Third, the legislative hearing model.[4] The court conducts a hearing in which all interested parties are invited to participate, often with relaxed rules of evidence. The judge uses the information gathered from the hearings to fashion the remedy. Fourth, the remedy can also be referred to an expert to develop and propose a remedy.[5] The expert should try to mobilize support among parties for his proposal, but should also bring his own expertise to the matter. The approach of the High Court in Centre for Child Law v MEC for Education partially fits this profile.[6] The Court ordered a school of industry that was failing to protect children's rights to undergo and implement a developmental quality assurance process.

Fifth, the court and the parties can develop 'structures that involve the interested actors in a process of developing a consensual remedy through joint fact-finding and collaborative decisionmaking assisted by a third party.'[7] In one case

[1] See Grootboom (supra) at para 97 (The Court held that the Human Rights Commission, who was a party to the case would monitor the State's progress and report on the progress if necessary.)

[2] S Sturm 'A Normative Theory of Public Law Remedies' (1991) 79 Georgetown LJ 1355 ('Normative Theory').

[3] 2008 (3) SA 208 (CC).

[4] Sturm 'Normative Theory' (supra) at 1370–1371.

[5] Ibid at 1371–1373.

[6] Unreported, Transvaal Provincial Division, Case No 19559/06 (30 June 2006).

[7] Sturm 'Normative Theory' (supra) at 1373–1374.

this involved, as a starting point, creating a computer program that mimicked the variables that applied to a dispute over fishing rights and then determined what possible solutions would meet all the parties' minimum requirements.[1] This 'consensual remedial formulation model' is an amalgam of the bargaining model and the expert model as the expert works with the parties to come to a solution.

Sturm finds inadequacies in all these models[2] and suggests a slight variation on the fifth option — which she calls the 'deliberative model' — as the most appropriate approach. Like the consensual model, a third party is appointed to engage with the stakeholders to reach a conclusion. The primary difference is that in the deliberative model the court is centrally involved at all stages of the process to ensure that fair procedures are followed. The court also ensures that the solution meets the original normative goals of the remedy and makes a decision if agreement cannot be reached.

In Canada, the question of structural interdicts is largely governed by the Supreme Court decision in Doucet-Boudreau.[3] The Court agreed that the government had not taken account of their obligation to provide all children with an education in either English or French when deciding where to build new schools. The High Court[4] had granted a structural interdict to solve the problem and the Supreme Court split 5–4 over whether that remedy was appropriate. The majority upheld the structural interdict, stressing the need to provide effective remedies and downplayed the danger of institutional interference.[5] Echoing the US Supreme Court, the majority also noted the need for appellate courts to defer to trial courts' determination of the appropriate remedy.[6] In the minority's view, the remedy required the trial court to take on an administrative or a political role, both of which were inappropriate for a court.[7] They believed that ordinary contempt of court procedures were sufficient to ensure compliance.[8]

(ii) The Case Law on Structural Interdicts

The first hint from the courts that supervisory orders were a possibility came in Pretoria City Council v Walker.[9] The case concerned discrimination arising from the [1] United States v Michigan File No M26–73CA (WD Mich, 7 May 1985) discussed in Sturm 'Normative Theory' (supra) at 1734. See also Brazil 'Special Masters in Complex Cases: Extending the Judiciary or Reshaping Adjudication?' (1986) 53 University of Chicago LR 394, 410.

[2] Sturm 'Normative Theory' (supra) at 1411–1427.

[3] Doucet-Boudreau v Nova Scotia (Department of Education) [2003] 3 SCR 3 ('Doucet-Boudreau'). For a full discussion of the case, see Roach & Budlender (supra) at 341–345.

[4] Doucet-Boudreau v Nova Scotia (Department of Education) 2000 CarswellNS 220.

[5] Doucet-Boudreau (supra) at paras 25 and 36 ('Deference ends . . . where the constitutional rights that the courts are charged with protecting begin.')

[6] Ibid at para 87.

[7] Ibid at paras 118–129.

[8] Ibid at para 136.

[9] 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC)('Walker').

use of different charging and collection policies for electricity rates in different areas of Pretoria. The Court found that the collection policies were unfairly discriminatory, but held that Mr Walker was not thereby entitled to — as he had — refuse to pay for his electricity as other remedies were available to him:

> Instead of withholding amounts lawfully owing by him to the council, [Mr Walker] could, for instance, have applied to an appropriate court for a declaration of rights or a mandamus in order to vindicate the breach of his [right to equality]. By means of such an order the council could have been compelled to take appropriate steps as soon as possible to eliminate the unfair differentiation and to report back to the court in question. The court would then have been in a position to give such further ancillary orders or directions as might have been necessary to ensure the proper execution of its order.[1]

In Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign the government argued that a court that found a violation of socio-economic rights could only make a declaratory order and leave it to the state to determine how to comply with that order.[2] An order that actually told government what to do would, the government submitted, violate the separation of powers by intruding into issues of policy, the realm of the legislature and executive. The Court strongly rejected this claim. While it acknowledged that courts should always pay 'due regard … to the roles of the Legislature and the Executive in a democracy', courts are also 'under a duty to ensure that effective relief is granted' and therefore must have the power 'to make orders that affect policy as well as legislation' including mandatory and supervisory orders.[3]

It is clear then, that courts have the power to make supervisory orders, but what have they done with it? The results have been mixed. The Constitutional Court has set a fairly high bar for the use of structural interdicts and it and the SCA have overturned some such orders made by the High Court, particularly in socio-economic rights cases. On the other hand, the Constitutional Court, the SCA and the High Courts have all indicated their willingness to supervise government's compliance in certain circumstances. The most recent instance also strongly suggests that such supervision will become more common in the future.

(aa) Cases where supervisory interdicts have been refused

The most important case on supervisory orders is Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign. The Constitutional Court held that the government's refusal to distribute the drug Nevirapine to prevent mother-to-child transmission of HIV/AIDS fell short of their obligations under the FC s 26(1)(a) to take reasonable measures to make healthcare progressively accessible.[4] The High Court had

[1] Walker (supra) at para 96 (my emphasis).

[2] 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC)('TAC') at paras 96–97.

[3] Ibid at paras 106 and 113. (The Court notes the support for this position in foreign jurisdictions (paras 107–111) and its own precedents supporting the need for effective relief and the power to grant mandatory orders where necessary. Ibid at paras 100–106.)

[4] For more on the right to health, see D Bilchitz 'Health' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 56A.

devised a supervisory interdict which ordered the government to develop a plan on how Nevirapine would be made available and to submit that plan to the Court for approval.[1] As noted earlier, the Constitutional Court confirmed the High Court's power to make such an order, however it determined that it was not appropriate in this case. The Court first established a strict test for when supervisory orders would be appropriate: '[Courts] should exercise such a power if it is necessary to secure compliance with a court order. That may be because of a failure to heed declaratory orders or other relief granted by a Court in a particular case.'[2] It then noted that government had 'always respected and executed orders of this Court' and that there was therefore 'no reason to believe that it will not do so in the present case.'[3] The Court made an order that both declared government's obligations and ordered them to take certain specific steps, while allowing government to deviate from the second part of the order if they found a better way to meet their obligations.[4]

The two important lessons to take from Treatment Action Campaign are: One, courts can grant supervisory orders even when they have policy implications, but, two, only where it is necessary to ensure compliance. The second lesson may seem to undermine the first as it will be very difficult to prove that supervision is necessary to ensure compliance unless a litigant can show that government is incompetent or in bad faith.

This view was given some credence in Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others.[5] The supervisory orders granted by the High Court was substituted on appeal. Rail Commuters concerned the duty of government to protect people using trains in the Western Cape from violence. The High Court had ordered the relevant organs of state to 'take all such steps … as are reasonably necessary to put in place proper and adequate safety and security services … in order to protect [the constitutional] rights of rail commuters'[6] and required them to submit reports to allow the court to evaluate their progress.[7] The Constitutional Court preferred to grant a simple declaratory order specifying the state's obligations and leaving it to the state to determine how to meet those benchmarks. Part of the reason given by O'Regan J was the flexibility afforded by declaratory orders,[8] but she also noted that '[t]here is nothing to suggest on the papers that [the state] will not take steps to comply with the terms of the order.'[9]

[1] 2002 (4) BCLR 356 (T).
[2] TAC (supra) at para 129 (my emphasis).
[3] Ibid.
[4] Ibid at para 135.
[5] 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC).
[6] 2003 (3) BCLR 288 (C) at order para 3.1.
[7] Ibid at order para 3.2.
[8] Rail Commuters (supra) at para 108. For more on declaratory orders, see § 9.6*(a)* supra.
[9] Rail Commuters (supra) at para 109.

The Supreme Court of Appeal has expressed a different set of reservations about supervisory orders. The facts of President of the Republic of South Africa v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd[1] are described in detail above,[2] but, in brief, people had invaded Modderklip's land and the state had been unable or unwilling to evict them. The High Court set out Modderklip's rights and required the government to submit a detailed plan of how it would remove the invaders from Modderklip's land and provide them with alternative housing.[3] On appeal, Harms JA advocated against supervisory orders

> Structural interdicts … have a tendency to blur the distinction between the executive and the judiciary and impact on the separation of powers. They tend to deal with policy matters and not with the enforcement of particular rights. Another aspect to take into account is the comity between the different arms of the state. Then there is the problem of sensible enforcement: the state must be able to comply with the order within the limits of its capabilities, financial or otherwise. Policies also change, as do requirements, and all this impacts on enforcement.[4]

Instead, he ordered the state to pay constitutional damages to Modderklip to compensate for his loss.[5] The Constitutional Court confirmed the SCA's order, but did not directly consider the High Court's supervisory order.[6]

(bb) Cases where supervisory interdicts have been granted

In August & Another v Electoral Commission the Court found that prisoners had been unconstitutionally deprived of their right to vote by the Electoral Commission's policy and ordered the Commission to make the necessary arrangements to permit prisoners to vote in the 1999 national elections.[7] Sachs J acknowledged that what those arrangements should be was 'a matter pre-eminently for the Commission' and that the Court did 'not have the information or expertise to enable it to decide what those arrangements should be or how they should be effected'.[8] It therefore ordered the Commission to draft an affidavit detailing what arrangements it would make and that that affidavit should be available for public inspection.[9] Although the Court did not specifically state this, it seems implicit that any of the parties or other interested persons who were unsatisfied with the Commission's plan could apply to the Court to rule on whether they

[1] 2004 (6) SA 40 (SCA), 2004 (8) BCLR 821 (SCA)('Modderklip SCA').
[2] See § 9.5*(a)*(ii)(aa) supra.
[3] 2003 (6) BCLR 616 (T) at para 52.
[4] Modderklip SCA (supra) at para 39.
[5] For more on constitutional damages, see § 9.5*(a)* supra.
[6] President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri SA & Others, Amici Curiae) 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC).
[7] 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC)('August').
[8] Ibid at para 39.
[9] Ibid.

were adequate. Five years later, the same issue arose in the 2004 elections.[1] Again the Court upheld prisoners' right to vote and again it ordered the Commission to lodge an affidavit explaining how the process would be managed.[2]

The Court's willingness to adopt supervisory orders in these cases probably rested on two factors. First, it would not be a long drawn out process of supervision of an institution, but a temporary supervision for a defined time. Second, and perhaps more importantly the task at hand — making it possible for prisoners to vote — was well defined and relatively simple, compared to, for example, the provisioning of housing for all people in the Johannesburg inner city. The Court probably felt that any disagreement on the plan adopted by the Commission was likely to be minor and could be easily resolved. The same would not be true when dealing with more complicated or institutional problems.

The Court engaged in a much more detailed supervisory process in Sibiya v The Director of Public Prosecutions, Johannesburg to regulate the conversion of sentences of people still sitting on death row after the death penalty was abolished.[3] The Government was required to submit information on all the prisoners still on death row and explain why their sentences had not yet been changed and what would be done to ensure that they were. The Court did not justify its supervision of the process in its original judgment, but later explained that it was based on 'the delay that had occurred since [the death penalty was declared unconstitutional] coupled with the pressing need for the sentences to be replaced'.[4] The Court eventually considered five reports by the government until the process was finalized. The first report set out the number of sentences that still needed to be converted while each subsequent report indicated what steps had been taken and what still remained to be done. The entire Court considered in detail each report and identified what problems remained and ordered a further report to be made. At the completion of the process, the Court issued a judgment reflecting on the supervisory process in generally positive terms:

> This judgment on the supervisory process in relation to the substitution of the death sentence shows the following:
> (a) Successful supervision requires that detailed information be placed at the disposal of a court.
> (b) Supervision entails a careful analysis and evaluation of the details provided.
> (c) Supervision cannot succeed without the full co-operation of others in the process.
> (d) Courts should exercise flexibility in the supervisory process.[5]

[1] Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Reintegration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC)('NICRO').

[2] Ibid at para 80 (This part of the order is not discussed in the body of the judgment. Presumably the same reasoning applied as in August.)

[3] 2005 (5) SA 315 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 812 (CC)('Sibiya I'). The death penalty was abolished in S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC).

[4] Sibiya & Others v DPP, Johannesburg High Court & Others 2006 (2) BCLR 293 (CC)('Sibiya III') at para 6.

[5] Ibid at para 22.

Sibiya reflects a growing comfort in the Court with supervision and satisfaction with their first serious foray into that area. Their emphasis on detail is particularly interesting. Yacoob J wrote that '[t]he detail was … essential so that this Court would not have to rely completely on the say-so of some other person that a particular stage in the process had been reached; there had to be sufficient information for the Court itself to be satisfied that a particular stage had been reached.'[1] This indicates that the Court is willing to engage in detailed analysis of government's plans and to identify the problems in them. Perhaps another explanation for the original order and the Court's satisfaction with the process is that Sibiya did not require the Court to substitute its own opinion for that of the government, but merely to ensure that the government completed a process to which it had already committed itself.

Although the SCA's dislike for supervisory orders was made clear in Modderklip, it has recently granted a supervisory order in a socio-economic case: City of Johannesburg v Rand Properties (Pty) Ltd & Others.[2] The court held that, although the City was entitled to evict people from buildings in the inner city, it had to provide them with alternative housing. It ordered the City to file an affidavit showing that it had done so. On appeal to the Constitutional Court, the Court, in the course of oral argument, ordered the parties to negotiate and attempt to reach a settlement.[3] The parties did so and the Court was thus spared deciding any further the question of remedy. Of course, the order to negotiate is itself a form of supervisory interdict as the parties were required to report back to the Court on their progress and the Court still had a discretion whether to make the agreement an order of court.

The High Court has been more willing to craft supervisory interdicts. What is particularly interesting is that many of the cases in which it has done so involve children.[4] In S v Z and 23 Similar Cases the Eastern Cape High Court was confronted with the problem that juvenile offenders were being sentenced to attend reform schools, yet there was no reform school in the Eastern Cape.[5] The result was that many juveniles were being held for long periods of time in places of safety, prison and police cells. Plaskett J found this situation unacceptable and, after hinting at the utility of a supervisory order, postponed the matter for further consideration. When it was considered again, Plaskett J ordered the state to report

[1] Sibiya III (supra) at para 7.
[2] 2007 (6) BCLR 643 (SCA).
[3] [2008] ZACC 1.
[4] See, eg Grootboom & Others v Oostenberg Municipality & Others 2000 (3) BCLR 277 (C). Davis J held that the state's failure to provide temporary shelter for families desperately in need violated the FC s 28(1)(c) right of children to 'basic shelter'. However, Davis J did not want to be 'prescriptive' about how the state should fulfill its obligations and therefore did not grant an interdict. Instead, he made a declaration of rights and retained supervisory jurisdiction by ordering the government to submit a plan that would then be responded to by the other parties and would ultimately be considered by the Court.
[5] 2004 (4) BCLR 410 (E)('Z and 23') discussed in Roach & Budlender (supra) at 331.

every four months to the Judge President of the Court, the Inspecting Judge of Prisons and two interested NGO's on the progress made in converting the facility where children were currently held and on building a reform school until the Judge President released them from the obligation.[1] This is a fascinating case because the Court is willing to undertake, in partnership with other interested bodies, the supervision of the sizable project of building a new school for an indefinite time.

More recently the Centre for Child Law approached the Pretoria High Court to force the provincial government to improve conditions for children staying at a so-called 'school of industry'.[2] Murphy J granted a wide-ranging order that required the state to immediately provide sleeping bags to the children, devise plans to control access to the school, subject the school to a developmental quality assurance process and commit to implement the plans arising from that process. The High Court retained supervisory jurisdiction over the implementation of this order. A supervisory order was also held to be necessary in S v Mokoena; S v Phaswane where the Court ordered radical revisions to the law regulating how children testify in criminal proceedings including requirements that any trial involving children be expedited and that children were entitled to testify through an intermediary.[3] The responsible government agencies were ordered to report back to the Court on the progress that had been made in implementing the order a year later.[4]

Why have the High Courts been so willing to intervene in cases involving children? Firstly, the High Court is, even under common law, the upper guardian of all children.[5] It therefore feels an innate responsibility to ensure their well-being which it may not feel for adults. Secondly, children's rights are all — unlike socio-economic rights — couched in absolute terms. Judges feel more comfortable intervening in government where there is a clear interest to protect rather than where the right is limited to the construction of a reasonable plan where policy is likely to play a much greater role.

There have, however, been several cases not involving children. As I noted earlier, the High Court's supervisory orders in TAC and Modderklip in other areas were overruled on appeal. That was not the case in City of Cape Town v Rudolph.[6] The City had attempted to evict a group of people from vacant public land. The occupiers replied with a counterclaim alleging that the City had failed to fulfill their obligations to provide them with housing. Selikowitz J agreed with the occupiers on

[1] S v Zuba [2004] ZAECHC 3.
[2] Unreported, Transvaal Provincial Division, Case No 19559/06 (30 June 2006)('Centre for Child Law').
[3] [2008] ZAGPHC 148.
[4] At the time of writing, the case was before the Constitutional Court for confirmation.
[5] See Z and 23 (supra) at para 39.
[6] 2004 (5) SA 39 (C)('Rudolph').

both counts and made a supervisory order to ensure the City fulfilled its obligations. He distinguished the case from TAC by pointing out that a mere declaration had already been made — by the Constitutional Court in Grootboom.[1] The failure of the City to comply with that order justified the Court taking over supervision of the City's provision of housing.

The High Court has also supervised the provision of antiretrovirals to HIV positive prisoners in KwaZulu-Natal,[2] the provision of electricity to prisoners in Pretoria[3] and the creation of an administrative regime to process asylum-seekers in Cape Town.[4] This final case warrants further consideration. The refugee centres in Cape Town were seriously overwhelmed and many asylum-seekers were unable to get access to them in order to seek refugee status despite sleeping outside the centres because only a limited number of people were admitted each day.[5] The applicants argued, and the Court held, that this failure violated both South Africa's international law obligations and the constitutional rights to life and freedom and security of the person.[6] Van Reenen J emphasised that 'as far as the upholding of the fundamental rights and other imperatives of the Constitution are concerned, all those involved in the public administration, must, despite a lack of adequate resources, purposefully take all reasonable steps to ensure maximum compliance with constitutional obligations even under difficult circumstances'.[7] In order to ensure that refugees would be able to access the centres, he granted a wide-ranging supervisory order that compelled the government to produce a report detailing: the number of officials assigned to each centre; which days of the week such tasks are performed; whether provision has been made for overtime; the number of applicants at each centre; the extent of the backlog of applications; the progress that has been made with each application; whether any remedial steps have resulted in improvements; and what other plans had been made for improvement.[8] The court and the other parties would then be able to comment on the report and monitor the state's progress in improving the situation.

(iii) Factors to draw from the case law

Kent Roach and Geoff Budlender identify three types of cases where supervisory intervention is appropriate.[9] Although the authors frame these as separate

[1] Rudolph (supra) at 88.
[2] EN & Others v Government of RSA & Others 2007 (1) BCLR 84 (D)('EN').
[3] Strydom v Minister of Correctional Services 1999 (3) BCLR 342 (W)(The Court found that certain prisoners had a right to electrical plug points in their cells and ordered the Minister to make them available. Schwartzman J required the Minister to submit a report indicating the timeline for completion of the project.)
[4] Kiliko & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2007 (4) BCLR 416 (C)('Kiliko').
[5] Ibid at para 10.
[6] Ibid at para 31.
[7] Ibid at para 29 citing Jaipal v S 2005 (4) SA 581 (CC), 2005 (5) BCLR 423 (CC) at para 56.
[8] Kiliko (supra) at para 32.
[9] 'Mandatory Relief and Supervisory Jurisdiction: When is it Appropriate, Just and Equitable?' (2005) 122 SALJ 325.

cases, they could of course overlap so that it is perhaps better to think of them as factors, rather than categories. In some cases one factor will favour supervision, while another will act against it.[1]

The first factor is whether there is any reason to believe that the government will not comply completely with the order.[2] If government has previously failed to comply with an order, or has been slow in doing so, or if there is any other reason to believe they may not comply with this order, supervision may be warranted. Both Sibiya (where the government had failed to implement the decision in Makwanyane) and Rudolph (where the government had failed to implement Grootboom) indicate the effect of this thinking.[3] This also seems to have been the primary barrier to the Constitutional Court granting supervisory orders in TAC and Rail Commuters; there was no reason to believe the government would not comply with a declaration.

Second, the consequences of non-compliance with the order: the more severe the consequences, the more likely a court will be to supervise to ensure that it is complied with.[4] This could include concerns about the importance of the right at issue as well as practical concerns such as how many people will be affected by the order and whether the result of delay will be discomfort or death or something in between. The children's rights cases discussed above reflect this rationale as the best interests of the child are treated by the Final Constitution as 'paramount' and therefore it is easier to justify intrusions on the separations of powers to protect them than it is for other rights. It might also relate to the need for deadlines. If the harm will be increased by delay, there would be a stronger case for supervision.[5] In EN if the applicants did not receive antiretrovirals they could die within a couple of weeks. The High Court therefore ordered antiretrovirals to be supplied immediately and gave government only two weeks to come up with further plans.[6]

The last factor identified by Roach and Budlender is how clear it is what steps should be taken to fix the problem.[7] If it is clear, then a simple mandamus may be sufficient. If it is unclear, then supervision may be necessary to determine in consultation with all stakeholders what the appropriate relief is. This was the primary motivator of the supervision ordered by the High Court in Grootboom and was probably also part of the reasoning in Kiliko. As I argued earlier, this is a distinct purpose for supervisory orders; the other purpose is ensuring compliance. There may be cases where an order that is perfectly clear would still need to be monitored to ensure compliance.

[1] For example, in NICRO and August the relief was clear and there was no reason to suspect
[2] Roach & Budlender (supra) at 333.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Ibid.
[5] That would have been the case in, for example, Sibiya III, NICRO and August (supra).
[6] EN (supra) at para 33.
[7] Roach & Budlender (supra) at 334.

(iv) Nyathi

Mr Nyathi was injured as a result of negligence in a government hospital. He sued the government and they conceded liability but disputed the amount of compensation they owed him. Pending the hearing on quantum, Mr Nyathi wrote a letter requesting interim relief, both for medical expenses and for money to permit him to pay his legal expenses for the quantum trial. The state again refused, so Mr Nyathi brought an application to compel the state to make an interim payment. The state ignored the application and it was granted. The state ignored it. Fast running out of options, Mr Nyathi argued that s 3 of the State Liability Act[1] which prohibited the execution and attachment of state property violated his rights to equality and access to court. He succeeded in the High Court[2] and the matter was sent to the Constitutional Court for confirmation. On the day of the hearing in the Constitutional Court and under immense pressure from the Justices, the state finally paid Mr Nyathi. The determination of the constitutional challenge was postponed. Before it could be decided, Mr Nyathi died.[3]

This is the background — which I think is vital to understand the Court's reaction — to the decision in Nyathi v MEC for Health, Gauteng.[4] The Constitutional Court confirmed the High Court's finding that s 3 was unconstitutional; but what is interesting for our purposes, is that it also crafted an order whereby the Court would supervise the payment of all the government's outstanding judgment debts. Astonishingly, considering the Court's earlier distaste for supervisory orders, the Court granted this order on its own initiative.

The reasoning behind the order is murky, to say the least. The Court does not clearly explain why a supervisory order is necessary — as was required by TAC — to ensure compliance. The heart of the reasoning seems to come when Madala J states that > we need legislative measures that will provide an effective way in which judgment orders may be satisfied, and mechanisms that will inform the litigants in detail on the procedures that they will need to follow regarding payment of court orders against the state. It has become necessary for this Court to oversee the process of compliance with court orders and to ensure ultimately that compliance is both lasting and effective.[5]

This excerpt is difficult to understand and does not support the order made. The first sentence calls for legislative measures to regulate the payment of judgment debts, which does not imply the need for court supervision, but for intervention by the legislature.

[1] Act 20 of 1957.

[2] Nyathi v MEC for the Department of Health, Gauteng & Another, 26014/2005 TPD, 30 March 2007, unreported.

[3] Cases like Nyathi cannot but remind us that, in Robert Cover's famous assertion: 'Legal interpretation takes place in a field of pain and death'. 'Violence and the Word' (1986) 95 Yale LJ 1601, 1601.

[4] [2008] ZACC 8 ('Nyathi').

[5] Ibid at para 83.

Later, Madala J argues that 'oversight is essential in the circumstances … [because] there can be no other effective manner to ensure that the state complies with the order'[1] and that '[i]n a state that has pledged itself to redeem the dignity of its citizens, it should not be the state itself that tramples on the rights of its citizens. On the contrary, everyone should be working tirelessly to protect and promote that dignity'.[2] These passages provide a clearer indication of the Court's reasoning. Although there was no indication that the government would not comply with an order by the Constitutional Court in the particular case, the government had clearly shown its disregard for court orders and for the dignity of its citizens generally by its continued failure to pay their judgment debts. The TAC assumption that Government would comply with any order the court made in Nyathi therefore no longer applied and supervision was necessary.

It is this reasoning that suggests that Nyathi may have far-reaching implications. If the impression that government was unwilling to comply with court orders is a general impression that applies to all instances when government is before the courts, then it must also apply in future cases. That is, the disdain for the courts proved in Nyathi was so serious that the courts will be unlikely in the future to ever take government assurances of compliance seriously. That may seem like an exaggeration. But consider the alternative position. It would make no sense to argue that the record of non-compliance in Nyathi only indicated that government would continue not to comply in another single case. Why would that general attitude change after one case? It is for that reason that I think the Court will be much more willing to grant supervisory orders in the future and that government will have to build up a record of compliance to re-establish the TAC assumption of compliance.

(v) A Theory for Systemic Remedies

Roach and Budlender have suggested a more general structure for considering remedies to systemic violations of rights. Drawing from the work of other scholars,[3] they argue that there are generally three levels of supervision that ought to be based on the attitude of government that is causing the problem: inattentiveness, incompetence and intransigence. I present their suggestions together with my own embellishments.

At the first level, the problem is mere inattentiveness on government's part. Once government's attention is drawn to the problem they are able and willing to fix it. At this stage, the appropriate order is, on Roach and Budlender's account, a declaration of rights accompanied by a requirement that government report to the public on its progress. There are two reasons for the reporting requirement. Firstly, it is difficult to be sure whether the reason for the violation of rights is truly inattentiveness and not unwillingness or inability. Reporting serves as a backstop that puts continued pressure on government to comply with the order. The history of compliance with the Grootboom and TAC orders show how useful a reporting requirement might have been. Secondly, it is a means to keep the public informed of the progress that is being made, both to allow them to prepare and to influence the process. August is the best example of this.[1] There was no question about the Electoral Commission's willingness to comply with the order, but supervision was ordered because it was necessary to have certainty on the steps that would be taken to allow prisoners to vote.[2]

[1] Nyatahi (supra) at para 85.
[2] Ibid at para 89.
[3] See C Hansen 'Inattentive, Intransigent and Incompetent' in SR Humm (ed) Child, Parent and State (1994) and J Braithwaite Restorative Justice and Responsive Regulation (2002). See also K Cooper-Stephenson 'Principle and Pragmatism in the Law of Remedies' in J Bennyman (ed) Remedies: Issues and Perspectives (1991) 1; K Roach Constitutional Remedies (1994).

It seems to me that there is an additional reason for supervision: determining the terms of the remedy. Even a government that is merely inattentive may not be clear of what should be done to solve the problem once their attention is drawn to it. Supervision may be necessary to help the government devise a plan, especially if the constitutional rights at issue require relatively quick action.

The supervision at this level is both distant and light. It is distant because the Court will generally not scrutinize the government's plans in detail and will allow them space to determine how to meet their obligations. It is light because it gives the government 'two more chances'.[3] Because it is based on a declaration, it cannot found an order of contempt of court; a further order turning the declaration into an interdict and non-compliance with the interdict will be necessary before any contempt proceedings could be brought.

The next level addresses government incompetence.[4] As Roach and Budlender argue, incompetence is probably the most common reason for non-fulfillment of rights and non-compliance with orders. Supervision is justified because without it government, even with the best of intentions, may not be able to meet its commitments. It should not be seen as punishment, but as a means to help government to comply with its constitutional obligations.[5] As a result, it may often require much closer or more detailed supervision by the court than is the case at the first level. Supervision may also include the use of outside experts to determine what the appropriate remedy should be.[6] The use of a developmental quality assurance process in Centre for Child Law is a good example of that sort of process.[7] The remedy at this level will normally be based on an interdict rather than a declaration. However, Roach and Budlender argue that the interdict

[1] Roach & Budlender (supra) at 348.
[2] August (supra) at para 39.
[3] Roach & Budlender (supra) at 348 citing O Fiss 'Dombroski' (1977) Yale LJ 1103, 1122–1124.
[4] Roach & Budlender (supra) at 349–350.
[5] Ibid at 350.
[6] Ibid at 349–350.
[7] Centre for Child Law (supra).

might not be in specific enough terms so that it can result immediately in a finding of contempt. This is the kind of order the Court devised in TAC (without, of course, any supervision). The government was ordered to take various steps to provide Nevirapine, but was allowed to deviate from the Court's order if they thought there was a better way to achieve the goal. That type of interdict can hardly found a finding of contempt. Depending on the facts, a supervisory interdict may also be necessary. Kiliko is an excellent example of this. There was no bad will on government's part, merely an inability to comply due to a lack of resources. Once the Court decided that the provision of services to refugees was sufficiently important, they could ensure that resources were channeled in that direction and were most effectively used to aid refugees.

Government intransigence, or purposeful non-compliance, is the target of the third level.[1] Supervision will be necessary even for the simplest goals in order to ensure, through the threat of contempt, that government does in fact do what it is meant to do. Supervision will generally be extremely close to ensure that government does not try through subterfuge to avoid or undermine compliance with the order. It will also be heavy as it will be accompanied by the immediate threat of contempt in the case of non-compliance. The need to give government space to determine how best to achieve a goal will give way here to the necessity of ensuring government does something. The order will be based on a detailed interdict to ensure that contempt is an immediate threat.

EN fits into this category. Pillay J admitted that he was initially skeptical of a supervisory order because the government 'had shown some sense of commitment, however inadequate and irrational, to redress [the applicants'] plight.'[2] However, after considering the evidence he found that government had not provided any 'rational or workable' solutions and those steps that had been taken had been 'characterised by delays, obstacles and restrictions which seriously compromise the [applicants'] health'.[3] The order compelled the government not only to submit a plan but to immediately provide anti-retrovirals. This was enforceable by a contempt order. Indeed, this is what happened when the compliance with the order was considered.[4] Nicholson J found that the government had failed to comply with Pillay J's order and were therefore in contempt.[5] However, because s 3 of the State Liability Act prevented him from taking any steps to enforce an order of contempt and because the government had made some progress in complying with the order, he granted an extension rather than an order of contempt.[6] The Judge however summed up the serious problems faced when government refuses to comply with Court orders:

[1] Roach & Budlender (supra) at 350–351.
[2] EN (supra) at para 32.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Treatment Action Campaign & Others v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others [2006] ZAKZHC 9('TAC 2006').
[5] Ibid at para 29.
[6] Ibid at paras 29–34.

> If the refusal to comply does not result from instructions from the first respondent, the Government of the Republic of South Africa, then the remaining respondents must be disciplined, either administratively or in an employment context, for their delinquency. If the Government of the Republic of South Africa has given such an instruction then we face a grave constitutional crisis involving a serious threat to the doctrine of the separation of powers. Should that continue the members of the judiciary will have to consider whether their oath of office requires them to continue on the bench.[1]

(vi) Beyond Supervision

Although supervision is a progressive and extremely effective remedy, there are other possibilities that go beyond supervision. One of these possibilities is the 'experimentalist approach'.[2] Unlike traditional supervisory orders where government bodies are required to comply with specific rules, the experimentalist approach 'combines more flexible and provisional norms with procedures for ongoing stakeholder participation and measured accountability'.[3] There is no one set of orders that compromises the experimentalist approach. Basically it involves helping institutions to improve themselves by seeing what works and what doesn't under the guidance of the court. Courts are, as Sabel and Simon note, both more and less involved in experimental remedies than they are in ordinary supervisory orders:

> They are more involved because experimentalist remedies contemplate a permanent process of ramifying, participatory self-revision rather than a one-time readjustment to fixed criteria. But the courts are less involved because the norms that define compliance at any one moment are the work not of the judiciary, but of the actors who live by them. At least in prospect, the demands on the managerial capacities of the court, and the risk to its political legitimacy, are smaller in this continuous collaborative process than in top-down reform under court direction.[4]

The very idea with the experimentalist approach is to open up spaces for innovation. In Roberto Unger's phrase experimentalist remedies are 'destabilization

[1] TAC 2006 (supra) at para 33.

[2] See generally, C Sabel & W Simon 'Destabilization Rights: How Public Law Litigation Succeeds' (2004) 117 Harvard LR 1015; M Dorf & C Sabel 'A Constitution of Democratic Experimentalism' (1998) 98 Columbia LR 267; M Dorf & B Friedman 'Shared Constitutional Interpretation' (2000) Supreme Court Review 61; M Dorf '1997 Supreme Court Term Foreword: The Limits of Socratic Deliberation' (1998) 112 Harvard LR 4 (1998); S Sturm 'Second Generation Employment Discrimination: A Structural Approach' (2001) 101 Columbia LR 452. S Sturm 'The Promise of Participation' (1993) 78 Iowa LR 981, 987–991, 1002–1010; S Sturm 'A Normative Theory of Public Law Remedies' (1991) 79 Georgetown LJ 1357; A Fung & EO Wright 'Deepening Democracy: Innovations in Empowered Participatory Governance' (1998) 29(1) Science & Society 5; Woolman 'Application' (supra) at Chapter 31; Woolman and Botha 'Limitations' (supra) at Chapter 34; S Woolman The Selfless Constitution: Experimentation & Flourishing as the Foundation of South Africa's Basic Law (forthcoming 2009).

[3] Sabel and Simon (supra) at 1019.

[4] Ibid at 1020.

rights'[1] that aim to induce uncertainty.[2] The use of the phrase 'right' also indicates how experimentalism breaks down the barriers traditionally established between rights and remedies.[3] Experimentalist remedies also try to get as many stakeholders as possible involved in the determination of an appropriate solution.

Another possibility is to force the parties to negotiate to a settlement.[4] The Constitutional Court did this in Occupiers of 51 Olivia Road, Berea Township and 197 Main Street Johannesburg v City of Johannesburg & Others.[5] The applicants were living in terrible conditions in rundown buildings in the Johannesburg city centre. The City wanted to evict them, allegedly, because the buildings were a health risk.[6] The applicants did not want to leave because there was no other accommodation available near the downtown area where they needed to live to get work. During oral argument, the Court decided to order the parties to try to reach a settlement. The parties were able to negotiate successfully and agreed that government would make improvements to the buildings to remove the health risk as an interim remedy while a more permanent solution was sought for all people living in the inner city. The Court endorsed the agreement, but made it clear that endorsement was not automatic; an agreement would only be endorsed if it was a reasonable response to the problem.[7] In light of this renewed attitude of engagement, the Court declined to rule on the City's long term obligations:

> The City has agreed that these solutions will be developed in consultation with them. The complaint by the occupiers that negotiations have been marred by unclear and inconcrete housing plans is not in my view a sufficient reason for this Court to consider this question at this stage. There is every reason to believe that negotiations will continue in good faith. The situation now is very different from that which confronted the occupiers in the High Court. The City has shown a willingness to engage. As a result, the desperate situation of the occupiers has been alleviated by the reasonable response of the City to the engagement process. There is no reason to think that future engagement will not be meaningful and will not lead to a reasonable result. In any event this Court should not be the court of first and

[1] False Necessity: Anti-Necessitarian Social Theory in the Service of Radical Democracy (1987) 530.

[2] See Sabel & Simon (supra) at 1055 ('The message that the new public law sends to prospective defendants is not that they will suffer any specific set of consequences in the event of default, but that they will suffer loss of independence and increased uncertainty. Uncertainty does not represent a failure of articulation but the deliberate crux of the message.')

[3] See § 9.2*(c)* supra.

[4] See Lingwood & Another v The unlawful occupiers of R/E of Erf 9 Highlands 2008 (3) BCLR 325 (W)(Court ordered the parties and the City of Johannesburg to engage in mediation to find a suitable solution. In my considered view, the justice and equity of the matter dictates that the parties . . . engage in mediation in an endeavour to achieve mutually acceptable solutions, and in achieving the underlying philosophy of [the Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act 19 of 1998], "to promote the constitutional vision of a caring society based on good neighbourliness and shared concern" and in line with the spirit of ubuntu which "suffuse the whole constitutional order"'.)

[5] 2008 (3) SA 208 (CC)('Occupiers of 51 Olivia Road').

[6] The real reason behind the evictions was a plan to gentrify the inner city.

[7] Occupiers of 51 Olivia Road (supra) at para 30. Yacoob J also noted that ideally these negotiations should occur prior to litigation. Ibid.

> last instance on whether the City has acted reasonably in the process. Nor should it be the only determinant of whether the plan is reasonable in the sense of being sufficiently concrete and clear. It is the duty of both parties to continue with the process of negotiation and for the occupiers or the City to approach the High Court if this course becomes necessary.[1]

As David Bilchitz notes, there are real benefits to this approach.[2] It forced the government to encompass opinions of those affected by the decisions and provided a solution that both sides could agree to. But there are also shortcomings. The Court's related decision to avoid deciding the constitutional duty of the City meant that, should the engagement fail, the applicants will have to go back to the High Court and fund and endure another round of litigation. If the parties had not reached agreement, the Court might have been compelled to decide the issue and thus potentially avoid future disagreement and suffering. There is also a possibility that negotiation will not be meaningful because of unequal power relations between the parties. If the applicants had not been represented by extremely competent lawyers, it is possible that the City could have negotiated an agreement that was not in the applicants' interests. Courts should be aware of this danger both when ordering negotiation and when monitoring the results of that engagement.

9.7 LEGISLATIVE REMEDIES

Many constitutional rights are regulated by specific pieces of legislation including:

- The Labour Relations Act (FC s 23)[3]
- The National Environmental Management Act (FC s 24)[4]
- The Promotion of Administrative Justice Act (FC s 33)[5]
- The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act (FC s 9)[6]

[1] Occupiers of 151 Olivia Road (supra) at para 34.

[2] 'Taking Socio-economic Rights Seriously: The Substantive and Procedural Implications' in Geraldine van Bueren (ed) Freedom from Poverty (2008 forthcoming).

[3] Act 66 of 1995 (LRA). For more on the LRA and its relation to FC s 23, see C Cooper 'Labour Relations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 53.

[4] Act 107 of 1998 (NEMA). For more on NEMA and s 24, see M van der Linde & E Basson 'Environment' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS1, Forthcoming 2009) Chapter 50.

[5] Act 3 of 2000 (PAJA). For more on PAJA, see G Penfold & J Klaaren 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 63; C Hoexter Administrative Law in South Africa (2007).

[6] Act 4 of 2000 (PEPUDA). For more on PEPUDA and the right to equality, see C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 35.

- The Promotion of Access to Information Act (FC s 32)[1]
- The Restitution of Land Rights Act (FC s 25(7))[2]
- The Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act (FC s 25(6))[3]

When parties rely on these rights, they must first bring their case under the legislation that gives effect to these rights. In the words of the Constitutional Court:

> [A] litigant who seeks to assert [a constitutional right] should in the first place base his or her case on any legislation enacted to regulate the right, not on [the section of the Final Constitution]. If the legislation is wanting in its protection of the … right in the litigant's view, then that legislation should be challenged constitutionally. To permit the litigant to ignore the legislation and rely directly on the constitutional provision would be to fail to recognise the important task conferred upon the legislature by the Constitution to respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights.[4]

The legislation cannot be used to challenge other pieces of legislation — in those cases the constitutional right is still the only option. But in all other cases, if the dispute in question is captured by the statute, a litigant must bring his case 'within the four corners of [the relevant] Act.'[5]

The majority of these pieces of legislation not only provide the normative framework to determine whether a right has been violated, they also determine what remedies are available if the statute has been violated. Litigants must therefore frame not only their substantive claim, but also their remedial claim under the statute. However, most of the statutes do not strictly limit the relief a court can grant; they grant a general power to afford 'appropriate' or 'just and equitable' relief and then provide a non-exclusive list of remedies that are included in that power.[6] For example, s 21(2) of PEPUDA empowers the court to 'make an appropriate order in the circumstances' and then lists 16 possible forms of relief. When phrased in this way, the legislation is suggestive rather than prescriptive. However, it may still limit a court's discretion by setting a higher bar for certain

[1] Act 2 of 2000 (PAIA). For more on PAIA and the right of access to information, see J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Access to Information' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS1, 2009) Chapter 62. See also I Currie & J Klaaren The Promotion of Access to Information Act Commentary (2002).

[2] Act 22 of 1994. For more on the Act and FC s 25(7), see J Pienaar & J Brickhill 'Land' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 48.

[3] Act 19 of 1998 (PIE). For more on PIE and FC s 25(6), see Pienaar & Brickhill (supra) at Chapter 48.

[4] South African Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Others 2007 (5) SA 400 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 863 (CC) at para 52. See also KwaZulu-Natal MEC for Education & Others v Pillay 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC)('Pillay') at para 40.

[5] Pillay (supra) at para 40.

[6] PEPUDA s 21(1), PAJA s 8(1) and PAIA s 82.

remedies. Section 8 of PAJA, for example, only permits a court to replace an invalid decision with its own decision or to award compensation in 'exceptional circumstances'.[1]

Some legislation, such as the LRA, is more prescriptive. In the case of ordinary[2] unfair dismissals, for example, the LRA does not provide the Labour Court with a general remedial power, but limits the power to re-instatement, re-employment or compensation[3] and strictly limits the conditions for the re-instatement, re-employment[4] and the amount of compensation.[5] It is, in part, because of these remedial limits that litigants have tried to avoid the jurisdiction of the Labour Court by framing their labour disputes either directly under FC s 23 or as contractual[6] or administrative claims.[7] However, the Constitutional Court has recently expressed disapproval of this practice and has stressed that labour law issues should be dealt within the framework of labour law[8] so it is unclear whether litigants will still be able to seek remedies outside those provided for in the LRA.

9.8 Criminal remedies

The availability of remedies in the context of a criminal trial is dealt with in detail elsewhere in this work.[9] However, for the sake of completeness, I address the topic very briefly here. Before I mention some of the available remedies, I must note that the same basic principles of remedies discussed in the first half of the chapter apply to remedies in criminal trials. Indeed, I have used some criminal cases in explicating those principles.

One of the most common uses of the Final Constitution in criminal trials is to exclude unconstitutionally obtained evidence. This issue is directly addressed by FC s 35(5) which reads:

> Evidence obtained in a manner that violates any right in the Bill of Rights must be excluded if the admission of that evidence would render the trial unfair or otherwise be detrimental to the administration of justice.[10]

[1] PAJA s 8(1)(c)(ii).

[2] If the dismissal is automatically unfair or based on operational requirements, the Labour Court does have a general remedial discretion. LRA s 193(3).

[3] LRA s 193(1).

[4] LRA s 193(2).

[5] LRA 194.

[6] See, for example, Fedlife Assurance Ltd v Wolfaardt 2002 (1) SA 49 (SCA).

[7] See, for example, Mgijima v Eastern Cape Appropriate Technology Unit and Another 2000 (2) SA 291 (Tk); Coin Security Group (Pty) Ltd v SA National Union for Security Officers and Other Workers and Others 1998 (1) SA 685 (C).

[8] See Chirwa v Transnet Ltd & Others 2008 (3) BCLR 251 (CC) particularly the judgment of Ngcobo J. For justified criticism of this element (and others) of Chirwa see C Hoexter. Clearing the Intersection? Administrative Law and Labour Law in the Constitutional Court' (2008) 1 Constitutional Court Review (forthcoming).

[9] See F Snyckers & J le Roux 'Criminal Procedure: The Rights of Arrested, Accused and Detained Persons' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 51; P Schwikkard 'Evidence' in S Woolman, T Roux & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 52.

[10] FC s 35(5) is discussed at length in Schwikkard 'Evidence' (supra) at Chapter 52.

What is interesting about this remedy is that the terms for its use are specifically set in the text of the Constitution: (a) the evidence was gathered in a way that violates a constitutional right; (b) including the evidence would either (i) render the trial unfair; or (ii) be detrimental to the administration of justice. The Constitutional Court has emphasised that this is a decision that should principally be made by the trial court; evidence should not be excluded in pre-trial proceedings by other courts.[1]

Another possible remedy is a permanent stay of prosecution which prevents the accused from ever being tried on the same charges again.[2] This remedy is very rare in South Africa and will only be granted where the accused can show that it is impossible for him to receive a fair trial. For irregularities at trial, the obvious remedies are an acquittal or invalidating the trial. The Constitutional Court has adopted the pre-constitutional standard to determine the appropriate remedy. If the irregularity is not too serious, the court on appeal can reconsider the facts, excluding any evidence tainted by the irregularity, and convict or acquit the accused. Only when the irregularity is so severe that it cannot be said that a trial actually took place will a court set aside the trial.[3] When it sets aside a trial, unlike when it orders a permanent stay of prosecution, there is nothing to prevent the charges from being brought again. An arrested or detained person may also approach a court for an interdict to ensure that his rights are respected.[4]

[1] Thint (Pty) Ltd v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Others; Zuma & Another v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Others [2008] ZACC 13 at paras 215–223.

[2] See generally, Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC).

[3] See generally, S v Shaik & Others 2008 (2) SA 208 (CC), 2007 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC); Veldman v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) 2007 (3) SA 210 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 (CC).

[4] See, for example, Strydom v Minister of Correctional Services 1999 (3) BCLR 342 (W).

10 Democracy

Theunis Roux

10.1 Introduction 10–1
10.2 Democracy in political theory 10–3
(a) Direct democracy 10–4
(b) Representative democracy 10–8
(c) Contemporary accounts of democracy 10–11
(i) Pluralist democracy 10–12
(ii) Participatory democracy 10–14
(iii) Deliberative democracy 10–15
(d) Constitutional democracy 10–18
10.3 Constitutional provisions referring to democracy 10–22
(a) Preamble 10–22
(b) Founding provisions 10–24
(c) Democracy in the Bill of Rights 10–32
(d) The powers and functions of Parliament, the provincial legislatures and municipal councils 10–37
(i) Rules and orders concerning legislative business must take account of representative and participatory democracy 10–38
(ii) Participation by minority parties in proceedings of Parliament, provincial legislatures and municipal councils 10–39
(iii) Public access to and involvement in Parliament and the provincial legislatures 10–43
(e) Miscellaneous provisions 10–45
10.4 Constitutional rights shaping South African democracy 10–46
(a) Freedom of expression 10–48
(b) Political rights 10–53
(c) Socio-economic rights 10–57

10.5 The principle of democracy in South African constitutional law 10–62
(a) Introduction 10–62
(b) The principle of democracy in the constitutional text . . 10–65
(c) The principle of democracy in the case law 10–69

10.1 INTRODUCTION

Democracy is a noun permanently in search of a qualifying adjective. The core idea — that decisions affecting the members of a political community should be taken by the members themselves, or at least by elected representatives whose power to make those decisions ultimately derives from the members — is more or less settled. Even this relatively simple statement, however, does not fit many political systems that are widely regarded as democratic. Constitutional democracies by definition immunize certain decisions from popular control, but are not undemocratic for that reason alone.[1] And liberal democracies, by restricting the legitimate scope of collective decision-making, define the boundary between public and private power in a way that, for social democrats, seems to ignore the impact of certain types of private decision on the wider political community. But in this case, too, few would deny that liberal democracies are nevertheless democratic.[2]

Adding to the complexity is political theory's propensity, every five years or so, to add a new qualifying adjective to the mix in an attempt either to describe existing democratic systems more accurately or to set out an ideal form of democracy to which existing systems should aspire. In this way, the traditional lexicon of liberal v social and direct v representative democracy has been expanded by such terms as 'pluralist',[3] participatory,[4] 'deliberative',[5] 'associative',[6] 'consociational',[7] 'reflective'[8] and, inevitably, 'radical'[9] democracy.

When the preamble to the Final Constitution declares as one of its objectives the establishment of 'a society based on democratic values', one may therefore be

* I would like to thank Amelia Vukeya and Ryan Babiuch for their research assistance, Lourens du Plessis for helping me to understand the normative weight to be given to the preamble, Danie Brand for agreeing at short notice to respond to a draft version of this chapter at the March 2006 CLOSA Public Lecture Series, and Stu Woolman for his (non-Native) intellectual support and encouragement.

[1] For the democratic objection to judicial review, see § 10.2*(d)* infra.

[2] There is, of course, plenty of room for debate about whether such systems could be made more democratic when measured against an idealized conception of democracy. See § 10.2*(c)* infra.

[3] See RA Dahl Dilemmas of Pluralist Democracy (1982) 1 (Arguing that 'the fundamental problem of pluralist democracy' is that 'autonomous organizations' are necessary to the democratic process, but may also work against the public good and 'weaken or destroy democracy'.)

[4] See C Pateman Participation and Democratic Theory (1970); CB Macpherson The Life and Times of Liberal Democracy (1977) 93-115.

[5] See J Habermas Between Facts and Norms: Contributions to a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy trans W Rehg (1996); A Gutmann & D Thompson Democracy and Disagreement (1996); J Elster (ed) Deliberative Democracy (1998); S Macedo (ed) Deliberative Politics: Essays on Democracy and Disagreement (1999).

[6] See P Hirst Associative Democracy: New Forms of Economic and Social Governance (1994)(Arguing that late-twentieth-century representative democracy needs to be supplemented by self-governing voluntary associations.)

[7] See A Lijphart Democracy in Plural Societies: A Comparative Exploration (1982)(Examining a form of democracy in which elites in a pluralist society co-operate in the interests of stable democratic government.)

[8] See R Goodin Reflective Democracy (2003).

[9] See D Trend Radical Democracy: Identity, Citizenship, and the State (1996); C Mouffe 'Radical Democracy: Modern or Post-modern?' in A Ross (ed) Universal Abandon? The Politics of Postmodernism (1988) 41-44 (Describing the project of radical democracy as being an attempt to 'expand [democracy's] sphere of applicability to new social relations'.)

forgiven for mouthing a respectful 'yes, but'. Like meat and poison, democracy has a way of meaning different things to different people.[1] At a purely textual level, the word democracy, when used in the Final Constitution, is qualified by four adjectives: 'representative',[2] 'participatory',[3] 'constitutional',[4] and 'multi-party'.[5] And democracy itself is variously used to mean a system of government,[6] a form of society,[7] a principle,[8] and a set of values.[9] Democracy is, at one point, also referred to as a 'culture' that can be 'deepen[ed]' by the adoption of 'Charters of Rights'[10] — the very antithesis of democracy if the core idea is left unqualified.

Given that the various forms of democracy in political theory are either ideal types or deliberately partial accounts of what this term means, it is not surprising that the Final Constitution should have hedged its bets in this way — to have chosen as its blueprint just one of the existing 'models'[11] of democracy would have been artificial and unnecessary. Instead, what the Constitutional Assembly did was to sketch the contours of a peculiarly South African form of democracy, leaving it to the legislature and the judiciary to fill in the details. The task that this chapter sets itself is to describe those contours and, where possible, to identify sharp edges and hard boundaries that may be said to constitute South African democracy's justiciable core.

The chapter begins by distinguishing the most important forms of democracy in political theory — direct and representative democracy — and then discusses some of the main contemporary accounts of representative democracy, modern democracy's pre-eminent form. The central tension running through contemporary democratic theory, it is argued, is the tension between theories that purport to offer strictly descriptive accounts of actually existing democracy, and normative accounts that seek to extend our understanding of the ideal form of democracy in the modern nation-state. This theoretical distinction tracks a distinction between a shallow and a deep conception of democracy that is also present in South African constitutional law.

§ 10.3 analyses the express references to democracy in the Final Constitution and the case law interpreting these provisions. Although the express references do not tell us all that there is to know about the Final Constitution's conception of

[1] Cf Plato The Republic (2nd Edition, trans D Lee 1974) Book VIII.557d (Democracy is 'just the place to go constitution-hunting'.)
[2] FC ss 57(1)(b), 70(1)(b), 116(1)(b).
[3] FC ss 57(1)(b), 70(1)(b) , 116(1)(b).
[4] FC s 181(1).
[5] FC s 236.
[6] FC ss 1*(d), 152(1)(a)*.
[7] FC preamble and ss 36(1), 39(1) (a) , 59(2), 72(2), 118(2).
[8] FC s 195(1).
[9] FC preamble and ss 7(1), 195(1).
[10] FC s 234.
[11] On use of 'models' in this context, see D Held Models of Democracy (2nd Edition, 1996) and Macpherson (supra) at 3 (Defining the term 'model' when used in this context as 'a theoretical construction intended to exhibit and explain the real relations, underlying the appearances, between or within the phenomena under study'.)

democracy, they nevertheless provide a useful starting point. Cases turning on these references have required the courts to define the term 'democracy' in different contexts, and in this way a considerable body of black letter law has begun to develop.

§ 10.4 builds on this analysis by examining the case law in relation to a group of fundamental rights that both democratic theory and the courts suggest is integral to the Final Constitution's conception of democracy. The particular rights examined are the right to freedom of expression, political rights, and socio-economic rights. Cases decided under these rights frequently comment on the place of the right in the Final Constitution's overarching scheme for South African democracy, and therefore tell us more about what that scheme entails.

In conclusion, § 10.5 converts the assessment of the Final Constitution's conception of democracy in § 10.3 and § 10.4 into a statement of the principle of democracy in South African constitutional law. Despite the contested nature of democracy in political theory, it is possible to state this principle in a fairly precise way. The main argument in § 10.5 is that, while the principle of democracy discernible in the constitutional text is unquestionably a deep one, the courts have not always given effect to this principle, often preferring a shallower interpretation in politically sensitive cases. This does not yet mean that the principle of democracy discernible in the constitutional text needs to be restated, but it does call for a re-examination of the importance of this principle in cases in which the political stakes are high.

10.2 Democracy in Political Theory

The overview of democracy given in this section is necessarily truncated, and does not pretend to offer any original insights into the theoretical tradition here described.[1] Rather, the aim of this section is to give some indication of the ideas that lie behind the main forms of democracy in political theory, focusing on those forms to which express or implied reference is made in the Final Constitution. In the absence of any detailed judicial treatment of this issue, it is necessary to attempt at least a thumbnail sketch of the terrain, and to refer the reader to the literature for further study.

The secondary aim of this section is to create a normative framework from which to assess the South African courts' treatment of democracy in the cases discussed in § 10.3 and § 10.4. The Final Constitution's vision for South African democracy is both an amalgam and a particularization to South African conditions of the various forms of democracy in political theory. Without knowing what those forms are, it is impossible to understand the theoretical approaches on which the Final Constitution draws or the contribution it makes to our understanding of how the democratic ideal may be realized in practice.

The section starts by setting out the two most basic forms of democracy identified in political theory — direct and representative democracy. These two forms are based on a simple empirical distinction between political systems in which the people rule themselves and systems in which the expression of the people's will is mediated by their elected representatives. As an actually existing political system, direct democracy is very rare. Indeed, this form of democracy is said to have existed as a fully functioning system only in the fifth-century BC, in the city-state of Athens, and in certain other isolated and relatively short-lived polities.[1] Direct democracy nevertheless remains an important form of democracy in political theory, as a normative ideal, and also because aspects of this form of democracy can be seen in the provision made in modern democratic constitutions for referenda, the right to freedom of assembly and greater citizen participation in local government.

[1] For one of the most comprehensive accounts, see D Held Models of Democracy (2nd Edition, 1996).

With these exceptions, all modern democracies are essentially representative in form, meaning that their commitment to the democratic ideal consists in the arrangements they make for elected representatives to take collective decisions on citizens' behalf, and the institutions through which citizens exert control over their elected representatives. When contemporary democratic theorists present alternative models of democracy, therefore, they generally do not mean to contest the place of representative democracy as the pre-eminent modern form of democracy, but rather to stress different aspects of democracy, either as a normative correction on the representative model, or as an attempt more accurately to describe its actual mode of operation. As indicated in § 10.1, the list of these contemporary accounts is long and ever growing. From among this list, however, three forms have emerged as the most important: pluralist, participatory and deliberative democracy. In addition to these three, constitutional democracy has, in the last thirty years or so, begun to receive increasing attention as a distinct form of democracy in its own right, one that may contain some or all of the elements of the other forms, but which nevertheless has unique features that are worthy of separate categorization.

(a) Direct democracy

Direct democracy may be defined as a system of government in which major decisions are taken by the members of the political community themselves, without mediation by elected representatives. As noted above, such a system has only ever existed in its pure form in the ancient city-state of Athens and certain other isolated and relatively short-lived polities. As a normative ideal, however, direct democracy figures in the influential contributions to democratic theory made by Jean-Jacques Rousseau, Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels.[2] It is also possible for direct democracy to be implemented in subsidiary institutions within an overarching system of representative democracy.

[1] The other examples of actually existing direct democracy typically given in the literature are the medieval Italian city-states, the Paris Commune of 1871, and contemporary New England town meetings (particularly in Vermont). See Dahl On Democracy (supra) at 110-112.

[2] See D Held Models of Democracy (2nd Edition, 1996).

The received account of Athenian direct democracy, though in certain respects 'conjectural',[1] is that, in the fifth century BC, this form of democracy was practised in a city-state comprised of about 30 000–45 000 citizens.[2] Since neither slaves nor women were counted as citizens, the Athenian system was not democratic in the modern sense. Nevertheless, it is held up as a unique historical example of a system in which fundamental political decisions were taken directly by the citizen body, or Assembly. The Assembly met about 40 times a year with quorum of 6 000.[3] Routine business, including the setting of the agenda for Assembly meetings, was undertaken by a Council of Five Hundred, split into ten Committees of 50. The Committees were not representative bodies as such since election to them was by lot, restricted to one year at a time, and to two years per citizen in total.[4] Athenian democracy also had no bureaucracy in the modern sense of a permanent class of people responsible for implementing (and thereby capable of influencing) policy. Rather, all decisions were taken by the Assembly after deliberation in plenary session.

The Athenian model of democracy was famously attacked by Plato in The Republic.[5] After identifying democracy as one of four 'imperfect' forms of society, Plato dialogically describes how democracies emerge from the collapse of oligarchies, 'when the poor win, kill or exile their opponents, and give the rest equal civil rights and opportunities of office'.[6] These, by modern standards, fairly welcome events are sarcastically dismissed by Plato as the harbingers of a political system in which everyone is free to do what they like, and in which leaders respond to the whims of the people at the expense of the public interest. 'Democracy,' Plato writes, 'doesn't mind what the habits and backgrounds of its politicians are; provided they profess themselves the people's friends, they are duly honoured . . . It's an agreeable anarchic form of society, with plenty of variety, which treats all men as equal, whether they are equal or not.'[7]

Elements of the direct democratic model were revived in the Italian city-republics of the sixteenth century,[8] but the sheer size and complexity of the modern nation-state has militated against the survival of this model as an actually existing political system. Nevertheless, direct democracy remains an important theoretical construct, most notably in the work of Rousseau, Marx and Engels.[9] Rousseau's Social Contract, first published in 1762,[10] attempted to revive the ideal of direct

[1] See D Lee 'Translator's Introduction' in Plato (supra) at 9, 26.
[2] Ibid; Held (supra) at 15.
[3] Held (supra) at 21. Lee writes that the Assembly met 'in theory . . . ten times a year; in practice a good deal more often, though probably never more than once a week'. Lee (supra) at 26.
[4] Lee (supra) at 27.
[5] See Held (supra) at 29.
[6] Plato (supra) at Book VIII.557a.
[7] Ibid at Book VIII.558c.
[8] Held (supra) at 40-43.
[9] Ibid at 33-34.
[10] This chapter refers to the 1968 Penguin edition.

democracy even as the conditions for its practical realization were fast disappearing. Under the influence of his experience of Geneva, a 'city-state of peasant proprietors',[1] Rousseau argued that, since the central value of democracy was the educative process undergone by citizens in the course of participating in collective decision-making, any system that did not give citizens a direct role in such decision-making was not truly democratic. Although his argument has been misunderstood as requiring the totalitarian submission of the individual interest to the 'general will',[2] revisionist accounts of Rousseau's work have re-emphasized the liberal leanings of his core idea, namely, that direct participation in collective decision-making allows individuals to see the way in which their sectarian interests are ultimately best served by the pursuit of the public interest.[3] In Rousseau's famous and controversial phrase, citizens can in this way be 'forced to be free'.[4]

This view of the central value of citizen participation necessarily drew Rousseau into a rejection of representative democracy. In his words:

> Sovereignty cannot be represented, for the same reason that it cannot be alienated; its essence is the general will, and will cannot be represented — either it is the general will or it is something else; there is no intermediate possibility. Thus the people's deputies are not, and could not be, its representatives; they are merely its agents; and they cannot decide anything finally. Any law which the people has not ratified in person is void; it is not law at all. The English people believes itself to be free; it is gravely mistaken; it is free only during the election of Members of Parliament; as soon as the Members are elected, the people is enslaved; it is nothing. In the brief moments of its freedom, the English people makes such a use of that freedom that it deserves to lose it.[5]

In this characteristically uncompromising passage, Rousseau's devotion to the ideal of citizen participation leads him to dismiss representative democracy as a sham, a mere illusion, in which citizens pretend to themselves that they exercise control over their elected representatives, but in which, in reality, they hand over control of collective decision-making to people who do not necessarily have the public interest at heart.

Like Rousseau's city-state of Geneva, Marx and Engels used an actually existing, albeit short-lived, example of direct democracy — the Paris Commune of 1871 — to inform their theoretical understanding of what an ideal form of democracy might look like.[6] In The Civil War in France, Marx eulogized the

[1] Pateman (supra) at 27.

[2] The most famous example of this is Isaiah Berlin's charge that Rousseau's model has 'tyrannical implications'. See Held (supra) at 61 referring to I Berlin Four Essays on Liberty (1969) 162-64.

[3] See, especially, C Pateman Participation and Democratic Theory (1970).

[4] Rousseau (supra) at 64.

[5] Ibid at 141 (partly quoted in Held (supra) at 58).

[6] In his Introduction to Marx's The Civil War in France (1891)(reprinted in the Lawrence and Wishart edition of Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels: Selected Works (1968) 237), Engels referred to the Paris Commune as a practical example of what the desired 'dictatorship of the proletariat' might look like. Ibid at 247. According to Engels, the Commune's most significant decisions, during its short period in power from 28 March to 28 May 1871, were that it 'filled all posts — administrative, judicial and educational — by election on the basis of universal suffrage of all concerned, subject to the right of recall at any time by the same electors', and that it restricted the wages of administrative officials to the same level as the wages received by 'other workers'. Ibid at 246.

organizational structure of the Paris Commune as follows:

> The Commune was formed of the municipal councillors, chosen by universal suffrage in the various wards of the town, responsible and revocable at short terms. The majority of its members were naturally working men, or acknowledged by representatives of the working class. The Commune was to be a working, not a parliamentary, body, executive and legislative at the same time.[1]

Marx's rejection of the liberal doctrine of separation of powers, which is implicit in this passage, is elsewhere made explicit. In reflecting on the Paris Commune's unfulfilled plans for expansion of the model on a national scale, for example, Marx wrote:

> The judicial functionaries were to be divested of that sham independence which had but served to mask their abject subserviency to all succeeding governments to which, in turn, they had taken, and broken, the oaths of allegiance. Like the rest of public servants, magistrates and judges were to be elective, responsible, and revocable.[2]

Although the Paris Commune lasted for only two months, and never attained the status of national government, Marx speculated that the model could have been extrapolated on a national scale in France by the formation of similar communes in all the major urban and rural centres, unified under a 'Communal constitution'.[3] Dispensing with representative government,[4] the proposed system would have operated by direct election to local communes, with the communes in turn electing representatives to central political organs.[5]

Though not unworkable as a form of party-political organization,[6] the model of the Paris Commune, when translated into a system of government, is incompatible with representative democracy and the liberal doctrine of separation of powers. By stipulating that all state institutions should be directly accountable to the electorate,[7] Marx and Engels excluded the possibility of horizontal checks and balances between state institutions. They also placed tremendous faith in the capacity of human beings to pursue long-term political projects over time.

The fundamental difficulty faced by all theories of direct democracy is the sheer complexity of collective decision-making in the modern nation-state. As noted above, Rousseau's model was constructed in deliberate denial of the changing social and economic circumstances of eighteenth-century Europe. From the perspective of the twenty-first century, his rejection of the legitimacy of representative decision-making seems quaint and other-worldly. In the same way, the

[1] Marx The Civil War in France (supra) at 274.
[2] Ibid at 275.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Marx's rejection of representative government is very reminiscent of Rousseau: 'Instead of deciding once in three or six years which member of the ruling class was to misrepresent the people in Parliament, universal suffrage was to serve the people, constituted in Communes . . .'. Marx (supra) at 275.
[5] See Held (supra) at 145 (Describing this system of government as one in which the people rule through a '"pyramid" structure of direct (or delegative) democracy'.)
[6] See Macpherson (supra) at 112-14.
[7] Held (supra) at 146.

failure of the communist states in Eastern Europe, which were at least in theory an attempt to implement the Marxist-Leninist model of direct democracy, has been attributed in part to the inability of these states in the end to compete with the post-industrial, technologically advanced states of Western Europe and North America.

The ideal of direct democracy, of course, survives in a subsidiary form in many modern constitutions, most notably in the right to freedom of assembly, and the provision made for the holding of referenda and a greater degree of citizen participation in local government. In the United States, for example, institutional provision is made for three kinds of direct democracy: the initiative (in terms of which a prescribed minimum number of voters may file a petition proposing legislation or a constitutional amendment); the referendum (in terms of which state legislatures may put a legislative proposal to voters for their approval); and the recall (in which a prescribed minimum number of voters may file a petition demanding that the continued tenure in office of an elected public official be put to the vote).[1] Other modern constitutions contain similar arrangements.[2] The role and influence of all these institutions, however, is carefully circumscribed, and their presence generally does not detract from the representative thrust of the main institutional arrangements.

(b) Representative democracy

Representative democracy is typically justified as a concession to the impossibility of achieving direct democracy in the modern nation-state.[3] This justification masks two curiosities about representative democracy that are worth noting: (a) the emergence of this form of democracy as an actually existing system of government is a surprisingly recent phenomenon, dating back to the emergence of liberal democracy in the late eighteenth century, and reaching its current form only in the first quarter of the twentieth century; and (b) many of the theoretical accounts of representative democracy, though beginning with the traditional, pragmatic justification, ultimately defend a conception of democracy in which the modern nation-state is a necessary condition for, rather than a practical constraint on, the achievement of 'true' or 'genuine' democracy.

As to the first point, most accounts place the rise of liberal democracy (and representative democracy as its practical embodiment) at the end of the eighteenth century.[4] Between this time and the direct democracy practised in the city-state of Athens there was a long period during which democracy all but

[1] See TE Cronin Direct Democracy: The Politics of Initiative, Referendum and Recall (1999) 2.
[2] See, for example, FC ss 84(2)(g) and 127.
[3] See, for example, JS Mill 'Considerations on Representative Government' in JS Mill On Liberty and Other Essays J Gray (ed) (1991) (Mill 'Considerations') 203, 248.
[4] See Macpherson (supra) at 20; J Dunn Western Political Theory in the Face of the Future (Revised Edition, 1993) 6.

disappeared as an actually existing political system.[1] Not only that, but democracy was for much of this period a pejorative term used to describe allegedly disordered societies in which no better form of government could be found than mob rule.[2]

The social, political and economic changes that made possible the re-emergence of democracy in the late eighteenth century are too complex to describe here, but essentially have to do with the emergence of an independent class of property owners capable of demanding and winning political freedom from royal authority, and the simultaneous unification in Western Europe of previously fragmented principalities into linguistically and culturally homogeneous nation-states.[3] Just as direct democracy is identified with the city-state governments of ancient Greece, so, too, representative democracy is inextricably tied to the emergence of this new form of polity. The connection between representative democracy and the modern nation-state explains, in turn, why one of the central cleavages running through democratic theory is that between theorists who appear to lament the passing of the city-state, and those who view the modern nation-state as a form of political organization that provides new opportunities for democracy, and hence new possibilities for the development of human freedom.

Even after the emergence of the nation-state in the late eighteenth century, the full maturation of representative democracy took another hundred years, with the vote being extended to all adult men in Western Europe and North America in the late nineteenth century, and to women only at the beginning of the twentieth century.[4] During this time, institutions that had developed at the end of monarchical rule as a means of giving the propertied classes a greater say in government, were gradually extended to the entire population according to the principle of political equality.[5]

Although it had important precursors in the work of Locke,[6] Montesquieu,[7] Madison,[8] and the utilitarian theory of James Mill and Jeremy Bentham, the classic liberal statement of the nature and benefits of representative democracy is John Stuart Mill's Considerations on Representative Government.[9] This work,

[1] The only exception being the medieval Italian city-states, which disappeared during the Renaissance. Dahl Democracy and its Critics (supra) at 213.

[2] See Dunn (supra) at 1-28.

[3] See Dahl Democracy and its Critics (supra) at 213. Dahl also discusses, in the same work, the conditions favourable to the emergence of polyarchy, which he argues is a precondition for democracy in the modern nation-state. Ibid at 221-22, 244-64.

[4] Ibid at 234-39.

[5] Ibid at 216.

[6] Two Treatises of Government (1689).

[7] De l'Esprit des Lois (1748).

[8] See Held (supra) at 91-92 (On Madison's importance as translator of Locke and Montesquieu); Dahl Democracy and its Critics (supra) at 218 (Madison's importance to democratic theory is his argument that increasing the size of a state good for democracy).

[9] JS Mill Considerations on Representative Government (1861).

appearing as it did in the second half of the nineteenth century, was intended both as an argument in support of the extension of the franchise then underway in Great Britain, and also as a statement about the possibility of democracy in the modern nation-state. Representative government, in Mill's cautious definition, is a system in which 'the whole people, or some numerous portion of them, exercise through deputies periodically elected by themselves, the ultimate controlling power, which, in every constitution, must reside somewhere' (emphasis added).[1] Mill's qualification of what is today understood as a necessary precondition for democracy — universal adult suffrage — is indicative of the age in which he was writing. At the time of the publication of the Considerations in 1861, voting rights in Great Britain were still restricted to the propertied class, and absolutely denied to women.[2] Nevertheless, the kernel of the modern idea of representative democracy is contained in Mill's definition, namely, the notion of democracy as a political system in which the people voluntarily exchange their power to govern themselves for the power to control those whom they elect to govern them.

The impetus behind Mill's theory is most easily understood in contradistinction to that of Rousseau. Although he shared Rousseau's concern for, and indeed insistence upon, the educative effects of citizen participation in politics,[3] Mill was more sanguine than Rousseau about the possibilities of indirect citizen participation. Rejecting the notion that the giving up of control leads necessarily to enslavement, Mill argued that representative democracy was preferable to all other forms of government. Whilst authoritarian societies might be able to outperform representative democracies over the short term, their inability to produce public-spirited citizens made them less attractive over the long term.[4] As for Rousseau's objection that voting in a representative system was an illusion that masked the reality of elite domination, Mill argued that it was possible for democracy to be 'learned' at the local level,[5] and for this learning to be translated onto the national stage.[6] In addition, there was a range of institutions available to

[1] Mill 'Considerations' (supra) at 269.

[2] For Mill's attitude on the representation of women, see 'The Subjection of Women' in Mill (supra) at 471.

[3] See Mill 'Considerations' (supra) at 210 (Arguing that representative government is 'of little value, and may be a mere instrument of tyranny or intrigue, when the generality of electors are not sufficiently interested in their own government to give their vote, or, if they vote at all, do not bestow their suffrages on public grounds. . .'.) On the similarities between Rousseau and Mill, see Pateman (supra) at 29-30.

[4] Mill 'Considerations' (supra) at 238-256.

[5] Pateman (supra) at 31 quoting JS Mill Essays on Politics and Culture (G Himmelfarb (ed)) (1963) 186.

[6] Mill's theory is marred by his ambivalence on the property-based franchise. Interestingly, much of this ambivalence has to do with Mill's doubts about whether the propertyless were truly capable of benefiting by the educative power of the vote, a view which, if propounded today, would be deeply offensive. See, for example, Mill's distinctly elitist argument that '[a] representative constitution is a means of bringing the general standard of intelligence and honesty existing in the community, and the individual intellect and virtue of its wisest members, more directly to bear upon the government, and investing them with greater influence in it, than they would in general have under any other mode of organization'. Mill 'Considerations' (supra) at 228-29. Elsewhere, however, Mill argues forcefully in favour of the impossibility of cross-class representation, ie the notion that it is possible for an elected representative from the propertied class fairly to represent the views and interests of workers. Ibid at 246.

representative government by means of which the people could retain control of their elected representatives: competition between political parties, the separation of powers and, most important of all, freedom of the press.[1]

The distinctly modern turn in Mill's argument was therefore to transform the (somewhat weak) justification of representative democracy as a pragmatic concession to the impossibility of direct democracy into a claim that representative democracy might actually improve on all other known forms of government. As David Held puts it: 'The conclusion Mill draws is that a representative government, the scope and power of which is tightly restricted by the principle of liberty, and laissez-faire, the principle of which should govern economic relations in general, are the essential conditions of "free communities" and "brilliant prosperity".'[2]

Representative democracy is today the basic form of democracy in every country considered to be democratic. The so-called 'third wave' of democracy, in which this form of government has spread out from its origins in Western Europe and North America to the rest of the world, has thus seen the proliferation of a common set of political institutions, including universal adult suffrage, regular elections, the right to free political participation and freedom of the press. The link between the globalization of democracy and the spread of formal political equality secured by individual rights is explored in § 10.2*(d)*.

(c) Contemporary accounts of democracy

Given the pre-eminence of representative democracy as modern democracy's practical form, the overriding concern of democratic theory today is to describe the operation of actually existing democratic systems and, in so doing, to identify weaknesses and deviations from the democratic ideal. Although the lexicon is vast, two main schools of thought may be identified: participatory democracy, which is associated with the work of Carole Pateman, and deliberative democracy, the main theorists of which are Jürgen Habermas and, in the English-speaking world, Amy Gutmann and Dennis Thompson. Neither of these schools is intended as a direct challenge to representative democracy. Nevertheless, both stress certain deficiencies in the representative model than can be traced back to the ideal of direct democracy.

Before summarizing the ideas underpinning these two schools, it is necessary first to say something about the two most influential attempts to describe and (in part) defend actually existing representative democracy: Joseph Schumpeter's competitive elitist model, and Robert A Dahl's conception of democracy as 'polyarchy'.

[1] Mill 'Considerations' (supra) at 210.
[2] Held (supra) at 104.

(i) Pluralist democracy

Although he did not himself use the term, Schumpeter is credited with the theoretical move that led to the still-dominant conception of democracy as 'pluralism', that is, the notion that, far from being the expression of the 'general will', voting in a democracy is essentially about the aggregation of diverse interests under the banner of political parties. The conceptual shift that made this view of democracy possible was, in Schumpeter's words, to 'reverse the roles' played in democratic theory by 'the selection of the representatives' and the 'deciding of issues by the electorate'.[1] According to Schumpeter, the problem with 'the classical doctrine of democracy' was that it assumed that the people were more active and engaged in politics than they actually were, and that voting was a method through which parliamentarians could be mandated to represent the people's opinions on specific issues.[2] If, on the contrary, one assumed that democracy was a value-neutral method for producing stable government,[3] then the primary role of the people could be seen to be the selection of representatives. On this approach, democracy was simply 'that institutional arrangement for arriving at political decisions in which individuals acquire the power to decide by means of a competitive struggle for the people's vote'.[4] And democracy's claim to our allegiance, in turn, was not that it was ideally preferable to any other political system, but that historically it had proven to be more successful in producing stable governments than any other system.[5]

In explaining his theory, Schumpeter analogized the role of political parties to that of firms in the marketplace. Just as 'department store[s]' compete for custom by offering different brands of goods for sale, Schumpeter argued, so do political parties compete for office by gathering together 'a stock of principles or planks' that they deem likely to attract a majority of votes.[6] It was principally this idea that the main theorist of pluralism, Robert A Dahl, extrapolated in his notion of democracy as 'polyarchy', or 'rule by the many'.[7] For Dahl, like Schumpeter,

[1] JA Schumpeter Capitalism, Socialism and Democracy (1943) 269.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Cf Macpherson (supra) at 86 (Macpherson characterizes the central justificatory claim of the pluralist model as being the bringing about of 'an optimum of equilibrium of the supply and demand for political goods'.)

[4] Schumpeter (supra) at 269. Not surprisingly, this definition leads Schumpeter to dismiss proportional representation as practically 'unworkable'. Ibid at 272-73.

[5] Note how this definition provides a cynical answer to Plato's cynicism about democracy in The Republic. Just as Plato dismissed democracy for failing to produce efficient government, so Schumpeter endorses it, not for its inherent qualities, but for its relative effectiveness under modern conditions.

[6] See Schumpeter (supra) at 283. See also Pateman (supra) at 4.

[7] RA Dahl On Democracy (1998) 90. See also RA Dahl A Preface to Democratic Theory (1956) 133 (Arguing that democracy may be distinguished from dictatorship by the 'number, size, and diversity of the minorities whose preferences will influence the outcome of governmental decisions'); RA Dahl Democracy and its Critics (1989) 220 (Defining polyarchy as a 'political order' in which '[c]itizenship is extended to a relatively high proportion of adults, and the rights of citizenship include the opportunity to oppose and vote out the highest officials in government'.) For a discussion of Dahl's contribution to political theory, see Held (supra) at 206-208. For other major works in the pluralist canon, see SM Lipset Political Man (1960); DB Truman The Governmental Process (1951).

the task of political theory was to describe and explain actually existing democratic systems, rather than philosophize about democracy's ideal form.[1] But Dahl was more optimistic than Schumpeter about the prospects for direct citizen participation in politics, mainly because his empirical research revealed the existence of intermediate sites of power, between the governors and the governed, where competing interests could be asserted and mediated.[2] Stressing the importance to democracy of a shared 'political culture',[3] Dahl argued that the mid-twentieth-century welfare states of North America and Western Europe were best described as political systems in which a diverse range of minority interests competed for power. Unlike Schumpeter, therefore, Dahl's conception of democracy is not an elitist one in which a largely passive citizenry chooses between members of a self-appointed political class. Rather, democracy is secured by the dispersion of interests in advanced capitalist societies, and underpinned by societal consensus regarding the range of permissible government action.

There is some dispute in the literature as to whether Schumpeter and Dahl made normative claims for their theories in the sense that they contended not only that they provided the best descriptive account of contemporary democracies, but also that the democratic systems they were describing were better than any others.[4] Certainly, both Schumpeter and Dahl seem to make the pragmatic claim that the 'competitive elitist' or 'pluralist' form of democracy is the only workable form of democracy in advanced capitalist societies. In addition, critics of Schumpeter in particular have pointed to passages in which descriptive claims appear to shade into normative claims about the value of passive citizenship or, conversely, the dangers of active citizen participation in politics.[5]

Despite these criticisms, neither of the two critical schools that have come to challenge pluralism in recent years has been able to improve on the descriptive power of pluralism as applied to actually existing democratic systems. On the contrary, the theorists of both participatory and deliberative democracy have in their turn been criticized for their overly optimistic assumptions about the capacity of individuals in advanced capitalist societies to overcome their selfish, welfare-maximizing desires. As CB Macpherson has argued, the central challenge facing those critical of status-quo representative democracy is to overcome an

[1] Dahl did, however, begin to do this in his later work, such as On Democracy (supra).

[2] See, especially, RA Dahl Who Governs? Democracy and Power in an American City (1961)(Examining operation of democratic politics in situation of social and economic inequality in New Haven, Connecticut, and finding that power was dispersed between different sites.)

[3] See Held (supra) at 207.

[4] See Macpherson (supra) at 82-86; Pateman (supra) at 8-10; Dunn (supra) at 26-27; Held (supra) at 178.

[5] Held (supra) at 209 (Citing G Duncan & S Lukes 'The New Democracy' in S Lukes (ed) Essays in Social Theory (1963) 40-47.) See, eg, Schumpeter's discussion of Napoleon's 'master strokes' in solving various problems relating to religious freedom in post-revolutionary France. Schumpeter (supra) at 255-56. This discussion, part of his critique of the 'classical doctrine of democracy', ends with a more general conclusion that 'government for the people' (ie by a benevolent military dictator) might sometimes produce better outcomes than 'government by the people'. Ibid at 256.

apparent 'vicious circle'. On the one hand, in order to improve the quality of democracy, citizens need to develop a sense of themselves as something more than passive consumers of political goods. On the other hand, in order to change this perception, advanced capitalist societies first need to change in ways that encourage greater citizen participation in politics.[1] This paradox leaves theorists of participatory and deliberative democracy occasionally looking like utopian dreamers, however much more palatable their models may be to the democratic purist.[2]

(ii) Participatory democracy

The leading contemporary democratic theorist, David Held, classifies participatory democracy along with direct democracy as part of the same model.[3] And, indeed, there is an obvious relationship between these two forms of democracy, with both stressing the value of citizen participation in the making of collective decisions. What, then, is the difference? By most accounts, participatory democracy in its contemporary guise is as an attempt to re-inject elements of direct democracy into modern systems of representative democracy. In this sense, participatory democracy is essentially about the question whether, and if so, how, citizens should be given the right to participate in the making of decisions that affect them, notwithstanding the fact that the basic form of political organization in the modern nation-state is, and is likely to remain, representative democracy.[4] By contrast, direct democracy stands apart from representative democracy as a pre-modern form of democracy that is unlikely to be re-instantiated as the basic form of government in any polity that we know of, notwithstanding the residual role played by such institutions as the referendum and the right to freedom of assembly.

According to its chief theoretical exponent, Carole Pateman, participatory democracy returned to prominence in the 1960s in the context of New Left student politics in Europe and North America.[5] Before this time, this model had been suppressed by the belief that modern bureaucratic states were incompatible with mass participation and the related view that, where it had occurred, mass participation in politics had tended towards totalitarianism rather than democracy.[6] In particular, Schumpeter's attack on the 'classical' doctrine of democracy had successfully demonized participatory theory as resting on unrealistic assumptions about the actual extent of citizen participation in politics.[7]

[1] Macpherson (supra) at 100.

[2] Cf Dunn (supra) at 27 (Dunn concludes his assessment of participatory democracy and pluralism by saying that they represent the two less than satisfactory alternative forms of democracy existing today, 'one dismally ideological [pluralism] and the other fairly blatantly Utopian [participatory democracy]'.)

[3] Held (supra) at 6.

[4] As we have seen, in Schumpeter's account, representative democracy in its pure form restricts participation in politics to voting. Cf Pateman (supra) at 5.

[5] Ibid at 1. See also CB McPherson The Life and Times of Liberal Democracy (1977) 93.

[6] Pateman (supra) at 2-3.

[7] Ibid at 4.

Against this background, Pateman's work was devoted to demonstrating that Schumpeter had misrepresented the importance accorded to participation in the 'classical tradition', and to rehabilitating the theoretical importance of, among others, Rousseau and Mill. For Pateman, '[u]ntil the theory of participatory democracy has been examined in detail and the possibilities for its empirical realisation assessed, we do not know how much "unfinished business", or of what sort, remains for democratic theory.'[1]

Unfortunately for Pateman, the main empirical evidence she enlists in support of this argument, an upbeat study of 'workers' self-management in [1960s] Yugolsavia',[2] now looks a little dated. John Dunn, for one, dismisses her work with a quintessentially English putdown, suggesting in a footnote that we should consult Pateman's book '[f]or a clear, if somewhat innocent, exposition of the merits of participatory democracy'.[3] According to a more sympathetic critic, CB Macpherson, the central problem with this approach is that the two virtues of participation — promoting a more active citizenry and reducing social and economic inequality — are also its prerequisites.[4] This leads to the 'vicious circle' described earlier in which the realization of participatory democracy is hindered by the difficulty of creating conditions conducive to citizen support for the idea. Macpherson is not completely pessimistic, however, and finds some solace in the thought that the main threats to the stability of the liberal-democratic status quo might provide 'loopholes' in the circle capable of prompting a change for the better.[5] The best route to a more participatory form of democracy, he concludes, is to retain the present representative system, and to rely on political parties to encourage citizen participation in their internal structures.[6]

(iii) Deliberative democracy

Deliberative and participatory democracy are superficially similar since both can be seen as a reaction against the tendency of modern representative democracies to produce passive citizens, whose power to control their elected representatives is reduced to their right to participate in periodic elections. The distinction between these two forms of democracy, however, is the view propounded by theorists of deliberative democracy that a particular form of participation — deliberation — may legitimate collective decisions even in the presence of fundamental moral disagreement. Participatory democracy, by contrast, often appears

[1] Pateman (supra) at 21.
[2] Ibid at 85-102.
[3] Dunn (supra) at 28 n68.
[4] Macpherson (supra) at 99-100.
[5] Ibid at 101. The three main threats that Macpherson refers to are: the unsustainability, for environmental reasons, of current levels of economic growth; a growth in 'neighbourhood and community movements and associations' and 'movements for democratic participation in decision-making at the workplace'; and the logical need for capitalism to spread access to consumer goods to a greater proportion of the world's population. Ibid at 102-108.
[6] Ibid at 112-14.

naively to assume, as in Rousseau's work, that sufficient, or the right kind of, participation, will eventually produce agreement between citizens on a single right decision most conformable with the public interest.

The seminal thinker in the field of deliberative democracy is the German social theorist, Jürgen Habermas.[1] In the last twenty years all of Habermas's major works have been translated into English, and his ideas have in this way become part of the Anglo-American tradition of thinking about democracy. Even (or perhaps especially) in translation, however, Habermas's work remains impenetrable to the casual reader. According to Jon Elster, the main idea for which Habermas's version of deliberative democracy stands is that 'democracy revolves around the transformation rather than simply the aggregation of preferences'.[2] As Elster notes, this idea is not entirely new, since it was present in early accounts of Athenian democracy,[3] and also, as we have seen, in Rousseau and Mill's notion of the educative value of citizen participation in politics.[4] What distinguishes Habermas's account of democracy from these other accounts is the emphasis it places on the legitimating function of deliberation. This point can be seen most clearly, Elster argues, in contradistinction to the Marxist model of delegative democracy, which assumes that the citizen's mandate, once given at the local level, can be transmitted unchanged to the national level, with national delegates voting purely according to the mandate they receive from below. For Habermas, the problem with this model is that it denies both the possibility and the legitimacy of preference transformation through discussion.[5] In order to be legitimate, Habermas argues, 'political choice must be the outcome of deliberation about ends among free, equal and rational agents.'[6]

The most influential attempt in English thus far to set out the case for deliberative democracy is Amy Gutmann and Dennis Thompson's Democracy and Disagreement.[7] According to these authors, the main contemporary challenge to democracy in the United States is 'the problem of moral disagreement', by which they mean 'conflicts about fundamental values'.[8] Citing the controversy over abortion, Gutmann and Thompson question the extent to which the reference of this issue to the courts, and the United States Supreme Court in particular, has promoted the ideal of democracy. The liberal constitutionalist approach

[1] See J Habermas Between Facts and Norms: Contributions to a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy (trans W Rehg, 1996).
[2] J Elster (ed) Deliberative Democracy (1998) 1.
[3] Ibid at 1.
[4] Ibid at 3-4.
[5] Elster (supra) at 3.
[6] Ibid at 5.
[7] A Gutmann & D Thompson Democracy and Disagreement (1996). See also A Gutmann & D Thompson 'Democratic Disagreement' in S Macedo (ed) Deliberative Politics: Essays on Democracy and Disagreement (1999) 243-49 (Reply to their critics). For another Anglo-American take on deliberative democracy, see J Cohen 'Deliberation and Democratic Legitimacy' in D Estlund (ed) Democracy (2002) 87 (previously published in A Hamlin & P Pettit (eds) The Good Polity (1989)).
[8] Gutmann & Thompson Democracy and Disagreement (supra) at 1.

to the resolution of fundamental moral disagreements, they argue, tends to de-emphasize and therefore de-capacitate the role of citizen participation in politics. The proper response to this challenge is to seek ways in which the idea and practice of 'moral discussion in public life' can be re-introduced.[1]

In Gutmann and Thompson's account, the core idea of deliberative democracy is that, 'when citizens or their representatives disagree morally, they should continue to reason together to reach mutually acceptable decisions'.[2] For this reason, deliberative democracy is best seen as a proceduralist model of democracy, ie, a model of democracy that is concerned with how political decisions are taken rather than the substantive moral values that democracy should serve, or the ends it should seek to achieve. This approach requires citizens and their representatives to deliberate in a way that is somewhere in between 'impartiality' and 'prudence'.[3]

The three principles of deliberative democracy, according to Gutmann and Thompson, are reciprocity (the duty to deliberate in the manner just described), publicity (the need for reasons to be made public) and accountability (the duty of reason-givers to account to the immediate electorate and their moral constituency, including 'citizens of other countries and members of future generations').[4] The first principle requires citizens to deliberate in such a way that they can offer justifications to people who reasonably disagree with them. 'Citizens who reason reciprocally can recognize that a position is worthy of moral respect even where they think it is morally wrong.'[5] This principle also means that citizens should 'try to accommodate the moral convictions of their opponents to the greatest extent possible, without compromising their own moral convictions'.[6] Gutmann and Thompson qualify this position by arguing that the duty to deliberate in this way does not apply to all disagreements, but only to deliberative disagreements, by which they mean disagreements between two views, each of which is worthy of moral respect (such as the contending views on abortion). Other disagreements, they argue, may be 'non-deliberative', such as the disagreement between people who think that racial discrimination is justified and people who think that it is not. Where one of the contending views is not worthy of moral respect, Gutmann and Thompson argue, no duty to deliberate in the required manner arises.[7]

In anticipation of the discussion of constitutional democracy in § 10.2*(d)*, it is worth emphasizing that Gutmann and Thompson's conception of deliberative democracy leads them to reject the exclusive role of courts in deciding certain policy questions, such as those pertaining to what they call the 'middle democratic' issues of health policy, affirmative action and euthanasia.[8] The problem

[1] Gutmann & Thompson Democracy and Disagreement (supra).
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid at 2.
[4] Ibid at 8.
[5] Ibid at 2-3.
[6] Ibid at 3.
[7] Ibid.
[8] See Gutmann & Thompson 'Democratic Disagreement' (supra) at 4-5.

with the exclusive settlement of these questions by the courts is not just that this is potentially undemocratic, but that it deprives citizens of the opportunity to debate these questions, and therefore of the opportunity to develop as citizens.

The longstanding criticism of deliberative democracy is that a commitment to submit political decisions to public discussion can allow for the influence of rhetoric and demagogy, and that such discussion, at best, neither improves nor detracts from the quality of collective decision-making.[1] The theory also appears to depend for its practical realization on a pre-existing equality of deliberative power, meaning some measure of educational and social and economic equality between deliberators. Without this, even consensual outcomes might be distorted by the greater capacity of certain deliberators to articulate their interests in terms acceptable to the rules of deliberative democratic engagement. Like the challenge posed to participatory democracy at the end of the last subsection, therefore, there appears to be a circularity problem with deliberative democracy, in as much as the conditions for the realization of this ideal appear to depend on changes to the status quo that the commitment to deliberative democracy itself will not be able to bring about.[2]

(d) Constitutional democracy

Unlike the other terms considered thus far, 'constitutional democracy' is a purely descriptive term, not associated with any particular theorist, but used to connote a political system in which the people's power to make collective decisions is constrained by a written constitution, or at least a received set of institutional practices that is regarded as being incapable of ordinary amendment. Usually, but not necessarily, the power to decide whether the people, acting through the political branches, have deviated from the terms of the constitution is vested in the judiciary, and usually but not necessarily, the judiciary exercises this power on the authority of a supreme-law bill of rights. Understood in this way, 'constitutional democracy' is the binary opposite of the term 'parliamentary sovereignty', which connotes a political system in which the legislature has the final word in the event of inter-branch conflict over the constitutionality of a collective decision.

[1] Elster (supra) at 1-2.

[2] Various other criticisms of Gutmann and Thompson's work in particular can be found in Macedo (supra). Frederick Schauer, for example, argues that: '[t]he central anomaly in [Gutmann and Thompson's] argument . . . is the tension between, on the one hand, the nonideal world that they rightly claim gives rise to the problems they address and, on the other, the idealized dimension of the solution they propose for resolving or at least managing those problems.' F Schauer 'Talking as a Decision Procedure' in Macedo (supra) at 17, 22. Michael Walzer, in turn, lists a number of examples of legitimate, non-deliberative practices in democratic politics, including political education, mass organization and demonstration, the issuing of statements, bargaining, voting, and debate without any attempt to reach agreement. M Walzer 'Deliberation, and What Else?' in Macdeo (supra) at 58. In the end, most of the criticisms of deliberative democracy come down to the practical impossibility of introducing this form of decision-making in modern democratic politics, which appears rather to be dominated by the pursuit of sectarian interests and political power. I Shapiro 'Enough of Deliberation: Politics is about Interests and Power' in Macdeo (supra) at 28.

An apparent paradox surrounding the 'third wave' of democracy that has swept through the world in the last thirty years is that the newly democratic states have mostly rejected parliamentary sovereignty in favour of constitutional democracy. On the majoritarian conception of democracy, this does not make sense. When a political community moves from a long period of totalitarianism to democracy it is to be expected that the people should initially be jealous of their newfound power to make collective decisions. Instead, the third wave of democracy is associated with a simultaneous 'global expansion of judicial power'.[1]

One possible explanation is that the curtailment of democracy, if that is indeed what judicial review amounts to, is a necessary condition for the spread of at least some kind of democracy. Something like this explanation is given by Tom Ginsburg in his study of the emerging role of constitutional courts in Asia. According to Ginsburg, the institution of judicial review, by providing 'insurance' to prospective electoral losers, can persuade warring factions to commit to the democratic process.[2]

A second possible explanation is contained in Dahl's work on polyarchy, to which reference has already been made.[3] Polyarchy, in Dahl's usage, is not equivalent to democracy, but rather a set of institutions necessary to the emergence and maintenance of modern democratic systems.[4] '[O]ne of the most striking differences between polyarchy and all earlier democratic and republican systems,' Dahl writes, 'is the astounding expansion of individual rights that has occurred in countries with polyarchal government'.[5] Dahl would thus agree with Ginsburg that the enforcement of individual rights is naturally associated with the spread of democracy.[6] What Dahl adds is the idea that rights are not just a form of insurance, but also an ongoing means of dealing with the complexity of decision-making in the modern nation-state.[7] Recall that the rise of representative democracy is closely associated with the emergence of this form of polity, and that one of the central questions of contemporary democratic theory concerns how representative democracy is to retain its legitimacy when citizen participation in politics is effectively reduced to the right to participate in periodic elections. One possible answer to this question, Dahl argues, is that judicially enforced rights make up for what is lost. In place of direct participation in collective decision-making, citizens today participate in the political process as rights-bearers.[8] Rights both secure their membership of the political community and carve out 'a sphere of personal freedom that participation in collective decisions cannot'.[9] In this sense, the judicial enforcement of individual rights is a [1] See C N Tate & T Vallinder (eds) The Global Expansion of Judicial Power (1995).

[2] T Ginsburg Judicial Review in New Democracies: Constitutional Courts in Asian Cases (2003).
[3] See § 10.2*(c)*(i) supra.
[4] Dahl Democracy and Its Critics (supra) at 221-22.
[5] Ibid at 219.
[6] See also Dahl On Democracy (supra) at 48-50.
[7] Dahl Democracy and its Critics (supra) at 220.
[8] Ibid.
[9] Ibid.

precondition for democracy, and there is thus no contradiction between the twin processes of democratization and the 'global expansion of judicial power'.

Whereas Ginsburg's view is explicitly premised on the assumption that rights detract from democracy, Dahl's argument sidesteps this question somewhat by arguing that the institutions of polyarchy that depend on judicial review, such as freedom of expression and the right to free and fair elections, 'are necessary to the highest feasible attainment of the democratic process in the [modern nation-state]' (emphasis added).[1] This approach is sufficient for Dahl's purposes, since his main aim is to defend status-quo political systems in North America and Western Europe against the charge that they have departed too far from the democratic ideal. For purposes of this chapter, however, this question cannot be avoided. The Final Constitution establishes a constitutional democracy with a justiciable Bill of Rights and an independent judiciary. It is therefore necessary to ask: Do rights detract from democracy? And, if so, are constitutional democracies really democratic?

The extensive literature on this topic, under the rubric of the 'counter-majoritarian dilemma', is canvassed elsewhere in this work.[2] The concern of this chapter is with a sub-component of this question, namely whether, as a matter of classification, the institution of judicial review can be said to render a political system undemocratic. This question was the subject of a well-known exchange between Ronald Dworkin and Jeremy Waldron. In the opening chapter of Freedom's Law,[3] Dworkin argues that, far from detracting from democracy, judicial review under a supreme-law Bill of Rights may in fact enhance it. For Dworkin, there is no such thing as the counter-majoritarian dilemma, and law professors who devote their scholarly lives to finding an 'interpretive strategy' between originalism and 'the moral reading' of the constitution are wasting their time.[4] Building on John Hart Ely's work,[5] Dworkin asserts that not just political rights, but also other rights which ensure that individuals are treated with 'equal concern and respect' are essential to the legitimacy of majority decision-making. When a majority infringes these rights, whether intentionally or inadvertently, the exercise of majoritarian power is illegitimate.[6] The 'constitutional conception of democracy', in other words, 'presupposes democratic conditions', or what Dworkin calls 'the conditions of moral membership in a political community'.[7] If these conditions are not met, 'no democracy exists'.[8]

[1] Dahl Democracy and its Critics (supra) at 220.
[2] See S Sibanda & A Stein 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, September 2006) Chapter 12. See also S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34
[3] R Dworkin Freedom's Law: The Moral Reading of the American Constitution (1996)('Freedom's Law').
[4] Ibid at 14.
[5] JH Ely Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review (1980).
[6] Dworkin Freedom's Law (supra) at 1-37.
[7] Ibid at 23-24.
[8] Ibid at 24.

In responding to this argument, Waldron's starting point is to concede that '[t]he idea of democracy is not incompatible with the idea of individual rights' and that 'there cannot be a democracy unless individuals possess and regularly exercise … the right to participate in the making of the laws'.[1] But, Waldron says, Dworkin is wrong to argue that there is no 'loss to democracy' when an unelected body, such as a court, imposes its view of what the conditions of democracy are.[2] On the contrary, there is always a trade-off between rights and democracy, even where a court, in striking down legislation on the grounds that it undermines democracy, makes the right decision. This is because any such decision, if taken by a non-democratic body, entails 'a loss in self-government'.[3] Although the fact that a court makes the right decision may mitigate this loss, it does not mean that there is no loss.[4] Conversely, where such a decision is taken by a democratic body, and a mistake is made, 'it is not silly for citizens to comfort themselves with the thought that at least they made their own mistake about democracy rather than having someone else's mistake foisted upon them'.[5]

Even Waldron, however, the most strident recent defender of the 'dignity of legislation',[6] does not go so far as to argue that judicial review under a supreme-law Bill of Rights renders a political system undemocratic. At most, he argues that the presence of this institution renders a system less democratic. Nor does Waldron argue that political systems in which judicial review plays a role are more or less just than systems in which this is not the case. This question, Waldron argues, when asked in relation to any actually existing political system, involves a counterfactual, and hence is incapable of meaningful proof either way.[7]

We are left, therefore, with two main conclusions: (a) judicial review under a supreme-law bill of rights forms an integral part of many political systems that are widely regarded as democratic, and, indeed, the popularity of judicial review as a device to control state power may be said to have contributed to the 'third wave' of democracy experienced during the latter part of the last century; (b) even if judicial review detracts from democracy, as it certainly does from the simple majoritarian conception of democracy, this does not mean that political systems in which this institution plays a prominent role are not democratic.

As a rider to these two conclusions, we might add that, if the question is framed in the way Dahl frames it, as being whether judicial review is a necessary condition for the emergence and maintenance of some kind of democracy, albeit a less than perfect kind, then the answer is certainly 'yes'. The contribution to

[1] J Waldron Law and Disagreement (1999) 282.
[2] Ibid at 285-87, 302.
[3] Ibid at 293.
[4] Ibid.
[5] Ibid at 293-94.
[6] J Waldron The Dignity of Legislation (1999).
[7] Waldron Law and Disagreement (supra) at 287-89.

democratic theory made by judicial review on the American model is precisely this — that for democracy to endure, it must be saved from its excesses.[1]

10.3 Constitutional Provisions Referring to Democracy

This section considers the text of, and judicial commentary on, the various provisions in the Final Constitution in which direct reference is made to democracy. Although the Final Constitution's vision for South African democracy is obviously more complex than this, and is in the end conveyed through the entire constitutional text, consideration of the direct references to democracy provides a useful starting point.

(a) The preamble

The preamble to the Final Constitution, in setting out the purposes for which it was adopted, makes three direct references to democracy, each of which is tied to a different purpose. First, the preamble provides that one of the aims underlying the Final Constitution is to 'establish a society based on democratic values, social justice and fundamental human rights'. Secondly, the preamble commits the Final Constitution to 'lay[ing] the foundation for a democratic and open society in which government is based on the will of the people and every citizen is equally protected by law'. Thirdly, the preamble connects the adoption of the Final Constitution to the goal of 'build[ing] a united and democratic South Africa able to take its rightful place as a sovereign state in the family of nations'.

The precise normative weight to be given to these provisions has not been considered, but is apparent from case law under the Interim Constitution.[2] In essence, the preamble, though not part of the operative provisions, may be taken into account in interpreting the rest of the Constitution. In Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal, for example, the Court quoted the first part of the preamble in the course of explaining the role of socio-economic rights in combating poverty and inequality. This reference appears to have been intended to bolster the argument that there is no necessary conflict between the Final Constitution's commitment to democracy and the judicial enforcement of socio-economic

[1] Cf Aristotle The Politics (Revised Edition trans TA Sinclair 1981) Book VI.v. Aristotle argues that the best way of preserving any form of government is to make it less extreme: 'We shall know not to regard as a democratic (or oligarchic) measure any measure which will make the whole as democratic (or oligarchic) as it is possible to be, but only that measure which will make it last as a democracy (or oligarchy) for as long as possible.'

[2] See LM du Plessis Re-interpretation of Statutes (2003) 240-41 (Du Plessis observes that '[t]he Constitutional Court and, to a lesser extent high courts, have shown a readiness to rely on constitutional preambles for interpretive purposes without imposing the qualification that such reliance is warranted only where constitutional language lacks clarity and unambiguity'. Under the Interim Constitution, Du Plessis notes that the Court in S v Mhlungu 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) at para 112 held that: 'The preamble in particular should not be dismissed as a mere aspirational and throat-clearing exercise of little interpretive value. It connects up, reinforces and underlies all of the rest that follows. It helps to establish the basic design of the Constitution and indicate its fundamental purpose.') rights.[1] Likewise, in First National Bank, the Court quoted the reference to 'democratic values' in the preamble when explaining the 'proportionate balance' that needs to be struck between 'protecting existing property rights' and 'serving the public interest'.[2]

Other references to the preamble have been less determinate,[3] and no judgment to date has attempted anything like a comprehensive analysis of this part of the Final Constitution. In the absence of relevant case law, the preamble should be taken at face value, and its three direct references to democracy should be understood to mean that democracy is expected to fulfil at least three different functions.

First, in providing that one of the purposes underlying the Final Constitution is 'to establish a society based on democratic values', the preamble suggests that democracy is something more than a system of government — a value-neutral set of procedures for achieving other valued ends. Democracy itself, the preamble implies, is a value system that demands our allegiance. Nor is this value-system limited in its application to the structure of state institutions and the way government conducts itself. Rather, the purpose behind the adoption of the Final Constitution is 'to establish a society based on democratic values' (emphasis added). The expectation, in other words, is that the Final Constitution's commitment to democracy will permeate all social relations, and inform all South Africans' dealings with each other,[4] whether as private citizens inter se or as civil servants appointed to serve the public interest.[5] It is significant, too, that the reference to democracy in this part of the preamble is tied to 'social justice and fundamental rights', suggesting that these three concepts are to be the fundamental building blocks of South African society, and implying that there is no necessary contradiction between them.

Secondly, the preamble provides that, in the 'open and democratic society' which the Final Constitution is expected to establish, 'government is [to be] based on the will of the people and every citizen is [to be] equally protected by law'. This statement reiterates the core democratic idea with which this chapter

[1] 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC) at para 9.

[2] First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service & Another; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) at para 50.

[3] See, eg, Director of Public Prosecutions: Cape of Good Hope v Bathgate 2000 (2) SA 535 (C), 2000 (2) BCLR 151 (C) at para 58 (Preamble to the Final Constitution cited without comment.); Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC) at para 43 (Quoting the preamble in holding that '[f]airness requires a consideration of the interests of all of those who might be affected by the [court's] order'.); Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC) at para 1 (Referring to the preamble as recording South Africa's commitment to 'the attainment of social justice and the improvement of the quality of life of everyone'.); Islamic Unity Convention Independent Broadcasting Authority & Others 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC) at para 45 (Citing preamble in considering the fourth respondent's submission that the right to freedom of expression may be limited in the interests of 'building a united society'.)

[4] Cf I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 14 n60.

[5] FC s 195(1) provides that: 'Public administration must be governed by the democratic values and principles enshrined in the Constitution.' For discussion of FC s 195(1), see § 10.3 infra.

began — with two modifications. In introducing at this early stage the concept of openness, and in juxtaposing the democratic principle alongside the principle of formal equality, this part of the preamble aligns the Final Constitution with the liberal tradition of thinking about democracy discussed in § 10.2. This does not mean that the Final Constitution's vision for democracy is limited to the liberal tradition,[1] or that the Final Constitution does not seek to add to that tradition in any way. But it does mean that the conception of democracy in the Final Constitution, and the normative standard it seeks to impose, must develop out of the liberal tradition, rather than deviate from it.

Thirdly, in providing that the adoption of the Final Constitution is intended to serve the purpose of 'build[ing] a united and democratic South Africa able to take its rightful place as a sovereign state in the family of nations', the preamble acknowledges that, in the modern era, the fate of each democratic nation-state is tied to the rest. Apartheid stifled the democratic aspirations of the South African people. But it also hindered the spread of democracy in Africa. One of the secondary purposes of getting its own democratic house in order, this part of the preamble suggests, is to enable South Africa to make a contribution to the global struggle for democracy, social justice and the advancement of human rights.[2]

In addition to these three direct references to democracy, the preamble stresses that the Final Constitution is itself a democratic document, made by 'the people of South Africa through [their] freely elected representatives'. Like the similar provision in the US Constitution, this formulation imports into South African constitutional law the justification of constitutionalism as a democratic 'precommitment' to the rules according to which democracy is to operate.[3] The Final Constitution's overarching approach to the tension between rights and democracy is discussed in § 10.3*(c)*. For the moment, it is enough to note that the preamble openly embraces this tension in emphasizing the democratic pedigree of the document through which democratic politics are to be regulated.

(b) Founding provisions

FC s 1 provides that: 'The Republic of South Africa is one, sovereign, democratic state founded on the following values: (a) . . . (d) Universal adult suffrage, a national common voters role, regular elections and a multi-party system of democratic government, to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness.' This provision lays the foundation for a system of representative government on the liberal model. Universal adult suffrage, regular elections and the expression of preferences through the medium of political parties are all institutions that have evolved in particular historical settings within the tradition of thinking about democracy described in § 10.2. However, in providing that the purpose underlying these institutions is 'to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness',[1] FC s 1*(d)* gives the idea of representative democracy an inflection that is incompatible with some interpretations of the liberal tradition. The insistence on 'responsiveness', for example, is irreconcilable with Schumpeter's competitive elitist model in which, as we have seen, citizens are depicted as passive consumers of political goods. On the contrary, what FC s 1*(d)* envisages is a system in which the institutions of representative democracy operate to ensure that the people's elected representatives are genuinely answerable to an active, informed and engaged citizenry.

[1] See Democratic Alliance & Another v Masondo NO & Another 2003 (2) SA 413 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 128 (CC)(Sachs J concurring). Sachs J contends that there are important parallels between the liberal tradition and the 'indigenous African tradition' of democracy, both of which stress the importance of participation and deliberation. Ibid at para 42. This decision, and Sachs J's judgment, are discussed in § 10.3*(d)* infra. See also S v Mamabolo (E TV & Others Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC), as discussed in § 10.4*(a)* infra.

[2] See Kaunda & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) at para 222 (O'Regan J dissenting).

[3] See S Holmes 'Precommitment and the Paradox of Democracy' in J Elster & R Slagstad (eds) Constitutionalism and Democracy (1988) 195.

In practice, of course, this conception of democracy may be hopelessly idealistic, and Schumpeter's model, for all we know, may be a more accurate description of actually existing democratic politics in South Africa. But this is not the point. As a matter of constitutional law, FC s 1*(d)* attributes a broader instrumental purpose to the familiar institutions of liberal democracy, and in so doing imposes a normative standard that would not be satisfied by the mere holding of elections and the operation of an essentially elitist multi-party political system.

But how, exactly, is this normative standard to be enforced? In Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Re-integration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others, the respondents argued that FC s 1*(d)* was not only directly justiciable, but that it posited an absolute right which was incapable of limitation under FC s 36.[2] The respondents, all of whom were prisoners, had been excluded by an amendment to the Electoral Act from participating in the 2004 general elections.[3] Although the respondents' case was in the main based on the contention that the amended provisions of the Act violated their voting rights in FC s 19(3)(a), they argued, in the alternative, that the amendments violated FC s 1*(d)*, and that, since this provision gave rise to absolute rights, such violation could not be saved under FC s 36. The Constitutional Court rightly dismissed this argument:: 'The values enunciated in section 1 of the Constitution', the Court held, 'are of fundamental importance. They inform and give substance to all the provisions of the Constitution. They do not, however, give rise to discrete and enforceable rights in themselves.'[4] The founding values, in other words, must be

[1] FC s 1*(d)* is slightly ambiguous as to whether the phrase 'to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness' qualifies the immediately preceding phrase — 'a multi-party system of democratic government' — or the entire provision. The presence of a comma after 'government' suggests the latter reading, which is the one preferred here. See § 10.5*(a)* infra.

[2] 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC)('NICRO').

[3] 73 of 1998

[4] Ibid at para 21.

seen as interpretative guidelines, presumptions almost, which favour a certain way of understanding the South African constitutional project and, in the case of FC s 1*(d)*, the nature of the democracy which that project seeks to promote.[1]

There are two exceptions to this rule. First, in the event of an amendment to the Final Constitution, FC s 1*(d)* may be directly justiciable in so far as it may be used to determine the substantive category to which the amendment belongs. So much is clear from the UDM, in which the Court entertained an (ultimately unsuccessful) argument that, because it undermined South Africa's multi-party system of democratic government, the constitutional amendment at issue ought to have been passed according to the procedure laid down in FC s 74(1).[2] Secondly, FC s 1*(d)* may be directly relevant to the assessment of the constitutionality of a provincial constitution. In Ex parte Speaker of the Western Cape Provincial Legislature: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Western Cape, 1997,[3] the Constitutional Court was asked to strike down parts of the draft Western Cape Constitution on the basis of FC s 1*(d).[4] The substance of the challenge was that, in providing that two of the 14 members of the provincial cabinet need not be members of the provincial parliament, ss 42 and 83 of the Western Cape Constitution, read with clause 1 of Annexure A to Schedule 3, contradicted 'the principles of democratic government entrenched in [FC] s 1(d)*'.[5] Citing the First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court held that democratic systems based on the principle of separation of powers do not require that every member of the executive be an elected member of the legislature.[6] The foundational commitment to 'regular elections and a multi-party system of democratic government' in FC s 1*(d)*, in other words, does not require either strict independence or interdependence between the legislature and the executive.[7]

Given the limited frequency of provincial constitution-making, it can be expected that the content of FC s 1*(d)* will mainly be elaborated in judgments considering challenges to constitutional amendments, and then only in the event that there is some strategic purpose to be served in classifying the amendment as one that affects the founding values. Thus, in UDM, because the procedure for ordinary constitutional amendments had been followed, and because the African National Congress could not, at that stage, be assured of obtaining the requisite majorities prescribed in FC s 74(1) for constitutional amendments affecting the

[1] C Roederer 'Founding Provisions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 13.

[2] United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (African Christian Democratic Party & Others Intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Another as Amici Curiae*) (No 2)* 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1213 (CC)('UDM').

[3] 1997 (4) SA 795 (CC), 1997 (9) BCLR 1167 (CC)('Ex parte Speaker of the Western Cape Legislature').

[4] The direct challenge to a provincial constitution in this way is made possible by FC s 143(2)(a), which provides that a provincial constitution 'must comply with the values in section 1 and with Chapter 3'.

[5] Ex parte Speaker of the Western Cape Legislature (supra) at para 62.

[6] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 108.

[7] Ex parte Speaker of the Western Cape Legislature (supra) at para 63.

founding values, there was a strategic purpose in attempting to persuade the Court that the founding values were implicated, and, in particular, the foundational commitment to multi-party democracy. This argument, although in the end unsuccessful, at least required the UDM Court to comment on the constitutional conception of multi-party democracy in a way that adds to our understanding of this institution. Multi-party democracy, the UDM Court held, 'clearly excludes a one-party state, or a system of government in which a limited number of parties are entitled to compete for office'.[1] Rather, 'multi-party democracy contemplates a political order in which it is permissible for different political groups to organize, promote their views through public debate and participate in free and fair elections.'[2]

In UDM, the Court was required to apply this definition to an assessment of the constitutionality of a constitutional amendment and related electoral reform legislation that purported to amend the then applicable proportional representation system. The package of legislation, which is discussed in detail elsewhere in this work,[3] sought to make it possible for members of Parliament, the provincial legislatures and municipal councils to cross the floor without losing their seats. The crisp question before the Court was whether the foundational commitment to multi-party democracy precluded the creation of an electoral system in which the outcome of an election could be altered by post-election floor-crossing. The applicants' argument was not that the existing proportional representation system was constitutionally entrenched, but that, where an electoral system is based on proportional representation, a provision prohibiting parliamentarians from defecting to other parties between elections is essential to multi-party democracy.[4] The Court's somewhat long and convoluted answer to this question came down to the assertion that floor-crossing in a proportional representation system, though it may frustrate the will of the electorate, does not undermine multi-party democracy.[5] The frustration of the will of the electorate, for its part, does not infringe FC s 19 (political rights), because all the rights in this section 'are directed to elections, to voting and to participation in political activities. Between elections, however, voters have no control over the conduct of their representatives.'[6] And multi-party democracy is not undermined because FC s 1*(d)* does not prescribe a particular kind of electoral system.[7]

[1] UDM (supra) at para 24.
[2] Ibid at para 26
[3] See G Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 29; C Roederer 'Founding Provisions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 13; S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 17.
[4] UDM (supra) at para 30.
[5] Ibid at para 53.
[6] Ibid at para 49.
[7] Ibid at para 35.

UDM is disappointing, not because the outcome was necessarily wrong, but because the Court repeatedly fails to engage with the values underlying democracy in South Africa, and because the decision, uncharacteristically for the Court, too frequently relies on assertion rather than reasoned argument. For example, the statement that, '[b]etween elections voters have no control over the conduct of their representatives', simply asserts a shallow, pluralist conception of democracy that is out of kilter with some of the Court's other decisions in this area and with the Final Constitution's vision for South African democracy. It is the case that the main form of control that voters have over their representatives under the Final Constitution is the right of recall. However, FC s 1*(d)*, as noted above, prescribes a deeper conception of democracy, one that accords to the institutions of representative democracy the instrumental purpose of ensuring 'accountability, responsiveness and openness'. It is difficult to see how these values are served by a proportional representation system that allows people who were elected to represent a particular political party, and therefore a particular set of interests, to change parties between elections without any recourse to the electorate.

The UDM Court's reliance on the absence of any decision in foreign case law to the effect that proportional representation necessarily implies that members of a legislature are not permitted to defect equally fails to engage with the substantive values underlying democracy in South Africa.[1] The Final Constitution's vision for democracy is primarily a function of the constitutional text. The absence of foreign case law in which the lack of an anti-defection provision in a proportional representation system was found to be unconstitutional can only provide indirect evidence of what the commitment to multi-party democracy in South Africa entails. Such evidence is no substitute for a value-laden inquiry into the importance of multi-party democracy in South Africa. And yet such an inquiry is conspicuously absent from the Court's decision in UDM, notwithstanding an entire section ostensibly devoted to '[t]he anti-defection provision in the context of conditions in South Africa'.[2]

We are left in the end with the sense that the Court's refusal in UDM to elaborate a sufficiently deep, substantive conception of democracy was attributable to the deference it perceived itself to owe to the legislature in cases of this nature. At the outset of the judgment the Court signals this basic approach by declaring:

> This case is not about the merits or demerits of the provisions of the disputed legislation. That is a political question and is of no concern to this Court. What has to be decided is not whether the disputed provisions are appropriate or inappropriate, but whether they are constitutional or unconstitutional. It ought not to have been necessary to say this for that is true of all cases that come before this Court. We do so only because of some of the submissions made to us in argument, and the tenor of the public debate concerning the case which has taken place both before and since the hearing of the matter.[3]

[1] UDM (supra) at para 35.
[2] Ibid at paras 36-54.
[3] Ibid at para 11.

The Court's reliance in this passage on a rigid distinction between law and politics is really just a signal of the level of deference it felt to be appropriate to the case. Law and politics are inevitably intertwined, and constitutional courts are seen in political theory, at least, as pre-eminently political institutions.[1] In rhetorically denying this, the Court in UDM was merely setting the standard of review that it intended to apply in the case. In finding that foreign case law did not support the striking down of the provisions, for example, the Court held: 'Where the law prohibits defection, that is a lawful prohibition, which must be enforced by the courts. But where it does not do so, courts cannot prohibit such conduct where the Legislature has chosen not to do so.'[2] All that this holding really means is that the detailed design of South Africa's electoral system is a political question that is reserved for the legislature to make. And the two-parted ratio that we should take away from UDM, in turn, is that: (a) the commitment to multi-party democracy in FC s 1*(d)* does not guarantee a particular form of electoral system;[3] and (b) the commitment to multi-party democracy is not incompatible with a system of proportional representation in which members of the legislature are permitted to cross the floor between elections.

In addition to decisions on amendments to the Final Constitution, the extension of FC s 1*(d)* as an interpretative guide to the meaning of the rights enshrined in Chapter 2, and political rights in particular, has been determined in a number of voting rights cases. In NICRO, where this interpretative role was most clearly set out, FC s 1*(d)* did not go on to play a significant role in the interpretation of FC s 19(3)(a), mainly because the right to vote had plainly been violated. This, in turn, meant that the focus of the NICRO Court's attention fell on the limitations stage of the inquiry, and in particular on the question whether limiting the right of certain categories of prisoner to vote was reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society. In two other cases involving the right to vote, however, FC s 1*(d)* has been deployed as an interpretative guide in the manner suggested in NICRO. In August v Electoral Commission, which also involved prisoners, and which preceded and in many ways paved the way for the challenge in NICRO, the Court was asked to consider whether the Electoral Commission's failure to take positive steps to enable prisoners to vote in the 1999 general elections violated FC s 19(3)(a). The complication in August was that the Electoral Act at that time did not expressly disqualify prisoners from voting. The focus of the August Court's assessment thus fell on the first stage of the constitutional inquiry, since it was clear that, in the absence of a law of general application, the violation of the applicants' right to vote, once established, could not be justified. In this context, the Court devoted an entire paragraph to the importance and meaning of FC s 1*(d)*, which is worth quoting in full:

[1] See, for example, L Epstein, O Shvetsova & J Knight 'The Role of Constitutional Courts in the Establishment of Democratic Systems of Government' (2001) 35 Law & Society Review 117-63 (Attempting to model the strategic calculations made by the Russian Constitutional Court in relation to politically controversial decisions.)

[2] UDM (supra) at para 35.

[3] Ibid at para 29 (Holding that the omission from FC s 1*(d)* of any express reference to proportional representation, in contrast to Constitutional Principle VIII, means that this electoral system does not form part of the founding values.)

> Universal adult suffrage on a common voters' roll is one of the foundational values of our entire constitutional order. The achievement of the franchise has historically been important both for the acquisition of the rights of full and effective citizenship by all South Africans regardless of race, and for the accomplishment of an all-embracing nationhood. The universality of the franchise is important not only for nationhood and democracy. The vote of each and every citizen is a badge of dignity and personhood. Quite literally, it says that everybody counts. In a country of great disparities of wealth and power it declares that whoever we are, whether rich or poor, exalted or disgraced, we all belong to the same democratic South African nation; that our destinies are intertwined in a single interactive polity. Rights may not be limited without justification and legislation dealing with the franchise must be interpreted in favour of enfranchisement rather than disenfranchisement.[1]

There are two main arguments running through this passage. First, the passage emphasizes that the Final Constitution's commitment to 'universal adult suffrage on a common voters roll' is no mere incantation of a foreign legal nostrum. Rather, it is a profound expression of South Africans' desire never to repeat the apartheid fallacy that a minority of citizens should be entitled to dominate the majority by dividing the electorate into separate polities, each with its own voters' roll and distinct national identity. Secondly, the passage connects the right to vote to the development of human personality in ways that are very reminiscent of Mill's emphasis on the educative effects of citizen participation in politics. At the same time, however, the passage strips Mill's argument of its elitist contention that, though all should be entitled to vote, the vote of some (the better educated, the wealthy) should be more important than the vote of others (the uneducated, the poor). South African democracy, this passage makes clear, is one in which the principle of political equality is taken to its logical conclusion.

This part of August is quoted in full in African Christian Democratic Party v Electoral Commission & Others.[2] In African Christian Democratic Party, the applicant, a political party, had been excluded from participating in the 2006 municipal elections for the City of Cape Town on the grounds that it had failed to pay the deposit prescribed by ss 14 and 17 of the Local Government: Municipal Electoral Act.[3] By agreement with the Electoral Commission, the applicant had made a central payment of a sum of money sufficient to cover the deposit required in respect of all the municipalities it sought to contest, but had not mentioned Cape Town in the list of municipalities that accompanied this payment. The question before the Court was whether the term 'deposit' in ss 14 and 17 necessarily meant an earmarked deposit in the sense that, when made, it should be specific to a named municipality. This question, the African Christian Democratic Party Court held, was essentially one of statutory interpretation. However, the passage in August was relevant to the extent that it suggested that a court, 'when interpreting provisions in electoral statutes', is required 'to seek to promote enfranchisement rather than disenfranchisement and participation rather than exclusion'.[1] African Christian Democratic Party therefore confirms the holding in NICRO that, apart from the two exceptions discussed above, the role of the founding values is to act as a guide to the interpretation of legislation. In particular, where legislation seeks to regulate the right to vote, the role of FC s 1*(d)* is to act as a higher-norm presumption against an intention on the part of the legislature to exclude certain categories of people from voting.

[1] 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC) at para 17.
[2] 2006 (5) BCLR 579 (CC)('African Christian Democratic Party') at para 22.
[3] Act 27 of 2000.

In addition to the right to vote, FC s 1*(d)* has also featured as an interpretive guide in cases involving the right to freedom of expression,[2] the right to participate in the proceedings of municipal councils,[3] and the extra-territorial application of the Bill of Rights.[4] In Khumalo & Others v Holomisa, for example, FC s 1*(d)* was referred to in connection with the importance of the role of the media 'in ensuring that government is open, responsive and accountable to the people'.[5] And in Democratic Alliance v ANC & Others, following the Constitutional Court's decision in UDM, the Cape High Court held that FC s 1*(d)* does not prescribe proportional representation as the only 'fair' representative system compatible with multi-party democracy.[6]

In the most recent decision to engage FC s 1*(d)*'s relationship to multi-party democracy, Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South African & Others,[7] the Constitutional Court considered FC s 1*(d)* in the course of interpreting FC s 155(3)(b). FC s 155(3)(b) provides that national legislation must 'establish criteria and procedures for the determination of municipal boundaries by an independent authority'. The Court re-iterated the view it had expressed in Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature that the purpose of establishing an independent authority to determine municipal boundaries was to 'guard against political interference'.[8] This, in turn, was necessary to protect 'our multi-party system of democratic government'.[9] The foundational commitment to multi-party

[1] African Christian Democratic Party (supra) at para 23.

[2] See, eg, S v Mamabolo (E TV & Others Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC) at para 45.

[3] Democratic Alliance v ANC & Others 2003 (1) BCLR 25 (C)('Democratic Alliance v ANC').

[4] See Kaunda & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC)('Kaunda') (O'Regan J dissenting) at para 218.

[5] 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC) at para 23. For a discussion of this case, see § 10.4*(a)* infra.

[6] Democratic Alliance v ANC (supra) at 38D-F, citing UDM (supra). For a discussion of this case in relation to FC s 160(8), see § 10.3*(d)*(ii) infra.

[7] 2006 (5) BCLR 622 (CC)('Matatiele').

[8] Ibid at para 41 quoting Executive Council, Western Cape v Minister of Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development & Another; Executive Council, KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at para 50.

[9] Ibid.

democracy here supports a reading of FC s 155(3)(b) that would prevent the manipulation of municipal boundaries by a dominant political party to safeguard its position against later shifts in the balance of political power.

Sachs J's concurring judgment in Matatiele stressed a different aspect of FC s 1(d), namely the foundational commitment to 'accountability, responsiveness and openness'. The pursuit of these goals, Sachs J held, requires government to be candid when asked to explain the purpose behind a legislative proposal:[1]

> [F]ar from the foundational values of the rule of law and of accountable government existing in discreet [sic] categories, they overlap and reinforce each other. Openness of government promotes both the rationality that the rule of law requires, and the accountability that multi-party democracy demands. In our constitutional order, the legitimacy of laws made by Parliament comes not from awe, but from openness.[2]

This passage, like Sachs J's remarks in August, helpfully deepens our understanding of the Final Constitution's conception of democracy. In particular, it suggests that the exercise by Parliament of its democratic law-making power is only legitimate to the extent that the purposes it seeks to achieve are properly explained. Legislation, like all assertions of public power, must also of course be rational. But, Sachs J concludes, the requirement of transparency in law-making is likely to promote rationality as a matter of course.[3]

(c) Democracy in the Bill of Rights: FC ss 7(1), 36(1) and 39(1)

There are three direct references to democracy in the Bill of Rights: FC 7(1) (the basic rights clause), FC s 36(1) (the general limitations clause) and FC s 39(1) (the interpretation clause). Together, these three provisions structure the way in which the tension between rights and democracy is to be managed in South African constitutional law.

FC s 7(1) provides that: 'The Bill of Rights is a cornerstone of democracy in South Africa. It enshrines the rights of all people in our country and affirms the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom.'[4] Although the

[1] Matatiele (supra) at para 99.

[2] Ibid at para 110.

[3] Although he does not say so, Sachs J's understanding of the authority of legislation comes close to Habermas's notion of communicative power, that is, the notion that the only legitimate form of political power in the modern nation-state is the power that is exercised consequent on rational deliberation in the public sphere. See J Habermas Between Facts and Norms: Contributions to a Discourse Theory of Law and Democracy (Trans W Rehg, 1996) 170 and W Outhwaite Habermas: A Critical Introduction (1994) 142.

[4] In Kaunda, the Court held that FC s 7(1) means that the Bill of Rights enshrines the rights of South Africa's people only when they are literally in South Africa, and accordingly that the Bill of Rights has no extra-territorial application. Kaunda (supra) at para 37. The interesting aspect of Kaunda from the perspective of this chapter is that it placed the Court in the seemingly contradictory position of having to enforce constitutional rights in defence of persons charged with plotting the overthrow of the head of another sovereign state. The 69 applicants in Kaunda had been arrested in Zimbabwe on charges of participating in an attempted coup against the President of Equatorial Guinea. Amidst allegations of poor treatment and threatened extradition to Equatorial Guinea, where it was said they would face the death penalty, the applicants launched an urgent application in the Pretoria High Court demanding that the South African government seek their release and/or extradition to South Africa. The Constitutional Court's appeal ruling — that the Bill of Rights had no application to the case and that the Court should academic debate over the question whether judicial review under a supreme-law Bill of Rights necessarily detracts from democracy will no doubt continue, in relation to cases heard under the Final Constitution at least, FC s 7(1) comes down decisively in favour of the view that it does not. Far from detracting from democracy, FC s 7(1) asks us to accept, the rights in the Bill of Rights lie at the very heart of the Final Constitution's vision for South African democracy. Or, to put the point the other way round, no South African political system claiming to be democratic would be worthy of that name unless it respected the democratic values which the Bill of Rights affirms.[1]

This approach to the rights-democracy tension resembles Dworkin's argument in Freedom's Law.[2] As we saw in § 10.2*(d)*, for Dworkin, there is nothing at all undemocratic about a court being asked to enforce, against the will of the majority, rights that are constitutive of democracy. Provided the court reaches the right answer, this practice can only enhance democracy. In endorsing this view, FC s 7(1) distinguishes South African democracy from the account of that system given by Schumpeter, and, to a lesser extent, Dahl. The purpose underlying the commitment to democracy in the Final Constitution, FC s 7(1) implies, is not the maintenance of political stability, or some kind of best-that-we-can-do-under-the-circumstances democracy, but the promotion of a value-laden system of government based on human dignity, equality and freedom.[3]

Of course, resolving the rights-democracy tension is not really this simple. Rights are in tension with democracy, and it will not always be readily apparent when a decision to vindicate a right against the will of the majority will serve the accordingly defer to the executive's judgment of how best to protect its citizens — seems to run counter to the preamble's concern with the way in which the quality of South African democracy impacts on the struggle for democracy in other countries, especially on the African continent. For this reason, O'Regan's J's dissenting judgment is to be preferred. In contrast to the majority, O'Regan J did not read FC s 7(1) as necessarily implying that the Bill of Rights has no extraterritorial effect. In any event, she reasoned, the case did not concern the extraterritorial application of the Bill of Rights, but rather whether the applicants' constitutional rights as citizens of South Africa entitled them to protection in the circumstances of the case. Ibid at para 230. This approach appears to be more in keeping with the preamble's commitment to 'build[ing] a united and democratic South Africa able to take its rightful place as a sovereign state in the family of nations'. As noted in § 10.3*(a)*, this commitment implies that there is a connection between the promotion of constitutional democracy in South Africa and the way South Africa relates to other sovereign states. This commitment cannot be fulfilled if the executive is not in principle bound by the Bill of Rights in the conduct of South Africa's international relations. For an extended discussion of the extraterritorial application of the Bill of Rights that largely accords with this view, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31. Other cases in which FC s 7(1) has been referred to include Minister of Justice v Ntuli 1997 (3) SA 772 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 677 (CC) at para 32; Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Another (Centre for Applied Legal Studies Intervening) 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC) at para 33; and Van Dyk v National Commissioner, South African Police Service & Another 2004 (4) SA 587, 589I (T).

[1] Kaunda & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC).

[2] R Dworkin Freedom's Law: The Moral Reading of the American Constitution (1996).

[3] R Dworkin Law's Empire (1986).

democratic values listed in FC s 7(1), and when it will not. But what FC s 7(1) decisively does do is to put beyond question the idea that there will be at least some occasions when the vindication of a right at the expense of majoritarian wishes will not be undemocratic. In practice, the way this system works is through the two-stage approach to judicial review.[1] Like the 1982 Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Final Constitution envisages an adjudicatory model in which courts resolve the rights-democracy tension in concrete cases by deciding first whether the impugned law or conduct infringes a right in the Bill of Rights, and thereafter whether such infringement can be saved under the general limitations clause. In this way, FC s 36(1) functions as a kind of democratic 'claw-back', allowing apparently rights-infringing law to be justified by reference to the very same values that FC s 7(1) says the Bill of Rights was adopted to affirm.

In order fully to appreciate this point, it is necessary to set out the first part of FC s 36(1) in full: 'The rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited only in terms of law of general application to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom ' The repetition of the democratic values listed in FC s 7(1), to which reference is also made in FC s 1*(a)*, is deliberate. The only basis on which law that infringes a right in the Bill of Rights may be justified, FC s 36(1) tells us, is if that limitation can be said to be reasonable and justifiable in the sort of society that the Bill of Rights is committed to promoting. And what sort of society is that? Well, an 'open and democratic' society in which, whether it comes down in favour of the people's will or the right allegedly infringed, the resolution found for the rights-democracy tension must in the end promote the democratic values of 'human dignity, equality and freedom'.

It follows from this analysis that the case law applying FC s 36(1) is likely to tell us quite a bit about the Final Constitution's conception of democracy, or at least the Final Constitution's idea of what it means to live in an 'open and democratic society'.[2] And, indeed, a cursory examination of the law reports reveals this to be the case. In decision after decision in which the second stage of the constitutional inquiry has been reached, the courts have pronounced on this issue. In some cases, the courts' view is implicit in the holding of the case, in the form of a statement along the following lines: In an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom, it is (not) reasonable and justifiable to limit right X in the following circumstance. In other cases, or in addition to holdings of this kind, the courts have expressly articulated what they think the Final Constitution's vision for an open and democratic society is. In, Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others, for example, the Court remarked that '[t]he hallmark of an open and democratic society is its capacity to accommodate and manage difference of intensely-held world views and lifestyles in a reasonable and fair manner'.[1]

[1] For a discussion of two-stage review, and the relationship between fundamental rights analysis and limitations analysis, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34. See, eg, S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) at para 21; S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC)('Makwanyane') at paras 100-102; S v Williams & Others 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 54; Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa; Matiso & Others v Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison, & Others 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC)('Coetzee') at para 9; Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 44; S v Mbatha; S v Prinsloo 1996 (2) SA 464 (CC), 1996 (3) BCLR 293 (CC) at para 9.

[2] See D Meyerson Rights Limited: Freedom of Expression, Religion and the South African Constitution (1997) 3 (Arguing that the reference to 'an open and democratic society' in FC s 39(1) suggests that the drafters of the Final Constitution had in mind for South Africa something like Cass Sunstein's 'republic of reasons', or deliberative democracy, citing CR Sunstein The Partial Constitution (1993).)

In this way, the courts' interpretation of the Final Constitution's vision of what it means to live in an open and democratic society is a function of everything they have said in all the cases in which the second stage of the constitutional inquiry has been reached. It would serve no useful purpose to summarize all of this jurisprudence here.[2] Some of the more important decisions may, however, be briefly mentioned. We know, for example, that the Final Constitution's vision for what it means to live in an open and democratic society does not encompass certain types of reverse onus provision.[3] Nor is there space in that vision for the criminalization of sodomy between consenting adult males;[4] the disenfranchisement of prisoners serving sentences without the option of a fine;[5] the statutory restriction of the common-law prescription period for delictual claims against the state;[6] the detention and sale in execution of goods belonging to a third party to defray a customs debt;[7] the overbroad statutory authorization of lethal force in effecting an arrest;[8] the blanket criminal prohibition of nude performances on premises where liquor is sold;[9] and the sale of immovable property in execution of a judgment debt without judicial supervision.[10]

[1] 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC) at para 95. In the preceding paragraph of the judgment the Court remarked: 'In an open and democratic society contemplated by the Constitution there must be mutually respectful co-existence between the secular and the sacred.' See also Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council: Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development Intervening (Women's Legal Centre as Amicus Curiae*)* 2001 (4) SA 491 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC)('Moise') at para 23 ('Untrammelled access to the courts is a fundamental right of every individual in an open and democratic society'.)

[2] For such a summary, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[3] S v Manamela & Another (Director-General of Justice Intervening) 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC).

[4] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC).

[5] 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC)('NICRO').

[6] Moise (supra).

[7] First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner for the South African Revenue Service & Another; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC).

[8] Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: In re S v Walters & Another 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC)('S v Walters').

[9] Phillips & Another v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand) & Others 2003 (3) SA 345 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC).

[10] Jaftha v Schoeman & Others; Van Rooyen v Stoltz & Others 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC).

What the limitations analysis in all of these cases reveals is that the resolution of the rights-democracy tension in concrete cases can only be achieved by means of a value-laden inquiry. As Sachs J noted in Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa, a case decided under the Interim Constitution:

> [F]aithfulness to the Constitution is best achieved by locating the two-stage balancing process within a holistic, value-based and case-oriented framework. The values that must suffuse the whole process are derived from the concept of an open and democratic society based on freedom and equality The notion of an open and democratic society is thus not merely aspirational or decorative, it is normative, furnishing the matrix of ideals within which we work, the source from which we derive the principles and rules we apply, and the final measure we use for testing the legitimacy of impugned norms and conduct.[1]

It is easy to dismiss this passage as being somewhat idealistic. In fact, it goes to the heart of the constitutional project. What is often forgotten when thinking about the two-stage approach to constitutional adjudication is that both stages of the inquiry are driven by considerations of rights and democracy: the first stage because it involves an assessment of whether the right in question has been infringed, in a context in which FC s 7(1) provides that the 'Bill of Rights is a cornerstone of democracy' and 'affirms the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom'; and the second stage because it involves the assessment of whether the right has been reasonably and justifiably limited, measured against the standards of 'an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom'.

In South African constitutional law, therefore, it is not conceptually possible for a right in the Bill of Rights to conflict with 'the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom'. Such conflict is conceptually impossible because all of the rights in the Bill of Rights are only enforceable to the extent that they affirm these values. If a court were to find a conflict between a particular right and these values it would by definition have made a mistake. We would be entitled to say: That cannot be what the right means because FC s 7(1) provides that all the rights in the Bill of Rights affirm the values that you say are in conflict with this right.

In summary: the paradigmatic case in which law or conduct is impugned under the Bill of Rights does not require the court to resolve a conflict between the right on which reliance is placed and democratic values. Rather, such a case requires the court to resolve the inevitable tension between rights and democracy in a way that best advances the constitutional project. That project must be understood as the gradual working out, on a case-by-case basis, of the optimal balance to be struck between the need to respect democracy, in the sense of the people's right to govern, and the need to 'respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights',[2] without which there would be no meaningful democracy. On this understanding of the constitutional project, the will of the majority on its own will never be a good enough reason to justify the limitation of a right. This is self-evidently the case where the will of the majority is deduced from public opinion polls.[1] But it is also the case where the will of the majority is expressed through duly enacted laws of general application. Unless those laws are found to be 'reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom', the fact that they violate a right in the Bill of Rights will be fatal to their constitutionality.

[1] Coetzee (supra) at para 46.
[2] FC s 7(2).

FC s 39(1) fits into this scheme by providing that, '[w]hen interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court, tribunal or forum–(a) must promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom'. On the reading of the Final Constitution just advanced this provision is strictly speaking redundant since FC s 7(1) already tells us that the rights in the Bill of Rights are intended to affirm these values.[2] A court doing justice to FC s 7(1) would therefore in any case be obliged to interpret the Bill of Rights in the manner suggested by FC s 39(1).[3] But constitution-makers are allowed some repetition for effect, and, if nothing else, what FC s 7(1) does is to say that, even where the general limitations clause is not (yet) implicated, at the first stage of the constitutional inquiry, the same values that infuse the second stage of the inquiry must be referred to in deciding whether that stage should be reached.

(d) The powers and functions of Parliament, provincial legislatures and municipal councils

The centerpiece of the Final Constitution's commitment to democracy is to be found in the provisions dealing with the powers and functions of Parliament, the provincial legislatures and the municipal councils. As Sachs J remarked in Matatiele, '[d]emocratically elected by the nation, Parliament is the engine-house of our democracy.'[4]

That the basic form of South African democracy is representative government is confirmed by FC s 42(3), which provides:

> The National Assembly is elected to represent the people and to ensure government by the people under the Constitution. It does this by choosing the President, by providing a national forum for public consideration of issues, by passing legislation and by scrutinizing and overseeing executive action.[5]

[1] Cf Makwanyane (supra) at para 88.

[2] But see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34 (Arguing that, because FC s 39 and FC s 36 invoke the same set of values, courts are obliged to acknowledge this 'unity of values' when engaged in both fundamental rights analysis and limitations analysis. They contend that arguments made here, in this chapter vis-à-vis FC s 7(1), re-inforce a value-based approach to both stages of analysis.)

[3] See Walters (supra) at para 26.

[4] Matatiele (supra) at para 109.

[5] See King & Others v Attorneys Fidelity Fund Board of Control & Another 2006 (1) SA 474 (SCA), 2006 (4) BCLR 442 (SCA) at para 20 (Summarizing various provisions relating to the National Assembly and concluding: '[t]hose are all facets of a National Assembly that belongs to the people, although its formal business is conducted through their representatives, and it is to an Assembly functioning in this way that the Constitution entrusts the power to legislate'.)

The main function of the National Council of Provinces, in turn, is to represent provincial interests.[1]

The Final Constitution's provisions on national, provincial and local government legislative authority are discussed in detail elsewhere in this work.[2] What this section does, instead, is to focus on three generic provisions that expressly refer to democracy and which are repeated in the various sections setting out the powers and functions of Parliament, provincial legislatures and municipal councils. The three generic provisions deal with legislative bodies' power to make rules and orders concerning their business, participation by minority parties in legislative proceedings, and public access to legislative bodies.

(i) Rules and orders concerning legislative business must take account of representative and participatory democracy

FC s 57(1)(b) provides that the National Assembly may 'make rules and orders concerning its business, with due regard to representative and participatory democracy, accountability, transparency and public involvement'. This formulation is repeated in respect of the National Council of Provinces[3] and provincial legislatures.[4] In De Lille & Another v Speaker of the National Assembly, the Cape High Court held that the 'suspension of a Member of the Assembly from Parliament for contempt is not consistent with the requirements of representative democracy [in FC s 57(1)(b), read with FC s 57(1)(a) and FC s 57(2)(b)]'.[5] The main reason advanced in support of this holding was that such a punishment would not only 'penalise' the Member of Parliament in question, 'but also his or her party and those of the electorate who voted for that party who are entitled to be represented in the Assembly by their proportionate number of representatives'.[6] The limitation in FC s 57(1)(b) on the National Assembly's power to regulate the way it conducts its business, in other words, means that the rules and orders regulating its business cannot be so drafted as to frustrate the principle of democracy. This is a classic instance of what John Hart Ely has called the 'democracy-reinforcing' function of judicial review.[7] Although the De Lille case was eventually decided by

[1] FC s 42(4).

[2] See S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 17; T Madlingozi & S Woolman 'Provincial Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 19.

[3] FC s 70(1)(b).

[4] FC s 116(1)(b). This provision was cited but not judicially considered in In re: Constitutionality of the Mpumalanga Petitions Bill, 2000. 2002 (1) SA 447 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1126 (CC) at para 17. The equivalent provision in respect of municipal councils, FC s 160(6) makes no reference to democracy. FC s 160(6) was considered in Executive Council, Western Cape v Minister of Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development & Another; Executive Council, KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others. 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at paras 96-112.

[5] 1998 (3) SA 430 (C), 1998 (7) BCLR 916 (C) at para 27.

[6] Ibid.

[7] JH Ely Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review (1980).

the Supreme Court of Appeal on a different basis,[1] the High Court's interpretation of FC s 57(1)(b) was not contradicted.

(ii) Participation by minority parties in proceedings of Parliament, provincial legislatures and municipal councils

FC s 57(2)(b) provides that the National Assembly's rules and orders must allow for 'participation in the proceedings of the Assembly and its committees of minority parties represented in the Assembly, in a manner consistent with democracy'. This formulation is repeated in respect of the National Council of Provinces,[2] provincial legislatures,[3] and municipal councils.[4] There have been two important decisions to date on the version of this provision that applies to minority party participation in the proceedings of a municipal council and its committees — FC s 160(8). In Democratic Alliance v ANC & Others,[5] which was handed down after the floor-crossing legislation at issue in UDM[6] had taken effect, the reconstitution of three committees of the City of Cape Town was challenged under FC s 160(8). The applicant, a minority political party, alleged that its representation on the City's reconstituted executive committee and two other committees was adversely disproportional to the number of seats it held in the municipal council. In argument, counsel conceded that the requirement in FC 160(8)(b) that the rights of members of a municipal council to participate in proceedings of the Council and those of its committees be 'consistent with democracy' would be satisfied by a first-past-the-post system in which the majority party took all the seats on the executive committee.[7] The decision accordingly turned on the interpretation of FC s 160(8)(a), which provides that parties must be 'fairly represented' on committees of the Municipal Council.[8] On this issue the Cape High Court held that FC s 160(8)(a) confers a right to participate in such committees, rather than a right to demand that the composition of each committee be proportional to the parties' representation in the municipal council.[9]

[1] See Speaker of the National Assembly v De Lille & Another 1999 (4) SA 863 (SCA), 1999 (11) BCLR 1339 (SCA)(Holding that the respondent's conduct was protected by parliamentary privilege — FC s 58(1).) The SCA's judgment in De Lille is discussed in Budlender (supra) at 17-39 — 17-40.

[2] FC s 70(2)(c). See also FC s 61(3)(Providing that national legislation determining how provincial legislatures' delegates to the National Council of Provinces are to be selected must ensure minority party participation); FC s 70(2)(b) (Rules and orders governing participation of provinces in proceedings of National Council of Provinces must be 'consistent with democracy').

[3] FC s 116(2)(b).

[4] FC s 160(8).

[5] 2003 (1) BCLR 25 (C).

[6] United Democratic Movement & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (African Christian Democratic Party & Others Intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Another as Amici Curiae*) (No 2)* 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC)('UDM').

[7] Democratic Alliance v ANC & Others 2003 (1) BCLR 25, 31D-F (C)('Democratic Alliance v ANC'). This aspect of the decision is criticized in § 10.5*(c)* infra.

[8] Democratic Alliance v ANC (supra) at 31D-G.

[9] Ibid at 37F.

Distinguishing Democratic Party & Others v Brakpan Transitional Local Council & Others,[1] and citing UDM, the Court in Democratic Alliance v ANC held that 'the requirement of "fair representation" set by FC s 160(8)(a) can be met by a system of representation other than proportional representation or a system approximating one of proportional representation.'[2] Later on in the judgment, the Court made it clear that its decision was strongly influenced by what it perceived to be the proper role of courts in 'political' cases. In cases of this nature, the Court held, a greater degree of judicial deference is in order.[3]

Two provisional conclusions may be drawn from the Cape High Court's decision in Democratic Alliance v ANC. First, it is clear that, where the Final Constitution refers to democracy tout court, rather than any particular form of democracy, there is a danger that the term 'democracy' will be understood as a reference to the majority-rule principle, rather than the deeper principle of democracy that appears to underlie the constitutional text as a whole. Secondly, the Court's reluctance to super-impose its own conception of democracy on FC s 160(8) illustrates the inherent difficulty in all cases where the principle of democracy is implicated. As the Court notes, cases of this type are by definition 'political', and therefore subject, if not to a formal political question doctrine, at least to more than the ordinary degree of deference. When this deferential approach is coupled with the contested nature of democracy itself, it may be expected that non-specific or unqualified references to democracy in the Final Constitution will rarely give rise to determinate rules, other than the requirement that the dispute should be resolved according to the wishes of the majority. On the other hand, where references to democracy are qualified, there may be a basis for more robust judicial intervention.

The Constitutional Court had an opportunity to consider FC s 160(8) in Democratic Alliance & Another v Masondo NO & Another.[4] In Masondo, the issue was whether a mayoral committee established under s 60 of the Local Government: Municipal Structures Act 117 of 1998 was a committee as contemplated in FC s 160(8).[5] Langa DCJ, writing for the majority, held that it was not, on two grounds: first, on the basis of a finding that the functions of mayoral committees

[1] 1999 (4) SA 339 (W), 1999 (6) BCLR 657 (W).
[2] Democratic Alliance v ANC (supra) at 38E.
[3] Ibid at 41B-F.
[4] 2003 (2) SA 413 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 128 (CC)('Masondo').
[5] Section 60 of the Structures Act provides that, where a municipal council has more than nine members, the executive mayor 'must appoint a mayoral committee from among the councillors to assist the executive mayor'. Section 60 is silent as to whether the committee must include councillors from minority parties. Note that the question posed in the second Democratic Alliance case is different from the one posed in the Cape High Court case. In the Cape High Court case the question was whether the composition of the executive committee of a municipal council must be proportional to the representation of parties in the council. In the second Democratic Alliance case the question was whether a mayoral committee, under an executive mayor system (which is different from the executive committee system) was a committee of the council at all, and therefore subject to FC s 160(8). The two decisions are accordingly distinguishable, and the Constitutional Court's decision in the second Democratic Alliance case must not be read as having overridden the Cape High Court's decision.

under the Structures Act were 'executive' not 'deliberative',[1] and, secondly, by reason of the fact that a mayoral committee was not elected by the municipal council, but appointed by the executive mayor.[2] In relation to the first point, the majority held that the Final Constitution was consistent in not requiring minority party representation on executive bodies, since the 'primary purpose' of such bodies was 'to ensure effective and efficient government and service delivery'.[3] In relation to the second point, the majority held that there was a contextual basis for finding that the word 'committees' in FC 160(8) meant committees elected by the municipal council.[4] A mayoral committee was therefore 'simply not the type of committee contemplated by s 160(8)'.[5]

O'Regan J, whilst agreeing that FC s 160(8)(b) connotes simple majority rule, dissented on the basis that FC s 160(8)(a) requires a prior procedure in which the views of minority parties should at least be taken into account. In O'Regan J's view, 'the obligation of fair representation means that those decisions [ie majority decisions under FC s 160(8)(b)] are made only once the interests of non-majority parties have been aired'.[6] Nor could the application of FC s 160(8) be said to depend on whether the mayoral committee was appointed by the municipal council or an executive mayor, as this would allow the subsection to be circumvented by the device of having all committees appointed in the latter way.[7] Rather, since the purpose underlying FC s 160(8)(a) was to ensure that decisions of the council and its committees are preceded by 'deliberation', the real question was whether mayoral committees are 'involved in deliberative decision-making'.[8] The fact that, in the case of local government, legislative and executive authority is vested in 'the same institution' (the municipal council) provided a strong indication that this was indeed the case.[9] Summarizing her position, O'Regan J concluded:

> [S]ection 160(8)(b) is clear that the principle of fair representation is always subject to democracy and the will of the majority. Members of the mayoral committee must therefore submit to that principle, as must all councillors. The principle established by section 16(8) is a principle which requires inclusive deliberation prior to decision-making to enrich the quality of our democracy. It does not subvert the principle of democracy itself.[10]

The third judgment delivered in Masondo, by Sachs J, neatly split the difference between the majority and the minority position. Whilst agreeing with O'Regan J's conception of democracy as requiring more than mere lip-service to be paid to [1] Masondo (supra) at para 19.

[2] Ibid at para 20.
[3] Ibid at para 18, referring to FC ss 91 and 132.
[4] Ibid at para 20, referring to FC ss 160(1)(c), 160(5)(b) and 160(6)(c).
[5] Ibid at para 23.
[6] Ibid at para 63.
[7] Ibid at para 70.
[8] Ibid at para 72.
[9] Ibid at para 75.
[10] Ibid at para 78.

the notion of minority party participation and the value of deliberation,[1] Sachs J nevertheless concurred in the majority judgment. For Sachs J, the key point was that the Final Constitution 'is silent on the question of the kind of executive leadership that councils may have'.[2] The constitutional provisions on local government, Sachs J noted, lack the detail of — and the distinctions drawn in — the constitutional provisions on national and provincial legislative and executive authority.[3] Whereas O'Regan J drew from this silence the inference that the legislative and executive functions of a municipal council are effectively fused, for Sachs J the absence of detailed constitutional rules meant that the legislature had a significant margin of appreciation in designing the system of local government. Unless it could be shown that the Structures Act, in providing for the executive mayor system, necessarily undermined the deeper conception of democracy that he shared with O'Regan J, there was no basis for striking down any of its provisions.[4] Rather, the question of whether the mayoral committee system in practice undermined democracy had to be approached on a case-by-case basis.[5]

O'Regan J and Sachs JJ's judgments in Masondo provide compelling examples of courts' capacity to give meaningful effect to the principle of democracy where the text of the Final Constitution prompts them to do so. The difference between the majority and the minority decision in this case lies in O'Regan J's preparedness to exploit the distinction in FC s 160(8) between the manner of participation in municipal council committees and the basis on which decisions are ultimately taken. As we have seen, the emphasis placed in the theoretical literature on the value of participation in political decision-making and the associated value of deliberation is never made to the exclusion of the majority-rule principle.[6] None of the democratic theorists discussed in the previous section would thus argue that a modern democracy should be beholden to the impossible ideal of decision-making by consensus, or to exhaustive processes of participation that ultimately run counter to governmental efficiency. Rather, deliberation and participation in decision-making are stressed for the contribution these processes can make to better informed and more legitimate decisions. But there is always a tipping point at which participation and deliberation cease to be useful, and instead become counterproductive. O'Regan and Sachs JJ's judgments attempt to maintain this balance by reading FC s 160(8) in such a way as to ensure that, after adequate deliberation, the majority view must prevail. Had it carried the day, O'Regan J's judgment would arguably have contributed to the deepening of democracy in South Africa, since it would have helped to secure the conditions for multi-party participation in the entire local government system, rather than

[1] Masondo (supra) at paras 38 and 42 (Sachs J)
[2] Ibid at para 48.
[3] Ibid at para 47.
[4] Ibid at para 49.
[5] Ibid at para 50.
[6] Ibid at para 38 (Sachs J).

exempting an important part of that system — the functioning of mayoral committees where the executive mayor system applies — from the requirements of participatory and deliberative democracy.

(iii) Public access to and involvement in Parliament and the provincial legislatures

FC s 59(2) provides that the National Assembly 'may not exclude the public, including the media, from a sitting of a committee unless it is reasonable and justifiable to do so in an open and democratic society'. Once again this provision is replicated with respect to the National Council of Provinces in FC s 72(2) and provincial legislatures in FC s 118(2). None of these provisions has as yet been judicially considered. On their face, they acknowledge the value not so much of public participation in legislative decision-making as access to information about the inner workings of the democratic process. This value is promoted by conferring on the public a right to attend legislative committee hearings subject to a similar form of limitations analysis as that required FC s 36.

FC s 59(2) and its NCOP and provincial equivalents are complemented by FC ss 59(1), 72(1) and 118(1), all of which impose on the legislature concerned a positive duty: (a) 'to facilitate public involvement in the legislative and other processes of the legislature and its committees' and (b) to 'conduct its business in an open manner, and hold its sittings, and those of its committees, in public' subject to reasonable limitations. In Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South African & Others, the Constitutional Court remarked obiter that FC s 118(1)(a) may impose a duty on provincial legislatures, when considering a constitutional amendment under FC s 74(8), to entertain oral or written representations.[1] Because this issue was not properly argued, however, the Court declined to decide it, ordering instead that it be canvassed at a subsequent hearing.[2] For the same reason, the Court declined to comment on the correctness of the view expressed in King & Others v Attorneys' Fidelity Fund Board of Control & Another that '[t]he public may become "involved" in the business of the National Assembly as much by understanding and being informed of what it is doing as by participating directly in those processes'.[3]

The question the Supreme Court of Appeal had to decide in King was whether an alleged violation by the National Assembly of its FC s 59(1)(a) obligation to 'facilitate public involvement' in its 'processes' fell to be determined exclusively by the Constitutional Court by reason of FC s 167(4). This subsection provides that '[o]nly the Constitutional Court may– (a) … (e) 'decide that Parliament or the President has failed to fulfil a constitutional obligation'. The Supreme Court of Appeal answered this question in the affirmative, holding that the National Assembly's obligation under FC s 59(1)(a) was 'pre-eminently a "crucial political" question' that the Final Constitution reserved for the Constitutional Court.[1] The views expressed in King about the obligation imposed by FC s 59(1)(a) were, therefore, not intended as a comprehensive analysis of that provision, but rather as a statement of the sort of obligation that FC s 59(1)(a) imposed, for the limited purposes of deciding the jurisdictional question. Had the Supreme Court of Appeal been properly seized with the case, its interpretation of FC s 59(1)(a) might have been more robust, particularly when read alongside FC s 59(1)(b) and (2).[2] These two provisions, after all, already secure the public's right not to be excluded from sittings of the National Assembly and its committees. FC s 59(1)(a) must therefore impose on the National Assembly a duty to do something more than this. Although the Supreme Court of Appeal was in principle correct to say that 'public involvement' is 'necessarily an inexact concept' and that the duty to facilitate it may be fulfilled in many ways, the juxtaposition of FC s 59(1)(a) alongside provisions that already secure the public's right of access to the National Assembly restricts the range of possible meanings that can be attributed to the phrase 'public involvement'. The only example the Supreme Court of Appeal gives of public involvement other than the right to make submissions is the suggestion that members of the public may have a right to be 'informed' of what the National Assembly is 'doing'.[3] This is not a plausible reading of FC s 59(1)(a) if it is taken to mean that the National Assembly's obligations under this paragraph may be fulfilled by alerting the public to upcoming legislative proposals. The word 'involvement' connotes far more than the passive right to receive information. Rather, the plain meaning of 'involvement' is active participation in the affairs of the legislative body concerned, not necessarily accompanied by the right to influence the outcome of a particular process, but, at the very least, embracing the right to be heard.[4] To argue, as the Supreme Court of Appeal did in King, that the fact that FC s 59(1)(a) gives rise to several possible obligations, and that the breach of just one of these obligations is therefore not conclusive, begs the question. The real question is whether FC s 59(1)(a) gives rise to a core obligation on the part of the National Assembly to entertain written or oral submissions from members of the public in respect of every legislative proposal that comes before it. On the facts in King, the public had been given this opportunity, although the appellants had not been directly consulted, and had not responded to any of the public calls for submissions. Had the Supreme Court of Appeal been properly seized with the case, that factual finding would have been an adequate basis for dismissing the appellants' argument.

[1] Matatiele (supra) at para 65.
[2] Ibid at para 86.
[3] 2006 (1) SA 474 (SCA), 2006 (4) BCLR 462 (SCA)('King') at para 22 (quoted and discussed in Matatiele (supra) at paras 64-65).

[1] See King (supra) at para 23.

[2] These two provisions are cited in King but are not considered. See King (supra) at para 19

[3] See King (supra) at para 22.

[4] The South African Concise Oxford Dictionary defines the verb 'involve' as meaning: '(of a situation or event) include as a necessary part or result; cause to experience or participate in an activity or situation'. For related considerations on rights of participation, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Assembly' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 43.

A more detailed understanding of FC s 59(1)(a) and its cognates will emerge once the Constitutional Court gives judgment on the meaning of FC s 118(1)(a) in response to the further hearing in Matatiele.[1] Even in this case, however, the answer is likely to be partial, as the Constitutional Court's decision will be restricted to the obligation on a provincial legislature to facilitate public involvement in its processes when approving a constitutional amendment bill, as required by FC s 74(3)(b) read with FC s 74(8). It is apparent from the Constitutional Court's comments on King that the crucial question will be whether FC s 118(1)(a) imposes a duty to entertain written or oral submissions. If that question is decided in the affirmative, the next question will be whether the duty to entertain submissions always means oral submissions or sometimes just written submissions. The answer to this question, at least, is clear. Given the wide range of matters that come before the National Assembly, the NCOP and the provincial legislatures for consideration, FC s 59(1)(a) and its cognates cannot be read to imply a duty to entertain oral submissions in every case. No reasonable conception of democracy would require this. Rather, if it is found that FC s 59(1)(a) imposes a duty to entertain written or oral submissions, the choice between these two forms of public involvement should be left to the legislature, depending on the nature of the issue being discussed, the level of technical information required, the public importance of the issue, and the urgency of the need to decide it.

(e) Miscellaneous provisions

FC Chapter 9 is entitled 'State Institutions Supporting Constitutional Democracy'. FC s 181(1) goes on to provide a list of 'state institutions [that] strengthen constitutional democracy'.[2] This is the only provision in the Final Constitution in which the word 'democracy' is qualified by the adjective 'constitutional'. Although there can be little doubt that the system that the Final Constitution puts in place is

[1] The NCOP's obligation under FC s 72(1)(a) is also due to be considered in the Court's judgment in Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others. CCT Case 12/05 (Heard on 21 February 2006).

[2] Just how the state institutions supporting constitutional democracy are expected to perform their tasks is the subject of other chapters in this work. See M Bishop & S Woolman 'Public Protector' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 24A; S Woolman & Y Schutte 'Auditor General' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 24B; J Klaaren 'South African Human Rights Commission' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 24C; C Albertyn 'Commission for Gender Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 24D; J White 'Independent Communications Authority of South Africa (ICASA)' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 24E; S Woolman & J S Aullo 'Commission for the Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 24F;

a constitutional democracy, the term 'democracy' when used in the Final Constitution is either left unqualified or qualified by terms such as 'participatory' or 'representative'. It would be wrong to read too much into this. The lack of any other references to 'constitutional democracy' simply confirms the fact that constitutional democracies, as indicated in § 10.2*(d)*, are compatible with a number of different forms of democracy. The presence of a supreme-law bill of rights in a constitution does not mean that the political system concerned ceases to be a representative democracy, or that elements of participatory or deliberative democracy cannot be grafted onto the constitution. As we have seen, both Sachs and O'Regan JJ have been at pains to articulate a deep, in the sense of being participation and deliberation-rich, constitutional conception of democracy. It is this deep conception that the Chapter 9 institutions ought to be strengthening. If it were not, there would have been no reason to establish them.

Other provisions that refer directly to democracy include: FC s 152(1),[1] FC s 195(1),[2] FC s 234,[3] and FC s 236.[4]

10.4 Constitutional Rights Shaping South African Democracy

As we have seen, FC s 7(1) provides that the Bill of Rights 'affirms the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom'. In theory, therefore, every right in the Bill of Rights is integral to understanding the Final Constitution's vision for South African democracy, and a comprehensive treatment of this issue would need to look at the contribution made by each right in the Bill of Rights to the articulation of this vision.[5] Such an undertaking is not possible

[1] FC s 152(1) provides that one of objects of local government is to 'provide democratic and accountable government for local communities'. This provision was considered in Masondo. The Masondo Court held that FC s 152 sets two main objects for local government: 'the development and promotion of democracy', which 'involves ensuring that the will of the majority prevails and also that the views of the minority are considered'; and the object 'to ensure that government is efficient and effective in the rendering of services and the promotion of social and economic development'. Masondo. (supra) at para 17. The Masondo Court continued: 'The two purposes are mutually reinforcing — they give meaning to each other. They are both indispensable to the enormous task of reconstructing society in the functional areas of local government.' Ibid.

[2] FC s 195(1) provides: 'Public administration must be governed by the democratic values and principles enshrined in the Constitution . . .' See Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet t/a Metrorail & Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC) at para 74 (Court held that the principle of accountability in the Final Constitution was an important consideration when deciding questions relating to the state's liability in delict.)

[3] FC s 234 provides: 'In order to deepen the culture of democracy established by the Constitution, Parliament may adopt Charters of Rights consistent with the provisions of the Constitution.'

[4] FC s 236 provides: 'To enhance multi-party democracy, national legislation must provide for the funding of political parties participating in national and provincial legislatures on an equitable and proportional basis.' See UDM (supra) at para 52 (Court referred to this provision and held that it was possible to devise an equitable political party funding system even where floor-crossing was allowed. It offered Germany as an example.)

[5] On the interaction between the right to dignity and democracy, see S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) 36-13. On the relationship between the right to property and democracy, see First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service & Another; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) at para 45.

within the confines of this chapter. To keep the discussion within reasonable bounds, this section concentrates on a small sample of rights that have come to be seen by democratic theory, and by the courts in South Africa, as being integral to the operation of a democratic system of government. For the most part, these rights are clustered together in one part of the Bill of Rights, FC ss 16-19, which covers respectively the right to freedom of expression; the right to freedom of assembly, demonstration, picket and petition; the right to freedom of association; and political rights. The clustering together of these rights is not co-incidental. As the Constitutional Court has observed, FC ss 16-19 are grouped together precisely because they share a common connection to the establishment and maintenance of the conditions necessary for democracy.[1] Whilst all of these rights are equally important, this chapter engages only with the right to freedom of expression and political rights.

The other group of rights that is integral to democracy is the group of socio-economic rights in FC ss 25-29. The link between these rights and the maintenance of the conditions necessary for democracy is self-evident, but nonetheless not as well established in liberal constitutional theory as might be expected. Indeed, the inclusion of socio-economic rights as fully justiciable rights in the Final Constitution is part of the reason why that document is regarded as being an extension of the liberal constitutionalist project, rather than a mere restatement of it.[2] By considering the place of socio-economic rights in the South African democratic system the discussion in § 10.4*(c)* below attempts to do justice to this broader vision.

[1] See Case & Another v Minister of Safety and Security & Others; Curtis v Minister of Safety and Security & Others 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC)('Case') at para 27 (Referring to the right to freedom of expression in IC s 15 'as part of a web of mutually supporting rights . . . [which] together may be conceived as underpinning an entitlement to participate in an ongoing process of communicative interaction that is of both instrumental and intrinsic value'.) This dictum, though occurring in the minority judgment of Mokgoro J, was applied by a near-unanimous court to the right to freedom of expression in the Final Constitution. See S v Mamabolo (E TV & Others Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC) at para 28 (Referring to FC ss 15-19 as a group of rights together promoting 'the freedom to speak one's mind', which freedom 'is now an inherent quality of the type of society contemplated by the Constitution as a whole'); South African National Defence Force Union v Minister of Defence & Another 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC)('SANDFU') at para 8 (Citing the passage from Case with approval and remarking that the rights in FC ss 10 and ss 16-19 'taken together protect the rights of individuals not only individually to form and express opinions, of whatever nature, but to establish associations and groups of like-minded people to foster and propagate such opinions'). On the relationship between freedom of expression and democracy, see D Milo & A Stein 'Freedom of Expression' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 42. On the relationship between freedom of assembly and democracy, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Assembly' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 43. On the relationship between freedom of association and democracy, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44.

[2] See KE Klare 'Legal Culture and Transformative Constitutionalism' (1998) 14 SAJHR 146, 153 (Arguing that the Final Constitution views the realization of social rights as being necessary to the exercise of 'democratic political rights'.)

(a) Freedom of expression

In liberal constitutional theory, Ronald Dworkin has argued, the right to freedom of expression has both an 'instrumental' and a 'constitutive' dimension.[1] In its instrumental dimension, the right protects expression because of the consequences for society that are thought to follow from protecting certain forms of expression (such as political speech).[2] In its constitutive dimension, the right protects expression because allowing people the freedom to express themselves without government restraint is thought to be necessary to the development of human personality. Although it is easy to see the first dimension of the right as being necessary to democracy, the second dimension is equally relevant. As Dworkin has argued, recognition of the second dimension requires government to treat its citizens as 'responsible moral agents'.[3] The protection of non-political speech, in other words, promotes a culture in which citizens are regarded as being capable of forming their own opinions, and in which their right to make political choices and engage in public debate is thereby indirectly respected.

In addition to endorsing this approach,[4] the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence on the right to freedom of expression in FC s 16 shares with the liberal tradition the notion that it is sometimes justifiable to limit this right in order to protect democracy.[5] In Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority & Others, for example, the Court held:

[1] R Dworkin Freedom's Law (1996) 200 as quoted in I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 360.

[2] In his commentary on Canadian constitutional law, Peter Hogg writes: 'Perhaps the most powerful rationale for the constitutional protection of freedom of expression is its role as an instrument of democratic government'. PW Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (Loose-leaf Edition, 2001 — Rel. 1) 40-7 citing Switzman v Elbling [1957] SCR 285, 358, 369.

[3] Dworkin Freedom's Law (supra) at 200.

[4] See SANDFU (supra) at para 59 (The right to freedom of expression 'lies at the heart of a democracy' and is valuable for three reasons: 'its instrumental function as a guarantor of democracy, its implicit recognition and protection of the moral agency of individuals in our society and its facilitation of the search for truth by individuals and society generally'), quoted in Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority & Others 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC)('Islamic Unity') at para 26. See also Khumalo & Others v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC) at para 21 ('Freedom of expression is integral to a democratic society for many reasons. It is constitutive of the dignity and autonomy of human beings. Moreover, without it, the ability of citizens to make responsible political decisions and to participate effectively in public life would be stifled'); Phillips v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) 2003 (3) SA 345 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC) at para 23 ('The right to freedom of expression is integral to democracy, to human development and to human life itself'); De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC)('De Reuck') at paras 59-60.

[5] FC s 16 provides: '(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of expression, which includes–(a) freedom of the press and other media; (b) freedom to receive or impart information or ideas; (c) freedom of artistic creativity; and (d) academic freedom and freedom of scientific research. (2) The right in ss (1) does not extend to–(a) propaganda for war; (b) incitement of imminent violence; (c) Advocacy of hatred that is based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion, and that constitutes incitement to cause harm.'

> The pluralism and broadmindedness that is central to an open and democratic society can, however, be undermined by speech which seriously threatens democratic pluralism itself. Thus open and democratic societies permit reasonable proscription of activity and expression that pose a real and substantial threat to such values as the constitutional order itself.[1]

The notion that certain forms of speech may in fact undermine democracy is captured in FC s 16(2), which excludes three types of expression from the protection afforded by FC s 16(1).[2] The Constitutional Court has made it clear that, where expressive conduct falls outside these three exclusions, any regulation of the right to freedom of expression will be found to limit the right, and the focus of the Court's attention will accordingly fall on the limitations stage of the inquiry.[3]

So much is uncontroversial. Besides affirming the liberal approach to the right to freedom of expression, however, the case law under FC s 16 also contains several arguments about the link between freedom of expression and democracy that are specific to South Africa. These arguments are worth examining for what they reveal about the peculiar features of the Final Constitution's vision for South African democracy.

In S v Mamabolo (E TV & Others Intervening), a government official had been convicted by a High Court judge of the common-law crime of scandalizing the court. On appeal, the Constitutional Court was required to consider whether the continued existence of this crime in South African law was consistent with FC s 16(1). The interesting aspect of Mamabolo from the perspective of this chapter is that it concerned the role of freedom of expression in ensuring the accountability of judges to the people in a constitutional democracy.[4] In assessing this question, the Court weighed, on the one hand, the need for 'vocal public scrutiny'[5] of the judiciary, and, on the other, the need to preserve the 'moral authority'[6] of the judiciary, especially in a young democracy where the judiciary's role in the maintenance of democracy is still being established. Public scrutiny of the judiciary, the Court noted, 'constitutes a democratic check' and must be allowed because it is difficult for the political branches, except in extreme cases of judicial misconduct, to check the judiciary without being seen to threaten judicial independence.[7] The countervailing consideration, however, was the need to build public confidence in the judiciary, particularly given the 'erosion' of that confidence under apartheid.[8]

[1] 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC) at paras 28-29 citing Handyside v The United Kingdom (1976) 1 EHRR 737, 754.

[2] The unprotected forms of expression listed in FC s 16(2) are: (a) 'propaganda for war'; (b) 'incitement of imminent violence'; and (c) 'advocacy of hatred that is based on race, ethnicity, gender, or religion, and that constitutes incitement to cause harm'.

[3] See Islamic Unity (supra) at paras 31-33; De Reuck (supra) at para 48; Laugh it Off Promotions CC v SAB International (Finance) BV t/a Sabmark International (Freedom of Expression Institute as Amicus Curiae*)* 2006 (1) SA 144 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 743 (CC) at para 47.

[4] Mamabolo (supra) at para 15.

[5] Ibid at para 30.

[6] Ibid at para 16.

[7] Ibid at para 30.

[8] Ibid at para 17.

Against this background, the Final Constitution's vision for the right to freedom of expression was to seek a more nuanced approach to the right, in particular by balancing the right to freedom of expression against the right to human dignity in FC s 10.[1]

The Mamabolo Court contrasted its approach to that of the United States Supreme Court, whose jurisprudence it was asked to follow. In the United States, freedom of speech is given heightened protection in the form of the 'clear and present danger' test, which permits limitation of the First Amendment only in the most pressing circumstances. The Court was asked to follow this approach on the authority of a decision of the Ontario Court of Appeal which had sought to adapt it to Canadian law.[2] The Mamabolo Court's response to this argument is instructive about its view of the special features of the Final Constitution's vision for South African democracy. Stressing that South Africa was a young democracy emerging from a totalitarian past, the Court acknowledged that this might be taken as a reason for according the right to freedom of expression heightened protection on the American model:

> Having regard to our recent past of thought control, censorship and enforced conformity to governmental theories, freedom of express — the free and open exchange of ideas — is no less important that it is in the United States of America. It could actually be contended with much force that the public interest in the open market-place of ideas is all the more important to us in this country because our democracy is not yet firmly established and must feel its way. Therefore we should be particularly astute to outlaw any form of thought control, however respectably dressed.[3]

Nevertheless, the Court reasoned, South Africa's status as a new democracy also provided an argument in favour of reducing the protection afforded to freedom of speech, especially in relation to criticism of the judiciary. It is precisely because the judiciary is more powerful in a new constitutional democracy that its integrity needs to be protected.[4] The Court also took cognizance of crucial differences between the drafting histories of the United States and South African Constitutions which suggested that a different approach to the right to freedom of expression in South Africa was in order. Whereas the American Constitution was 'a monument to the libertarian aspirations of the Founding Fathers', the Final Constitution 'is a wholly different kind of instrument infinitely more explicit, more detailed, more balanced, more carefully phrased and counterpoised'.[5]

It would be convenient to think of Mamabolo as situating South African democracy somewhere in the middle of the political spectrum between libertarianism and socialism, but of course this simple two-dimensional approach is misleading. Conceptions of democracy do not vacillate over time and from country to country in a fixed plane between these two extremes. Rather, the Western (and

[1] Mamabolo (supra) at para 41.
[2] See R v Kopyto (1987) 47 DLR (4th) 213 (Ont CA) as cited in Mamabolo (supra) at para 35.
[3] Mamabolo (supra) at para 37.
[4] Ibid at para 38.
[5] Ibid at para 40.

increasingly international) understanding of democracy, as the discussion in § 10.2 makes clear, is continually evolving, stretching out in a second dimension that the traditional left-right axis is incapable of capturing.[1] In addition, as Mamabolo indicates, the Final Constitution's vision for South African democracy is a product not only of the liberal tradition but also of the lived experience of the struggle for democracy in South Africa. Whether it is in the end correct to describe that vision as remaining within the liberal tradition does not really matter. The point is rather that the Final Constitution's vision for South African democracy is unique, and must in the end be deduced from a careful reading of the constitutional text, the history of its enactment, and the extrapolation of the constitutional drafters' basic premises to the changing circumstances of South African society.

The second case that illuminates the role of the right to freedom of expression in the Final Constitution's vision for South African democracy is Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority & Others.[2] Islamic Unity Convention involved a challenge under FC s 16 to clause 2*(a)* of the Code of Conduct for Broadcasting Services, which prohibits broadcasting of 'any material which is likely to prejudice the safety of the State or the public order or relations between sections of the population'.[3] The Court was accordingly required to focus on the exclusion from protection under FC s 16(2)(c) of expression that amounts to 'advocacy of hatred that is based on race, ethnicity, gender, or religion, and that constitutes incitement to cause harm'. 'There is no doubt', the Court held, 'that the State has a particular interest in regulating this type of expression because of the harm it may pose to the constitutionally mandated objective of building the non-racial and non-sexist society based on human dignity and the achievement of equality'.[4] Nevertheless, the regulation in clause 2*(a)* went beyond the confines of FC s 16(2) by prohibiting categories of speech other than those specifically excluded by this subsection.[5] Nor could the clause be saved by FC s 36. To be sure, FC s 36 authorized limitations of the right to freedom of expression in service of the democratic values of 'human dignity, equality and freedom'. It was also true that the 'achievement of these values' gave the state a special interest in regulating '[e]xpression that advocates hatred and stereotyping of people on the basis of immutable characteristics'.[6] But it had not been shown that this interest 'could not be served adequately by the enactment of a provision which is appropriately tailored and more narrowly focused'.[7]

[1] Karl Klare expresses something like this idea in attributing to the Final Constitution the label 'post-liberal'. See Klare (supra) at 151.

[2] 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC)('Islamic Unity Convention').

[3] Ibid at para 22.

[4] Ibid at para 33. Earlier on in the judgment, the Islamic Unity Convention Court remarked that '[t[he restrictions that were placed on expression [under apartheid] were not only a denial of democracy itself, but also exacerbated the impact of the systemic violations of other fundamental human rights in South Africa.' Ibid at para 27.

[5] Ibid at para 35.

[6] Ibid at para 45.

[7] Ibid at para 51.

Islamic Unity Convention reminds us that the commitment in Mamabolo to a more balanced view of the role of freedom of expression in South African democracy does not exempt the state from the need to pay careful attention to the way that this balance is struck in practice. The holding in Mamabolo that the right to freedom of expression is not paramount in the Final Constitution's hierarchy of rights does not mean that the right is not important. Even in the most politically sensitive of areas — expression touching on questions of 'race, ethnicity, gender or religion' — the state still bears the onus, when straying outside the confines of FC s 16(2), of justifying any limitation of this right.

The third case worth mentioning is Khumalo & Others v Holomisa.[1] Khumalo concerned the question whether the common-law rules of defamation should be altered by the direct application of FC s 16. What is specific to South Africa about the right to freedom of expression, O'Regan J noted, is that this right is included in a Constitution committed to ensuring 'accountability, responsiveness and openness'.[2] This observation suggests that the mass media has a heightened role to play:

> The manner in which the media carry out their constitutional mandate will have a significant impact on the development of our democratic society. If the media are scrupulous and reliable in the performance of their constitutional obligations, they will invigorate and strengthen our fledgling democracy. If they vacillate in the performance of their duties, the constitutional goals will be imperiled.'[3]

The striking thing about this passage is that it transforms the media's right to freedom of expression into a constitutional obligation to disseminate information and 'provide citizens with a platform for the exchange of ideas'.[4] Although prompted by a decision of the High Court of Australia,[5] O'Regan J, by referring to FC s 1*(d)*, amplifies the stress in that decision on media freedom to justify a much stronger conception of the role of the media in South Africa. The fact that the Final Constitution accords an instrumental purpose to the institutions of representative democracy, she reasons, means that the media is doubly important. Not only must it play a role in the exchange of information and ideas. It must also play a special role in holding government to account, and in ensuring that it is responsive to the needs of the electorate. Here, then, we have a much deeper conception of democracy than the one set out by the unanimous Court in UDM.[6] Democracy, according to O'Regan J in Khumalo, cannot depend for its protection

[1] 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC)('Khumalo').

[2] FC s 1 (d) quoted in Khumalo (supra) at para 23 n27.

[3] Ibid at para 24.

[4] Ibid. See also ibid at para 33 ('The media thus rely on freedom of expression and must foster it. In this sense they are both bearers of rights and bearers of constitutional obligations in relation to freedom of expression.')

[5] See Theophanous v Herlad & Weekly Times Ltd & Another (1994) 124 ALR 1, 61 quoted in Khumalo (supra) at para 22.

[6] See United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (African Christian Democratic Party & Others Intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Another as Amici Curiae*) (No 2)* 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1213 (CC)('UDM').

on the restraining influence of regular elections alone. Rather it is a 'culture'[1] that needs to be nurtured between elections if it is to survive for any length of time.

The role of the right to freedom of expression in the consolidation of democracy has also been expressed in two decisions that otherwise might have been handed down in any one of the more established liberal democracies, Phillips v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division)[2] and De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division).[3] In both these cases, whilst stressing the traditional function of the right to freedom of expression, the Court suggested that forms of expression that could not be associated, even indirectly, with 'the growth of democracy' would enjoy concomitantly less protection.[4]

In summary, the four special features of the Final Constitution's conception of the link between freedom of expression and democracy are: (1) the right to freedom of expression is of central, but not paramount, importance to democracy, and must be balanced against the right to human dignity in FC s 10; (2) the right to freedom of expression has a particular role to play in a new democracy such as South Africa, where it is crucial to democratic consolidation; (3) expression based on the immutable characteristics of a person or group is potentially destructive of democracy, especially in a country such as South Africa, but must nevertheless be regulated with care so as to remain within the boundaries set by FC s 16(2); and (4) the role of the right to freedom of expression in holding the political branches to account means that the media has a special constitutional obligation in South Africa to create the conditions necessary for the development of a democratic culture.[5]

(b) Political rights

The 'right to participate in the making of laws' has been called 'the right of rights'[6] and, indeed, there is broad agreement in democratic theory that, if any right is integral to democracy, then it is the right to participate in the democratic process.[7] The special relationship between political rights and democracy is sometimes recognized in the text of a constitution,[8] and state action impinging on such rights

[1] Ibid at para 24.

[2] 2003 (3) SA 345 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC)('Phillips')(Section 160 (d) of Liquor Act 27 of 1989, which makes it an offence for the holder of an 'on-consumption liquor licence to allow 'any person to perform an offensive, indecent or obscene act' out to perform in public without being properly clothed, found to be overbroad and unconstitutional against FC s 16.)

[3] 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC)('De Reuck')(Unsuccessful challenge to s 27(1), read with the definition of child pornography in s 1, of the Film and Publications Act 65 of 1996.)

[4] Phillips (supra) at para 23.

[5] See also Speaker of the National Assembly v De Lille 1999 (4) SA 863 (SCA) at para 29 ('The right of free speech in the [National] Assembly protected by s 58(1) is a fundamental right crucial to representative government in a democratic society').

[6] J Waldron Law and Disagreement (1999) 282.

[7] For a discussion of the right to participate, see § 10.3*(c)* supra.

[8] The 1982 Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, for example, excludes the right to vote in s 3 from the parliamentary override provision in s 33. See J de Waal 'Political Rights' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 5, 1999) 23-3; PW Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (Loose-leaf Edition, 2003 — Rel. 1) 42-2.

may be subject to a heightened level of review.[1]

In South Africa, FC s 19, which provides for a range of political rights, is not singled out as being more important than other rights in the Bill of Rights. The core democratic institutions that FC s 19 supports are, however, enumerated in FC s 1*(d)*, which declares 'universal adult suffrage, a national common voters roll, regular elections, and a multi-party system of democratic government' to be among the values on which the South African state is founded.[2] This means that constitutional amendments affecting political rights may need to satisfy the procedural requirements, not just of amendments impinging on the Bill of Rights, but also of amendments to the founding values in FC s 1.[3]

FC s 19 identifies three main categories of political rights: 'the right to make political choices' (FC s 19(1)); 'the right to free, fair and regular elections' (FC s 19(2)); and the right to vote and stand for public office (FC s 19(3)). In two of the five political rights cases decided by the Constitutional Court to date, August and NICRO, the violation of FC s 19 was not seriously in dispute.[4] In a third case, African Christian Democratic Party, the constitutional claimant did not rely directly on political rights, but appealed instead to FC s 19, read with FC s 1*(d)*, as a guide to the interpretation of the electoral provisions at issue.[5] In the two remaining cases, however, UDM and New National Party, the question whether FC s 19 had been violated was central to the Court's decision.[6]

In UDM, as we have seen, it was alleged that FC s 19 had been infringed by the mid-term amendment of South Africa's proportional representation system so as to allow floor-crossing, and that the special procedures provided for constitutional amendments impinging on the Bill of Rights should therefore have been

[1] In the United States, the right to vote is generally protected through the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In such cases, the US Supreme Court has typically held that the standard of review to be applied is strict scrutiny. See, eg, Dunn v Blumstein (1972) 405 US 330 (State law conditioning right to vote on minimum residence requirement stuck down as being overbroad.) In Canada, by contrast, a deferential standard of review is applied to legislative determinations of electoral boundaries. See Re Provincial Electoral Boundaries (Saskatchewan) [1991] 2 SCR 158. Australia has, at best, an implied constitutional right to vote, and the jurisprudence of the Australian High Court is accordingly not particularly relevant. See T Blackshield & G Williams Australian Constitutional Law and Theory: Commentary and Materials (3rd Edition, 2002) 1101-05.

[2] See C Roederer 'Founding Provisions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 13.

[3] See FC s 74(1) and (2), as applied in UDM. As Steven Budlender points out in his chapter in this volume, a literal reading of FC s 74(1) and (2) suggests that, for these provisions to apply, the constitutional amendment must actually take the form of an amendment to FC s 1 or a right in the Bill of Rights. The Court in UDM, without saying so expressly, read FC s 74(1) and (2) more generously to apply to any constitutional amendment impinging on FC s 1 or the Bill of Rights. See S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) 17-30.

[4] See August v Electoral Commission 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC)('August'); Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Re-integration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC)('NICRO').

[5] African Christian Democratic Party v The Electoral Commission & Others 2006 (5) BCLR 579 (CC)('African Christian Democratic Party')at paras 21-23.

[6] New National Party v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)('New National Party').

followed.[1] The Constitutional Court dismissed this argument in three paragraphs.[2] The key argument in the Court's reasoning is the holding that:

> The rights entrenched under section 19 are directed to elections, to voting and to participation in political activities. Between elections, however, voters have no control over the conduct of their representatives.[3]

Whilst probably justified in relation to FC s 19(2) and (3), this argument seems misplaced in relation to FC s 19(1), which provides for the freedom 'to make political choices', including the right 'to form a political party', 'participate in the activities of a political party', and 'campaign for a political party or cause'. None of these rights may be meaningfully exercised only at election time, and all are patently capable of violation in between elections.

The deferential approach of the Court in UDM to state action impinging on political rights had earlier been signalled in New National Party, where an eight-to-one majority had dismissed a challenge by a minority political party to certain sections of the Electoral Act.[4] The impugned sections together provided that, in order to register and vote in a general election, citizens had to be in possession of a particular kind of identity document or temporary identity certificate. It was common cause that these provisions prevented certain South African citizens above the statutory age from voting. The question the New National Party Court had to decide was whether the impugned provisions violated the right to vote in FC s 19(3) and, if so, whether such violation was reasonable and justifiable according to the standard imposed by FC s 36.

The difference between the majority judgment of Yacoob J and the minority judgment of O'Regan J goes to the heart of the Final Constitution's conception of democracy. For the majority, although the 'importance of the right to vote is self-evident and can never be overstated', there was > no point in belabouring its importance and it is sufficient to say that the right is fundamental to a democracy, for without it there can be no democracy. But the mere existence of the right to vote without proper arrangements for its effective exercise does nothing for a democracy; it is both empty and useless.[5]

There is some ambivalence in this passage about the importance of the right to vote that provides an early indication of the approach the majority ultimately takes. Whilst affirming the centrality of the right to vote in maintaining the conditions necessary for democracy, the majority downplays the importance of the right in the ambiguous last sentence of the quoted passage. The fact that the right to vote is 'empty and useless' without procedural arrangements for its exercise, of course, cuts two ways. Either it means, as the majority later presses us to accept, that the legislature should be given a relatively free hand to decide what those

[1] See § 10.3*(b)* supra.
[2] See UDM (supra) at paras 49-51.
[3] Ibid at para 49.
[4] Act 73 of 1998.
[5] New National Party (supra) at para 11.

arrangements should be,[1] or it means that the right is so important that a heightened level of review should be applied to the scrutiny of the arrangements — the approach taken by O'Regan J in her minority judgment.[2]

Two subsidiary considerations bolster the majority's approach in New National Party: a concern for the institutional legitimacy of the Court in reviewing procedural arrangements made for the exercise of the right to vote;[3] and the purely technical argument that the two-stage system of review requires the reasonableness of state action to be considered only at the second, limitations stage.[4] Both of these subsidiary arguments are flawed: the first because it ignores the importance of the right to vote in lending legitimacy to the system in terms of which laws regulating the right to vote are made, and the second because it is contradicted by decisions handed down both before and after New National Party.[5]

In avoiding these two errors, O'Regan J's minority judgment is more in keeping with the approach to political rights in democratic theory. As we have seen, democratic theory accords to political rights a special status as democracy-enhancing rights. Even Waldron, the most ardent critic of Dworkin's view that the set

[1] New National Party (supra) at para 14 ('The details of the system are left to Parliament.')

[2] Ibid at para 122.

[3] Ibid at para 19 ('It is to be emphasised that it is for Parliament to determine the means by which voters must identify themselves. This is not the function of a Court.')

[4] See New National Party (supra) at para 24.

[5] In a series of decisions across different areas of law the Constitutional Court has shown itself to be prepared to engage in reasonableness review at the first stage of the inquiry. The most familiar of these areas is socio-economic rights, where the inquiry into the violation of the right has, since the decision in Government of the RSA & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC), depended on the Court's assessment of the reasonableness of the legislative and other measures taken to realize the right. See further S Liebenberg 'Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 33. In relation to property rights, too, the Court has laid down a test that sees it employing a flexible review standard at the initial stage, the outer end of which conforms to something approximating reasonableness review. See First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service & Another; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) at para 65, discussed in T Roux 'Property' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 46. In FC s 16 cases, as we have seen, the rationality of a law restricting freedom of expression generally does not provide a defence at the first stage of the inquiry unless the law regulates forms of expression specifically excluded by FC s 16(2). Although harder to compare, the Court's review standard under FC s 9(3), the unfair discrimination part of the equality clause, is also arguably higher than that deployed in New National Party in relation to political rights. See, eg, Harksen v Lane NO 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1537 (CC) at para 52, discussed in B Goldblatt & C Albertyn 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 35. To be fair to the majority in New National Party, most of these decisions were handed down after the decision in that case. The basic structure of the Final Constitution in this regard was, however, clear, as pointed out in O'Regan J's minority judgment at para 123. For a slightly different view, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34 (The authors contend that, save for rights provisions containing internal limitations clauses, no good reason exists for reasonableness tests to form a part of fundamental rights analysis.)

of democracy-enhancing rights should be expanded to include all rights that ensure that citizens are treated with equal concern and respect, concedes that Dworkin's argument is unassailable in relation to the right to participate in the democratic process.[1] John Hart Ely's defence of political rights as 'democracy-reinforcing' rights is equally well known.[2] Against this background, the majority's reticence in New National Party to subject the right to vote in FC s 19(3) to reasonableness review is hard to fathom. Far from requiring special deference, the democratic objection to judicial review is weakest in relation to political rights.

Although in outcome they may appear to have vindicated the special place of political rights in the Final Constitution's vision for South African democracy, neither August nor NICRO nor African Christian Democratic Party contradicts the deferential standard of review adopted in New National Party. In August, a decision handed down just before New National Party, the Court held, in the absence of an express legislative prohibition, that the state was required to show that it had taken reasonable steps to enable prisoners to vote.[3] This was effectively the same standard of review as the one later applied in New National Party.[4] In NICRO, which was decided after the national Electoral Act had been amended to deny certain categories of prisoner the right to vote, the state conceded that such legislative prohibition necessarily limited the right in FC s 19(3).[5] The standard of review to be applied in the case accordingly did not arise. And in African Christian Democratic Party, as we have seen, FC s 19 was relied on only indirectly, with greater normative weight being given to FC s 1*(d)*.

Despite the relative degree of success enjoyed by constitutional claimants under FC s 19, therefore, the Court's jurisprudence in relation to political rights is out of kilter with its approach to FC s 16. As noted in § 10.4*(a)*, state action impinging on freedom of expression that is not excluded from the ambit of the right by FC s 16(2) is generally taken to infringe FC s 16(1), with most of the interpretative work being done at the limitations stage. Under FC s 19, on the other hand, the constitutional claimant must discharge a fairly difficult legal burden before the limitations stage can be reached. The explanation for this discrepancy seems to be that, in FC s 19 cases, at least where the political stakes are high, the Court — driven by pragmatic rather than principled considerations — has opted for a deferential review standard. The fact that this approach is diametrically opposed to the one suggested by democratic theory is a salutary reminder that the theory and practice of adjudication do not always converge.

(c) Socio-economic rights

Socio-economic rights interact with democracy in two main ways: first, as rights to the minimum standard of welfare required for meaningful participation in the [1] See Waldron Law and Disagreement (supra) at 282.

[2] See JH Ely Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review (1980).
[3] See August (supra) at para 22.
[4] See New National Party (supra) at para 23.
[5] See NICRO (supra) at para 32.

democratic process,[1] and, secondly, as rights the adjudication of which involves the judiciary in the allocation of public resources, a function traditionally reserved for the legislative and executive branches of government. The first form of interaction is positive in the sense that the vindication of the right is, in theory at least, aimed at securing the conditions necessary for democracy to function. The second form of interaction, on the other hand, is potentially negative. For many, the judicial enforcement of socio-economic rights detracts from democracy, not just in the way Waldron argues that all rights detract from democracy,[2] but in a particularly severe way associated with the role judges are expected to perform when enforcing socio-economic rights. More so than in respect of other rights, the enforcement of socio-economic rights requires judges to review complex policy choices regarding the allocation of public resources. Quite apart from the fact that judges are not institutionally equipped to undertake this task, such policy choices are more legitimately made, many democratic theorists think,[3] by the people's elected representatives, or at least by those immediately answerable to them.

Of the two main forms of interaction between socio-economic rights and democracy, the second has dominated the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence to date.[4] None of the cases decided thus far has drawn an express link between socio-economic rights and the minimum standard of welfare required for meaningful participation in the democratic process.[5] Instead, the Court's attention has been devoted to rebutting the contention that the second form of interaction between socio-economic rights and democracy is necessarily a negative one. In

[1] See N Haysom 'Constitutionalism, Majoritarian Democracy and Socio-economic Rights' (1992) 8 SAJHR 451, 461 (Arguing that, '[b]y constitutionalising selected socio-economic rights, society is elevating certain rights to a necessary condition for the existence of a minimum civil equality'.); S Liebenberg 'The Value of Human Dignity in Interpreting Socio-Economic Rights' (2005) 21 SAJHR 1, 2 (Arguing that the deprivation of 'basic subsistence needs . . . impedes the development of a whole range of human capabilities, including the ability to fulfil life plans and participate effectively in political, economic and social life'.); S Liebenberg 'Needs, Rights and Transformation: Adjudicating Social Rights' (Unpublished inaugural lecture, University of Stellenbosch, 4 October 2005, manuscript on file with author) 21-22 (Exploring the role of social rights in 'enhancing participatory parity'.)

[2] See § 10.2*(d)* supra.

[3] For a review of the literature, see R Gargarella 'Theories of Democracy, the Judiciary and Social Rights' in R Gargarella, P Domingo & T Roux (eds) Courts and Social Transformation in New Democracies: An Institutional Voice for the Poor? (forthcoming, 2006).

[4] See L Williams 'Issues and Challenges in Addressing Poverty and Legal Rights: A Comparative United States/South African Analysis' (2005) 21 SAJHR 436, 438 (Arguing that 'the fear that democracy might be undermined by judicial fiat has formed the backdrop against which the Constitutional Court has begun to fashion its role in giving content to socio-economic rights'.) The most important socio-economic rights cases decided to date are: Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC); Grootboom (supra); Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (No 2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC)('Treatment Action Campaign'); Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC).

[5] The closest the Court has come to this interpretation is the statement in Grootboom (supra) at para 23 that '[a]ffording socio-economic rights to all people . . . enables them to enjoy the other rights enshrined in chap 2 [of the Final Constitution]'.

both Grootboom and Treatment Action Campaign, the Court emphasized that the adjudication of socio-economic rights was a role given to it by the Final Constitution, and therefore one to which no democratic objection could be raised, provided that the boundaries set by the Constitution were respected.[1]

Whilst this defence of the Court's role in relation to socio-economic rights is understandable in light of the separation of powers concerns that were raised in Grootboom and especially Treatment Action Campaign, when examined against the text of the Final Constitution it seems a little grudging. As noted in § 10.3*(c)*, FC s 7(1) enjoins the courts to interpret all the rights in the Bill of Rights as affirming the 'democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom'. If this injunction is taken at face value, the judicial enforcement of socio-economic rights need not be anti-democratic. On the contrary, the Final Constitution requires the courts to interpret socio-economic rights as democracy-enhancing rights in the same manner as the right to vote, the right to freedom of expression, or indeed any of the rights in the Bill of Rights. The democratic defence of justiciable socio-economic rights, in other words, is not simply that the Constitutional Assembly, a democratic body, decided that the power of future majorities should be restrained in this way. It is that the Constitutional Assembly — on the plain meaning of FC s 7(1) — evidently thought that the judicial enforcement of socio-economic rights would enhance the quality of democracy in South Africa. That view may, of course, have been mistaken, but until the mistake is clearly established, and the Final Constitution amended, the courts' fidelity to the constitutional text requires them to give socio-economic rights the benefit of the doubt. Giving socio-economic rights the benefit of the doubt requires the courts not just passively to accept that such rights are capable of enhancing democracy, but actively to interpret socio-economic rights so as to serve this end.

The democracy-enhancing role of socio-economic rights is most obviously apparent in the first form of interaction described above. The very essence of this form of interaction, after all, is the claim that socio-economic rights enhance democracy by ensuring that everyone has the minimum standard of welfare required meaningfully to participate in politics. Of course, it may be that the judicial enforcement of socio-economic rights will in fact have the opposite effect, and that the involvement of courts in the allocation of public resources will either disrupt state welfare provision or impede economic growth.[2] But these speculative arguments must be disregarded for interpretive purposes. The Final Constitution clearly gives courts a role in enforcing socio-economic rights, and it is not for the courts to question the economic wisdom of that decision. Rather, what the

[1] See, eg, Grootboom (supra) at para 20; Treatment Action Campaign (supra) at para 99. On the precommitment defence to the democratic objection to constitutional review generally, see S Holmes 'Precommitment and the Paradox of Democracy' in J Elster & R Slagstad (eds) Constitutionalism and Democracy (1988) 195.

[2] See, eg, S Archer 'Human Rights and Economic Resources in South Africa after Political Change' Centre for Applied Legal Studies Law & Transformation Conference (Unpublished paper, August 2000, manuscript on file with author).

Final Constitution requires them to do is to interpret socio-economic rights in such a way as to ensure that no one is excluded from the democratic process for lack of resources.[1]

The second form of interaction between socio-economic rights and democracy was, at the time of the adoption of the Final Constitution, thought by almost everyone to be an unavoidably negative one. It was simply inconceivable that courts could enforce socio-economic rights without detracting from democracy. For some, this was reason enough to exclude socio-economic rights from the Bill of Rights altogether.[2] For others, the fact that justiciable socio-economic rights would inevitably detract from democracy was a convenient counterweight to the politically driven decision to include property rights. Since judges would be given this anti-democratic power, why not at least temper it with the power to vindicate socio-economic rights when the occasion demanded?

As it turned out, the Final Constitution's vision for the relationship between socio-economic rights and democracy was more profound than anyone imagined. Although the Constitutional Court's need to build its legitimacy has prevented it from exploiting all the interpretative possibilities in the constitutional text, its cautious case-by-case approach has shown that socio-economic rights and democracy are not necessarily in conflict.[3] In particular, the Court's record demonstrates that, by respecting the limits of its institutional role, a court may counter the democratic objection to justiciable socio-economic rights, whilst at the same time contributing to the deepening of democracy. This point may be illustrated by reference to policy developments after the decisions in Grootboom and Treatment Action Campaign.

In Grootboom, for technical reasons associated with the way the case was run, the order handed down was purely declaratory. This gave rise to a range of criticisms about the seriousness of the Court's commitment to enforcing the right to have access to adequate housing.[4] If the poor were unable to influence the democratic process in their favour, surely the Court had to act more forcefully to protect the Final Constitution's vision? The passage of time has shown that these criticisms were not justified. In the five years since Grootboom was handed

[1] But see Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC). Stu Woolman contends that the Khosa court's rationale for extending FC s 27's right of access to social security to permanent residents — that 'wealthier members of the community view the minimal well-being of the poor as connected with their personal well-being and the well-being of the community as a whole' — 'emphasizes an increase in the objective sense of well-being that flows from the enhancement of the agency of each individual member of our society' and that such agency must, per force, embrace rights of self-governance, and therefore, rights of political participation. See S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) 36–15 citing Khosa (supra) at para 74.

[2] See, eg, D Davis 'The Case against the Inclusion of Socio-Economic Demands in a Bill of Rights Except as Directive Principles' (1992) 8 SAJHR 475.

[3] The case-by-case approach was enunciated in Grootboom. (supra) at para 20.

[4] For my own misguided criticisms, see T Roux 'Understanding Grootboom — A Response to Cass R Sunstein' (2002) 12 Constitutional Forum 41, 51.

down, there has been a slow but inexorable shift in national housing policy towards the position preferred by the Court.[1] Beginning with the adoption of the Emergency Housing Programme,[2] and more recently with the wholesale re-orientation of housing policy to cater to the needs of informal settlers,[3] the state's approach to housing today is closer to the kind of policy that the Court in Grootboom said was constitutionally required. That result could, of course, be entirely coincidental: it may be that South Africa's housing policy would have changed in this way without the intervention of the Court. But there are several reasons to think that Grootboom did make a difference. For one, Grootboom is cited in some of the major policy documents that have signalled this shift.[4] For another, some of the policy choices underlying the new programme are too close to those recommended in Grootboom as to be entirely unrelated to it. Even if those choices cannot be directly attributed to the judgment, Grootboom at the very least created an environment in which such choices could be openly debated.

In the health sector, the re-orientation of the state's anti-retroviral programme in the direction mandated by the Court in Treatment Action Campaign has been much more controversial, with the successful litigant having to institute contempt proceedings in order to ensure implementation of the Court's decision.[5] Nevertheless, public policy on the prevention and treatment of HIV/AIDS has since shifted in the direction preferred by the Court. More importantly, it is clear that the policy now more closely reflects the preferences of the majority of South Africans, and that this change occurred because Treatment Action Campaign created the space for broader public participation in the debate about the adequacy of government's response to the HIV/AIDS epidemic.

Grootboom and Treatment Action Campaign accordingly illustrate that, given the requisite amount of judicial restraint, and favourable political conditions, justiciable socio-economic rights may deepen democracy by enhancing public participation in the making of decisions about the allocation of public resources. Both

[1] The remainder of this paragraph and the one following it draw on arguments made elsewhere. See T Roux 'The Constitutional Framework and the Deepening of Democracy in South Africa' paper prepared for the Open Society Institute Africa Governance Monitoring and Advocacy Project (June 2005, manuscript on file with author).

[2] National Department of Housing (2003).

[3] The Informal Settlement Support Programme adopted by the national Department of Housing in 2004. The Emergency Housing Programme and the Informal Settlement Support Programme are discussed in detail elsewhere in this work. See K McLean 'Housing' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 55.

[4] The discussion paper accompanying the Emergency Housing Programme referred expressly to the decision in Grootboom, along with the then recent experience of severe flooding in the north of the country, as the reason behind the new strategy. See National Department of Housing (2003). Although not that prominent in the policy documents underpinning the Informal Settlement Support Programme, the spectre of Grootboom loomed large in internal departmental discussions about how to deal with mass urbanisation. Arguably, Grootboom helped to tip the balance in these discussions in favour of a policy more accommodating of informal settlers.

[5] See M Heywood 'Contempt or Compliance? The TAC Case after the Constitutional Court Judgment' (2003) 4(1) ESR Review 7, 10.

cases therefore suggest that Gutmann and Thompson's scepticism about the impact of judicial review on democratic debate is misplaced.[1] Far from removing issues from public discussion, limited and sensitive involvement by the courts in important democratic decisions may actually enable an otherwise passive citizenry to become more involved in politics. In so far as the Final Constitution seems to mandate a more direct role for the courts than this, one which sees the courts directly enforcing rights to the minimum standard of welfare required for meaningful participation in the democratic process, the legitimacy that the Constitutional Court has built for itself over the first ten years of its existence may now enable it to interpret the Final Constitution more expansively in this way.

10.5 The Principle of Democracy in South African Constitutional Law

(a) Introduction

The constitutional provisions and cases discussed in the previous two sections together inform our understanding of the principle of democracy in South African constitutional law.[2] Some of the cases attempt expressly to articulate this principle in justifying the rules they lay down. Most of the cases, however, do not.[3] The correct statement of the principle is in any event not dependent on any particular case. Rather, it is a function of the best reading of the constitutional text

[1] See § 10.2*(c)*(iii) supra.

[2] The term 'principle' is used here in its Dworkinian sense of a legal standard that best fits and therefore best justifies the legal materials. See R Dworkin Taking Rights Seriously (1978), 22-31, 71-80; R Dworkin Law's Empire (1986) 225-58. In addition, though no court has confirmed this in so many words, the principle of democracy is also a justiciable principle of South African constitutional law akin to the principle of legality, or the rule of law doctrine, and the doctrine of separation of powers. On the principle of legality, or the rule of law doctrine, see Fedsure Life Assurance & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC) at paras 56-59; Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA & Another: In Re Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) at para 17 (Recognizing the principle of legality as a self-standing principle of South African constitutional law.) See also F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 11. On the separation of powers, see South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC) at paras 19-21 (Recognizing the separation of powers as an 'implied' provision of the Final Constitution.) In so far as its justiciability is concerned, the principle of democracy is more akin to the doctrine of separation of powers than it is to the principle of legality. This is because the principle of democracy, like the separation of powers doctrine, is given expression in the 'structure and provisions' of the Final Constitution as a whole. Cf Heath (supra) at para 21. It does not necessarily follow from this that, when invoking the principle of democracy, litigants should be able to point to the particular provision of the Final Constitution that they allege has been violated. As was the case in Heath in relation to the separation of powers, it should in theory be possible to invoke the principle of democracy by referring to its embodiment in the text of the Final Constitution as a whole. To date, however, all the cases in which express reference has been made to the principle of democracy have tied the application of that principle to a particular provision, meaning that the principle of democracy has not yet been recognized as a self-standing principle of South African constitutional law. See further the cases discussed in § 10.5*(c)* infra.

[3] See § 10.5*(c)* infra.

and the accompanying case law, and is subject to revision by future cases in light of the legal rules there developed.

Because of the interpretive function assigned to it by the Constitutional Court in NICRO,[1] the logical place to start in trying to articulate the principle of democracy is FC s 1*(d). As we have seen, the founding values function something like principles in the way they inform the interpretation of other provisions. FC s 1(d)* is not itself, however, coterminous with the principle of democracy, both because it is stated in the form of a founding value, and because the principle of democracy is something larger and more mutable than FC s 1*(d)*.[2]

It is worth quoting FC s 1*(d)* in full again: 'The Republic of South Africa is one, sovereign democratic state founded on the following values: (a) … (d) Universal adult suffrage, a national common voters roll, regular elections and a multi-party system of democratic government, to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness.' On its face, the principle of democracy that this provision supports is one that attributes to the institutions of representative government a particular purpose, namely, 'to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness'. For this reading, though not for the argument of this section as a whole, the placement of the comma after 'government' in FC s 1*(d)* is crucial. Without the comma, the words 'to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness' would have qualified the phrase 'multi-party system of government' alone, and FC s 1*(d)* would for the most part have consisted of a list of institutions the purpose of which was left unstated. But this is not the provision that the Constitutional Assembly adopted. Nor is it a provision that would have made very much sense. Listing a range of institutions without any apparent purpose, except in the case of the last one, would have been an odd way for the Constitutional Assembly to have gone about articulating a founding value. Values, after all, provide standards against which conduct may be measured, whereas institutions are only valuable to the extent that they serve a valued purpose. The grammatically correct reading is therefore also the reading that makes best sense of the intention behind FC s 1*(d)*. What the placement of the comma after 'government' does is to make it clear that the Final Constitution's commitment to the institutions of representative government is not a commitment to the value of these institutions in and of themselves, but a commitment to a particular kind of relationship between government and the governed, one in which the people's representatives are controlled by and responsible to the people, and in which the reasons behind the exercise of governmental power are publicly explained.

Put in this way, it is immediately apparent that FC s 1*(d)*'s conception of democracy, and the deep principle of democracy it supports, would be incompatible with a model of democracy in which political parties vied for the people's

[1] See NICRO (supra) at para 21.

[2] I say 'larger' because the principle of democracy must attempt to reconcile all the cases, even those that appear to have been wrongly decided, and 'more mutable' because it is subject to change in future cases.

votes, only to ignore the people once elected. In adopting FC s 1*(d), the Constitutional Assembly also conclusively rejected Rousseau's scepticism about the quality of democracy in a representative system of government. On the contrary, there is something of J S Mill's optimism about FC s 1(d)* in the way it confidently draws a causal link between the adoption of the institutions of representative government and the consequences it assumes will surely follow. To judge by FC s 1*(d)* alone, the principle of democracy in South African constitutional law is something like this: Government in South Africa must be so arranged that the people, through the medium of political parties and regular elections, in which all adult citizens are allowed to participate, exert sufficient control over their elected representatives to ensure that: (a) representatives are held to account for their actions; (b) government responds to the needs of the people; and (c) the reasons for all collective decisions are publicly explained.

Unfortunately, not all the cases read FC s 1*(d)* in this way. And there's the rub, for the principle of democracy must endeavour to reconcile the best interpretation of the constitutional text with the way the courts have in fact interpreted those same provisions. The major stumbling block in the way of the interpretation of FC s 1*(d)* just offered is, of course, the decision of the unanimous Constitutional Court in UDM.[1] In that case, the Court was asked to place a value-laden construction on the commitment to multi-party democracy in FC s 1*(d)* that would have prevented Parliament from changing the then applicable electoral system so as to allow floor-crossing. The possible reasons behind the Court's refusal to give such a value-laden reading have already been discussed.[2] They are relevant here only to the extent that it is necessary to discern whether the Court in UDM, in declining to interpret FC s 1*(d)* in the value-laden way it was asked to do, at the same time attributed to FC s 1*(d)* a different set of values that have changed the way in which the principle of democracy in South African constitutional law must be stated. Here, at least, advocates of the value-laden reading may be thankful for a bit of luck, for the Court in UDM did not base its refusal to apply that reading on the primacy of a countervailing set of values located in FC s 1*(d)*, but on a countervailing principle, extrinsic to FC s 1*(d), namely, the principle that, where the Final Constitution does not clearly prescribe a particular model, the judiciary should defer to the legislature in politically sensitive cases concerning the design of the electoral system. Since that countervailing principle is not a principle located in FC s 1(d)* itself, it is not part of the normative universe that needs to be taken into account when stating the principle of democracy derivable from FC s 1*(d)*. Rather, the principle that the court should defer to the legislature in such cases is a self-standing principle, one that was accorded greater weight on the facts of the UDM case, but one that will not be relevant to all cases in which the principle of democracy is implicated.

[1] United Democratic Movement & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (African Christian Democratic Party & Others Intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Another as Amici Curiae) (No 2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC).

[2] See § 10.3*(b)* supra.

The principle of democracy derived from the plain meaning of FC s 1*(d)* accordingly survives UDM. Will it also remain unchanged as the best-fit reading of the legal materials when called upon to explain the other provisions in the Final Constitution on democracy and the cases decided under them? This is a complicated question and it will be easier to answer it in two stages. First, it will be necessary to consider whether the reading of FC s 1*(d)* offered at the beginning of this section fits with the other express references to democracy in the Final Constitution and the rights in the Bill of Rights that are integral to democracy. Once this task is complete, it will be possible to decide whether the case law necessitates an amendment to the principle of democracy discernible in the constitutional text.

(b) The principle of democracy in the constitutional text

The principle of democracy derived from FC s 1*(d)* is supported by the preamble. As noted in § 10.3*(a), the first part of the preamble characterizes democracy not as a value-neutral set of procedures for achieving other valued ends, but as a value system in itself. This is in keeping with FC s 1(d)'s commitment to the institutions of representative government as a means to ensure a particular kind of relationship between government and the governed. The second part of the preamble also affirms the core idea that democracy is a system of government 'based on the will of the people' in which 'every citizen is equally protected by law'. The principle of political equality to which this part of the preamble refers is reflected in FC s 1(d)*'s commitment to universal adult suffrage on a national common voters' roll. The two statements of that principle are not incompatible with each other, and together can be incorporated into the democratic principle's understanding of political equality as a necessary condition for the sort of relationship between government and the governed that it seeks to establish. Finally, the preamble's concern with the connection between the consolidation of democracy in South Africa and South Africa's relationship to other sovereign states is not part of the democratic principle itself, but rather a statement about the consequences that are expected to follow from the observance of that principle. It is therefore not necessary to try to incorporate the third part of the preamble into our understanding of the principle of democracy in South African constitutional law.

The main feature of the reading of the relationship between rights and democracy in § 10.3*(c)* was that these two concepts should not be seen to be in conflict with each other, but rather as being in constructive tension, the resolution of which should take place on a case-by-case basis in accordance with the democratic values of 'human dignity, equality and freedom'. These values are repeated in FC ss 7(1), 36(1) and 39(1). They also appear in a slightly extended form in FC s 1*(a)*. The repetition of the same set of values in these provisions, it was argued, is deliberate, the intention being to make it clear that the rights in the Bill of Rights do not detract from democracy, but are rather constitutive of it. This Dworkinian approach to the relationship between rights and democracy is plainly incompatible with any attempt to equate the principle of democracy in South African constitutional law with the majority-rule principle.[1] This is just not what the Final Constitution says, anywhere. Even if there were isolated references to democracy in the Final Constitution that could be read in this way,[2] the overwhelming weight of the express and implied references to democracy in the Constitution comes down in favour of a different view. The principle of democracy in South African constitutional law is not that collective decisions shall be taken by majority vote, but something far deeper than this, including, at the very least, the notion that the people's will may be trumped by individual rights where this serves the democratic values of 'human dignity, equality and freedom'.

All the rights in the Bill of Rights contribute in one way or another to this deep principle. In most cases, the contribution is indirect. In some cases, however, such as those discussed in § 10.4, the contribution is direct. Thus, when FC s 16(1) provides that '[e]veryone has the right to freedom of expression', or when FC s 19(3)(a) provides that '[e]very adult citizen has the right to vote', the clear intention is to secure these rights against majority override, not for anti-democratic reasons, but so as to safeguard the conditions necessary for democracy. To be sure, these rights may be limited by law of general application. But such limitation, according to FC s 36(1), will be in keeping with the principle of democracy only if the law in question itself serves the democratic values of 'human dignity, equality and freedom'.

At this point the Final Constitution needs to be read very carefully.[3] FC ss 7(1), 36(1) and 39(1) consistently tell us that the democratic values that the [1] Note that the argument is not that the majority-rule principle is not a principle of South African constitutional law. Rather, the argument is that the principle of democracy can neither be equated with nor exhausted by the majority-rule principle.

[2] The reference to democracy in FC s 160(8)(b) has been read by several courts, including the Constitutional Court, to refer to majority rule. See § 10.5*(c)* infra.

[3] It might be useful at this point to contrast the reading of the principle of democracy offered here with the one proposed by Iain Currie and Johan De Waal. See I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 13-18. Currie and De Waal begin their treatment of 'democracy and accountability' by asserting that, in addition to the rule of law, 'the Constitution also requires the government to respect the principle of democracy'. Ibid at 13. The principle in general, they remark, means that 'government can only be legitimate in so far as it rests on the consent of the governed'. Ibid. They then list all the provisions in which direct reference is made to democracy, and quote FC s 1*(d)* in full. Ibid at 14. One can quibble that, apart from FC s 1*(d), most of the provisions they cite are not references to 'the principle of democracy' but to the word 'democracy', but this is not that important. Currie and De Waal's reference to FC s 1(d)* as central to the principle of democracy is certainly correct. They then go on to make two mistakes, however, first, in asserting that there is 'no definition of democracy in the Constitution nor an exhaustive list of the requirements that the principle imposes', and, secondly, in distinguishing from the principle of democracy, whose existence they affirm, a separate, connected but normatively distinct 'principle of accountability'. Ibid at 17. The first statement is mistaken because it is not in the nature of a legal principle to list exhaustively all the requirements it imposes. Rather, as noted above, the principle of democracy is a function of the constitutional text, the cases decided to date and the cases yet to be decided. The list of requirements imposed by such a principle is in theory infinite. Currie and De Waal's second mistake is more serious. In arguing that there are, in fact, two self-standing principles, one of democracy and one of accountability, they divest the principle of democracy of its true content, and set up the possibility of a conflict between these two principles in which a more shallow principle of democracy may win out. If FC s 1*(d)* is taken to be the closest thing to rights in the Bill of Rights are intended to serve are 'human dignity, equality and freedom'. On the other hand FC s 1*(d)* provides that the institutions of representative government are intended to ensure 'accountability, responsiveness and openness'.[1] Is there a contradiction here? No, because FC s 1*(d)* is only one of four values on which the democratic South African state is founded, the others being '[h]uman dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms' (FC s 1*(a)), '[n]on-racialism and non-sexism' (FC s 1(b)) and '[s]upremacy of the constitution and the rule of law' (FC s 1(c)). It follows that FC s 1(d)* does not purport to be an exhaustive list of the values that the commitment to democracy in South Africa is intended to serve. Rather, it is a more limited list of the values that the institutions of representative government are thought to be capable of ensuring. The remaining values in FC s 1 can and must be integrated into our understanding of the principle of democracy in South African constitutional law. Any such principle, after all, though it need not articulate them expressly, must be consistent with the founding values in FC s 1. This can be done, it is suggested, by rephrasing the principle of democracy derived from FC s 1*(d)* in the form of two linked propositions — the proposition already given about the way in which government ought to be arranged, and then a complementary proposition, as follows: The rights necessary to maintain such a form of government must be enshrined in a supreme-law Bill of Rights, enforced by an independent judiciary, whose task it shall be to ensure that, whenever the will of the majority, expressed in the form of law of general application, runs counter to a right in the Bill of Rights, the resolution of that tension promotes the values of human dignity, equality and freedom.

The next part of the Final Constitution that we need to take into account is those provisions considered in § 10.3*(d), that is, express references to democracy in provisions setting out the powers and functions of the various legislative bodies. These provisions, as we have seen, may be divided into three basic types: provisions requiring legislative bodies to take account of representative and participatory democracy in the way they design their rules and orders; provisions requiring legislative bodies to allow minority party participation in their proceedings; and provisions requiring legislative bodies to facilitate public access to and involvement in their proceedings. All these provisions qualify the majority-rule principle underlying the provisions on national, provincial and local government legislative authority as a whole, that is, the principle that whichever party a statement of the principle of democracy in the Final Constitution, then it is clear that the principle of democracy connotes a unified conception of democracy and accountability in which the institutions of representative government are not divorced from the purpose for which they are established. To extract the principle of accountability from FC s 1(d)* in this way deprives the institutions of representative government of their instrumental purpose, and the principle of democracy of its deeper meaning.

[1] It is also possible to argue that 'accountability, responsiveness and openness' are really goals not values, and in this way to resolve the apparent contradiction between FC s 1*(d)* and FC ss 7(1), 36(1) and 39(1). See Dworkin's distinction between goals and values in Taking Rights Seriously (supra) at 22. However, we are expressly told in the beginning of FC s 1 that the items to follow are founding values — not goals. In any case, it is possible to reconcile them in another way, as the rest of this section makes clear.

wins the most votes in an election is entitled to form the government. The qualification that the three sets of provisions discussed in § 10.3*(d)* place on the majority-rule principle is that the commitment to multi-party democracy in FC s 1*(d)* is not one that may be fulfilled at election-time alone, but one that must be carried through to the day-to-day operation of the various legislatures, such that the views of citizens who voted for minority parties are fairly reflected in any discussions that take place. In addition, the third generic provision requires that the legislatures should make provision for citizens on occasion to bypass their elected representatives in order to participate directly in the proceedings of the legislature. This qualification may be expressed by restating the first element of the democratic principle in the following way: G*overnment in South Africa must be so arranged that the people, through the medium of political parties and regular elections, in which all adult citizens are entitled to participate, exert sufficient control over their elected representatives to ensure that (a) representatives are held to account for their actions, (b) government listens and responds to the needs of the people, in appropriate cases directly, [and] (c) collective decisions are taken by majority vote after due consideration of the views of minority parties, and (d) the reasons for all collective decisions are publicly explained.* (Words added are underlined; words deleted appear in square brackets.)

Is it also necessary to amend the statement of the democratic principle in light of the rights integral to democracy considered in § 10.4? To a large extent, these rights have already been taken into account in the statement of the second element of the democratic principle. At the risk of privileging certain rights over others and making the statement of the second element long and unwieldy, one might amend it thus: The rights necessary to maintain such a form of government, including the right to freedom of expression, the right to form political parties, the right to vote, and the right to the minimum standard of welfare necessary to participate in the democratic process, must be enshrined in a supreme-law Bill of Rights, enforced by an independent judiciary, whose task it shall be to ensure that, whenever the will of the majority, expressed in the form of law of general application, runs counter to a right in the Bill of Rights, the resolution of that tension promotes the values of human dignity, equality and freedom. This way of stating the second element of the principle, though accurate, is somewhat inelegant. On balance, therefore, it is probably better to leave the second element as it stood after consideration of FC ss 7(1), 36(1) and 39(1). This means that the principle of democracy derivable from the constitutional text, before consideration of the case law, is something like this: (1) G*overnment in South Africa must be so arranged that the people, through the medium of political parties and regular elections, in which all adult citizens are entitled to participate, exert sufficient control over their elected representatives to ensure that: (a) representatives are held to account for their actions, (b) government listens and responds to the needs of the people, in appropriate cases directly, (c) collective decisions are taken by majority vote after due consideration of the views of minority parties, and (d) the reasons for all collective decisions are publicly explained. (2) The rights necessary to maintain such a form of government must be enshrined in a supreme-law Bill of Rights, enforced by an independent judiciary, whose task it shall be to ensure that, whenever the will of the majority, expressed in the form of law of general application, runs counter to a right in the Bill of Rights, the resolution of that tension promotes the values of human dignity, equality and freedom.*

(c) The principle of democracy in the case law

The introduction to this section considered the extent to which the Constitutional Court's decision in UDM may be said to have altered the principle of democracy supported by FC s 1*(d)*. For the same reason that UDM cannot be said to have altered that principle, it cannot be said to have altered the more extended principle discernible in the entire constitutional text. By declining to engage with the substantive values underpinning multi-party democracy, UDM does not stand for a countervailing interpretation of the democratic principle, but for an independent principle of judicial deference in politically sensitive cases, such as those involving the design of the electoral system. Whatever one thinks of the correctness of UDM, therefore, it cannot be said to impact on the principle of democracy. Rather, UDM stands for the meta-principle that where the principle of democracy and the principle of judicial deference in politically sensitive cases conflict, the latter principle must prevail. As it so happens, that part of the UDM decision strikes one as intuitively wrong, but it is not necessary to make a case for that intuition here. It is sufficient to conclude that the statement of the principle of democracy discernible in the constitutional text need not be altered in order to accommodate UDM.

UDM was, of course, not the first case to rely on the principle of judicial deference in politically sensitive cases concerning the design of the electoral system. In New National Party,[1] Yacoob J held, in a decision from which only O'Regan J dissented, that the standard of review in challenges to electoral statutes based on the right to vote was bare rationality.[2] In her powerful dissent, O'Regan J stressed the centrality of the right to vote in the consolidation of South African democracy, remarking that: 'The right to vote is foundational to a democratic system. Without it, there can be no democracy at all.'[3] In according special importance to the right to vote in this way, O'Regan J aligned herself with the consensus view in the literature that, if any right needs to be safeguarded against majority override, it is the right to vote. For this reason, O'Regan J's judgment also supports the second element of the principle of democracy just outlined. As argued in § 10.5*(b)*, it is integral to the Final Constitution's conception of democracy that rights be capable of trumping the will of the majority where such a result better serves 'the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom'. Excluding the right to vote from the operation of this principle by subjecting the state's regulation of it to a standard of mere rationality alone is clearly wrong.

Although the decisions in August[4] and NICRO,[5] by vindicating prisoners' right

[1] *New National Party v Government of the Republic of South Africa*1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)('NNP').
[2] Ibid at paras 19-24.
[3] Ibid at para 122.
[4] August v Electoral Commission 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC)('August').
[5] Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Re-integration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC)('NICRO').

to vote in the face of executive neglect and legislative override, counterbalance the decision in NNP somewhat, they do so without calling into question the standard of review laid down in that case.[1] August and NICRO, despite endorsing the centrality of the right to vote to South African democracy, neither support nor detract from the principle of democracy in § 10.5*(b)*. At best, they are agnostic on the question whether that principle can be enforced in cases where the state does not act irrationally.[2]

Another case in which the principle of democracy appears at first blush to have given way to the principle of judicial deference in politically sensitive cases is Democratic Alliance v ANC & Others.[3] In that case, it will be recalled, the Cape High Court was asked to decide whether FC s 160(8) meant that the party-political composition of a municipal council's committees, including the executive committee, had to be proportional to the parties' support in the council. The High Court decided that it did not, holding that FC s 160(8) primarily conferred on minority parties a right to participate in the proceedings of a municipal council and its committees, and that the composition of the committees need not exactly reflect the composition of the municipal council itself. This decision appears to have been strongly influenced by the decision in UDM, which had been handed down shortly before, and which gave rise to the dispute in Democratic Alliance v ANC. The Democratic Alliance v ANC Court thus held that, due to the political sensitivity of the case, a high degree of judicial deference was in order.[4] To this extent, the approach in Democratic Alliance v ANC may be distinguished on the same basis as UDM. However, before this stage of the decision had been reached, the Court made a finding that is potentially more damaging to the deep principle of democracy. As noted in § 10.3*(d)(ii), the High Court accepted without question a concession by counsel that, read on its own, the requirement imposed by FC s 160(8)(b)* would be satisfied by a first-past-the-post system in which all the members of a municipal council's executive and other committees came from the majority party. FC s 160(8)(b), it will be recalled, provides that the manner in which members of a municipal council are entitled to participate in the proceedings of the municipal council and its committees must be 'consistent with democracy'. The construction placed by the Court in Democratic Alliance v ANC on this provision evinces a very shallow conception of democracy indeed. Read on its own, the Court held, the requirement that municipal councillors' participatory rights be consistent with democracy imposes an imprecise standard that would be satisfied by any number of arrangements, including a winner-takes-all system. The principle of democracy in FC s 160(8)(b), the Court thereby implied, though

[1] August was decided twelve days before NNP. NICRO was decided some five years later.

[2] It should not be necessary to add that South African constitutional law does not need a deep principle of democracy to guard against irrational state action. The principle of the rule of law, including the doctrine of legality, would do this job just as well. See F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 11.

[3] 2003 (1) BCLR 25 (C)('Democratic Alliance v ANC').

[4] Ibid at 41B-F.

not equivalent to the principle of majority rule, is insufficiently determinate as to be clearly incompatible with it.[1]

Here, then, we have a statement of the principle of democracy that appears to be diametrically opposed to the one contained in the constitutional text. What are we to make of it? The first thing to say is that the Cape High Court, in accepting the concession made by the applicant's counsel in relation to FC s 160(8)(b), made a mistake. What the applicant's counsel and the Court seem to have missed is that the requirement of democracy in FC s 160(8)(b) applies both to municipal councillors' entitlement to participate in the proceedings of committees of the municipal council and to their entitlement to participate in the proceedings of the municipal council itself. FC s 160(8)(b) cannot therefore establish as weak a standard as the Court says it does, since a first-past-the-post system in which the majority party participated in the proceedings of the municipal council to the exclusion of minority parties would plainly be unconstitutional. In fact, a careful reading of FC s 160(8)(b) reveals that it has nothing at all to do with party-political participation in the municipal council or its committees. That issue is dealt with in FC s 160(8)(a), which provides that municipal councillors are entitled to participate in the proceedings of the council and its committees in a manner that allows 'parties and interests reflected within the Council to be fairly represented'. As the Court in Democratic Alliance v ANC itself decides, this provision is directly relevant to disputes about the extent of party-political participation in the proceedings of the municipal council and its committees. FC s 160(8)(b) has to do with something else, namely the manner of members' participation in such proceedings, which must be 'consistent with democracy'. To discern what this requirement means would have required the Court to undertake a detailed analysis of that phrase. Given counsel's concession in relation to FC s 160 (8)(b), it is easy to understand why the Court did not do this: the task of deciding what the phrase 'consistent with democracy' means is nothing short of the task undertaken in this chapter. Offered a convenient way out, the High Court took it, and we are accordingly left no wiser about what the principle of democracy really means. By the same token, however, Democratic Alliance v ANC cannot be read as detracting from the principle of democracy discernible in the constitutional text as a whole. Since it makes no attempt to interpret the text beyond FC s 160(8), it cannot be taken as a serious attempt to articulate that principle, and its holding in this respect may therefore be disregarded.

[1] See MEC for Development Planning and Local Government in the Provincial Government of Gauteng v Democratic Party 1998 (4) SA 1157 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 855 (CC). This case concerned a challenge to s 16(5) of the Local Government Transition Act 209 of 1993 ('LGTA') in terms of FC s 160(3)(b) read with FC s 160(2)(b). The constitutional provisions require that the budget of a municipal council be approved by a majority of members, whereas the LGTA provided for approval by two-thirds majority, with a deadlock-breaking mechanism allowing the MEC to approve the budget. One of the questions raised in this case was whether the LGTA framework offended a range of principles, including the principle of democratic government. The Court held that, even if there was such a principle, 'a deadlock-breaking mechanism to avoid impasse [in approving a municipal budget] would not be in breach of [it]'. Ibid at para 56.

The Constitutional Court's interpretation of FC s 160(8) is contained in Democratic Alliance & Another v Masondo NO & Another.[1] This case is a particularly rich one from the perspective of this chapter, and was accordingly discussed in some detail in § 10.3*(d)*(ii). Two of the three opinions, Sachs J's concurring and O'Regan J's dissenting opinion, come quite close to the reading of the constitutional text offered here. These opinions will be discussed in moment. First, however, it is necessary to ask whether the majority opinion in Masondo detracts from the principle of democracy set out in § 10.5*(b)*. As was the case with UDM and Democratic Alliance v ANC, the answer must be 'no'. This time, fortunately, the reason for this conclusion is quite simple. As we saw in § 10.3*(d)*(ii), the difference between the three opinions handed down in Masondo had to do with the question whether the principle of democracy was implicated in that case at all, rather than with differing views about the content of the principle. Had the majority been asked whether they agreed with Sachs and O'Regan JJ's vision for South African democracy they would probably have said, 'Yes, of course.' But that was not the point of their disagreement. The point of their disagreement was whether mayoral committees in an executive mayoral system are best understood as executive bodies or as bodies in which the functions of the legislature and the executive are combined. The majority took the former approach, and in effect held that the principle of democracy in FC s 160(8) did not apply to the case.[2] Sachs and O'Regan JJ, on the other hand, held that mayoral committees were mixed executive-legislative bodies because, in the nature of things, much of the deliberation over collective decisions in an executive mayoral system will occur in the mayoral committee. Both Sachs and O'Regan JJ therefore felt that the principle of democracy was indeed implicated. The difference between their two opinions can be attributed to O'Regan J's view that the absence of minority-party participation in the mayoral committee per se contradicted the 'fair representation' part of that principle, and Sachs J's view that it all depended on the way that the system was implemented.

It is impossible to summarize Sachs J's remarks in Masondo on the principle of democracy in South African constitutional law without depriving them of their special flavour:

> The requirement of fair representation [in FC s 160(8)(a)] emphasizes that the Constitution does not envisage a mathematical form of democracy, where the winner takes all until the next vote-counting exercise occurs. Rather, it contemplates a pluralistic democracy where continuous respect is given to the rights of all to be heard and have their views considered. The dialogic nature of deliberative democracy has its roots both in international democratic practice and indigenous African tradition. It was through dialogue and sensible accommodation on an inclusive and principled basis that the Constitution itself emerged. It would accordingly be perverse to construe its terms in a way that belied or minimized the importance of the very inclusive process that led to its adoption, and sustains its legitimacy.

[1] 2003 (2) SA 413 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 128 (CC)('Masondo').

[2] Masondo (supra) at para 22 (Court holds that the governing principle was the need for effective and efficient service delivery, which is the more appropriate principle when it comes to the assessment of the conduct of the executive.)

> The open and deliberative nature of the process goes further than providing a dignified and meaningful role for all participants. It is calculated to produce better outcomes through subjecting laws and governmental action to the test of critical debate, rather than basing them on unilateral decision-making. It should be underlined that the responsibility for serious and meaningful deliberation and decision-making rests not only on the majority, but on minority groups as well. In the end, the endeavours of both majority and minority parties should be directed not towards exercising (or blocking the exercise) of power for its own sake, but at achieving a just society where, in the words of the Preamble, 'South Africa belongs to all who live in it'. At the same time, the Constitution does not envisage endless debate with a view to satisfying the needs and interests of all. Majority rule, within the framework of fundamental rights, presupposes that after proper deliberative procedures have been followed, decisions are taken and become binding. Accordingly, an appropriate balance has to be established between deliberation and decision.[1]

These two paragraphs, though somewhat eclectic in their blending of different theories, powerfully articulate many of the elements of the principle of democracy that § 10.5*(b)* argued was discernible in the constitutional text. The key aspects of the principle in Sachs J's formulation are: (a) the rejection of the winner-takes-all conception of democracy, except in so far as majority rule remains the basic way of taking decisions once the values of participation and deliberation have been adequately served; and (b) the notion that democracy is not an event that takes place only at election time, but rather a 'continuous' process in which every reasonable attempt is made to accommodate, or at least listen to, divergent views. If there is one theoretical influence in the mix that dominates the rest, it is the theory of deliberative democracy, and in particular Habermas's notion that communicative power is the only legitimate form of power in the modern nation-state.[2] The principle of majority rule, in Sachs J's formulation, is legitimate only to the extent that it is subordinated to a deeper principle of democracy that stresses the value of participation and deliberation before decisions are taken.

O'Regan J's statement of the principle in FC s 160(8)(a) is very similar, but does contain one difference that may be crucial for the way the principle of democracy is conceived in other cases Although Sachs J, like the Cape High Court in Democratic Alliance v ANC, interprets the phrase 'consistent with democracy' in FC s 160(8)(b) as meaning consistent with the principle of majority rule,[3] it is clear from the remarks just quoted that he thinks that the Final Constitution's overarching vision for South African democracy is much deeper than this, and that the operation of the majority-rule principle, not just in FC s 160(8), but generally, is constrained by the need to engage in meaningful

[1] Masondo (supra) at paras 42-43.

[2] Cf Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South African & Others 2006 (5) BCLR 622 (CC)('Matatiele') at para 110 (Sachs J remarked: 'In our constitutional order, the legitimacy of laws made by Parliament comes not from awe, but from openness.') See § 10.3*(b)* supra.

[3] See Masondo (supra) at para 38.

deliberation beforehand. For Sachs J, therefore, the principle of democracy in South African constitutional law is a deep one, roughly corresponding to the statement of that principle in § 10.5*(b). O'Regan J, on the other hand, says in so many words that the principle of democracy, at least in FC s 160(8)(b)* is coterminous with the principle of majority rule. In the passage already quoted in § 10.3*(d)*(ii) she says that:

> [FC] s 160(8)(b) is clear that the principle of fair representation is always subject to democracy and the will of the majority. The principle established by s 160(8) is a principle which requires inclusive deliberation prior to decision-making to enrich the quality of our democracy. It does not subvert the principle of democracy itself.'[1]

It is clear from this passage that, when O'Regan J uses the phrase, 'the principle of democracy', she means the principle of majority rule. Her reading of FC s 160(8), in other words, is that it contains two principles — a principle of fair representation and a principle of democracy — and that these two principles may be reconciled with each other by reading the former to apply to the manner in which minority parties should be allowed to participate in the proceedings of a municipal council and its committees, and the latter to the way in which decisions are taken. It has already been noted in the discussion of Democratic Alliance v ANC that this reading of FC s 160(8) is questionable. Textually, there is nothing in FC s 160(8)(b) that says that this provision applies to decision-making, and certainly not to the exclusion of other issues. The operation of the majority-rule principle with regard to decision-making in a municipal council is set out in FC s 160(3), which provides that certain decisions of a municipal council must be taken 'with a supporting vote of a majority of its members' and others 'by a majority of the votes cast'. Given this comprehensive regulation of the issue, it unclear why FC s 160(8)(b) should be read as restating the majority-rule principle in relation to participation in the proceedings of the municipal council and its committees.[2] The most obvious construction to be placed on FC s 160(8)(b), when read with the comprehensive regulation of decision-making in FC s 160(3), is that it applies to the manner of participation in a municipal council and its committees, and not to the way decisions are taken. What FC s 160(8)(b) says is that, in addition to being fairly represented, minority parties are entitled to participate in the meetings of a municipal council and its committees in a manner 'consistent with democracy'. The principle of democracy to which FC s 160(8)(b) here refers must mean, not the majority-rule principle, which has already been stated in FC s 160(3), but the deeper principle of democracy discernible in the constitutional text as a whole.

It would thus seem that O'Regan J's equation of the FC s 160(8)(b) requirement with the principle of majority-rule in decision-making is open to question.

[1] Masondo (supra) at para 78.

[2] It is possible that the intention of FC s 160(8)(b) was to extend the majority-rule principle in FC s 160(3) to proceedings of the committees of a municipal council. However, as noted earlier, this reading is strained since FC s 160(8) expressly applies both to proceedings of the committees of a municipal council and to proceedings of the municipal council itself, that is, in plenary session.

Nevertheless, that is conclusively what she says, and we are therefore left with a dissenting opinion that fails to attribute to the principle of democracy the full meaning argued for in § 10.5*(b)*. Even Sachs J's concurring opinion, though it appears to support that reading of the principle more fully, might in the end be said to depend on the textual peg of the phrase 'fair representation'. Without that phrase, it is not self-evident that either O'Regan J or Sachs J would have read FC s 160(8) in the manner that they did. Masondo therefore leaves us with less than fulsome support for the reading of the principle of democracy outlined above.

Two more recent decisions, however, come much closer to that reading, and moreover were delivered by a near unanimous Court. In African Christian Democratic Party, the first occasion on which O'Regan J has written for the majority in a case concerning political rights, the Court held that provisions in electoral statutes should be interpreted in favour of 'enfranchisement rather than disenfranchisement and participation rather than exclusion'.[1] This holding was expressly tied to FC s 1*(d), which is quoted in full in the preceding paragraphs, along with Sachs J's commentary on FC s 1(d)* in August.[2] O'Regan J's judgment was concurred in by all the members of the Court with the exception of Skweyiya J. Here, then, we have conclusive support for the deep principle of democracy operating as a guide to the interpretation of statutes affecting political rights.[3]

In a decision handed down three days later, Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South African & Others, we find even more conclusive evidence that a majority of the Constitutional Court may yet endorse the deep principle of democracy set out in § 10.5*(b). In this case, it will be recalled, an amendment to the Final Constitution altering a provincial boundary was challenged under FC s 155(3)(b)* for unconstitutionally limiting the authority of the Municipal Demarcation Board. Although the Court ultimately decided against the applicants on this point, it affirmed the importance of the Demarcation Board 'to our constitutional democracy' and the role of FC s 153(3)(b) read with FC s 1*(d)* in guarding against political manipulation of the demarcation process. This dictum, though not crucial to the outcome of the case and therefore not part of the ratio, suggests a slightly less deferential approach to the legislative regulation of the voting system than was evident in UDM. Of course, the political stakes were not quite as high in Matatiele, and therefore it is easy to downplay the importance of this dictum. Nevertheless, it does suggest that the meta-principle in UDM — that the principle of democracy must give way to the principle of deference to legislative determinations of the design of the electoral system — is not sacrosanct.

The second aspect of the Matatiele decision provides even greater support for the principle that § 10.5*(b)* argued is evident in the constitutional text as a whole. Faced with a concession by applicants' counsel that the procedures for the amendment of the Final Constitution had been duly followed, a majority of the Court refused to accept it. There was enough on the papers, the Court held, to suggest that the people of Matatiele had not been properly consulted about the decision to transfer the area in which they lived to a different province.[1] Although a court should, as a rule, be cautious about deciding issues that were not raised by the parties in their pleadings, this rule had to 'yield to the interests of justice'.[2] FC s 118(1)(a) was open to the interpretation that the people directly affected by a decision to alter a provincial boundary should be consulted by the provincial legislature concerned, either through public hearings or by giving them an opportunity to make written submissions. These issues, the Court held, 'lie at the very heartland of our participatory democracy'.[3]

[1] African Christian Democratic Party (supra) at para 23.

[2] August (supra) at para 17, quoted in African Christian Democratic Party (supra) at para 22.

[3] African Christian Democratic Party does not, however, overturn the standard of review applied in NNP. FC s 19 was used in African Christian Democratic Party as the basis for an enfranchisement-friendly reading of the statute in question, rather than as part of a direct challenge to the statute.

The order in Ngcobo J's majority judgment in Matatiele was supported by all but two of the judges. Three other judges supported the order but not all of the reasoning in the majority judgment. The joint dissenting judgment of Skweyiya and Yacoob JJ takes issue, not with the Court's remarks on the possible interpretation of FC s 118(1)(a), but with the majority's decision to refer the case to further hearing. It therefore leaves the majority's provisional reading of this provision untouched. Sachs J, in concurring in both the order and the reasoning in the majority judgment, restates his conception of democracy in Masondo in even more explicitly Habermasian terms, holding that 'the legitimacy of laws made by Parliament comes not from awe, but from openness'.[4] For Sachs J, at least, the principle of democracy derived from FC s 1*(d)* is a deep one that is capable of invalidating virtually any law or conduct, provided that there is a textual peg on which to hang it. O'Regan J, in supporting the majority's order but not all their reasoning, is a little more cautious. For her, the central question in the case was whether the people of Matatiele had a legitimate grievance and, if so, the consequences for government's relationship with that community if that grievance were left unaddressed. In her words: 'Were we to leave undetermined the legal issues raised by Ngcobo J it would create uncertainty and doubt which might continue to be a source of disquiet and anger for decades to come.'[5] The fact that the case involved a constitutional amendment, in other words, only heightened the need to ensure that government was responsive to the concerns of the Matatiele community. In this indirect way, O'Regan J's judgment, too, though it does not mention it expressly, provides support for the deep principle of democracy outlined in § 10.5*(b)*.

What then, in conclusion, are we to make of the principle of democracy at this stage of our jurisprudence? The constitutional text clearly supports a deep reading of that principle which conforms to accounts in contemporary political theory which insist that, for democracy to be meaningful, government must facilitate real

[1] Matatiele (supra) at para 69.
[2] Ibid at para 66.
[3] Ibid at para 72.
[4] Ibid at para 110.
[5] Ibid at para 90.

public participation in decision-making and genuine deliberation. That this is indeed the principle of democracy in South African law has not yet been confirmed by a majority of the Constitutional Court. Of the current judges, Sachs J has come closest to endorsing this reading, and O'Regan J certainly appears very sympathetic to it. The other judges, however, have remained largely agnostic, with two exceptions — NNP and UDM. UDM remains the greatest obstacle in the way of the recognition of the deep principle of democracy in South African constitutional law, all the more so because it was joined by Sachs and O'Regan JJ. But it is possible to distinguish UDM on the basis that, rather than standing for a different principle of democracy, it stands for a meta-principle, namely, that the deep principle of democracy must yield to a principle of judicial deference in politically sensitive cases, such as those involving legislative determinations of the electoral system. To the extent that this meta-principle still stands in the way of the deep principle of democracy, there are indications in African Christian Democratic Party and Matatiele that the meta-principle is weakening, and that we will shortly have a decision in which the majority of the Court endorses the deep principle in a case in which it really matters.

11 The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution

Frank I. Michelman

11.1 Introduction 11–1
(a) The common law doctrine of legality 11–1
(b) Legality as a norm of enacted constitutional law. 11–2
(c) A product of judicial interpretation 11–2
11.2 The principle of legality and the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. 11–4
(a) The scope of 'constitutional matters': the Constitutional Court not envisioned as a court of general jurisdiction . . 11–4
(b) A problem: The rule of law as a constitutional matter. . . 11–6
(i) An optimistic view of the limited-in-principle scope of 'constitutional matters' 11–7
(ii) The destabilizing effect of introducing the principle of legality as a constitutional matter. 11–11
(iii) The Constitutional Court has never directly addressed this difficulty. 11–12
11.3 The causes of the constitutionalisation of the legality principle 11–15
(a) Introduction 11–15
(b) The straight historical account 11–16
(c) The justificatory account 11–23
(i) The 'transformative' character of the Final Constitution and the special role of the Constitutional Court 11–24

(ii) The impulse and need for retention of a general principle of legality after the onset of the Bill of Rights 11–26
(iii) The risks of locating the legality principle 'outside' the Final Constitution 11–29
11.4 Supremacy of the Constitution 11–34
(a) Constitutional supremacy as a value (not just a rule) . . . 11–34
(b) The unity of the legal system and the pursuit of justice. 11–36
(c) An all-pervasive Constitution? 11–38
(d) Constitutional supremacy as basic-law status 11–41
(e) Constitutional supremacy and discursive style. 11–42

11.1 INTRODUCTION

(a) The common law doctrine of legality

If a country has working legal and political orders, then somewhere within its corpus juris will be found its constitutional law, the law that structures and arranges political and legal institutions, their workings, and their interactions.[1] To that generalization, South Africa during the years preceding the recent constitutional transition was never thought to pose an exception.

As was typical for systems in the Westminster or Diceyan tradition, South Africa's pre-transition constitutional law was understood to be a part of its common law.[2] The twin pillars of that constitutional common law were the principles of legality and of parliamentary supremacy. According to the former doctrine: (a) government and its officials were deemed powerless to act upon the interests and concerns of persons without an authorization or chain of authorizations traceable to an act of Parliament or to the common law;[3] (b) actions by officials falling foul of any restrictions or requirements contained either in the common law or in any law laid down by Parliament or by duly authorized subordinate lawmakers were deemed to that extent unlawful and judicially remediable;[4] and (c) official actions that were judicially found to be arbitrary, according to certain inflections of that term — some of which had substantive overtones — were considered unlawful and judicially remediable, in the absence of clear and specific authorization from Parliament. Such, at least, was the formal state of doctrinal affairs.[5] Has the onset of the Final Constitution altered that state of affairs? If so, in what ways?

---

* I am indebted to Dennis Davis, Andre Van der Walt, Stuart Woolman, and participants in a workshop at the University of Toronto for perceptive comments on drafts of this Chapter.

[1] See § 11.4 infra.

[2] See Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa: In re Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa (2000) (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC)('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers') at para 33 ('The control of public power by the courts through judicial review is and always has been a constitutional matter. Prior to the adoption of the Interim Constitution this control was exercised by the courts through the application of common law constitutional principles.')

[3] This branch of the legality principle apparently encompasses a restriction on the permissible 'vagueness' of statutory authorizations for official action. See Affordbale Medicines Trust & Others v Minister of Health & Another 2005 (6) BCLR 529 (CC)('Affordable Medicines') at paras 24, 108. The branch also ramifies directly to a norm for the interpretation of a certain class of statutes, those that base the liability of a subject to perform or forbear from an act on the existence some prior official action. An example would be a statute that attaches a penalty to the act of smoking in a posted area. See Oudekraal Estates (Pty) Ltd v City of Cape Town & Others 2004 (6) SA 222 (SCA) at paras 32–7 (When construed against the background of the principle of legality, such a statute normally will be taken to mean that the penalty does not ensue if the triggering official action (the posting, in our example) is shown by a person charged with violation not to have been accomplished according to law.)

[4] In case of any discrepancy between common-law and statutory requirements, the latter would prevail per parliamentary supremacy.

[5] Not within memory has the legality principle's formal status as a component of South African common constitutional law been doubted. Content is another matter, of course, as is the strength of judicial will to interpose the legality principle against questionable governmental conduct. It is notorious both that the meaning of 'arbitrary' underwent contraction and that the stringency of the demand for clear parliamentary authorization underwent dilution under the stress of apartheid-era realpolitik. For accounts of these matters, see D Dyzenhaus Hard Cases in Wicked Legal Systems: South African Law in the Perspective of Legal Philosophy (1991); J Dugard Human Rights and the South African Legal Order (1978).

(b) Legality as a norm of enacted constitutional law

Today, the judicially enforceable claim to legality inhabits South African law not as a part of the common law carried over from pre-Constitutional days but as a norm sourced directly in the Final Constitution. The claim to legality has gained recognition as a guarantee within that body of enacted, supreme law — the Final Constitution — for the implementation of which the Constitutional Court ('CC') bears special and final judicial responsibility. The decisions proclaiming this development — their circumstances, motivations, and implications — provide the first main topic of this chapter. The second main topic is the related notion of constitutional supremacy or hegemony developed by the CC. The central and decisive judgment is that in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers. However, President of the Republic of South African & Another v Hugo[1] and Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council[2] are important way-stations, and there are several post-Pharmaceutical reaffirmations of the doctrine.[3]

(c) A product of judicial interpretation

Among the founding values of the Republic — alongside democracy, human dignity, and the achievement of equality, non-racialism and non-sexism — the Final Constitution lists 'supremacy of the constitution and the rule of law'.[4] As might have been foreseen from this text, the rule of law, like dignity,[5] is today invoked in South African constitutional jurisprudence as a pervasive value that 'informs the interpretation of many, possibly all, other rights.'[6] But also like dignity, the rule of law (or at least its included principle of legality[7]) has achieved

[1] 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC)('Hugo').

[2] 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)('Fedsure'). See §11.3*(b)* infra for a comprehensive account of Fedsure and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers.

[3] See Affordabale Medicines (supra) at paras 49, 108; City of Cape Town and Another v Robertson & Another 2005 (2) SA 323 (CC)('Robertson'); Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs & Another 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC)('Bato Star'); Bel Porto School Governing Body & Others v Premier of the Province, Western Cape & Another 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC)('Bel Porto').

[4] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC') s 1*(c)*.

[5] See D Cornell 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2005) Chapter 36.

[6] Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) ('Dawood') at para 35 (On dignity). Consider, for example, the appeal to rule-of-law values in construing the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC') s 8(1) and FC s 9(1). See Prinsloo v Van der Linde & Another 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 25 ('[T]he constitutional state . . . should not regulate in an arbitrary manner or manifest 'naked preferences' that serve no legitimate governmental purpose, for that would be inconsistent with the rule of law . . . The purpose of this aspect of equality is, therefore, to ensure that the state is bound to function in a rational manner.'); Bel Porto (supra) at para 120 (identifying a claim that certain governmental action was 'irrational and thus unlawful' as 'the same argument as that raised in relation to the claim based on s 9(1).') For a crisp summary of the influence of sundry dimensions of the rule-of-law ideal in recent South African constitutional adjudication, some of them tied to specific clauses in the Bill of Rights and some not, see H Botha 'The Legitimacy of Legal Orders (3): Rethinking the Rule of Law' (2001) 64 THRHR 523, 534–6.

[7] See Fedsure (supra) at para 57 ('Whether the [constitutionalised] principle of the rule of law has greater content than the principle of legality is not necessary for us to decide here.') For a succinct review of the rule-of-law 'philosophy' in a somewhat fuller sense, see Y Burns 'A Right-based Philosophy of Administrative Law and a Culture of Justification' (2002) 17 SAPL 279, 284–5.

a dual status in South African constitutional law, serving not just as a pervasive value informing the interpretation of various constitutional clauses but also as a self-standing 'justiciable and enforceable' claim.[1]

Such a conclusion was strictly inescapable with regard to dignity, for the constitutional text, in addition to declaring dignity to be a founding value of the republic, expressly proclaims it a justiciable constitutional right.[2] Establishing the constitutional (as opposed to common-law) status of a general, justiciable claim to legality required something more in the way of interpretive exertion. This is true in three respects. First, at the moment when the CC first proclaimed the constitutional moorings of the claim to legality, it was dealing with the Interim Constitution, an instrument void of any text naming the rule of law as a constitutional 'value,' much less declaring it a guaranteed, justiciable right. By the Court's own testimony, the legality principle's niche in South Africa's tablets of judicially enforceable constitutional guarantees is one that it found to be 'implied' — meaning not expressly stated — within the terms of the Interim Constitution.[3] It is, then, a niche that the CC at one time felt impelled to carve out in the absence of any plain-on-its-face constitutional directive to do so.

Second, while the Final Constitution's designation of the rule of law as a 'founding value' of the Republic might now seem to offer a plain textual platform for the CC's doctrine that the Final Constitution confers a general, justiciable, subjective right to legality, no such simple explanation for that doctrine can be squared with the Court's declaration in NICRO that the founding values listed in FC s 1 do not in themselves 'give rise' to 'discrete and enforceable rights.'[4] Rather, as the CC went on to say in NICRO, the FC s 1*(c)* values 'inform and give substance' to the rights-granting sections of the Bill of Rights.[5] When we scan the Bill of Rights, we find no mention of a general, self-standing, justiciable claim to legality. What may be more to the point, the CC has never identified any section of the Bill of Rights as a direct textual source for such a general, justiciable claim. One is left to infer that the implication of which the CC spoke in Fedsure and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers is an implication from the Final Constituton in its entirety.

Third, as we shall see later, the CC's doctrine regarding a general claim to legality does not rest with giving such a claim a place within constitutional law.[6] The doctrine also essentially includes a denial that such a claim continues to [1] Dawood (supra) at para 35.

[2] See IC s 10 and FC s 10 (Both explicitly confer a right to have one's dignity respected and protected.)

[3] Fedsure (supra) at para 58.

[4] Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Re-Integration of Offenders (NICRO) and others 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 at paras 21, 23.

[5] On the uses of 'the rule of law' as a value, see Bel Porto (supra) at para 120; Dawood (supra) at para 35; Prinsloo v Van der Linde & Another 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 25. See also President of the Republic & Others v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd 2004 (6) SA 40 (CC) at paras 34, 48, 51 ('Modderklip')(Constitutional Court relies on FC s1*(c)* to support its conclusion that the state had limited Modderklip's right of access to court, as guaranteed by FC s 34, by failing to provide an alternative housing location for illegal occupiers against whom Modderklip had obtained an eviction order that could not be enforced in the absence of such an alternative location.)

[6] See § 11.3*(c)* infra.

subsist beyond the Final Constitution, as a part of South African common law that arguably would fall outside the CC's special powers of control over adjudication respecting 'constitutional matters.'

What we have here, therefore, is no tame or paltry act of judicial lawfinding but rather an event of conscious, active constitutional interpretation by the CC, and one fraught with far-reaching consequences for the administration of law in South Africa. Among these consequences, moreover, as we are about to see, is one that appears to run directly counter to an express design of the Final Constitution: that of assigning to the CC a less-than-plenary subject-matter competence and thus of dividing final appellate authority between the CC and the Supreme Court of Appeal. We shall want, therefore, to consider the possible causes and justifications for this bold stroke by the CC.[1]

11.2 The Principle of Legality & the Jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court

(a) The scope of 'constitutional matters': The Constitutional Court not envisioned as a court of general jurisdiction

A court set up to have the last word on constitutional matters, as the CC indubitably is,[2] may or not also be a court set up to exercise a plenary jurisdiction over all legally cognizable matters that may arise. Whether a 'constitutional' court is also to serve as a court of plenary jurisdiction would seem to be a choice for constitutional drafters to make, both by their explicit delineations of the court's jurisdiction and by the prescriptive norms they write into their constitutional instrument. Taking the Final Constitution at its word, we would have to say the CC of South Africa decidedly is not set up to be a court of plenary jurisdiction. FC 167(3)(a) confines the CC's writ to 'constitutional matters' and 'issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters.'[3] By contrast, FC s 168(3) endows the Supreme Court of Appeal ('SCA') with authority to decide appeals in 'any matter,' subject to possible review by the CC in 'constitutional matters.' The conclusion seems inescapable: 'constitutional matters' compose a proper subset of all litigable matters, and the Final Constitution, by express design and presumably for reasons consciously held, has applied to the CC not only a special principle of concentration on constitutional matters but a concomitant rule of jurisdictional confinement to such matters.

The CC relied squarely on this view in S v Boesak.[4] The case raised the question of whether another court's judgment of the sufficiency of evidence in a criminal case to support a finding of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt is a constitutional matter falling within the CC's powers of review. The applicant maintained that

[1] See § 11.3 infra.

[2] See S v Pennington 1997 (4) SA 1076 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1413 (CC) at para 10.

[3] Constitutional matters include issues involving 'the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Constitution.' FC s 167(7). The Interim Constitution similarly made the Constitutional Court the final judicial arbiter of 'all matters relating to the interpretation, protection and enforcement of the provisions of this Constitution.' IC s 98(2).

[4] 2001 (1) BCLR 36 (CC), 2001 (1) SA 912 (CC)('Boesak').

conviction on the basis of insufficient evidence — evidence that 'ought to' have left the tribunal in doubt about his guilt — infringed his right to be presumed innocent, expressly guaranteed by FC s 35(3)(h),[1] and also (because imprisonment impended) his right not to be deprived of freedom without just cause, expressly guaranteed by FC s 12 (1)(a).[2] On their face, these contentions seem easily to meet the requirement that 'the Constitution must be implicated in some way before a finding can be said to raise a constitutional issue within the jurisdiction' of the CC.[3] The CC nevertheless concluded that questions of the sufficiency of evidence to support a conviction of crime could not be classed as constitutional matters because, if they were, then 'all criminal cases would be constitutional matters, and the distinction drawn in the Constitution between the jurisdiction of this Court and that of the SCA would be illusory.'[4] However less than airtight such reasoning may be,[5] it plainly implies as a premise that the CC may not, consistently with Final Constitution, regard its subject-matter competence as plenary.

From a legal-realist standpoint, of course, one always can doubt that it is possible to seal off 'non-constitutional' issues in a system where 'the Constitution is the supreme law and all law has to conform to the Constitution.'[6] After all, the CC not only is granted the authority to decide 'issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters,' it is further expressly empowered to decide, with finality, 'whether a matter is a constitutional matter or whether an issue is connected with a decision on a constitutional matter;'[7] and those grants may seem potentially plastic enough, in the hands of a sufficiently determined and confident court, to cover that court's seizure of control over just about any legal issue of clear public importance once brought to litigation by a party with arguable standing to raise it.[8]

It does not follow, however, that these textual concessions of power to the CC — to decide 'connected' issues, and to decide which issues are constitutional or connected — detract from the clarity of the Constitution's plan to confine the CC's competence to a proper subset of the set of all legal issues. These texts endorse the CC's exercise of ancillary powers that no set of words could have denied to it in practice. Making explicit what must have been true in any event, these constitutional clauses cannot be said to gainsay the Final Constitution's apparent commitment to a principle of limited subject-matter competence for the CC. Rather to the contrary: By expressly pinning final responsibility for [1] Boesak (supra) at para 16.

[2] Ibid at para 36.
[3] Ibid at para 23.
[4] Ibid at paras 15 and 35.
[5] It seems the distinction would not be illusory as long as some non-criminal cases might be found that raise no constitutional matters.
[6] Van der Walt v Metcash Trading Ltd 2002 (4) SA 317 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 454 (CC)('Metcash') at para 32. Ngcobo J obviously wrote with the Final Constitution's supremacy clause in mind. See FC s 2 ("This Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic; law or conduct inconsistent with it is invalid, and the obligations imposed by it must be fulfilled.')
[7] FC s 167(3)(c).
[8] See C Loots 'Standing, Ripeness and Mootness' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 8.

prudent implementation of the principle on the CC — where, inevitably, such responsibility would rest in practice anyway — the Final Constitution confirms its commitment to the principle.

Neither is the Final Constitution's apparent commitment to a contained jurisdiction for the CC belied by FC s 173, granting to the CC an 'inherent power' to 'develop the common law, taking into account the interests of justice.' Other clauses of the Final Constitution unquestionably obligate courts at all levels to develop the common law when and as required in order to 'give effect to' or appropriately 'limit' a right in the Bill of Rights (FC s 8(3)), and furthermore to develop the common law as may be required to keep the latter duly attuned to the 'spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights' (FC s 39(2)).[1] There thus must arise cases in which constitutional matters are at stake in deciding or steering the course of common-law development, and proper oversight by the CC in such cases obviously may be aided by allowing the CC a competence to participate along with other courts in developing the common law. FC 173 thus figures as an implementation of the principle of the CC's special competence in constitutional matters, and the CC would be expected to tailor accordingly its use of its common-law development power.[2]

We may conclude, therefore, that the Final Constitution's express delineations of the subject-matter competence of the CC disclose an intention or design to restrict that competence to a proper subset of all legal issues.

(b) A problem: The rule of law as a constitutional matter

Questions obviously remain about whether a limiting formula so open to interpretation as 'constitutional matters' realistically can rein in the CC in practice. Questions also remain — and we shall discuss them — about whether anything like a watertight containment really was intended, or is desirable, or is consonant

[1] It makes no difference here — although it may elsewhere, see below — that the distribution of these duties between the Supreme Court of Appeal and the High Courts is a contentious issue. See Nontembiso Norah Kate v Member of the Executive Council for the Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape Case No 1907/03 (SEC) (Froneman J)('In matters where there may be doubt or ambiguity in higher court or authority, and where that doubt or ambiguity may have serious consequences for upholding the fundamental constitutional values of the supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law, I would respectfully suggest that High Court judges of first instance are obliged to follow the interpretation of authority that in their serious and considered opinion would serve the Constitution and the rule of law best.'); Ex Parte Minister of Safety and Security: In re S v Walters 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC)('Walters'); Afrox Healthcare Bpk v Strydom 2002 (6) SA 21 (SCA)('Afrox'); S Woolman & D Brand 'Is There a Constitution in this Courtroom? Constitutional Jurisdiction after Afrox and Walters' (2003) 18 South African Public Law 38; S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 31.4*(b)*(x)(On stare decisis development of common law, and high Court Jurisdiction).

[2] The CC has done just that. See Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.4*(e)*(i)–(iv)(Describes CC's practice of deferring or standing aside while the Supreme Court of Appeal and High Courts take the labouring oar in common-law development.) See also Gardener v Whitaker 1996 (4) SA 337, 1996 (6) BCLR 775 (CC); De Freitas v Society of Advocates of Natal 2001 (6) BCLR 531 (SCA), Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC)('Carmichele'); Khumalo & Others v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 771 (CC)('Khumalo'); Boesak (supra) at para 15 ('The development of, or the failure to develop, a common-law rule by the SCA may constitute a constitutional matter.') with the Final Constitution's larger purposes.[1] Of course, none of these questions is independent of how the Final Constitution is construed substantively. Certain kinds of norms for the conduct of officials or the exercise of official powers, if found in the Final Constitution, might render the notion of a less-than-plenary jurisdiction for the CC illusory or inconceivable even in theory. Now that, indeed, is the result to which we are brought — for so we are about to see — by embrace of the CC's understanding of the place and function of the rule-of-law notion in the scheme and project of the Final Constitution. If, as the CC held in Fedsure and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, the doctrine of legality is a 'rule' of supreme constitutional law giving rise to justiciable, subjective claims, it becomes impossible in concept (leave alone realist doubts about what will happen in practice) to see how any case coming to court in South Africa possibly can fall short of being a constitutional case. We develop this point over the next two subsections.

(i) An optimistic view of the limited-in-principle scope of 'constitutional matters'

To get started, we may ask how close to all-inclusive is the coverage of case-types in which the CC's subject-matter competence in constitutional matters is virtually uncontested and incontestable given the text of the Constitution. In S v Boesak, the CC summarised the textual position on 'constitutional matters' as follows:

> If regard is had to the provisions of s 172(1)(a) and s 167(4)(a) of the Constitution, constitutional matters must include disputes as to whether any law or conduct is inconsistent with the Constitution, as well as issues concerning the status, powers and functions of an organ of state. Under s 167(7), the interpretation, application and upholding of the Constitution are also constitutional matters. So too, under s 39(2), is the question whether the interpretation of any legislation or the development of the common law promotes the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[2]

Thus, cases of the following types all raise constitutional matters:

(a) Claims that a specific executive or administrative action falls foul of a requirement or restriction imposed by the Final Constitution.[3]

(b) Claims that a statute correctly construed falls foul of a requirement or restriction imposed by the Final Constitution.[4]

[1] See § 11.3*(c)* infra.

[2] Boesak (supra) at para 14 (citations omitted).

[3] See President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1, 1997 (6) BCLR 705 (CC)('Hugo')(Claim of violation of IC s 8(2) by the President's proclamation considered and upheld.) See J Kentridge 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 35.

[4] See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) at para 23 (Claim of violation of FC s 9(3) by s 25(5) of the Aliens Control Act 96 of 1991, considered and upheld. Court found that the word 'spouse' in the challenged statutory section could not permissibly be read to encompass a same-sex life partner.) See also F*irst National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service & Another* 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) at paras 40, 109, 113 and 114 (Claim of violation of FC s 25(1) by s 114 of the Customs and Excise Act 91 of 1964 was considered and upheld. Court concluded that the statute's deprivative application could not be limited by judicial construction to the class of 'credit grantors' of customs debtors.)

(c) Claims that a statute open to alternative plausible interpretations is rightly to be construed in the claimant's favor because the alternative construction causes the statute to fall foul of the Final Constitution.[1]

(d) Claims that a lower court has failed in the obligation imposed by FC s 39(2) to construe a statute so as to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[2]

(e) Claims that a lower court has erroneously construed and applied a statute, when the statute was enacted for the purpose of giving content to a constitutional right.[3]

(f) Claims that a lower court has failed in the obligation imposed by FC ss 8(2) and 8(3) to develop the common law as required to give effect a right in the Bill of Rights, or in the obligation imposed by FC s 39(2) to develop the common law so as to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[4]

Again, one realistically may doubt whether a sufficiently determined and confident court would have much trouble bringing any publicly salient legal issue under one or another of these six, more or less uncontested classes of constitutional matters. This is certainly so given the apparent sweeping and tentacular reach of the sundry guarantees in the Bill of Rights[5] — including guarantees

[1] See Daniels v Campbell NO & Others 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC)('Daniels') at para 16 (Claim directed by appellant against strict interpretation, in Daniels v Campbell NO & Others 2003 (9) BCLR 969 (C), of the term 'spouse' as used in the Intestate Succession Act and the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act.) See also NEHAWU v University of Cape Town & Others 2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 154 (CC) ('NEHAWU') at para 15 (CC declared that '[i]n relation to a statute a constitutional matter may arise either because the constitutionality of its interpretation or its application is in issue or because the constitutionality of the statute itself is in issue.') In speaking of cases in which the constitutionality of a statute's interpretation or its application is in issue, the CC undoubtedly had in mind cases that are in all practical respects equivalent to cases either of type C or of type D in the enumeration, above.

[2] See L Du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2005) Chapter 3. Such claims need not be strictly equivalent to claims of the preceding type C. Conceivably, a type D claim could succeed where a type C claim would fail. See, eg, Daniels (supra) at para 25 (Whereas the judgment explains at length why the more generous construction of 'spouse' both 'aligns itself with the spirit of the Constitution and furthers the objectives of the Acts,' at no point does it expressly embrace the applicant's claim that a narrower construction would render the Acts unconstitutional.) See also D Davis 'Elegy to Transformative Constitutionalism' in H Botha, A Van der Walt & J Van der Walt (eds) Rights And Democracy (2003) 57, 65.

[3] Although this class of cases might be thought covered by case-type D in our enumeration, the CC has distinguished this class as a discrete category of 'constitutional matters'. See NEHAWU (supra) at para 15. See also Radio Pretoria v Chairperson of the Independent Communications Authority of South Africa & Another 2003 (5) SA 451 (T), 2003 (4) BCLR 421 (T) at para 20 (Appeal raises constitutional issues because case involves application of a 'legislative framework' devised by Parliament to give effect to the requirement laid down by FC s 192 to establish an independent authority to regulate broadcasting in the public interest.)

[4] Carmichele and Khumalo fall within this class. See Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.4*(e)*(ii)–(iv).

[5] See Baloro & Others v University of Bophuthatswana & Others 1995 (4) SA 197 (B), 1995 (8) BCLR 1018, 1054 (B)(IC s 35(3) gives judges 'an almost plenipotentiary judicial authority to decide according to a sense of natural justice, 'equity', 'ius naturale', 'aequitas' all being enshrined in the Constitution.') respecting equality before the law,[1] freedom from arbitrary treatment,[2] and access to court for the fair resolution of disputes.[3] Given such a potentially wide-reaching set of constitutional norms, there is no chance that the CC's competence in constitutional matters can, in practice, be 'seal[ed] hermetically' from the general jurisdiction of the SCA,[4] and there is every chance that 'all' cases within certain broad classes — for example, labour disputes — will engage the CC's competence.[5]

Nevertheless, our enumeration of six classes of constitutional matters is finite in form, and it thus may leave open the possibility that there can arise legal issues falling outside all of the six classes — just as the Final Constitution's jurisdictional clauses evidently expect. We provide below a possible example of such a case.[6] Our point for now is that we might expect the CC to have an eye out for such cases and indeed to find sometimes that a case raises no issue within its competence to decide — thus affirming its own commitment to the apparent constitutional principle of a contained jurisdiction for the CC.

Two cases provide graphic examples of the CC apparently straining to demonstrate exactly such a commitment. In Van der Walt v Metcash Trading Ltd, 'on successive days in August 2001 [separate two-judge panels of the SCA] made contrary orders in two [civil] cases which were materially identical.'[7] A disadvantageously affected party sought review by the CC, asserting several constitutional grounds for complaint, all of which turned on the proposition that the resulting differential treatment by the judiciary of two identical and virtually simultaneous cases was unconstitutionally irrational and arbitrary. After noting the absence of any claim that either of the SCA panels had acted incompetently or in bad faith, the CC concluded that there was nothing it could do to correct what it called a

[1] FC s 9(1).

[2] Claims to freedom from arbitrary treatment stem from multiple constitutional roots, including the guarantee of fair administrative action in FC s 33(1) and the guarantee of equal protection of the law in FC s 9(1). See Prinsloo v Van der Linde & Another 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC)(Court prohibits irrational legislative 'differentiations' or classifications.) For cases involving neither administrative action nor legislative classifications, the Court employs the 'principle of legality'. See Fedsure (supra) at para 58; Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 17; J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2002) Chapter 62.

[3] FC s 34. See Boesak (supra) at para 14 ('If regard is had to . . . the wide scope and application of the Bill of Rights, and to the other detailed provisions of the Constitution such as the allocation of powers to various legislatures and structures of government, the jurisdiction vested in the Constitutional Court to determine constitutional matters and issues connected with decisions on constitutional matters is clearly an extensive jurisdiction.')

[4] Fedsure (supra) at para 111.

[5] NEHAWU (supra) at para 16 (Such an effect, the Court explained, is 'a consequence of our constitutional democracy.' It is, in other words, a consequence of the constitutionalisation of South African democracy combined with the fact that the makers of the Final Constitution saw fit to bring labour matters under pervasive constitutional norms.)

[6] See § 11.2*(b)*(ii), (iii) infra (Discussion of Phoebus Apollo Aviation CC v Minister of Public Security 2003 (2) SA 34 (CC), 2003 (1) BCLR 14 (CC).)

[7] Metcash (supra) at para 1 (The orders were made in response to petitions for leave to appeal against orders of the High Court in summary judgment applications.)

misfortune,[1] and dismissed the appeal.[2] 'The Constitution,' the Metcash Court remarked, 'does not and could hardly ensure that litigants are protected against wrong decisions.'[3] The Court did not further explain — perhaps no further explanation was possible — why the appellant's claim of unconstitutionally arbitrary differentiation lacked sufficient merit, in these rare circumstances, to engage the Court's competence.

In Phoebus Apollo Aviation CC v Minister of Public Security, the appellants sought to hold the Minister vicariously liable for the larcenous acts of a few wayward policemen.[4] The sole question framed in the appeal to the CC was whether the SCA had correctly applied to the facts of the case before it the established common-law test for respondeat superior liability. The appellant offered no contention either that the SCA's doctrinal formulation of the test was at direct odds with the Final Constitution, or that it required modification in order to bring it into full harmony with the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[5] The CC dismissed the appeal expressly on the ground of want of jurisdiction,[6] remarking that the application of this uncontested legal standard to a particular set of facts would typically be classed as raising a question of fact, not of law — a sort of garden-variety judicial task that 'is of course not ordinarily a constitutional issue.'[7]

As in Metcash Trading, such a disposition — dismissal of the appeal — seems in line with a constitutional principle of confinement of the CC to a proper subset of all possible appeals. And yet the dismissal was hardly an irresistible dictate of strict logic. Despite the appellant's failure to frame its pleadings and its appeal so as formally to raise before the CC the issue of the constitutional adequacy of the SCA's formulation of the common-law respondeat superior doctrine, the CC easily could have raised that question on its own had it seen fit to do so. Having that fact in mind, what the CC is really telling us in Phoebus Apollo Aviation is that it sometimes will decline to hear argument on a claim of unconstitutionality because of the extreme prima facie implausibility of the claim,[8] as the CC surely has the power to do under FC 167(6) and its own Rule 20(1).[9]

But that is not how the CC chose to frame its dismissal of the appeal in Phoebus Apollo Aviation. By the Phoebus Court's own account, that dismissal was not a discretionary withdrawal of the leave to appeal it had previously given.[10] It rather

[1] Metcash (supra) at para 11.
[2] Ibid at para 28.
[3] Ibid at para 14 quoting Lane NO v Dabelstein & Others 2001 (2) SA 1187 (CC), 2001 (4) BCLR 312 (CC) at para 4.
[4] 2003 (2) SA 34 (CC), 2003 (1) BCLR 14 (CC)('Phoebus Apollo Aviation').
[5] Ibid at para 9.
[6] Ibid at paras 10–1.
[7] Ibid.
[8] Ibid at para 6.
[9] FC s 167(6) mandates provision for appeals to the CC from other courts, where constitutional matters are involved, 'when it is in the interest of justice and with leave of the Constitutional Court.' Rule 20(1) of the Rules of the CC provides that an appeal to the CC against a judgment of the SCA respecting a constitutional matter 'shall be granted only with the special leave of the Court on application made to it.'
[10] Compare Boesak (supra) at para 12 ('The decision to grant or refuse leave [to appeal, in terms of FC s 167(6) and Rule 201(1) of the Rules of the CC] is a matter for the discretion of the Court.') was forced on the Phoebus Court by discovery that the case raised no issue within the CC's constitutionally bounded subject-matter competence. That form of self-explanation may be an apt gesture of recognition by the CC of the Final Constitution's plan to make its jurisdiction less than plenary. For that or other reasons, the choice to dismiss one or another case on jurisdictional grounds may represent wise judicial administration and it may fall amply within the CC's proper range of self-regulation. If so, then a cost of the constitutionalisation of the legality principle in Fedsure and Pharamaceutical Manufacturers is to make it highly implausible, if not downright impossible, for the CC ever again to dismiss an appeal, or to refuse leave to appeal, on the ground of want of jurisdiction.

(ii) The destabilizing effect of introducing the principle of legality as a constitutional matter

Speaking rigorously and strictly, a jurisdiction that extends to all 'constitutional matters' must be plenary, unless the body of judicially cognizable norms of the Final Constitution is itself subject to containment, in the sense that some cases conceivably can be brought to court to which none of these norms can plausibly be claimed to extend and apply. Owing to the presence of the constitutionalised doctrine of legality, that condition does not now hold in South Africa

As expounded by the CC in Fedsure and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, the constitutionalised doctrine of legality encompasses a demand that any exercise of official power to the detriment of any person must comply with whatever terms and conditions may be set by any applicable law as may happen to exist. Nor does the principle stop there. It contains an ultra vires component, demanding that any exercise of official power to the detriment of any person — and this includes exercises of legislative power[1] — be affirmatively authorized by positive law.[2] The CC has made clear its view that a properly presented claim of default on either of those demands raises a constitutional matter within its jurisdiction.[3] From such a premise, it apparently must follow that every possible appeal in a case at law presents a constitutional question.[4]

In any possible appeal in a case at law, at least one party must be contending that at least one state body has acted in a way that either is contrary to law or is unauthorized by law. The body accused may be an executive body, charged with

[1] See Fedsure (supra) at paras 58–9 ('It seems central to the conception of our constitutional order that the legislature and executive in every sphere are constrained by the principle that they may exercise no power and perform no function beyond that conferred upon them by law.') See also J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2002) Chapter 62.

[2] See Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association & Others 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC) at para 35.

[3] See § 11.3*(b)* infra.

[4] See F Snyckers 'Civil and Constitutional Procedure' (2000) Annual Survey of South African Law 595–6 (Asserting that the CC's conclusion, in Fedsure, that claims of deviation from legality raise a constitutional question, 'could, if taken to its logical conclusion, wreak havoc with the distinction between constitutional and non-constitutional matters for purposes of jurisdiction. . . . One need only postulate Kelsenian notions that all legal questions are to be answered in terms of their ultimate sanction to find that every legal question has now become "constitutional".') acting in contravention of statute, of the Final Constitution, or of the common law, or of acting without due authorization from any of those sources. It may be a subordinate legislative body charged with acting in violation of superior legislation, of the Final Constitution, or of the common law, or of acting without due authorization from any of those sources. It may be a provincial legislature or the national parliament, charged with acting in contravention of, or without authorization from, the Final Constitution.

Or — and here comes the rub — the body complained of might be a lower court charged with having made a legally erroneous or legally unauthorized decision to the complainant's detriment. After all, even a good faith misapplication to the facts of a concededly correct legal rule or standard, as claimed in Phoebus Apollo Aviation, seemingly must count as a legally non-authorized exercise of power by the judge who perpetrates it, to the detriment of a presumably innocent victim — as clear a case as one might hope to see of a direct insult to the principle of legality if allowed to stand uncorrected by a superior court that knows better.[1]

A charge of one or another of these kinds of legal misprision, against one or another of these kinds of bodies, is a necessary component of any appeal in a case at law. But every one of these kinds of charges also amounts to a charge of deviation from the principle of legality, which the CC holds to be a judicially cognizable mandate of the Final Constitution. Thus they all raise constitutional matters. The scope of 'constitutional matters' turns out coextensive with the scope of all claims that might appear in any viable appeal. The CC's finding that the principle of legality stands among the judicially cognizable and enforceable norms laid down by the Final Constitution is apparently at war with the principle of a less-than-plenary subject-matter competence for the CC, which the Court also repeatedly has endorsed.

(iii) The Constitutional Court has never directly addressed this difficulty

The CC has recognized expressly the expansive result for its subject-matter competence flowing from the constitutionalised legality doctrine: 'In Pharmaceutical Manufacturers . . . [a] unanimous Court held that under our new constitutional order the control of public power is always a constitutional matter.'[2] Of course, that declaration stops short of admitting that the Court's jurisdiction now is plenary for all intents and purposes (for not every case need be deemed to involve the control of public power), so it is worth asking whether any sort of reasoning remains by which so awkward-seeming a conclusion might be forestalled or denied.

Consider, again, a case like Phoebus Apollo Aviation. The plaintiff's claim (i) is based on common law, hence it implicates no particular exercise of legislative power. The plaintiff concedes, or the CC finds, that (ii) the legally cognizable wrong or harm pleaded by the plaintiff was perpetrated without any use of executive powers, by persons acting without the support or connivance of any holder of executive powers.[1] Insofar as the wrong or harm is, in substance, one of a sort that arguably is covered by some provision of the Bill of Rights, the CC concludes that (iii) taking into account the nature of the right in question and the nature of any duty imposed by the right, it is not one of those rights that by force of FC s 8(2) would bind a natural or juristic person; hence, there is no occasion in terms of FC s 8(3) to develop the common law.[2] The CC further concludes that (iv) the common law doctrine applied below stands in no need of development in order that it duly promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[3] Accordingly, the CC finds itself lacking power to look any further into the ordinary, residual common law merits of the case.

[1] The CC has made clear that the unquestioned good faith an official actor does not absolve the actor's legal errors from judicial remediation as breaches of the constitutionalised principle of legality. See Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 89 ('The fact that the President mistakenly believed that it was appropriate to bring the Act into force, and acted in good faith in doing so, does not put the matter beyond the reach of the Court's powers of review. What the Constitution requires is that public power vested in the executive and other functionaries be exercised in an objectively rational manner.')

[2] Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs & Another 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC)('Bato') at para 22; Affordable Medicines (supra) at paras 48–9.

The CC has not doubted that often there will be such merits for some court — other than itself — to look into. The apparent premise is that there are sundry occasions for common-law doctrinal choice where either of two or more competing resolutions will correspond adequately to the Final Constitution's spirit, purport and objects and yet only one of these will be correct or best in the eyes of a responsible common-law judge.[4] In Phoebus Apollo Aviation, the CC acted on the basis that this decision is none of its proper business. The Phoebus Court purported to have acted thus not as a matter of discretion but in recognition of a legal curb on its powers. Having made the findings and conclusions we labelled (i), (ii), (iii), and (iv), the CC held itself barred by the Final Constitution's jurisdictional mandates from proceeding further.

Absent the constitutionlised doctrine of legality, such reasoning may strike us as supportable.[5] In the presence of that doctrine, the reasoning falters badly. A lower court judge who enters a legally erroneous judgment acts in contravention of or beyond her legally authorised powers, in apparent breach of the doctrine of legality. If legality is a requirement rooted in the Final Constitution, then a party who claims that the judge has broken it asserts a constitutional claim and raises a constitutional matter. No possible appeal escapes that logic.

[1] See Phoebus Apollo Aviation (supra) at paras 6, 8.

[2] Ibid at para 4 (Holding that the protections of FC s 25(1) 'are aimed at protecting private property rights against governmental action and are quite irrelevant' where the parties charged with robbery and theft have acted independently of the government.) See also S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 31. But see Modderklip (supra) at para 26 (Constitutional Court wrote as if the question of horizontal application of FC s 25(1) is still an open one, making no mention of its judgment in Phoebus Apollo.) Cf T Roux 'Property' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 46.

[3] See FC s 39(2); Phoebus Apollo Aviation (supra) at paras 9–10.

[4] See Carmichele (supra) at paras 55–6 ('Not only must the common law be developed in a way that meets the FC s 39(2) objectives, but it must be done in a way most appropriate for the development of the common law within its own paradigm. There are notionally different ways to develop the common law [relevant to this case] under s 39(2) of the Constitution, all of which might be consistent with its provisions. Not all would necessarily be equally beneficial for the common law.')

[5] But see § 11.4*(c)* infra.

True, but the logic depends on a premise that some might think debatable. The logic takes for granted that legality is defeated by good faith mistakes of legal judgment by judges in the same way as it unquestionably is defeated by judicially uncorrected good faith mistakes of legal judgment by executive officials, and by legislatures with regard to constitutional limitations and requirements.[1] Are there reasons to doubt this premise?

From Fedsure and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, we understand that the constitutionalised principle of legality is meant to be made effective, as other legal norms are made effective, by judges enforcing the principle in litigated cases. Now, for a judge to apply the principle of legality to a case in litigation is nothing other than for that judge to decide whether certain questioned actions of other persons or bodies have or have not been conducted according to law. But the judge doing that is simply doing, on that particular occasion, what every judge is expected to do in every single case that ever may come before her: do the best she can to discern the relevant law correctly, and apply that law correctly, to the acts of the parties and others connected to the case.

Suppose we feel sure that the High Court judges in a particular case have decided the case in good faith and well within the bounds of legal competence. But suppose we also — being competent lawyers ourselves — disagree strongly with their rulings of law or with their applications of the law to the facts. Would it occur to us to think or to say that the judges had broken some principle of legality or the rule of law, just because we, with conviction, would have decided the matter differently? Surely not. What the rule of law requires of judges is legal competence and good faith, and mere error of legal judgment is a sign of a lack of neither. Of course, it is always open to an appellate court to find that any given lower court judgment has been rendered in bad faith or with gross incompetence. Such a finding, however, is tantamount to a finding of corrupt, malicious, or manifestly negligent conduct by the judge below, and so would require nullification of the tainted judicial handiwork quite aside from any highfalutin 'principle of legality.' Therefore (it might be said), it can make no sense — it would be purely redundant — to apply the legality principle to the acts of judges deciding cases. Perhaps judges engaged in the normal judicial business of deciding cases according to law should not, in that specific sense, be regarded as public officials wielding official powers.

We need not here resolve the merits of such a view. What we can say is that the CC's jurisdictionally framed dismissals of the appeals in Metcash and Phoebus Apollo Aviation suggest that possibly the CC has adopted it. In Metcash, the CC offered the observation that 'the judicial system in any democracy has to rely on decisions taken in good faith by judges' as a reason why the bare fact of an erroneous judicial decision cannot give rise to a constitutional complaint.[2] Both cases show

[1] See Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 89 ('The fact that the President mistakenly believed that it was appropriate to bring the Act into force, and acted in good faith in doing so, does not put the matter beyond the reach of the Court's powers of review. What the Constitution requires is that public power vested in the executive and other functionaries be exercised in an objectively rational manner.')

[2] Metcash (supra) at para 19.

how, accepting this view, the CC can contrive to give effect to a real and substantial restriction imposed on its subject-matter competence by FC s 167(3), even with the principle of legality constantly looming as a part of constitutional law capable of giving rise to a 'constitutional matter'.[1]

11.3 The Causes of the Constitutionalisation of the Legality Principle

(a) Introduction

The plain fact remains that the CC's folding of the legality principle into the justiciable positive law laid down by the Final Constitution sits uneasily alongside the CC's own recognition that its charter is limited by FC s 167(3) to 'constitutional matters,' presumably meaning some proper subset of all the litigable matters there are. The CC is explicit that, with the legality principle in tow, its jurisdiction extends to every single case in which 'the control of public power' is at issue,[2] not excluding cases in which the only laws of which infractions are claimed are pieces of ordinary statute law or of common law,[3] and also not excluding cases in which the only claim against the exercise of power is that no law can be found to authorize it.[4]

At least to that extent, acceptance of the legality principle as a constitutionally enacted restraint on power — as distinct from a doctrine having common-law status only — exerts expansive pressure on the CC's jurisdiction, relative to the scope of jurisdiction that one might naively expect would accrue to a supposedly specialized 'constitutional' court; and, in fact — as we soon shall see — the CC's recognition of the legality principle as a piece of enacted constitutional law undoubtedly was meant to have exactly such an effect. It is in order, therefore, to ask what circumstances might have impelled, and what considerations might justify, this turn in constitutional-legal doctrine, which has the effect of very nearly transforming the CC into a court of general jurisdiction (insofar as it might see fit to act in such a capacity), contrary to the design that is apparent on the face of the Final Constitution.

[1] We are concerned in this chapter with the legality principle's implications for the outer bounds of the CC's authority in terms of 'constitutional matters,' should the Court choose to take cognizance of a case. This question is to be distinguished from other, important questions concerning the CC's management of its authority — concerning, for example, when appeals will be steered to the Supreme Court of Appeal as a matter of Court rule, policy, and practice, and when High Court decisions will be left standing without substantive review. See Snyckers (supra) at 595–596. These management questions, important as they are, are beyond the scope of our treatment here.

[2] Bato (supra) at para 22 ('In Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) [a] unanimous Court held that under our new constitutional order the control of public power is always a constitutional matter.') See S Woolman & D Brand 'Is There a Constitution in this Courtroom? Constitutional Jurisdiction after Afrox and Walters' (2003) 18 SAPL 38 (Authors concur that the CC's reasoning in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers entails, in effect, that 'all manifestations of public power engage[s] the rule of law, and thus the Final Constitution.')

[3] Bato (supra) at para 22.

[4] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers stands for this proposition.

To ask about the origins or causes of the constitutionalisation of the legality principle is to ask not one question but two. From the internal standpoint of the CC or anyone seeking sympathetically to account for its actions, the question is one of justification: How might it be thought that the CC does best by the Final Constitution's drafters, or by its constituency more broadly conceived, to conclude that the Final Constitution has enacted the legality principle as a component of judicially cognizable constitutional law, despite the trouble that makes for the jurisdictional plan that is plain on the face of the instrument? From the external standpoint of a historian, the question would be different: What factors caused or led to that action by the CC? What factors actually prompted the CC to draw the conclusion that the Final Constitution has enacted the legality principle as a component of judicially cognizable constitutional law?

(b) The straight historical account

There is, of course, a good chance that answers to the two questions will overlap. Usually, if we try to list the main, proximate causes for some legal-interpretative choice made by a court, we'll want to include in our list certain facts regarding the judges' beliefs about which choice would be the right one, legally speaking. The judges, we think, will have acted as they did because, as matter of fact, they held certain beliefs about how they, as judges of the law, ought to act in the circumstances. Having identified these beliefs as best we can, we may or may not find them consonant with what we ourselves would approve as the best legal judgment. Insofar as we do so approve them, that part of our causal explanation for the judicial act ('they did it because they thought it was normatively justified for such-and-such reasons') will, for us, subsume a justification for that act.

But the normative convictions of the judges, however well warranted we may find them to be, need not ever stand in our eyes as the sole cause for a court's interpretative act, nor would historians be likely to find such convictions the sole cause of the specific judicial act that concerns us here. From the standpoint of narrative history, one plain proximate cause of the CC's pronouncements in Fedsure and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers nailing down the constitutional-legal status of the principle of legality was a simmering turf war between it and the SCA.[1]

This was not exactly an openly declared struggle, and indeed it is sometimes hard to tell whether a given adjudicatory episode is turf-war related or not. Take for example the SCA's decision in Amod v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accidents Fund.[1] Decisions from pre-transition days had taken the view that 'potentially polygamous' (even if de facto monogamous) marriages according to Muslim rites, being contra bonos mores, give rise to no obligations enforceable in South African civil courts.[2] In Amod, Mahomed CJ found, to the contrary, that South African boni mores could no longer be found scandalised by de facto monogamous Muslim rite marriages.

[1] See S Woolman & D Brand 'Is There a Constitution in this Courtroom? Constitutional Jurisdiction after Afrox and Walters' (2003) 18 SAPL 38. On the 'widespread perception of a rivalry' between the two courts, the factual bases for it, and some reasons for deploring it, see J van der Walt 'Progressive Indirect Horizontal Application of the Bill of Rights: Towards a Co-operative Relation between Common-law and Constitutional Jurisprudence' (2001) 17 SAJHR 342, 358 (J van der Walt 'Towards a Co-operative Relation'). Tussles between a dedicated CC and an 'ordinary' judiciary have occurred in other legal systems. See AJ van der Walt Constitutional Property Clauses: A Comparative Analysis (1999) 141–5 (Describing a running disagreement in Germany between the Federal Constitutional Court and the civil courts over the availability of monetary compensation as a remedy for constitutionally improper regulation of property).

Three years previously, in Ryland v Edros, Farlam J had ruled to similar effect in the High Court.[3] Both Farlam J and Mahomed CJ relied on the Constitution to help overcome what otherwise apparently would have been a serious doubt about whether any intervening factual shift in the social ethos had occurred, sufficient to support a departure from the established doctrine that Muslim-rite marriages are contra bonos mores.[4] They did so, however, in different ways. Farlam J explained that he was acting in compliance with the Interim Constitution's command to the judiciary to develop the common law with due regard to the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[5] Mahomed CJ, by contrast, denied that his judgment was in any way dictated by the Interim Constitution or was, in fact, anything other than a normal, common-law adjustment of the content of boni mores to keep pace with objective social conditions, including facts about the prevailing social ethos.[6] To Mahomed CJ, adoption of the Constitution was significant in the Amod case not by reason of any legal command the Interim Constitution might have directed to the judiciary to revise the boni mores doctrine as previously applied to Muslim rite marriages, but just as a historical fact evincing a relevant, factual change in the prevailing social ethos.

What might account for the differing approaches of Mahomed CJ in Amod and Farlam J in Ryland? Perhaps an answer lies in part in their different locations in the judicial hierarchy. Farlam J might have entertained some doubt regarding a High Court's authority — constitutional mandates aside — to revise clear Appellate Division precedent regarding the bearing of boni mores on Muslim-rite marriage cases.[7] Mahomed CJ could not have doubted the authority of the SCA to do

[1] 1999 (4) SA 1319 (SCA)('Amod').

[2] See Ismail v Ismail 1983 (1) SA 1006 (A)('Ismail').

[3] 1997 (2) SA 690 (C), [1996] 413 All SA 557 (C), 1997 (1) BCLR 77 (C)('Ryland')

[4] Ibid at 704 (As Farlam J put the matter, 'In the present case it would be difficult to find that there has been such a change in the general sense of justice of the community as to justify a refusal to follow the Ismail decision if it were not for the new Constitution. In the circumstances I prefer to base my decision on the fundamental alteration in regard to the basic values on which our civil policy is based which has been brought about by the enactment and coming into operation of the new Constitution.')

[5] IC s 35(3). See Ryland (supra) at 705 ('In my view it is clear that if the spirit, purport and objects of chap 3 of the [Interim] Constitution and the basic values underlying it are in conflict with the view as to public policy expressed and applied in the Ismail case then the values underlying chap 3 . . . must prevail.')

[6] See Amod (supra) at para 29 ('I have reached [my] conclusion without any reliance on either s 35(3) of the Interim Constitution or s 39(2) of the 1996 Constitution. It is therefore unnecessary for me to consider the submission of Counsel for the appellant based on these constitutional provisions.')

[7] In fact, Farlam J's apparent assumption that IC s 35(3) was the key to unlock High Courts from bondage to Appellate Division (later Supreme Court of Appeal) precedent later was rejected by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Afrox. That rejection has a bearing on the division of authority between the CC and the Supreme Court of Appeal. If High Courts are barred from taking the initiative to develop the

so. The fact remains that Mahomed CJ had the choice to follow the path marked out by Farlam J — indeed, a prior CC decision in the case had clearly anticipated that the SCA would do just that[1] — and for some reason chose not to take that course. What might have been that reason?

In the view of many, a major share of instances of common-law reconstruction impelled by FC s 39(2), at least in the near term, are likely to be cases involving applications of boni mores and other general common law standards such as good faith and unconscionability.[2] Mahomed CJ's judgment in Amod provides a model for High Court and SCA judges who might wish to package any given (or every) judgment of this kind so as ostensibly to keep it out of the class of constitutional matters, with a view to reserving for the SCA final control over this important stream of impending future cases.[3]

Was that any part of Mahomed CJ's purpose or intention in packaging his Amod judgment as he did? It would be rash to say so, because there is a clear and adequate alternative explanation for his choice. By placing his judgment in Amod squarely on non-constitutional grounds, Mahomed CJ — as he explained — avoided what could have been thorny questions about application of IC s 35(3) or FC s 39(2) to a case in which the cause of action arose prior to commencement of the Interim Constitution.[4]

Regardless of intention, however, the SCA's Amod judgment suggests a device of potentially broad applicability by which the SCA, if ever minded to do so, might seek to insulate its judgments in constitutionally sensitive territory from review by the CC. In that way, Amod prefigures the possible outbreak of open contestation between the SCA and the CC over final authority in important branches of South African jurisprudence. Such contestation did break out soon thereafter, and the bone of contention was the SCA's attempted use — this time unquestionably with jurisdiction-expanding intentions — of a device very similar to that suggested by its Amod judgment.

Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council was decided under the Interim Constitution. The case involved an attack on the lawfulness of property rate levies by certain local government authorities on the ground (among others) that the levies in question were ultra vires, common law in the face of entrenched AD precedent, then a High Court-to-Constitutional Court channel (High Court revises common law, CC affirms on direct appeal) cannot be set up to circumvent the Supreme Court of Appeal. See Woolman & Brand (supra) at 38–83 (On how the CC's and SCA's views on both constitutional jurisdiction and stare decisis conspire to block the development of the common law.) The CC still could revise the common law on its own hook, so to speak, on direct appeals from High Court decisions failing to do so, but the CC has made clear its very substantial reluctance to act in that manner.

[1] See Amod v Multilateral Motor Accidents Fund 1998 (4) SA 753 (CC), 1998 (10) BCLR 1207 (CC) at paras 33–4.

[2] See, eg, J van der Walt 'Towards a Co-operative Relation' (supra) at 351–2; A J van der Walt 'Transformative Constitutionalism and the Development of South African Property Law' 2005 TSAR ('Transformative Constitutionalism').

[3] FC s 168(3) makes the Supreme Court of Appeal 'the highest court of appeal except in constitutional matters.'

[4] See Amod (supra) at para 29.

unauthorized by the terms of any applicable law.[1] The High Court had rejected this claim, and the SCA had referred to the CC the question of whether an appeal from the High Court's ruling would more properly be directed to the CC or the SCA. The doubt arose because the Interim Constitution not only limited the CC's subject-matter jurisdiction to constitutional matters,[2] it also — unlike the Final Constitution — excluded the Appellate Division (predecessor of the SCA) from deciding any constitutional matter[3] (aside from developing the common law under the aegis of IC s 35(3).[4]) If, but only if, ultra vires was considered to be a subsisting doctrine of the common law, as separate and distinct from law laid down by the Interim Constitution, the correctness of the High Court's rejection of the ultra vires claim apparently would fall to be decided exclusively and finally by the SCA.

The CC held, to the contrary, that the ultra vires claim raised a constitutional matter, so that review in this case fell properly to it and not the SCA. At no point does the Interim Constitution state in so many words that a local government may act only within the powers lawfully conferred upon it. The Fedsure Court nevertheless reasoned that it is 'a fundamental principle of the rule of law, recognised widely, that the exercise of public power is only legitimate where lawful,' and 'this principle of legality' is 'generally understood to be a fundamental principle of constitutional law.'[5] The Fedsure Court explained further:

> It seems central to the conception of our constitutional order that the legislature and executive in every sphere are constrained by the principle that they may exercise no power and perform no function beyond that conferred upon them by law. At least in this sense, then, the principle of legality is implied within the terms of the Interim Constitution. . . . We . . . hold that fundamental to the Interim Constitution is a principle of legality.[6]

The CC recognized, of course, that a principle opposed to ultra vires government action was a part of the pre-Constitutional common law, and one that 'remain[s] under the new constitutional order.'[7] But the old doctrine now enjoys a new sort of support in the legal firmament. It is now 'underpinned (and supplemented where necessary)' by a principle of legality that is 'implicit in the Constitution.'[8] (With an apparent eye to the future, the Fedsure Court took note

[1] A second ground of attack was that the procedures by which the rate-levy resolutions were adopted failed to satisfy the requirements of IC s 24, which applied to 'administrative action.' The CC concluded that the local government actions in this case were 'legislative,' not 'administrative,' so IC s 24 fell away from the case. See Fedsure (supra) at paras 41–2.

[2] IC s 98(2).

[3] See FC s 101(5) ('The Appellate Division shall have no jurisdiction to adjudicate any matter within the jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court'.)

[4] See Du Plessis v De Klerk 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC)('Du Plessis'). See also Woolman & Brand (supra) at 42 (Authors note that most jurists and commentators did not, in fact, believe the AD possessed even this limited power of constitutional review until the CC enunciated that position in Du Plessis v De Klerk.)

[5] Fedsure (supra) at para 56.

[6] Ibid at para 58.

[7] Ibid at para 59.

[8] Ibid.

that the FC s 1*(c)*, declares 'supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law' to be a founding value of the Republic.[1])

It would follow that the CC possessed jurisdiction in Fedsure and other cases like it. But would it necessarily follow that the SCA lacked jurisdiction in the case, by force of the Interim Constitution's exclusion of the Appellate Division from adjudicating 'any matter within the jurisdiction of the CC?' Conceivably not, if ultra vires survives as a common-law doctrine with a footing outside as well as inside the Interim Constitution.

Today, of course, the question must take a somewhat different form. It is no longer a question of who can exercise jurisdiction but of whose decision will be final. Today, the SCA is competent in constitutional as well as non-constitutional matters. However, by force of FC s 168(3)[2] and by clear implication of FC s 167(3), the SCA's decisions in constitutional matters are reviewable by the CC, whereas its decisions in non-constitutional matters are not. Thus, if ultra vires and other dimensions of the common-law doctrine of legality still retain a separate life outside the Final Constitution — a kind of Captain's Paradise of legal doctrine — that might arguably leave the SCA room to render its judgments on 'legality' claims in a form resistant to possible reversal by the CC.[3] In the Fedsure litigation, the SCA raised a possibility of this kind in a tentative way[4] and the CC clearly gestured toward a rejection of it,[5] but there was no occasion to resolve the question definitively.

The posture of the SCA turned more aggressive in Container Logistics.[6] The applicants contended that the responsible official had acted arbitrarily — had failed properly to 'apply his mind' — in holding them liable for certain import duties. They couched this contention both as a common law and as a constitutional claim. Agreeing with the contention on the merits, and concluding that 'at common law such a finding provides sufficient reason to set the decision aside,' the SCA declined to decide whether the questioned administrative action also, for the same reason, fell foul of IC s 24.[7] There can be little doubt that the SCA, by disposing of the case in this manner, expected or hoped to make its decision

[1] Fedsure (supra) at para 59.

[2] FC s 168(3) declares the Supreme Court of Appeal to be 'the highest court of appeal except in constitutional matters.'

[3] Compare the discussion of Amod (supra).

[4] See Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1998 (2) SA 1115, 1124 (SCA), 1998 (6) BCLR 671, 678 (SCA) ('It could conceivably be argued that the Interim Constitution did not exclude the jurisdiction of the Appellate Division to adjudicate on the cogency of any attack on administrative actions where such attacks are based on common-law grounds, and that the Appellate Division continues to enjoy some kind of parallel jurisdiction with the Constitutional Court where the relevant attack is founded on common-law grounds. I have some doubt as to whether this would be a sound argument.')

[5] See Fedsure (supra) at para 103.

[6] Commissioner for Customs and Excise v Container Logistics (Pty) Ltd; Commissioner for Customs and Excise v Rennies Group Ltd t/a Renfreight 1999 (3) SA 771 (SCA), 1999 (8) BCLR 833 (SCA)('Container Logistics').

[7] Ibid at para 21.

proof against further examination by the CC. As the SCA explained its stand in Container Logistics:

> Judicial review under the Constitution and under the common law are different concepts. . . . Constitutional review is concerned with the constitutional legality of administrative action, the question in each case being whether it is or is not consistent with the Constitution, and the only criterion being the Constitution itself. Judicial review under the common law is essentially also concerned with the legality of administrative action but the question in each case is whether the action under consideration is in accordance with the behests of the empowering statute and the requirements of natural justice. The enquiry in this regard is not governed by a single criterion. The grounds for review which the courts have developed over the years can never be regarded as a numerus clausus for the simple reason that administrative law is not static. As new notions develop and take root, so must new measures be devised to control the exercise of [official] functions. . . .[1]

The SCA conceded freely that 'it is difficult to conceive of a case where the question of legality cannot ultimately be reduced to a question of constitutionality.'[2] It nevertheless insisted that the common-law grounds for review had not 'ceased to exist.' The SCA could detect in the Interim Constitution no indication of an intention 'to bring about a situation in which, once a court finds that administrative action was not in accordance with the empowering legislation or the requirements of natural justice, interference is only permissible on constitutional grounds.'[3] (This, of course, meant 'only on grounds regarding which the CC has final powers of review.')

The stage thus was set for the CC's final riposte in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers. Acting on mistaken and disastrous bureaucratic advice, the President, as authorized by a certain Act of Parliament, issued a proclamation bringing the Act into force. Discovering the error, the President applied to the courts for an order annulling the proclamation and its effect. The High Court granted the requested order on the ground that the issuance of the proclamation was, in the circumstances, an ultra vires action by the President. The CC had to decide whether it had jurisdiction to review the High Court's ruling or whether, to the contrary, such jurisdiction would fall exclusively to the SCA to decide as court of last resort.

The CC answered by upholding its own jurisdiction. The High Court's finding of ultra vires action by the President, the CC concluded, was ineluctably 'a finding on a constitutional matter.'[4] In the course of explaining this conclusion, the CC conveyed its flat and final rejection of the SCA's sally in Container Logistics regarding the survival of the common law doctrine of legality as an extra-constitutional ground for judicial decision.

In a sense, the CC began, 'the control of public power by the courts through judicial review is and always has been a constitutional matter,' but now:

[1] Container Logistics (supra) at para 20.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 20.

> [t]he common law principles that previously provided the grounds for judicial review of public power have been subsumed under the Constitution, and in so far as they might continue to be relevant to judicial review, they gain their force from the Constitution. In the judicial review of public power, the two are intertwined and do not constitute separate concepts.[1]

The CC found unacceptable any suggestion that the common law subsists as a body of norms 'separate and distinct from the Constitution':

> There are not two systems of law, ... each operating in its own field with its own highest court. There is only one system of law. It is shaped by the Constitution which is the supreme law, and all law, including the common law, derives its force from the Constitution and is subject to constitutional control ... Whereas previously constitutional law formed part of and was developed consistently with the common law, the roles have been reversed. The written Constitution articulates and gives effect to the governing principles of constitutional law. Even if the common law constitutional principles continue to have application in matters not expressly dealt with by the Constitution, (and that need not be decided in this case) the Constitution is the supreme law and the common law, in so far as it has any application, must be developed consistently with it, and subject to constitutional control.[2]

No text in the Final Constitution intimates otherwise. Indeed, the CC continued, IC ss 33(3)[3] and 35(3) and FC s 39(3)[4] and (2) imply the contrary proposition:[5]

> The reference in s 33(3) of the Interim Constitution and s 39(3) of the 1996 Constitution is to 'other rights', and not to rights enshrined in the respective Constitutions themselves. That there are rights beyond those expressly mentioned in the Constitution does not mean that there are two systems of law. Nor would this follow from the reference in s 35(3) of the Interim Constitution and s 39(2) of the 1996 Constitution to the development of the common law. The common law supplements the provisions of the written Constitution but derives its force from it. It must be developed to fulfil the purposes of the Constitution and the legal order that it proclaims — thus, the command that law be developed and interpreted by the courts to promote the 'spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.' ... There is, however, only one system of law and within that system the Constitution is the supreme law with which all other law must comply.

The CC thus established, once and for all, that the SCA cannot insulate a decision on legality from CC review by dressing it as a merely common law (and hence not a constitutional) decision. But the CC's declarations in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers did

[1] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 33.

[2] Ibid at paras 44–45 (footnote omitted).

[3] IC s 33(3) read: 'The entrenchment of the rights in terms of this Chapter shall not be construed as denying the existence of any other rights or freedoms recognized or conferred by common law, customary law, or legislation to the extent that they are not inconsistent with this Chapter.'

[4] FC s 39(3) reads: 'The Bill of Rights does not deny the existence of any other rights or freedoms that are recognised or conferred by common law, customary law or legislation, to the extent that they are consistent with the Bill.'

[5] The CC at this point was responding to remarks of the Supreme Court of Appeal made in Container Logistics. See Container Logistics (supra) at para 20.

more. They pronounced emphatically a doctrine of the unity of all South African law under the aegis and control of the Final Constitution, which has important further implications, to be explored below.

(c) The justificatory account

In Fedsure and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, the CC conferred upon the legality principle the status of a constitutional matter falling within the purview of the CC's special powers and responsibilities in the new constitutional order. The Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Court took this course despite the fact that doing so goes far to undercut the principle of a contained subject-matter competence for the CC, to which the Court also professes loyalty. It did so, moreover, at least initially as a matter of 'implication' in the absence of any plain-to-the-naked-eye textual compulsion.[1]

Of course there may be good grounds for such an implication. We next consider what such grounds might be.

The most promising line of justification for the implication appears to lie in the following four claims:

1. An interpretation of the Final Constitution is justified if (a) it is conducive to the Final Constitution's scheme of ends and means whereas rejection of that interpretation possibly would pose a hindrance to that scheme and (b) the interpretation is one that otherwise is open to a court under general, non-literalist principles of legal interpretation.
2. Among the Final Constitution's chief ends is the pursuit of social transformation in South Africa through the medium of law. Among its chosen means to that end is the establishment of a new and distinct branch of the South African judiciary — the CC — to serve as special judicial guardian of the Final Constitution's transformative function.
3. Survival of the legality principle in post-Constitutional South African law is required by general considerations of legal policy and by the Final Constitution's most central aims.
4. Survival of the legality principle as a doctrine of the common law independent of the Final Constitution would carry risks of endangerment of the CC's special guardianship role.

Claim 1 asserts, in effect, a purposive or teleological approach to constitutional interpretation. Claim 2 asserts a brace of leading and pervasive constitutional purposes by which interpretation accordingly should be guided, related to each other as a means (protection of the special guardianship role of the CC) to an end (the Final Constitution's socially transformative aim). Claims 3 and 4 combine to assert that this brace of purposes is assisted by acceptance of the doctrine of the constitutional-legal status of the legality principle and might stand to be endangered by rejection of that doctrine.

[1] See § 11.1 supra.

The CC has adhered consistently, from the outset of its work, to the sort of teleological approach to constitutional interpretation affirmed by claim 1.[1] In this respect, the CC's decisions and opinions in Fedsure and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers call for no special justification. Those opinions, moreover, show convincingly that the inference of a constitution-based, justiciable principle of legality is one that is neither precluded by the Final Constitution's text nor apparently out of kilter with main themes of that text. The merit of the inference, as a matter of purposive interpretation, thus will rise and fall with the cogency and strength of claims 2, 3, and 4.

To those claims we now turn. The brace of constitutional purposes affirmed by Claim 2 are discussed below in subsection (i). Claim 3 is the subject of subsection (ii), and Claim 4 of subsection (iii).

(i) The 'transformative' character of the Final Constitution and the special role of the Constitutional Court

Some constitutions may be called primarily preservative, in the sense that their aim is to consolidate and memorialise in the law, in a relatively enduring form, 'a historical consensus of values and aspirations evolved incrementally from a stable and unbroken past.'[2] Other constitutions are primarily transformative, aimed at bringing to pass a societal future that will differ 'starkly' and 'dramatically' from a decisively rejected past.[3] The CC has declared time and again its view that the Final Constitution it sits to construe and apply is of the transformative kind,[4] a view with which there has been and seemingly could be little or no serious disagreement. The Court also has repeatedly conveyed — perhaps most dramatically in President of the Republic & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others — its understanding that it was brought into being for the particular purpose of ensuring that judicial applications of the new Constitution would not falter from the transformative commitment.[5] No doubt other branches of the judiciary

[1] See L du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2005) Chapter 3.

[2] S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 262 ('Makwanyane')(Mahomed J). Compare Michael H v Gerald D 491 US 110, 141 (1989)(Scalia J, in effect, classified the US Constitution as preservative — its purpose being not to 'enable this Court to insert new [values],' but rather, to the contrary, to 'prevent future generations from lightly casting aside traditional values.') See also C R Sunstein Designing Democracy: What Constitutions Do (2001) 67–8; L Lessig Code and Other Laws of Cyberspace (1999).

[3] Makwanyane (supra) at 262. A transformative constitutional vision does not ignore the values of continuity. It retains from the past whatever is 'defensible' in the envisioned future. See K Klare 'Legal Culture and Transformative Constitutionalism' (1998) 14 SAJHR 146; D Moseneke, 'The Fourth Bram Fischer Memorial Lecture: Transformative Adjudication' (2002) 18 SAJHR 309; A J van der Walt 'Transformative Constitutionalism (supra).

[4] See Mkontwana v Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality & Another 2005 (1) SA 530 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 150 (CC) at para 81 ('Mkontwana')(O'Regan J)('As this Court has emphasised on many occasions, our Constitution is a document committed to social transformation.') are expected to work toward the same end,[1] but a special responsibility to secure it has devolved upon the CC.

[5] 1999 (4) SA 147 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 725 (CC) at paras 73–6.

Both reason and history support that understanding. Let us, however, be clear that they do so only in a historically contingent way. One cannot simply say that the sentiment for transformation, dominant as it was at the moment of constitution-making, compelled or determined South Africa's choice in favour of a justiciable constitution under which judges would act as powerful agents of change. Whether, in given historical conditions, judicial constitutional review is an aid or a barrier to social transformation can be, for obvious reasons, a hotly disputed and reasonably disputable question.[2] Judicial review patently can be a device for impeding or 'slowing down' majority rule, and slowing down post-transition majority rule in South Africa was not beyond all possibility of argument the most expeditious route to transformative results.[3] Yet substantial reasons can be summoned to support such a choice[4] and — this really is the only point that matters just now for our discussion — the choice for justiciability is the choice that South Africans indubitably have made. The Final Constitution says so, redundantly, in words too plain to brook any question.[5] (On some views, the mere inclusion of 'the rule of law' among the Final Constitution's founding values would have sufficed to establish the Final Constitution's justiciability.[6])

Once the die is cast for a justiciable constitution, the question necessarily follows of how to organize the country's judiciary for optimal performance in

[1] See Nontembiso Norah Kate v Member of the Executive Council for the Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape Case No 1907/03 (SEC)('Nontembiso') at para 16. Froneman J wrote:

> All courts, including the High Court, are enjoined by the Constitution to uphold the rights of all, to ensure compliance with constitutional values, and to do so by granting 'appropriate relief', 'just and equitable orders', and by developing the common law 'taking into account the interests of justice'. In a new constitutional democracy such as ours that means that courts have to devise means of protecting and enforcing fundamental rights that were not recognized under the common law. . . . [Neither difficulties of practical implementation nor regard for the separation of powers] may . . . serve as an excuse for failing to fashion and enforce new remedies simply because they did not exist under the common law. In these situations the judge who fails to examine the existing law with a view to ensuring the effective realisation of constitutional rights and values that were not recognised before is not, as is often presumed by proponents of this course, merely neutrally and objectively applying the law. That will only ever be true if the existing common law proceeds from a fair and equal baseline, an assumption that will not often be open to the present judiciary in South Africa in cases such as the present, given our unequal past.

[2] See H Klug Constituting Democracy (2000) 181; P Lenta 'Democracy, Rights Disagreements and Judicial Review' (2004) 20 SAJHR 1.

[3] Cf R M Unger What Should Legal Analysis Become? (1996) 164–5 (Speaking of 'constitutional arrangements that slow down transformative politics.')

[4] See Lenta (supra) at 30.

[5] See FC, Preamble ('We . . . adopt this Constitution as the supreme law of the Republic . . .'); FC s 1*(c)* (Including 'supremacy of the constitution and the rule of law' among the Republic's founding values); FC s 2 ('This Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic; law or conduct inconsistent with it is invalid, and the obligations imposed by it must be fulfilled.'); FC ss 167(3)(b), 168(3), 168*(a)*(Respectively empowering the CC, the Supreme Court of Appeal, and the High Courts to 'decide' constitutional matters.)

[6] See H Botha (supra) at 524–5.

light of the Final Constitution's aims and purposes. In South Africa, any answer to that question inevitably must reflect the primarily transformative role envisioned for the Final Constitution. Insofar as the judiciary has a share in the work of effectuating the Final Constitution's purposes, a leadership role within the judiciary respecting that work necessarily will carry over from the old regime if it is not explicitly assigned by the new Constitution. Those in whose eyes the new Constitution was meant to play a primarily transformative, not preservative, role in their country's legal and other affairs would have been leery of leaving judicial leadership in constitutional matters in the hands of judges and tribunals carried over from the old, repudiated regime and possibly imbued with its thoughtways and habits.[1] We should not be surprised, then, to find them choosing to turn over final judicial authority in constitutionally sensitive matters to a new tribunal, staffed with members freshly chosen for the purpose and conscious of having been thus chosen.[2] Historical accounts confirm that it was for precisely such a reason that introduction of the CC into the South African judicial constellation became a key component in the hard-bargained constitutional settlement of 1993.[3]

(ii) The impulse and need for retention of a general principle of legality after the onset of the Bill of Rights

Even under the most muscular judicial deployments of the doctrine of legality that Westminster legal history has known, the co-doctrine of parliamentary supremacy meant that plainly worded law having a parliamentary provenance prevailed over constitutional common law in case of any apparent inconsistency regarding authorization or restriction of official action. It meant, in other words, that Parliament was free to set the terms for lawful official action however it might choose, assuming it spoke with sufficient clarity, up to and including empowerment of officials to act arbitrarily under any or all possible common-law senses of that term.

Parliamentary supremacy, needless to say, was ousted from South Africa by the [1] See Van der Walt 'Transformative Constitutionalism' (supra).

[2] See Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 54 (The CC . . . . 'occupies a special place in [the] new constitutional order. It was established as part of that order as a new court with no links to the past, to be the highest court in respect of all constitutional matters, and as such, the guardian of our Constitution. . . . The Constitution contains special provisions dealing with the manner in which the judges of this Court are to be appointed and their tenure which are different to the provisions dealing with other judicial officers. It has exclusive jurisdiction in respect of certain constitutional matters, and makes the final decision on those constitutional matters that are also within the jurisdiction of other courts.') constitutional upheaval of 1993-94.[1] Subjecting Parliament itself to a principle of legality is, after all, everywhere understood to be the first and foremost point of replacing a Westminster-style regime with 'constitutionalism' in the form of a supreme-law type of justiciable, written constitution. Constitutionalism in that form, we may say, is the idea of legality writ large.[2] And so coiled within the very certainty that the onset of constitutionalism destroys parliamentary supremacy lies the certainty that its implication for a legal system's prior existing principle of legality must be exactly the opposite.

[3] See R Spitz & M Chaskalson The Politics of Transition (2000) 191–209; Klug (supra) at 140–2; H Klug 'Historical Background' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2005) Chapter 2.

Enactment of a constitutionalist constitution, cannot — it simply cannot — be read to have the effect of leaving the country's corpus juris bereft of a legality principle it formerly possessed.[3] If, as was true in South Africa, the principle had fallen into a state of disrepair during the times preceding the constitutional transition, then the new Constitution's aim must be to salvage and restore the principle, not to erase it.[4] So if the new, written Constitution's roster of textually enumerated legal guarantees leaves some significant extension of legality uncovered, the impulse will be strong to be read that principle fully into the instrument by implication or by exegesis, or else — at the very least — to confirm legality's survival as a robust common law doctrine. No other choice is plausibly available. That a new constitutionalist Constitution would crowd out legality as an operative legal norm is unthinkable.

The case of South Africa turns out to be one in which the roster of constitutionally enumerated guarantees does, in fact, leave some extensions of legality uncovered. The property clause — FC s 25(1) — inveighs against state acts lacking authorization by non-arbitrary laws, but it applies only to deprivations of [1] One important consequence of the replacement of parliamentary by constitutional supremacy is that the ultra vires branch of the legality principle no longer (as formerly) requires that governmental officials and bodies be able to justify their actions by chains of authorizations traceable to Acts of Parliament. Such powers now may be conferred directly by the Final Constitution. See, eg, Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association & Others 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC)(Discussed at § 11.3*(c)* infra); City of Cape Town & Another v Robertson & Another 2004 (5) SA 412 (C), 2004 (9) BCLR 950 (C)('Robertson') at paras 55–60 ('Now the conduct of a municipality is not always invalid only for the reason that no legislation authorises it. Its power my derive from the Constitution or from the legislation of a competent authority or from its own laws.')

[2] See Fedsure (supra) at para 58 (It is 'central to the conception of our constitutional order that the legislature and executive in every sphere are constrained by the principle that they may exercise no power and perform no function beyond that conferred on them by law.')

[3] See Hugo (supra) at para 28 ('It would be contrary to [the] promise [of a constitutional state contained in the Interim Constitution's Preamble] if the exercise of the presidential power [to issue pardons] is above the Interim Constitution and is not subject to the discipline of the Bill of Rights.')

[4] See H Botha 'The Legitimacy of Legal Orders (3): Rethinking the Rule of Law' (2001) 64 THRHR 523, 539 ('[T]he rule of law is not an a historical construct which stands in the way of democracy and the need to redress past injustices, but is rooted in the historical struggle of black South Africans for democracy and equal rights. . . . [T]he rule of law is vital in ensuring democratic accountability and in fighting social injustice.') property.[1] The equality clauses — IC s 8(1) and FC s 9(1) — are construed to prohibit arbitrary legislative differentiations or classifications[2] but they have nothing to say about other possible cases of legislative, executive, or administrative lawlessness. The administrative justice clauses — IC s 24 and FC s 33 — may be read to cover any or every dimension of legality where administrative action is involved; but 'administrative action' designates a delimited category of official actions; and while the limits may be uncertain and contested, there is no doubt that a non-negligible residue of official actions lies outside them. These clauses have nothing to say, for example, about lawless legislative action;[3] nor do they speak to whatever cases of executive action may be deemed to fall outside the 'administrative' category.[4]

In addition to picking up residual categories of official action that might not otherwise be covered, a generalised constitutional principle of legality probably carries some further, important implications pertaining to the judicial system, ones that might not be found contained in the more specific rights-granting clauses in the Bill of Rights. Such a principle has been found, for example, to imply the powers of courts to devise non-traditional remedies in response to failures by state officials to carry out judicial orders.[5] In sum, all relevant factors considered, it is entirely understandable that the CC should have concluded that a general or sweeping principle of legality must have survived the most recent constitutional upheaval in South African jurisprudence.

[1] For the CC's gloss on 'arbitrary', see First National Bank (supra) at paras 62–71, 97–100; Mkontwana (supra) at paras 44–64.

[2] Prinsloo v Van der Linde & Another 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at paras 25–6, 35–6, Harksen v Lane NO & Others 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 53. See New National Party of South Africa v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1997 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)('New National Party') at paras 19, 24 (In a case questioning a statutory classification, the New National Party Court conveyed its view that FC s 9(1) was not the only possible basis for a challenge on the ground of lack of rational connection to a valid governmental purpose. An additional basis for such a challenge, the Court said, is supplied by 'the rule of law which is a core value of the Constitution.' The New National Party Court cited Fedsure (supra) at paras 56–7 for this proposition.)

[3] See Fedsure (supra) at paras 41–2.

[4] A clear example is the President's exercise of powers to appoint officers and create commissions of inquiry, which the CC has held to be constitutionally reviewable under the implied principle of legality, although such exercises are not administrative action covered by FC s 33. See President of the Republic v South African Rugby Football Union 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC) at paras 146–7 ('SARFU'). One might also consider the President's exercise of his pardon power in Hugo and his statutorily granted power to proclaim a law into force in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers.

[5] See Nontembiso (supra) at paras 21, 25 ([T]he State and its organs have no powers outside that granted to it by the Constitution or by legislation complying with the Constitution. . . . So on what possible legal basis may any state organ refuse to implement a court order and expect the courts to recognize its legal right to do so? . . . It is one thing to realise the possibility as a matter of fact that the government might refuse to comply with court orders. It is something completely different to hold as a matter of law that courts are powerless to devise ways to ensure compliance with court orders in a constitutional state such as ours. . . . For the courts to do the latter would be to aid and abet unconstitutional government, the very antithesis of the courts 'duty in terms of the Constitution.')

(iii) The risks of locating the legality principle 'outside' the Final Constitution

The legality principle undoubtedly is a part of South African common law, and the Final Constitution takes pains to make clear that it does not displace or destroy pre-existing common law doctrines consistent with its spirit.[1] Accordingly, one might ask: For purposes of preserving in South African jurisprudence a sweeping principle of legality (were that the only end to be considered), might not a restoration of the common law principle to full vigour have sufficed, obviating any need to 'read up' the Bill of Rights by implying the legality principle into it as one of the Bill's protective clauses?[2]

The answer plainly would be 'no' insofar as one might perceive any substantial likelihood that some future Parliament, in a throwback to the old days, might see fit to legislate against a justiciable principle of legality. If or insofar as demands for adherence to legality are not protected by constitutional supreme law, parliamentary supremacy still holds with respect to such claims, just as with respect to any other legislative choices still left open by the constraints imposed by the Bill of Rights.

Be that as it may, the history we have reviewed suggests strongly that it is not any concern about possible parliamentary throwback that leads the CC to conclude that the legality principle now is irretrievably and inextricably a 'constitutional matter' in South Africa. For the CC, it is not enough to affirm that legality now is a justiciable guarantee of a supreme Constitution. No less urgent, in the CC's view, is the negative proposition that legality has not survived as a principle of the common law drawing breath, so to speak, on its own, outside the tent of the Final Constitution. What the CC has found itself driven to reject is the survival of legality in a legal form or medium that would leave the SCA in a position, sometimes, to pronounce with finality that an infringement of legality has occurred. The CC's apparent driving concern thus has not so much been a possible future deficit of legality as it has been a possible future surfeit of this presumptively good thing.

[1] See FC s 39(3): 'The Bill of Rights does not deny the existence of any other rights or freedoms that are recognised or conferred by common law, customary law or legislation, to the extent that they are consistent with the Bill.'

[2] See S v Zuma 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC)(Suggests this model). In Zuma, the CC dealt with a claim under IC s 25(3)(c)'s guarantee of an accused person's right to be presumed innocent and remain silent, and held unconstitutional a statutory provision placing the onus on an accused, in certain circumstances, to prove that a confession was not given voluntarily. The Zuma Court relied heavily on its view that South African common law as it existed prior to certain apartheid-era developments would have left the onus on the State regarding the voluntariness of any questioned confession. 'The concepts embodied in [s 25] are by no means an entirely new departure in South African criminal procedure,' wrote the Court. It continued: 'The presumption of innocence, the right of silence and the proscription of compelled confessions have for 150 years or more been recognised as basic principles of our law.' Granting that those common-law principles had 'to a greater or lesser degree been eroded by statute and in some cases by judicial decision.' The Zuma Court saw fit to appeal to them in their pre-eroded state as 'part of the background to IC s 25.' Ibid at para 12. It surely was with the pre-erosion principles in mind that the Zuma Court felt moved to declare that post-transition jurisprudence would not cast out or ignore 'all the principles of law which have hitherto governed our courts.' Those principles, the Zuma Court declared, 'obviously contain much of lasting value.' Ibid at para 17.

Our justificatory question, then, comes down to this: How might either the transformative commitment of the Final Constitution or the CC's role as special judicial guardian of that commitment be compromised by admitting the SCA to an autonomous, equal-footing partnership with the CC in policing compliance with legality by sundry governmental agencies and officials in South Africa?

It would not, mainly, be by way of some feared likelihood that the SCA would lean toward being too lenient, too ready to find compliance. That is not a significant worry, because the bar and the High Courts easily could be taught the lesson that, if you don't wish to risk the SCA unappealably rejecting your breach-of-legality claims or decisions, you have only to plead your claim, or base your decision, on constitutional and not merely common-law grounds and then the CC can have the last word whenever it sees fit. No, the main, driving concern would have to be that the SCA might sometimes uphold breach-of-legality claims on — and only on — common-law grounds, when those claims — in the eyes of the CC — are both debatable and possibly fraught with counter-transformative baggage.

To say that the Final Constitution was born with transformative ends in view is by no means to say that every legally defensible application of its requirements — much less of the requirements of a common-law corpus that the Final Constitution and its appointed judicial guardians do not control — is guaranteed to advance transformative ends as those most typically are envisioned. That is not how law works or possibly can work. It is not, to take the most obvious case in point, the way we expect a typical constitutional property clause to work,[1] much less the common law of property.[2] No more can one assume that every time a court in a debatable case finds in favour of a breach-of-legality claim the cause of transformation, as typically envisioned, will have been advanced rather than hindered.

A number of examples come to mind. Take City Council of Pretoria v Walker.[3] In that case, the CC, conscious of the need to construe the Interim Constitution consistently with its transformative purpose,[4] rejected a claim that the Council's temporary use of a different system for utility rate charges in 'Old Pretoria' than in two amalgamated former townships was an instance of unfair discrimination (against whites) on a racial ground, prohibited by IC s 8(2). But suppose the plaintiffs had thought to plead, as a common-law claim only, that the Council had acted in breach of legality or natural justice in regard to the differentiated-

[1] See A J Van der Walt Constitutional Property Clauses: A Comparative Analysis (1999).
[2] See A J Van der Walt 'Transformative Constitutionalism' (supra).
[3] 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC)('Walker').
[4] Ibid at paras 46, 53.

rates policy[1] and the SCA had agreed (just as the CC itself came close to doing in regard to another branch of the case).[2]

Bel Porto presents a comparable scenario.[3] The case involved a claim that administrative officials had acted arbitrarily, in contravention of the principle of legality,[4] in a highly transformation-charged context in which the parties complaining were historically privileged, historically all-white schools. Would it have been a true reading of the Final Constitution to conclude that the SCA might have reserved to itself the final word on the case by upholding the claim on, and only on, a common-law ground?

The question here, it must be emphasised, is about constitutionally contemplated process — or, more precisely, institutional arrangement. The question is not about which substantive ruling in a case like Bel Porto — for or against the claim of a breach of legality — would have comported better on the whole with constitutional values and directives. As to that substantive issue, opinions may differ; and anyway, for aught we know, the SCA, given the opportunity, would have decided it just as the CC did. The question we face here is different. It is about whether the Final Constitution, on the better reading, assigns to the Supreme Court of Appeal or to the CC the ultimate power of decision over debatable claims of breaches of legality.

For further illustration, we may consider Minister of Public Works and Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association and Others.[5] Neighbouring landowners challenged the legality of the government's plan to establish, on land owned by the state, temporary shelters for persons left homeless by floods. The applicants contended that the planned actions would be ultra vires and hence unlawful, there being no legislation authorizing the government to act thus in the circumstances. The CC, of course, accepted the applicants' premise that 'the principle of legality is implied within the terms of the Interim Constitution,' but it ruled nevertheless in the government's favour.[6]

In order to do so, the CC had to deny the applicability of certain existing statutes to the case at hand, because those statutes included certain conditions

[1] Walker (supra) at para 56 (The CC found it necessary to deflect a claim of that very sort: 'The failure to deal openly with residents in old Pretoria is not in keeping with the new values of public accountability, openness and democracy. It is conduct that deserves censure; it is however not the central issue in the dispute.')

[2] See Walker (supra) at para 76 ('[W]here a policy is deemed by s 8(4) to constitute unfair discrimination on a ground specified under s 8(2), the fact that the policy is contrary to a fair and rational council resolution and is implemented in secrecy and in contradiction of public statements issued by the council officials, makes the burden of proving the policy not to be unfair more difficult to discharge than it might otherwise have been.' Walker held unconstitutional the council's policy of dealing more harshly with rate-arrearages in Old Pretoria than in the ex-township areas.)

[3] Bel Porto School Governing Body & Others v Premier of the Province, Western Cape & Another 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC)('Bel Porto').

[4] Ibid at paras 120–1.

[5] 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC)('Kyalami').

[6] Ibid at para 35.

and requirements that the government plainly had not met.[1] But if, then, there was no applicable statutory framework, where was the 'law' to authorize the government's action with its alleged adverse impacts on the applicants? The Kyalami Court's answer found the authorizing law in the Final Constitution itself, taken together with the general common law of property ownership. By force of FC s 26 as construed in Government of the Republic and Others v Grootboom and Others,[2] the government is under legal obligation to take reasonable measures to come to the aid of persons in conditions of housing crisis. FC ss 85(2)(b) and (e) provide that the President's executive authority is exercised by 'implementing national … policy' and by 'performing any … executive function provided for in the Constitution.'[3] The CC confirmed the 'government's common law power to make its land available to flood victims pursuant to its constitutional duty to provide them with access to housing,'[4] and concluded that 'if regard is had to its constitutional obligations, to its rights as owner of the land, and to its executive power to implement policy decisions, [the government's] decision to establish a temporary transit camp for the victims of the flooding was lawful.'[5]

This reasoning lies well within the bounds of legal plausibility. Few, however, would regard it as legally inescapable. How absolutely certain can one be that another court would have come to a like conclusion had it been the court of last resort in this case? How worrisome should that question be to South African constitutionalists who respect the apparent plan of the Final Constitution to entrust judicial leadership in constitutionally sensitive affairs to the CC?[6] It is questions of that sort that the CC — or so we are suggesting — found itself confronting in Fedsure and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, when presented with the thought that the principle of legality might currently have a home outside the Final Constitution but still within South African law.

Significantly, it is not only the members of the CC and the SCA to whom such questions will occur but also the litigating public, and this fact gives cause for concern. Consider the controversy that erupted in 2004 between certain private parties (pharmaceutical manufacturers and retailers) and the Minister of Health

[1] Kyalami (supra) at paras 44, 49 (The Court found that none of those statutes was designed 'to regulate the temporary settlement of people rendered homeless by natural disaster.' Hence, they did not qualify or limit the government's exercise of any powers it might otherwise hold to provide shelter for flood victims and the government did not, by ignoring those statutes and their requirements, make itself chargeable with avoiding an applicable legislative framework and in that way 'acting arbitrarily or otherwise contrary to the rule of law.')

[2] 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom').

[3] Kyalami (supra) at para 40.

[4] Ibid at para 49.

[5] Ibid at para 52.

[6] Other recent cases illustrate the importance of the question. See Robertson (supra) at paras 66–71 (The CC reversed a finding by the High Court that applicable legislation had withheld from municipalities the power to levy property rates on the basis of a provisional valuation roll, in circumstances where the CC had found the dispute to be fraught with transformative consequence.) See also Affordable Medicines (supra) at paras 41–55 (The CC condered and rejected a claim that the Minister of Health exceeded the powers granted her by statute when she issued regulations linking licenses to dispense medicienes to particular locations whence the medicines are dispensed.)

over regulations issued by the Minister that would have imposed controls on prices, mark-ups, and dispensing fees for medicines. The private parties claimed that the regulations were, in various respects, unauthorized by the applicable legislation. When the High Court rejected these challenges, appeals obviously impended.[1] From the ensuing stances and skirmishings of the parties, it is evident that the two sides had strongly differing preferences respecting the venue of the first appeal — the Government preferring to have the CC review the merits directly and the private parties evidently believing that their prospects would be brightened — or at least any losses delayed — by securing first a judgment from the SCA.[2]

Because there could have been no possible question about the involvement in the case of constitutional matters — the case turned on questions of statutory interpretation that surely drew FC s 39(2) into play along with the guarantee of access to health care services in FC s 27 — it seemed bound to reach the CC sooner or later. For that reason, the parties' differences over whether it should or should not be routed first through the SCA probably were less acutely felt than they might have been if a judgment from the SCA would have been final. Now, final is just what an SCA judgment in this case could well have been, if the norm of legality had survived as the basis of an extra-constitutional objection to the regulation. We can see, then, that one benign consequence of the Fedsure/Pharmaceutical doctrine is to diminish the stakes in forum-shopping struggles. More fundamentally, one might hope that the establishment of secure roles for both the SCA and the CC in all contexts of legal disputes having even arguable constitutional sensitivity would tend over time to instill expectations of 'shared constitutional interpretation' in place of what have up to now been perceptions of a rivalrous relation between the two tribunals. Indefinite persistence into the future of the perception of rivalry cannot be a healthy thing for the rule of law in South Africa.[3]

[1] New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd v Msimang NO & Another; Pharmaceutical Society of South Africa & Others v Minister of Health & Another Case No 4128/2004 (C)('New Clicks HC'); and Pharmaceutical Society of South Africa & Others v Minister of Health & Another; New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd v Msimang NO & Another Case Nos 542/04 and 543/04 (SCA).

[2] See New Clicks HC (supra) at paras 3–14 (The stances and manoeuvres are described in detail in the Supreme Court of Appeal's opinion.)

[3] See J van der Walt 'Progressive Indirect Horizontal Application of the Bill of Rights: Towards a Co-operative Relation between Common-law and Constitutional Jurisprudence' (2001) 17 SAJHR 342, 362–3 ('A widespread perception of a rivalry between the two top courts in a legal system obviously casts doubt on the quality of the administration of justice in the country concerned.') On the virtues and benefits of shared interpretation, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) § 31.4*(e)*(vii); M Dorf & B Friedman 'Shared Constitutional Interpretation' (2000) 2000 Sup Ct R 61. Woolman, Dorf, and Friedman have conceived of shared interpretation as sharing responsibility for constitutional meaning-making between the judicial and legislative branches of government. We here extend their thought to such sharing between branches of the judiciary. (Here is where welcoming rules of engagement for the High Courts could make an important difference. See Woolman & Brand (supra) at 38–83.) We also skate near the edge of debate over the possibility of merging the CC and the SCA, upon which we shall not enter beyond cautioning that our remarks here do not come close to establishing that merger is a good idea. See L Berat 'The Constitutional Court of South Africa and Jurisdictional Questions: In the Interest of Justice?' (2005) 3 Int'l J of Constitutional Law 39, 72–76.

11.4 Supremacy of the Constitution

In order to grasp fully what the CC is driving at in its Fedsure and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers decisions, we have to take our analysis one step further. Observing that FC s 1's list of the South African republic's founding values speaks not of 'the rule of law' in splendid isolation but rather of that value in a coupling with the 'supremacy of the constitution,' it is time to ask: In what way does the latter phrase signify a value? And how, if at all, is the value it signifies related to the value of legality with which it is textually coupled?

Three propositions, affirmed by the CC, fix the legality principle's central place in South Africa's legal order. Exercises of state power — seemingly without exception[1] — are subject to a constraint of legality. This constraint is justiciable, so that anyone suffering disadvantage from an exercise of state power may demand from some court a ruling on the lawfulness of that exercise of power, and furthermore a remedy in case the exercise is found unlawful. Every such demand for a ruling gives rise to a constitutional matter falling within the appellate purview of the CC.

As we have seen, the CC initially found these propositions to be implicit in the entirety of a constitutional instrument — the Interim Constitution — that lacks any particular text pointing explicitly at them.[2] Even today the CC would be prevented from basing them simply on Final Constitution s 1*(c)'s proclamation of the 'rule of law' as a founding value of the Republic, by its own insistence that the FC s 1 values do not 'in themselves' give rise to 'discrete and enforceable rights.[3] To be sure FC s 1(c)* is not beside the point, either, because the FC s 1 values do 'inform and give substance to' everything that is in the Final Constitution.[4] But then what, if anything, has the coupled reference to the supremacy of the Final Constitution got to do with what we have been talking about?

(a) Constitutional supremacy as a value (not just a rule)

It goes almost without saying that the Final Constitution is supreme law in South Africa, in the plain and simple sense — let us call it the 'trumping' sense — of that term. Whenever and insofar as a legal norm or rule of decision laid down by the Final Constitution (as construed) comes into practical collision with a legal

[1] See Hugo (supra) at paras 28–9 (Affirming that it would be contrary to the promise of a constitutional state to treat any exercise of presidential power as entirely above the law, regardless of whether that exercise would have fallen within the royal prerogative as a matter of traditional Westminster constitutional law); SARFU (supra) at para 38 (Affirming judicial reviewability, under traditional 'legality' standards — such as whether the President had properly 'applied his mind' to the question — of presidential exercises of power to appoint commissions of inquiry); Kaunda & Others v President of the Republic 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) at paras 78–9 (Affirming that a presidential refusal of a request by a South African citizen for diplomatic protection abroad is judicially reviewable for irrationality or arbitrariness, citing Hugo and SARFU.)

[2] See § 11.1*(c)* supra.

[3] See NICRO (supra) at para 21.

[4] Ibid. The CC rested its conclusion that the FC s 1 values do not in themselves give rise to enforceable rights not only on the language of FC s 1 but also on an observation of redundancy, or, as the NICRO Court put it, 'the way the Constitution is structured and in particular the provisions of Chapter 2 which contains the Bill of Rights'.

norm or rule of decision laid down by any sort of non-constitutional law (as construed) — be it parliamentary legislation, subordinate legislation, common law, or customary law — the Final Constitution's norm is to be given precedence by anyone whose project is to carry out the law of South Africa. To that extent, the Final Constitution's norm or rule of decision is the rule of decision for a South African court.

Can supremacy in the trumping sense be the total sum and substance of what FC s 1*(c)* means to convey when it names 'supremacy of the Constitution' as a founding value of the South African Republic? There are compelling reasons to resist such a tame and facile reading. The most glaring of these is redundancy. Other clauses of the Final Constitution beat out to a fare-thee-well the message that norms of the Final Constitution prevail over other, arguably conflicting norms in the legal system. FC s 2 declares that the Final Constitution 'is the supreme law of the Republic; law or conduct inconsistent with it is invalid, and the obligations imposed by it must be fulfilled.' If that were not sufficient to get the point across, FC s 173(1) obliges any court finding itself faced with such a question, at the very least and regardless of what further remedy the court may find to be just and equitable, to 'declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency.'[1]

FC s 1, captioned 'Republic of South Africa,' presents the Republic in terms of values on which it is founded. The mention of supremacy of the Final Constitution as one of these values is followed almost instantaneously by the Final Constitution's official supremacy clause, FC s 2, which actually is captioned 'Supremacy of the Constitution.' Why the duplication? Because — one is virtually compelled to think — there really is no duplication; the two clauses are addressed to different matters, and indeed they say so on their faces. FC s 1*(c)* posits supremacy of the Final Constitution as a value. FC s 2 lays down constitutional supremacy as a rule for the construction of a determinate, hierarchical relation among legal norms emanating from various, recognized sources of law in and for South Africa. Trumping-sense constitutional supremacy — the payload of FC s 2 — is, in short, a practical rule, not a 'value.' We do not normally speak of 'values' when rules of practice are what we have in mind. Values, rather, serve as reasons for rules; conversely, rules (if they are any good) serve to implement values.

When we look at FC s 1 as a whole, with its references to 'human dignity,'

[1] See also FC s 8(1)('The Bill of Rights applies to all law, and binds the legislature, the executive, the judiciary and all organs of state'); FC s 83*(b)(declaring that the President 'must uphold, defend and respect the Constitution as the supreme law of the Republic'); FC s 211(c)*('The courts must apply customary law when that law is applicable, subject to the Constitution and any legislation that specifically deals with customary law'); FC s 232 ('Customary international law is law in the Republic unless it is inconsistent with the Constitution or an Act of Parliament.') FC s 231(4) provides that 'any international agreement becomes law in the Republic when it is enacted into law by national legislation; but a self-executing provision of an agreement that has been approved by Parliament is law in the Republic unless it is inconsistent with the Final Constitution or an Act of Parliament.' Does this clause arguably imply that acts of Parliament enacting non-self-executing treaty obligations into law prevail regardless of inconsistency with other norms of the Final Constitution? See K Hopkins & H Strydom 'International Law' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2005) Chapter 30. Even if it does, constitutional supremacy in the trumping sense is not impaired. FC s 231(4) itself is a norm of the Final Constitution.

'achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms,' 'non-racialism and non-sexism,' the section appears to use 'values' to mean states of social affairs to which South Africa as a political community now is committed; states of affairs, then, to be promoted and sustained by governmental and other social means that themselves are consonant with the Final Constitution. Values, thus understood, serve as reasons for rules. That means they also are available (insofar as we can ascertain their content) to serve as guides to the interpretation and application of rules, when guidance is needed because the proper extension of the rule is not facially self-evident.

What do we find, then, if we try to put together FC ss 1*(c)* and 2? First, a value: a desired condition of South African society to which FC s 1*(c)* gives the name 'supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law.' Second, a rule (likewise labelled 'Supremacy of the Constitution' by FC s 2) that presumably is meant to promote the achievement of the specified societal condition. Thus, achievement of the condition is an end to which the rule is related as a means. We know the content of the rule (the means): Norms of the Final Constitution trump any other, arguably conflicting norms that may be found floating around in South Africa's legal system. But then what is the content of the desired societal condition ('supremacy of the Constitution') to which that rules stands as a means? That condition cannot consist simply of the state of affairs in which the trumping rule is faithfully followed, else the two supremacy clauses, those of FC ss 1*(c)* and (2), would be purely redundant.

The challenge thus posed to bench and bar by the 'supremacy' clause in FC s 1*(c)* is clear and somewhat daunting. It is to comprehend the sense in which 'supremacy of the Constitution' now is established as a polestar for the general guidance of South African government, society, and jurisprudence, beyond the point of establishing the trumping rule that the Final Constitution's norms prevail, in cases of conflict, over other norms claiming recognition in the legal system.

On the face of it, this is a puzzling question. FC s 1 expressly names some of the Constitution's motivating and guiding values. The remainder of the Final Constitution sets forth an array of prescriptive norms that presumably are meant to subserve these values directly or indirectly, no doubt along with other values that remain implicit. An obvious further step towards advancement of these same values is to lay down a rule that the Final Constitution's prescriptive norms must take precedence over arguably conflicting norms emanating from recognized legal sources apart from the Final Constitution. That is what FC s 2 expressly does. In that instrumental way, FC s 2's rule of trumping-sense supremacy has value (given that the items named in FC s 1 and presumably subserved by the Final Constitution's array of prescriptive norms are true values). But how are we to understand 'supremacy of the Constitution' as being itself a value capable of giving guidance to the interpretation of other norms of the Final Constitution (which is what it ought to be if it belongs in FC s 1)?

(b) The unity of the legal system and the pursuit of justice

Our question is: in what way does the value of constitutional supremacy declared by FC s 1*(c)* transcend the rule of trumping-sense supremacy laid down by s 2.

Puzzling as the question may be, the extant jurisprudence of South Africa demands that it be faced, for we have the CC's word for it that indeed there is some way in which the supremacy value does and is meant to transcend the supremacy rule.

That word is given by the CC in its *Pharmaceutical Manufacturer*s decision, in the well-known peroration:

> There is only one system of law. It is shaped by the Constitution which is the supreme law, and all law, including the common law, derives its force from the Constitution and is subject to constitutional control.[1]

In those two sentences, the CC claims for the Final Constitution not just one special virtue as compared with the rest of South Africa's laws but three of them, two of which go well beyond the claim (which also is there) for the Constitution's supremacy in the unadorned, norm-trumping sense declared by FC s 2. The first of these additional claims is for the pervasiveness of the Final Constitution's norms — 'all law . . . is subject to constitutional control.' The second is the claim for the Final Constitution's status as the basic law of South Africa — 'all law . . . derives its force from the Constitution.'[2] Certainly there is no other law in South Africa of which it may be said either that all (other) law is subject to its control or that the force of all (other) law flows or stems from it.

Now, a law to which these unique virtues are ascribed, along with trumping-sense supremacy, would be about as superlatively — or 'radically'[3] — supreme as a law can get. Suppose, then, that the CC's attribution to the Final Constitution of the three special virtues combined could be seen to posit or reflect a value to which South Africa's embrace of the Final Constitution could defensibly be said to have committed the country; a value, that is, that stands distinct from and additive to the other human and societal goods posited as founding values by FC s 1. If we could see the threefold attribution in such a light, then we might understand 'supremacy of the Constitution' as it occurs in FC s 1's list of founding values to be the textual pointer toward the CC's claims in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers for the pervasiveness and the basic-law status, as well as the normative-trumping force, of the Final Constitution.

What, then, might be the value that correlates to the aggregation within a single law — the Final Constitution — of the three virtues of trumping power, pervasive application or relevance, and basic-law status? Once we have the question shaped up in that form, the answer stares us in the face: 'Supremacy of the Constitution' names the value of legal-systemic harmony in the service of the vision of the good society staked out by the entire list of founding values set forth in FC s 1 and instinct in the rest of the Final Constitution. We deal here

[1] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 44.

[2] Both the idea of the pervasiveness of constitutional norms and that of the Final Constitution's basic-law status require further development, which we supply in §§ 11.4.c and 11.4.d infra.

[3] See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) § 31.4*(e)(iv) ('[T]he Constitutional Court has assured the Supreme Court of Appeal and the High Courts that this radical doctrine of constitutional supremacy does not mean that every judicial decision is meat for constitutional review or that the Constitutional Court will supplant the Supreme Court of Appeal as the guardian of the common law.') with the value of the unity of the legal system — meaning the system's normative unity or, as one might say more poetically, its visionary unity.[1] The value in question is the value of having all the institutional sites in which the legal order resides — and especially all of its courts of law — pulling in the same and not contrary directions, working in ultimate harmony (which is not to say without difference and debate) toward the vision (the elements of which must always be open to interpretation) of a well-ordered South African society depicted in very broad-brush fashion by the other founding values listed in FC s 1: human dignity, equality, human rights and freedoms, non-racialism, non-sexism, and the basic accoutrements of an open, accountable, representative-democratic system of government. Such an understanding of the value named 'the supremacy of the Constitution' in FC s 1(c)* accords well with that item's coupling there with 'the rule of law,' for the traditional rule-of-law ideal — we need hardly point out — already strongly intimates the integrity and consistency of the compilation of norms and proto-norms composing a corpus juris.[2]

What is more, we can now see how FC s 1*(c)*'s linkage of 'the rule of law' to 'supremacy of the Constitution' insinuates significant glosses on both the partners to the coupling. The linkage suggests that, in the Final Constitution's sight, legal-systemic unity — every site of law pulling in the same direction — is a relative or contingent value, not an absolute one. What that value is contingent on is the direction of the pull. It is when the sites pull together toward the vindication of human dignity, human rights, non-racialism, non-sexism, and the rest that the unity of the country's law in their service figures as a true value. Accordingly, the Final Constitution means by the rule of law something richer than that formula's most traditional, formal, Diceyan signification. If we read FC s 1 holistically — so that the coupling of the rule of law to constitutional supremacy signifies the value of legal-systemic unity in the service of human dignity, non-racialism, and the rest — then 'the rule of law' signifies not just the rule of rules but the rule of justice, as the Final Constitution envisions justice. 'Supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law' signifies the unity of the legal system in the service of transformation by, under, and according to law.

That, in a nutshell, is what the CC's work described in this chapter has been driving at; or so we would contend. But there are wrinkles still to iron out, and to them we now turn.

(c) An all-pervasive Constitution?

At any time, a case might come along that prompts the judiciary to re-examine some parcel of common law doctrine. To be provocative, let us take as our example the doctrine that decides whether acceptance by mail of a contractual offer — and therefore formation of a contract — occurs as soon as the letter of acceptance is posted or only later when it is received. The law has got to decide

[1] See Port Elizabeth Municipality v Various Occupiers 2005 (1) SA 217 (CC) para 35 ('Rather than envisage the foundational values of the rule of law and the achievement of equality as being distinct from and in tension with each other, PIE treats these values as interactive, complementary, and mutually reinforcing.').

[2] See, eg, LL Fuller The Morality of Law (1969) 38–9.

this question, one way or the other, by a general rule. Has the Final Constitution anything at all to do with such a matter? Are there not, after all, some questions of law that lie beneath the Final Constitution's notice, or beyond its gaze? If there are some, the choice between 'effective-on-dispatch' and 'effective-on-receipt' in the law of contract doubtless is one of them. (Notice, though, that if there are any such questions at all, then there probably are quite a few of them.)

When the CC declares, as it did in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, that 'all law' is 'subject to constitutional control,' is the CC giving us its answer to the question we have just posed? Is the CC saying 'no, no legal question at all is beneath the Constitution's notice'? Just staring at those words in isolation, one might well doubt it. The words (in isolation) can easily be construed — are perhaps most naturally construed — to say simply that the Final Constitution's norms prevail wherever they extend, without implying anything about how pervasively those norms extend across the length and breadth society's affairs.

Suppose we had a constitutional instrument that addressed itself solely to the design of state institutions, and not at all to substantive limits and constraints on the acts of those institutions. Regarding such an instrument, one might perfectly aptly say that all law is subject to its control; it is just that this truism would make little difference to the substantive content of the law and of legal decrees, because all duly enacted laws and decrees, regardless of content, would satisfy the demands of the narrow-bodied constitution whose control they were under. In such a case, 'all law is subject to constitutional control' would simply repeat the doctrine of the constitution's trumping-sense supremacy. The remark would bear no implication regarding what we have termed the 'pervasiveness' of constitutional norms.

When, however, we place the CC's remark — 'all law is subject to constitutional control' — in context, we may feel strongly drawn to read it differently. The context very saliently includes the CC's repeated stresses on the unity of the legal system ('there is only one system of law'). More telling is the CC's expressed view of the Final Constitution's role in conferring that unity ('shaped by the Constitution'). The context further includes the actual stakes in the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers case — to wit, the sharply contested issue of whether legal cases can arise in South Africa over which the CC (restricted to deciding constitutional matters and matters ancillary to constitutional matters) is precluded from having the last word. With these contextual factors in the picture, 'all law is subject to constitutional control' almost irresistibly conveys a claim for the pervasiveness of the Final Constitution's norms. Such, after all, is the conclusion to which all the preceding discussion in this chapter has been tending. Call it the thesis of the all-pervasive Constitution.

How problematic a conclusion is it? The all-pervasive-Constitution thesis certainly contradicts the ostensible design of the Final Constitution to divide last-resort appellate jurisdiction between the CC and the SCA.[1] However, as the logicians like to tell us, you can prove anything with a contradiction. Merely noticing a contradiction tells us nothing about how to proceed in the face of it. Merely noticing this one tells us nothing, yet, about which of the two contending ideas — the ostensible jurisdictional division or the all-pervasive Constitution — is the one that had better give way if we want to keep faith with the Final Constitution as best we can. Might our discussion in § 11.4.b, above, possibly have some light to shed on this question?

[1] See § 11.2 supra.

Recall our conclusion there: 'Supremacy of the Constitution' names the value of legal-systemic harmony in the service of the vision of the good society staked out by the entire list of founding values set forth in FC s 1 and instinct in the rest of the Constitution. The premise, unstated, is that such a vision — a comprehensive (if doubtless somewhat inchoate) vision of the good society — indeed resides in the Final Constitution. Significantly, that is a premise to which the CC has subscribed:

> Our Constitution is not merely a formal document regulating public power. It also embodies, like the German Constitution, an objective, normative value system. As was stated by the German Federal Constitutional Court:
>
> > The jurisprudence of the Federal Constitutional Court is consistently to the effect that the basic right norms contain not only defensive subjective rights for the individual but embody at the same time an objective value system which, as a fundamental constitutional value for all areas of the law, acts as a guiding principle and stimulus for the legislature, executive and judiciary.
>
> The same is true of our Constitution. . . . It is within the matrix of this objective normative value system that the common law must be developed.[1]

If common law, then how not all law?[2] An objective normative value system is not a Swiss cheese. Something going under that name ought to have a bearing on every legal choice, even if it does not fully decide them all. There would be no way to exclude a priori the choice between 'dispatch' and 'receipt' in the law of contract. Granting that the relevant message from the objective normative value system inhabiting South Africa's Constitution may not occur to you just now, that may be because you have not thought hard enough about it. More likely it is because the system's implications remain far less than fully developed and resolved at this point in South Africa's history of collective self-definition through political and juridical exchange and contestation. One may hope and expect that such a condition of openness to refreshed understanding will persist forever. Still the point would remain: some judge, some day, may grasp the Final Constitution's message for the 'dispatch'/'acceptance' choice and therefore every judge, every day, is expected to confront that choice and others like it in a state of conscious reflection on what the Final Constitution is up to. Such would appear to be the import of FC s 1*(c)*, 'the supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law,' at least in the current view of the CC.

[1] Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC) at para 54 (citation omitted); Du Plessis & Others v De Klerk & Another 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC) at para 94. See also Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.4*(e)*(vii) (On the meaning of 'objective normative value system'.)

[2] Compare FC s 2; FC s 8(1)('The Bill of Rights applies to all law.') See Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.4*(b)*(i)–(ii). (On the meaning of 'all law').

But if that is so, then how explain the CC's performances in cases like Metcash Trading and Phoebus Apollo Aviation?[1] In Phoebus Apollo Aviation, the CC peels the onion, exposing layer by layer the absence from the case of any question of law save the acceptability of the SCA's formulation of the general test for respondeat superior in ordinary delict cases. 'None of our business, then,' says the CC. 'True today if you say so,' we respond, 'but who can say about tomorrow, when you or your successors may see further or deeper into that objective normative value system of which you speak?' When the CC dismisses an appeal such as that in Phoebus Apollo Aviation, pleading want of jurisdiction, it seems we must understand the Court as confessing to a temporary shortfall in its comprehension of that objective normative value system whose inhabitation of the Final Constitution it posits. ('We don't know yet.') Otherwise, why is the CC not affirming the decision below? (Granted, 'temporary' here may refer to a condition that is not short-term.)

(d) Constitutional supremacy as basic-law status

Let us turn now to the third of the three special legal virtues claimed for the Final Constitution by the CC in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers: 'All law, including the common law, derives its force from the Constitution.' It is hard to know what to make of this remark. On its face, as we explain just below, it registers as a proposition in the field of jurisprudence or the philosophy of law. The trouble is that the remark thus read draws the CC into a debate in legal theory that the CC surely has neither any intention of entering nor any slightest reason to enter — the theorists' debate being entirely lacking in consequence for the CC's work.

To state the matter as briefly and simply as possible: Truckloads of legal theorists would pronounce 'All law derives its force from the Constitution' an obvious mistake and moreover an impossibility. All law in South Africa, they would say, including the Final Constitution (as well as all statute law, common law, and customary law), necessarily derives its force from something called South Africa's 'ultimate rule of recognition,' which is not and cannot be identical with South Africa's enacted Final Constitution. Very roughly, South Africa's ultimate rule of recognition consists of a set of understandings, presumably widely shared across South African society, by which South Africans are able to converge on acceptance of the Final Constitution as the highest-ranking law in South Africa. Such a convergence of pre-legal understandings must necessarily exist as a matter of 'social fact' — so the argument quite persuasively runs — in order for the practice of legal ordering to exist in this or any society.[2] Without it, the Final

[1] See § 11.2*(b)* supra.

[2] A modern locus classicus is HLA Hart The Concept of Law (1961). See also F Schauer 'Amending the Presuppositions of a Constitution' in S Levinson Responding to Imperfection: The Theory and Practice of Constitutional Amendment (1995) 147.

Constitution could not function as law. Moreover — the argument continues — once the necessary existence of this widely shared set of pre-legal understandings is acknowledged, then it — and not the Final Constitution — will be seen to serve as the source providing the force of law not just to the Final Constitution but also to statutes enacted in accordance with the Final Constitution's rules, and to common-law and customary-law doctrines that emanate from sources authorized by the Final Constitution to pronounce and develop common law and customary law.

For our purposes, it does not matter whether the view just described is correct or not. More to the point is the likelihood that most if not all of the justices of the CC would happily sign on to that view if asked for their opinion regarding it. At any rate, they would have no reason not to. The CC is plainly and strongly committed to claims that the Final Constitution's norms are all-pervasive and the they have trumping-sense supremacy over all other South African law. Those claims, however, stand, quite independent of any claim that the Final Constitution — as opposed to an ultimate rule of recognition distinct from the Final Constitution — supplies the force of law to statutes and the common law. Rather, implicit in the CC's stance is a claim about the content of South Africa's ultimate rule of recognition, the social source from which all South African law derives its force. The CC is claiming, in effect, that South Africa's ultimate rule of recognition contemplates both the all-pervasive relevance of the Final Constitution's norms and their trumping-sense supremacy within South Africa's legal system.

If so, however, what are we to make of 'all law derives its force from the Constitution'? What is the Court trying to say by that remark, that makes any practical sense or any practical difference?

(e) Constitutional supremacy and discursive style

All else failing, let us try to find an answer by changing the subject.

When we place the Final Constitution side-by-side with the pre-constitutional South African corpus juris and ask 'what is new?', our first answers likely will speak in terms of the substantive content of the law and the values animating it. Democracy, human dignity, the achievement of equality, the advancement of human rights and freedoms, non-racialism and non-sexism[1] have gained a new ascendancy, and acquired new meanings, in the orderings of values that, in one way or another, enter into legal decision-making. In a word, what is new is every dimension of the social valuation of legal choices conveyed by the word 'transformation.' In Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, the CC plainly affirmed the point that no pocket of South African law is exempt from reconsideration in the light of the Final Constitution's scheme of values.

But 'transformation' signifies to many a shift in the style as well as in the substance of the law — a shift in the law's discursive modalities as well as in its guiding vision of human and social flourishing. Exactly what sort of stylistic or discursive shift is indicated is a matter under discussion, of course. For some observers, the relevant contrast is that between 'doctrinal' argument (old style) and 'political' argument (new style).[1] For others, it is the contrast between Roman-Dutch formalism and a legal pragmatism that opens decision-making wide to the particulars of 'the social, political and historical context of the case.'[2] For still others, the contrast is best rendered in terms of choices of dominant metaphors: say, 'rights as boundaries' versus 'rights as relationships.'[3] And for yet others (the list is not exhaustive), the crucial contrast is the contrast between a 'matrix mindset' that thinks inside legal boxes containing 'comparatively unreflective' sets of settled rules and structures and a 'post-matrix mindset' that is constantly subjecting received rules and practices to the test of consistency with a guiding, global set of values.[4] Or the contrast may similarly be defined as being that between modes of judicial analysis that allow or invite law outside the Final Constitution — above all, the common law — to 'drive the enquiry into constitutional values,' and modes that put the Final Constitution in the driver's seat by forcing courts to explicate constitutional values separately before asking about the adequacy of the fit between — for example — this or that antecedent common-law doctrine and the Final Constitution.[5]

[1] See FC s 1.

Tracing the commonalities and differences among these assorted views of what may be at stake discursively in the Final Constitution's entry onto the South African legal scene is beyond the scope of this chapter. What is very much to its point is this: Among those who perceive that 'constitutional' denotes a transformed style of legal (no doubt some would say faux-legal) argumentation, there is disagreement over whether that transformation ought to reach into every last redoubt of juridical activity. Some maintain that the country is best served by leaving the old style (however that may be conceived) some space in which to operate alongside the new.[6] Others disagree.[7]

[1] The former is said to employ a distinctively legal grammar that injects into the facts and events that compose a legal case their distinctly legal significance, thus shielding legal decision off from raw, consequentialist calculation. Doctrinal argument is a method, then, by which trained, specialist practitioners work out the legally best or aptest shadings and orderings of shared, permanent principles or values in changing contexts, where 'legally' connotes a time-tested, evolving, civilizational wisdom that no sheerly instrumentalist or 'balancing' calculus ever could capture. See D van der Merwe 'Constitutional Colonisation of the Common Law: A Problem of Institutional Integrity' (2000) 1 TSAR 15, 22–5. By contrast, political, including constitutional argument involves the parties in an open, unmediated contest of clashing interests and rights-claims that only a trade-off could resolve. Ibid at 24.

[2] See AJ van der Walt 'Dancing with Codes — Protecting, Developing, Limiting and Deconstructing Property Rights in the Constitutional State' (2001) 118 SALJ 258.

[3] H Botha 'Metaphoric Reasoning and Transformative Constitutionalism (Part 2)' (2003) (1) TSAR 20, 34.

[4] C Roederer 'Post-Matrix Legal Reasoning: Horizontality and the Rules of Values in South African Law' (2003) 19 SAJHR 57, 62.

[5] See D Davis 'Elegy to Transformative Constitutionalism' in H Botha, A Van der Walt & J Van der Walt (eds) Rights and Democracy in a Transformative Constitution (2003) 57, 65.

[6] See, eg, Van der Merwe (supra) at 15.

[7] See, eg, Roederer (supra) at 57.

We cannot here go into detail. We merely suggest that when the CC spoke in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers of all law deriving its force from the Final Constitution, it may have been giving expression to that side of its mind that decidedly favours having constitutional values (post-matrix) drive the enquiry into the adequacy of all other law, rather than the reverse. This may have been the CC's way of conveying that there remains in South Africa no trace of law that does not act discursively like the law of the Final Constitution; no law that does not, in that sense, bear the Final Constitution's genes. To put the point another way: No legal argument, contention, or proposal is rejectable today simply because it does not 'sound' right or 'feel' right to a well-brought-up South African jurist of the current generation. To say that is to say something significantly more than that all law has to harmonize with the spirit, purport, and objects of the Final Constitution.

12 Separation of Powers

Sebastian Seedorf & Sanele Sibanda

12.1 Introduction 12–1
12.2. Origins and Conceptual Framework of the Separation of Powers Doctrine 12–3
(a) 'Power arrests power': the historical development of the idea of separated powers 12–3
(b) Constitutionalism, 'checks and balances' and the 'pure form' of separation of powers 12–10
(c) The different forms of separation of powers 12–13
12.3 Separation of Powers under the South African Constitution . 12–16
(a) Separation of powers in the Interim Constitution and the Constitutional Principles 12–17
(b) Separation of powers in the Final Constitution. 12–20
(i) The legislature and the executive 12–21
(ii) The judiciary 12–25
(iii) Independent constitutional institutions 12–30
(c) Beyond the text: separation of powers as a living doctrine 12–34
(i) A distinctively South African model of separation of powers. . 12–35
(ii) Justiciability of the separation of powers principle 12–36
(d) Emerging general principles and doctrines of separation of powers. 12–39
(i) Legislature, executive and judiciary between pre-eminent domains and checks and balances. 12–39
(aa) A pre-eminent domain for each branch of government 12–39
(bb) The availability of checks and balances 12–45

(ii) Judicial review and the separation of powers 12–49
(aa) Judicial review in the context of the supremacy of the Constitution, the political question doctrine and intergovernmental respect and courtesy 12–50
(bb) Separation of powers and the applicable standard of review 12–59
(cc) Separation of powers and remedies 12–73
(iii) Delegation of legislative authority and subordinate legislation . 12–86
(iv) Executive-controlled dispute resolution 12–94

12.1 INTRODUCTION

The adoption of the Interim[1] and subsequently the Final Constitution[2] is often lauded as the major milestone in the attainment of freedom in South Africa. As important a milestone as the adoption of these two Constitutions was, however, it is arguably the governmental structures that these Constitutions established that have been most vital in ensuring that South Africa continues to develop as a constitutional state, i e a state in which political power is restricted in various ways and in which the Constitution serves as the standard for the legitimate exercise of public power.

Constitutional restrictions on public power may be both procedural and substantive. The focus of substantive restrictions is an entrenched and justiciable bill of rights and a commitment to certain foundational values, such as the rule of law. The separation of powers falls on the procedural side, although its purpose is related to substantive interests: it is a means to ensure the protection of individual rights by way of the distribution of political power between different institutional actors, and includes mechanisms to ensure that such power is not unduly exercised. The idea behind separation of powers is that a concentration of power will most likely lead to self-interested action and abuse of power for personal gain. Historical experience suggests that benign dictators, who rule wisely, judge fairly and generally advance everyone's welfare, are very hard to find — if such people ever existed. The underlying idea beneath any separation of powers doctrine is thus the sceptical assessment that good governance is more likely when political power is distributed between different institutions and persons.

Separation of powers is the basis for an institutional, procedural and structural division of public power to create conditions that place human rights at the centre of society. Both from an institutional and structural point of view, such a constitutional principle is an essential aspect of promoting and securing the entrenchment of South Africa's nascent constitutional democracy. Separation of powers — as well as democracy and the rule of law — are therefore linked to the constitutional project of creating a society founded on the recognition of human rights, peaceful co-existence and development opportunities for all South Africans. The objective of separation of powers is to curtail the exercise of political power to prevent its abuse — meaning the violation of human rights. This instrumental function of separation of powers as an institutional mechanism to protect human rights is the reason why the combination of these two ideas (separation of powers and human rights) has been called the 'core of constitutionalism'.[3] And it is these features that have ensured that there really has been a decisive break from the past constitutional system in South Africa.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').
[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').
[3] Jan-Erik Lane Constitutions and Political Theory (1996) 25. See also Iain Currie & Johan de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 8.

Separation of powers means that specific functions, duties and responsibilities are allocated to distinctive institutions with defined areas of competence and jurisdiction. Separation of public powers is, in short, separation of public institutions (legislature, executive and judiciary) and of public functions, i e the making of law, law application and execution, and dispute resolution. Functional distribution leads to specialization and this, in turn, enhances state efficiency — the second rationale for separation of powers. In US constitutional law, the argument that a proper division of public functions and their attribution to particular institutions helps government to perform better was employed to justify a strong executive with a powerful President at its helm.[1] More generally, the underlying idea is that particular institutions are particularly well equipped to perform a particular function. In complex modern societies with numerous stakeholders and multifaceted decision-making processes, this argument takes account of the level of specialization and expertise required for the delivery of 'good governance'. When only people who know what they are talking about are involved in the decision-making process it is more likely that the outcome will be just and equitable and serve the public good. This argument thus relates to the first rationale of separation of powers, i e prevention of the abuse of power. On the other hand, the efficiency rationale has lost some of its force due to the fact that pure efficiency has to be limited to some degree to ensure that all relevant considerations in the decision-making process are taken into account. Unhindered technocratic rule by experts (not questioning their knowledge of the subject at all) may lead to institutional deafness and ignorance of the plight of others and, in the worst case, to exactly the kind of human rights violations and abuses of power the Constitution aims to prevent. The prevailing purpose of checks and balances as part of the separation of powers doctrine is therefore to ensure that institutions do not become too self-centred in their conduct, even if they are thus impeded in efficiently fulfilling their functions to a certain extent.

This chapter engages in a detailed analysis of the import and impact of the doctrine of separation of powers in the development of South Africa's constitutional law. Before moving to consider exactly how the doctrine has manifested itself in the South African context, the first part of the chapter will briefly consider the doctrine's origins and its profound influence on the development of the modern democratic state premised on the idea of limited government. This analysis will seek to show that the doctrine's success as a means of establishing a fairly predictable set of structured constitutional arrangements has resulted in a growing tendency to emphasize the doctrine's form over its substance.

In the second part of the chapter the focus will turn to a consideration of how the doctrine has been incorporated in the text of the Final Constitution, in spite of the fact that the constitutional text makes no reference — direct or indirect — to separation of powers. In this section it will be shown that, rather than slavishly following other states' interpretation of the doctrine, the drafters of the Final Constitution incorporated the idea of separation of powers in a manner that was 'distinctively' conceived to meet South Africa's peculiar needs and context. Further, this section will commence with the consideration of the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence on separation of powers. This analysis will be prefaced by a consideration of the Court's own role with respect to the development of the separation of powers as a justiciable doctrine, particularly in light of its own far-reaching powers of judicial review.

[4] Geoffrey Stone, Louis Seidman, Cass Sunstein, Mark Tushnet & Pamela Karlan Constitutional Law (5th Edition, 2005) 363.

The final part of the chapter will engage in an analysis of the Constitutional Court's separation of powers jurisprudence and in so doing identify some important emerging features and principles. Although the development of this jurisprudence has necessarily been conducted on a case-by-case basis, a cumulative reading of the Constitutional Court's judgments illustrates that the doctrines and principles identified in this chapter have heavily influenced the Court's goal of distilling a 'distinctively South African model of separation of powers'. This section further seeks to demonstrate that, although the judgments discussed go a long way towards illuminating the separation of powers doctrine in South Africa, the Constitutional Court's conceptualization of this doctrine is, much like South Africa's overall constitutional project, an ongoing enterprise to which there are no full and final answers.

12.2 Origins and conceptual framework of the separation of powers doctrine

(a) 'Power arrests power': the historical development of the idea of separated powers

The articulation of an explicit doctrine of separation of powers as a distinct explicatory theory of governance is generally thought to have its origin in the political philosophy of the age of Enlightenment in seventeenth-century Europe, when political thinkers started to challenge the unlimited might and arbitrariness of an absolute monarch. However, its basic aim is much older, i e to find a structure of government that prevents the accumulation of too much power in one institution. Mitigating power by way of diffusion has been a feature common to many societies for ages, even when they have followed a strictly hierarchical system of government.

For example, in pre-colonial southern African societies, no separation of powers technically existed, because traditional leaders performed all functions of government, including dispute resolution.[1] However, traditional leaders were always expected to consult with an advisory body (usually consisting of senior members of the society) or seek the approval of a popular assembly. As Tom Bennett and Christina Murray point out, even without formal constraints, no important decision could be taken without discussion in the council, giving the members of the group (or their representatives) opportunities to check self-interested action and effectively limit the power of the ruler.[1]

[1] See Tom Bennett & Christina Murray 'Traditional Leaders' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) § 26.6*(c)*.

The idea that the accumulation of power can be (best) prevented by the introduction of distinctive institutions with defined functions, areas of competence and jurisdiction, which exercise public power in mutual co-operation, was foundational to the Roman republic of the sixth century BC. While the senate, a body of up to 600 men from (mostly) Roman nobility, engaged in general policy debates, made important decisions (such as decisions about entering into war and suing for peace) and controlled the treasury, administrative and judicial functions were transferred to annually elected officials (collectively called magistrates) with titles like consul or praetor depending on their rank and responsibilities. These were elected by assemblies (the comitias) representing the Roman people.

Much of the theoretical groundwork for such an arrangement was laid by the Greek philosopher Aristotle, who formulated the idea of a threefold division of public power as one of the requirements of a good constitution. Aristotle saw three elements in every constitution: the deliberative element (responsible for law-making and other important decisions), the element of the magistracies (everything concerning the day-to-day 'running' of the state) and the judicial element.[2] In his view, when the drafters of a Constitution had reached the best arrangement for each of the three elements, and they were all acting in the right 'proportion', the Constitution as a whole would work well. This background in Aristotelian theory and Roman practice was not lost and influenced the scholarly debate on how societies ought to be structured for centuries — although, in practical terms in medieval Europe, state power became increasingly concentrated in single rulers.[3]

The emergence of all-powerful, absolute rulers whose authority was not restrained, balanced and countered by other institutions led to the revitalization of separation of powers ideas in the seventeenth century. At that time, these ideas were influenced by the developing liberal notions of personal freedom and civil liberties. Aristotle had focused on the well-being of the community as a whole, the polis, and only indirectly on the individual. During the period of the Reformation and the Renaissance, however, a growing emphasis was placed on the fact that public power should be exercised in the interests of the governed. Absolute monarchs could not be trusted in this regard, as 'there is the danger that they will think themselves to have a distinct interest from the rest of the Community.'[4]

[1] Bennett & Murray (supra) at §§ 26.2, 26.6*(c)*(iii).

[2] Aristotle Politics Book IV, Chapter 14. In modern terms, Aristotle's drew a distinction between state organs and state functions.

[3] MJC Vile Constitutionalism and the Separation of Powers (1967) 40; Lane (supra) at 22–25.

[4] John Locke Two Treatises of Government II (1688) Chapter XI para 138.

Thus, the idea that public power must be distributed and controlled was developed with a view to the accountability of government to the will of the people. The basis for today's notion of separation of powers was laid with the functional understanding that democracy and the rule of law require both the division of powers and mutual checks and balances. The main proponents of this idea were John Locke (1632–1704), Charles Baron de Montesquieu (1689–1755) and James Madison (1751–1836).

Locke's work was based on his experiences with the Civil War in England around 1650 and the Revolution of 1688, when King James II of England was overthrown by a union of parliamentarians, which effectively ended absolute monarchy in Britain by circumscribing the monarch's powers. Although supportive of this development, Locke's concern was that absolute monarchical power should not just be replaced by absolute parliamentary power. In his view, the concentration of influence in any one institution entailed an inherent danger:

> [I]it may be too great a temptation to humane frailty apt to grasp at Power, for the same Persons who have the Power of making Laws, to have also in their hands the power to execute them, whereby they may exempt themselves from Obedience to the Laws they make, and suit the Law, both in its making and execution, to their own private advantage.[1]

Locke was influenced by natural law assumptions such as that all men are by nature free and equal and that legitimate governments are those which have the consent of the people. For this reason, there was a need 'to think of methods of restraining any exorbitances of those to whom [the people] had given the authority over them, and of balancing the power of government, by placing several parts of it in different hands'.[2] This was Locke's essential thought: separation of powers as a means to counter the power-accumulating tendencies of human nature. To prevent arbitrariness, his prescription for the executive power (in his view, the King) was that it should not be concerned with law-making, while the legislature, on the other hand, should only be concerned with the passing of general rules and, equally important, should be dissolved on a regular basis so that it would consist of different people from time to time.[3]

Although quite revolutionary for his time, Locke's understanding of separation of powers differed in important ways from later conceptions of this doctrine. First, Locke still saw the judicial function as part of the executive, as it was for him part of the implementation of abstract legal rules.[4] Secondly, advocating the

[1] Locke (supra) at Chapter XII, para 143.
[2] Locke (supra) at Chapter VIII, para 107.
[3] See FA Hayek The Constitution of Liberty (1960) 170.
[4] Locke divided state functions mainly between law making (legislative power) and law implementation, including adjudication (executive power). He nevertheless advocated three distinctive governmental powers because he distinguished between internal 'executive power' (where the executive was subject to the control of the legislature) and external 'federative power', i e foreign affairs, which cannot be conducted subject to predetermined abstract legal rules and in which the executive is not subject to the control of the legislator. See Vile (supra) at 66–67.

then emerging English model of parliamentary supremacy, he did not think of an effective institutional counterbalance to the legislature, but only of procedural restraints.[1]

The division of state power between three distinctive institutions was introduced by Montesquieu, who is generally credited with devising the modern conception of separation of powers. Montesquieu's singular contribution was to conceive the judicial power as an independent state function, thereby treating it as a form of power equivalent to legislative and executive power, and laying the theoretical basis for the independence of the judiciary.[2] Montesquieu conceived his theory as an empirical study in which he examined all kinds of regimes present and past. In this endeavour, he started from a rather gloomy view of human nature, similar to that of Locke: human beings in power have the tendency to abuse it.[3] But Montesquieu thought that such tendencies need not prevail because the structure of government, as embodied in the constitution of a nation, could make a difference.

For Montesquieu, the separation of powers doctrine was foundational to any constitution that sought to prevent the abuse of power and advance personal freedom:

> [There is no] liberty if the power of judging is not separate from legislative power and from executive powers. . . . All would be lost if the same man or the same body of principal men, either of nobles, or of the people, exercised these three powers: that of making the laws, that of executing public resolutions, and that of judging the crimes or the disputes of individuals.[4]

Jan-Erik Lane has noted that Locke's constitutionalism is focused on the concept of limited government, of restrained and restricted political power to ensure the liberty of the individual, while Montesquieu focused on the fact that such liberty is most likely to survive in a state where executive, legislative and judicial power are not in the same hands.[5] What they had in common was that they regarded separation of powers as a means directly to prevent the accumulation of power and, even more importantly, indirectly to ensure that every member of society enjoyed individual rights and freedoms.[6]

[1] See Vile (supra) at 68–70.

[2] Although Montesquieu did not accord the judicial branch an exactly equal status with the legislative and executive branches of government, he clearly intended the judiciary to be independent of the other two. See Vile (supra) at 96.

[3] Montesquieu The Spirit of the Laws (1748, translated and edited by Anne M Cohler, Basia Carolyn Miller & Harold Samuel Stone, 1989) Book XI Chapter 4 155 ('. . . it has eternally been observed that any man who has power is led to abuse it; he continues until he finds limits.')

[4] Montesquieu (supra) at Book XI Chapter 6 157.

[5] See Lane (supra) at 39.

[6] It was exactly this focus on individual liberty that persuaded writers advancing communism or socialism to reject the idea of separation of powers. A government of the working class demanded absolute accountability of every state function to the 'masses'. Mutual checks and balances are unnecessary where 'revolutionary forces' exercise all power and control all state functions. For an appraisal of the apparent mixing of state functions during the short-lived Paris Commune of 1871 by Karl Marx, see Theunis Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, A Chaskalson & M Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 10.2*(a)*.

Montesquieu's point was that separation of powers was crucial for good government. He believed that only the separation of powers would create a situation in which the common good would be advanced. Some 50 years before the Jacobins in the aftermath of the French revolution would disguise their reign of terror as a reign of virtue, Montesquieu strongly emphasized that even a government with the best intentions needed to be limited: 'Is it not strange, though true, to say that virtue itself has need of limits?'[1]

Additionally, Montesquieu realized that limitations imposed by procedural or even substantive laws would not suffice to prevent the abuse of power. Instead, such legal limitations had to be supported by alternative sources of political power, which also meant bringing social forces into consideration.[2] To make separation of powers work, a Constitution would have to distribute power between the different branches of government: 'To prevent this abuse, it is necessary from the very nature of things that power arrests power.'[3]

James Madison later picked up on this insight (though without explicitly referring to Montesquieu) when he outlined the structure of the US Constitution:

> But the great security against a gradual concentration of the several powers in the same department, consists in giving to those who administer each department the necessary constitutional means and personal motives to resist encroachments of the others. The provision for defense must in this, as in all other cases, be made commensurate to the danger of attack. Ambition must be made to counteract ambition. The interest of the man must be connected with the constitutional rights of the place.[4]

[1] Montesquieu (supra) at Book XI Chapter 4 155 ('Qui le dirait! La virtue même a besoin de limites.' Some English editions have used a different translation more congruent with the French original: 'Who would think it! Even virtue has need of limits.')

[2] Montesquieu placed great emphasis on the accommodation of the different strata of society, in particular the nobility, of which he himself was part. To separate powers not only according to their function, but also along social lines was of great importance to him: 'Here, therefore, is the fundamental constitution of the government of which we are speaking. As its legislative body is composed of two parts, the one will be chained by the other by their reciprocal faculty of vetoing. The two will be bound by the executive power, which will itself be bound by the legislative power. The form of these three powers should be rest or inaction.' Montesquieu (supra) at Book XI Chapter 6 164 (my emphasis). Although Montesquieu does not mention the judiciary in this context, he nevertheless speaks of three powers. Instead of state powers here he has social powers in mind, referring to the monarch as the head of the executive, the nobility (comprising the upper house of Parliament) and the bourgeoisie, represented in the second chamber or lower house of Parliament. This class emphasis is also visible from his argument that members of the aristocracy should not be judged in the ordinary courts of law, but in courts made up of their peers, because 'important men are always exposed to envy; and if they were judged by the people, they could be endangered . . .' Montesquieu (supra) at 163.

[3] Ibid at Book XI Chapter 4, 155 ('Pour qu'on ne puisse abuser du pouvoir, il faut que, par la disposition des choses, le pouvoir arrête le pouvoir.') Depending on the translation, the last part of this sentence may read 'power must be a check on power'.

[4] Alexander Hamilton, James Madison & John Jay The Federalist Papers No 51 (1788, JM Dent Edition, 1992) 266 ('The Federalist').

Hannah Arendt has called Montesquieu's insight the 'forgotten principle underlying the whole structure of separated powers', because it realizes that power must be limited and kept intact at the same time. Separation of powers must not have a disabling, but an enabling function:

> Power can be stopped and still be kept intact only by power, so that the principle of the separation of powers not only provides a guarantee against the monopolization of power by one part of the government, but actually provides a kind of mechanism, built into the very heart of government, through which new power is constantly generated, without, however, being able to overgrow and expand to the detriment of other centres or sources of power.[1]

As much as Montesquieu made one of the most enduring conceptual contributions to today's understanding of the separation of powers doctrine, he did not outline institutional mechanisms to serve his ideal. The task of putting Montesquieu's ideas into practice was left to James Madison and his fellow 'founding fathers'. Drawing on their experience with the far-reaching powers of colonial governors, the framers of the early American constitutions ensured that the principle of separation of powers played a central role in the structures of government for the first time.[2] They started from the same assumption as Montesquieu, i e that the division of power is essential to prevent its abuse:

> The accumulation of all powers, legislative, executive, and judiciary, in the same hands, whether of one, a few, or many, and whether hereditary, selfappointed, or elective, may justly be pronounced the very definition of tyranny.[3]

One important aspect in the American implementation of the doctrine was the distinction between a Constitution and ordinary legislation. For the majority of Americans at the time, the distinctive source of political power was the people. It was the people who constituted the state and expressed their will in the form of a written Constitution.[4] Against this, the legislature had only a delegated power, which needed to have limits, too. However, early experiences with some State Constitutions and their systems of separated powers had shown that a simple

[1] Hannah Arendt On Revolution (1963) 151–152 (emphasis in the original).

[2] See, for example, the Constitution of Virginia of June 29, 1776 (Not to be confused with the Virginia Bill of Rights of June 12, 1776): 'The legislative, executive, and judiciary department, shall be separate and distinct, so that neither exercise the powers properly belonging to the other: nor shall any person exercise the powers of more than one of them, at the same time; except that the justices of the county courts shall be eligible to either House of Assembly.'

[3] Hamilton, Madison & Jay The Federalist No 47 (supra) at 247 (Madison placed great emphasis on the fact that a majority could abuse its power, too, and act contrary to the interests of a just society. 'It is of great importance in a republic not only to guard the society against the oppression of its rulers, but to guard one part of the society against the injustice of the other part. . . . In a society under the forms of which the stronger faction can readily unite and oppress the weaker, anarchy may as truly be said to reign as in a state of nature, where the weaker individual is not secured against the violence of the stronger. . .' The Federalist No 51 at 267–268.)

[4] See Vile (supra) at 158–159.

division of functions had neither sufficiently acknowledged the idea of popular sovereignty, nor restricted the legislatures to the passing of general rules. Instead, the State legislatures had slowly absorbed more and more powers.[1]

The problem of how to place limits on the legislature was thus the background against which the drafters of the US Constitution, based on their reading of Montesquieu, concluded that a strict separation of powers would not prevent the accumulation of power.[2] To put the principle that 'power arrests power' into practice, it would instead be necessary to draft a Constitution 'in which the powers of government should be so divided and balanced among several bodies of magistracy, as that no one could transcend their legal limits, without being effectually checked and restrained by the others.'[3]

The idea of 'checks and balances' as a complement to the mere separation of powers was the decisive innovation. Although in a sense a breach of the doctrine, the Americans realized that checks and balances were nevertheless necessary to the successful application of the separation of powers. In the Constitutional Convention of 1787, Madison argued that the introduction of a balance of powers and interests would add a defensive power to each department to maintain the theory of separation of powers in practice.[4] As checks and balances concerned institutions, which had to be linked in order to exercise control over each other, Madison pointed out that the emphasis in separation of powers should lie in the persons, rather then in their functions. In this way, different institutions might well have a share in the same state function (e g the passing of legislation by the legislature and its signing into law by the head of the executive), but the personnel of government were to be kept strictly separate.

With the ratification of the US Constitution, the modern understanding of separation of powers, including the elements of division and interdependence between different branches of government, was established:

> The constitutional convention of 1787 is supposed to have created a government of 'separated powers'. It did nothing of the sort. Rather, it created a government of separated institutions sharing powers.[5]

With this development also came a giant conceptual leap for modern constitutionalism in general — the idea that, to keep not only the government but also the legislature in check, something higher than law is needed, something that

[1] See Hamilton, Madison & Jay The Federalist No 48 (supra) at 254 ('The legislative department is everywhere extending the sphere of its activity, and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex.')

[2] Hamilton, Madison & Jay (supra) at 257 ('[A] mere demarcation on parchment of the constitutional limits of the several departments, is not a sufficient guard against those encroachments which lead to a tyrannical concentration of all the powers of government in the same hands.' In his writings, Madison pointed out several times that it was fully in line with Montequieu's theory to allow for some mutual interference between the different branches of government.)

[3] Thomas Jefferson Notes on the State of Virginia (1781) Query 13, 4.

[4] James Madison 'Records of the Debates in the Federal Convention of 1787' Notes of July 21, 1787.

[5] Richard E Neustadt Presidential Power: The Politics of Leadership (1966) Chapter 3: 'The Power to Persuade' 33.

determines the legitimacy of all public power. This was the idea of a Constitution as a fundamental law of special rank and status superior to the ordinary law. As stated in Article 16 of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 26 August 1789: 'A society in which the observance of the law is not assured, nor the separation of powers defined, has no constitution at all.'

In the final stage of this process, the connection between the idea of constitutional supremacy and the doctrine of separation of powers led to the development of judicial review of Acts of Parliament in the US, according to the argument that the distinction between a Constitution and a law enacted by the delegated power of the legislature demanded that the judiciary should act as the final arbiter of whether the constitutional limits on the legislature had been observed.[1] Although judicial review was not originally set out in the US Constitution of 1787, and only later developed by the US Supreme Court, it is today part of the fabric of many constitutional states, such as the US, Germany, and South Africa.

(b) Constitutionalism, 'checks and balances' and the 'pure form' of separation of powers

The modern notion of separation of powers as a foundational concept in constitutional law is often said to be premised in organizational theory and therefore primarily concerned with the design of ideal structural and institutional arrangements. Fuelled, further, by the adoption of formal written constitutions encapsulating constitutional rules and arrangements as a modus vivendi, separation of powers is often depicted as a depoliticized, and purely formal, justificatory or descriptive theory of governance.[2]

It is in line with such formalist notions that a 'pure form' of separation of powers has evolved. The doctrine in its 'pure form' has been described as requiring the strictest adherence to the following three principles:

- the division of governmental power into the three branches: legislative, executive and judicial, with no control or interference by one on the other;
- the separation of functions; and
- the separation of personnel.[3]

[1] See Hamilton, Madison & Jay The Federalist No 78 (supra) at 400 ('It is not . . . to be supposed, that the Constitution could intend to enable the representatives of the people to substitute their will to that of their constituents. It is far more rational to suppose, that the courts were designed to be an intermediate body between the people and the legislature, in order, among other things, to keep the latter within the limits assigned to their authority.')

[2] See Martin Loughlin 'Constitutional Law: The Third Order of the Political' in Nicholas Bamford & Peter Leyland (eds) Public Law in a Multi-layered Constitution (2003) 27–51, 46–49.

[3] See Vile (supra) at 14 ('A pure doctrine of separation of powers might be formulated in the following way. It is essential for the establishment and maintenance of political liberty that the government be divided into three branches or departments, the legislature, the executive and the judiciary. To each of these three branches there is a corresponding identifiable function of government, legislative, executive and judicial. Each branch of government must be confined to its own function and not allowed to encroach upon the functions of other branches. Furthermore, the persons who compose these three agencies of government must be kept separate and distinct, no individual being allowed to be at the same time a member of more than one branch.') See also Iain Currie & Johan de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 19 (On an 'absolute' separation of powers.)

This pure form of separation of powers emphasizes negative limits on the powers of political actors in a society. The existence of several autonomous decision-making bodies with distinctive functions is considered a sufficient safeguard against the concentration and abuse of power. Simply by allocating different functions to different people, each of the branches will be a check on the others and no single group of people will be able to control the machinery of the state.[1] The 'pure form' of separation of powers could thus be said to represent a theoretical highpoint at which the doctrinal prescripts are achieved and governmental power is truly separated.

The problem with this negative or pure understanding of separation of powers, however, is that it does not provide for the situation when one of the branches of government (or the people who control it) nevertheless attempts to enlarge their power by encroaching upon the functions of another branch. How are they to be stopped? This inadequacy has led to the modification of the separation of powers doctrine in line with the idea of checks and balances, as described above. The introduction of checks and balances brought positive elements to the doctrine of separation of powers, such as the right of the executive to veto legislation, the power of the legislature to impeach the (head of the) executive, or the power of the judiciary to declare both acts of the legislature and the executive to be unconstitutional and void. As MJC Vile has put it, each branch was given the power to exercise a degree of direct control over the others by authorizing it to play a part, although only a limited one, in the exercise of the others' functions.[2]

At the same time, a system of totally separated powers may lead to a diffused and uncoordinated exercise of power. The doctrine needs 'to avoid diffusing power so completely that the government is unable to take timely measures in the public interest'.[3] Thus, a doctrine of separation of powers needs not only to cater for the case where one of the branches exercises its power improperly. It also has to take account of the fact that, in modern societies, government may need to be organized in a co-ordinated manner to provide for solutions to complex problems.

The aim of checks and balances, therefore, was and still is to create links between the different branches of government to make government in general and the doctrine of separation of powers in particular more efficient. It is important that this deviation from the pure form should be limited: the basic idea of a division of functions remains and is only modified by the fact that each of the branches may assert some specifically defined authority in the field of the others. For example, the executive may have a share in the legislative process through its right to veto legislation, but may not legislate itself.[1] Thus, while the introduction of mutual checks and balances inevitably brings with it some deviation from a complete separation of powers, it is in the overall interests of an effective balance between different centres of power. Separation of powers requires independence as much as it requires interdependence. To quote MJC Vile again:

[1] See Vile (supra) at 14, 19.

[2] Ibid at 20.

[3] De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at para 60. For further endorsement of this proposition, see South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC) at para 24; S v Dodo 2001 (3) SA 382 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 423 (CC) at para 15.

> Without a high degree of independent power in the hands of each branch, they cannot be said to be interdependent, for this requires that neither shall be subordinate to the other. At the same time a degree of interdependence does not destroy the essential independence of the branches.[2]

For these reasons, it is generally well accepted that in practice there is no constitutional system that either aspires or claims to implement the 'pure form' of the separation of powers.[3] Instead, the importance of the 'pure form' of separation of powers can be said to be its utility as an analytical tool, in that by comparing constitutional arrangements as manifested in a particular constitution to the abstract principles embodied in the 'pure form', the existence of different models of separation of powers, ranging from the weak to the strong, becomes more evident.[4] Informed by an individual state's particular history and values, the division of power, functions and personnel, and provision for checks and balances, may differ significantly, despite the fact that the different states may all claim to have incorporated the same doctrine.[5]

Therefore, as MJC Vile has quite incisively noted, the incorporation of separation of powers in a particular constitutional system should not be seen as an end in itself.[6] Instead, the extent of the actual incorporation of the doctrine within a nation's constitutional system should rather be viewed as being reflective of that

[1] Note that in South Africa this right is limited by FC s 79 to questions of constitutionality.

[2] Vile (supra) at 104.

[3] See Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 108 ('There is, however, no universal model of separation of powers, and in democratic systems of government in which checks and balances result in the imposition of restraints by one branch of government over another, there is no separation that is absolute.') See also EFJ Malherbe & IM Rautenbach Constitutional Law (4th Edition, 2004) 78–79; Marius Pieterse 'Coming to Terms with Judicial Enforcement of Socio-Economic Rights' (2004) 20 SAJHR 386.

[4] See Ziyad Motala 'Towards an Appropriate Understanding of the Separation of Powers, and Accountability of the Executive and Public Service under the New South African Order' (1995) 112 SALJ 506–07. Motala notes that there are variations in constitutional models incorporating separation of powers with the US adhering to a model that requires a strict separation of personnel, whilst the model under the South African Interim Constitution (and Final Constitution) was a weaker version premised on a parliamentary system of government that does not envisage a strict separation of personnel, except where the judiciary is concerned.

[5] The prevalence of governmental power being divided up between the three primary branches of the government in national constitutions is that even countries that do not claim to subscribe to the doctrine of separation of powers divide their power up in the same way. See for example, Hogg Canadian Constitutional Law (3rd Edition, 1992) 184 (Points out that 'there is no general' separation of powers. The Act does not separate the legislative, executive and judicial functions and insist that each branch of government exercise only 'its own' function.) See also ibid at 243 -44.

[6] See Vile (supra) at 9–11.

nation's political choices and aspirations, whilst the 'pure form' of the doctrine merely serves as a useful analytical reference point informing the choice of appropriate constitutional principles, rules, processes and institutions.

(c) The different forms of separation of powers

The emphasis in the doctrine of separation of powers, both in its classical meaning and also in contemporary constitutional discourse, falls on the division of state functions between different institutions in one sphere of government. This distinction between 'branches' of government is based on Montesquieu's division of powers: that of making the laws, that of administrating and executing these laws, and that of judging crimes or disputes between individuals. But besides this 'horizontal' separation of powers between different actors in the same sphere of influence, contemporary political and constitutional theory involves several other restrictions on political power by way of separating and dividing different spheres of influence.

An obvious division in this regard is the 'vertical' separation of powers in a state between the local, provincial and national levels of government (or 'spheres of government' as it is put in FC s 40(1)).[1] The entire notion of a federal system of government is based on the separation of powers: the political power of the central government in its different branches is restricted in some areas, which are the domain of smaller territorial entities (the provinces or states).[2] In South Africa, these matters are defined as functional areas of exclusive provincial legislative competence, as set out in Schedule 5 of the Final Constitution.[3]

This division of power between different levels of government as a means to restrict the power of the centre was already present in the feudal societies of medieval Europe and in this way provided the 'bedrock' for constitutionalist ideas about how to limit royal power and the later separation of powers doctrine.[4] The idea that smaller territorial entities could form their own government and exercise their own powers independent of, and autonomous from, a national, central or federal government was also a prominent consideration in the constitutional development of the US.

[1] It has been pointed out that the Constitutional Assembly deliberately used the word 'sphere' instead of 'level' to emphasize co-ordination and different responsibilities, rather than competition and hierarchy. Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux & Barry Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) § 14.1.

[2] This is particularly true for the South African context as the creation of provinces was part of the historic power-sharing compromise between the old regime and the liberation movement. See Bertus de Villiers The Future of Provinces in South Africa — The Debate Continues Konrad-Adenauer Foundation Policy Paper No 2 (October 2007) Chapter 2.

[3] For more details, see Steven Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) § 17.3*(a)*.

[4] See Jan-Erik Lane Constitutions and Political Theory (1996) 21.

> In the compound republic of America, the power surrendered by the people is first divided between two distinct governments [ie state and federal], and then the portion allotted to each subdivided among distinct and separate departments. Hence a double security arises to the rights of the people. The different governments will control each other, at the same time that each will be controlled by itself.[1]

Again, the separation of powers by way of federalism is not an end in itself, but a way to protect 'justice and the general good'. The delegation of political influence to smaller entities also helps to keep decision-making in line with local and regional demands, to ensure spending of public funds in a particular region (and not only in some far away capital city), or to provide generally for some degree of self-determination for one (ethnic or cultural) group on their 'home turf'. At the same time, federalism does not only divide powers between local, provincial and central political actors, but also between the different provinces. In that way, federalism provides for a territorial separation of powers: institutions of one province cannot exercise power on another province's territory.

Of course, as checks and balances accompany the traditional horizontal notion of separation of powers between different branches of government and thus ensure that no branch trespasses onto the other's competence, and that government is not diffused completely, similar interdependencies are part and parcel of the vertical separation of powers between the national and the provincial sphere, too. First, the institutional system of provincial government mirrors that in the national sphere, since in the provinces, too, the legislature and the executive are separated and control each other.[2] In South Africa, this replication does not apply to the judiciary, as this country does not distinguish between provincial and national courts, and has no courts administered by the provinces. Secondly, the provinces participate in the national legislative process through their representation in the National Council of Provinces.[3]

Additionally, the constitutional institution of regular elections can be understood as a means to separate power on a time-line basis. Elections serve the goal of allocating power temporarily to a particular group of representatives. The time factor is crucial, because it guarantees the intended accountability of the elected representatives. As long ago as John Locke it was pointed out that a democratically elected Parliament may be as bad as an unelected monarch, if the legislature is 'in one lasting assembly always in being',[4] because such representatives will lose touch with the electorate over time and pursue only their own interests. Particularly since, between elections, voters have no control over the conduct of their

[1] Hamilton, Madison & Jay The Federalist No 51 (supra) at 267.

[2] For more details, see Tshepo Madlingozi & Stu Woolman 'Provincial Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constituional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 19; and Christina Murray & Okeyrebea Ampofo-Anti 'Provincial Executive Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop Constituional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 20.

[3] See Budlender (supra) at § 17.1*(b)*; Madlingozi & Woolman (supra) at § 19.8.

[4] John Locke Two Treatises of Government 2nd Treatise (1688), Chapter XI para 138.

representatives, the prospect that office-holders may not be re-elected and that they govern on borrowed time ensures that power is not misused.[1] Given this background, the Final Constitution is based on the founding value of regular elections (among other features of democracy) for the explicit purpose of ensuring 'accountability, responsiveness and openness' (FC s 1*(d)*). Regular elections from this vantage point prevent the accumulation of political power and a lack of responsiveness between the elected and the electorate, as envisaged by Locke.

The same argument, of course, is true for time limits in relation to the terms of office of political office-bearers, in particular, the executive. The fact that in South Africa no person may hold office as President for more than two terms (FC s 88(2)) is based on the idea that power accumulation through unlimited rule has to be avoided, not least because historical experience world-wide has shown that rulers who do not fear the possibility of electoral defeat tend to abuse their power.

More recent conceptions of separation of powers have emphasized that the formal notion that a completely independent legislature controls an equally independent executive is to a large extent illusory, and does not mirror real avenues of political influence.[2] In modern democracies, it is political parties which form governments on the basis of their majority in Parliament. The executive not only regularly comprises members of the legislature (e g FC s 91(3) explicitly requires the President to select the majority of Ministers from among the members of the National Assembly). Both the government and the underlying political party (or parties) have — at least in theory — the same political agenda. The political dividing line in a parliamentary system of government does not run primarily between government and Parliament, but rather between the government and the governing party in Parliament, on the one hand, and the opposition parties, on the other. Besides the constitutional separation of power between Parliament and the executive, there is a political separation of power between the governing party and the opposition. Although there are certainly members of the governing party in Parliament who take their oversight function seriously, controlling the political power of government is generally the task of the opposition party. Opposition parties may control the majority by way of public criticism and the constant promise they hold out, however hypothetical, of being voted into power.

Furthermore, because in modern democracies real political influence has shifted from the individual members of Parliament to their parties and, in fact,

[1] See United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR (CC) at para 49.

[2] See Eberhard Schuett-Wetschky 'Gewaltenteilung zwischen Bundestag und Bundesregierung? Nach dem Scheitern des Gewaltenteilungskonzeptes des Parlamentarischen Rates: Gemeinwohl durch Parteien statt durch Staatsorgane?' in Klaus Dicke (ed) Der Demokratische Verfassungsstaat in Deutschland (2001) 67–117.

from constitutional organs to party committees, transparency in the decision-making processes of government has declined. This lack of transparency is partly remedied by the independent media, which ideally provides information for the general public so that officials can be held accountable and self-interested actions can be exposed. This check on government by way of exposure to public criticism, and the important political and social consequences associated with press coverage and the possibility of adverse public opinion, has led to the media being referred to as the 'fourth estate'.[1]

The purpose of pointing out the separation of powers dimension of these different institutions is to show that features and institutions based on the idea of separation of powers are found throughout the Final Constitution — although the phrase itself is not mentioned in the Constitution. In this fashion, other ways of dividing power may be added.[2] While not all of these ways are necessarily derived from the doctrine of separation of powers in the strict sense, they perform the common service of preventing the accumulation of too much power in one institution.

12.3 Separation of powers under the South African Constitution

Before 1994, South African constitutionalism was based on the Westminster system that centralized political power in an elected Parliament.[3] Parliament controlled the executive, but its decisions were not in turn subject to control by any other institution — hence, Parliament was sovereign and superior to the other branches of government.[4] Some aspects of the separation of powers principle were part of the South African legal tradition at this time and, as such, still influence contemporary understandings of this doctrine.[5] For example, members

[1] The term 'estate' here is derived from the French 'état', referring to a particular social class, such as the clergy, nobility and commons (basically ordinary citizens). The term 'fourth estate' for the press as a powerful social force is usually attributed to the eighteenth-century English theorist Edmund Burke. See Julianne Schutz Reviving the Fourth Estate — Democracy, Accountability and the Media (1998) 47–48.

[2] For example, the German political scientist Winfried Steffani has identified a 'constitutional level' of separation of powers, which requires that some decisions need a qualified higher majority in Parliament, a 'decisionmaking level' that takes the different stakeholders of civil society in the formulation of policy decisions into account, and a social separation of powers that recognizes unequal distribution of influence between different classes or strata in society. See Winfried Steffani Gewaltenteilung und Parteien im Wandel (1997).

[3] See Stu Woolman & Jonathan Swanepoel 'Constitutional History' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 2 (The chapter discusses in great detail the constitutional system of government premised on the doctrine of parliamentary supremacy that had its roots in the Westminster system of government which was the bedrock of South Africa's pre-1994 Constitutions. In terms of this system, Parliament could make whatever laws it wanted, whilst the courts' role was limited solely to interpreting the law (that is establishing the will of Parliament). Parliamentary supremacy, as a model of constitutionalism, provided a permissive environment that allowed for the establishment of the apartheid legal framework, and placed governmental laws and policies beyond the review jurisdiction of the courts.)

[4] For a historic account, see Hermann Robert Hahlo & Ellison Kahn The Union of South Africa (1960) 146–163 (Covering the period of the Union of South Africa); Marius Wiechers Staatsreg (2nd Edition, 1967) 249.

[5] See Gretchen Carpenter Introduction to South African Constitutional Law (1987) 158–59.

of the executive were also members of the legislature and thus responsible to it; and the judiciary was, in theory at least, guaranteed independence from both legislative and executive interference. Nevertheless, the distinction between the three branches of government was only formal, and never amounted to a real system of mutual checks and balances. It has therefore been said that the pre-1994 South African constitutional system was not, in fact, founded on the separation of powers.[1]

Furthermore, both in terms of formal constitutional law and in practice, legislative powers were increasingly transferred to the executive, mainly from 1976 onwards. The 1983 'tricameral' Constitution vested supreme power in the executive, with an exceptionally potent State President at the top, and did not contain any substantive power constraints.[2] By then, the traditional concept of parliamentary supremacy had been surpassed by the power of the executive to manipulate legislation.[3] For example, the President could categorize a matter as an 'own affair' of a particular population group and in so doing select the legislative mechanism to be applied in the enactment of statutory provisions dealing with this matter. Additionally, when the three houses of Parliament failed to reach consensus in respect of so-called 'general affairs', the President could activate a 'President's Council' as a substitute legislature.[4] Finally, all these institutions were reserved and limited to a tiny minority of the population and could thus never claim real democratic legitimacy.

In the First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court concluded:

> At the same time the Montesquieuan principle of a threefold separation of state power — often but an aspirational ideal — did not flourish in a South Africa which, under the banner of adherence to the Westminster system of government, actively promoted parliamentary supremacy and domination by the executive. Multi-party democracy had always been the preserve of the white minority but even there it had languished since 1948. The rallying call of apartheid proved irresistible for a white electorate embattled by the spectre of decolonisation in Africa to the north.[5]

(a) Separation of powers in the Interim Constitution and the Constitutional Principles

The end of Westminster-style constitutionalism and the subsequent transformation of South Africa from a racially divided society into a democratic, racially inclusive society brought with it a decisive break with the past and the arrival of a 'new order' based on the ideals of constitutional supremacy. The drafters of [1] See Johan van der Vyver 'The Separation of Powers' (1993) 8 SAPR/PL 177, 185.

[2] Ibid (supra) at 188.
[3] Ibid (supra) at 189.
[4] See Carpenter (supra) at 363–71.
[5] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 6.

the Interim Constitution were faced with many challenges, of which one of the major ones was how power relations in the new South Africa would be mapped out and political power distributed.

There seems to have been consensus among the main players in the negotiations process that the new constitutional order should be based on the separation of powers doctrine.[1] For the pre-1994 South African government (and the National Party behind it), the insistence on separation of powers may have been one aspect of ensuring that the newly elected government established by the formerly disenfranchised did not use its new-found power to engage in regressive and retributive measures.[2]

Nevertheless, the text of the Interim Constitution does not mention the term 'separation of powers'. In the absence of clear textual support, it is the structure of the Constitution itself, and the interplay of the different organs of state, which aim to ensure that political power is not accumulated in one centre, but mitigated and checked by other institutions. The principle of separation of powers was, however, constitutionally entrenched in the Constitutional Principles, which served as a yardstick for the Constitutional Assembly in its drafting of the Final Constitution. Constitutional Principle VI provided as follows:

> There shall be a separation of powers between the legislature, executive and judiciary, with appropriate checks and balances to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness.

As was the case in the historical development of the doctrine, the drafters of the first democratic South African Constitution regarded the separation of powers not as a goal in itself, but as a means to democracy and good governance. To prevent a government pre-occupied with its own self-interest, detached from the people and inclined to non-transparent backroom politics, the Constitution would have to distribute political power between the different branches of government. Notably, Constitutional Principle VI was silent as to the model of separation of powers to be established by the Constitutional Assembly. The structural and institutional choices made by the drafters of the Final Constitution, pursuant to this principle, were subject only to the proviso that the scheme crafted had generally to ensure the promotion and attainment of democratic principles, namely accountability, responsiveness and openness.

The moment of truth came in the First Certification Judgment, in which the Constitutional Court assessed whether the drafters of the Final Constitution had complied with the Constitutional Principles.[3] In this decision, the Constitutional

[1] See, for example, Albie Sachs Protecting Human Rights in a New South Africa (1990) 191. Sachs was, at that time, a member of the ANC's NEC as well as its Constitutional Committee.

[2] According to Allistair Sparks one of the major challenges faced during the negotiations related to allaying fears harboured by many in the white section of the population that the democratic principle of majority rule would not result in black reprisals. Tomorrow is a Another Country (1994) 94. Therefore, according to Sparks: '[M]uch of the new (interim) constitution was devoted to reassuring the white minority that the tables would not be turned on them in a regime of vengeance'.

[3] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment').

Court made it clear that the silence of Constitutional Principle VI with regard to the specific model of separation of powers to be established by the Constitutional Assembly was not a problem, but allowed for a tailor-made solution:

> Within the broad requirement of separation of powers and appropriate checks and balances, the Constitutional Assembly was afforded a large degree of latitude in shaping the independence and interdependence of government branches. The model adopted reflects the historical circumstances of our constitutional development.[1]

The Court emphasized that there is no universal model of separation of powers and that in democratic systems of government in which checks and balances result in the imposition of restraints by one branch of government on another, there is no separation that is absolute.[2] It is notable that the text of the 1996 Constitution makes no express mention of separation of powers. In the First Certification Judgment, the Court did not appear to be in any way constrained by this apparent omission. Instead of looking for the phrase 'separation of powers', it considered whether both the basic structure of the (draft) Final Constitution and its detailed textual provisions were in accordance with the Constitutional Principles.

With regard to the overall thrust of the Constitution, the Constitutional Court remarked rather dryly that an examination of the draft text established that it satisfied the basic structure and premises of the new constitutional order as contemplated in the applicable Constitutional Principles.[3] It held that the principle of separation of powers was complied with through the constitutional provisions in Chapters 4 (Parliament), 5 (the President and National Executive) and 8 (Courts and Administration of Justice) and clauses 47, 89, 92, 165 and 177 of the draft Final Constitution.[4]

Relying on CP VI as its review standard, the Court went on to test the provisions of the draft Final Constitution. While separation of powers concerns were raised with regard to several provisions that regulate the distribution and interplay of governmental powers and functions, as well as the designation of functionaries, the Constitutional Court engaged most thoroughly with the principle in relation to the constitutional provisions which provide for members of the executive also to be members of the legislature in all three spheres of government.[5]

[1] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 112.
[2] Ibid at para 108.
[3] Ibid at para 46.
[4] Ibid at para 46 note 44.
[5] Ibid at paras 106–113. See also the paragraphs in the First Certification Judgment where the Court dealt with challenges raised on the basis that CP VI had not been complied with. Ibid at para 54 (Dealing with the contention that the horizontal application of the Bill of Rights violates the separation of powers in that it allows the courts to alter legislation and thereby to encroach upon the proper terrain of the legislature); para 77 (Using the same argument against the introduction of socio-economic rights); paras 123–32 (Where it was alleged that the participation of the executive in the appointment of judges and acting judges was a breach of separation of powers); paras 185–86 (wherein it was alleged that the constitutional anti-defection clause breached separation of powers.)

In the end, the Constitutional Court declared that such a deviation from the principle that the persons who compose the three branches of government must be kept separate and distinct and that no individual should be allowed to be at the same time a member of more than one branch (as it is the case in the US) was in line with the separation of powers doctrine as envisaged in CP VI. The Court even found a connection between the dual membership provisions and the constitutional rationale of separation of powers: 'The overlap provides a singularly important check and balance on the exercise of executive power. It makes the executive more directly answerable to the elected legislature.'[1]

The Court held that the language of CP VI is sufficiently wide to cover the particular kind of separation that the Final Constitution provided for. In this regard, the Constitutional Court emphasized the purposive understanding of separation of powers, which had already been present during the drafting of the Constitutional Principles, i e to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness: 'We find in the [draft final Constitution] checks and balances that evidence a concern for both the over-concentration of power and the requirement of an energetic and effective, yet answerable, executive.'[2]

This purpose has survived the period of the Interim Constitution and these principles are now enshrined in FC s 1*(d)*. Therefore, although the Constitutional Principles have lost their main function as a yardstick for the Final Constitution in light of the certification of the new constitutional text of 1996, these provisions still inform any analysis of the South African model of separation of powers.

(b) Separation of powers in the Final Constitution

As already indicated, the Final Constitution does not mention the principle of 'separation of powers' anywhere in the text. Hence, in the First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court pointed out that there is no fixed or rigid constitutional doctrine of separation of powers. Rather, the doctrine is to be found in the provisions outlining the functions and structure of various organs of state and their respective independence and interdependence.[3]

Because the doctrine of separation of powers has developed over several centuries and because it has been given expression in many different forms and made subject to checks and balances of many kinds, it is important to understand the appropriate relation between constitutional provisions and any theoretical conception of separation of powers. As indicated with regard to the 'pure form' of the doctrine above, the relation between different branches of government should not be tested against some abstract idea of separation of powers. Instead, any conception of separation of powers has to come from the constitutional text itself and be properly aligned with the particular constitutional system one is looking at.

[1] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 111.
[2] Ibid at para 112.
[3] Ibid at paras 110–11.

Against that background, the Constitutional Court cited with approval the following remark by constitutional scholar Laurence Tribe in respect of the US Constitution:

> We must therefore seek an understanding of the Constitution's separation of powers not primarily in what the Framers thought, nor in what Enlightenment political philosophers wrote, but in what the Constitution itself says and does. What counts is not any abstract theory of separation of powers, but the actual separation of powers 'operationally defined by the Constitution.' Therefore, where constitutional text is informative with respect to a separation of powers issue, it is important not to leap over that text in favour of abstract principles that one might wish to see embodied in our regime of separated powers, but that might not in fact have found their way into our Constitution's structure.[1]

Although the importance of starting in the text as highlighted above is self-evident, it is also important to note that this textual approach has inherent limitations in that it can never tell the entire story with regard to the operational distribution of power and functions; this story only becomes evident through the application and interpretation of the Constitution. And it is here that different conceptions of the doctrine have their significance, provided they are based on the text in the first place:

> At times, text will be sufficient, without necessarily developing an overarching vision of the structure, to decide major cases. . . . Sometimes, however, it will be necessary to extrapolate what amounts to a blueprint of organizational relationships from the fundamental structural postulates one sees as informing the Constitution as a whole.[2]

The exposition of the separation of powers doctrine in South Africa that follows therefore commences by briefly considering the text of the Final Constitution and how it conceptualizes the respective independence and interdependence of the different branches of government. In order to evaluate the extent to which the text accords with or deviates from the 'pure form' of the doctrine it is helpful to recall that the doctrine requires the separation of functions between the three branches of government, the separation of personnel (a person should not be part of more than one of the three branches of government), and generally that one branch of government should not control or interfere with the work of another.

(i) The legislature and the executive

In the co-operative government system applicable in South Africa, the Final Constitution divides legislative authority between the national, provincial and

[1] Laurence Tribe American Constitutional Law Vol 1 (3rd Edition, 2000) 127. This paragraph was cited with approval in S v Dodo 2001 (3) SA 382 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 423 (CC) at para 17 and Van Rooyen & Others v State & Others (General Council of the Bar of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC) at para 34.

[2] Tribe (supra) at 130 (Cited with approval by the South African Constitutional Court in S v Dodo (supra) at para 17.)

local spheres of government. In the following exposition, however, the focus falls solely on the national legislative authority vested in Parliament.[1] The Final Constitution does not provide a description or definition of what legislative authority is, but from FC s 44(1) it can be gleaned that the exercise of legislative authority entails the power to make laws, to amend the Constitution, and to assign or delegate legislative powers to other legislative bodies in another sphere of government. Plenary legislative competence is conferred by the Final Constitution on Parliament, although there is an important substantive constraint on the exercise of legislative authority, in that Parliament must act in accordance with, and within the limits of the Final Constitution (FC s 44(4)) — marking a clear departure from the pre-1994 Westminster system of government. To be more precise, the function of legislating is exercised primarily by Parliament, which is comprised of members of the National Assembly[2] and delegates of the National Council of Provinces.[3] That the legislature is envisaged as an autonomous, deliberative and representative body with its own constitutional power base is evident in the fact that there are constitutional provisions that empower both legislative houses to regulate their own sitting periods[4] and processes,[5] and which confer parliamentary privilege on all members and delegates for all speeches made before the house or its committees.[6]

Executive authority, on the other hand, is vested by the Final Constitution in the President (FC s 85(1)), and is exercised by the President together with the other members of Cabinet (FC s 85(2)). According to the Final Constitution, the executive function is a broad one that entails responsibility for the development, preparation and implementation of national policy and legislation, and the co-ordination of the functions of state departments and the public administration (FC s 85(2)(a)-(e)). In recognition of the immense powers enjoyed by the executive relative to the other branches, the Final Constitution enjoins the President — and by necessary extension the entire Cabinet — to uphold, respect and defend the Constitution as the supreme law (FC s 83*(b)*).

[1] See FC s 43*(a)*. See also Victoria Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa (eds) (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 15; Steven Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 17.

[2] See FC ss 46, 47 for provisions relating to the composition, election and membership of the National Assembly.

[3] See FC ss 60, 61 for provisions relating to the composition and allocation of delegates to the National Council of Provinces.

[4] See FC s 51.

[5] See FC s 57 in respect of National Assembly and FC s 70 in respect of the National Council of Provinces.

[6] See FC s 58 in respect of the National Assembly and FC s 71 in respect of the National Council of Provinces. See also Speaker of the National Assembly v De Lille 1999 (4) SA 863 (SCA), 1999 (11) BCLR 1339 (SCA) at paras 28–30 (Held that FC s 58(1) protects the right to free speech in the Assembly, as it is a fundamental right crucial to representative government in a democratic society.)

Notwithstanding the institutional separation of Parliament and the national executive, the Final Constitution makes provision for the involvement of the executive in the legislative function by allowing members of Cabinet to initiate and introduce legislation in Parliament.[1] In addition to this, the President enjoys the power to summon Parliament to an extraordinary sitting to discuss special business.[2] Furthermore, the legislative process is incomplete without the assent of the President, who has to sign duly passed Bills into law, provided that he or she has no constitutional reservations (FC s 79(1)).

As far as the mixing of personnel is concerned, the majority of the national executive (including the President and the Deputy President) must at the same time be members of the National Assembly. The President, as head of the national executive, is elected from the National Assembly, but ceases to be a member of it from the date of his or her election (FC ss 86(1) and 87). The President enjoys the power to appoint and dismiss Cabinet; however, the President is constrained by the Final Constitution to selecting the Deputy President and all but two members of the Cabinet from the National Assembly (FC s 91(3)). In consequence of this arrangement, the majority of members of Cabinet are simultaneously members of Parliament in similar fashion to parliamentary systems of government. As we have seen, this feature was challenged during the certification process of the Final Constitution, but was justified as a means to ensure accountability of the executive to the legislature.[3] In this respect, therefore, the Final Constitution has adopted a hybrid system of government that combines the features of an executive presidential system (with the Cabinet chosen by the head of the executive and with its members accountable only to him or her) with a parliamentary-style Cabinet mostly drawn from the legislature.[4]

To what extent can Parliament control or interfere with the functions of the executive and vice versa? The Final Constitution clearly places the executive under the scrutiny of the legislature. It is the constitutional duty of the legislature, especially the National Assembly, to oversee the exercise of executive authority in the implementation of legislation and more generally to hold the executive accountable to it, as envisaged in FC s 55(2). Correspondingly, the Final Constitution provides that members of Cabinet are accountable individually and collectively to Parliament (FC s 92(2)), and must provide full and regular reports concerning matters under their control (FC s 92(2)(b)). On the other hand, the President and any member of the Cabinet or any Deputy Minister who is not a

[1] See FC ss 73(2), 85(2)(d).

[2] FC s 42(5). See also FC ss 51(2) and 63(2) for similar provisions in respect of the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces respectively.

[3] First Certification Judgment (supra) at paras 106–13. See also § 12.3*(a)* supra.

[4] See *Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Other*s 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) at para 55; EFJ Malherbe & IM Rautenbach Constitutional Law (4th Edition, 2004) 181; Jonathan Klaaren 'Structures of Government in the 1996 South African Constitution: Putting Democracy Back into Human Rights' (1997) 13 SAJHR 3, 9.

member of the National Assembly may, subject to the rules and orders of the Assembly, attend and speak in the Assembly, but may not vote (FC s 54). The Final Constitution seems to assume that the national executive's duty to explain and justify its conduct to Parliament will ensure that the executive will perform its functions both in accordance with the Constitution and the law and in line with the political convictions of the majority of the National Assembly. As some form of ultima ratio, the National Assembly may force the President and the other members of the Cabinet and any Deputy Ministers, or just the Cabinet, to resign by a vote of no confidence supported by a majority of its members (FC s 102). Finally, according to FC s 89, the National Assembly is empowered to institute proceedings to remove the President when he or she is found to have violated the Constitution or the law, or when the President is found to have engaged in serious misconduct, or when the President is found no longer to be able to perform the functions of his or her office.

This constitutional feature of legislative control of the executive does not mean that government does not enjoy influence over Parliament. In the complex regulatory environment that is modern government the scope of the functions and powers exercised by the executive are necessarily extensive, particularly if one considers the centrality of the executive in the formulation and execution of policy and legislation. Besides the fact that the Final Constitution allows members of Cabinet to initiate and introduce legislation in Parliament, the influence that the executive has in determining the content of legislation cannot be underestimated. The executive's apparent ascendancy in its relations with the legislature may be attributed to the specialized or technical nature of modern governance that requires ever-increasing regulation. The executive's access to specialized skills by virtue of its control of the bureaucracy has positioned it as the primary initiator, drafter and implementer of both policy and legislation.[1]

Of some concern is the relationship between the impeachment provisions of FC s 89 and FC s 47, which prescribe the conditions of membership of the National Assembly. It is clear from FC s 47(1)(e) that anyone who has been finally (i e without a further avenue of appeal) convicted of an offence and sentenced to more than 12 months' imprisonment without the option of a fine cannot become a member of the National Assembly. The same applies to parliamentarians: once an MP has been convicted in this way, he or she ceases to be eligible and, therefore, automatically loses his or her membership of the National Assembly (FC s 47(3)(a)). Since the President has to be elected from among the members of the National Assembly, someone who intends to become President has to be a member of the National Assembly first — and thus must not have a criminal record of the kind contemplated.

[1] See Marius Pieterse 'Coming to Terms with Judicial Enforcement of Socio-Economic Rights' (2004) 20 SAJHR 386, 387–89 for a well-articulated and critical account of the 'stranglehold' that the executive has assumed over the legislature.

This constitutional feature of legislative control of the executive does not mean that government does not enjoy influence over Parliament. In the complex regulatory environment that is modern government the scope of the functions and thus the standards for continuation in the formulation and execution of no confidence and the removal procedure are the only instruments that the Final Constitution provides to force an elected President out of office.

The Final Constitution is silent on whether court proceedings may be instituted or, once instituted, proceed against a person who has been elected President. In our view, such proceedings may be pursued, because the fact that someone does not automatically cease to be President once he or she has been finally convicted and sentenced to more than 12 months' imprisonment only affects the consequences of such a conviction. There is nothing in the Final Constitution that suggests that such a conviction cannot be handed down, or that all legal proceedings have to come to a standstill once a person has been elected President. Certainly, a pending trial requiring personal attendance may be an impediment to the performance of the President's official duties. However, although the judiciary must be sensitive to the status of the head of state,[1] the involvement of an accused in court proceedings is clearly in the interests of justice, and the practical obstacles that come with such involvement do not outweigh the requirement that the President appear in Parliament. Finally, according to FC s 89, the President may only be removed from office on the grounds of serious misconduct or a serious violation of the Constitution or the law (in addition to his or her inability to perform the functions of office). It is, however, the function of the courts to establish whether a serious violation of the Constitution or the law has been committed. Therefore, if the courts were not allowed to pass judgment in a case involving an incumbent President, MPs would be left to speculate whether the law or the Constitution had been violated, and the impeachment procedure would be without foundation in the rule of law.

On the other hand, a sentence of imprisonment could hardly be executed while the President remained in office. In the light of the wide array of presidential duties and functions outlined in FC s 84, any actual confinement would prevent a President from performing his or her duties and would therefore for all practical purposes remove him or her from office. Such a de facto removal from office might be construed as a violation of FC s 89, which requires a resolution adopted with a supporting vote of at least two thirds of the members of the National Assembly for a removal to take effect.

(ii) The judiciary

FC s 165 vests judicial authority in the courts, which are independent and 'subject only to the Constitution and the law'. This section also stipulates that the courts are enjoined to apply the Constitution and the law 'impartially and without fear, favour or prejudice'.[1] The importance of the functional and institutional independence of the courts finds expression in FC s 165(4), which provides that the other organs of state must take measures to 'assist and protect' the courts to ensure their 'independence, impartiality, dignity, accessibility and effectiveness'.

[1] See President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC)('SARFU III') at para 243.

The Final Constitution establishes a hierarchy of courts.[2] Within this hierarchy the Constitutional Court is designated as the apex court in all constitutional matters, whilst the Supreme Court of Appeal is the apex court for all non-constitutional matters.[3] The supremacy of the courts in matters of constitutional interpretation makes the judiciary an immensely powerful branch. The judiciary's constitutionally ordained role as an independent and impartial arbiter with the power to review the constitutionality of all law and conduct makes it an important check on, and counterweight to, the other two branches.[4]

With regard to the executive, which is bound by the Constitution and the ordinary law (either in its statutory or common-law form), judicial review is a central aspect of the doctrine of legality, which in itself is part of the rule of law and a long established principle of South African law.[5] Today, the supremacy clause in FC s 2 binds the executive to the Constitution, subjects all Presidential action to the Constitution and leaves no room for prerogative powers outside the scope of judicial review.[6]

With regard to Acts of Parliament, judicial review is part of the change in South Africa from the pre-1994 Westminster system of parliamentary supremacy to a system of constitutional supremacy. Thus, FC s 172 provides for competent courts to declare that any law inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency, with the Constitutional Court making the final

[1] See also the prescribed text of the oath or solemn affirmation of Judicial Officers in Schedule 2 of the Final Constitution.

[2] FC s 166*(a)-(e)* sets out the hierarchy of courts as follows: the Constitutional Court; the Supreme Court of Appeal; the High Courts; the magistrates' courts and any other courts established or recognized by an Act of Parliament. Subsequent sections of the Final Constitution set out the jurisdictional limits of the various courts.

[3] FC ss 167(3) and 168(3) respectively. For more details, see Sebastian Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 4.

[4] But note that FC s 170 precludes the magistrates' courts and other courts of a status lower than the High Court from reviewing the constitutionality of legislation or conduct of the President.

[5] See Ben Beinart The Rule of Law (1962) 99 and 102.

[6] See President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at paras 8, 12, 13 and 28. See also Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA in re: the Ex Parte Application of the President of the RSA & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) at paras 20, 33, 50 and SARFU III (supra) at para 148.

decision whether an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or conduct of the President is constitutional (FC s 167(5)).[1]

The power conferred upon the courts in this regard is irrefutably substantial, but should nevertheless not be overstated as it is in the main limited to single determinations of the constitutionality of laws made by the legislature that the executive is require to enforce. Although the courts therefore have the power to interfere with the political process, they lack the capacity to act on their own initiative. A court's power as a political actor outside of an actual dispute is rather limited compared to the other two branches. Nevertheless, the potential for dysfunctional institutional relations, or for the sort of constitutional crisis that may result from too expansive a judicial role, has often been highlighted.[2]

In its relations with the other two branches of government, the judiciary enjoys independence (FC s 165(2) and (3)). Both institutional and operational independence are necessary incidents of the constitutional injunction that the courts must apply the law impartially. The Final Constitution makes provision for such independence by guaranteeing judges' security of tenure and by providing that salaries, allowances and benefits of judges may not be reduced (FC s 176).[3]

Furthermore, both for the appointment of judges and their removal from office, the independent Judicial Services Commission (JSC) is inserted between the executive and the judiciary, with the process for the removal of a judge from office being rather onerous.[4] Although the most potent check available to members of the legislature or the executive against the judiciary lies in their power to

[1] The immense powers enjoyed by judges in a constitutional system like South Africa's that establishes a system of constitutional review will always raise issues of counter-majoritarianism. The fact that a group of unelected judges has the power to thwart the democratic will of the majority has been the source of a great deal of controversy and will no doubt be an issue that will inform the perceived and actual role of the courts in the development of South Africa's constitutional jurisprudence. On counter-majoritarianism, see Alexander Bickel The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics (1962); Dennis Davis, Matthew Chaskalson & Johan de Waal 'Democracy and Constitutionalism: The Role of Constitutional Interpretation' in Dawid van Wyk, John Dugard, Bertus De Villiers & Dennis Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism (1994) 6–11; Iain Currie & Johan de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 9–10; and George Devenish The South African Constitution (2005) 18–20.

[2] See Iain Currie 'Judicious Avoidance' (1999) 15 SAJHR 158 (Currie makes the point that, although the power to have the last word on the meaning of the Constitution is an 'awesome' one, it is one which must be construed in light of the fact that the courts are not the only interpreters of the Constitution, and that the legislature is equally entitled and empowered to interpret the Constitution. In interpreting the Constitution, the court should exercise its powers in accordance with the 'salutary rule' followed in the US that requires that a court 'should never anticipate a question of constitutional law in advance of the necessity to decide it'.) See also Patrick Lenta 'Judicial Restraint and Overreach' (2004) 20 SAJHR 544 (Lenta argues that the judiciary and the legislature can rightly be perceived as being in competition as far as the exercise of their 'discretionary' interpretive powers is concerned.)

[3] These guarantees are essential for the independence of any judicial officer and crucial for maintain the separation of powers. See Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 128.

[4] See FC s 174 for the procedure for appointments of judicial officers and FC s 177 for the procedure in respect of the removal of judges.

initiate proceedings for the removal of judges via the Judicial Services Commission (JSC), this is only possible on the very limited grounds of incapacity, gross incompetence or gross misconduct. Where the JSC makes such a finding, the removal proceedings will come under consideration by the National Assembly, which may resolve by a two thirds vote of all its members to order that a judge be removed. Where such resolution is passed, the President must effect the removal of that judge. Therefore, the ability of the legislative and executive branches directly to influence the operation or composition of the courts is constitutionally limited, which is important if the overt politicization of the courts is to be avoided.

The Constitutional Court has placed the independence and impartiality of the judiciary at the centre of the South African constitutional system and linked it to the separation of powers principle.

> An essential part of the separation of powers is that there be an independent judiciary. . . . What is crucial to the separation of powers and the independence of the judiciary is that the judiciary should enforce the law impartially and that it should function independently of the legislature and the executive.[1]

And on another occasion:

> The separation of the judiciary from the other branches of government is an important aspect of the separation of powers required by the Constitution, and is essential to the role of the courts under the Constitution. Parliament and the provincial legislatures make the laws but do not implement them. The national and provincial executives prepare and initiate laws to be placed before the legislatures, implement the laws thus made, but have no law-making power other than that vested in them by the legislatures. . . . Under our Constitution it is the duty of the courts to ensure that the limits to the exercise of public power are not transgressed. Crucial to the discharge of this duty is that the courts be and be seen to be independent.[2]

Judicial independence manifests itself in the absence of external interference in the assessment of the facts of a case and the application of the law.[3] But institutional and functional independence (referred to in FC s 166(3) and in the First Certification Judgment) are equally important. These aspects of independence require judicial control over administrative decisions that bear directly and immediately

[1] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 123.

[2] South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC) at para 25.

[3] See De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at para 70 (Constitutional Court quoted with approval the Canadian Supreme Court on judicial independence: '[T]he generally accepted core of the principle of judicial independence has been the complete liberty of individual judges to hear and decide the cases that come before them: no outsider — be it government, pressure group, individual or even another judge — should interfere in fact, or attempt to interfere, with the way in which a judge conducts his or her case and makes his or her decision. . . . The ability of individual judges to make decisions on concrete cases free from external interference or influence continues . . . to be an important and necessary component of the principle.' Canada v Beauregard (1986) 30 DLR (4th) 481, 491.) on the exercise of the judicial function, i e the budget of the institution, the human resources available to the court, and the way it conducts its business.[1] This institutional independence of the judiciary was the concern of many observers, both from inside and outside the judiciary, when, in December 2005, the Department of Justice and Constitutional Development published the Constitution Fourteenth Amendment Bill for comment.[2] The Bill, among other things, proposed placing the administration of the courts in the hands of the executive and was perceived by many as an attack on the independence of the judiciary.[3] It was suggested by these commentators that the proposed changes, in terms of which the government would have exercised greater control over the functioning of the judiciary, were harmful, and would reverse the evolving process of judicial independence — a view to which we fully subscribe. As at the time of writing, however, the Bill had not been tabled in Parliament, and whether the government still intends to do so, and, if so, in what form, remains to be seen.

Judicial independence is measured by an objective standard based on whether a well-informed, thoughtful and reasonable person would perceive a court to be independent.[4] This perception has to be based on a balanced view of all the material information, with the objective observer being sensitive to South Africa's complex social realities, in touch with its evolving patterns of constitutional development, and guided by the Final Constitution, its values and the distinction it makes between different levels of courts.[5]

[1] See Valente v The Queen (1985) 24 DLR (4th) 161, 171 ('It is generally agreed that judicial independence involves both individual and institutional relationships: the individual independence of a judge, as reflected in such matters as security of tenure, and the institutional independence of the court or tribunal over which he or she presides, as reflected in its institutional or administrative relationships to the executive and legislative branches of government . . . The relationship between these two aspects of judicial independence is that an individual judge may enjoy the essential conditions of judicial independence but if the court or tribunal over which he or she presides is not independent of the other branches of government, in what is essential to its function, he or she cannot be said to be an independent tribunal.' This passage was quoted with approval in De Lange v Smuts (supra) at para 159.)

[2] GN 2023 in GG 28334 of 14 December 2005. The Constitution Fourteenth Amendment Bill was introduced in conjunction with a package of Bills, comprising the Superior Courts Bill (B52–2003), the Judicial Service Commission Amendment Bill, the South African National Justice Training College Draft Bill, and the Judicial Conduct Tribunal Bill.

[3] See Cathi Albertyn 'Current Developments — Judicial Independence and the Constitution Fourteenth Amendment Bill' (2006) 22 SAJHR 126 (Contains additional references). Cf Proceedings of the General Council of the Bar Human Rights Committee Conference on the Justice Bills, Judicial Independence and the Restructuring of the Courts, Johannesburg (17 February 2006).

[4] The test was originally developed with regard to judicial bias. See President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 1999 (4) SA 147 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 725 (CC) (SARFU II) at para 48. It was later endorsed for independence. See Van Rooyen & Others v the State & Others (General Council of the Bar of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC)('Van Rooyen') at paras 33–34.

[5] Van Rooyen (supra) at paras 33–34.

The fact that courts operate at different levels has a direct impact on judicial independence, because the Final Constitution allows the complexity of the court system to be taken into account:

> Judicial independence can be achieved in a variety of ways; the most rigorous and elaborate conditions of judicial independence need not be applied to all courts, and it is permissible for the essential conditions for independence to bear some relationship to the variety of courts that exist within the judicial system.[1]

The main point is that institutional independence is a constitutional principle and therefore that the constitutional protection of the core value of judicial independence is not subject to any limitations.[2] The specific ways in which judicial independence has manifested itself are discussed later in this chapter.

(iii) Independent constitutional institutions

A specific feature of the Final Constitution is the establishment of constitutional bodies, which enjoy independence from all the other branches of government. This first and foremost refers to the state institutions supporting constitutional democracy provided for in Chapter 9.[3] These institutions are protected against all the other branches of government in that no person or organ of state may interfere with their functioning (FC s 181(4)).

Other constitutional bodies outside Chapter 9 are also expressly independent:

- the Municipal Demarcation Board, established as an independent authority in terms of FC s 155(3)(b);[4]

[1] Van Rooyen (supra) at paras 27–28.

[2] Ibid at paras 22, 35.

[3] These institutions are extensively covered elsewhere in this work: See Michael Bishop & Stu Woolman 'Public Protector' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24A; Stu Woolman & Yolandi Schutte 'Auditor General' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chaper 24B; Jonathan Klaaren 'South African Human Rights Commission' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 24C; Catherine Albertyn 'Commission for Gender Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 24D; Justine White 'Independent Communications Authority of South Africa' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24E; Stu Woolman & Julie Soweto Aullo 'Commission for the Promotion and Protection of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24F; and Glenda Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2005) Chapter 29.

[4] The Constitutional Court has held that the independence of the Board is crucial to South African constitutional democracy and that it should be able to perform its functions without being constrained in any way by the national or provincial governments. See Executive Council Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs; Executive Council KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at para 55; Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2006 (5) SA 47 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 622 (CC)('Matatiele I') at para 41.

- the Public Service Commission, the independence of which is provided for in FC s 196(2);
- the Independent Complaints Directorate of the South African Police Service, established in terms of FC s 206(6);
- the Financial and Fiscal Commission, the independence of which is provided for in FC s 220(2); and
- the Central Bank (South African Reserve Bank), which must perform its functions independently according to FC s 224(2).

Additionally, the Final Constitution provides for institutions that have to exercise their mandate with a degree of impartiality, although the word 'independence' is not expressly used: the Judicial Service Commission (FC s 178),[1] and the National Prosecuting Authority (FC s 179).[2]

These institutions enjoy a somewhat hybrid status. All of them are asked to perform their duties with a degree of independence, which places them outside the usual administrative structures of government. They also all have important supervisory and watchdog functions. In performing these functions, they sometimes assist the executive in its decision-making (e g the Financial and Fiscal Commission), complement and support Parliament in its oversight function (eg the Human Rights Commission), or enhance the judiciary by ensuring professional and ethical standards in the appointment and promotion of judges (the Judicial Service Commission). The Final Constitution or the relevant legislation guarantees the key personnel in these institutions some sort of tenure security and limits the grounds for their removal. Of course, the degree of independence or impartiality of these institutions varies, but the common thread running through their governing provisions is that government may not interfere with their decisions and affairs.

The Final Constitution guarantees the independence and impartiality of the Independent Electoral Commission (IEC), the Public Protector, the Auditor-General and possibly also the Human Rights Commission to such a high degree that it mirrors the independence of the judiciary. In our view, therefore, it makes sense to regard these institutions as falling outside the traditional trias politica, the three-fold division of power in the classical understanding of separation of powers. Their specific constitutional status puts them beyond the legislature, executive and judiciary and creates a further dimension to the separation of powers in South Africa. This point has been most clearly emphasized with regard to the IEC:

[1] But the Constitutional Court has held that the JSC is 'an independent body'. First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 128.

[2] See First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 146 ('Section 179(4) provides that the national legislation must ensure that the prosecuting authority exercises its functions without fear, favour or prejudice. There is accordingly a constitutional guarantee of independence, and any legislation or executive action inconsistent therewith would be subject to constitutional control by the courts.')

> Our Constitution has created institutions like the Commission that perform their functions in terms of national legislation but are not subject to national executive control. The very reason the Constitution created the Commission — and the other chapter 9 bodies — was so that they should be and manifestly be seen to be outside government.[1]

As regards the Public Protector and the Auditor-General, the Constitutional Court remarked that these institutions perform sensitive functions that require their independence and impartiality to be beyond question, and are protected by stringent provisions in the Final Constitution.[2] In reference to the Judicial Service Commission, the Constitutional Court used the language of separation of powers and held that the Commission provides 'a check and balance to the power of the executive' to make judicial appointments.[3] Of course, the IEC and the other institutions perform a public function that may even be described as governmental. But, according to the Constitutional Court, there is a distinction between the state and government, and the independence of the Chapter 9 institutions is intended to refer to independence from the government.[4] In short, they are part of governance, but not part of government.[5]

Not all of the constitutional bodies and institutions mentioned above can be considered to be part of a 'fourth branch of government'. In fact, the majority of them were established to assist the executive in the application and execution of the law. For example, the National Prosecuting Authority has the power to institute criminal proceedings on behalf of the state and is more associated with the executive branch than the judicial branch of government, with the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development exercising final responsibility over it in terms of FC s 179(6).[6] In addition, the Constitutional Court has held that the functions of the Public Service Commission are materially different to those of the Public Protector and the Auditor-General.[7] The separation of powers principle, however, does not necessarily require independent bodies to form an additional branch of government (although with regard to the IEC we do think that such a classification is warranted). Rather, the separation of powers principle in South Africa guarantees their independence, requiring all other branches of government, in particular the executive, to respect these institutions' domain of influence and not to interfere with their decisions. Both institutional and functional independence are crucial for these institutions to perform their constitutional mandate appropriately and to perform their role in good governance.

[1] Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality 2001 (3) SA 925 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC)('IEC v Langeberg Municipality') at para 31.

[2] Ex Parte Chairperson of the National Assembly: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 142 ('Second Certification Judgment').

[3] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 124.

[4] See IEC v Langeberg Municipality (supra) at para 27.

[5] Parliament of the Republic of South Africa Report of the Ad Hoc Committee on the Review of Chapter 9 and Associated Institutions. A Report to the National Assembly of the Parliament of South Africa (2007) 10.

[6] See First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 141.

[7] Second Certification Judgment (supra) at para 142.

Against this background, the Constitutional Court has held that the IEC must enjoy financial independence, administrative independence (especially relating to the institution's control over administrative decisions that bear directly and immediately on the exercise of its constitutional mandate) and independence with regard to appointments procedures and the security of tenure of appointed office-bearers.[1] Even the National Prosecuting Authority enjoys independence from the government in so far as the prosecution of individual cases is concerned.[2]

Of course, none of the institutions mentioned above exists in a constitutional vacuum. Their powers are checked and balanced against those of the other three branches: the heads of these institutions are usually elected by the National Assembly; in some cases members of the commissions are also appointed by the executive. Chapter 9 institutions are also accountable to the legislature. Finally, their conduct can be challenged in the courts. But their constitutional mandate must not be impaired by any other branch. This is not only true for the executive, but also for the legislature. This was the essence of a Constitutional Court decision in which it held that Parliament could not make a law allowing the executive the discretion to reject a municipal boundary determined by the Municipal Demarcation Board.[3] In another case, Matatiele I, the Court was asked whether Parliament could 'usurp' the Board by passing a constitutional amendment, effectively overriding the Board's decision. The Court did not answer this question in general terms (in theory, any of these institutions could be abolished by constitutional amendment), but held that, if Parliament could base its conduct on another constitutional power (in Matatiele I, its power to redefine provincial boundaries), such exercise of power could legitimately curtail the powers of independent bodies in so far as this was reasonably necessary.[4]

[1] See New National Party v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC) at paras 98–99.

[2] It is necessary to draw a distinction between the setting of prosecutorial policy and exercise of prosecutorial discretion in individual cases. According to FC s 179(5)(a) and s 21 National Prosecuting Authority Act 32 of 1998, the National Director of Public Prosecutions must formulate prosecutorial policy with the concurrence of the Minister of Justice. In the in setting of such policy the approval of the Minister of Justice is needed and the National Director does not enjoy independence. The same applies to various duties on the National Director to provide information and submit reports to the Minister. On the other hand, although the National Director of Public Prosecutions must observe prosecutorial policy during the prosecution process and exercise his powers and perform his functions in respect of this policy, this does not affect the exercise of prosecutorial discretion. Neither the Constitution nor the Act grants any power to the Minister regarding the exercise of prosecutorial discretion in individual cases. As such, individual decisions regarding whether or not to prosecute in a particular case are not within the purview of the Minister's 'final responsibility', but rest in the exclusive independent discretion of the prosecuting authority, and ultimately the National Director. See Hannah Woolaver & Michael Bishop 'Submission to the Enquiry into the National Director of Public Prosecutions by the South African Institute for Advanced Constitutional, Public, Human Rights and International Law (SAIFAC)' (2008) 21:2 Advocate 30.

[3] See Executive Council Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs; Executive Council KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at para 68.

[4] Matatiele I (supra) at paras 48–51.

(c) Beyond the text: separation of powers as a living doctrine

The text of the Final Constitution, as shown above, provides for the establishment of three co-equal branches of government with differing but complementary roles in the South African constitutional system. It is apparent from the text that all three branches are competent interpreters of the Constitution,[1] albeit each within its constitutionally prescribed domain.[2] Unlike the case in other jurisdictions, the inclusion of a justiciable bill of rights and express powers of judicial review has made it unnecessary to consider which branch has the power finally to decide the meaning of the Constitution.[3] The Constitutional Court is quite clearly the final and authoritative interpreter of the Constitution, enjoying the last word on all constitutional matters.[4]

This institutional function of the Constitutional Court covers every aspect of the Final Constitution, including the constitutional powers of the three branches of government and their relationship inter se. This creates a paradox in that the Constitutional Court is authorized to regulate itself. In particular, in the field of separation of powers, the Court can and does determine its own constitutional mandate.

The Constitutional Court has addressed this paradox in two ways. On the one hand, it has employed a flexible approach to separation of powers issues on the understanding that the Final Constitution provides for a unique and distinctive model of separation of powers. On the other hand, it has ensured its exceptional position in the constitutional structure by asserting that separation of powers issues (involving the judiciary or not) are not any less subject to constitutional scrutiny than any other provision of the Constitution.

[1] See Lourens du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) § 32.2 (Supremacy clause demands that all those who are obligated by and somehow benefit from the Final Constitution — and not only (or even primarily) courts of law (with the Constitutional Court at the helm) — are authorized readers and therefore interpreters of the Final Constitution.)

[2] Although employing a different phraseology with respect to the three branches of government, it is quite evident that the Constitution requires all three branches to exercise their powers and fulfil their duties in a constitutional manner. See, for example, FC s 44(4) with respect to Parliament, FC s 83*(b)* with respect to the President (and by necessary extension Cabinet as a whole), and FC s 165(2) with respect to the judiciary. This requirement may be understood to mean that in fulfilling their functions each branch must have regard to what the Constitution permits and demands even though the interpretation of the details may vary. See also FC s 41(1)(d), which provides that '[a]ll spheres of government and all organs of state within each sphere must be loyal to the Constitution, the Republic and its people.'

[3] For example, in the US Constitution, there is no provision that explicitly provides for judicial review. It was only as a result of the seminal decision of Chief Justice Marshall in Marbury v Madison 5 US (Cranch) 137 (1803) that the federal courts assumed the power to engage in judicial review for constitutionality of legislation. See generally Heinz Klug 'Introducing the Devil: An Institutional Analysis of the Power of Constitutional Review' (1997) 13 SAJHR 185.

[4] FC s 167(3)(a) states that the Constitutional Court is the highest court in all constitutional matters, while FC s 167(3)(c) confers upon the Constitutional Court the final say in determining whether a matter is a constitutional matter or not. See Sebastian Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) § 4.3.(f).

(i) A distinctively South African model of separation of powers

When the membership of Parliament by Cabinet Ministers was challenged during the certification of the Final Constitution, the objectors based their criticism on the fact that such dual membership was in violation of the separation of powers principle as practised in other countries around the world. As indicated above, the Constitutional Court found the possibility that members of the executive could at the same time be members of Parliament constitutionally justified.[1] In so doing, the Constitutional Court rejected the objectors' argument that the manner in which the separation of powers principle is instantiated in other parts of the world is decisive for the understanding of this principle in South Africa. Instead, the Court coined the idea of a specifically South African model of separation of powers:

> Within the broad requirement of separation of powers and appropriate checks and balances, the [Constitutional Assembly] was afforded a large degree of latitude in shaping the independence and interdependence of government branches. The model adopted reflects the historical circumstances of our constitutional development. We find in the [Constitution] checks and balances that evidence a concern for both the over-concentration of power and the requirement of an energetic and effective, yet answerable, executive. A strict separation of powers has not always been maintained; but there is nothing to suggest that the [Constitutional Principles] imposed upon the [Constitutional Assembly] an obligation to adopt a particular form of strict separation, such as that found in the United States of America, France or the Netherlands.[2]

The Court emphasized that there is no universal model of separation of powers and that the relationship between the different branches of government, and the power or influence that one branch of government has over the other, differ from one country to another.[3] In fact, the Court found that 'separation of powers' is an umbrella concept, open to all sorts of content:

> [T]he separation of powers doctrine is not a fixed or rigid constitutional doctrine, it is given expression in many different forms and made subject to checks and balances of many kinds.[4]

In its 1998 decision in De Lange v Smuts NO & Others, the Court referred to its earlier holding in the First Certification Judgment and further developed the framework for interpreting separation of powers under the Final Constitution:

> [O]ver time our Courts will develop a distinctively South African model of separation of powers, one that fits the particular system of government provided for in the Constitution and that reflects a delicate balancing, informed both by South Africa's history and its new dispensation, between the need, on the one hand, to control government by separating

[1] See § 12.3.(b)(i) supra.
[2] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 112.
[3] Ibid at para 108.
[4] Ibid at para 111.

> powers and enforcing checks and balances and, on the other, to avoid diffusing power so completely that the government is unable to take timely measures in the public interest. . . . This is a complex matter which will be developed more fully as cases involving separation of powers issues are decided.[1]

The notion of a 'distinctively South African model of separation of powers' introduced by Ackermann J in this passage has had an enduring influence on the way the separation of powers doctrine is understood.[2] Save for highlighting the point that the model must be grounded in South Africa's particular circumstances and needs, the notion of a 'distinctively South African model of separation of powers' is conceptually empty. Its importance, however, lies in its recognition of the fact that where separation of powers is concerned there are no immutable principles, predetermined answers or international precedents that must be followed by South African courts. Instead, the model is one that must develop over time based on interpretations of the Final Constitution as it operates in the South African politico-legal context.

This patriotic approach notwithstanding, the Constitutional Court has, in several judgments, made reference to aspects of the separation of powers doctrine in other constitutions. Any emphasis on the particular South African model of separation of powers, therefore, does not mean that the Court disregards foreign models. Rather, the Court uses the distinctiveness of the South African model to deviate from a review standard applicable in other countries where necessary. As foreign concepts are not to be slavishly followed, the Constitutional Court can deploy them according to its own institutional needs. This 'pick-and-choose' approach is particularly useful in separation of powers matters, because such matters often touch on the delicate balance between the different branches of government and thus on issues of extreme political sensitivity.

(ii) Justiciability of the separation of powers principle

There is no express reference to 'separation of powers' in the Final Constitution. Nevertheless, in a large number of cases litigants have relied upon this principle, either expressly or implicitly, to formulate their complaints. This has raised the question of what the exact basis for invoking the separation of powers doctrine as a justiciable principle is. In the First Certification Judgment, it was enough for the Constitutional Court to point out that the principle was implicit in the text since no one had suggested that there had not been an adequate separation of the judicial power from the legislative and executive power, or that there had not been an adequate separation of the respective functions of the legislature, the executive and the judiciary.[3]

[1] De Lange v Smuts 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at paras 60–61.

[2] See South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC) at para 24; S v Dodo 2001 (3) SA 382 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 423 (CC) at para 15.

[3] See First Certification Judgment (supra) at paras 107 and 113.

In Heath,[1] however, the question arose whether a principle not expressly mentioned in the Final Constitution could be relied upon in constitutional proceedings. The High Court had answered this question in the negative, holding that a legislative provision cannot be set aside on grounds that it is inconsistent with what, at best, is no more than a 'tacit' principle of the Constitution.[2] The Constitutional Court rejected this restrictive approach, first by recognizing separation of powers as an implicit or implied provision of the Final Constitution,[3] as it had done before with other principles not expressly mentioned,[4] and then by stating that such implicit provisions are no less justiciable than express provisions:

> I cannot accept that an implicit provision of the Constitution has any less force than an express provision. . . . The Constitutions of the United States and Australia, like ours, make provision for the separation of powers by vesting the legislative authority in the Legislature, the executive authority in the Executive, and the judicial authority in the Courts. The doctrine of separation of powers as applied in the United States is based on inferences drawn from the structure and provisions of the Constitution, rather than on an express entrenchment of the principle. In this respect, our Constitution is no different. . . . There can be no doubt that our Constitution provides for such a separation and that laws inconsistent with what the Constitution requires in that regard are invalid.[5]

The effect of this dictum seems clear: separation of powers may be relied upon directly by litigants in proceedings before the courts. Like any express right or principle in the Final Constitution, the principle of separation of powers is justiciable.

Besides this unequivocal proposition, however, there is a second, more subtle, consequence that follows from the Court's holding. It is that, as in other jurisdictions, separation of powers is apparent from the detailed provisions of the Final Constitution setting out the respective powers of the legislature, the executive and

[1] South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC)('Heath').

[2] South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others 2000 (10) BCLR 1131, 1160A (T)(Coetzee AJ).

[3] Heath (supra) at para 19 (The Court preferred to use the words 'implicit' or 'implied' to refer to unexpressed constitutional terms rather than 'tacit' because the law of contract draws a distinction between tacit and implied terms and the making of such a distinction in the context of the Constitution may be understood as an endorsement of the doctrine of original intent, which the Court wanted to avoid.)

[4] For the principle of legality, see Fedsure Life Assurance & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC) at para 58.

[5] Heath (supra) at paras 20–22 (footnotes omitted). The Court referred to several other decisions in which it had invoked the separation of powers principle. See, eg, First Certification Judgment (supra); *Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Other*s 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC); De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC); Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA & Another: In re Ex parte President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC); and Bernstein & Others v Bester & Others NNO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC).

the judiciary (as well as, one might add, the powers of local government, the provinces and other institutions under the Final Constitution, like the institutions supporting constitutional democracy). These provisions, when read and interpreted cumulatively, constitute the distinctively South African model of separation of powers:

> The constitutional principle of separation of powers . . . is not simply an abstract notion; it is reflected in the very structure of our government. The structure of the provisions entrusting and separating powers between the legislative, executive and judicial branches reflects the concept of separation of powers.[1]

Since the Final Constitution is supreme law and any law or conduct inconsistent with it is unconstitutional, any of the specific provisions may obviously be relied upon in a constitutional challenge. For example, a litigant may rely on the provisions pertaining to the independence of the judiciary, such as FC s 165. Or a litigant may bring a challenge based on the alleged violation of the exclusive power vested in provincial legislatures under FC s 104 read with Schedule 5 of the Final Constitution. These are all separation of powers challenges, although their true nature lies in the underlying provisions of the Final Constitution on which they are based. These underlying provisions are express provisions. To refer to separation of powers as an 'implicit provision', therefore, is slightly misleading, since it tends to ignore the fact that separation of powers challenges may in many cases be based on express provisions.

On the other hand, the notion of a self-standing separation of powers principle derived from these provisions allows the Constitutional Court (and of course litigants) to develop constitutional standards and rules that may not be traced back to any particular provision, but rather follow from the interplay between the different branches of government, and their respective powers and functions. The principle of separation of powers is not only a technical term for the sum of all the express provisions dealing with the powers and functions of the different branches of government. It is also the source of abstract rules and principles which re-shape these powers and functions and the way in which they may be used as checks and balances. Thus, the whole principle of separation of powers is more than the sum of its parts, i e the express provisions. In recognizing separation of powers as a justiciable principle, it is not necessary for the Court to determine a specific basis for a rule derived from this principle beyond what is expressed in the language of the Constitution. This is the core feature of the relationship between textual provisions and overarching principles, as formulated by Laurence Tribe and endorsed by the Constitutional Court:

> At times, text will be sufficient, without necessarily developing an overarching vision of the structure, to decide major cases. . . . Sometimes, however, it will be necessary to extrapolate what amounts to a blueprint of organizational relationships from the fundamental structural postulates one sees as informing the Constitution as a whole.[2]

[1] Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC) at para 37.

[2] Laurence Tribe American Constitutional Law Vol 1 (3rd Edition, 2000) 130.

The remainder of this chapter sets out the general principles and doctrines applicable to these organizational relationships, as derived from the principle of separation of powers, which, in turn, is derived from the text of the Final Constitution as a whole.

(d) Emerging general principles and doctrines of separation of powers

(i) Legislature, executive and judiciary between pre-eminent domains and checks and balances

As indicated in our explanation of how the Final Constitution conceptualizes the separation of powers, both in its express provisions and in the overarching structure of inter-branch relations, there is no 'absolute separation of powers'. The Constitutional Court, too, has rejected any attempt to read the Final Constitution as embodying the 'pure form' of separation of powers. Instead, the powers, functions and institutions of the legislature, executive and judiciary are interrelated. This principle notwithstanding, the way separation of powers issues have been addressed by the Constitutional Court shows that, in South African constitutional law, understanding the nature of each branch's separate (or pre-eminent) domain is as important for the theoretical and practical elaboration of the separation of powers principle as the acknowledgement of mutual checks and balances.

In fact, the Constitutional Court has recognized that the separation of powers principle guarantees the unobstructed exercise of powers and functions and the integrity of each particular branch of government in a way similar to the way in which individuals enjoy rights in the Bill of Rights. In this sense, the principle of pre-eminent domain protects the core functions and powers of each branch of government against intrusions from outside, while other intrusions are treated as checks and balances. Where a particular arrangement between the legislature, executive or judiciary is challenged on the basis of an alleged breach of separation of powers, the inquiry is therefore two-fold: first, the court must establish whether the power at issue falls into the core area of the branch's pre-eminent domain and, secondly, if not, whether the power may be subject to limitations aimed at tempering its exercise and constraining its abuse.

(aa) A pre-eminent domain for each branch of government

The rejection of a strict separation between the three branches of government has, however, not prevented the Constitutional Court from acknowledging that within the separation of powers each branch has a specific mandate. The principle of pre-eminent domain signifies that there are certain functions and powers that fall squarely within the domain of one or the other branch of government. Within this domain, interference or involvement by another branch cannot be justified as 'checks and balances', but must instead be treated as unconstitutional intrusions.

The principle of pre-eminent domain, in other words, emphasizes the separation of functions and limits the attribution of certain powers to the 'wrong' institution. In Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (2), the Court clearly made this point when it stated:

> [A]lthough there are no bright lines that separate the roles of the legislature, the executive and the courts from one another, there are certain matters that are pre-eminently within the domain of one or other of the arms of government and not the others. All arms of government should be sensitive to and respect this separation.[1]

Apparently, although several powers and functions may fall into the grey area between the different branches, and are at times hard to discern ('no bright lines'), there are others which are clearly attributable to one particular branch, so that no ambiguity arises. This leads to the obvious question of what these matters that can be so unequivocally attributed to one particular branch of government are. In Ferreira v Levin NO, one of its earliest judgments, the Constitutional Court indicated how it perceived the general distribution of responsibilities between the three branches:

> Whether or not there should be regulation and redistribution is essentially a political question which falls within the domain of the legislature and not the court. It is not for the courts to approve or disapprove of such policies. What the courts must ensure is that the implementation of any political decision to undertake such policies conforms with the Constitution. . . . The protection of fundamental freedoms is pre-eminently a function of the court.[2]

Although the Constitutional Court has never defined the boundaries of these domains in abstract terms, this statement shows that a 'pre-eminent domain' is a core area of exclusive competence defined from a functional point of view. When dealing with the 'domain', 'heartland', 'exclusive competence' or 'central mission' of the executive, legislature or judiciary, the Court looks at the distinctive function of that particular branch of government in its relation to the other branches.

These core areas of each branch of government are well established in other jurisdictions — and they are usually invoked as a limitation on any intrusion by another branch, in effect a limitation on checks and balances. In Germany, for example, the Bundesverfassungsgericht has held that the separation of powers principle demands that the executive has room for manoeuvre and that there be a separate domain for each branch of government:

[1] 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1075 (CC) at para 98 (emphasis added). See also Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC) at para 199 and fn 41 (For cases cited in support of proposition.)

[2] Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 180, 183.

> The Basic Law does not require separation of powers in a pure form, but mutual checks, balances and moderation between the different branches of government. Nevertheless, the distribution of power and influence between the three branches as it is set up in the Constitution must be respected. No branch may develop a predominance over another branch that is not warranted by the Constitution. No branch may be deprived of the competences it needs to fulfil its constitutional tasks and mandate. The core-area of each of the three branches is invariable.[1]

This idea of a core area has been used by the German Federal Constitutional Court to counter demands by Parliament with regard to the publication of certain government files in a parliamentary commission of inquiry,[2] or to make certain politically contested decisions itself, in particular with respect to foreign policy,[3] but with the notable exception of military operations in foreign countries.[4]

The South African Constitutional Court has picked up on this understanding of pre-eminent domains defined by function. A case that illustrates the point is Doctors for Life, where the Court made the almost trite finding that the parliamentary process falls within the exclusive domain of Parliament, and emphasized the importance of its protection:

> Parliament has a very special role to play in our constitutional democracy — it is the principal legislative organ of the State. With due regard to that role, it must be free to carry out its functions without interference. To this extent, it has the power to 'determine and control its internal arrangements, proceedings and procedures'. The business of Parliament might well be stalled while the question of what relief should be granted is argued out in the courts. Indeed the parliamentary process would be paralysed if Parliament were to spend its time defending its legislative process in the courts. This would undermine one of the essential features of our democracy: the separation of powers. The constitutional principle of separation of powers requires that other branches of government refrain from interfering in parliamentary proceedings.[5]

At first glance, the fact that the determination of parliamentary procedure is the prerogative of Parliament seems to be so self-evident that it needs no further explanation. The underlying purpose of this passage, however, is to point out that

[1] BVerfGE 95, 1 ('Südumfahrung Stendal' ['Stendal Southern Beltway']) 15 ('Das Grundgesetz fordert nicht eine absolute Trennung, sondern die gegenseitige Kontrolle, Hemmung und Mäßigung der Gewalten. Allerdings muß die in der Verfassung vorgenommene Verteilung der Gewichte zwischen den drei Gewalten gewahrt bleiben. Keine Gewalt darf ein von der Verfassung nicht vorgesehenes Übergewicht über eine andere Gewalt erhalten. Keine Gewalt darf der für die Erfüllung ihrer verfassungsmäßigen Aufgaben erforderlichen Zuständigkeiten beraubt werden. Der Kernbereich der verschiedenen Gewalten ist unveränderbar.' (references ommitted).)

[2] See BVerfGE 67, 100 ('Flick-Untersuchungsausschuss' ['Flick-Parliamentary Commission of Inquiry']).

[3] See BVerfGE 68, 1 ('NATO-Doppelbeschluss/Atomwaffenstationierung' ['NATO-Double Track Decision / Deployment of Nuclear Arms']).

[4] See BVerfGE 90, 286 ('Auslandseinsätze der Bundeswehr' ['Military Out of Area Operations']).

[5] Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC)('Doctors for Life') at paras 36, 37.

Parliament's control over its own procedure must be protected to enable Parliament to fulfil its major function: to make policy decisions and enact general rules.[1]

This idea is further illustrated in De Lange v Smuts NO & Others.[2] This case concerned the constitutional validity of a provision in the Insolvency Act, which authorized a person presiding over a creditors' meeting to imprison a recalcitrant witness. After holding that coercive imprisonment as such may be constitutionally justified, the majority of the Constitutional Court found that the separation of powers demanded that an order for such imprisonment should only be imposed by a judicial officer. Because the power to commit an uncooperative witness to prison lies 'within the very heartland of the judicial power', it cannot be exercised by non-judicial officers.[3] After some reference to foreign jurisdictions, Ackermann J laid out the rationale behind this pre-eminently judicial function:

> Judicial officers enjoy complete independence from the prosecutorial arm of the state, and are therefore well-placed to curb possible abuse of prosecutorial power. However, were executive branch officials to be invested with the power to compel, upon pain of imprisonment, cooperation with their investigative demands, this necessary check on the prosecutorial power would vanish, because it would allow the executive to pass judgment on the lawfulness of its own prosecutorial decisions.[4]

This statement shows that the ambit of pre-eminent domain is defined by the function of the branch of government concerned. The power to commit someone to prison is such a threat to personal liberty that it needs to be exercised by someone institutionally and personally independent from government influence. This power forms part of the pre-eminent domain of the judiciary because the protection of fundamental freedoms is one of the core functions of the judiciary.

The companion case to De Lange v Smuts is Heath, which involved the question of judicial independence from the executive.[5] In Heath, the Constitutional Court had to consider the validity of certain statutory provisions (and presidential proclamations issued in terms of these provisions) providing for the appointment of a High Court judge as the head of an extraordinary police organization (the so-called 'Special Investigating Unit' (SIU)) tasked with investigating serious malpractices or maladministration in, or in connection with, the public service. In particular, the question was raised whether the numerous functions the head of the [1] Obviously, the ironic twist in the Doctors for Life decision is that after all this strong language the Constitutional Court in the end did interfere with that seemingly sacred domain, holding that Parliament had failed to comply with the constitutionally mandated law-making process and declaring the Acts adopted in violation of that procedural requirements invalid (although the declaration of invalidity was suspended).

[2] De Lange v Smuts 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC)('De Lange').

[3] Ibid at para 61.

[4] Ibid at para 63.

[5] South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath & Others 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC).

organization was required to fulfil were consistent with his or her position as a judge or would undermine the independence of the judiciary and the separation of powers.

Chaskalson P, writing for a unanimous Court, characterized this particular issue as one 'not concerned with the intrusion of the executive into the judicial domain, but with the assignment to a member of the judiciary by the executive, with the concurrence of the legislature, of functions close to the "heartland" of executive power'.[1] The performance of functions in the heartland of the executive is incompatible with the core competence of the judiciary, i e the impartial assessment of executive power against the laws made by the legislature.[2] This core competence, the Court went on, determines and shapes the skills and qualities required for the performance of judicial functions — skills and qualities such as independence, the weighing up of information, the forming of an opinion based on information, and the giving of a decision on the basis of a consideration of relevant information.[3] In contrast, the head of the SIU, the Court held, was required to perform functions incongruent with these characteristics:

> [The functions that the head of the SIU has to perform] include not only the undertaking of intrusive investigations, but litigating on behalf of the state to recover losses that it has suffered as a result of corrupt or other unlawful practices. . . . By their very nature, such functions are partisan. The judge cannot distance himself or herself from the actions of the SIU's investigators.[4]

This is the heartland of the executive: to act in a partisan, interest-driven way, not to be independent but to follow the political views of the democratically elected government and to act accordingly — of course within the limits set by the Constitution.

The main reason for keeping a judge outside the executive is not that the legitimate partisan interests of the government would be threatened by an independently minded judge. The reason for the Constitutional Court to reject such appointments is their potential effect on the judiciary itself. It is the negative perception of the judiciary that could follow if judges were to act sometimes in an interest-driven way. The Heath Court makes it very clear that for this reason the constitutional review standard is objective, and demands that it go beyond the identity of the particular judge and his or her appointment to the SIU:

[1] Heath (supra) at para 24.
[2] Ibid at para 29 (The Court cites with approval Mistretta v United States 488 US 361, 388 (1989)('Congress may delegate to the Judicial Branch non-adjudicatory functions that do not trench upon the prerogative of another Branch and that are appropriate to the central mission of the Judiciary' (Blackmun J).)
[3] Heath (supra) at para 34.
[4] Ibid at paras 39–40.

> Under our Constitution, the judiciary has a sensitive and crucial role to play in controlling the exercise of power and upholding the bill of rights. It is important that the judiciary be independent and that it be perceived to be independent. If it were to be held that this intrusion of a judge into the executive domain is permissible, the way would be open for judges to be appointed for indefinite terms to other executive posts, or to perform other executive functions, which are not appropriate to the 'central mission of the judiciary.' Were this to happen the public may well come to see the judiciary as being functionally associated with the executive and consequently unable to control the executive's power with the detachment and independence required by the Constitution. This, in turn, would undermine the separation of powers and the independence of the judiciary, crucial for the proper discharge of functions assigned to the judiciary by our Constitution. The decision, therefore, has implications beyond the facts of the present case, and states a principle that is of fundamental importance to our constitutional order.[1]

On the other hand, once a non-judicial function has been assigned to a judicial officer in a way consistent with the Constitution, he or she is accountable to the executive, and may not enjoy the same degree of independence in the exercise of this function as when performing a judicial function. Against this background, the Constitutional Court distinguished the function of a magistrate's court in extradition proceedings from its core judicial functions in Geuking.[2] When a foreign state requests the extradition of one of its nationals from South Africa, the process of extradition is initiated by the issue of a warrant of arrest by a magistrate. In this procedure, according to s 10(2) of the Extradition Act,[3] a certificate from the appropriate authorities in the foreign state must be accepted as conclusive proof that such authority has sufficient evidence to warrant the prosecution of the person concerned. It was contended that this conclusive presumption had the effect of obliging the magistrate to commit the person concerned without any individual assessment of the alleged criminal conduct. The Court rejected the argument that such 'blindfolding' interferes with the functioning of the judiciary, because there is a difference between 'ordinary domestic proceedings' (read: court proceedings) and extradition proceedings. The inquiry by a magistrate during extradition proceedings does not constitute a trial in which guilt or innocence has to be determined. Instead, it is conducted in the context of a quasi-administrative procedure aimed at determining whether or not there is reason to remove a person to a foreign country to be put on trial there.[4] Consequently, the independence of the judiciary is not affected and the separation of powers not violated.

[1] Heath (supra) at paras 46.
[2] Geuking v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2003 (3) SA 34 (CC), 2004 (9) BCLR 895 (CC)('Geuking').
[3] Act 67 of 1962.
[4] Geuking (supra) at paras 49–50.

Because, within these pre-eminent domains, separation of powers is absolute and no checks and balances apply, such domains are defined narrowly and the courts are very specific in their delimitation. For example, in Doctors for Life, the Constitutional Court had no problem in reviewing the parliamentary process ex post, i e once the bills at issue had been enacted. In De Lange, the Court limited the judiciary's pre-eminent domain to committing people to prison, while not preventing the executive from, among other things, pardoning offenders, limiting the discretion of the courts through minimum and maximum sentencing legislation, or running prisons. The same analysis works for Heath: judges regularly chair commissions of inquiry, head the Legal Aid Board, the Rule Board and the Inspectorate of Prisons. These are all functions that are, at least slightly, legislative or executive in nature, but they may be less partisan, do not deviate from the heartland of the judicial function, and are therefore acceptable.

Finally, in some exceptional circumstances, the principle of pre-eminent domain may not apply. Again, in Doctors for Life, the Constitutional Court kept the door open to intervene during the parliamentary process in exceptional cases, such as where an aggrieved person cannot be afforded substantial relief once the process is completed because the underlying conduct would have violated the constitutional rights of that person beyond repair.[1] The exception, in fact, makes it debatable whether the Constitutional Court would accept the pre-eminent domain of another branch of government where this would prevent it from exercising necessary judicial review powers. In these limited circumstances, one may see a pre-eminent domain not as an absolute barrier to judicial intervention, but rather as a subject matter requiring a particularly high level of justification for judicial intervention. There may also be extreme situations — war or national emergency — where the Constitution may permit the executive to perform functions reserved for Parliament or the judiciary, at least on a temporary basis.[2]

To sum up, the principle of pre-eminent domain is designed to ensure the functional separation of powers between the executive, the legislature and the judiciary. It is used when the Constitutional Court regards a contested power as being so closely related with the primary function of that particular branch of government that (almost) no interference by other branches of government may be justified.

(bb) The availability of checks and balances

In a constitutional system that does not follow a strict separation between the legislature, the executive and the judiciary, the principle of pre-eminent domain is necessarily limited to core areas. Beyond these heartlands, there is room for procedures that limit the unobstructed exercise of powers by each of these branches and embody the countervailing principle of checks and balances.

[1] See Doctors for Life (supra) at para 69.

[2] See Nicole Fritz 'States of Emergency' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 61.

In its engagement with checks and balances, the Constitutional Court has repeatedly disavowed an approach to separation of powers questions that focuses on the form of the institutional arrangements alone, preferring to examine in detail the substantive effect of these arrangements. The point about checks and balances is precisely that they do provide for interference between the branches of government. The courts are asked carefully to examine if such interference is an unwarranted intrusion into the domain and independent functioning of one branch of government or another constitutional body, or if such interference constitutes an institutional safeguard designed to prevent the abuse of power.

This issue has been discussed at some length by the Constitutional Court with regard to the appointment procedures for judicial officers, which involve the participation of the other branches of government.

> An essential part of the separation of powers is that there be an independent judiciary. The mere fact, however, that the executive makes or participates in the appointment of judges is not inconsistent with the doctrine of separation of powers or with the judicial independence . . . In many countries in which there is an independent judiciary and a separation of powers, judicial appointments are made either by the executive or by Parliament or by both. What is crucial to the separation of powers and the independence of the judiciary is that the judiciary should enforce the law impartially and that it should function independently of the legislature and the executive.[1]

This argument was later picked up in Van Rooyen.[2] In Van Rooyen, it was contended that magistrates' courts lacked the institutional independence required by the Final Constitution.[3] The question was raised whether magistrates could be independent as long as they were appointed by a commission largely dominated by the executive. The Constitutional Court, after affirming that magistrates indeed enjoy judicial independence, even if not in the same form as higher courts,[4] rejected this view, and held that the fact that the executive, under the relevant legislation, might have a direct or indirect influence on these matters did not in itself entail a breach of judicial independence. According to the Court, a strong influence on the appointment of the members of the Magistrates Commission by the executive does not mean that the magistrates' courts themselves lack institutional independence. Nor does it follow from this that the Commission 'is unlikely to take any decisions, express any views or make any recommendations which do not find favour with the Minister', as the High Court had presumed.[5] Instead, the Court emphasized the fact that the appointment process for magistrates is designed with a view to the functions of magistrates:

[1] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 123.

[2] Van Rooyen & Others v S & Others (General Council of the Bar of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC)('Van Rooyen').

[3] The High Court had declared several provisions of the Magistrates Act 90 of 1993 and the Magistrates' Courts Act 32 of 1944 unconstitutional and referred the matter to the Constitutional Court for confirmation in terms of FC s 172(2).

[4] Van Rooyen (supra) at paras 27–28.

[5] Ibid at para 71.

> There is . . . a difference between being nominated by the executive to perform a duty which calls for an independent decision and being chosen by the executive to perform that duty in accordance with its wishes.[1]

The thread that runs through the Court's reasoning throughout the Van Rooyen judgment is the inquiry whether the influence (or power) of the executive over the judiciary can be abused. Checks and balances allow for interdependencies, but these must be safeguarded against abuse of the power concerned. Because judicial officers are required to act independently and impartially in dealing with cases that come before them, the Constitution at an institutional level requires structures to protect courts and judicial officers against external interference.

What eventually saved the institutions and procedures relating to magistrates and their judicial function from the separation of powers attack in Van Rooyen was that there were at least one or two institutional constraints on the actual encroachment on the independence of the judiciary. The powers concerned were: (a) subject to judicial control by a higher court in the form of review; and (b) subject, in certain instances, to control by the Magistrates Commission itself.[2] Finally, Parliament could also counter potentially undue influence on magistrates by the executive.[3] For example, the Court regarded the fact that magistrates are required to perform administrative duties unrelated to their functions as judicial officers to be not 'ideal', because it may make them answerable to the executive, and if that happens, the separation of powers that should exist between the executive and judiciary would eventually be blurred. However, the Constitutional Court seemed to accept such non-judicial assignments as long as none of these administrative duties specifically affects the judicial independence of magistrates. This is because, on the one hand, the assignment of any duty, either by law or by executive regulation, is itself subject to constitutional control, and because such assignments may serve the legitimate goal of using administrative resources prudently, and are thus not per se unconstitutional.[4]

Adopting this approach, the Van Rooyen Court focused on specific instances of violation rather than general allegations. It found repeatedly that there was no violation of separation of powers under the particular institutional arrangements established under the respective acts. The High Court had erred in focusing on

[1] Van Rooyen (supra) at para 93

[2] Ibid at paras 69, 73, 87, 100, 128, 133, 148, 213, 238 and 263–265.

[3] Ibid at para 133.

[4] Ibid at paras 228–234. Technically, the question whether administrative duties unrelated to a magistrate's judicial functions can properly be assigned to magistrates was not the basis on which the constitutionality of the statutory provisions was challenged. The Chief Justice therefore refrained from dealing with that more general question in a decisive way. But he nevertheless held that '[t]here may be reasons why existing legislation that makes provision for administrative functions and duties to be performed by magistrates is necessary, and is not at present inconsistent with the evolving process of securing institutional independence at all levels of the court system.' Ibid at para 233.

the provisions at a level of generality that neglected the internal safeguards. It had preferred form over substance. By analyzing the specific provisions it was revealed that there were sufficient checks and balances to ensure that there was no infringement of separation of powers.

This approach is also visible in S v Dodo,[1] a case in which the Constitutional Court had to decide on mandatory sentences to imprisonment for life.[2] The High Court had reasoned that the imposition of the most severe punishment falls within the 'exclusive prerogative and discretion' of the courts, was inconsistent with separation of powers as required by the Constitution, and had accordingly declared the statutory provisions to be invalid.[3] The Constitutional Court refused to follow this reasoning. Ackermann J (in a unanimous decision) firstly rejected the argument that sentencing was the pre-eminent domain of the judiciary.[4] Nevertheless, because the imposition of mandatory sentences was some kind of limitation on a trial court's sentencing discretion, a separation of powers concern was indeed raised. This limitation, however, could be justified because, although the separation of powers under the Final Constitution was intended as a means of controlling government by separating or diffusing power, it was never intended to be strict. Instead, according to the Constitutional Court, the South African constitutional model of separation of powers is one that > embodies a system of checks and balances to prevent an over-concentration of power in any one arm of government; it anticipates the necessary or unavoidable intrusion of one branch on the terrain of another; this engenders interaction, but does so in way which avoids diffusing power so completely that government is unable to take timely measures in the public interest.[5]

The Court explicitly accepted the legislature and executive's role and interest in respect of punishments imposed by the courts. It would only be contrary to the rule of law and constitutionalism if the legislature were to oblige the judiciary to impose punishments without any regard to the circumstances of each individual case, for then the judiciary would merely 'rubber stamp' a general legislative decision or impose a sentence that was not proportional to the crime.[6] Therefore, despite the obvious legislative encroachment into the judicial domain, the Court

[1] 2001 (3) SA 382 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 423 (CC).

[2] Criminal Law Amendment Act 105 of 1997 s 51(1) made it obligatory for a High Court to sentence an accused, convicted of offences specified in the Act, to imprisonment for life unless, under s 51(3)(a), the court was satisfied that 'substantial and compelling circumstances' exist which justify the imposition of a lesser sentence. The SCA had elaborated on how this exception clause should be applied in S v Malgas. 2001 (2) SA 1222 (SCA), 2001 (1) SACR 469 (SCA).

[3] S v Dodo 2001 (3) SA 382 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 423 (CC)('Dodo') at para 8. The decision of the High Court is reported as S v Dodo 2001 (3) BCLR 279 (E), 2001 (1) SACR 301 (E).

[4] Dodo (supra) at para 13.

[5] Ibid at para 16. Ackermann J later writes: 'There is under our Constitution no absolute separation of powers between the judicial function, on the one hand, and the legislative and executive on the other'. Ibid at para 22.

[6] Ibid at para 26.

rightly recognized that mandatory sentencing legislation does not have the effect of excluding the exercise of judicial discretion in the ultimate decision as to what sentence is appropriate in the particular case. The statutory imposition of mandatory sentences was regarded as a constitutionally justified check or balance on judicial power. In the view of the Court, it was justified because it is 'pre-eminently the function of the legislature' to determine what conduct should be criminalized and punished, and because the legislature had pursued a legitimate objective, i e ensuring that sufficiently severe penalties are imposed on dangerous criminals in order to protect society and trying to facilitate greater consistency in sentencing.[1]

The relationship between the inviolable domain of each branch and justified checks and balances, as well as the problem of where the one starts and the other ends, surfaces again in a summary halfway into Ackermann J's judgment:

> On this part of the case I accordingly conclude as follows:
> 33.1 While our Constitution recognises a separation of powers between the different branches of the state and a system of appropriate checks and balances on the exercise of the respective functions and powers of these branches, such separation does not confer on the courts the sole authority to determine the nature and severity of sentences to be imposed on convicted persons.
> 33.2 Both the legislature and the executive have a legitimate interest, role and duty, in regard to the imposition and subsequent administration of penal sentences.
> 33.3 The concomitant authority of the other branches in the field of sentencing must not, however, infringe the authority of the courts in this regard.
> 33.4 It is neither possible nor, in any event, desirable to attempt a comprehensive delineation of the legitimate authority of the courts in this regard.
> 33.5 For purposes of this case it is sufficient to hold that the legislature is not empowered to compel any court to pass a sentence which is inconsistent with the Constitution.[2]

Thus, a limitation on a function of one branch of government may be justified under the separation of powers doctrine if that limitation does not affect the core area of that other branch, if the limitation is itself the exercise of a core function or originates in the pre-eminent domain of the 'intruding' branch, and if the limitation serves a legitimate objective.

(ii) Judicial review and the separation of powers

Most of the decisions discussed above involve the judiciary and its independence from outside interference by the other branches. There are considerably fewer Constitutional Court decisions dealing with the separation of, and interrelationship between, the legislature and the executive.[3] Besides decisions in which the [1] Dodo (supra) at paras 23 and 25.

[2] Ibid at para 33. Apparently, 'authority' here refers to those powers that form the pre-eminent domain of the judiciary and may not be infringed.
[3] On the problem of delegated legislation, see § 12.3*(d)*(iii) infra.

institutional and functional independence of the judiciary has been at stake, the principle of separation of powers has also played a prominent role in decisions in which intra-governmental relations were not the subject matter of the dispute. In several decisions concerning individual rights and freedoms, the Constitutional Court has used separation of powers criteria to determine the scope of its own review powers, the level of scrutiny and the remedies available.

In these cases, separation of powers concerns, informed by the Court's understanding of its institutional function in the South African constitutional system, were decisive for the assessment of the rights violations at issue and the substantive claims pursued. Considerations crucial to the practical operation of the separation of powers doctrine in South Africa, in other words, have not only been developed in the face of executive or legislative intrusions into the judicial domain, but also with regard to perceived or real intrusions into the other branches' domains by the judiciary. In this context, separation of powers is connected to the general notion of the benefits and problems of judicial review.

(aa) Judicial review in the context of the supremacy of the Constitution, the political question doctrine and intergovernmental respect and courtesy

In terms of the supremacy clause in FC s 2 and its jurisdiction as set out in FC ss 167 and 172, the Constitutional Court has the power to review legislation and executive action for consistency with the Constitution, in some instances as the final arbiter, and in others as the exclusive arbiter. This in itself is one of the most radical changes to the pre-1994 system introduced by the Final Constitution:

> Prior to the enactment of the interim Constitution, courts adopted a more deferential attitude to laws made by elected legislatures than they did to laws made by administrative functionaries. Judicial review was developed and applied by South African courts against the background of a legal order which recognised the supremacy of parliament. Legislation duly passed by parliament in accordance with the then existing constitution was not subject to judicial review, and the power of the courts was confined to interpreting such laws and applying them to the facts of the particular case. … The introduction of the interim Constitution has radically changed the setting within which administrative law operates in South Africa. Parliament is no longer supreme. Its legislation, and the legislation of all organs of state, is now subject to constitutional control.[1]

The Constitutional Court has again and again emphasized that it understands its mandate and its own 'pre-eminent domain'[2] to be the enforcement and protection of the Constitution, to ensure that the limits on the exercise of public power are not transgressed, to control the exercise of power and to uphold the Bill of Rights:

[1] Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC) at paras 28 and 32.

[2] See § 12.3*(d)(i)*(aa) supra.

> Where we used to have a supreme Parliament, we now have a supreme Constitution. The Constitutional Court has been given the responsibility of being the ultimate guardian of the Constitution and its values.[1]

The very reason for the judiciary to be independent from the legislature and the executive is so that it can fulfil this guardianship role:

> In our constitutional order the Judiciary is an independent pillar of State, constitutionally mandated to exercise the judicial authority of the State fearlessly and impartially. Under the doctrine of separation of powers it stands on an equal footing with the executive and the legislative pillars of State; but in terms of political, financial or military power it cannot hope to compete. It is in these terms by far the weakest of the three pillars; yet its manifest independence and authority are essential. Having no constituency, no purse and no sword, the Judiciary must rely on moral authority. Without such authority it cannot perform its vital function as the interpreter of the Constitution, the arbiter in disputes between organs of State and, ultimately, as the watchdog over the Constitution and its Bill of Rights — even against the State.[2]

Whenever, in the years since its establishment, the question has arisen whether the Constitutional Court has the power to review a particular legal rule or conduct, the Court has affirmed its comprehensive review powers. Some of these affirmations were inevitable given the clear language of the supremacy clause, such as the Court's holding in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers[3] that the Final Constitution alone sets the review standard for executive and administrative action.[4] Others were, perhaps, based on a particular understanding by the Constitutional Court of its own institutional function and mandate. In Carmichele,[5] the Court held that it would supervise other courts' interpretation and application of the ordinary law in terms of the Final Constitution.[6] Together, these decisions have led the Court to establish that there is no executive, administrative, parliamentary or

[1] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 1999 (4) SA 147 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 725 (CC) ('SARFU II') at paras 72–73.

[2] S v Mamabolo (E TV & Others Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC) at para 16.

[3] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA in re: the Ex Parte Application of the President of the RSA & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC).

[4] For further insight into this judgment, see Frank Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) § 11.3*(b)*; Sebastian Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) § 4.3*(d)*(ii).

[5] Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC).

[6] The Constitutional Court has assumed a supervisory function with regard to the constitutionality of the application, interpretation and development of statutory and common law by other courts. See Stu Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) § 31.4*(e); Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' (supra) at §4.3(d)(i)* and §4.3*(h)(i)*(aa).

judicial conduct, and no law whatsoever (including amendments to the Final Constitution, which are (at least) subject to procedural review[1]), that escape constitutional scrutiny.

The Constitutional Court's strong conception of judicial review and of its constitutional mandate is the reason why the Court has declined to adopt anything like a political question doctrine. In other jurisdictions, this doctrine has developed as a key determinant of whether a court will consider an issue or not. The approach of the US Supreme Court was authoritatively declared in the oft-cited case of Baker v Carr.[2] Justice Brennan, whilst characterizing the various formulations of the political question doctrine as 'essentially a function of separation of powers', described the doctrine as follows:

> Prominent on the surface of any case held to involve a political question is found a textually demonstrable constitutional commitment of the issue to a coordinate political department; or a lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards for discovering it; or the impossibility of deciding without an initial policy determination of a kind clearly for non-judicial discretion; or the impossibility of a court's undertaking independent resolution without expressing lack of the respect due coordinate branches of government; or an unusual need for the unquestioning adherence to a political decision already made; or the potentiality of embarrassment from multifarious pronouncements by various departments on one question.[3]

The doctrine as articulated in this passage has the effect of ousting the court's jurisdiction with respect to the consideration of issues characterized as political questions, as these issues are deemed for the reasons set out in the passage as being non-amenable to judicial settlement. One of the more interesting aspects of the doctrine, particularly with regard to its general ousting effect, is that the limitation on the court's jurisdiction is in essence a self-imposed one. According to Laurence Tribe, at the heart of the political question doctrine are issues of justiciability and the courts' perception of their competence and limitations.[4]

The South African Constitutional Court has followed the US model to a certain extent, but on the other hand has taken a more flexible approach to political questions. At first glance, the Court has confirmed that there are questions which it cannot decide, such as political or moral questions.[5] In this way, the exclusion of certain matters from the realm of the judiciary reflects the Court's notion of pre-eminent domains:

[1] See Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC)('Matatiele II').

[2] 369 US 186 (1962).

[3] Baker v Carr (supra) at 217.

[4] Laurence Tribe American Constitutional Law Vol 1 (3rd Edition, 2000) 368, 385. See also Iain Currie & Johan de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 46.

[5] Other matters outside the scope of judicial review are, for example, religious questions: 'Judges would be placed in an intolerable situation if they were called upon to construe religious texts and take sides on issues which have caused deep schisms within religious bodies. . . . Whether or not the Biblical texts support [an applicant's argument] would certainly not be a question which this Court could entertain.' Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Others; Lesbian & Gay Equality Project v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC) at paras 92–93.

> Whether or not there should be regulation and redistribution is essentially a political question which falls within the domain of the legislature and not the court. It is not for the courts to approve or disapprove of such policies. What the courts must ensure is that the implementation of any political decision to undertake such policies conforms with the Constitution.[1]

The crucial distinction drawn in this and other passages is between the political function of the legislature and the executive and the politicality (or controversy) of a particular question that may be presented for decision. Thus far, the Constitutional Court has followed the US model only insofar as it has accepted that its power to decide a case may be limited by a 'lack of judicially discoverable and manageable standards'. This principle has been articulated on several occasions. In the First Certification Judgment, for example, the Court held:

> First and foremost it must be emphasised that the Court has a judicial and not a political mandate. . . . Admittedly a constitution, by its very nature, deals with the extent, limitations and exercise of political power as also with the relationship between political entities and with the relationship between the state and persons. But this Court has no power, no mandate and no right to express any view on the political choices made by the [Constitutional Assembly] in drafting the [Final Constitution], save to the extent that such choices may be relevant either to compliance or non-compliance with the [constitutional principles]. Subject to that qualification, the wisdom or otherwise of any provision of the [Final Constitution] is not this Court's business.[2]

It has been recognized in academic writing that constitutional questions are inevitably political questions, and as such the mere classification of an issue as being 'political' is not determinative of whether or not a court should adjudicate it.[3] This view has also been articulated by some members of the Constitutional Court in their extra-curial writings.[4] Furthermore, the Court has held that because the Final Constitution 'by its very nature deals with the extent, limitations and exercise of political power' the fact that a particular case has political implications may be precisely what brings it into the ambit of constitutional review.

> Section 167(4) . . . confers exclusive jurisdiction to this Court in a number of crucial political areas which include the power to decide disputes between organs of State in the national and provincial sphere, to decide on the constitutionality of any parliamentary or provincial Bill, to decide on the constitutionality of any amendment to the Constitution and to decide

[1] Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 180.

[2] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 27.

[3] On the false dichotomy between politics and (constitutional) law, see Martin Loughlin 'Constitutional Law: The Third Order of the Political' in Nicholas Bamford & Peter Leyland (eds) Public Law in a Multi-layered Constitution (2003) 27–51; Bruce Ackerman 'Constitutional Politics/ Constitutional Law' (1989) 17 Yale LJ 453.

[4] Pius Langa 'Transformative Constitutionalism' (2006) 17 Stell LR 351, 353.

whether Parliament or the President has failed to fulfil a constitutional obligation. … It follows that the drafters of the Constitution necessarily envisaged that this Court would be called upon to adjudicate finally in respect of issues which would inevitably have important political consequences.[1]

In other cases, the fact that a matter 'pre-eminently involves a "crucial political" question', far from precluding the power of judicial review, has been the basis on which the Court has assumed exclusive jurisdiction to hear the matter.[2]

The nature of political questions that fall outside the scope of judicial review becomes clearer if one does not look at the subject matter but rather at what the Court may be asked to do. As the Court put it in UDM:

> This case is not about the merits or demerits of the provisions of the disputed legislation. That is a political question and is of no concern to this Court. What has to be decided is not whether the disputed provisions are appropriate or inappropriate, but whether they are constitutional or unconstitutional.[3]

This dictum emphasizes the distinction between political and legal questions not with regard to the subject matter of the dispute but with regard to the judiciary's function to adjudicate disputes that can be resolved through the application of law. The key to judicial review — and therefore the function of the courts in contrast to other branches of government — is not what the dispute is about, but the review standard or the yardstick that is applied. Any criterion of political expediency is irrelevant in the judicial decision-making process. Instead, the Court, in applying the Final Constitution as the sole review standard, determines the constitutional framework for political decision-making. In this respect, the distinction between political and legal questions is related to the Constitution's threshold criterion for access to courts, i e that the dispute can be resolved by the application of law.[4] There is a similarity between the possibility that a dispute may be resolved by a legal standard and the idea that political questions fall outside the ambit of the Constitutional Court's review powers.[5] In both cases, a legal norm (the review standard) must be able to provide a solution or answer to the question raised.[6]

[1] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 1999 (4) SA 147 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 725 (CC)(SARFU II) at paras 72–73.

[2] Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC) at para 21. See Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' (supra) at § 4.3.(b).

[3] United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR (CC) at para 11.

[4] See Jason Brickhill & Adrian Friedman 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) § 59.3*(a)(v)*.

[5] Currie & de Waal (supra) at 707.

[6] Chuks Okpaluba writes: '[F]or a matter raising a purely political question to emerge, it must be clear that judicial intervention … lacks constitutional foundation…. It is that question that defies all constitutional and legal solutions since its resolution could not be traced to any … legal source. For want of a better phraseology, that is the political question over which the court cannot assume jurisdiction, entertain its cause of complaint or grant any relief in any exercise of judicial authority. 'Justiciability, Constitutional Adjudication and the Political Question in a Nascent Democracy' (2003) 18 SAPR/PL 331.

It is therefore never the particular subject matter of a case that renders it 'political' and thus outside the review powers of the judiciary in general or the Constitutional Court in particular. Political questions in South Africa are not political matters or political cases. The determining factor is rather the methodology a court can apply in giving an answer to the question. There are questions for which the Final Constitution does not provide a review standard, such as whether there should be a particular law or not or whether one regulatory scheme is better than the other. The Final Constitution does not provide a review standard for criteria like what is 'better', and accordingly the judiciary cannot be asked to decide such questions.

The Constitutional Court's approach in this regard is in keeping with its constitutionally ordained role of being the 'guardian of the Constitution'. However, in spite of the clarity of the Court's position with respect to its power to decide political matters, but not policy choices, the question still remains as to how to determine where the latter category starts, i e at what moment the Constitution fails to provide a workable review standard.

As will become clearer in the discussion of remedies below, the Constitutional Court will usually refer a question back to the other branches of government if choices are available for which the Constitution does not provide a single answer, but rather a leeway — a set of options all within the framework of the Constitution.[1] Once the political choice has been made, however, the Court's mandate is to see that this choice complies with the Constitution. Every final policy choice is open and subject to judicial review.

In other words, the Final Constitution makes the courts the final arbiters of the nature and extent of the powers of the other branches and institutions of state. Through the power of review, they are possessed of the power not only to set aside the unlawful exercise of power by the executive, but to strike down legislation that is inconsistent with the Constitution. The courts themselves are the final arbiters of constitutional consistency. This power is to some extent checked by the powers of Parliament to amend the Constitution and the powers of other institutions of state to ensure that the courts are staffed with qualified and responsible officers. However, these instruments of control are either indirect or cumbersome.

In such a constitutional system it is necessary that the courts themselves formulate, articulate and apply principles for guiding the limits of their own powers and preventing their abuse. The formulation and application of these principles is important for the actual self-constraint which the courts exhibit. However, the articulation of these principles is equally important. Since the ultimate constraint on the abuse of power by the courts is political, articulation publicizes the standards by which the exercise of the courts' powers will be measured by society and its elected representatives. The courts' powers, if improperly and irresponsibly exercised, may undermine the courts' institutional legitimacy and lead to a situation where other branches of government no longer respect the authority of the courts.

[1] See § 12.3*(d)(ii)(cc)* infra.

This is particularly important for the Constitutional Court. For one, the Constitutional Court as the highest court on constitutional matters can and does constrain the exercise of power by all other courts, through the established institutions of appeal and review. Secondly, sensitivity to the requirement of self-restraint is most acute in respect of the exercise of the Constitutional Court's powers. Although there is a danger that the legitimacy of the courts as a whole may be undermined by cumulative or systematic abuse of judicial power, the wide jurisdiction and the symbolic position that the Constitutional Court enjoys require the Court to exercise its powers with particular care. The separation of powers principle is tested most in those difficult cases, where the Court is called upon to determine the authority of the other branches, and by corollary, where the Court's own authority is determined. In such cases, the Constitutional Court has made it clear that it will respect the powers of the other branches of government, such as its statement in Ferreira that the decision whether or not there should be regulation and redistribution falls into the domain of the legislature and not the courts.[1] It has over time developed its jurisprudence in a strategic way to ensure that its decisions are indeed respected by the government and Parliament and, to a lesser extent, by the public.[2]

Like courts in other jurisdictions, the Constitutional Court of South Africa has on frequent occasions employed the idea of judicial restraint, a conscious decision based on separation of powers concerns not to interfere with decisions by the other branches of government, provided that they are in line with the Constitution. The last part of this sentence points to the dilemma that the Constitutional Court faces: the separation of powers principle demands that the Court should respect the domains and powers of the other branches of government, while at the same time ensuring that these branches act in accordance with the Constitution.

The judges of the Constitutional Court, of course, are aware of this challenge:

> [T]his Court may frequently find itself faced with complex problems as to what properly belongs to the discretionary sphere which the Constitution allocates to the legislature and the executive, and what falls squarely to be determined by the judiciary. . . . The search for an appropriate accommodation in this frontier legal territory accordingly imposes a particularly heavy responsibility on the courts to be sensitive to considerations of institutional competence and the separation of powers. Undue judicial adventurism can be as damaging as excessive judicial timidity. . . . Both extremes need to be avoided.[3]

[1] See Ferreira v Levin NO (supra) at para 180. See also § 12.3*(d)(i)*(aa) supra.

[2] This thesis is convincingly argued by Theunis Roux. 'Principle and Pragmatism on the Constitutional Court of South Africa' (2009) 7 International J of Constitutional Law (forthcoming). See also Patrick Lenta 'Judicial Restraint and Overreach' (2004) 20 SAJHR 544, 554–56.

[3] Prince v President, Cape Law Society & Others 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC) at paras 155–56 (Sachs J).

While it is generally advisable to avoid extremes, the supremacy of the Constitution must be the starting point for any such inquiry. In Doctors for Life, Ngcobo J emphasized that the judiciary's terrain has been mapped out quite clearly by the constitutional supremacy clause (FC s 2):

> Courts must be conscious of the vital limits on judicial authority and the Constitution's design to leave certain matters to other branches of government. They too must observe the constitutional limits of their authority. This means that the judiciary should not interfere in the processes of other branches of government unless to do so is mandated by the Constitution. . . . But under our constitutional democracy, the Constitution is the supreme law. It is binding on all branches of government and no less on Parliament. . . . Courts are required by the Constitution to ensure that all branches of government act within the law and fulfill their constitutional obligations.[1]

The performance by the Court of its mandate to ensure allegiance to the Constitution necessarily manifests itself as an intrusion into the domain of the other branches. Constitutional scrutiny, however, shows no disrespect for the separation of powers, but is the very embodiment of the system of checks and balances required by the Final Constitution. This point was made by the Constitutional Court in Treatment Action Campaign (2):

> The primary duty of courts is to the Constitution and the law, which they must apply impartially and without fear, favour or prejudice. The Constitution requires the state to respect, protect, promote, and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights. Where state policy is challenged as inconsistent with the Constitution, courts have to consider whether in formulating and implementing such policy the state has given effect to its constitutional obligations. If it should hold in any given case that the state has failed to do so, it is obliged by the Constitution to say so. In so far as that constitutes an intrusion into the domain of the executive, that is an intrusion mandated by the Constitution itself.[2]

In Doctors for Life, too, the Constitutional Court held that it would take the most unambiguous of ouster clauses to deprive it of its power to enforce the Constitution.[3] Later in this judgment, Ngcobo J pointed out that the separation of powers principle could not serve as such an ouster:

> [W]hile the doctrine of separation of powers is an important one in our constitutional democracy, it cannot be used to avoid the obligation of a court to prevent the violation of the Constitution. The right and the duty of this Court to protect the Constitution are derived from the Constitution, and this Court cannot shirk from that duty.[4]

[1] Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC)('Doctors for Life') at paras 37–38.
[2] Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1075 (CC) at para 99.
[3] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 38.
[4] Ibid at para 200.

This is the correct approach. The separation of powers doctrine is a justiciable, though not express, constitutional principle reflected in the very structure of government.[1] Intergovernmental relations can be reviewed against this principle. It provides, both in its express provisions and in the overarching concept to which it gives rise, the yardstick against which alleged encroachments by the different branches of government can be scrutinized and assessed. But the principle of separation of powers cannot serve as a justification for the violation of other constitutional provisions or principles, especially those in the Bill of Rights. Where there is a rights violation, the Court must ensure that the violation stops and that the victim is given a remedy.

The Constitutional Court is aware that its own powers of review necessarily require it to intrude into the domains of the other branches of government. As much as it has said that such intrusions are mandated by the Constitution, it has at the same time pointed out that its powers must, nevertheless, be exercised with respect for the legislature and the executive. In Van Rooyen, the Court was thus critical not only of some of the conclusions reached by the High Court, but also rebuked the High Court for the manner in which its conclusions had been reached and the ease with which the High Court was prepared to infer improper motives on the part of other organs of state:

> In a constitutional democracy such as ours, in which the Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic, a substantial power has been given to the judiciary to uphold the Constitution. In exercising such powers, obedience to the doctrine of separation of powers requires that the judiciary, in its comments about the other arms of State, show respect and courtesy, in the same way that these other arms are obliged to show respect for and courtesy to the judiciary and one another. They should avoid gratuitous reflections on the integrity of one another.[2]

Here, respect and courtesy are applied as standards to guide the manner in which the Court relates to the other branches — not as standards influencing how the judiciary exercises its review powers in the first place. The basis for and limitations of judicial review in the constitutional context are to be determined by the separation of powers principle itself:

> The use of the word 'deference' may give rise to misunderstanding as to the true function of a review Court. This can be avoided if it is realised that the need for Courts to treat decision-makers with appropriate deference or respect flows not from judicial courtesy or etiquette but from the fundamental constitutional principle of the separation of powers itself.[3]

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 37.

[2] Van Rooyen & Others v S & Others (General Council of the Bar of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC) at para 48.

[3] Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs & Others 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC) at para 46.

Respect and courtesy are necessary corollaries of the review powers of the judiciary, and in particular to the Constitutional Court's review powers, because of its exclusive jurisdiction in certain matters.[1] Where there is no constitutionally mandated need for review and the administration of justice is not impeded, courts should preserve the comity that exists between the judicial branch of government, on the one hand, and the legislative and executive branches of government, on the other.[2]

However, as argued below, the Constitutional Court has not always followed its own principle that the separation of powers doctrine should not be used to avoid the courts' obligation to prevent violations of the Constitution. In certain cases, it has used the separation of powers principle in the process of constitutional interpretation to reduce the level of review, and thus to find that there was no violation. It has also in some cases relied on the separation of powers principle in its determination of the appropriate remedy, after a finding that the Constitution had been infringed.

(bb) Separation of powers and the applicable standard of review

The Constitutional Court has used separation of powers considerations to justify reduced levels of scrutiny in Bill of Rights cases. Such reduced levels of scrutiny, or review standards, have meant that law and conduct that otherwise might have been found to be unconstitutional has passed constitutional muster. This has occurred not only at the second stage of the two-stage process for the analysis of rights infringements,[3] but also at the first stage, where such considerations are arguably irrelevant.

The question of different levels of scrutiny or different review standards preoccupied the Constitutional Court from the very beginning of its work. The limitations clause in the Interim Constitution stipulated that all limitations of a right in the Bill of Rights needed to be reasonable and justifiable, and that limitations of certain rights had in addition to be necessary.[4] In Makwanyane, the Constitutional Court accepted that, under the Interim Constitution, there could be at

[1] See Sebastian Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' (supra) at § 4.3*(b)*.

[2] See President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 1999 (2) SA 14 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 175 (CC) at para 29.

[3] See S v Zuma & Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) at para 21 ('[The limitation clause in the Bill of Rights] calls for a 'two-stage' approach. First, has there been a contravention of a guaranteed right? If so, is it justified under the limitation clause?') For further details, see Stu Woolman & Henk Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 34.3.

[4] IC s 33(1)(b).

least these two levels of scrutiny depending on the right.[1] Half a year later, in Ferreira v Levin NO, the Court rejected the possibility of further flexibility in the application of its review standards:

> In terms of our Constitution we are enjoined to protect the [right to freedom and security of the person] against all governmental action that cannot be justified as being necessary. . . . We cannot regulate this power by mechanisms of different levels of scrutiny as the courts of the United States do, nor can we control it through the application of the principle that freedom is subject to laws that are consistent with the principles of 'fundamental justice', as the Canadian courts do.[2]

In practice, however, the Constitutional Court has not abandoned the idea of different review standards for different rights. In Hugo, which dealt with the granting of a presidential pardon to imprisoned mothers (but not fathers), the Court relied on the fact that mothers had been the victims of past discrimination to develop a special review standard under the equality clause in the Interim Constitution.[3] Kriegler J's dissenting judgment was even more explicit:

> Although the Constitution does not establish levels of scrutiny in the manner of the American Constitution, it is nevertheless worth noting that race and sex/gender are given special mention in the Preamble and head the list of [the specifically prohibited bases for discrimination] categories. The drafters of the Constitution could hardly have established a presumption of unfairness [in the equality clause] only to have the burden of rebuttal under the section discharged with relative ease.[4]

The limitation clause in the Final Constitution dropped the notion of dual levels of scrutiny. Why? It may be because the drafters intended that the courts should be able to tighten or loosen the clause's justificatory requirements according to the nature and importance of the right at issue.[5] Whether this proposition is true or not, the crucial question is what considerations may legitimately inform the level of review applied by the courts at both the first and the second stage of the constitutional inquiry. The full answer to this question is beyond the scope of this chapter. For purposes of this chapter, the question is whether the courts may legitimately use separation of powers considerations to adjust the review standard applicable to a case, either at the first stage, or at the second.

[1] S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 339 ('The requirement of reasonableness and justifiability which attaches to some of the section 33 rights clearly envisages a less stringent constitutional standard than does the requirement of necessity. In both cases, the enquiry concerns proportionality: to measure the purpose, effects and importance of the infringing legislation against the infringement caused. In addition, it will need to be shown that the ends sought by the legislation cannot be achieved sufficiently and realistically by other means which would be less destructive of entrenched rights. Where the constitutional standard is necessity, the considerations are similar, but the standard is more stringent.')

[2] Ferreira v Levin NO (supra) at para 181 (Chaskalson P).

[3] President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 47.

[4] Ibid at para 75.

[5] Woolman and Botha defend this proposition elsewhere in this treatise. See Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra) at §34.8*(c)(i)*.

When one looks at the cases, it is immediately apparent that the Constitutional Court takes separation of powers considerations into account at both the first and the second stages of the constitutional inquiry. At the first stage, in engaging with the content of the right, the Court sometimes considers that its own role and function in the constitutional system prevents it from scrutinizing the rights violation to the fullest extent. In these cases, the Court does not define the content of the right in general terms or even at all. Rather, it reduces the right to the requirement that a particular legislative or executive procedure be followed. In some cases, this approach is sufficient to substantiate a finding that the applicant's rights have been violated in a way they cannot be constitutionally justified. In others, the weaker standard of review thus applied results in a finding that the right has not been violated, and therefore that the law in question does not need to be justified under the general limitations clause, or that the conduct in question passes constitutional muster.

The reason for this approach seems to be the view that assessing law or conduct against substantive rights may sometimes result in the usurpation of the legislative or executive branch's powers. In its analysis of a particular constitutional right, the Court thus often looks at the right, not from the perspective of an independent arbiter with final decision-making powers in respect of the content of rights, but as a player in the intergovernmental relations game. On this approach, the content of rights must be defined in a way that leaves interpretive room to the other branches of government.

The most prominent example of this approach, of course, is the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence on socio-economic rights — the rights to housing, health care, food, water and social security in FC ss 26 and 27.[1] The method the Court has used in its engagement with these rights — besides peppering its decisions with the 'rhetoric of restraint'[2] — is to transform the legislature and executive's obligations in respect of these rights into the duty to act reasonably. The consequence of this approach is a jurisprudence that oscillates between deference and interference or, in more traditional language, between judicial restraint and activism.

[1] For more on socio-economic rights, see Kirsty McLean 'Housing' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 55; David Bilchitz 'Health' S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 56A; Anton Kok & Malcolm Langford 'Water' S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 56B; Danie Brand 'Food' S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 56C; and Mia Swart 'Social Security' S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 56D.

[2] Patrick Lenta 'Judicial Restraint and Overreach' (2004) 20 SAJHR 544.

On a conceptual level, the Court has rejected the view that there is any real difference between its approach to traditional civil and political rights, on the one hand, and socio-economic rights, on the other. In the First Certification Judgment, the Court was explicitly faced with the objection that socio-economic rights were inconsistent with the separation of powers because the judiciary would have to encroach on the domain of the legislature and executive.[1] In particular, the objectors argued that the adjudication of socio-economic rights would necessarily require the courts to dictate to government how its budget should be allocated. The Court held that these concerns were unfounded:

> It is true that the inclusion of socio-economic rights may result in courts making orders which have direct implications for budgetary matters. However, even when a court enforces civil and political rights such as equality, freedom of speech and the right to a fair trial, the order it makes will often have such implications. A court may require the provision of legal aid, or the extension of state benefits to a class of people who formerly were not beneficiaries of such benefits. In our view it cannot be said that by including socio-economic rights within a bill of rights, a task is conferred upon the courts so different from that ordinarily conferred upon them by a bill of rights that it results in a breach of the separation of powers.[2]

In this dictum, the Court adopts what may be described as a 'so-be-it' approach to the consequences for separation of powers of the inclusion of justiciable socio-economic rights in the Final Constitution. In Soobramoney, the first socio-economic rights case to come before the Court, its approach was more cautious:

> The provincial administration which is responsible for health services ... has to make decisions about the funding that should be made available for health care and how such funds should be spent. These choices involve difficult decisions to be taken at the political level in fixing the health budget, and at the functional level in deciding upon the priorities to be met. A court will be slow to interfere with rational decisions taken in good faith by the political organs and medical authorities whose responsibility it is to deal with such matters.[3]

In this passage, the Court appeared to adopt a low-level, 'rational decisions taken in good faith' standard for the review of socio-economic rights. In Grootboom, the Court was slightly bolder, and articulated its now familiar reasonableness standard. For current purposes, the crucial point is that the Grootboom Court, in developing this standard, expressly took into account the institutional function of the judiciary in the separation of powers:

> The precise contours and content of the measures to be adopted are primarily a matter for the legislature and the executive. They must, however, ensure that the measures they adopt are reasonable. ... A court considering reasonableness will not enquire whether other more desirable or favourable measures could have been adopted, or whether public money could have been better spent. The question would be whether the measures that have been adopted are reasonable. It is necessary to recognise that a wide range of possible measures could be adopted by the state to meet its obligations. Many of these would meet the requirement of reasonableness. Once it is shown that the measures do so, this requirement is met.[1]

[1] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC).
[2] Ibid at para 77.
[3] Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC) at para 29.

The Court here sets the review standard for socio-economic rights in a way that ensures that the right is only violated once the challenged executive or legislative conduct has been declared to be unreasonable. The limitations and consequences of this approach are discussed elsewhere in this work,[2] but it is fair to say that this standard is lower than a requirement that specific social services should be provided, and thus makes it easier for the legislature and the executive to survive constitutional challenges, both to their adopted policies and to the quality of services actually delivered. For purposes of this chapter, the important point is that the Constitutional Court's entire approach in this regard starts with the assertion that giving content to socio-economic rights is not 'primarily' its mandate. To be fair, both FC ss 26 and 27 provide that the state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realization of socio-economic rights. These textual indicators, however, did not ineluctably determine the particular understanding of reasonableness that the Court has adopted. Instead, it has been the Court's particular conception of separation of powers that has been decisive in the development of this standard.

In Treatment Action Campaign (2), the Constitutional Court confirmed its reasonableness standard of review and emphasized its connection to the judiciary's role in intergovernmental relations:

> Courts are ill-suited to adjudicate upon issues where court orders could have multiple social and economic consequences for the community. The Constitution contemplates rather a restrained and focused role for the courts, namely, to require the state to take measures to meet its constitutional obligations and to subject the reasonableness of these measures to evaluation. Such determinations of reasonableness may in fact have budgetary implications, but are not in themselves directed at rearranging budgets. In this way the judicial, legislative and executive functions achieve appropriate constitutional balance.[3]

All this does not mean, of course, that the reasonableness standard may not be used to grant constitutional claimants specific benefits — after all, in Treatment Action Campaign (2), the Court held that government was obliged to make a specific drug available to combat mother-to-child transmission of HIV. But the last sentence of the quoted passage begs the question: does so indeterminate and weak a review standard as reasonableness really bring the judicial, legislative and executive functions into appropriate balance?

[1] Grootboom v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom') at para 41.

[2] See Kirsty McLean 'Housing' (supra) at §55.3*(c); David Bilchitz 'Health' (supra) at §56A.3(c)-(d); Mia Swart 'Social Security' (supra) at §56D.3(c)*.

[3] Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1075 (CC)('Treatment Action Campaign (2)') at para 38.

From a separation of powers perspective, the first problem with such a review standard is that it allows not only the executive and the legislature, but also the courts to determine the constitutionality of socio-economic rights policies and programmes according to a vague, and therefore discretionary, standard. As David Bilchitz has argued, this approach does not prevent but — on the contrary — may actually give rise to the danger that courts will overstep their mandate and trespass onto the domain of the other branches of government.[1] This may result in an unnecessarily antagonistic relationship between the judiciary and the other branches of government, when 'ideally' the courts should be seen to be supporting the legislature and executive in their task of progressively realizing socio-economic rights.[2] This criticism is certainly valid. The problem with reasonableness is that it is potentially an empty shell, one that may be filled with deference as well as with activism. On the other hand, the Constitutional Court has already suggested considerations that might help to make the reasonableness standard less discretionary. For example, in Treatment Action Campaign (2), the Court held that the effect on the poor and vulnerable in society is an important factor in determining whether a particular government policy is reasonable.[3] Over time, the Court will no doubt define more criteria for the assessment of reasonableness, and in this way prevent the usurpation of the other branches' powers, and provide assistance to the legislature and executive on how best to fulfil their socio-economic rights obligations.

Another, more serious problem with the Constitutional Court's application of the separation of powers doctrine in socio-economic rights cases is that the Court seems to do exactly what it vehemently denies: limiting rights by reference to separation of powers considerations, not at the second stage of the constitutional inquiry, but by way of a particular interpretation of socio-economic rights at the first stage. The Court's decision to adopt a level of scrutiny at the first stage that does not even require a minimum core content to be given to socio-economic rights reduces their potential scope considerably. Although the Court has emphasized that the Final Constitution requires the state to respect, protect, promote, and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights, it has rejected the idea that socio-economic rights may found claims for specific services.[4] This stance appears to run counter to the Court's strong statement in Doctors for Life[5] that the doctrine of separation of powers should not be used to avoid the judiciary's obligation to prevent the violation of the Constitution.

[1] Bilchitz (supra) at §56A.3*(e)*.

[2] Marius Pieterse 'Coming to Terms with Judicial Enforcement of Socio-Economic Rights' (2004) 20 SAJHR 386, 406.

[3] Treatment Action Campaign (2) (supra) at paras 70, 72.

[4] Ibid at paras 35 and 99.

[5] Cf Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC) at para 200.

To be clear, the problem with taking separation of powers concerns into account at the first stage of the constitutional inquiry is that such concerns are strictly speaking irrelevant, and may actually prevent the courts from performing their constitutionally appointed task of determining the content of rights and government's corresponding obligations. Once a constitution includes a particular right, the separation of powers doctrine dictates that competent courts must determine the specific claims and entitlements flowing from the right. In so doing, the courts do not usurp the political branches' powers. On the contrary, they fulfil their constitutional mandate to close gaps in the law, solve conflicts, and make choices in the light of ambiguous legal rules. Inevitably, the courts thus make law. This shows no disrespect for the legislature, but merely amounts to the performance by the courts of their institutional function in a constitutional system in which they are given the power of judicial review.

Admittedly, in the context of socio-economic rights, the Constitutional Court has based its reasoning on a particular interpretation of the relationship between subsecs (1) and (2) of FC ss 26 and 27.[1] Nothing in these provisions, however, dictates that separation of powers concerns should be factored into the process of rights interpretation (as opposed to the process of rights limitation, which occurs after the content of rights has been specified). In the context of the Bill of Rights, the separation of powers manifests itself in the fact that, beyond specific guarantees, the legislature and the executive are free to pursue their policy goals. The Final Constitution does not cover every possible aspect of life and leaves considerable leeway for a range of policy decisions, all of which may be in conformity with the Constitution.[2] Nevertheless, it is a core principle of strong-form judicial review that the legislature does not have the final word on the content of human rights guarantees (as would be the case in a system of parliamentary supremacy or weak-form judicial review), but that the legislature's decisions are reviewed against the higher standard of the Constitution itself. To construe legislative and executive conduct as internal modifiers, as the Constitutional Court has done in its socio-economic rights jurisprudence, is to make a mockery of the principle that the legislature and the executive are bound by the Bill of Rights.

In the context of rights interpretation, the separation of powers doctrine requires the courts to determine the appropriate level of scrutiny on the basis of the constitutional text, in the same way as they do in relation to other constitutional provisions, i e by taking into account the purpose of the right, the purpose of the Bill of Rights in general, and the relation of the right to the founding values.[3] It follows that the state will only enjoy a margin of appreciation

[1] Treatment Action Campaign (2) (supra) at paras 29–30 and 39.

[2] See Seedorf (supra) 'Jurisdiction' at § 4.3.(b)(ii)(bb).

[3] For example, the Constitutional Court has interpreted the right to equality with a view to the underlying value of dignity and it is difficult to see why that should not be the case in the area of socio-economic rights. See Catherine Albertyn & Beth Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) § 35.1*(d)(i)*.

or leeway in its policy decisions where the nature and purpose of the right itself allows the leeway. On this approach, an applicant may still have no claim to a specific benefit, not because the state may determine the content of the right, but because the scope of the right, properly construed, may not extend to the granting of specific benefits. In respect of such rights, the state enjoys a wide discretion and may thus decide on a range of possible measures that all meet its constitutional obligations. In respect of other rights, however, the scope of the right properly construed may give rise to a specific benefit, and to deny this benefit to the applicant on the basis of separation of powers concerns is to renege on the courts' constitutional obligations.[1]

Even if the Final Constitution on a proper interpretation allows for a wide range of possible measures which could be adopted by the state to meet its obligations, the separation of powers doctrine does not mean that these obligations can not be determined. It may be that on a proper interpretation of FC s 26, for example, the right to access to housing does not confer an entitlement to claim shelter or housing immediately upon demand.[2] But this does not mean that separation of powers considerations prevent the courts from giving any content to this right, simply because there is no corresponding obligation to fulfil the right immediately. Budgetary or capacity considerations may be balanced against the state's constitutional obligations during the limitations exercise.

Although the intrusion of separation of powers concerns into the rights interpretation stage manifests itself most clearly in relation to socio-economic rights, the Constitutional Court has adopted this approach in other cases, too. The common thread running through these cases is that they all involved claims for positive action on the part of the state, rather than a mere negative defence of the Bill of Rights.

In the 2004 case of Kaunda, a matter in which alleged mercenaries imprisoned in Zimbabwe sought to compel the government to provide them with diplomatic protection, the Court acknowledged that questions of foreign policy generally fall into the domain of the executive and that the Court was ill-equipped to intervene.[3] Chaskalson CJ, writing for the majority, held as follows:

> A decision as to whether protection should be given, and if so, what, is an aspect of foreign policy which is essentially the function of the executive. The timing of the representations if they are to be made, the language in which they are to be couched, and the sanctions (if any)

[1] Chaskalson P made this the focal point of rights interpretation: 'The very reason for establishing the new legal order, and for vesting the power of judicial review of all legislation in the courts, was to protect the rights of minorities and others who cannot protect their rights adequately through the democratic process. Those who are entitled to claim this protection include the social outcasts and marginalised people of our society. It is only if there is a willingness to protect the worst and the weakest amongst us, that all of us can be secure that our own rights will be protected.' S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 88.

[2] See Grootboom (supra) at para 95.

[3] Kaunda & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC).

which should follow if such representations are rejected are matters with which courts are ill-equipped to deal. The best way to secure relief for the national in whose interest the action is taken may be to engage in delicate and sensitive negotiations in which diplomats are better placed to make decisions than judges, and which may be harmed by court proceedings and the attendant proceedings.[1] The fact that foreign policy has traditionally been[2] and in many jurisdictions still is regarded as the domain of the executive[3] is not surprising. In Kaunda, however, the Constitutional Court indicates exactly why it is prepared to grant the executive broad discretion in matters of foreign policy. In the absence of a political question doctrine, both the majority and the dissenting judgments make it clear that the Court should stick to its general rule that the exercise of all public power, including issues of foreign affairs, is subject to constitutional control. The majority emphasizes that foreign affairs are not beyond scrutiny — that if government refuses to consider a legitimate request, or deals with it in bad faith or irrationally, a court could require government to deal with the matter properly.[4] But, as O'Regan J puts it in her dissenting judgment, 'the precise scope of the justiciability will depend on … the nature of the power being exercised'.[5] In the eyes of the majority, the nature of the power to conduct foreign affairs is so multi-layered and complex that a court of law should not apply a one-dimensional review standard to it. Chaskalson CJ and Ngcobo J (in a supporting judgment) both stress that a court simply cannot take all the factors into account that are necessary for the decision whether and, if so, how to provide diplomatic protection. For O'Regan J, a court should 'not presume knowledge and expertise that it does not have'.[6] Both the majority and the minority thus feel that the Court lacks the skills necessary to evaluate comprehensively how foreign affairs should be conducted. Many of the criteria that need to be applied in such an evaluation (Chaskalson CJ states timing, language, and possible consequences) are extra-legal, and thus beyond the realm of the courts. There is simply no legal yardstick by which to judge whether the timing of a particular diplomatic approach, for example, would be appropriate. In the result, the only review standard the Kaunda Court

[1] Kaunda (supra) at para 77. On the pre-eminence of the executive in the area of foreign policy see also the minority decisions of Ngcobo J at para 172 ('The conduct of the foreign relations is a matter which is within the domain of the executive.') and O'Regan J at para 243 ('It is clear … [that] the conduct of foreign relations is primarily the responsibility of the executive.')

[2] See John Locke's notion of 'federative power', the 'power of war and peace, leagues and alliances', i e foreign affairs, which cannot be conducted subject to predetermined abstract legal rules and in which the executive is not subject to the control of the legislature. John Locke Two Treatises of Government 2nd Treatise (1688) Chapter XII, paras 145–48.

[3] The Constitutional Court quotes decisions by German and English courts and refers to several other jurisdictions. Kaunda (supra) at paras 71–75.

[4] Kaunda (supra) at paras 80 (Chaskalson CJ) and 192 (Ngcobo J).

[5] Ibid at para 244.

[6] Ibid at para 247.

feels competent to apply is the (rather low) standard of rationality and absence of bad faith, and a test for whether the request for diplomatic protection was dealt with at all.

The difference between the majority and the dissenting judgments is thus not the analysis of the right at issue (although there is a disagreement over the extra-territorial effect of the Final Constitution): both agree that the Final Constitution does not provide for a clear and unambiguous entitlement to diplomatic protection. (In fact, the Final Constitution does not mention any entitlements with regard to foreign policy at all.) Rather, the difference between the judgments is the consequence that should follow from this finding: what is the Constitutional Court to do when there is no clear normative framework? The majority concludes that it must adopt a low review standard and leave a wide range of options open to the government. O'Regan J, by contrast, thinks that the Court should first look to see whether it can fill an open constitutional standard by reference to other constitutional provisions:

> The question [whether there is an obligation upon government to provide diplomatic protection] has to be answered in the light of the normative commitment to human rights emphasised in our Constitution, the importance accorded to international law and human rights in our Constitution and the conception of democratic government that underlies our Constitution. Most importantly, our Constitution must be interpreted in a way that will promote rather than hinder the achievement of the protection of human rights.[1]

The consequence of this approach is not that the Court may prescribe to the executive what to do in foreign affairs, but that, in light of 'a growing global commitment to the protection and promotion of fundamental human rights', the government is under an obligation to reaffirm the primacy of human rights in the South African constitutional order.[2] On this basis, O'Regan J proposes a declaratory order requiring the South African government to take appropriate steps to protect the applicants from possible egregious violations of international human rights norms.

In the eyes of the majority, the absence of any clear legal obligation indicates that the courts may only apply the review standard of lawfulness. Lawfulness is here defined as being the absence of irrationality — a contingency standard where nothing else is available. The moment the government can show that it has taken the matter seriously and that it has acted rationally in good faith, there is no violation of the Constitution and, hence, the applicants have no further claim. They may demand that the executive exercise its discretion according to this standard, but they cannot demand a specific result. In the eyes of the minority, on the other hand, the wide discretion the majority accords to the executive is reduced by the need to comply with international human rights norms. The issuing of the minority's declaratory order may not have made much difference to the applicants' situation in Kaunda. But it would have suggested that, even in cases falling into the executive's pre-eminent domain, the Bill of Rights fetters the executive's discretion to a certain extent.

[1] Kaunda (supra) at para 237.
[2] Ibid at para 270.

The relationship between rights interpretation and separation of powers is also illustrated in cases involving the right to political participation. In these cases, the Constitutional Court has often stated how important political rights are for South Africa's constitutional democracy.[1] But it has nevertheless adopted a deferential review standard based on considerations similar to those taken into account with regard to socio-economic rights. In New National Party, for example, the Court (in a majority judgment by Yacoob J) held that the requirement to register as a voter on the national voters' roll was 'a constitutional requirement of the right to vote, and not a limitation of the right'.[2] Given this conceptual framework, the Court inevitably concluded that the only appropriate standard for reviewing electoral legislation was that of rationality:

> It is to be emphasised that it is for Parliament to determine the means by which voters must identify themselves. This is not the function of a court. But this does not mean that Parliament is at large in determining the way in which the electoral scheme is to be structured. There are important safeguards aimed at ensuring appropriate protection for citizens who desire to exercise this foundational right. The first of the constitutional constraints placed upon Parliament is that there must be a rational relationship between the [electoral] scheme which it adopts and the achievement of a legitimate governmental purpose. Parliament cannot act capriciously or arbitrarily. The absence of such a rational connection will result in the measure being unconstitutional.[3]

The Court ironically uses strict language here to justify a fairly low standard of review. This low standard was criticized by O'Regan J, who, in a dissenting judgment, argued that the importance of the right to vote (which the majority strongly emphasized) demanded 'particular scrutiny by a court to ensure that fair participation in the political process is afforded'.[4] In O'Regan J's view, the majority's rational basis test for determining the constitutionality of an electoral statute was far too deferential. Instead, she held, a provision in an electoral statute that has the effect of limiting the number of eligible voters needs to be reasonably related to an appropriate government purpose.[5]

[1] See, for example, New National Party v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)('New National Party') at para 11 ('The importance of the right to vote is self-evident and can never be overstated. . . . [T]he right is fundamental to a democracy for without it there can be no democracy.') See also August & Another v The Independent Electoral Commission (IEC) & Others 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC)('August') at para 17 (Sachs J).

[2] New National Party (supra) at para 15.

[3] Ibid at para 19.

[4] Ibid at para 122.

[5] Ibid at para 122.

The majority in New National Party retorted that it was barred from adopting this higher standard by reason of the separation of powers:

> Decisions as to the reasonableness of statutory provisions are ordinarily matters within the exclusive competence of Parliament. This is fundamental to the doctrine of separation of powers and to the role of courts in a democratic society. Courts do not review provisions of Acts of Parliament on the grounds that they are unreasonable. They will do so only if they are satisfied that the legislation is not rationally connected to a legitimate government purpose. In such circumstances, review is competent because the legislation is arbitrary. Arbitrariness is inconsistent with the rule of law which is a core value of the Constitution.[1]

The majority here appears to misunderstand O'Regan J's point and fails to engage with the real separation of powers issue in this case. It is true that the Constitutional Court should not, and does not, review policy decisions by Parliament on the basis of whether there are other or better policy options available. To this extent it indeed does not use a reasonableness standard. But, of course, reasonableness is a perfectly legitimate review standard with regard to legislation, as is expressly envisaged in the limitations clause. What O'Regan J meant, and perhaps might have expressed more clearly, was that a provision in an electoral law restricting the number of eligible voters is a clear limitation on the right to vote and therefore needs to be reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society. The importance of the right to vote would in this way be respected by placing the onus on the government to justify any limitation. The majority's approach in New National Party, by contrast, means that legislative regulation of the right to vote is unlikely ever to require justification beyond the rational basis standard imposed in that case.[2]

The real separation of powers issue that the majority in New National Party fails to address is this: when the Final Constitution provides very little direct guidance on how a legislative scheme should be designed, does the separation of powers doctrine automatically require the Court to adopt the lowest possible review standard? O'Regan J pointed to the dilemma that the right to vote cannot be exercised in the absence of a legislative framework.[3] Indeed, the Final Constitution often requires the Constitutional Court to test legislation against open-ended concepts and vague expressions, such as 'democracy' or the 'rule of law.' The same may be said of socio-economic rights. In all these cases, the Court has to give content to the rights concerned. As argued earlier, however, filling these open-ended concepts is an interpretative exercise in which the Court needs to engage with other constitutional provisions, the founding values and, perhaps, the structure of the Final Constitution as a whole. It does not follow from the separation of powers principle that merely because a standard is open a deferential approach is required.[1]

[1] New National Party (supra) at para 24.
[2] Ibid at para 24.
[3] Ibid at para 122.

The Constitutional Court's decision in UDM adds even more complexity to this discussion.[2] In upholding certain constitutional amendments allowing the defection of members of parliament from one party to another ('floor crossing'), the Constitutional Court held that the principle of democracy as set out in the Final Constitution allows for both a system of proportional representation with an anti-defection clause and for such a system without an anti-defection clause.[3] Because the Final Constitution left the precise form of the electoral system open, the decision taken by Parliament to abolish the anti-defection clause passed constitutional muster.

In contrast to its decision in New National Party, the UDM Court does not reason explicitly that it cannot set a higher review standard by reason of the separation of powers. On a purely technical reading, the holding that an anti-defection clause is not mandated is based entirely on the Final Constitution's democratic principle. The Court simply saw no reason to develop a more robust understanding of democracy, which would have raised the review standard the legislature had to meet.[4] But this dry reasoning needs to be contrasted with the affirmed importance of democracy and the Court's willingness in other cases to adopt a value-based understanding of such concepts.[5] As several commentators have noticed, even without explicit reference to separation of powers, the underlying rationale for the UDM Court's decision seems to be the deference it perceived itself to owe to the legislature in cases of this nature.[6]

Although UDM may not provide the full inside story of how the Court understands the meaning, relevance and function of the separation of powers principle in South Africa, it nevertheless shows that separation of powers is sometimes an

[1] See Patrick Lenta 'Judicial Restraint and Overreach' (2004) 20 SAJHR 544, 547 (Emphasizes that advocating judicial restraint is meaningless when it does not take into account that written Bills of Rights (by way of their open language) allow for divergent judicial approaches within the spectrum of legitimate legal reasoning, that in constitutional democracies judges wield a great deal of discretion and that they are necessarily active participants in governance.)

[2] United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR (CC)('UDM').

[3] Ibid at paras 34–35.

[4] Ibid at para 35 (Court pointed out that no authority was provided obligating a member of a legislature to resign if he or she changed party allegiance during the life of the legislature absent a clear constitutional or legislative requirement to that effect.)

[5] See, for example, Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Reintegration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC) at para 21 (Interpretative role of the founding provisions in relation to political participation); August (supra) at para 17; and African Christian Democratic Party v Electoral Commission & Others 2006 (3) SA 305 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 579 (CC) at para 23.

[6] See Theunis Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 10.3*(b); Jason Brickhill & Ryan Babiuch 'Political Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) § 45.5(a)*; Patrick Lenta 'Judicial Restraint and Overreach' (2004) 20 SAJHR 544, 554.

express principle of constitutional law, while on other occasions it provides a more hidden rationale for the Court to employ other tools of constitutional interpretation to justify a deferential approach.

It is, of course, a matter of speculation what internal reasons might have motivated the Court in UDM to adopt an understanding of separation of powers that resulted in its ultimately allowing the floor-crossing package of legislation to go through where this was hardly the indisputable requirement of strict constitutional logic. The best explanation, in our view, is that the Constitutional Court does not always follow strict constitutional principle, but sometimes trades off principle against pragmatic considerations.[1] Decisions like UDM help us to understand how the Constitutional Court has developed its jurisprudence on a strategic basis to ensure that its decisions are respected by the government and Parliament, and, to a lesser extent, by the public. To everyone familiar with the contested role of the judiciary in South Africa, it is not inconceivable that the Constitutional Court may at times take the possible reaction of other political players into account when deciding a case. Sometimes the Constitutional Court prevents the legislature from pursuing a particular policy by subjecting it to a strict constitutional standard and sometimes it defers to the legislature's policy choice — without any apparent logic or coherent legal justification connecting the two sets of cases. This is hardly surprising, however, in a country dominated by a single political party in which the Constitutional Court needs to have regard to its institutional security and sociological legitimacy.

From a separation of powers perspective, there is another interesting factor that contributes to this explanation. The fact that the Constitutional Court feels the need to safeguard its institutional security so that it will be able, over time, to widen the 'tolerance interval' of the other branches for adverse decisions, thus allowing it to enforce the Constitution even in the most difficult cases,[2] is reminiscent of a fundamental aspect of the separation of powers: that only power arrests power.[3] By gradually expanding its de facto political power to enforce the Constitution, the Constitutional Court apparently takes seriously a consideration of which Montesquieu and Madison were acutely aware, i e that it is not enough to have separation of powers on paper. A system of countervailing powers, and checks and balances, also has to be operative in fact. Separation of powers simply does not work — does not prevent 'the gradual concentration of the several powers in the same department' — if those institutions tasked with providing limitations on the concentration and abuse of power lack 'the necessary means or personal motives to resist encroachments of the others', as James Madison put it.[4]

[1] See Theunis Roux 'Principle and Pragmatism on the Constitutional Court of South Africa' (2009) 7 International J of Constitutional Law (forthcoming).

[2] Ibid (quoting Lee Epstein, Olga Shvetsova & Jack Knight 'The Role of Constitutional Courts in the Establishment of Democratic Systems of Government' (2001) 35 Law & Society Review 117, 128–29).

[3] See § 12.2*(a)* supra.

[4] Alexander Hamilton, James Madison & John Jay The Federalist No 51 (supra) at 266.

The Final Constitution clearly provides the Constitutional Court with the 'necessary means to resist encroachments' by the political branches, and by all accounts thus far the Constitutional Court judges have shown that they have the personal stature required to live up to this expectation. But the constitutional mandate for judicial review would be meaningless if the Constitutional Court were faced with the prospect of seeing its members replaced by more politically compliant judges or, in the worst case scenario, being closed down or having its powers significantly curtailed. It is therefore precisely because the Constitutional Court's institutional function is to prevent the executive and the legislature from accumulating too much power, that it has to ensure that it stays in the adjudication business long enough to achieve this goal. The Constitutional Court has to ensure its institutional security so that it has the capacity to check and balance the other branches of government, in accordance with its constitutional mandate.

(cc) Separation of powers and remedies

Once the Constitutional Court has found that there has been an unjustified violation of a fundamental right, separation of powers considerations may still play a role with regard to the remedy. Constitutional remedies are governed by the Constitutional Court's authority to make any order that is just and equitable (FC s 172(1)(b) in connection with orders of invalidity) and to grant appropriate relief (FC s 38 in connection with an infringement or threatened infringement of the Bill of Rights).[1] Because the Final Constitution is not particularly detailed on remedies, the Constitutional Court has found that it has been left to the courts to decide what constitutes appropriate relief in any particular case, and that the courts' approach must be flexible,[2] provided that the remedy asked for has a sufficiently close connection to the subject matter of the case and the question put to the Court.[3] In essence, appropriate relief is relief that is required to protect and enforce the Constitution and the rights enshrined in it.[4] The Court has

[1] For more details on constitutional remedies, see Michael Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 9.

[2] See Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC) at para 18; Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC) at para 38.

[3] See Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC)(The Court was asked not only to extend certain benefits for married couples to partners in a permanent same-sex life partnership (who were unconstitutionally excluded from these benefits), but also to extend the benefits to non-married heterosexual partnerships. The Court rightly rejected this request: 'This Court is not at large to grant any relief under its power to grant "appropriate relief" — it cannot import matters that are remote to the case in question — otherwise it will be intruding too far into the legislative sphere. The intended accommodation of heterosexuals cannot be introduced via the backdoor into this case. It was not properly before us, nor did we hear argument on the complexities involved.' Ibid at para 33.)

[4] Fose (supra) at para 19.

emphasized that the legitimacy of its orders rests on the fact that they give effect to the provisions of the Constitution,[1] are effective and can be seen to be effective.[2]

Declarations of statutory invalidity in terms of FC s 172(1) are mandatory once the Constitutional Court has decided that any law or conduct is inconsistent with the Final Constitution. However, sometimes part of the legislative scheme found to be unconstitutional serves a legitimate purpose, and the invalidation of the unconstitutional provision would complicate or even prevent the achievement of this legitimate goal.[3] Furthermore, since statutory invalidity may be rectified in many possible ways, ranging from minor adjustments to a major redesign of the entire scheme, the repair of a defective statutory provision often involves (policy) decisions beyond the function and mandate of the judiciary.[4]

The task of not throwing the baby (the benign legislative scheme) out with the bath water (the unconstitutional provision) becomes particularly difficult when (similar to the cases discussed above concerning positive state obligations) the state grants a benefit or entitlement to some people, but fails to provide the same benefit or entitlement to other people, and an excluded applicant asks to be included in the benefits of the scheme. The Court is here faced with the problem that an unequal distribution of benefits may be rectified in several ways: by extending the benefit to the disadvantaged group (which is what the applicant typically asks for), by not granting the benefit to anybody (which would render the scheme equal by dint of abandoning it), or by redesigning the scheme in a different but constitutional way (so that some people may still not benefit from it, but this time for reasons that may be justified). On the one hand, the decision about which option to choose inextricably involves a policy choice. On the other hand, an unconstitutional statute must be invalidated, and therefore the Court has to choose.

Merely striking down the provision does seem to be the option that shows the most deference to the legislature. The consequence of this option will often be that the benefit is not provided to anybody. If the entitlement is required to be

[1] Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others as Amici Curiae); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC) at para 171.

[2] Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC) at para 200.

[3] See Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) at para 107 ('There may also be situations in which it is necessary for the Court to act to avoid or control the consequences of a declaration of invalidity of post-constitutional legislation where the result of invalidating everything done under such legislation is disproportional to the harm which would result from giving the legislation temporary validity.')

[4] See Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North & Others 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC)('Fraser') at para 50; East Zulu Motors (Pty) Ltd v Empangeni/Ngwelezane Transitional Local Council & Others 1998 (2) SA 61 (CC), 1998 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 12.

provided in terms of a constitutional right, such a decision may itself be unconstitutional, although not from an equality point of view. If the complete repeal of the benefit is constitutionally feasible, the group interested in the benefit may lobby Parliament to get its benefits back. But such a clear-cut decision may appear cruel to those who suffered from the unconstitutional distribution and unfair to those who legitimately relied on the benefit.[1] The Constitutional Court has indicated that it will, as a general rule, rather extend benefits to disadvantaged groups than strike down the beneficial provision altogether:

> Where reading in would, by expanding the group of persons protected, sustain a policy of long standing or one that is constitutionally encouraged, it should be preferred to one removing the protection completely.[2]

The solution then is that the Court should not only strike the invalid provision down, but, in the interests of a just and equitable remedy, supplement the declaration of invalidity with other remedial measures to ameliorate the negative consequences of its order. In this way, the Court effectively re-designs the law, either as an interim matter until the legislature has decided on the route it would like to take, or in a way that grants the applicant permanent and appropriate relief. In both cases, the legislative enactment is altered by the order of a court. Although more tailored to the situation than a simple invalidation, such remedies inevitably see the Court making policy choices that should ideally have been left to the legislature. The principle of separation of powers and the Court's duty to grant appropriate, just and equitable relief necessarily collide with each other in this context. Both principles have their place, but it is the judiciary's first and foremost function to protect the Constitution. This does not mean that a court may ride roughshod over legislative choices. Instead, the task is to use the least invasive remedy possible.[3]

Against this background, the Constitutional Court has emphasized that when it is faced with an unconstitutional statute it will assess whether the purpose served by the statute outweighs the constitutional violation.[4] In so doing, the Court's obligation to provide appropriate relief has to be balanced against separation of powers:

> [A court must keep the principle of separation of powers in mind] and, flowing therefrom, the deference it owes to the legislature in devising a remedy for a breach of the Constitution in any particular case. It is not possible to formulate in general terms what such deference

[1] See Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Others v Minster of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC) at para 88 ('There is every reason not to delay payment of social grants any further to the applicants and those similarly situated.') must embrace, for this depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. In essence, however, it involves restraint by the courts in not trespassing onto that part of the legislative field which has been reserved by the Final Constitution, and for good reason, to the legislature.[1]

[2] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality (NCGLE) & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000(1) BCLR 39 (CC)('NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs') at para 75.

[3] Ibid at para 74.

[4] See First National Bank of South Africa Ltd v Land and Agricultural Bank of South Africa & Others; Sheard v Land and Agricultural Bank of South Africa & Another 2000 (3) SA 626 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 876 (CC) at para 13.

When courts consider a remedy following a declaration of invalidity there is a need for 'remedial precision',[2] which pays due respect to the role of the legislature but still acknowledges that the key factor in striking the appropriate balance has to be the Court's function in protecting the Constitution.[3] Perhaps this is why the Court on another occasion held that a declaration of complete invalidity is something like a last resort, while the preferred remedy, if possible, should take the form of severance or reading in so as 'to bring the law within acceptable constitutional standards.'[4] Ironically, the Court here referred to its earlier judgment in NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs where it advocated a much more balanced approach.

In particular, the Constitutional Court has strongly rejected any contention by the other branches of government that there may be cases in which the separation of powers principle requires the Court ipso facto not to give directions to the executive. This was the government's stance in Mohamed, a case in which a foreign national had illegally been arrested by South African authorities and extradited to the US without an assurance from the US government that it would not impose or carry out the death penalty on him if convicted.[5] The Court disagreed, and insisted that after a violation of the Bill of Rights any order addressed to the

[1] See NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at para 66.

[2] Khosa (supra) at para 88.

[3] See NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at paras 74–75 ('In deciding whether words should be severed from a provision or whether words should be read into one, a court pays careful attention first, to the need to ensure that the provision which results from severance or reading words into a statute is consistent with the Constitution and its fundamental values and secondly, that the result achieved would interfere with the laws adopted by the legislature as little as possible. In our society where the statute books still contain many provisions enacted by a Parliament not concerned with the protection of human rights, the first consideration will in those cases often weigh more heavily than the second. In deciding to read words into a statute, a court should also bear in mind that it will not be appropriate to read words in, unless in so doing a court can define with sufficient precision how the statute ought to be extended in order to comply with the Constitution. Moreover, when reading in (as when severing) a court should endeavour to be as faithful as possible to the legislative scheme within the constraints of the Constitution.')

[4] Van Rooyen & Others v S & Others (General Council of the Bar of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC) at para 88.

[5] Mohamed & Another v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC)('Mohamed'). The government had argued that it would be wrong for a South African court to issue any declaratory order expressing disapproval of the arrest, detention, interrogation and transfer of the applicant to the USA. In particular the government opposed any order requiring it to intercede with the US authorities as this would infringe the separation of powers between the judiciary and the executive. 'In substance the stance was that Mohamed had been irreversibly surrendered to the power of the United States and, in any event, it was not for this Court, or any other, to give instructions to the executive.' Ibid at para 70.

relevant organs of state in South Africa to do whatever they could to remedy the wrong done or to ameliorate the consequences of the violation would be appropriate:

> To stigmatise such an order as a breach of the separation of state power as between the executive and the judiciary is to negate a foundational value of the Republic of South Africa, namely supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law. The Bill of Rights, which we find to have been infringed, is binding on all organs of state and it is our constitutional duty to ensure that appropriate relief is afforded to those who have suffered infringement of their constitutional rights.[1]

Finally, it makes a difference whether the statutory scheme, including the provision found to be unconstitutional, originated in the pre-1994 era or was enacted by the legislature of the new democratic state. Where the Constitutional Court finds that laws enacted before the coming into force of the Interim Constitution are inconsistent with the Bill of Rights it will more readily exercise special remedial powers to fill lacunae resulting from such inconsistencies — and thereby make quasi-legislative choices — than it will in respect of laws passed after the coming into force of the Interim Constitution.[2] The rationale for this principle, of course, is that there is generally a lesser need to defer to the legislative choices of a Parliament that was not concerned with the protection of human rights.[3]

These affirmations notwithstanding, the 'remedial precision' required to balance the effectiveness of a remedy against the principle of separation of powers has often caused the Court problems, with the scale tipping sometimes in one and sometimes in the other direction. This balancing exercise has affected all types of remedial measures, whether explicitly provided for in the Final Constitution or developed by the Constitutional Court in terms of FC s 172(1)(b), such as 'reading in' or 'severance'.[4] By and large, the Court has favoured providing effective relief over deference, although on some occasions the Court has compromised on the effectiveness of an order to avoid trespassing on what it perceived to be the legitimate domain of the other branches of government.

The notion of balancing is expressly provided for in FC s 172(1)(b)(ii), which authorizes the Court to suspend an order of statutory invalidity to allow the competent authority to correct the defective statute. In the interests of separation of powers, in other words, the Court may suspend the coming into effect of such

[1] Mohamed (supra) at para 72.

[2] See Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) at para 108;

[3] NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at para 74. It may be argued, though, that the difference is much less pronounced now than it was under the Interim Constitution. In 2008, it is fair to assume that, 14 years after the transition to democracy, pre-1994 statutes still on the books are there because the democratic legislature wants them to be valid.

[4] On these and other remedial strategies following a finding of constitutional invalidity, see Michael Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) § 9.4.

an order — although the Court itself has recognized that often an effective remedy is one that takes effect immediately.[1] FC s 172(1)(b)(ii) not only authorizes the Court to allow the competent authority (the legislature with regard to Acts of Parliament, the executive with regard to delegated legislation) to correct the defective law. It also allows the judiciary to exert some degree of pressure on the political branches and 'to put Parliament on terms to correct the defect in an invalid law within a prescribed time'[2] Parliament is, however, free to decide how it is going to redesign the unconstitutional provision — provided that the new provision complies with the Final Constitution — and may decide to do nothing if it has no objection to the law being invalidated.[3]

The general assumption, though, is that an unconstitutional provision is invalid with immediate effect and that a party wishing the Court to suspend its order of invalidity must provide persuasive reasons for the Court to do so.[4] If those reasons are presented to the Court, it will engage in a balancing exercise to determine whether the purpose served by the challenged statute outweighs the constitutional violation effected under its provisions.[5] In this balancing exercise, the Court considers the nature of the law in question and the character of the defect to be corrected,[6] the potential for prejudice being suffered if an order of invalidity is not suspended, the interests of the parties as well as those of the public, and the need to promote the constitutional project and prevent chaos.[7]

The Court has not always been particularly responsive to the person*(s)* affected by an unconstitutional provision. In its early years, the Court tended to show greater deference to the legislature than to the need to protect the Bill of Rights. This is evident in the Court's grudging admission in Ntuli that the further perpetuation of the unconstitutional law in that case was 'unfortunate', but that the applicant was nevertheless required to live with it until the legislature had cured the defect.[8] In another case it rejected an application because it regarded the consequences of invalidity to be too complex and held that the legislature

[1] NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at para 89.

[2] Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) at para 106.

[3] For the consequences of a suspension order, see Bishop 'Remedies' (supra) at §9.4*(d)(i)*.

[4] See S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC) at para 30; Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 51.

[5] See First National Bank of South Africa Ltd v Land and Agricultural Bank of South Africa & Others; Sheard v Land and Agricultural Bank of South Africa & Another 2000 (3) SA 626 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 876 (CC) at para 13.

[6] See Mistry v Interim Medical and Dental Council of South Africa & Others 1998 (4) SA 1127 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 880 (CC) at para 37. The Court here sets out as a general rule, that a 'party wishing to keep an unconstitutional provision alive should at least indicate the following: what the negative consequences for justice and good government of an immediately operational declaration of invalidity would be; why other existing measures would not be an adequate alternative stop-gap; what legislation on the subject, if any, is in the pipeline; and how much time would reasonably be required to adopt corrective legislation.'

[7] See Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the RSA & Others 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC) at para 91.

[8] S v Ntuli 1996 (1) SA 1207 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 141 (CC) at para 28.

would need to apply its mind to the problem.[1] On yet another occasion, the Court held that if a party could establish that the suspension of its order of invalidity would cause it substantial prejudice, the party could approach the Court for a variation of the order.[2]

In recent years, however, the Constitutional Court has increasingly tried to reconcile the conflicting principles of separation of powers and the need for an effective remedy by granting interim relief to the successful litigant pending the rectification of the defective legislation. For example, the Constitutional Court has ordered the executive to apply and interpret an unconstitutional statute in a particular way until the defect is corrected (in particular, when the statute is incomprehensible).[3]

At first glance, the suspension of an order of invalidity combined with interim relief seems to be the way out of every situation in which the Court has to choose between the effective protection of a violated right (with immediate effect for the aggrieved party) and leaving it to the 'competent authority' to make the necessary (policy) decision on how to correct the defect. Such a solution allows the judiciary to have it both ways: to be a bold guardian of the Constitution and to achieve an appropriate constitutional balance between the three branches of government. One may assume, therefore, that the availability of this solution would have emboldened the Court to strike down legislation. And indeed, in Dawood, the Constitutional Court (in a unanimous judgment by O'Regan J) emphasized that interim relief and deference to Parliament are related:

> Where . . . a range of possibilities exists and the Court is able to afford appropriate interim relief to affected persons, it will ordinarily be appropriate to leave the Legislature to determine in the first instance how the unconstitutionality should be cured. This Court should be slow to make those choices which are primarily choices suitable for the Legislature.[4]

Consequently, an order of suspension married to an order for interim relief should be the preferred option for the Court. One important exception suggests itself. Where the Court (for whatever reason) is not able to give appropriate

[1] East Zulu Motors (Pty) Ltd v Empangeni/Ngwelezane Transitional Local Council & Others 1998 (2) SA 61 (CC), 1998 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 12.

[2] South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC) at para 42.

[3] Executive Council Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs; Executive Council KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at para 135; Janse van Rensburg & Another v Minister of Trade and Industry NO & Another 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC) at para 35–36; Moseneke & Others v Master of High Court 2001 (2) SA 18 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 103 (CC) at para 27; South African Liquor Traders Association & Others v Chairperson Gauteng Liquor Board & Others 2006 (8) BCLR 901 (CC) at paras 44–45. See also Bishop 'Remedies' (supra) at §9.4*(d)(i)*.

[4] Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs; Shalabi & Another v Minister of Home Affairs; Thomas & Another v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC)('Dawood') at para 64.

interim relief to the persons affected, the Court might wish to issue a 'stricter' order by the Court – even if such an order would require the Court to make choices 'primarily … suitable' for other branches of government.

But in several judgments the Court has not followed this route. Rather it has given another remedy instead, on the grounds that the combination of suspension and interim relief did not constitute a just and equitable remedy. In Satchwell, for example, the Constitutional Court was faced with a challenge to the constitutionality of certain provisions of the Judges Remuneration and Conditions of Services Act and the regulations promulgated under this Act, which gave benefits to the spouses of judges, but not to same-sex life partners.[1] Not surprisingly, the Court found that this omission constituted an infringement of the right to non-discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation.[2] Turning to the question of a just and equitable remedy, the Court had to choose between a suspended declaration of invalidity (because a simple striking down would have had the effect that no-one would have been entitled to any benefits), perhaps combined with interim relief, and reading the entitlement for partners in a permanent same-sex partnership into the impugned provision. The Court decided on the latter option:

> The remedy of reading in is far more preferable to an order striking down and suspending such declaration which would not afford the applicant the relief she seeks.[3]

Unfortunately, the Constitutional Court did not provide any further reasons for its choice. Perhaps the judges thought that it was a clear case. From the judges' perspective, any reduction of the benefits for fellow judges' spouses was apparently not an option.[4] So, further extension was the only way to go. Perhaps the Court just saw no point in waiting for the extension. From this perspective, a suspended striking down would have been a mere nicety, making even less sense when combined with an interim order basically providing same-sex life partners with all that they had asked for anyway.

In Khosa, a case concerning the entitlement of permanent residents to social grants, the Constitutional Court (in a majority judgment by Mokgoro J) explicitly rejected the possibility of interim relief because this would have helped only the applicants, and not other persons in a similar situation.[5] The Court wanted to

[1] Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC)('Satchwell').

[2] Ibid at para 21.

[3] Ibid at para 34.

[4] Ironically, Constitutional Court judges were not included in the challenged benefits scheme, because the Constitutional Court did not exist when the provisions entered into force. This was changed by legislation in 2001 — while the Satchwell case was pending — and again the legislature omitted to include permanent same-sex life partners. These new provisions were challenged, too, and the Constitutional Court repeated its earlier 'reading in' order with regard to these new provisions. See Satchwell v President of South Africa & Another 2003 (4) SA 266 (CC), 2004 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).

[5] Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Others v Minster of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC) at para 88 (Striking down without an order of suspension was not appropriate either, as it would have made the grants instantly available to all residents including visitors within South Africa who satisfy the other criteria.)

help all other permanent residents who were excluded from the social grant scheme, and therefore resorted to reading the words 'permanent residents' into the impugned legislation as the most appropriate remedy.[1]

Just how fragile the balance between respect for the separation of powers and granting an effective remedy is, is evident in those cases in which the Constitutional Court was divided over this very question. The leading case here is Fourie.[2] The Court was unanimous in finding that both the Marriage Act[3] and the common-law definition of marriage were unconstitutional to the extent that they discriminated against homosexual couples by failing to provide them with the means to enjoy the status and the benefits, together with the responsibilities, that marriage accorded to heterosexual couples. It was, however, divided on the remedy. The majority (in a judgment by Sachs J) suspended the order of invalidity for twelve months in order to give Parliament time to remedy the defect (which it did in November 2006).[4] If Parliament had failed to cure the defect within that time, the words 'or spouse' would automatically have been read into the relevant section of the Marriage Act (the common law would just have become invalid). In a dissenting judgment, O'Regan J proposed that the Court should not have suspended the order of invalidity and additionally should have made the necessary orders to permit same-sex couples to marry with immediate effect, i e by developing the common law and reading in the words 'or spouse' into the relevant section of the Marriage Act.

The majority and the minority judgment in Fourie illustrate two different approaches to the Court's relationship to the legislature in respect of violations of the Bill of Rights. In the majority judgment, Sachs J spends thirty paragraphs dismissing claims by the government and the amici that, even if the Marriage Act and the common law do discriminate against same-sex couples, the remedy against such discrimination should not be to alter the law of marriage to include same-sex couples, but rather to provide alternative forms of recognition to same-sex family relationships. The rejection of these arguments forms part of the first stage of the enquiry, because after this Sachs J goes on to engage the limitations

[1] Khosa (supra) at para 89.

[2] Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Others; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)('Fourie').

[3] Act 25 of 1961.

[4] In response to Fourie, on 30 November 2006 (just one day short of the window period), the President signed the Civil Union Act 17 of 2006 into law. The Act introduces the new institution of a 'civil union' between persons either in the form of marriage or a civil partnership, both forms available to heterosexual as well as same-sex partners, solemnized before the state and with all legal consequences of a marriage. The Marriage Act of 1961 is still valid and still only allows heterosexual partners to conclude a marriage. For an insightful view of the drafting history behind the new Act, see Pierre de Vos 'The "Inevitability" of Same-Sex Marriage in South Africa's Post-apartheid State' (2007) 23 SAJHR 432, 458–63. See also David Bilchitz & Melanie Judge "For Whom Does the Bell Toll?" — The Challenges and Possibilities the Civil Union Act Creates for Family Law in South Africa' (2007) 23 SAJHR 466.

stage, where again it was contended that marriage should not be extended to include same-sex couples. In this context, Sachs J makes an interesting remark about the relationship between the rights inquiry stages and the remedy (or order) stage:

> The factors advanced [in support of justification] might have some relevance in the search for effective ways to provide an appropriate remedy that enjoys the widest public support, for the violation of the rights involved.[1]

This sentence seems to indicate that the majority takes the state's concerns about the full extension of marriage to same-sex couples more seriously than it elsewhere admits — not with regard to the rights violation, but with regard to the appropriate remedy.[2] It is at this point that separation of powers concerns weigh heavily with the Court. It begins by acknowledging that Parliament has included same-sex partners as beneficiaries of several statutory schemes. The problem with these 'advances', however (the Court says), is that they 'continue to be episodic rather than global'.[3] This allows it to reiterate its earlier call for comprehensive legislation regularizing same-sex relationships in J & B.

> It is unsatisfactory for the courts to grant piecemeal relief to members of the gay and lesbian community as and when aspects of their relationships are found to be prejudiced by unconstitutional legislation. . . . The executive and legislature are therefore obliged to deal comprehensively and timeously with existing unfair discrimination against gays and lesbians. Moreover, courts considering unfair discrimination cases of this sort need carefully to evaluate the context and nature of the discrimination and, where unfair discrimination is found, remedies must be carefully tailored to that context.[4]

Ironically, in J & B (which involved a challenge to the exclusion of same-sex partners from becoming joint parents of a child born to them as a result of artificial insemination), the Constitutional Court had no problem in reading the words 'permanent same-sex life partner' into the Children's Status Act.[5] Furthermore, the Court explicitly rejected the suspension of that order: first because, after the vindication of an infringed right by way of reading in, there is no lacuna left that the legislature needs to fill; secondly, because, when the unconstitutionality is cured, there would usually be no reason to deprive the applicants of the benefit of such an order by suspending it; and, finally, because the legislature is anyway at liberty to change the law whenever it pleases.[6]

[1] Fourie (supra) at para 113.

[2] See De Vos (supra) at 457 ('[T]here seems to be a contradiction at the heart of the rhetoric employed by the Court.') See also Fourie (supra) at para 143 (Court notes that the SALRC considered it advisable from a policy point of view not to disregard the strong objections against recognition, and rather to accommodate religious sentiments to the extent possible in the development of a further proposal.)

[3] Fourie (supra) at para 116.

[4] J & B v Director General: Department of Home Affairs & Others 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC)('J&B') at paras 23 and 25.

[5] Act 82 of 1987.

[6] J & B (supra) at para 22.

In Fourie, however, the majority of the Court emphasized that matters were not that simple, and referred to a pending South African Law Reform Commission (SALRC) project on the topic of Domestic Partnerships, which had outlined several alternative forms of relief to which same-sex couples might be entitled.[1] Given that different ways of accommodating the legitimate interests of such couples were already in the public domain and were soon to be considered by Parliament,[2] the Court felt that it needed to have regard to the complexity and variety of the statutory and policy alternatives available to the legislature, even though a successful litigant should usually receive at least some practical relief.[3]

Against this background, the Court reasoned that the benefits of suspending the order of invalidity outweighed the interests of the successful litigants. The first reason given for this was that same-sex marriage is a matter of 'status' and thus requires a remedy that is 'secure', 'firmly located within the broad context of an extended search for emancipation', and part of an 'enduring and stable legislative appreciation'.[4] A temporary remedial measure, on the other hand, would be far less likely to achieve the enjoyment of equality promised by the Constitution.[5] Secondly, in the eyes of Sachs J, the claim by Mrs Fourie and Mrs Bonthuys to get married should not be regarded as a narrow wish 'to enter into a legal arrangement' but rather as part of a bigger picture.[6] The validity of these arguments is debatable.[7] Nevertheless they allowed the majority of the Court to show respect for the separation of powers and (particularly in the light of the progress made by the SALRC) to give Parliament an opportunity to deal appropriately with a matter 'that touches on deep public and private sensibilities'.[8] The sleight of hand in the [1] South African Law Reform Commission, Project 118, Discussion Paper 104 (August 2003). The SALRC proposed that same-sex relationships should be acknowledged by the law and identified three alternative ways of effecting legal recognition for such relationships: (a) opening up the common-law definition of marriage to same-sex couples by inserting a definition to that effect in the Marriage Act; (b) abolishing secular marriage as a legal institution and replacing it with a civil union which would produce effects similar to marriage but be available for both heterosexual and same-sex couples; and (c) providing a 'marriage-like alternative', according same-sex couples the opportunity of concluding civil unions with the same legal consequences as marriage.

[2] For previous use of this argument, see Volks NO v Robinson & Others 2005 (5) BCLR 446 (CC) at para 29.

[3] Fourie (supra) at paras 133–34 (with reference to Fraser (supra) and Dawood (supra)).

[4] Ibid at para 136.

[5] Ibid at para 136.

[6] Ibid at para 137 ('the comprehensive wish to be able to live openly and freely as lesbian women emancipated from all the legal taboos that historically have kept them from enjoying life in the mainstream of society'.)

[7] The first argument begs the question why an order by the Constitutional Court should not be a 'secure' remedy. In several other judgments the Court had relied on the fact that 'reading in' does constitute such a remedy, granting to successful litigants the fruits of their constitutional efforts and providing for legal certainty. The second argument made by Sachs J seems to be a bit speculative, and assumes a very altruistic motivation on the part of the applicants for which there was no indication in the facts of the case. Maybe Mrs Fourie and Mrs Bonthuys really just wanted to get married.

[8] Fourie (supra) at paras 138–39.

majority judgment was, as Theunis Roux has pointed out, that it implied that this very deference to the legislature would actually enhance the effective protection of the constitutional right at issue.[1]

The most interesting part of the Fourie judgment from a separation of powers perspective follows immediately after these considerations. Although throughout his reasoning on the remedy Sachs J emphasizes why the legislature should be free to map out what it considers to be the best way forward for same-sex marriage, the judgment ultimately defines the scope Parliament has in its deliberations on this issue rather narrowly. On the pretext that it would be 'helpful to Parliament to point to certain guiding principles of special constitutional relevance' for the prospective legislation,[2] the Court in effect pre-determines the path the legislature has to follow if it is to avoid further constitutional challenges.[3] In the process of drafting the new legislation and in academic writing, for example, it was argued that the creation of a separate institution for same-sex couples ('civil partnership') would run against the 'guidelines' in the Fourie judgment (even if such an option bestowed exactly the same set of legal rights on same-sex civil partners as it did on heterosexual married couples). The civil partnership option, it was said, would contravene the very clear prohibition of a 'separate but equal' remedy in the judgment.[4]

In our view, the deference the Constitutional Court paid to the legislature in Fourie was given with one hand and taken away with the other. The Court tied the legislature's hands with regard to the policy choices it could make, in a way that did not show a particularly high regard for Parliament's pre-eminent domain. This is not to suggest that the reasoning in Fourie was wrong from a Bill of Rights perspective. In addition, if one contrasts this case with the deference shown towards the legislature and the executive in the cases discussed above,[5] the Court in Fourie did what we argued it should have done in cases like UDM: the Court closed constitutional leeways potentially open to the political branches by a process of constitutional interpretation that included reference to supporting

[1] See Theunis Roux 'Principle and Pragmatism on the Constitutional Court of South Africa' (2009) 7 International J of Constitutional Law (forthcoming).

[2] Fourie (supra) at para 147.

[3] See Fourie (supra) at paras 148–53 (The Court outlined the following principles: The objective of the new measure must be to promote human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms; the new law should not create equal disadvantage for all, i e it should not assume that if same-sex couples cannot enjoy the status and entitlements coupled with the responsibilities of marriage, nobody should; the new regime should (while on the face of it provide equal protection) in fact reproduce new forms of marginalization and would reiterate a 'separate but equal' repudiation of homosexuals; finally, the legislative remedy chosen must be as generous and accepting towards same-sex couples as it is to heterosexual couples, both in terms of the intangibles as well as the tangibles involved.)

[4] De Vos (supra) at 458–59; Bilchitz & Judge (supra) at 481; Jaco Barnard 'Totalitarianism, (Same-Sex) Marriage and Democratic Politics in Post-Apartheid South Africa' (2007) 23 SAJHR 500, 516.

[5] See § 12.3.(d)(ii)(bb) supra.

constitutional principles,[1] the adoption of a historic perspective,[2] and resort to comparative law. In the end, the separation of powers concerns in Fourie were not as pressing as they first appeared to be, or, perhaps, they were experienced in a more indirect way. The genius of the decision is the way the Court was able to pass responsibility for the recognition of same-sex marriage to the legislature, shrouding its interest in avoiding blame for the 'destruction of marriage' in a resounding tribute to Parliament's greater democratic legitimacy, and a stated belief in the value of legislative choice and competence. At the same time, however, the Constitutional Court made very sure that the legislature's choice was in fact quite limited and designed an order that put considerable pressure on the political branches not to exceed the period given for a legislative solution.

The price paid for this bit of ingenuity, of course, was that same-sex couples who wished to get married had to wait a further year. For O'Regan J in dissent, the principle that successful litigants should ordinarily obtain the relief they seek could not be strategically traded off in this way.[3] The weak point in the majority judgment, as she pointed out, was that, even on its approach, the legislature was not left with a wide range of options from which to choose.[4] This fact undermined the majority's invocation of separation of powers:

> The doctrine of the separation of powers is an important one in our Constitution but I cannot see that it can be used to avoid the obligation of a court to provide appropriate relief that is just and equitable to litigants who successfully raise a constitutional complaint. The exceptions to … [the immediate effect of invalidity orders] must arise in other circumstances, where the relief cannot properly be tailored by a court, or where even though a litigant would otherwise be successful, other interests or matters would preclude an order in his or her favour, or where an order would otherwise produce such disorder or administrative difficulties that the interests of justice served by an order in favour of a successful litigant are outweighed by the social dislocation such an order might occasion.[5]

She continues:

> It would have been desirable if the unconstitutional situation identified in this matter had been resolved by Parliament without litigation. The corollary of this proposition, however, is not that this Court should not come to the relief of successful litigants, simply because an Act of Parliament conferring the right to marry on gays and lesbians might be thought to carry greater democratic legitimacy than an order of this Court. The power and duty to

[1] See Fourie (supra) at para 149 ('At the heart of these principles lies the notion that in exercising its legislative discretion Parliament will have to bear in mind that the objective of the new measure must be to promote human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms.')

[2] Ibid at para 150 (the Court refers to an apartheid-era case to illustrate that the traditional notion that separate but equal institutions are no longer permissible ('unthinkable') in the post-1994 constitutional democracy.)

[3] Ibid at paras 165–67.

[4] Ibid at para 168.

[5] Ibid at para 170.

protect constitutional rights is conferred upon the courts and courts should not shrink from that duty. The legitimacy of an order made by the Court does not flow from the status of the institution itself, but from the fact that it gives effect to the provisions of our Constitution.[1]

With these words, O'Regan counters the majority's (somewhat superficial) respect for the domain of the legislature with a reminder about the need to respect the Court's own domain, adding that no order by the Court would preclude Parliament from addressing the law of marriage in the future.

In the final analysis, both the majority and the minority's approach in Fourie are plausible. The Court, after all, did fulfil its major obligation to protect the Constitution. The difference between Fourie and those cases in which the Constitutional Court employed the separation of powers doctrine to reduce the level of review is that the substantive question of constitutional law in Fourie was undisputed. It is thus debatable whether the majority really 'shr[a]nk' from its duty to protect constitutional rights, as O'Regan J implies in the quote above. To whom does the Court owe its duty to protect the Constitution: only or primarily the litigants in the case before it, or also all affected persons and society in general? If one accepts that the Constitutional Court is just one actor in South African politics and needs to involve other players in the constitutional project (not least in order to protect its capacity to make controversial judgments), then one must also accept that the majority's decision in Fourie to sacrifice the applicants' interests in an immediately enforceable order in favour of the long-term health of South Africa's constitutional democracy was probably justified.[2] The separation of powers doctrine in the context of remedies needs to find an appropriate balance between two conflicting domains: the judiciary's power and duty to give effect to the Constitution and the political branches' prerogative to make policy choices within the framework of the Constitution. The Final Constitution anticipates this tension by providing for just and equitable remedies, such as the suspension of orders of invalidity. Attaching greater importance to one of the two domains in the abstract does not do this careful constitutional scheme justice.

(iii) Delegation of legislative authority and subordinate legislation

The most obvious example of the performance by the executive of a legislative (ie abstract rule-making) function is the making of subordinate legislation.[3] Generally

[1] Fourie (supra) at para 171.

[2] Cf Roux 'Principle and Pragmatism' (supra) (Suggesting that, for the majority of the Constitutional Court in Fourie, it was important to enlist the legislature's co-operation in the enforcement of a legal change that was likely to be highly divisive, and ran the risk of further weakening public support for the Court.)

[3] Subordinate legislation is also referred to as delegated legislation, governatorial legislation or secondary legislation. The term basically refers to law made by an executive authority under powers given to it by an empowering Act ('primary legislation') in order to implement and administer the requirements of that Act. The advantage of such legislation is that it allows rules dealing with rather technical matters to be prepared by those with the relevant expert knowledge in the governmental departments. The legislature does not need to be occupied with such details and is free to determine broader policy decisions. Finally, it can usually be changed faster than a formal Act of Parliament allowing the government to deal swiftly with changing circumstances.

speaking, countries within the English tradition of parliamentary supremacy are less concerned about the delegation of law-making power to the executive. In legal systems with a strong tradition of a constitutionally mandated separation of powers, on the other hand, the extent to which the legislature may transfer rule-making powers to the executive is a contested issue.

The most extreme example of the parliamentary supremacy tradition is the United Kingdom itself, where there is no formal limit on the power of Parliament to delegate legislative power to the government.[1] This power extends as far as the delegation of the power to amend Acts of Parliament. However, since the Statutory Instruments Act of 1946, most delegated legislation is subject to parliamentary control, either in the form of a 'negative resolution procedure', requiring Parliament formally to veto the delegated legislation within a certain time period to prevent its coming into force, or in the form of an 'obligatory positive affirmative resolution' as a precondition for the delegated legislation's coming into force. In either case, the empowering Act must state the form of parliamentary control to which the delegated legislation is subject. Parliament's control is typically limited to approving or rejecting the delegated legislation as laid before it, i e it can usually not amend it.

In Australia, the High Court, in a 1931 decision, followed the English tradition of allowing for wide-ranging delegation of law-making powers by Parliament to the executive.[2] The Court explicitly rejected the argument that separation of powers considerations prevented the legislature from delegating even the widest powers to the executive, precisely because the very nature of Parliament's legislative power involves the power to confer law-making powers upon authorities other than itself. However, the High Court at the same time declared that Parliament could not 'abdicate' its legislative powers in a particular area entirely. Delegation needed to be specific, because an overbroad delegation would fall outside the legislative competence of the Commonwealth Parliament (in contrast to state parliaments in Australia, which retain all residual legislative powers):

> [A] law confiding authority to the Executive will [not always] be valid, however extensive or vague the subject matter may be . . . There may be such a width or such an uncertainty of the subject matter to be handed over that the enactment attempting it is not a law with respect to any particular head or heads of legislative power.[3]

A generally more critical approach to subordinate legislation exists in Germany, where delegation is possible, but only as provided for in the Constitution. According to Article 80 of the Grundgesetz, the executive at both the federal and the provincial (Länder) level may be authorized by a law to issue subordinate legislation provided that the content, purpose, and scope of the authority conferred on it are specified in the empowering law. The Federal Constitutional Court has on many occasions been asked to decide whether a particular empowering act was sufficiently precise in this regard. The general thrust of these decisions is restrictive and has resulted in the so-called 'theory of essentialness' ('Wesentlichkeitstheorie'), which emphasizes the importance of parliamentary authority for limitations of the Bill of Rights against the background of separation of powers concerns:

[1] See Anthony Bradley & Keith Ewing Constitutional and Administrative Law (14th Edition, 2007) 682–87.
[2] Victorian Stevedoring and General Contracting Co Pty Ltd & Another v Dignan Informant (1931) 46 CLR 73.
[3] Ibid at 101 (Dixon J).

> The principles of the rule of law and democracy impose on the legislature a duty of formulating more or less by itself those regulations that are essential for the realization of basic rights — and of not leaving this to the discretion and decision-making authority of the executive. To what extent the legislature must by itself set the necessary guidelines depends, in a given area, predominantly on the fundamental right involved. It has a duty to act in this way when competing liberty rights clash, and their boundaries are fluid and hard to discern. … Here, the legislature itself is obligated to determine the limits of the conflicting guarantees of liberty, at least to the extent that such limits are essential for the exercise of these liberty rights.[1]

According to the Court, the theory of essentialness does not only answer the question of whether a particular subject must be statutorily regulated before the executive may make any rules in relation to it. It is also decisive in determining how far such statutory regulation should go, how precise it needs to be, and how much discretion may be left to the executive in its application.[2] Obviously, the question of what is essential is highly dependent on the particular subject matter, and the Federal Constitutional Court's jurisprudence is accordingly quite fragmented in this respect. The involvement of Bill of Rights issues generally reduces the legislature's capacity to delegate law-making powers to the executive, but an Act of Parliament regulating complex situations or addressing potentially fast-changing facts may be given greater leeway to delegate decisions to the executive.[3]

In South Africa, the issue of whether and to what extent Parliament may empower the government to make abstract rules and thus to delegate its law-making power was first addressed under the Interim Constitution. The constitutional text provided no assistance as it did not mention subordinate legislation at all, but only stated in very general terms that Parliament had the power to make laws in accordance with the Constitution (IC s 37).

[1] BVerfGE 83, 130 ('Josephine Mutzenbacher') 142 ('Rechtsstaatsprinzip und Demokratiegebot verpflichten den Gesetzgeber, die für die Grundrechtsverwirklichung maßgeblichen Regelungen im wesentlichen selbst zu treffen und diese nicht dem Handeln und der Entscheidungsmacht der Exekutive zu überlassen. Wie weit der Gesetzgeber die für den fraglichen Lebensbereich erforderlichen Leitlinien selbst bestimmen muß, richtet sich maßgeblich nach dessen Grundrechtsbezug. Eine Pflicht dazu besteht, wenn miteinander konkurrierende grundrechtliche Freiheitsrechte aufeinandertreffen und deren jeweilige Grenzen fließend und nur schwer auszumachen sind. … Hier ist der Gesetzgeber verpflichtet, die Schranken der widerstreitenden Freiheitsgarantien jedenfalls so weit selbst zu bestimmen, wie sie für die Ausübung dieser Freiheitsrechte wesentlich sind.' (References omitted.)) This judgment was published in an English translation in Bundesverfassungsgericht (ed) Decisions of the Bundesverfassungsgericht 1958–1995 Volume 2/II (1998) 474.

[2] See BVerfGE 83, 130, 152 ('Josephine Mutzenbacher').

[3] BVerfGE 49, 89, 133 ('Kalkar I').

The practice of delegating law-making power to the executive was challenged as early as 1995 in Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others.[1] The case concerned the validity of certain amendments to the Local Government Transition Act by presidential proclamation. The Act had explicitly empowered the President to make amendments to it in this way, provided that any such amendment should first have been approved by the relevant Parliamentary committees and that Parliament as a whole did not later disapprove of any such proclamation or any provision thereof.

The Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature 1995 Court began its assessment with the general observation that delegated legislation was not only allowed by the Interim Constitution, but also unavoidable in complex contemporary societies:

> In a modern state detailed provisions are often required for the purpose of implementing and regulating laws, and Parliament cannot be expected to deal with all such matters itself. There is nothing in the Constitution which prohibits Parliament from delegating subordinate regulatory authority to other bodies. The power to do so is necessary for effective law-making. It is implicit in the power to make laws for the country and I have no doubt that under our Constitution parliament can pass legislation delegating such legislative functions to other bodies.[2]

Historically, South Africa had followed English law in terms of which it is accepted that Parliament may delegate power to the executive to amend or repeal Acts of Parliament.[3] The Court considered, however, whether the principle of separation of powers entrenched in the Interim Constitution and the departure from the former system of parliamentary supremacy had changed this. Reasoning that the explicit description of the law-making process in the Interim Constitution[4] guaranteed the exercise of legislative authority by Parliament, the Court held that this procedure was mandatory whenever a law was amended.[5]

> There is . . . a difference between delegating authority to make subordinate legislation within the framework of a statute under which the delegation is made, and assigning plenary legislative power to another body, including . . . the power to amend the Act under which the assignment is made.[6]

The empowerment of the President formally to amend the Act by proclamation (or by any other form of subordinate legislation) was therefore held to be invalid.

The Final Constitution, in contrast to its predecessor, does mention subordinate legislation. FC s 239 (the definitions clause) states that national legislation includes

[1] Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC)('Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature 1995').
[2] Ibid at para 51 (Chaskalson P).
[3] See R v Maharaj 1950 (3) SA 187 (A) and Binga v Cabinet for South West Africa & Others 1988 (3) SA 155 (A).
[4] IC ss 59–65; FC ss 73–82.
[5] Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature 1995 (supra) at para 62.
[6] Ibid at para 51.

'subordinate legislation made in terms of an Act of Parliament'. The only requirement that may be deduced from this definition is that all subordinate legislation must be made 'in terms of' an empowering statute. FC s 101(3) provides that '[p]roclamations, regulations and other instruments of subordinate legislation must be accessible to the public', thereby not only guaranteeing some degree of transparency, but also indicating that the meaning of 'subordinate legislation' is not limited to proclamations or regulations, but also includes by-laws and other rules made by executive bodies.[1]

As with the Interim Constitution, the Final Constitution does not determine the extent to which Parliament may make use of its power to delegate legislative authority to the executive. In 1999, however, the Constitutional Court confirmed its earlier decision in Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature that delegation short of 'plenary legislative power' is possible.[2] In the 1999 judgment, the Court emphasized that the real inquiry was whether the Constitution authorizes the delegation of the particular power in question.[3]

This decision leads to the more specific question, which was left open in the 1995 judgment: When does a legitimate delegation to make (subordinate) legislation become a constitutionally prohibited delegation of 'plenary legislative power'? In Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature the Constitutional Court adopted a formalist approach and relied on the fact that the Act in question provided for a formal amendment power by the President. According to the formalist approach, an Act of Parliament needs to be and remain an Act by Parliament: a set of rules created and if necessary amended in the proper legislative process. Thus, Parliament may delegate law-making authority to the executive, but not statute-making or statute-amending authority — save in exceptional circumstances, such as times of war or natural catastrophe.[4] But the insertion of the word 'including' in the Court's dictum in Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature — as quoted above[5] — seems to suggest that an unconstitutional assignment of plenary legislative power is also possible short of formal amendment powers.

In the 1999 judgment, Ngcobo J also began cautiously by suggesting a formalist approach:

> The Constitution uses a range of expressions when it confers legislative power upon the national legislature in Chapter 7. Sometimes it states that 'national legislation must'; at other times it states that something will be dealt with 'as determined by national legislation'; and at other times it uses the formulation 'national legislation may'. Where one of the first two

[1] The content of FC s 101(3) is mirrored for the provincial sphere in FC s 140(3).

[2] Executive Council Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs; Executive Council KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC)('Executive Council Province of the Western Cape 1999') at para 124 (Ngcobo J)('Although [in Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature 1995 (supra)] the Court was concerned with the interim Constitution, it seems to me that the same principle applies to the present Constitution.')

[3] Executive Council Province of the Western Cape 1999 (supra) at para 124.

[4] Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature 1995 (supra) at para 62.

[5] Ibid at para 51.

> formulations is used, it seems to me to be a strong indication that the legislative power may not be delegated by the legislature, although this will of course also depend upon context.[1]

The problem with this approach, however, is that FC s 239 makes it very clear that 'national legislation' includes subordinate legislation. This provision would be meaningless if the constitutional requirement that a particular issue should be regulated by national legislation could be construed to mean that every detail had to be determined by an Act of Parliament. Nevertheless, in its 1999 judgment, the Constitutional Court interpreted FC s 159(1), which requires the term of a municipal council to be 'determined by national legislation', to mean that such terms of office could not be determined by ministerial notice in the Government Gazette.[2]

However unconvincing such reasoning may be in the light of FC s 239, the outcome of the Court's decision seems right. In addition to relying on the words 'determined by national legislation', Ngcobo J also pointed out that the determination of the term of office of an elected legislative body such as a municipal council is a crucial aspect of the functioning of that council and of importance to the democratic political process.[3] This factor contributed to the Court's finding that the term of office had to be decided by Parliament and could not be delegated to the executive.[4] This argument is persuasive, since the Court here uses a substantive rather than formal criterion (importance for the democratic process) to assess whether the Final Constitution authorizes the delegation of the power in question.

In general, the use of substantive criteria is a better way of assessing whether subordinate legislation is permissible or not. Formal criteria may provide for a minimum standard, but often miss the real separation of powers concern raised by the delegation of lawmaking authority. In practice, 'plenary legislative power' may be assigned to another body without authorizing the formal amendment of a statutory provision. The crucial question, therefore, is the extent to which Parliament may delegate major policy decisions to the executive by way of an empowering provision to make subordinate legislation. To recall, subordinate legislation was traditionally supposed to cover matters of a complementary nature; technical matters that the legislature did not need to occupy itself with; and subordinate matters incidental to the subject matter of the statute, which did not need to be discussed in public, but could rather be adjusted to the overall purpose of the statute by technical experts in the administration.

There is certainly no need slavishly to look for the 'technical nature' of matters before subordinate legislation may be approved, and it would be inappropriate to reject the conferral of even the slightest discretion on the executive. Such an

[1] Executive Council Province of the Western Cape 1999 (supra) at para 124.
[2] Ibid at para 126.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Ibid. Ngcobo J pointed out that Parliament could easily have determined the term of office itself.

approach would just go to the opposite extreme. Nevertheless, the principle of separation of powers in the Final Constitution precludes the delegation of any power to legislate on matters of general policy. It is also incompatible with the separation of powers principle for such a wide discretion to be conferred on the executive in regulating a matter that it is impossible to know from the statutory provision the scope, content and limitations of the subordinate legislation. In English law, such an empowering statute is aptly referred to as 'skeletal' as it lacks any substantive flesh and amounts to nothing more than a licence to legislate.[1] 'Plenary legislative power' has been assigned to the executive when an empowering statute leaves room for subordinate legislation to adopt not just one particular principle, but also its exact opposite. In such a case, in which opposing policy decisions could be taken 'in terms of' the same statutory provision, parliamentary oversight and scrutiny of executive action is substantially weakened.

Thus far, this question has not been explicitly addressed in South Africa. In the 1999 decision discussed earlier, Executive Council Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs; Executive Council KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa, the Constitutional Court was asked to consider whether an empowering Act had to provide safeguards against 'abuse and arbitrary application' of the power it conferred on the executive, and whether Parliament, when delegating its law-making functions, should provide clear or adequate criteria for the exercise of the delegated power. The Court held that it was not necessary to decide either of these questions,[2] but nevertheless seemed to be quite sympathetic to answering them in the affirmative. Regarding the need for clear or adequate criteria for the exercise of the delegated power, it stated that the challenged Act prescribed the framework within which the Minister had to exercise his delegated authority with sufficient precision and therefore that the delegation did not amount to the assignment of plenary legislative power.[3]

This approach is in line with the Constitutional Court's later decision in Dawood, which concerned the exercise of discretion by officials on the basis of an Act of Parliament.[4] The Court found fault with the fact that the discretion had been conferred without proper guidance on how it should be exercised. The crucial factor in this case was that the discretionary decisions that the officials were empowered to take potentially limited constitutional rights. At least in such a case, the Court held, the legislature needs to provide guidance to the executive on how to apply a discretionary norm.[5] As the Court put it: 'Affording the executive

[1] Bradley & Ewing (supra) at 677–78.
[2] Executive Council Province of the Western Cape 1999 (supra) at paras 94, 116–18.
[3] Ibid at para 94 (our emphasis).
[4] Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others; Shalabi & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others; Thomas & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC).
[5] Ibid at para 54.

a power to regulate such matters is not sufficient. The legislature must take steps where the limitation of rights is at risk to ensure that appropriate guidance is given.'[1]

This principle is a sound one, and may also be used to determine the constitutional limits of the delegation of legislative authority: where the implementation of a statutory provision may lead to a violation of a right in the Bill of Rights the essential circumstances under which such violation is justified need to be determined by the democratically elected legislature. If it is left to the executive (by way of a discretionary decision or by way of subordinate legislation) it is impossible to determine whether the executive has acted in accordance with the will of the legislature or not. As Steven Budlender has argued, the constitutionality of a delegation will depend on the nature of the delegated power involved and the effect that the exercise of such power has.[2] The more a delegated law-making power affects the democratic process, the institutional function of Parliament or the legislatures in other spheres of government, and the more it poses a threat to the protection, promotion and fulfilment of the rights in the Bill of Rights, the more detail the legislature needs to specify in the empowering law itself and the less it may leave to the executive to specify in subordinate legislation.

Similar separation of powers concerns are raised when rule-making authority is delegated to bodies other than organs of state, either directly by Parliament or by way of sub-delegation by the executive. In a number of decisions, courts have had to decide whether rules created by private institutions were subject to judicial review — a problem related to the definition of organs of state in FC s 239 and the application of the Final Constitution in the private sphere.[3] From a separation of powers point of view, however, the crucial question is the legitimate source of such private bodies' power to make abstract rules in the first place.

The leading case in this regard is AAA Investments (Pty) Ltd v Micro Finance Regulatory Council & Another.[4] The legislature here had clearly empowered the Minister of Trade and Industry to make certain regulations, but the empowering Act remained silent on whether the Minister could — as he had done — further delegate this rule-making power to a private body. The majority of the Constitutional Court had no objection to such sub-delegation (provided that it fell short of the delegation of plenary legislative power), even in the absence of express authorization in the statute.[5] In a compelling dissenting judgment, however,

[1] Dawood (supra) at para 54 note 74.

[2] See Steven Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) § 17.3*(e)(i)*.

[3] See, for example, Dawnlaan Beleggings (Edms) Bpk v Johannesburg Stock Exchange & Others 1983 (3) SA 344 (W) for a pre-1994 case; Directory Advertising Cost Cutters v Minister of Posts, Telecommunications and Broadcasting 1996 (3) SA 800 (T); Oostelike Gauteng Diensteraad v Transvaal Munisipale Pensioenfonds 1997 (8) BCLR 1066 (T).

[4] 2007 (1) SA 343 (CC), 2006 (11) BCLR 1255 (CC).

[5] AAA Investments (supra) at paras 48, 125–31.

Langa CJ disagreed with the majority's view. Citing established case law, he held that the doctrine 'delegatus delegare non potest' requires that, where the legislature has delegated powers and functions to a subordinate authority, it must be assumed to have intended that authority to exercise those powers and to perform those functions itself, and not to delegate them to someone else, and that the power delegated in the Act did not therefore include the power to sub-delegate.[1] Only an express authorization to sub-delegate or the deduction of such authority by necessary implication from the statute could have legitimated the further delegation of law-making power to a private body.[2]

(iv) Executive-controlled dispute resolution

Although the judicial authority is vested in the courts (FC s 165(1)), several specialized bodies, tribunals, agencies, commissions, boards and other structures outside the court system are entrusted with adjudicative functions, such as the Competition Commission, the Competition Tribunal and the Competition Appeal Court;[3] the Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration;[4] the Complaints and Compliance Committee of the Independent Communication Authority of South Africa;[5] and the South African Human Rights Commission (with its internal adjudication system).[6] All these bodies were set up to provide efficient, cost-effective and fair dispute-resolution procedures using adjudicators with specialist knowledge of technical expertise in the particular subject matters dealt with. Other legitimate considerations for the establishment of extra-curial dispute-resolution mechanisms include the need to use less formal procedures (dispensing with legal representation, for example) and the need for decentralized systems more accessible to people living outside major urban areas.

However, as appealing as the idea of lightening the judiciary's case load and providing more efficient alternatives might be to prospective litigants, the danger exists that such institutions may not be subject to the same strict standards of independence and impartiality as the courts. A litigant will not gain anything from efficiency if the dispute is not resolved according to the same professional standards as he or she rightly expects from the courts. From a separation of powers perspective, the judicial function may be undermined not only by declaring certain subject matters and disputes to be outside the review powers of courts ('ouster clauses'), but — in a more subtle way — by establishing dispute-resolution mechanisms that are under the control of the executive, and thereby 'outsourcing'

[1] AAA Investments (supra) at para 81.
[2] Ibid at paras 82–83.
[3] See Competition Act 89 of 1998 ss 19 (Competition Commission), 26 (Competition Tribunal) and 36 (Competition Appeal Court).
[4] See Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995 s 112.
[5] See Independent Communication Authority of South Africa Act 13 of 2000 s 17A as amended by the ICASA Amendment Act 3 of 2006.
[6] See Jonathan Klaaren 'South African Human Rights Commission' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa (eds) (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) § 24C.3*(c)*(ii).

certain adjudicative functions. Such outsourcing is constitutionally problematic, not because judges are always better at dispute resolution, but because the positive aspect of separation of powers — the prevention of bad government by reducing the concentration of power — is seriously threatened when administrative decisions are not checked and balanced in a review process by independent institutions, such as the courts.

In other jurisdictions, particularly within the common law tradition,[1] the 'outsourcing' of dispute-resolution mechanisms to special adjudicative bodies is a matter of great concern. Violations of the separation of powers doctrine are particularly real when such policies bring the adjudicative function under the influence and possible control of the executive.

In Australia, the High Court has from 1915 onwards taken the view that the judicial power has to be exercised independently and impartially by bodies meeting the traditional description of a court.[2] The legislature is prevented from establishing alternative bodies that may issue judicial remedies and from establishing new 'courts' if those courts are not structured in a way comparable to traditional courts, i e with life tenure for the judges.

In the UK, a tribunal system separate from the courts of law has developed as a standard mechanism for dispute resolution in several subject areas.[3] By and large, this no longer results in many separation of powers concerns as there is a lot of overlap between the courts and tribunals, both with regard to the decisions they take and with regard to the procedures they apply. However, in the 1950s, after a series of allegations of misconduct by government officials, a committee was established to look at the working of administrative tribunals and inquiries. The committee's subsequent report recommended three crucial criteria for the operation of non-court tribunals: openness, fairness and impartiality. The report noted:

> Take openness. If these procedures were wholly secret, the basis of confidence and acceptability would be lacking. Next take fairness. If the objector were not allowed to state his case, there would be nothing to stop oppression. Thirdly, there is impartiality. How can a citizen be satisfied unless he feels that those who decide his case come to their decisions with open minds?[4]

[1] In continental European jurisdictions this problem is not as prevalent because, first, legal disputes have traditionally to be decided exclusively by judges while, secondly, the specialized court structure allows for more judicial resources. For example, administrative and executive decisions in France are exclusively challenged in a 'tribunal administratif', which, despite its name, has the status of a court of law. In Germany, Article 19(4) of the Basic Law constitutionally guarantees that any (alleged) rights violation by a public authority can be challenged in a court of law, usually in a 'Verwaltungsgericht'.

[2] New South Wales v Commonwealth (1915) 20 CLR 54 ('Wheat Case'); Waterside Workers' Federation of Australia v JW Alexander Ltd (1918) 25 CLR 434.

[3] See Bradley & Ewing (supra) at 695–704.

[4] Oliver Franks Report of the Committee on Administrative Tribunals and Enquiries, UK Parliament Command Paper, 5th Series, Cmnd 218 (1957)('Franks Report') at paras 23–24.

The 'Franks Report' of 1957 established the UK practice of regarding tribunals and similar bodies, not as ordinary courts, but nevertheless as institutions involved in adjudication, and hence subject to the judiciary's standards of independence rather than being seen as part of the administration.[1]

The Final Constitution explicitly addresses this potential problem. FC s 34 (the right of access to courts) provides that any legal dispute has to be resolved before a court 'or, where appropriate, another independent and impartial tribunal or forum'.[2] According to the Constitutional Court, this section must be read with FC s 165(2), which provides that the courts are 'independent and subject only to the Constitution and the law, which they must apply impartially and without fear, favour or prejudice'. The purpose of FC s 34 in this context is > to emphasise and protect generally, but also specifically for the protection of the individual, the separation of powers, particularly the separation of the Judiciary from the other arms of the State. [FC s 34] achieves this by ensuring that the courts and other fora which settle justiciable disputes are independent and impartial. It is a provision fundamental to the upholding of the rule of law, the constitutional State, the 'regstaatidee', for it prevents legislatures, at whatever level, from turning themselves by acts of legerdemain into 'courts'.[3]

Accordingly, any such tribunal or forum must prima facie enjoy the same independence and impartiality as the courts mentioned in FC s 166. There are several ways, however, in which such independence and impartiality may be achieved, either by ensuring institutional or, as a minimum, personal independence. Institutional independence is guaranteed in the area of criminal law. FC s 35(3)(c) specifically states that an accused person has the right to a public trial before an ordinary court of law, i e the adjudication of criminal offences can not be transferred to any other forum. The Constitutional Court has interpreted this provision to mean that, generally, deprivations of physical liberty either have to be authorized by a court or, at least, by a forum presided over by a judge or a magistrate, i e a judicial officer of the court structure established under the Final Constitution and in which FC s 165(1) has vested the judicial authority of the Republic.[4] On the other hand, public servants who answer to higher officials in the executive branch do not enjoy the same independence as the judiciary and therefore may not deprive a person of his or her personal liberty. Consequently, even fora that do not enjoy the same independence as courts institutionally may be 'upgraded' if their adjudicative functions are performed by a judicial officer. In assessing whether a particular dispute-resolution function is performed by sufficiently independent and impartial bodies, the Constitutional Court looks at the structure of the body, not its name.

[1] Bradley & Ewing (supra) at 694.

[2] See Jason Brickhill & Adrian Friedman 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa (eds) (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 59.

[3] Bernstein & Others v Bester & Others NNO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC) at para 105.

[4] De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at para 74.

In Metcash v SARS,[1] which concerned a challenge to the procedure for resolution of disputes over the payment of Value-Added Tax (VAT), the Constitutional Court analyzed the independence of the Special Income Tax Court,[2] a forum in which a taxpayer may challenge the assessment of VAT by the SARS Commissioner. The Court held, first, that applications (so-called 'appeals') to the Special Court were not 'forensic' but proceedings in terms of a statutory mechanism specially created for the reconsideration of this particular category of administrative decisions by a specialist tribunal.[3] This did not infringe the taxpayer's right of access to courts, however, because the tribunal was independent and impartial:

> The Special Court operates to all intents like an ordinary court and has extensive powers to interfere with, amend or set aside decisions of the Commissioner. Although the procedure is referred to in the legislation as an appeal, it is a full hearing more akin to a trial. The relevant provisions of the Income Tax Act that establish the Special Court and prescribe its procedure . . . are eminently fair and afford a dissatisfied vendor more than a merely formal right of appeal. The court is presided over by a judge, who sits with an accountant and a representative of the business community. There is a right to legal or other expert representation, to adduce evidence and to challenge or rebut adverse evidence in a full-blown trial on the issues raised in the taxpayer's notice of appeal. Withal, therefore, a hearing before the Special Court meets the criteria of section 34 of the Constitution.[4]

In 2007, the Islamic Unity Convention (the operator of a radio station) challenged the status and powers of the Broadcasting Monitoring and Complaints Committee and its successor, the Complaints and Compliance Committee of ICASA, as (among others) being contrary to FC s 34.[5] The Constitutional Court considered whether the structure of, and the powers conferred on, the two committees ensured fairness, independence and impartiality.

> [T]he BMCC, when investigating and adjudicating a complaint, [has] to afford the complainant and the licensee a reasonable opportunity to make representations and to be heard [and] . . . both [are] entitled to legal representation. . . . [T]he Chairperson of the BMCC must be a judge of the High Court, whether in active service or retired, a practising advocate or attorney with at least ten years' appropriate experience, or a magistrate with at least ten years' appropriate experience. This requirement, in my view, was aimed at ensuring fairness, impartiality and independence. The Chairperson was an experienced, legally trained person. In my view, the scheme adequately ensured fairness.[6]

Although both the BMCC and the CCC seem to meet all the requirements, they are not courts of law concerned with the fair resolution of social conflict, but regulatory bodies performing an administrative function in the interests of the

[1] Metcash Trading Ltd v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service, & Another 2001 (1) SA 1109 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Metcash v SARS').

[2] According to Value-Added Tax Act 89 of 1991 s 33, the Special Income Tax Court (constituted under Income Tax Act 58 of 1962 s 83) also has jurisdiction with regard to VAT disputes.

[3] Metcash v SARS (supra) at para 32.

[4] Ibid at para 47.

[5] Islamic Unity Convention v Minister of Telecommunications & Others 2008 (3) SA 383 (CC).

[6] Ibid at para 49 (Mpati AJ).

administration to which they belong, and hence prone to 'institutional bias'. However, in this particular case, FC s 34 was not even implicated, because the BMCC and the CCC do not take final decisions, but rather refer their findings and recommendations to ICASA for final decision-making. Before an administrative agency has taken a final decision, the Islamic Unity Convention Court held, there is no 'dispute' that can be resolved by the application of law.[1]

The separation of powers doctrine requires that all adjudicative functions be performed by substantially independent and impartial bodies according to a fair procedure. These essential requirements apply to both courts and other dispute-resolution bodies and do not depend on the name of the adjudicatory body. It is crucial that neither side may dictate to the adjudicatory body the way in which it should decide the matter, that the matter should be looked at from both sides, and that adjudicators should not fear punishment or dismissal when a state body is unhappy with their decision. In cases where internal, non-independent administrative review procedures are a precondition for further review (such as in the case of the BMCC and the CCC), it is crucial for the separation of powers (and FC s 34) that a truly independent body or a court of law should exercise full review powers. This means that the independent body should in no way be bound by the findings and decision of the earlier body, but should consider the case de novo.

At some stage in all (new) areas of regulation disputes will arise concerning the application of the legislation. The separation of powers principle does not prescribe whether such disputes should be settled by courts or law or some (newly established) commission or tribunal system. As pointed out, the criteria of institutional and functional independence apply to both kinds of dispute-resolution structure. And both FC s 34 and the separation of powers principle allow for an appeal to the Constitutional Court if an applicant challenges the decision made by the commission, tribunal or committee on the basis that the decision-maker lacked the required independence and impartiality.

[1] Islamic Unity Convention (supra) at para 55.

13 Founding Provisions

Christopher Roederer

13.1 Introduction 13–2
13.2 FC Chapter 1 does not contain all the foundational values and not all of the provisions in FC Chapter 1 are foundational 13–3
(a) Not all the foundational values are found in FC Chapter 1. 13–3
(b) Not all the provisions of FC Chapter 1 are foundational. 13–9
13.3 Relationship between the founding provisions and 'an objective, normative value system'. 13–9
13.4 Founding provisions and the basic structure argument 13–15
13.5 Function of the various sections of FC Chapter 1 13–18
(a) FC ss 1 and 2 13–18
(b) FC ss 3 and 6 13–25
(c) FC ss 4 and 5 13–26
13.6 Are the founding provisions absolute or at least more important than other provisions in the Final Constitution?. . 13–27
13.7 Do the founding provisions create justiciable rights? 13–28
(a) FC s 1 does not create justiciable rights. 13–29
(b) Other provisions in FC Chapter 1 give rise to justiciable rights. 13–30

Republic of South Africa

1. The Republic of South Africa is one, sovereign, democratic state founded on the following values:

(a) Human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms.

(b) Non-racialism and non-sexism.

(c) Supremacy of the constitution and the rule of law.

(d) Universal adult suffrage, a national common voters roll, regular elections and a multi-party system of democratic government, to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness.

Supremacy of Constitution

2. This Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic; law or conduct inconsistent with it is invalid, and the obligations imposed by it must be fulfilled.

Citizenship

3. (1) There is a common South African citizenship.

(2) All citizens are:

(a) equally entitled to the rights, privileges and benefits of citizenship; and

(b) equally subject to the duties and responsibilities of citizenship.

(3) National legislation must provide for the acquisition, loss and restoration of citizenship.

National anthem

4. The national anthem of the Republic is determined by the President by proclamation.

National flag

5. The national flag of the Republic is black, gold, green, white, red and blue, as described and sketched in Schedule 1.

Languages

6. (1) The official languages of the Republic are Sepedi, Sesotho, Setswana, siSwati, Tshivenda, Xitsonga, Afrikaans, English, isiNdebele, isiXhosa and isiZulu.

(2) Recognising the historically diminished use and status of the indigenous languages of our people, the state must take practical and positive measures to elevate the status and advance the use of these languages.

(3) (a) The national government and provincial governments may use any particular official languages for the purposes of government, taking into account usage, practicality, expense, regional circumstances and the balance of the needs and preferences of the population as a whole or in the province concerned; but the national government and each provincial government must use at least two official languages.

(b) Municipalities must take into account the language usage and preferences of their residents.

(4) The national government and provincial governments, by legislative and other measures, must regulate and monitor their use of official languages. Without detracting from the provisions of subsection (2), all official languages must enjoy parity of esteem and must be treated equitably.

(5) A Pan South African Language Board established by national legislation must

(a) promote, and create conditions for, the development and use of

(i) all official languages;

(ii) the Khoi, Nama and San languages; and

(iii) sign language; and

(b) promote and ensure respect for

(i) all languages commonly used by communities in South Africa, including German, Greek, Gujarati, Hindi, Portuguese, Tamil, Telegu and Urdu; and

(ii) Arabic, Hebrew, Sanskrit and other languages used for religious purposes in South Africa.[1]

13.1 INTRODUCTION

The founding provisions in FC Chapter 1 have yet, as a whole, to exert a determinate influence on South African constitutional law.[2] A search of the literature[3] and case law[4] turns up very few references to the founding provisions as a whole.

* The author would like to thank Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux and Brian Foley for extensive comments on earlier drafts of this chapter, and particularly Theunis Roux for his contribution to the section on the 'founding provisions and the basic structure argument'. The author would also like to thank Kate Collier at the University of the Witwatersrand School of Law and Jeremy Salter at Florida Coastal School of Law for their most able research assistance.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996 ('FC' or 'Final Constitution'). See also Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').

[2] Like the Interim Constitution's Constitutional Principles, the Founding Provisions have largely vanished. The Constitutional Court in the First Certification Judgment made it clear that once the draft constitution was certified the Constitutional Principles ('CPs') from the Interim Constitution could not be raised again as dispositive rules of law. See Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996, 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment) at para 18; AJH Henderson 'Cry, The Beloved Constitution? Constitutional Amendment, the Vanished Imperative of the Constitutional Principles and the Controlling Values of s 1' (1997) 114 SALJ 542, 548 ('With its certification of the text of the Constitution, the court has bade the Principles farewell'); A Butler 'The 1996 Constitution Bill, its Amending Power, and the Constitutional Principles' (1996) 1(3) HRCLJSA 24(Voicing concerns that the proposed New Text failed to secure the continued relevance of the principles.) Of course, the Court and other commentators have noted that the 34 Constitutional Principles do live on in the form of precedent. See S Woolman 'Provincial Constitutions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 20. Indeed, the First Certification Judgment is the most cited judgment — and it is often mined for general statements about the values that underwrite the Final Constitution.

[3] See, eg, GE Devenish A Commentary on the South African Constitution (1998) 33–40; Z Motola & C Ramaphosa Constitutional Law: Analysis and Cases (2002). Motola and Ramaphosa do not include a chapter or section on the founding provisions and do not even mention them in the index. They do begin Chapter 2 'Interpretation of the constitution' with the text of FC s 2. Ibid at 13. For these authors, '[t]he Supremacy of the Constitution' (which is part of the value of 'constitutionalism') appears to be more foundational to the interpretation of the Final Constitution than FC s 39. Ibid. This makes sense given the fundamental shift signalled by FC s 2: a shift away from a system of parliamentary sovereignty to a system of constitutional supremacy. When it comes to the background values used to interpret the Final Constitution, they mention FC s 39(1)(b), which requires the consideration of international law, FC s 8(3), which requires the development of the common law, and the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence, which requires the taking into account of indigenous values in giving expression to the Bill of Rights. Ibid at 35–36. They then address these 'values' in the remainder of the chapter.

[4] A search of the South African Law Reports reveals no references at all to FC Chapter 1 as a whole. There are under a dozen cases that refer to FC s 1 generally, and even fewer that address FC s 1*(c)* and 1*(d). There are no references in the case law to FC ss 1(a)* or 1*(b). There are few references to FC ss 2 and 3. There are only a few references to FC s 6. There are no references in the cases to FC s 4 or FC s 5. There are, of course, numerous references to the foundational nature of dignity and equality which are embodied in FC s 1(a)* and (b). See Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe') at para 50 ('Not only is the achievement of equality one of the founding values of the Constitution, s 9 of the Constitution also guarantees the achievement of substantive equality to ensure that the opportunity to enjoy the benefits of an egalitarian and non-sexist society is available to all, including those who have been subjected to unfair discrimination in the past.') See also De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC) at para 62 ('Dignity is a founding value of our Constitution. It informs most if not all of the rights in the Bill of Rights and for that reason is of central significance in the limitations analysis.')

There appear to be two reasons for this: first, Chapter 1 does not contain all the principles or values that might be, and indeed, have been, considered foundational to the new constitutional order; secondly, not all of the provisions in Chapter 1 are really foundational.

These two points are considered further in §13.2 below. §13.3 and §13.4 address two constitutional concepts that appear to subsume many of the founding provisions in FC Chapter 1, namely, that the Final Constitution contains an 'objective, normative value system' (§13.3) and that it contains a 'basic structure' (§13.4). Both these concepts significantly overlap with FC Chapter 1 but draw on foundational values and ideas that go beyond the text of this chapter. §13.5 explores the function of the various provisions of FC Chapter 1, while §13.6 addresses whether some of these provisions give rise to absolute rights (ie rights that are not subject to limitation in terms of FC s 36) or, alternatively, whether they are more important than other constitutional provisions, given their foundational status. Finally, §13.7 addresses the question whether some of the provisions of FC Chapter 1 give rise to justiciable rights despite the fact that they do not appear in FC Chapter 2, the Bill of Rights.

13.2 FC Chapter 1 does not contain all the foundational values and not all the provisions in FC Chapter 1 are foundational

(a) Not all the foundational values are found in FC Chapter 1

Although neither settled nor exhaustive, the list of foundational constitutional values thus far recognized by the courts or expressly mentioned in the Final Constitution includes: (1) social justice and the advancement of human rights and freedoms,[1] with particular emphasis on human dignity, substantive equality, non-racialism and non-sexism; (2) constitutionalism; (3) the rule of law; (4) open and accountable democratic government; (5) separation of powers; (6) co-operative government; (7) transformation; (8) ubuntu; and (9) cosmopolitanism. Although many of these values appear in FC Chapter 1, several do not. Some are embodied in the Preamble and elsewhere in the Final Constitution. Others are not mentioned in the Final Constitution at all but are implicit in its structure.[2] The value of co-operative government is, for example found in FC Chapter 3, but,

[1] This value, arguably the most important value of the Final Constitution, is found in the Preamble, FC s 1*(a)–(b)* and FC Chapter 2. O'Regan J has called it '[t]he leitmotif of our Constitution.' See Kaunda & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC)('Kaunda') at para 220.

[2] See I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005)('Currie & De Waal Handbook') 7. The authors refer somewhat obliquely to the founding provisions, but they do so in general terms by referring to the 'basic principles of the new constitutional order'. This raises the question as to how basic, fundamental or foundational they are. See also I Currie & J De Waal The New Constitutional and Administrative Law Vol 1 (2001)('Currie & De Waal The New Law') 73 (Currie and De Waal address what they call the 'Basic Features of the New Constitutional Order' which includes these same features or principles. Currie and De Waal do not offer an argument for either the radiating effect doctrine or a basic features doctrine.)

clearly animates the entire text of the Final Constitution.[1] Similarly, the notion of separation of powers, whilst explicit in CP VI,[2] is only implicitly embodied in the Final Constitution.[3]

The commitment to social justice and human rights as foundational values is found in the Preamble and FC s 1, and is, of course, given further expression in FC Chapter 2, the Bill of Rights.[4] The relationship between FC s 1 and the Bill of Rights is a complex one, but the clear textual import of FC s 1*(a)* and (b) is to single out, from amongst the rights in the Bill of Rights, the rights to human dignity, substantive equality[5] and freedom from racial and sexual discrimination[6] as rights to states of affairs that are so fundamental to the South African constitutional order that the Final Constitution's commitment to those states of affairs forms part of the values on which the entire constitutional order is founded.

Transformation, which is not listed in FC s 1, can be found in the text of the Preamble and has been expressly recognised as a foundational value by the Constitutional Court.[7] According to one commentator, it consists in the value of moving from a society with an 'unjust past' to a 'society based on democratic values, social justice, and fundamental human rights', which is concerned to

[1] See S Sibanda & A Stein 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 12.

[2] CP VI read: 'There shall be a separation of powers between the legislature, the executive and judiciary, with appropriate checks and balances to ensure accountability, responsiveness, and openness.'

[3] The fact that some of these values are 'only' implicit does not mean that they are less foundational. Separation of powers is clearly embedded in the way the Final Constitution structures the powers of the branches of government. There are numerous references to this basic value in the case law. See Sibanda & Stein (supra).

[4] The Bill of Rights is not an exhaustive list of the rights that exist in South Africa. See FC s 39(3).

[5] FC s 1*(a)* refers to 'the achievement of equality'. For such an achievement to occur might require the state to commit itself to the realization of substantive equality. Substantive equality, like 'the advancement of human rights' is an affirmative goal and requires more than non-discrimination. See C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 35. While the goal of substantive equality is a goal for all persons in South Africa, those persons and groups who have historically been denied equal treatment are in the most need of positive steps being taken on their behalf. See FC s 9(2) and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 ('PEPUDA'). Arguably, the value of transformation is embodied in these affirmative goals.

[6] FC s 1*(b)* lists 'non-racialism and non-sexism' as foundational values. This may lead one to think that unfair discrimination based on race and sex is more strictly scrutinized in South African constitutional law than other forms of unfair discrimination (as is the case in the US). In practice, however, this is not the case. Neither FC s 9, nor the jurisprudence of the courts, supports this view. FC s 9(5) applies the presumption of unfairness to discrimination on any of the 17 listed grounds, and PEPUDA further expands the list.

[7] See Soobramoney v Minister of Health (KwaZulu-Natal) 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC)('Soobramoney') at para 8 ('We live in a society in which there are great disparities in wealth. Millions of people are living in deplorable conditions and in great poverty . . . These conditions already existed when the Constitution was adopted and a commitment to address them, and to transform our society into one in which there will be human dignity, freedom and equality, lies at the heart of our new constitutional order.')

'[i]mprove the quality of life of all citizens and free the potential of each person'.[1] As Mahomed J stated in S v Makwanyane:

> In some countries the Constitution only formalizes, in a legal instrument, a historical consensus of values and aspirations evolved incrementally from a stable and unbroken past to accommodate the needs of the future. The South African Constitution is different: it retains from the past only what is defensible and represents a decisive break from and ringing rejection of, that part of the past which is disgracefully racist, authoritarian, insular and repressive, and a vigorous identification of and commitment to a democratic, universalistic, caring and aspirationally egalitarian ethos expressly articulated in the Constitution.[2]

More recently, Ngcobo J stated in Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism & Others:[3]

> South Africa is a country in transition. It is a transition from a society based on inequality to one based on equality. This transition was introduced by the interim Constitution, which was designed 'to create a new order based on equality in which there is equality between men and women and people of all races so that all citizens should be able to enjoy and exercise their fundamental rights and freedoms'. This commitment to the transformation of our society was affirmed and reinforced in 1997, when the Constitution came into force. The Preamble to the Constitution 'recognises the injustices of our past' and makes a commitment to establishing 'a society based on democratic values, social justice and fundamental rights'. This society is to be built on the foundation of the values entrenched in the

[1] See GE Devenish A Commentary on the South African Constitution (1998) 28–29. Devenish appears to treat the non-justiciable Preamble as foundational. Following Rautenbach and Malherbe, Devenish sees the Preamble as a statement of values that inform the interpretation of all provisions of the Final Constitution as well as legislation, customary law and common law. Ibid at 32. See I Rautenbach & EHJ Malherbe Constitutional Law (4th Edition 2003). See also Currie & De Waal Handbook (supra) at 13–15, 16; Currie & De Waal The New Law (supra) at 82, 89. (The authors here refer to the Preamble when addressing the foundational principle of democracy. They are not, however referring to the transformative values mentioned above but to the value of an 'open and democratic society'.)

[2] 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) para 262 ('Makwanyane'). Karl Klare has argued that the constitutional text trumpets a post-liberal, re-distributive, egalitarian and caring form of politics. KE Klare 'Legal Culture and Transformative Constitutionalism' (1998) 14 SAJHR 146, 151–53. Klare was writing in the context of the Interim Constitution, but the Final Constitution is no less progressive. He notes the following elements found in the Interim Constitution in support of his view: (1) social rights and substantive equality, (2) affirmative state duties, (3) horizontality, (4) participatory, decentralized and transparent governance, (5) multi-culturalism, and (6) historical self consciousness. Ibid at 153. All of these values can be found in the Final Constitution. See also S Woolman & D Davis 'The Last Laugh*: Du Plessis v De Klerk,* Classical Liberalism, Creole Liberalism and the Application of Fundamental Rights Under the Interim and Final Constitutions' (1996) 12 SAJHR 36; C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Facing the Challenge of Transformation: Difficulties in the Development of an Indigenous Jurisprudence of Equality' (1998) 14 SAJHR 248; H Corder 'Prisoner, Partisan and Patriarch: Transforming the Law in South Africa 1985–2000' (2001) 118 SALJ 772; A Chaskalson 'The Third Bram Fischer Lecture: Human Dignity as a Foundational Value of Our Constitutional Order' (2000) 16 SAJHR 193; D Moseneke 'The Fourth Bram Fischer Lecture: Transformative Adjudication' (2002) 18 SAJHR 309; C Roederer 'Post-matrix Legal Reasoning: Horizontality and the Rule of Values in South African Law' (2003) 19 SAJHR 57; C Roederer 'The Transformation of South African Private Law after Ten Years of Democracy: The Role of Torts (Delict) in the Consolidation of Democracy' (2006) 37 Columbia Human Rights Law Review (forthcoming)(Roederer 'The Role of Torts').

[3] 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC)('Bato Star Fishing') at para 73.

very first provision of the Constitution. These values include human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms.[1]

Although there may be considerable dispute over what the value of transformation entails,[2] there is little dispute that it is a value that animates the Final Constitution.[3] It is also clearly linked to the value of ubuntu, which was part of the Post-amble to the Interim Constitution.[4] As Pieterse writes, '[t]he Nguni word ubuntu represents notions of universal human interdependence, solidarity and communalism which can be traced to small-scale communities in pre-colonial Africa, and which underlie virtually every indigenous African culture.'[5] In S v Makwanyane, Langa J said the following of the concept:

> [Ubuntu] is a culture which places some emphasis on communality and on the interdependence of the members of a community. It recognises a person's status as a human being, entitled to unconditional respect, dignity, value and acceptance from the members of the community such a person happens to be part of. It also entails the converse, however. The person has a corresponding duty to give the same respect, dignity, value and acceptance to each member of that community. More importantly, it regulates the exercise of rights by the emphasis it lays on sharing and co-responsibility and the mutual enjoyment of rights by all.[6]

[1] Ngcobo J seems to limit the transformative aspirations of FC s 9 to equality between men and women and between the races rather than to the entire range of people and groups who have suffered discrimination in South Africa. Bato Star Fishing (supra) at para 73. O'Regan J leaned on the same language in her opinion. Kaunda (supra) at para 219.

[2] What the value reflects is largely dependent on what one thinks the evil of apartheid was, for this defines what it is that is in need of transformation. For instance, was the libertarian approach to the private law part of the problem or was the problem the distortion of the libertarian system? My view is that the apartheid cancer did spread to private law and that to the extent that it did not infect private law, the private law with its libertarian values acted as a carrier and facilitator of apartheid values and policies, perpetuating the inequities of apartheid. Further, the development of private law was arrested under apartheid and finally, even if some areas of private law were not infected by the apartheid cancer, many of the values that animated private law under apartheid are inconsistent with the values, goals and aspirations of the democratic transformation of South Africa. See Roederer 'The Role of Torts' (supra).

[3] Frank Michelman argues that the 'supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law signifies the unity of the legal system in the service of transformation by, under, and according to law'. F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2005) Chapter 11. Thus, even the values of FC s 1*(c)* are infused with the value, goal or object of transformation.

[4] Devenish treats ubuntu as being implicit in the foundational values of FC s 1. See Devenish (supra) at 33. See also Rautenbach & Malherbe (supra) at section 3.4 (Authors have a separate subsection on the concept and correctly point out that the Constitutional Court in Makwanyane referred to the concept as one that underlies both the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution, and that ubuntu informed the Court's treatment of the constitutionality of the death penalty throughout the judgment in Makwanyane (supra) at paras 130–31, 223–7, 237, 243, 250, 307–313, 263, 308, 516.) Currie and De Waal do not include the concept in their index and only refer to it briefly in the context of the Makwanyane decision in their chapter on the right to life. See Currie & De Waal Handbook (supra) at 281.

[5] M Pieterse '"Traditional" African Jurisprudence' in C Roederer & D Moellendorf (eds) Jurisprudence (2004) 441.

[6] Makwanyane (supra) at paras 224–25. Mahomed DP and Mokgoro J both addressed the meaning of ubuntu. Ibid at paras 263 and 308, respectively. Both Justices emphasized the notion of humaneness and reciprocity, while Mokgoro J placed particular emphasis on the centrality of the notion for South Africa's democracy.

Reducing the role of traditional values in the South African Constitution to one concept may smack of neo-colonialism or eurocentrism.[1] For better or worse, however, there are few references to ubuntu and even fewer positive references to traditional or indigenous South African values in the law reports. Early in the Constitutional Court's history, Sachs J called on the Court to pay due regard to the values of all sections of South African society when interpreting the Constitution, stating:

> In broad terms, the function given to this Court by the Constitution is to articulate the fundamental sense of justice and right shared by the whole nation as expressed in the text of the Constitution . . . Whatever the status of earlier legislation and jurisprudence may be, the Constitution speaks for the whole of society and not just one section . . . The preamble, post-amble and the principles of freedom and equality espoused in ss 8, 33 and 35 of the Constitution require such an amplitude of vision. The principle of inclusivity shines through the language provisions in s 3 and underlies the provisions which led to the adoption of the new flag and anthem and the selection of public holidays. The secure and progressive development of our legal system demands that it draw the best from all the streams of justice in our country . . . Above all, however, it means giving long overdue recognition to African law and legal thinking as a source of legal ideas, values and practice. We cannot, unfortunately, extend the equality principle backwards in time to remove the humiliations and indignities suffered by past generations, but we can restore dignity to ideas and values that have long been suppressed or marginalised.[2]

Since this attempt to explore the relationship of traditional values to the question of the constitutionality of the death penalty, however, there have been very few references to indigenous or traditional values as informing the interpretation of the Final Constitution.[3] And, in those cases where traditional values have been mentioned, it has most often been the case that they have been interpreted so as to conform to other values in the Final Constitution. As Ngcobo J stated in Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others:

[1] See FC ss 211 and 212. See also TW Bennett & C Murray 'Traditional Leaders' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 26.

[2] Makwanyane (supra) at paras 262–65. See also Makwanyane (supra) at para 366 ('Redressing the balance in a conceptually sound, methodologically secure and functionally efficient way will be far from easy. Extensive research and public debate will be required. Legislation will play a key role; indeed, the Constitution expressly acknowledges situations where legal pluralism based on religion can be recognised (s 14(3)), and where indigenous law can be applied (s 181). Constitutional Principle XIII declares that "... (i)ndigenous law, like common law, shall be recognised and applied by the courts, subject to the fundamental rights contained in the Constitution and to legislation dealing specifically therewith.'")

[3] But see NK v Minister of Safety & Security 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC)('NK') at para 24. (In NK, O' Regan J suggested that vicarious liability is not alien to the South African customary law tradition, for under customary law the kraal head is liable for all the delictual acts of inhabitants of the kraal.) See Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC)('Dawood') at paras 1 and 29 ('The State shall have the duty to assist the family which is the custodian of morals and traditional values recognised by the community.') See also Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (1) SA 997, 1034 (C)(Refers to the protection of the family as a value underlying and sustaining tradition values, and quotes from the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights article 18, which provides that '[t]he family shall be the natural unit and basis of society. It shall be protected by the State which shall take care of its physical and moral health.')

> Our Constitution contemplates that there will be a coherent system of law built on the foundations of the Bill of Rights, in which common law and indigenous law should be developed and legislation should be interpreted so as to be consistent with the Bill of Rights and with our obligations under international law. In this sense the Constitution demands a change in the legal norms and the values of our society. And indigenous law must reflect this change.[1]

The value of cosmopolitanism is perhaps the most controversial value on the abovementioned list. Nonetheless, it is a value that finds expression in the Preamble to the Final Constitution, the Bill of Rights and the interpretative provisions of FC ss 39 and 233. The cosmopolitan character of South African constitutional interpretative practice is nicely captured in the judgment of O'Regan J in Kaunda v President of the Republic of South Africa when she states:

> [O]ur Constitution recognises and asserts that, after decades of isolation, South Africa is now a member of the community of nations, and a bearer of obligations and responsibilities in terms of international law. The Preamble of our Constitution states that the Constitution is adopted as the supreme law of the Republic so as to, amongst other things, 'build a united and democratic South Africa able to take its rightful place as a sovereign state in the family of nations.' Customary international law is law in the Republic unless it is inconsistent with the Constitution or an Act of Parliament. Courts, when interpreting the Bill of Rights, 'must consider international law', and, when interpreting legislation, must prefer any reasonable interpretation consistent with international law over alternative interpretations that are not.[2]

Like the value of transformation, the value of cosmopolitanism is a product of South Africa's political transition, part of the break from South Africa's past, a past in which the white minority regime isolated and marginalized itself from the international community, and was in turn ostracized. South Africa's re-integration into the international community was part of the struggle to rid South Africa of apartheid; and those in the struggle reached out to that community, not only for political support, but also for the normative framework for the new order that came from international human rights law. The Final Constitution accordingly directs those interpreting its provisions to look both to international law and to comparative law,[3] not as afterthoughts, but as primary aids to interpretation.[4]

---

[1] Bhe (supra) at para 218 quoting Daniels v Campbell NO & Others 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC) at para 56.

[2] Kaunda (supra) at para 222.

[3] See FC s 39(1). Although the text requires those interpreting the Bill of Rights to consider international law and makes the consideration of foreign law optional, the practice of the Constitutional Court has been to routinely consult foreign law and only occasionally to consult international law. On the use of international law by the Constitutional Court, see D Hovell & G Williams 'A Tale of Two Systems: The Use of International Law in Constitutional Interpretation in Australia and South Africa' (2005) 29 Melbourne University Law Review 95; See H Strydom and K Hopkins 'International Law' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 30. See also Makwanyane (supra) at paras 262–373 (Sachs J calls on the courts to consult traditional African values as well as international values when considering whether the death penalty was cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment.)

[4] See J Sarkin 'The Development of a Human Rights Culture in South Africa' (1998) 20 Human Rights Quarterly 628.

(b) Not all the provisions of FC Chapter 1 are foundational

The second preliminary point about the founding provisions in FC Chapter 1, namely, that not all these provisions are indeed 'foundational', evinceé by the fact that the major commentaries on South African constitutional law do not contain a separate chapter on them,[1] but rather have chapters that either address a broader category of 'basic features' or, 'fundamental principles', or some of the ideas behind the founding provisions.[2] This work contains the present separate detailed chapters on the more important foundational values of FC Chapter 1, namely, democracy[3] and the rule of law,[4] as well as other foundational values, such as a foundational value not expressly contained in FC Chapter 1 — separation of powers and co-operative government.[5] The question of just how foundational the provisions in FC ss 3–6 actually are is discussed in §13.5 below.

13.3 Relationship between the founding provisions and an 'objective, normative value system'

One concept that strongly resonates with the Final Constitution's founding values is the idea that the Final Constitution embodies an 'objective, normative value' system.[6] While no case has yet outlined the parameters of this concept, a number [1] But see GE Devenish A Commentary on the South African Constitution (1998).

[2] See I Rautenbach & EHJ Malherbe Constitutional Law (4th Edition 2003) 53–63 and 102–106 (Contains discussions of 'The Rule of Law', 'The Constitutional State', 'Ubuntu' and the 'Bill of Rights' in terms comparable to the language of foundational values. They address citizenship and the symbols and official languages elsewhere in the text.)

[3] See T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 10.

[4] See F Michelman 'Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11.

[5] See S Sibanda & A Stein 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 12. See also S Woolman, T Roux & B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 14 (Addresses what some believe to be a foundational value or basic principle of the Final Constitution.) For more on citizenship, see J Klaaren 'Citizenship' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 67. Linguistic and cultural rights are addressed in I Currie 'Community Rights: Culture, Religion and Language' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 58; I Currie 'Official Languages and Language Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 65.

[6] For a critical appraisal of this phrase, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31. See also F Michelman 'Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11.

of cases have drawn from the 'grab-bag' of values found within this 'system'.[1] These cases do not confine themselves to FC s 1, nor even to FC Chapter 1, but instead draw on a number of the values listed in §13.1*(a)* above. What is clear is that the notion of an 'objective, normative value system' functions, like the founding values, as a measuring standard for all governmental conduct; as a set of values that influence the interpretation of the Final Constitution, the Bill of Rights and other legislation; and as a set of values that influences both whether and how the common law is to be developed. Given that constitutional values are the proper grounding for all South African law and that the Final Constitution 'is the legal embodiment of the values of post-apartheid South Africa',[2] it is doubtful that the parameters of the concept will ever be settled. Nonetheless, as the case law develops, one might expect that the core aspects of the concept will coalesce.

The first indication that the South African Constitution embodied an 'objective, normative value system' can be found in the concurring opinion of Mahomed DP in Du Plessis v De Klerk.[3] Although he does not explicitly endorse the Federal Constitutional Court's gloss on the German Basic Law, he notes that: 'the basic rights entrenched by the GBL not only establish subjective individual rights but an objective order of values or an objective value system ('eine objektive Wertordnung').[4] This objective order of values in the German system acts as a 'guiding principle' and 'stimulus' for all three branches of government.[5]

The notion is not picked up again until Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security & Another (Centre for Applied Legal Studies Intervening),[6] where the Court stated:

> Our Constitution is not merely a formal document regulating public power. It also embodies, like the German Constitution, an objective, normative value system. As was stated by the German Federal Constitutional Court:

[1] It may in fact be charged that this so called 'objective values system' operates in what Alfred Cockrell described as the land of 'rainbow jurisprudence'. In this land, our founding values are always consistent with one another and never in conflict. See A Cockrell 'Rainbow Jurisprudence' (1996) 12 SAJHR 1. Indeed, the Court often invokes the phrase without a discussion of its content or scope. As a virtual grab-bag, the Court can simply pick the relevant value needed to bolster a particular decision without having to worry about describing the difficult take of assessing the overall scheme or its limits. See Woolman 'Application' (supra) at §31.4*(e)*(viii).

[2] C Roederer 'Post-Matrix Legal Reasoning: Horizontality and the Rule of Values in South Africa' (2003) 19 SAJHR 57, 80.

[3] 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC)('Du Plessis').

[4] Ibid at para 94 citing 7 BVerfGE 198, 203–7; 35 BVerfGE 79,112–14; Von Münch & Kunig Grundgesetz-Kommentar Band 1 (1992) Vorb Art 1–19 Rn 22, 31. Mahomed DP invokes the German approach to horizontal application for the purposes of showing that the Interim Constitution Bill of Rights should be applied indirectly to private persons rather than directly. Ibid. He does not explicitly tell us that the Interim Constitution embodies an 'objective, normative value system' nor what that system entails. Ibid. He does point out, as he did in Makwanyane, that, '[i]n reaction to our past, the concept and values of the constitutional State, of the 'Regstaat' . . . are deeply foundational to the creation of the 'new order' referred to in the preamble (of the Constitution).' Ibid at para 97 citing Makwanyane (supra) at para 156.

[5] Ibid at para 94 quoting 39 BVerfGE 1, 41.

[6] 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2002 (1) SACR 79 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC)('Carmichele') at para 54 citing 39 BVerfGE 1, 41; Du Plessis (supra) at para 94; S v Acheson 1991 (2) SA 805, 831 (NmHC).

> 'The jurisprudence of the Federal Constitutional Court is consistently to the effect that the basic right norms contain not only defensive subjective rights for the individual but embody at the same time an objective value system which, as a fundamental constitutional value for all areas of the law, acts as a guiding principle and stimulus for the Legislature, Executive and Judiciary.'
>
> The same is true of our Constitution. The influence of the fundamental constitutional values on the common law is mandated by s 39(2) of the Constitution. It is within the matrix of this objective normative value system that the common law must be developed.

In this passage the Court is addressing FC s 39(2)'s requirement that, when developing the common law, the courts 'must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bills of Rights'. The contrast mentioned by the Court is one between constitutions that embody 'defensive subjective rights of the individual' and those that embody an 'objective value system'. This is a slightly odd juxtaposition. The contrast is not so much between subjective rights and objective values, but between a constitution (like that in the US), which provides freedom from or rights against government interference, and a constitution that attempts to ensure that government provides its citizens with the requisite material resources, to pursue a meaningful existence. The contrast, in other words, is between a purely liberal constitution, which at most embodies a thin conception of the good for society,[1] and a more full-blown republican constitution, which has a thicker conception of the good at which society is to aim.[2] On the liberal view, the government and court are best described as neutral referees, whose job it is to ensure that players play by the rules of the game.[3] On the liberal view, courts should be hesitant to make law, for this would be like the refereee joining

[1] See J Rawls A Theory of Justice (1971).

[2] See, eg, J Habermas 'Three Normative Models of Democracy' in S Benhabib (ed) Democracy and Difference (1996)(Contrasting liberal and republican theories of democracy with the idea of deliberative democracy.)

[3] The liberal view dominated the development of private law domain under apartheid. See C Roederer 'The Transformation of South African Private Law after Ten Years of Democracy: The Role of Torts (Delict) in the Consolidation of Democracy' (2006) 37 Columbia Human Rights Law Review (forthcoming). See also A Cockrell, 'The Hegemony of Contract' (1998) 115 SALJ 286, 309ff. However, the Court's view in Carmichele appears to be that under apartheid the courts also operated under a normative value system:

> Before the advent of the IC, the refashioning of the common law in this area entailed 'policy decisions and value judgments' which had to 'reflect the wishes, often unspoken, and the perceptions, often but dimly discerned, of the people'. A balance had to be struck between the interests of the parties and the conflicting interests of the community according to what 'the *(c)*ourt conceives to be society's notions of what justice demands'.

Carmichele (supra) at para 56 (quoting Minister of Law and Order v Kadir 1995 (1) SA 303, 318 (A) quoting, in turn, MM Corbett 'Aspects of the Role of Policy in the Evolution of Our Common Law' (1987) 104 SALJ 52, 67.)

Of course, one may argue that liberalism — any kind of liberalism — is a normative value system. For such a view, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31; S Woolman & D Davis 'The Last Laugh*: Du Plessis v De Klerk*, Classical Liberalism, Creole Liberalism and the Application of Fundamental Rights Under the Interim and Final Constitutions' (1996) 12 SAJHR 36.

the game for one side. Thus, a judiciary with this mindset would be inclined to ignore the strictures of FC s 39(2) and thereby avoid the need to develop the common law. However, the court in Carmichele made it clear that FC s 39(2) not only required that the courts consult this 'objective value system' if and when they decided to develop the common law, but that they are required to consult it proactively to see if in fact the common law is in need of development.[1]

All of this begs the question of what the objective value system that underlies the Final Constitution is.[2] What is the State's view of the good at which the law is to aim? Although the Carmichele Court did not directly address the question, it contrasted the English and the German approaches to such questions and noted that under the German approach the Basic Law has a 'radiating effect' on the 'general clauses' of the German Civil Code.[3] In South Africa, therefore, the idea seems to be that the objective value system embodied in the Final Constitution should come to enrich the existing 'policy decisions and value judgments' reflecting 'the wishes … and the perceptions … of the people' and 'society's notions of what justice demands',[4] and that this enriched value system should then radiate through the common law. In Carmichele, the Court did not limit itself to the values detailed in FC s 1 in deciding if the police had a duty towards the complainant. Rather, the Court looked to the values found in the rights to life, dignity and freedom and security of the person,[5] and in the constitutional provisions that point towards a positive duty to prevent harm.[6] The Carmichele Court found that these duties are accentuated in the case of women, both because of the historically vulnerable place of women in South African society, and because of South Africa's international obligations under the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women.[7] Thus, the Court seems to be drawing on a range of foundational values, from transformation for South African women and cosmopolitanism, to the promotion of various rights in the Bill of Rights.[8] The Carmichele Court nowhere claims that the values it draws on are the only foundational values, and it makes no attempt to address all the values, but rather picks and chooses those values that are helpful to resolving the case.[9]

[1] Carmichele (supra) at para 39.

[2] I would not put much store in debates over how 'objective' the value system is. The value system is contested and the word 'objective' adds little value to our inquiry. Arguments about the import of values stand or fall on the reasons offered on their behalf, and the uses to which the values are put.

[3] Carmichele (supra) at para 56. (The Court refers to such examples as 'good morals', 'justified', 'wrongful', 'contra bonos mores', 'good faith'.) See also Du Plessis (supra) at paras 39–40, 56, 93–94; 103–105.

[4] Carmichele (supra) at para 56.

[5] Ibid at para 44.

[6] Ibid at paras 44–45.

[7] Ibid.

[8] See Minister of Safety and Security v Van Duivenboden 2002 (6) SA 431 (SCA) at paras 17, 20 (Nugent JA locates the value of transparent, coherent and accountable government not in FC s 1*(d)* but in FC s 41(1).)

[9] But see Woolman (Dignity) supra at §36. (Argues that dignity in Carmichele operates as a second order rule that determines the outcomes of the dispute.)

This Alice in Wonderland approach to language — in which the Final Constitution means whatever we say it means — is evident in a series of recent judgments. O'Regan J, in Kaunda, states that the Final Constitution 'embodies "an objective, normative value system" as is asserted in the opening clause of the Constitution'.[1] Although she begins with a reference to FC s 1, in the paragraphs that follow she relies on the values of transformation[2] and cosmopolitanism.[3] Both of these values are seen as contributing to the foundational value of protecting and of promoting human rights,[4] and all of this influenced her assessment of whether the South African government owed the claimants a duty to provide them diplomatic protection.[5] They simply re-inforced her view that it was appropriate for the Court to issue a declaratory order regarding the government's obligations in this regard.[6]

In S v Thebus & Another, Moseneke J relied upon the phrase 'objective, normative value system' to develop the common law with regard to the common purpose doctrine.[7] The complainants argued that this doctrine, by severing the requirement for a causal connection between the defendant and the crime committed, infringed their rights to freedom and dignity.[8] In determining if these rights had indeed been infringed, the Court noted that they could only be limited for just cause and that '[t]he meaning of "just cause must be grounded upon and [be] consonant with the values expressed in s 1 of the Constitution and gathered from the provisions of the Constitution.'"[9] However, the Thebus Court did not explicitly rely on FC s 1 or other provisions in the Final Constitution, but rather alluded to the legitimate interest in deterring criminal conspiracies as a way of deterring crime.[10]

In Geldenhuys v Minister of Safety and Security & Another, Davis J notes both the need for an effective remedy and for the common law to be developed in accordance within the 'matrix' of the Final Constitution's 'objective normative value system'.[11] He emphasizes not only the Preamble and FC s 1's language of establishing a society based on human dignity, equality and freedom as well as [1] Kaunda (supra) at para 218 (Concurring in part and dissenting in part).

[2] Ibid at para 220 (Refers to Preamble and FC s 1.)
[3] Ibid at paras 221–223 (Refers to the Preamble, the political history leading up to the Interim Constitution and Final Constitution and South Africa's international law obligations.)
[4] Ibid at paras 220–221 (Refers to the Preamble, FC s 1 and FC s 7(2).)
[5] Ibid at paras 261–264, 268, 270, 271.
[6] Ibid at para 269.
[7] 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC)('Thebus') at paras 27–28.
[8] Ibid at para 34.
[9] Ibid at para 39 citing S v Boesak 2001 (1) SA 912 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 361 (CC) at para 38. Farlam and Navsa JJA, in their partially dissenting judgment, used the idea of an 'objective value system' to give a broader interpretation to 'public interest' than that given by the majority and the other concurring opinions. See Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others v Rail Commuters Action Group & Others 2003 (6) SA 349 (SCA), 2003 (12) BCLR 1363 (SCA) at para 68.
[10] Thebus (supra) at para 40.
[11] 2002 (4) SA 719 (C)('Geldenhuys') citing Carmichele (supra) at para 55.

'institutions of government which are open, transparent and accountable to the people whom they serve,'[1] but also the transformative values of the Final Constitution:

> The content of this normative system does not only depend on an abstract philosophical inquiry but rather upon an understanding that the Constitution mandates the development of a society that breaks clearly and decisively from the past and where institutions that operated prior to our constitutional dispensation had to be instilled with a new operational vision based on the foundational values of our constitutional system.[2]

Davis J then recounted how the facts of the case recalled the grim past of the 'systematic destruction of human dignity of people who were in the custody of the police'[3] and added: 'That was our past and it can no longer be our future, for if it is, then the wonderful aspirations and magnificent dreams contained in the Constitution will turn to post-apartheid nightmares.'[4]

O'Regan and Sachs JJ, in their partially concurring and partially dissenting opinions in S v Jordan,[5] confronted the issue of whether certain provisions of the Sexual Offences Act were unconstitutional because they embodied and enforced a particular view of private morality.[6] They argued that the Final Constitution does not bar the state from enforcing morality because in fact the Bill of Rights is 'founded on deep civic morality',[7] and that evidence of this deep civic morality is found in the language of Carmichele regarding the Constitution's 'objective, normative value system'.[8] The upshot is that:

> The state has accordingly not only the right but the duty to promote the foundational values of the interim Constitution. One of the most important of these is to 'create a new order in which all South Africans will be entitled to citizenship in a democratic constitutional state in which there is equality between men and women.'[9]

The question was not whether the Act was inspired by unconstitutional values, but whether, today, the purpose of the Act could be deemed consonant with the values now manifest in the text of the Final Constitution.[10] They wrote that: 'In our view, the Act does overall continue to pursue an important and legitimate constitutional purpose, namely the control of commercial sex'.[11] They were not convinced

[1] Geldenhuys (supra) at 728.
[2] Ibid at 728–29 ('The transformation of our legal concepts must, at least in part, be shaped by memory of that which lay at the very heart of our apartheid past.')
[3] Ibid at 728I.
[4] Ibid at 728J–729A.
[5] 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC)('Jordan').
[6] Ibid at para 103.
[7] Ibid at para 104.
[8] Ibid quoting Carmichele (supra) at para 54.
[9] Jordan (supra) at para 106 citing the Preamble to the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or 'Interim Constitution'). IC Chapter 1 was entitled 'Constituent and Formal Provisions' rather than 'Founding Provisions' and, while it contained sections on the national symbols, languages, and supremacy of the Constitution, it did not contain a section on citizenship, as in FC s 3, nor a section on constitutional values as found in FC s 1.
[10] Jordan (supra) at paras 106 and 112.
[11] Ibid at para 114.

'that that the overall purpose of the legislation is manifestly inconsistent with the values of our new order'.[1] Are these the same values — is this the same objective normative value system — that animates Davis J's judgment in Geldenhuys? The judges do not say.

Cameron JA, in his concurring opinion in Brisley v Drotsky,[2] attempted to shed light on why the Supreme Court of Appeal was hesitant to deploy the concept of boni mores or the legal convictions of the community.[3] While noting that boni mores is to be replaced with the 'appropriate norms of the objective value system embodied in the Constitution',[4] that latter concept does not give the courts 'jurisdiction to invalidate contracts on the basis of judicially perceived notions of unjustness or to determine their enforceability on the basis of imprecise notions of good faith'.[5] This is because contractual autonomy is said to embody both the values of freedom and dignity, at least when stripped of its 'extreme excesses'.[6] He thus concluded that: 'The Constitution requires that its values be employed to achieve a careful balance between the unacceptable excesses of contractual "freedom", and securing a framework within which the ability to contract enhances rather than diminishes our self-respect and dignity'.[7] Although Cameron JA does not shed much light on content of our objective value system it is clear from his discussion that it does include the values of freedom and dignity found in FC s 1.

In S v Ndhlovu & Others,[8] Cameron JA again referred to the 'norms of the objective value system.'[9] Here the concept was used to determine if the scheme in s 3 of the Law of Evidence Amendment Act (which conflated admissibility of hearsay evidence with its reliability) was compatible with those norms and thus the Final Constitution. He determined that the statute's fundamental test, the 'interests of justice', and the criteria it posits to determine if the test was satisfied, did comport with the Final Constitution and its values.[10] Cameron J noted that, 'in making the admission of hearsay evidence subject to broader, more rational and flexible considerations, the 1988 Act's general approach is, moreover, in keeping with developments in other democratic societies based on human dignity, equality and freedom.'[11]

13.4 Founding Provisions and the Basic Structure Argument

FC s 74(1) entrenches the foundational values in FC s 1 by providing that any amendment to FC s 1, and to FC s 74(1) itself, must be in the form of a Bill passed by a 75 per cent supporting vote in the National Assembly and by the [1] Jordon (supra) at para 114.

[2] 2002 (4) SA 1 (SCA), 2002 (12) BCLR 1229 (SCA)('Brisley').
[3] Ibid at para 93.
[4] Ibid at 93 referring to Carmichele (supra) at para 56.
[5] Brisley (supra) at 93.
[6] Ibid at para 94.
[7] Ibid at para 95.
[8] 2002 (6) SA 305 (SCA)('Ndhlovu') at para 16.
[9] Ibid at 16 referring to Carmichele (supra) at para 56.
[10] Ndhlovu (supra) at para 23.
[11] Ibid (Refers to FC ss 39(1)(c) & 36(1).)

National Council of Provinces 'with a supporting vote of at least six provinces'. This provision clearly identifies the foundational values as higher norms. It may also subsume, or at least overlap with, what is known in other jurisdictions as the basic structure doctrine, ie the notion that there are certain provisions in, or elements of, a constitution that are so fundamental to the constitutional legal order as to be incapable of amendment, either at all or except by special majority.[1] Logically, the inclusion of FC s 74(1) in the Final Constitution allows two mutually exclusive possibilities: either (1) the basic structure of the Final Constitution is contained in FC s 1 and there are no further substantive barriers in the way of the amendment of the Final Constitution once the procedural requirements of FC s 74(1) have been met; or (2) in addition to the values in FC s 1, there are values so fundamental to the constitutional legal order that any attempt to amend the Final Constitution in a way that contradicts those values will be unconstitutional, whatever the level of support for such an amendment in the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces.

In United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (No 2), the Court was asked to decide the constitutionality of a series of amendments and pieces of legislation that removed the anti-defection clauses from the Constitution and allowed for members of Parliament to cross the floor and join other parties without losing their seat.[2] Among the applicant's contentions was an argument that 'the right to vote and proportional representation are part of the basic structure of the South African Constitution, and as such, are not subject to amendment at all.'[3] The Court had earlier invited such an argument by remarking obiter in Premier of KwaZulu-Natal & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others that '[i]t may perhaps be that a purported amendment to the Constitution, following the formal procedures prescribed by the Constitution, but radically and fundamentally restructuring and reorganising the fundamental premises of the Constitution, might not qualify as an "amendment" at all.'[4] In UDM, the Court again declined to settle this issue, holding that the impugned amendments did not threaten 'to undermine democracy itself', and therefore that the question whether there is something akin to the basic structure doctrine in South African constitutional law did not need to be decided.[5]

The additional question whether the impugned amendments violated the foundational values in FC s 1 was treated separately in UDM, thereby suggesting that the basic structure doctrine may not be coterminous with the special protection given to the foundational values in FC s 1 by FC s 74(1). This is an important point because, as the UDM Court makes clear, the test for the constitutionality of amendments established by FC s 74(1) is a purely procedural one. That is, once it is established that a purported amendment of the Final Constitution does indeed

[1] See, eg, Indira Nehru Gandhi v Raj Narain (1975) SC 2299, 2461.
[2] 2003 (1) SA 678 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1220 (CC)('UDM') at para 3.
[3] Ibid at para 15.
[4] 1996 (1) SA 769 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1561 (CC)('Premier of KwaZulu-Natal') at para 47.
[5] UDM (supra) at para 17.

conflict with the foundational values in FC s 1, the only question is whether the amendment was properly passed under FC s 74(1).[1] If so, there can be no further basis, apart from the basic structure doctrine, for a finding of unconstitutionality. The possibility of there being a substantive check on constitutional amendments that enjoy the special majorities mentioned in FC s 74(1) depends, in other words, on the recognition of something like the basic structure doctrine. In the absence of such a doctrine, and assuming these special majorities are achieved, FC s 74(1) and the foundational values in FC s 1 present no substantive barrier to the amendment of the Final Constitution. Of course, if these special majorities are not achieved, then FC s 1 (read with FC s 74(1)) does present a substantive barrier, since any constitutional amendment that contradicts FC s 1 and fails to satisfy the procedural requirements of FC s 74(1) will be unconstitutional.

The two constitutional amendments impugned in UDM had been passed in terms of FC s 74(3), which regulates the procedure for the passing of amendments that affect neither the foundational values nor a provision in the Bill of Rights (FC s 74(2)). Having decided that the case did not require it to settle the existence in South African constitutional law of the basic structure doctrine, the Constitutional Court accordingly moved on to consider whether the amendments were inconsistent with the foundational values in FC s 1 or citizens' right to vote in FC s 19(3). The Court's detailed reasoning in respect of these two questions is discussed in §13.5*(a)* and elsewhere in this volume.[2] Suffice it to say that neither the commitment to multi-party government in FC s 1*(d)* nor to the rule of law in FC s 1*(c)* was found to preclude an amendment to South Africa's electoral system making it possible for members of parliament, elected on the basis of a party list proportional representation system, to cross the floor without losing their seat.[3] The clear implication of this decision, especially when read together with the decision in Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Re-Integration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others that FC s 1 does not give rise to justiciable rights,[4] is that the threshold for the deployment of the foundational values to protect the basic structure of the South African constitutional legal order is very high, and that only extraordinary amendments to that order will trigger the protection afforded by FC s 1. Even in this case, the protection afforded by FC s 1 is limited in the sense that FC s 1 does not present a substantive barrier to amendment of the Final Constitution once the requirements of FC s 74(1) have been met.

[1] UDM (supra) at para 12. The same is true of amendments duly passed in terms of FC s 74(2)(amendments to the Bill of Rights) and FC s 74(3)(all other amendments).

[2] See T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 10.

[3] UDM (supra) at paras 23–27 and 55–75.

[4] 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC)('NICRO')(Discussed at §13.7*(a)* infra).

13.5 Function of the various sections of FC Chapter 1

As may be evident from the above discussion, not all of the sections in FC Chapter 1 are of equal importance. FC s 1 sets out the foundational values in their most general terms. FC s 2 further specifies the effect of the supremacy of the Final Constitution in FC s 1*(d)*. FC s 3 provides for the equal rights and duties of citizenship. FC ss 4 and 5 address the national anthem and what the flag looks like, and FC s 6 details the Republic's official languages.

As we have seen, FC s 1 stands on a different footing from the other sections in FC Chapter 1 in as much as its provisions are more firmly entrenched. The other sections in FC Chapter 1 do not even receive the same status as the rights in FC Chapter 2, the Bill of Rights, which has stricter requirements for amendment than the rest of the Final Constitution, with the exception of FC s 1.[1]

This fact sends something of a mixed message regarding the importance of the founding provisions in FC ss 2–6. Why was the special status of FC s 1 not extended to all the provisions in FC Chapter 1? In particular, why was FC s 2 not given this status, or placed within FC s 1? Alternatively, FC ss 3 and 6 may have made more sense within the Bill of Rights, since they appear to delineate the rights of equal citizenship and of the Republic's official languages. FC ss 4 and 5 are more straightforward, informational provisions prescribing the manner in which the national anthem shall be determined and specifying the colours of the national flag, the detailed design of which is contained in Schedule 1.

(a) FC ss 1 and 2

FC ss 1 and 2 are the strongest candidates for being 'true' founding provisions. FC s 1 contains the foundational values, and FC s 2 further specifies the most central value of the Final Constitution, its supremacy.[2] The Constitutional Court in UDM stated that the foundational values have an important place in the Final Constitution as they both 'inform the interpretation of the Constitution and other law, and set positive standards with which all law must comply to be valid.'[3]

These twin functions implicate both the interpretation provisions and the limitations analysis. FC 39(1)(a) tells us that, when interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court or tribunal 'must promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom'. The most logical place to start looking for these values is FC s 1, which specifies the values that the Republic is said to be founded upon. Thus, these values or principles have an organizing and radiating effect on the Bill of Rights.[1] As noted above, there is nothing that stops us from recognizing that there are other foundational values or principles that underlie this open and democratic society, be it the separation of powers,[2] transformative values[3] or even ubuntu.

[1] Compare FC s 74(2) with FC s 74(3).

[2] Currie and De Waal argue that the basic principles should not be invoked until more detailed provisions of the Final Constitution run out. Currie & De Waal Handbook (supra) at 8. Thus it would make sense that one turns to FC s 2 before relying on FC s 1*(c). FC s 2 functions much more like a rule which gives effect to the value of supremacy of the Final Constitution as found in FC s 1(c)*. There are very few references to FC s 2 in the case law, most likely due to the clarity of the rule it states.

[3] UDM (supra) at para 19. Currie and De Waal argue that 'the "basic principles" of the Final Constitution tie the provisions of the Final Constitution together, help define the constitutional order, influence the interpretation of other provisions of the Constitution, influence legislation that is interpreted or drafted and influence how the common law will be developed'. Currie & De Waal Handbook (supra) at 7–8. See also I Currie & J De Waal The New Constitutional and Administrative Law Vol 1 (2001) 73. Their list of 'basics' overlaps with the contents of FC ss 1 and 2. But it both includes principles not found in these sections and excludes principles found in these sections.

[1] Khosa v Minister of Social Development 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC) at para 104 ('The founding values will inform most, if not all, of the rights in the Bill of Rights.') Note that it is hard to imagine how FC ss 4 and 5 might have a radiating effect. FC ss 3 and 6 may have some radiating effect on other provisions but this effect is unclear at best.

[2] For instance, the separation of powers had a profound impact on the standard of judicial review in all of the opinions in Kaunda. Kaunda involved the review of the conduct of government in living up to its duty to act positively to protect its citizens against human rights abuses abroad (diplomatic protection). In this context, the Kaunda Court wrote: 'This, however, is a terrain in which courts must exercise discretion and recognize that government is better placed than they are to deal with such matters.' Kaunda (supra) at para 67. The test arrived at for reviewing whether the government responded appropriately to a request for diplomatic protection was a simple 'rationality test'. Ibid at para 79. This test allows for broad discretion on the part of the government. Ibid at para 81. Kaunda reflects an about–face on the position adopted by the Court in Mohamed v President of the Republic of South Africa. 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC). In Mohamed, the Court held that the notion of separation of powers could not trump the value of the supremacy of the Final Constitution and the rule of law in order to defeat a potential order of the court to the government to 'do whatever may be within their power to remedy the wrong here done to Mohamed by their actions, or to ameliorate at best the consequential prejudice caused to him' by the unlawful rendering of him to FBI agents to be tried in New York, for '. . .[to] stigmatise such an order as a breach of the separation of State power as between the Executive and the Judiciary is to negate a foundational value of the Republic of South Africa, namely supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law'. Ibid at para 71. For more on the problems and the tension in the Constitutional Court's approach to issues of extraterritorial application of the Bill of Rights, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) §31.6.

[3] See Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism & Others 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC) at para 69 (Ngcobo J began his concurring opinion: 'I write separately to emphasise the importance of transformation in the context of the Marine Living Resources Act [Act 18 of 1998]'); Bekker & Another v Jika 2002 (4) SA 508 (E) at para 28 (Notes the strong influence of the transformative effect of Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act 19 of 1998 in determining if the provisions of the Act apply to an owner who remains in occupation despite his ownership having terminated. In coming to the conclusion that the Act did apply, Somyalo JP writes: 'The Act in question is clearly intended, not only to enforce the provisions so as to ensure fairness and human dignity and to protect the vulnerable but its transformative effect cannot be overemphasised.') See also Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2004 (5) SA 545 (C), 2004 (12) BCLR 1328 (C) at paras 83–106 (Value of transformation has bearing on determination of whether the rates charged by the City of Cape Town amounted to unfair discrimination against those who own residences with higher property values); Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC).

FC 39(2) tells us that when interpreting any legislation (including, presumably, the Final Constitution),[1] and when developing the common law and customary law, the 'court, tribunal or forum must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights'. Unlike FC s 39(1), FC s 39(2) provides a narrower scope for the interpretation of legislation and development of the law. Rather than being required to promote the values underlying an open and democratic society, or even the values underlying the Final Constitution as a whole, FC s 39(2) merely directs us to the purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. On a narrow reading, this may mean that only FC ss 1*(a)* and (b) would have a radiating effect since they are the only provisions of FC s 1 that have clear Bill of Rights counterparts.[2]

There are three approaches that one could take to this issue: (1) one could conclude that FC s 1*(c)* and (d) (and any other foundational value not found in the Bill of Rights) are irrelevant to the interpretation of the rest of the Final Constitution; (2) one could conclude that the values in FC s 1*(c)* and (d) (and other foundational values) are part of the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights and are therefore relevant to interpreting the rest of the Final Constitution; or, finally, (3) one could argue that, as there is no principled reason for excluding the founding provisions, it makes sense to speak of the values of the Final Constitution rather than the values of the Bill Rights under FC s 39(2).

The first approach is tempting since one would assume that there must be a reason for the difference in language between FC ss 39(1) and 39(2). Although plausible on its face, a deeper analysis of the Final Constitution reveals that the other two approaches are more attractive.

The values of supremacy of the constitution and the rule of law found in both FC s 1*(c)* and FC s 2 as well as the values of accountability, responsiveness, and openness found in FC s 1*(d)* are part of the values underlying the Bill of Rights.[3] One of the many points of a justiciable bill of rights is to promote these values and to place certain rights beyond the majority's will. Those rights provide for accountability, responsiveness and openness[4] and the values which underlie

[1] On the relationship between the Bill of Rights and the rest of the Final Constitution, see Woolman (supra) at §31.5/

[2] The values in FC s 1*(a)* and (d) are arguably less clearly reflected in the values of the Bill of Rights.

[3] See Z Motola & C Ramaphosa Constitutional Law: Analysis and Cases (1998)(Authors start their chapter on interpretation with the text of FC s 2.)

[4] Accountability, responsiveness, and openness have become important values in the interpretation of legislation and the development of the common law under s FC 39(2), particularly in cases involving the state. In NK (supra) at para 23, O'Regan J uses these values from FC s 1 to argue that the courts need to address the doctrinal area of vicarious liability in terms of the normative imperatives of FC s 39 (2): 'Denying that the principles bear such normative implications will only bedevil the exercise by rendering inarticulate, premises that in a democracy committed to openness, responsiveness and accountability should be articulated.' See also Premier, Western Cape v Faircape Property Developers (Pty) Ltd 2002 (6) SA 180 (C)(Reversed in Premier, Western Cape v Faircape Prop Developers (Pty) Ltd. 2003 (6) SA 13 (SCA)); Van Duivenboden v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) All SA 127 (C); Minister of Safety & Security v Van Duivenboden 2002 (6) SA 431 (SCA); Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & them form part of a 'culture of justification'.[1] Thus, the interpretation of legislation and the development of the common law and customary law that promotes these values also promotes the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. Further, FC Chapter 2, the Bill of Rights, begins with FC s 7(1), which states that 'the Bill of Rights is the cornerstone of democracy in South Africa'. Thus, there can be little question that democratic government, accountability and responsiveness are among the fundamental objects of the Bill of Rights and that their fulfilment requires attention to the values of FC s 1*(c)* and (d).

Finally, there does not seem to be a principled reason for drawing a distinction between those values that underlie the entire Final Constitution and those that underlie the Bill of Rights.[2] The value of transformation found throughout the Final Constitution is also embodied in the Bill of Rights. Perhaps most importantly, since the interpretation of the Bill of Rights is accomplished by promoting the broader set of values, it would be quite odd to say that they were not part of the values of the Bill of Rights themselves. In effect, there are no values informing the Bill of Rights that are prior to an interpretation of the Bill of Rights, and since that interpretative act requires that they be interpreted in light of the values underlying an open democratic society, those values are part of the Bill of Rights. In particular, they are part of the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[3]

Thus, it makes sense that O'Regan J refers to the values of the Final Constitution rather than merely the Bill of Rights in her treatment of how the common law of vicarious liability should be developed under FC s 39(2) in NK v Minister of Safety and Security. As she stated:

> The overall purpose of section 39(2) is to ensure that our common law is infused with the values of the Constitution. It is not only in cases where existing rules are clearly inconsistent with the Constitution that such an infusion is required. The normative influence of the Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC)(Holding that Transnet Ltd had a legal duty to keep its passengers reasonably safe from crime on its trains), rev'g Rail Commuter Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others 2003 (6) SA 349 (SCA), 2003 (12) BCLR 1363 (SCA)(Holding that Transnet Ltd did not have a legal duty to keep its passengers safe from crime, for that duty was one placed generally on the shoulders of the police services), rev'g Rail Commuter Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltdt/a Metrorail & Others 2003 (5) SA 518 (C), 2003 (3) BCLR 301 (C)(Davis and Van Heerden JJ)(Holding that Transnet did have such a duty.)

[1] This culture is one in 'which every exercise of power is expected to be justified.' E Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where: Introducing the Interim Bill of Rights' (1994) 10 SAJHR 31–32. The idea here is that the new dispensation makes a break from the authoritarian ethos of apartheid under which the exercise of power by the state was neither justified nor justifiable. Mureinik is clearly drawing on Dworkin's notion that the overall point of law is the justification of coercion, ie the principles underlying the law must be able to justify the coercive power that the State exercises in the name of the law. See R Dworkin Law's Empire (1986) 93, 109–10, 127, 190, 400. One of the mechanisms that clearly support this culture of justification is FC s 36 of the Bill of Rights. See S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March June 2006) Chapter 34.

[2] But see Woolman 'Application' (supra) at §31.5 (Discusses the extent to which the Bill of Rights applies to other sections of the Final Constitution).

[3] See C Roederer 'Post-matrix Legal Reasoning: Horizontality and the Rule of Values in South African Law' (2003) 19 SAJHR 57.

> Constitution must be felt throughout the common law. Courts making decisions which involve the incremental development of the rules of the common law in cases where the values of the Constitution are relevant are therefore also bound by the terms of section 39(2). The obligation imposed upon courts by section 39(2) of the Constitution is thus extensive, requiring courts to be alert to the normative framework of the Constitution not only when some startling new development of the common law is in issue, but in all cases where the incremental development of the rule is in issue.[1]

As noted above, constitutional values also help set standards and are thus implicated in determining the content of rights under FC s 39 as well as the jusification for the limitation of a right under FC s 36. A right or the limitation of a right will be given greater weight when they are furthering foundational values.[2] Given the extent of the influence of the founding provisions on both rights interpretation and limitations analysis, one may be tempted to argue that the founding provisions cannot — short of being eliminated — be altered at all.[3]

As noted above, UDM raised not only the issue of basic structure, but of whether the floor crossing amendments were compatible with the founding values of the Final Constitution.[4] After dismissing the basic structure argument, the Court addressed the argument that the amendments were inconsistent with the founding provisions as set out in FC s 1.[5] If so, then the amendments would be unconstitutional since they were not passed under the FC s 74(1) procedure required for amending these provisions.[6] Here it was contended that the amendments conflicted with both the requirement of a multi-party system of democratic government and with the rule of law.[7] The UDM Court dismissed the argument

[1] NK (supra) at para 17.

[2] See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Other v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 1999 (3) SA 173, 186–187 (C), 1999 (3) BCLR 280 (C)(Davis J wrote: 'At this stage of the constitutional enquiry respondents must bear the onus of pleading and proving justification in terms of s 36(1) of the Constitution . . . There was no evidence before the Court to suggest that this breach of the guarantee against discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation could possibly be justified.') As Mahomed DP (as he was then) said in Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North, & Others:

> [T]he guarantee of equality lies at the very heart of the Constitution [and] it permeates and defines the very ethos on which the Constitution is premised. A breach of this right can only be sanctioned if there is a clear and sustainable justification therefor. This becomes a more difficult onus to discharge in the case of foundational values such as equality. To consider a limitation to be viable, it would have to represent in the first place an important purpose.

1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), (1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC) at para 20 (emphasis added).

[3] Qozeleni v Minister of Law and Order 1994 (3) SA 625, 634 (E)('[T]he fundamental rights set out in chap 3 of the [Interim] Constitution, together with the general limitation clause in s 33, will, in each instance of an alleged breach of those rights, have to be examined to ensure that expression is given to the values already referred to.')

[4] See §13.4 infra.

[5] Ibid.

[6] UDM (supra) at para 18.

[7] Ibid at paras 19–20.

[8] Ibid at para 20. In other words, FC ss 1*(d)* and 1*(c)*.

that proportional representation was part of the founding values since it was not included in the text of FC s 1*(d)*.[1] It also dismissed the argument that floor crossing undermines the system of proportional representation,[2] since representatives are really not accountable between elections anyway.[3] In the end, while the Court almost concedes that anti-defection clauses may be good for multi-party democracy, it does not consider them necessary for democracy.[4] Although the UDM Court acknowledged that the 10 per cent formula would work to the detriment of smaller parties it found that this fact did not mean that it was unconstitutional.[5]

The UDM Court next addressed the argument that the legislation violated the rule of law. The Court captured the appellant's argument on this point as contending that the legislation was not rationally related to a legitimate government purpose, was therefore not consistent with the rule of law, and was, as a result, invalid.[6] The alleged illicit purpose was that the legislation was passed so that the ANC and the New National Party could take advantage of the break-up of the Democratic Alliance.[7] The Court's response was that this conflated motive and purpose. In any case, not only did the legislation secure overwhelming support (86 per cent in the National Assembly, including some Democratic Party members), it also had the legitimate purpose of allowing floor crossing without the penalty of losing one's seat. The real problem was that the legislation failed the requirement

[1] That part of CP VIII was not incorporated into the final constitutional text.

[2] Although not developed by the Court, the argument would be that if parliament wanted to allow for floor crossing it should have chosen an electoral system that could accommodate that possibility without sacrificing democratic accountability. For instance, floor crossing does not really undermine the US system because people vote for individuals rather than the party they represent. The Court in UDM in fact quotes the recommendation from a special committee that had been set up to investigate South Africa's electoral system which opposed floor crossing. UDM (supra) at para 62. The committee was opposed to the idea based on democratic grounds in 1998 ('it would be neither fair nor democratic to lift the ban'). It was, however, open to re-evaluating the matter after the 1999 elections, but only if the new electoral system included constituency voting.

[3] Ibid at paras 31 and 49. This response rejected again the contention that this switch in allegiance was mid-election and thus undermined the people's right to vote. Ibid at paras 48–51. The reasoning is rounded off with the circular argument that the voters exercised their franchise knowing that the Constitution could be amended in such a way as to defeat their vote. Ibid at para 51.

[4] Ibid at para 35.

[5] Ibid at para 47. The Court thereby finesses the argument that this was not some random benefit to some parties and a random burden on others, but a clear benefit to the governing party given to itself which worked to the detriment of smaller parties. Ibid at para 56.

[6] Ibid at para 55.

[7] Ibid at para 56.

of item 23A of Annexure A, Schedule 6 of the Final Constitution.[1] The Court further relied on the fact that there was considerable debate about whether floor crossing should be allowed and that all these contrasting views seemed to be supported on democratic grounds.[2] The final contention was that it was irrational and contrary to multi-party democracy to allow those who switch parties to take their seats with them.[3] The UDM Court's response here seems to amount to a de minimis argument: it states that given 'the limited term for which a defecting member will remain a member of the legislature it seems neither irrational nor inconsistent with multi-party democracy to provide that the seat should be regarded as the seat of the new party for the remainder of that member's term.'[4]

While the legislation may have met some technical requirement of legitimacy, it seems less clear that floor crossing can be justified on democratic grounds. The fact that these amendments were contemplated by Amendment A to Schedule 6 and that an overwhelming number of politicians supported them does not mean that they comport with the founding values that underlie the Final Constitution.[5] Neither the Indian situation of rampant floor crossing between 1967 and 1972,[6] nor the potential consolidation of power into a de facto one-party system, are ideal grounds for democracy and the protection of minority rights. Although reluctant to identify this dispute as an incursion on democratic rights, it did abdicate responsibility for protecting minority rights.[7] The failure to more strictly scrutinize the amendments or to read the demands of multi-party democracy more broadly is somewhat troubling given the unequal impact of the legislation on minority parties. Although the Court may have been worried about its political capital, a decision that the amendments altered FC s 1 and thus required

[1] UDM (supra) at para 57.

[2] Ibid at paras 63–67. The Court is not clear if anyone supported floor crossing and retaining the proportional system or if support for floor crossing was contingent on constituency voting.

[3] Ibid at paras 71 and 73.

[4] Ibid at para 74.

[5] The 'power and self-interest regarding' justifications are clear, but the Court did not clearly demonstrate what the 'public-regarding reasons' were for the amendments. See C Sunstein One Case at a Time (1999) 27 (For the use of these terms.)

[6] UDM (supra) at para 60. The Court notes that the Indian experience brings out two main problems with floor crossing: instability and corruption. It does not, however, respond to these concerns but merely points to the cacophony of voices on the issue.

[7] See J Ely Democracy and Distrust (1983) 73–75(In laying out the foundations of process theory, Ely argues for judicial intervention when the court is following a 'participation-oriented, representation reinforcing approach' that promotes democracy.) Sunstein also recognizes the need for judges to set aside their 'judicial humility' and their 'reluctance to disturb the results of the democratic process . . .when it can be shown that the political process is defective' and 'excludes people from political participation.' Sunstein (supra) at 258.

the FC s 74(1) procedures might have been democracy-promoting.[1] Given the overwhelming support for the amendments, such a decision would not have taken the amendment out of the political reach of Parliament, and would therefore not have undermined the will of the majority. Furthermore, such a decision might have signalled the Court's concern with amendments that have the effect of altering the outcomes of elections long after the vote has taken place.

(b) FC ss 3 and 6

The founding provision on citizenship is unique because, unlike the provisions on equality and dignity (FC s 1*(a)*) or non-racialism and non-sexism (FC s 1 (b)), FC s 3 is actually much more detailed than the Bill of Rights provision, FC s 20, which simply states: 'No citizen may be deprived of citizenship.' A further oddity is that FC s 20 appears to conflict with the authorization of legislation for the 'loss of citizenship' in FC s 3(3). For it is difficult to see how one could lose one's citizenship without being deprived of citizenship.[2]

FC s 3(1)'s language is a reaction both to the denationalization and forced removal of many South Africans to the Bantustans under apartheid and to the push for autonomy from proponents of a Volkstaat and traditional leaders. While the text accomodates claims of cultural autonomy elsewhere, FC s 3 makes it clear that there is only one kind of South African citizen and those citizens are to share equally in the rights and duties of citizenship under FC s 3(2).

Although FC s 3 is more detailed than FC s 20, its provisions do not add a great deal to FC s 20's rights.[3] The equality rights provisions themselves apply to citizens, but they also apply to 'everyone'.[4] The implication of FC s 3 is that non-citizens might not get the same benefits nor have the same burdens as citizens, but this is also specified in the rights that clearly do not apply to citizens.[5] FC s 3 does not appear to reinforce FC s 20, or any of the other rights in the Bill of Rights.

[1] See Sunstein (supra) at 27.

[2] See J Klaaren 'Citizenship' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, September 2006) Chapter 67.

[3] FC s 20 states in its entirety: 'No citizen may be deprived of citizenship.' This could easily have been added to FC s 3. However, if it had been put in FC s 3 without duplication in the Bill of Rights then its status as a right may have been placed in doubt. The failure to put FC s 3 in FC s 20 or in the Bill of Rights may lead some to question whether it is a right and/or duty-conferring provision.

[4] FC s 9.

[5] Several sections are specific to citizens: FC s 19 (political rights), FC s 21(3)–(4)(movement, residence, and the right to a passport), FC s 22 (trade, occupation and profession), FC s 37(8)(non-citizens deprived of rights under s 37(6)–(7) if detained under international armed conflict and those rights are substituted with the rights under international humanitarian law), FC s 47 (membership in National Assembly), FC s 106 (membership in provincial legislature), and FC s 158 (membership in municipal councils). For more on the benefits afforded citizens (as opposed to non-citizens) under the Bill of Rights, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) §31.3.

The provisions of FC s 6 on official languages differ in character from the Bill of Rights provisions that engage language in that they read more like directive principles. The founding provisions on official languages speak of 'taking positive measures', 'promoting and creating conditions for development and use of' as well as 'promoting and ensuring respect for' the languages and language groups within South Africa. This aspirational language stands in contrast to the language of FC ss 30 and 31, which do not require the State to do anything except refrain from infringing the rights in question.[1]

(c) FC ss 4 and 5

FC ss 4 and 5 deal with matters that are foundational only in the sense of identifying two important national symbols: the flag and the national anthem. While their significance should not be downplayed, they are not foundational in the sense of providing a foundation for the rest of the Final Constitution or for South African democracy. This is particularly true of FC s 4, which merely provides that the President will determine the national anthem by proclamation. In comparison to the pregnant provisions of FC s 1, FC s 4 is about as empty a vessel as a provision can be. Unlike some of the other founding provisions, this provision has no more work to do. In contrast to FC s 1, FC s 4 does not tie the provisions of the Final Constitution together, help define the constitutional order or influence the interpretation of other provisions of the Final Constitution, legislation, or the common law.[2]

Thus, the question remains, why are FC ss 3–6 part of the founding provisions when they seem to be so different from those sections that are more basic, or foundational? The best explanation is that they symbolize certain pillars or foundational values that accommodate both the history of the struggle for democracy in South Africa and the desire for recognition by certain groups. This is particularly true of the language and citizenship provisions, which, on the one hand, are reactions to the denial of citizenship, and the denigration of the languages of so many South Africans under apartheid, and, which on the other, reflect the pressure to identify a common unified citizenry and to embrace and to protect languages previously underprivileged.

[1] Moreover, FC s 30, the right to language and culture, and FC s 31, the right to cultural, religious and linguistic communities, are internally modified by a requirement of consistency with all other provisions in the Bill of Rights. See I Currie 'Community Rights: Culture, Religion and Language,' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 58.

[2] I refer to the possible conflict between the descriptions of the flag as containing the colour red in FC s 5 and chilli red in Schedule 1. See C Roederer 'Post-Matrix Legal Reasoning — Horizontality and the Rule of Values in South African Law' (2003) 19 SAJHR 57, 77, n 101 (Argues that should dispute over colours of the flag arise, the values of the Final Constitution would need to be invoked to resolve it.)

[3] Currie and De Waal set out a number of tasks for the basic principles of the new constitutional order. See Currie & De Waal Handbook (supra) at 7–8. Unlike these provisions, FC s 4 does not tie the provisions of the Final Constitution together, or help define the constitutional order, influence the interpretation of other provisions of the Final Constitution, or influence the way legislation is interpreted or drafted or how the common law will be developed.

13.6 Are the founding provisions absolute or at least more important than other provisions in Final Constitution?

As noted above, a number of the founding provisions appear to provide for rights, or at least could be interpreted to give rise to rights. If this is so, it is unclear from the text if they can be limited, since the limitations clause (FC s 36) refers only to rights in the Bill of Rights. If the founding provisions are in fact foundational, then there is room to argue that either they should be absolute and not subject to limitation, or at least that the rights they protect should be considered more important and more difficult to limit. The latter view represents a common approach to the rights to equality and to dignity, which are foundational values under FC s 1*(a)*.[1] For instance, the applicants in Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Re-Integration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others, who were citizen prisoners denied the right to vote, argued that the sections of the Electoral Act which disenfranchised them were contrary to FC ss 1*(d)* and 3(2) 'which are absolute and not subject to limitation in terms of the Constitution'.[2] While the text of the Final Constitution does not mandate this

[1] See, for example, Kriegler J's treatment of the right to freedom of expression versus dignity in S v Mamabolo 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC) at para 41. In her treatment of the competing rights to dignity and freedom of expression in Khumalo, O'Regan J noted that dignity was foundational while the right to freedom of expression was not paramount. Khumalo v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC) at para 25. For a critique of Khumalo with regard to the privileging of dignity over freedom, and the inconsistencies in the Court's jurisprudence on the value of expression in our democracy, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) §31.4. See also Sayed v Editor, Cape Times 2004 (1) SA 58, 62–63 (C). Khumalo appears to indicate that rights in the Bill of Rights that have the backing of the foundational values in FC s 1 outweigh those that do not. It is an indication of at least some radiating effect of the founding provisions. O'Regan J in Dawood wrote:

> The value of dignity in our Constitutional framework cannot . . . be doubted. The Constitution asserts dignity to contradict our past in which human dignity for black South Africans was routinely and cruelly denied. It asserts it too to inform the future, to invest in our democracy respect for the intrinsic worth of all human beings. Human dignity therefore informs constitutional adjudication and interpretation at a range of levels.

Dawood (supra) at para 35. Note that this quote connects the foundational value of dignity to the Preamble's value of transformation. Compare this view to Kriegler J's view of equality. See President of the RSA & Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1997 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 74 ('The South African Constitution is primarily and emphatically an egalitarian Constitution . . . [I]n light of our own particular history, and our vision for the future, a Constitution was written with equality at its centre. Equality is our Constitution's focus and its organizing principle.') See also Lotus River Ottery Grassy Park Residents Association v South Peninsula Municipality 1999 (3) SA 817, 833 (C), 1999 (4) BCLR 440, 456 (C); National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 1999 (3) SA 174, 186I-187A, (C), 1999 (3) BCLR 280, 292–293 (C).

[2] NICRO (supra) at 18.

conclusion, there is a clear gap in the letter of the law here: that gap is the absence of an express provision as to how rights or powers outside of FC Chapter 2 ought to be limited.[1] Rather than tell us why this gap should be filled one way or another, the Court in NICRO simply preferred the conclusion that the provisions in question are not absolute and that the FC s 36 was appropriate to the task of deciding whether FC s 18 could be limited.[2] The Court stated that: 'Neither of these sections requires voting rights to be absolute and immune from limitation'.[3]

FC ss 1*(d)* and 3(2) might have had an impact on the limitations analysis in NICRO but that may have been due as much to the fact that the rights to vote and to equality were also infringed. The right to equal citizenship overlapped with the right to equality. Another right that was not equally accorded to these prisoners/citizens was the right to vote. It is unclear that the verdict would have come out differently if the founding provisions did not, in fact, exist. While the Court notes that FC s 3's equal citizenship rights are modified by the equal duties provision of FC s 3, these duties are just as easily articulated as limitations, in terms of FC s 36, of the right to vote.[4]

13.7 Do the founding provisions create justiciable rights?

It can be argued that the limitations analysis in NICRO was appropriate because of the infringement of the rights to equality in FC s 9 and the right to vote in FC s 19(3)(a), and not because FC ss 1 and 3 were infringed. Notice that a limitation or infringement of the equal rights of citizenship provisions will, by definition, require the denial of a right and although the right in question need not be a right in the Bill of Rights (see FC s 39(3)), the denial of the right to an individual or group of citizens is likely to raise FC s 9 equality rights concerns. Should it not, there is still a good argument to be made that a founding provision that so clearly provides for equal rights of citizens should be both justiciable and afforded at least the same protection as the rights in the Bill of Rights.[5]

[1] See, in this regard, S Woolman 'Application' §31.5 (First rule: harmonization; 2nd rule: read non rights provisions in lights of rights; 3rd rule: rights trump exercise of the government power, but not the power itself.)

[2] The NICRO Court made this point when it stated that > Section 36 of the Constitution is dealt with more fully in paragraph 33 and later paragraphs below. It makes provision for the limitation of rights in the Bill of Rights and the criteria according to which this [the limitation of the right to vote of citizens] can be done.

NICRO (supra) at 19.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Ibid at paras 24 and 57 ('The rights include the right to vote in elections. The duties and responsibilities include at least an obligation to respect the rights of others and to comply with the law'. The Court characterized the policy justification put forward by the State as 'denounc[ing] crime and . . . communicat[ing] to the public that the rights that citizens have are related to their duties and obligations as citizens. Such a purpose would be legitimate and consistent with the provisions of s 3 of the Constitution.')

[5] See Currie & De Waal Handbook (supra). In chapter 20, 'Citizenship', the authors place FC s 3 in the shaded box along with FC s 20, indicating that this is a rights-granting provision to be treated the same as FC s 20.

The status of the FC s 6 'Languages' provisions is even less clear. While their denial may raise equality concerns (language is listed as one of the prohibited grounds under FC s 9(3)), if viewed as positive rights, they may be denied without infringing other rights, not even the language and cultural rights in the Bill of Rights. One view is that, given their socio-economic-rights-like structure, the FC s 6 provisions should be in the same camp as FC s 3, which would arguably make them justiciable and subject to the FC s 36 limitations analysis. This is reinforced by the FC s 2 command that 'the obligations imposed by it [the Final Constitution] must be fulfilled'.

(a) FC s 1 does not create justiciable rights

The Court has not given us any guidance on whether FC s 6 gives rise to enforceable rights, but it has addressed the question of the enforceability of FC s 1. Given that the FC s 1 provisions are truly foundational and substantially more entrenched than any other provision in the Constitution (save the entrenching provision) it is arguable that they should be interpreted as giving rise to justiciable rights. However, as Frank Michelman points out in his chapter on the rule of law, the Constitutional Court in NICRO held that the founding values of FC s 1 do not 'give rise' to 'enforceable rights'.[1] As the Court stated:

> The values enunciated in section 1 of the Constitution are of fundamental importance. They inform and give substance to all the provisions of the Constitution. They do not, however, give rise to discrete and enforceable rights in themselves. This is clear not only from the language of section 1 itself, but also from the way the Constitution is structured and in particular the provisions of Chapter 2 which contains the Bill of Rights.[2]

At first blush, this holding raises a concern for the rule of law because, in addition to there being no justiciable right to the 'rule of law' in FC s 1*(c), there are no other provisions in the Bill of Rights that clearly give rise to a justiciable right to the rule of law.[3] This leaves the second of the two values in FC s 1(c)* without apparent protection.[4] However, as Michelman points out, in a

[1] See F Michelman 'Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) §11.2, citing NICRO (supra) at paras 21, 23.

[2] NICRO (supra) at para 21 (emphasis added).

[3] See Michelman (supra) at §11.2. See also S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005)(Dignity as right gives rise to justifiable rules, dignity as value do not). Ch 36.

[4] The same concern is not present for the other values mentioned in FC s 1 since there are clear justiciable provisions relating to paras (a), (b), the rest of (c) and (d). Paragraph (a) finds expression in FC ss 9–10, 7(2), 38, 39 and throughout the Bill of Rights; paragraph (b) in FC s 9; the rest of paragraph (c) in FC ss 2, 38, 172(1)); and paragraph (d) in FC ss 19, 46(1), 236 and 237.

series of decisions the Constitutional Court has recognized the principle of legality, one of the core components of the rule of law, as a justiciable right.[1] Many of the concerns that might have been raised in response to the decision in NICRO are therefore unwarranted. In addition, in President of the Republic of South Africa & another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd, the Court appeared to qualify the NICRO ratio somewhat by suggesting that FC s 1(c)'s commitment to the rule of law may be given justiciable content through other rights, in this case the FC s 34 right of access to courts.[2]

(b) Other provisions in FC Chapter 1 may give rise to justiciable rights

It could be argued that, if FC s 1 does not give rise to justiciable rights, then none of the Chapter 1 founding provisions should be interpreted to give rise to justiciable rights. There may be two grounds for this: (1) justiciable constitutional rights are placed in FC Chapter 2, and thus, if the drafters wished to create justiciable rights in respect of the matters covered by FC Chapter 1, they could and should have placed them there; and (2) given that FC s 1 enjoys pride of place in FC Chapter 1, it would be odd if its provisions did not give rise to justiciable rights while other provisions in the same chapter did. The first argument can be found in the passage from NICRO quoted above, and is equally applicable to the other sections in FC Chapter 1.

The Court's second argument in NICRO, that the language of FC s 1 does not evince an intention to create rights, is not, however, equally applicable to the rest of FC Chapter 1. Given that the Court in NICRO did not say that the other sections of FC Chapter 1 did not give rise to enforceable rights, the difference in language of the other provisions may be enough to outweigh the structural arguments that they be treated the same as FC s 1. While FC s 1 clearly states that paras (a)-(d) specify the values that the Republic of South Africa is founded upon, it does not state that the values create rights, and does not clearly impose any duties on anyone. FC s 2, by contrast, in addition to providing that 'law or conduct inconsistent with [the Final Constitution]' is invalid, imposes a general duty to fulfil the obligations imposed by the Constitution. This section, which expressly creates a duty of fulfilment, arguably also creates the correlative right to fulfilment. As FC s 1 does not impose any obligations, FC s 2 cannot gain traction on it to create any rights. But, this is not the case with FC ss 3(2) and (3), which provide for equal rights and duties of citizenship, and impose an obligation on the State to pass legislation providing for 'the acquisition, loss and restoration of citizenship'.[1] It is also not the case with FC s 6, which imposes a number of obligations on the state with regard to the promotion of official, indigenous and other languages.[2] If these provisions, along with FC s 2, create constitutional duties, one could argue that they also create constitutional rights.[3] Any attempt to limit these rights would then either be unconstitutional (if FC Chapter 1 creates justiciable rights) or subject to the discipline of the general limitations clause.[4]

[1] Michelman (supra) at 11-15–11-33.
[2] 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC).

[1] See Kaunda (supra) at paras 62–67 (Chaskalson CJ addressed the right or the entitlement to equal citizenship in FC s 3 in the context of the right to request diplomatic protection of the state. Although he did not find that FC s 3 gave rise to a right to diplomatic protection, it did give rise to a right to request diplomatic protection and to have the request properly considered. The right to request entailed a corresponding duty to address the request in a manner consistent with the Final Constitution. In his treatment of the issue, Chaskalson CJ noted that the FC s 1 value of equality was part of FC s 3 and the FC s 1 values of advancing human rights and freedoms should inform the way government responded to such a request.)

[2] The High Court, in S v Damoyi, held that::

> It is quite evident that in terms of ss 6(2) and (4) of the Constitution both the national and the provincial governments have a constitutional duty to realise the objective envisaged in the aforementioned subsections, not only as regards the affairs of either the national and provincial governments but also as regards the conduct of court proceedings. Whether both the national and the provincial governments have the political will to do so remains to be seen.

2004 (2) SA 564 (C)('Damoyi') at para 8.

[3] But see Currie 'Official Languages and Language Rights' (supra) at §65.5 (Currie contends that FC s 6 does not create justiciable rights and that these provisions should be read as non-justiciable directives. On this view, the detailed language provisions appear to be mere symbols of the rainbow nation.)

[4] The practicalities of delivering on the guarantee in FC s 6 of some level of parity with regards to the 11 official languages and the 11 other languages mentioned in this section have led some to take the view that there should just be one language of record in court proceedings. The court in Damoyi noted that other courts were split on whether it was contrary to the democratic values of the Constitution to have English as the language of record to the exclusion of the 10 other languages. See Damoyi (supra) at para 11. Yekiso J sided with the view taken by the High Court S v Matomela. In Matomela Tshabalala J stated:

> In my judgment the best solution is to have one official language for courts . . . All official languages must enjoy parity of esteem and be treated equitably but for practical reasons and for better administration of justice one official language of record will resolve the problem. Such a language should be one which can be understood by all court officials irrespective of mother tongue.

1998 (2) All SA 1, 4 (Ck) (my emphasis). This view is contrary to the view expressed by the court in S v Pienaar. 2000 (2) SACR 143 (NC). See also JJ Malan 'Die Gebruik van Afrikaans vir die Notulering van Hofverrigtinge Gemeet aan die Demokratiese Standaarde' (2003) 28 Tydskrif vir Regswetenskap/Journal for Judicial Science 36 (Argues against making English the sole official languagge of the Courts.). The views in S v Pienaar were based on the practicality of using English and the substantial costs of trying to embrace the other 11 official languages. See also G Devenish A Commentary on the South African Constitution (1998) 40.

14 Co-operative Government & Intergovernmental Relations

Stu Woolman & Theunis Roux

14.1 Introduction 14–1
14.2 Comparative concepts of co-operative government. 14–3
14.3 Co-operative government and the Final Constitution 14–7
(a) The general framework of co-operative government. . . 14–7
(b) FC s 40 14–9
(i) FC s 40(1): Distinctive, interdependent and interrelated 14–9
(ii) FC s 40(2): Parties bound by chapter 3. 14–10
(c) FC s 41. 14–14
(i) FC s 41(1). 14–14
(aa) FC s 41(1)(d): The rule of law 14–15
(bb) FC s 41(1)(e): Respect for institutional integrity. 14–15
(cc) FC s 41(1)(f): Enumerated powers 14–16
(dd) FC s 41(1)(g): Abuse of power 14–16
(ee) FC s 41(1)(h): The duty to avoid litigation . . 14–18
(ii) FC s 41(2). 14–20
(iii) FC s 41(3). 14–23
(iv) FC s 41(4). 14–24
14.4 Intergovernmental relations 14–24
(a) Defining intergovernmental relations ('IGR'). 14–24
(b) Structures and Statutes for Intergovernmental Relations 14–24
(i) The National Council of Provinces 14–25
(ii) The Intergovernmental Forum ('IGF') and the President's Co-ordinating Committee ('PCC') 14–26

(iii) Intergovernmental Relation Committees of Ministers and Members of Executive Councils ('MINMECs') 14–27
(iv) Forum for South African Directors–General ('FOSAD') 14–28
(v) Fiscal and Financial Commision 14–28
(vi) The Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act 14–29
(vii) The Division of Revenue Act and the Explanatory Memorandum for the Division of Revenue 14–29
(viii) The Public Financial Management Act 14–30
(ix) The Provincial Tax Regulation Process Act 14–30
(x) The Borrowing Powers of Provincial Government Act 14–30
(xi) Medium Term Budget Policy Statement (MTBPS) and Medium Term Expenditure Framework (MTEF) 14–31
(xii) Provincial intervention in local government 14–31
(c) An Assessment of Intergovernmental Relations and Co-operative Government by the State and Civil Society . . . 14–32
14.5 The Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act 13 of 2005 14–34
(a) The Purpose of the Act 14–34
(b) A Reasonable Period for Promulgation of the IGFRA? 14–35
(c) How the IGRFA Works 14–36
(i) The Main Forums for Intergovernmental Cooperation and Coordination 14–36
(ii) Implementation Protocols 14–35
(iii) Settlement of Intergovernmental Disputes 14–39
(d) What Disputes the IGFRA Does Not Cover 14–41
(i) Conflicts between National Legislation and Provincial Legislation 14–41
(ii) Intra-governmental Disputes between Provincial Departments 14–42
(aa) The Problem 14–42
(bb) Executive Authority of Provinces 14–47
(cc) A Lack of Departmental Personality 14–48
(dd) Finding a Legal Nexus 14–50
(ee) Using The IGRFA as a Guide to Intra-Governmental Disputes 14–51
(ff) Dispute Settlement 14–51
(gg) Enforcement 14–52
(e) Practical Problems with the IGFRA: Premiers' Intergovernmental Forums and the District Intergovernmental Forums 14–52
(f) ANC Dominance and the Efficacy of the IGFRA . . . 14–54

14.1 INTRODUCTION*

Prior to 1994, co-operative government and intergovernmental relations were largely foreign terms in the South African political lexicon. While different levels of government existed, all meaningful decision-making processes were concentrated in the national government.

The MPNF at Kempton Park apparently gave little consideration to the processes necessary to facilitate intergovernmental relations. According to De Villiers,[1] the consequent lacuna in the Interim Constitution[2] reflects: (a) a lack of familiarity with how other multi-tiered dispensations operate; and (b) a politically charged debate between the ANC and NP on the relative merits of federal and unitary systems.[3]

The absence of express rules, procedures and systems for intergovernmental co-operation in the Interim Constitution did not preclude various government departments from developing both vertical and horizontal channels of communication.[4] These ad hoc rules and practices, as well as the pragmatism of government actors necessitated by the allocation of concurrent powers under the Interim Constitution, had a knock-on effect with respect to the drafting of the Final Constitution.[5]

The Constitutional Assembly — in FC ss 40 and 41 — laid out principles designed to promote co-ordination, rather than competition, between the various tiers of government and organs of state. To emphasize this shift in relations, FC ss 40 and 41 employ the term 'sphere' rather than 'level'. Sphere intimates differ-

---

* The authors would like to thank Hannah Woolaver and Bernard Bekink for their contributions to this chapter. We have also benefited from the insight and assistance of Nico Steytler and Christina Murray.

[1] See B De Villiers 'Intergovernmental Relations in South Africa' (1997) 12 SAPL 198 ('IGR in SA').

[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, Act 200 of 1993('IC' or 'Interim Constitution').

[3] Advocates of a unitary state believed that provincial and local governments should be largely subordinate to the national government. Federalists argued that each level of government should be allocated specified and entrenched powers and that any fundamental encroachment or limitation of such powers functions be deemed unconstitutional. See B De Villiers 'Intergovernmental Relations: The Duty to Co-operate — A German Perspective' (1994) 9 SAPL/PR 430 ('A German Perspective'). See also B De Villiers 'Intergovernmental Relations: A Constitutional Framework' in B De Villiers (ed) The Birth of a Constitution (1994); N Haysom 'The Origins of Co-operative Government: The "Federal" Debates in the Constitution-making Process' in N Levy & C Tapscott (eds) Intergovernmental Relations in South Africa: The Challenges of Co-operative Government (2001) 43, 45 (The negotiators shelved heated but unenlightening debates over taxonomy and 'embark[ed] on an inquiry into an appropriate system of constitutional government whose objective would be to promote nothing other than good and effective government'); C Murray & R Simeon 'Multilevel Governance in South Africa: An Interim Report' (unpublished paper) as quoted in K McLean 'Housing Provision through Co-operative Government' (2002)(Unpublished manuscript on file with authors) 15 ('ANC leaders came to see advantages in effective regional governments both for the delivery of services and for the empowerment of citizens. Their exposure to foreign models of federalism, especially in Germany, convinced them that regional governments could be combined with strong leadership from the centre'); N Haysom 'Federal Features of the Final Constitution' in P Andrews & S Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 504.

[4] For a discussion of this type of legislation in the context of pre-1996 intergovernmental relations, see Ex Parte Speaker of the National Assembly: In Re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the National Education Policy Bill 83 of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC)('National Education Policy').

[5] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('FC' or 'Final Constitution').

ent sets of responsibilities. (By implication, level denotes a hierarchy in structures of government). But that is as far as the break with the old order goes. Despite the emphasis on 'spheres' with particular, and sometimes exclusive, competencies, the Constitutional Assembly did not create a strong federal state.[1] As other chapters in this work indicate,[2] the national government retains both the power of the purse and the ability to override provincial and local government decisions. Moreover, the current dominance of the ANC means that technically independent political actors will be subject to the internal party discipline of that organization.[3] Of course, if the 2007 ANC Polokwane Conference and the 2009 elections have taught us anything, then it is that we operate in a complex, fluid and unpredictable political environment. The 2007 ANC Polokwane Conference split closely along provincial lines — with Zuma ousting Mbeki. (However the actual margin was greater when one takes into account the support of the ANC Women's League and the ANC Youth League for Zuma). Subsequent events such as the formation of a new (non-minority) party (the Congress of the People (COPE)), sustained period of mass action, demonstrations and strikes by unions (precipitated by a clear strategy of destabilization by COSATU, the SACP and their affiliates), and inevitably clear divisions within the governing faction of the ANC (between moderate populists, on the one hand, and leftists, from COSATU and the SACP, on the other) suggest that internal ANC politics are anything but settled. The 2009 electoral triumph of the Democratic Alliance in the Western Cape — and its cotemporaneous control of the Cape Town metropole — will also test national government, provincial government and municipal relations. The frission between these three levels of government will be keenly felt around spending issues. As we shall see, the national government's current constitutional and statutory control over provincial revenue, taxation and spending allows it to exercise extremely tight control (through conditional grants) over provincial and local imperatives. The independence of spheres of government secured by the Final Constitution ensures that provincial and municipal officials, with sufficient political will, can take decisions that simultaneously oppose current national policy and influence its future formulation.[4]

[1] De Villiers suggests that multi-tiered levels of government ensure greater public participation in societies riven by ethnic, religious or racial strife. See De Villiers 'A German Perspective' (supra) at 430-431.

[2] See, eg, V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 15; S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 17.

[3] N Steytler 'One Party Dominance & the Functioning of South Africa's Decentralized System of Government in R Kubek (ed) Political Parties and Federalism (2004) 159.

[4] For example, the resistance of the Gauteng provincial government to national government policy regarding the distribution of the anti-retroviral drug Nevirapine to prevent mother-to-child transmission of HIV/AIDS led to a shift in national policy. See Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign (No 2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 ('TAC'). As Nico Steytler and Yonathan Fessha note, challenges to the hierarchical statutory arrangements will become more pronounced as greater party pluralism becomes the norm in local, provincial and national government. See N Steytler & Y Fessha 'Provincial Intergovernmental Forums: A Preliminary Assessment of Institutional Compliance' (2006) (available at www.cage.org.za).

14.2 Comparative Concepts of Co-operative Government

Comparative constitutional law throws up a whole range of models of co-operative governance. So-called divided federal states are generally marked by a clear division of functions between the national government and provincial governments, independent taxing powers for regions or provinces, and few formal mechanisms of co-operation between the various levels of government. Separate levels of government must negotiate agreement on issues of mutual concern. The United States,[1] Canada,[2]

[1] A good example of a very weak divided federal dispensation was the post-revolutionary war government of the United States. The Articles of Confederation granted the federal government little more than the power to defend the thirteen states against foreign enemies. The federal government lacked an executive, a judiciary and the power of the purse. Nor did it possess any authority to intervene or to override the 13 sets of laws contrived by the founding States. The carefully calibrated system of shared and divided power crafted by the Constitutional Convention in 1787 was largely an answer to problems of co-ordination that threatened the very existence of the new nation. The federal government possessed only those powers articulated by the US Constitution. Article I, Section 8. All other powers vested in the states that made up the union. Tenth Amendment. Two hundred years later, the constitutionally recognized power of US federal government is such that there are relatively few areas of legislative and executive competence that are not at least shared by federal, state and local authorities. However, sharing competence does not mean coordinated action. Coordinated action is generally a function of mediation and not institutional arrangement.

The US is not without institutional arrangements designed to ensure that the national government takes cognisance of regional and local concerns. One house of Congress, the Senate, is made up of representatives from each of the 50 states. The other house, the House of Representatives, is made up of representatives from generally smaller constituencies — read local communities — from each of the 50 states. As a result, regional and local concerns feature prominently in national debate. See Garcia v San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority 469 US 528, 550-551, 105 SCt 1005 (1985) ('[T]he principle means chosen by the Framers to ensure the role of the States in the federal system lies in the structure of the Federal Government itself. It is no novelty to observe that the composition of the Federal Government was designed in large part to protect the States from overreaching by the Congress.') Indeed, political careers at the national level are often measured by the ability of representatives to bring home the 'pork' — that is, to ensure that local or regional communities benefit from national government largesse. See L Tribe 'Model I: The Model of Separated and Divided Powers' American Constitutional Law (3rd Edition, Volume I, 2000) 118 — 206.

[2] See P Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (4th Edition, Volume I, 2001) 5–43–5–45. Hogg describes the Canadian system as one of 'co-operative federalism'. He notes that while the 'formal structure of the Constitution carries a suggestion of eleven legislative bodies each confined to its own jurisdiction, and each acting independently of the others . . . in many fields, effective policies require the joint, or at least complementary, action of more than one legislative body. . . . [T]he essence of co-operative federalism is a network of relationships between the executives of central and regional government. Through these relationships, mechanisms are developed, especially fiscal mechanisms, which allow a continuous redistribution of powers and resources without recourse to the courts or the amending process. The area where cooperative federalism has been most dominant is in the federal-provincial financial arrangements. At any given time, there are over 150 organizations, conferences and committees involved in intergovernmental liaison, indicating a vast array of consultative organisms within the Canadian federation.'

Hogg's description of the Canadian system sounds remarkably similar to the South African model. An architect of the South African system, Firoz Cachalia, has described the system as one of 'co-operative federalism'. See De Villiers 'IGR in SA' (supra) at 199. See also Report of the Commission of Inquiry into Constitutional Problems ('Tremblay Report') (1956, Volume II) 97–131 (Discussion of the nature and the goals of the Canadian federal state.)

Australia,[1] India,[2] Brazil[3]

[1] See, generally, T Blacksmith & G Williams Australian Constitutional Law and Theory (2nd Edition, 1998) 213–244; Constitutional Commission Final Report of the Constitutional Commission (1988) 53–54 ('[T]he minimum essential features of a federal system as it has come to be understood in Australia are a high degree of autonomy for the government institutions of the Commonwealth and the States, a division of power between these organizations, and a judicial umpire.' The Constitution protects the States from discrimination through taxation, duties, tariffs or regulation of trade, commerce or revenue by the Commonwealth. Likewise, it ensures that citizens of one State are not discriminated against by another. Finally, the equal representation of the States in the Commonwealth Senate ensures a certain even-handedness in the formation of national government policy.) See also 'Australia's System of Government' Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade (2004) http://www.dfat.gov.au. Much like the United States, Australia's federal government powers are enumerated. Sections 51 and 52 of the Australian Constitution. The states' plenary powers find their source in s 107. See R Watts 'Intergovernmental Councils in Federations' in Constructive and Co-operative Federalism? A Series of Commentaries on the Council of the Federation (2003). Watts notes that Australia, like South Africa, combines federal and parliamentary institutions. While intergovernmental relations are not expressly provided for in the Constitution, Australia has established a number of major formal intergovernmental councils. The Council of Australian Governments (COAG) is Australia's primary intergovernmental institution. COAG consists of the Prime Minister, all the State Premiers and Territory Chief Ministers, and the President of the Australian Local Government Association. The 30-odd intergovernmental ministerial councils charged with various sectoral responsibilities make even more important contributions to IGR. Several of these councils have decision-making mandates assigned by legislation. This assigned authority — along with articulated deliberative and voting processes — makes them genuine intergovernmental co-decision mechanisms. They are quite similar in this respect to South Africa's MINMECs. See § 14.4*(d)* infra. For more on IGR in Australia, see DM Brown Market Rules, Economic Union Reform and Intergovernmental Policy-Making in Australia and Canada (2002) 162, 204-11, 226, 259 – 262; R Wilkins & C Saunders 'Intergovernmental Relations in Australia' in P Meekison (ed) Intergovernmental Relations in Federal Countries (2002) 17-23.

[2] India's Constitution provides expressly for the functional interdependence of various tiers of government. Article 263 allows for the creation of an Inter-State Council (ISC) designed to harmonize federal and state policies. (Despite this constitutional dictate, the ISC only came into being in 1990. The delay, justified in part by a desire to develop a set of best practices for federal-state relations, sheds at least some light on the South African government's delay in bringing into being IGR dispute resolution legislation in terms of FC s 41(2).) The National Development Council, created in 1952, is the setting for intergovernmental debate about Union five-year plans. The Finance Commissions provided for by Article 280 governs constitutionally mandated transfers between Union and State governments. Much like the South African Constitution, the Indian Constitution assigns government competencies according to a Union list, a State list and a Concurrent list. Article 246, Schedule VII, Lists I, II, III. The Union's list of powers embraces such standard national responsibilities as defence, foreign affairs, banking, currency control, taxes and levies. The State list contains such competencies as public order and police, local government, public health, education and state taxes. However, the Union's legislative powers may pre-empt state authority with respect to matters enumerated in the Union and concurrent list of competences. The Union government may also intervene directly in the affairs of the states. Subject to a two-thirds majority of the Council of States (a body similar in function to South Africa's National Council of Provinces), the Union may declare a state of emergency and appropriate the power to legislate with respect to matters covered by the State list. Article 249. All state governors are appointed by the President of the Union. As a result, the federal government retains oversight powers vis-à-vis the affairs of any given state. See HM Seervai 'Federalism in India' Constitutional Law of India (4th Edition, Volume 1, 1991) 281–303.

[3] See C Souza Constitutional Engineering in Brazil (1997). According to the 1988 Brazilian Constitution, the three tiers of government (federal, state and local) have both distinct and concurrent competencies. To get a sense of the relative power of each tier, Souza looks at both the fiscal and expenditure responsibilities of each tier. Ibid at 37-53. The federal government retains the lion's share of responsibility for taxation: through income tax, large fortunes tax, import/export duties, rural property and industrial products taxes. States possess the ability to tax incomes, inheritances, capital gains and motor vehicles as well as to create value-added tax. Local governments enjoy the right to tax property, services and fuel. Interestingly, once the distribution of fiscal revenue occurs, the federal government and Switzerland[1] are good contemporary examples of divided federal states. So-called integrated federal states generally provide for the exercise of both exclusive and concurrent powers by different levels of government and develop procedures designed to enhance co-operation between levels and organs of state. The national and sub-national governmental structures of Germany have been quite consciously designed to co-operate with each other.[2] South Africa's system replicates many of the best practices of the German system.

receives but 36.5% of the total. States receive 40.7% and local governments 22.8%. With respect to areas of expenditure, the federal government exercises authority over such expected fields as defence, international trade currency, national highways, postal services, federal police, social security and water. The federal, state and local government share competence over health, welfare and public assistance, culture and education, housing and sanitation, poverty and social marginalization, traffic safety and tourism. The states have residual powers over areas not assigned to the federal or municipal levels by the constitution. Local governments possess exclusive competence over local transport, primary schooling and land use. Despite the constitutionally prescribed competencies of the states, the Brazilian federal government can override state legislation in a set of prescribed circumstances (quite similar to those found in the FC in s 44(2)): (1) where the national interest is threatened, (2) where there is extreme public disorder or (3) when a state's finances are seriously in arrears. Such interventions must be certified by the Brazilian Supreme Court. In general, such an override will only take place after mediation between the federal government and the state government involved has failed. IGR in Brazil is largely informal. It relies on extensive political lobbying and brokered deals between the different tiers of government. While much of the lobbying flows upwards from municipal councillors and mayors to state legislatures and from state officials to congressmen, senators, federal ministers and the president, the 'federal government [post-1988] cannot take decisions about national issues without negotiating with the sub-national spheres.' Ibid at 172.

[1] Switzerland has a unique federal structure. The Federal Council is a collegial executive elected by the federal legislature. It sits for a fixed term and is composed of seven councillors. This structure is mirrored in cantonal political arrangements. Two things set this arrangement apart: (1) the guaranteed representation of the four major political parties in the Federal Council; (2) the possibility of dual membership in the cantonal and federal legislatures; and (3) a constitutional provision that potentially subjects all federal legislation to challenge by referendum. As a result of these unique features, Swiss politics reflects both a high degree of co-operation and a high degree of cantonal autonomy. Provision is made for cantonal participation in decision-making processes at the federal level with respect to federal legislation (Article 45(1)) and foreign policy (Article 55), while inter-cantonal co-operation is promoted through treaties, common organizations and institutions (Article 48). Federal Constitution of the Swiss Confederation, 1999. See JF Aubert & E Griesel 'The Swiss Federal Constitution' in F Dessemontet & T Ansay (eds) Introduction to Swiss Law (1995) 15–26.

[2] See De Villiers 'A German Perspective' (supra) at 432 fn 6 (Co-operative federalism is described as follows: '(i) horizontal and vertical co-operation between the various levels of government; (ii) bilateral and multilateral co-operation; (iii) the involvement of the legislative, executive and judicial branches of government; (iv) a combination of voluntary and obligatory co-operation'). The partnership between the German national government (Bund) and the various regions (Länder) is based on the principle of federal trust (Bundestreue). According to the German Constitutional Court, Bundestreue is a right enforceable by both the national and regional governments. See B Verf GE 1, 300. See also B Verf GE 12, 205, 256. That said, there is no exact checklist to measure compliance with the principle of Bundestreue. It is a constitutional norm given content by the demands of the specific circumstances with which the court is confronted. See De Villiers 'A German Perspective' (supra) at 432.

The principle of Bundestreue has informed South Africa's commitment to co-operative government and intergovernmental relations. However, notwithstanding the many shared elements of an integrated model, the South African national government retains a dominant position in intergovernmental relations. The South African model is far more centralised in comparison with its German counterpart. For more on German co-operative governance, see D Kommers The Constitutional Jurisprudence of the Federal Republic of Germany (1989) 78–92; D Currie The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (1994) 77–80; B De Villiers 'Bundestreue: The Soul of an Inter-governmental Partnership' Konrad Adenauer — Stiftung Occasional Papers (March 1995); B De Villiers 'Foreign Relations and the Provinces — International

Three cautionary notes are in order. First, the vast majority of nations are unitary, not federal. The concept of 'co-operative governance' has meaningful application in the fewer than 50 nations that may be properly described as federal. Second, taxonomy is often misleading. Distinctions between divided and integrated federal states obscure what is truly interesting: the conventions and the institutions that make a federal system work. Third, the Final Constitution creates space for two competing forms of federalism. Each form of federalism reflects a different conception of intergovernmental relations (IGR) and cooperative governance. As Ronald Watts and Nico Steytler note, the first form of integrated South African federalist state contemplated by the Final Constitution — call it cooperative IGR — assumes relative parity of power between the national government and our subnational constituents (the provinces and the municipalities.)[1] The second form of integrated South African federalist state contemplated by the Final Constitution — call it coercive IGR — reflects a hierarchical distribution of power: national government largely dominates the nation's subnational constituent parts.[2] As we shall see, the Constitutional Court's initial gloss on Chapter 3 suggests a cooperative form of IGR and relative parity between the country's three spheres of government. However, several important pieces of legislation — the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act 13 of 2005, the Provincial Tax Regulation Process Act 53 of 2001, the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act 97 of 1997, and the annual Division of Revenue Act (as well as many complicated constitutional provisions that determine the parameters of provincial and local fiscal autonomy) concentrate political power in our national government. The marriage of political culture — ANC dominance — to political structures that favour the national government — and ANC dominance — underwrite Watt and Steytler's contention that we currently operate with an integrated federal state that employs a coercive form of IGR and cooperative government.[3]

Experience' (1996) 11 SAPL/PR 204; B De Villiers 'Local-Provincial Intergovernmental Relations: A Comparative Analysis' (1997) 12 SAPL/PR 469. To show up the limits of these conceptual categories, it is worth noting that an exemplar of the divided model, the US, has much stronger regional and local representation at the national level than does South Africa.

[1] N Steytler 'Cooperative and Coercive Models of Intergovernmental Relations: A South African Case Study' in Intergovernmental Relations: A Festhschrift for Ronald Watts (forthcoming, 2009, on file with author); R Watts Intergovernmental Relations: A Report for the Department of Constitutional Development and Provincial Affairs (1999).

[2] In 1997, Ronald Watts contended that the Final Constitution 'represents an innovative hybrid combining some federal features with some constitutionally decentralized unitary features'. R Watts Federalism: The Canadian Experience: Theory and Practice Volume 2 (1997) 2. See also N Steytler 'One Party Dominance and the Functioning of South Africa's Decentralised System of Government' in Rudolf Hrbek (ed) Political Parties and Federalism (2004) 159.

[3] R Watts 'Intergovernmental Relations: Conceptual Issues' N Levy and C Tapscott (eds) Intergovernmental Relations in South Africa: The Challenges of Co-operative Government (2001) 22; C Leuprecht & H Lazar, 'From Multilevel to "Multi-order' Governance?" Spheres of Governance: Comparative Studies of Cities in Multilevel Governance Systems' in H Lazar & C Leuprecht (2007) 1. Steytler writes: 'While the object of providing "coherent government" may seem a neutral goal, the coherence is, however, premised on the "realisation of national priorities"... Given that the nature and extent of these [provincial and municipal] services are prescribed in national policies and legislation, the focus then shifts to [the] "monitoring implementation" of [national] policy and legislation' and not the coordination of varying policy initiatives. N Steytler 'Cooperative and Coercive Models of Intergovernmental Relations' (supra) at 7. Steytler and Watt's analyses carry more than a whiff of disappointment — as if things might have

14.3 Co-operative Government and the Final Constitution

(a) The general framework of co-operative government

Co-operative governance is reflected in any number of different ways in the Final Constitution. FC ss 40 and 41's use of the terms 'spheres' reflects a linguistic turn away from a hierarchal relationship between national, provincial and local government. All spheres of government, be they national, provincial or local, must co-operate vertically and horizontally. For example, municipalities must not only co-operate with one another but also with provincial governments and the national government.[1] Finally, FC ss 40 and 41 require that different spheres of government and different organs of state should exhaust all political means of dispute resolution before turning to the courts.[2] been different. But given 15 years of political dominance by the ANC and its longstanding resistance to fully devolved federalism, it is hard to imagine how things might have turned out otherwise.

---

[1] See G Devenish A Commentary on the South African Constitution (1998) 109.

[2] The constitutional framework for co-operative government is not exhausted by the provisions of FC ss 40 and 41.

FC Schedules 4 and 5 specifically provide for concurrent and exclusive legislative competencies for the national and provincial governments. See V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 15. Although the Interim Constitution made no express reference to co-operative government, the Constitutional Court appeared to recognize the need for just such a system. See Ex Parte of the National Assembly: In Re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the National Education Policy Bill 83 of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC) at para 34. (A national education policy bill that called for the (executive) co-operation between the provinces and the national government was the subject of abstract review. The Court wrote: 'Where two legislatures have concurrent powers to make laws in respect of the same functional areas, the only reasonable way in which these powers can be implemented is through co-operation.' The Court held that Parliament was entitled to make provisions for such co-operation of matters set out in IC schedule 6 and that the objection to such provisions on the grounds that they encroached upon the executive competence of the provinces could not be sustained.) See also Fedsure Life Assurance v Greater Johannesburg TMC 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)('Fedsure')(Court confirmed that the Interim Constitution recognized three distinct, but interdependent, levels of government: namely national, provincial and local); Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 290 ('First Certification Judgement') ('The Constitutional Court held that Intergovernmental co-operation is implicit in any system where powers have been allocated concurrently to different levels of government and is consistent with the requirement of CP XX that national unity be recognised and promoted. The mere fact that the NT has made explicit what would otherwise have been implicit cannot in itself be said to constitute a failure to promote or recognise the need for legitimate provincial autonomy.)

Other provisions crosshatch national, provincial and municipal powers. FC ss 146 and 44 delineate the desiderata for national override of provincial legislative prerogatives. FC s 100 sets out the guidelines for national executive supervision and intervention in provincial administrative affairs. Such a supervisory role remains subject to approval, to review and to termination by the National Council of Provinces. The NCOP, as a general matter, represents provincial interests in the national legislature. See FC s 42(4). FC s 125 (3) requires that national government must assist the provinces 'by legislative or other measures to develop the administrative capacity required for the effective exercise' of their functions, powers and duties. National and provincial governments have similar obligations to assist local governments throughout the country. See FC s 154. FC s 238 enables any organ of state in a sphere of government to delegate executive functions from one organ of state to another, and to perform any function for any other organ of state. Parliament may also delegate legislative powers to governments in other spheres, except the power to amend the Constitution. See FC s 44. Provincial legislatures may assign any legislative power to a municipality. See FC s 104. A member of cabinet may assign to a member of a provincial executive council or municipality a power or a function that must be performed in terms of an act of parliament. See FC s 99. A member of the executive council of a province (MEC) may assign any power (executive) to a municipality. See FC s 126.

The Chapter 3 jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court suggests that this 'new philosophy' of co-operative government is governed by two basic principles.[1] First, one sphere of government or one organ of state may not use its powers in such a way as to undermine the effective functioning of another sphere or organ of state. Second, the actual integrity of each sphere of government and organ of state must be understood in light of the powers and the purpose of that entity. In short, while the political framework created by the Final Constitution demands that mutual respect must be paid, a sphere of government or an organ of state may be entitled to determine the objectives of another sphere of government or an organ of state and to dictate the means by which those objectives are achieved.[2]

It is worth noting at the outset that the extant case law on co-operative government can appear a bit 'soft'. The highly qualified nature of many of the Constitutional Court's holdings in this area is a function of the textual, political and procedural environment. First the Court has been regularly forced to contract the imprecise drafting of FC ss 40 and 41. When faced with the choice of offering broad readings that would enable the various subsections in FC ss 40 and 41 to cohere, or narrower, more finely grained readings of individual subsections that would create doctrinal dissonance, the Court generally chooses the former route. Second, the principles of co-operative government are designed to facilitate political solutions to conflicts between different branches of government. The Court has rightly shied away from using Chapter 3 to impose judicial solutions on

[1] See Ex parte President of the Republic of South Africa: in re Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC); 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Liquor Bill') at para 40 (Chapter 3 'introduced a 'new philosophy' to the Constitution, namely that of co-operative government and its attendant obligations. In terms of that philosophy, all spheres of government are obliged in terms of [FC] s 40(2) to observe and adhere to the principles of co-operative government set out in chap 3 of the Constitution.') See also First Certification Judgment (supra) at paras 287-288.

[2] See Western Cape Provincial Government: In re DVB Behuising (Pty) Ltd v North West Provincial Government 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347 (CC) ('DVB Behuising')(Court held that the functional areas of concurrent legislative authority had to be interpreted in a manner which would enable the national parliament and the provincial legislatures to exercise their respective legislative powers fully and effectively); Premier, Western Cape v President of the Republic of South Africa 1999 (3) SA 657 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 382 (CC) ('Premier, WC v President') at paras 54-55, 83 (Court wrote that 'the provisions of chapter 3 of the Constitution are designed to ensure that in fields of common endeavour the different spheres of government co-operate with each other to secure the implementation of legislation in which they all have a common interest. Co-operation is of particular importance in the field of concurrent law-making and implementation of laws.' As a result, a procedure requiring the President and the Premier to seek agreement concerning the legality of a proposed restructuring of the public service within a provincial administration is entirely consistent with the system of co-operative government prescribed by the Constitution); National Educational Policy Bill (supra) at para 34 (Court held that the principles of co-operative government must be understood such that the powers assigned to an organ of state for one purpose — read education — may not be employed by the organ of state for another.) But see Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC); 2000 (11) BCLR 1360 (CC) ('Grootboom') at paras 39–40 ('[A] co-ordinated State housing program must be a comprehensive one determined by all three spheres of government in consultation with each other. But the national sphere of government must ensure responsibility for ensuring that laws, policies, programs and strategies are adequate to meet the State's s 26 obligations'); Member of the Executive Council for Local Government, Mpumalanga v Independent Municipal and Allied Trade Unions and Others 2002 (1) SA 76 (SCA)(National and provincial governments have the responsibility to ensure that municipalities function effectively and to intervene in their affairs if necessary.)

quintessentially political problems. Third, principles of co-operative government are rarely dispositive of a matter. In the main, they engage a host of preliminary issues that determine whether or not a matter ought to be before a court at all. The flexibility of many of our co-operative government doctrines affords the courts a significant amount of latitude in deciding whether an intrinsically political issue is sufficiently ripe for judicial intervention. Finally, the promulgation of the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act 13 of 2005 has largely, but not entirely, displaced the court's role in articulating rules designed to govern the better part of intergovernmental disputes.

(b) FC s 40

> 40 (1) In the Republic, government is constituted as national, provincial and local spheres of government, which are distinctive, interdependent and interrelated.
> (2) All spheres of government must observe and adhere to the principles in this chapter and must conduct their activities within the parameters that the chapter provides.

(i) FC s 40(1): Distinctive, interdependent and interrelated

The phrase 'distinctive, interdependent and interrelated' seems tailor-made for conceptual confusion. And yet, despite the inapt wording, the courts have managed to make sense of it.

The phrase stands for the following propositions. 'Interdependent' and 'interrelated' must be understood in light of FC s 1's provision that South Africa is 'one sovereign, democratic state'.[1] (Emphasis added). While the different spheres of government have distinct responsibilities, they must work together in order for the South African government as a whole to fulfill its constitutional mandate.[2] Despite textual intimations that the spheres are equal, there is a clear hierarchy

[1] See Premier, WC v President (supra) at para 50 ('Distinctiveness lies in the provision made for elected governments at national, provincial and local levels. The interdependence and interrelatedness flow from the founding provision that South Africa is 'one sovereign, democratic State', and a constitutional structure which makes provision for framework provisions to be set by the national sphere of government.')

[2] See Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality 2001 (3) SA 925 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC)(*'IEC v Langeb*erg*')* at para 26 ('All the spheres are interdependent and interrelated in the sense that the functional areas allocated to each sphere cannot be seen in isolation of each other. They are all interrelated. None of these spheres of government nor any of the governments within each sphere have any independence from each other. Their interrelatedness and interdependence is such that they must ensure that, while they do not tread on each other's toes, they understand that all of them perform governmental functions for the benefit of the people of the country as a whole. Sections 40 and 41 were designed in an effort to achieve this result'); Grootboom (supra) at paras 39–40 ('[A] co-ordinated State housing program must be a comprehensive one determined by all three spheres of government in consultation with each other as contemplated by chapter 3 of the Constitution. . . . Each sphere of government must accept responsibility for the implementation of particular parts of the program, but the national sphere of government must accept responsibility for ensuring that laws, policies, programs and strategies are adequate to meet the State's s 26 obligations.') that runs from national government down to provincial government down to local government.[1]

(ii) FC s 40(2): Parties bound by Chapter 3

Another potential source of conceptual confusion is FC s 40(2). It reads, in pertinent part: 'All spheres of government must observe and adhere to the principles in this chapter.' FC s 41(1), however, applies to 'all spheres of government and all organs of state.' To further complicate matters, FC s 41(3), uses the term 'organ of state' without reference to spheres of government. The text thereby raises thorny questions as to how, when and which Chapter 3 obligations apply to a given dispute between state institutions. As we shall see, it is not enough to parrot the text and simply say that Chapter 3's obligations are sometimes imposed solely on spheres of government, sometimes on both spheres of government and organs of state, and sometimes on organs of state alone.

One way of reconciling this terminological confusion is to insist that the term 'spheres of government' should be reserved for relations between the different spheres of government (so-called vertical intergovernmental relations). The term 'organs of state within each sphere' could then be used to describe relations within a particular sphere (so-called horizontal intergovernmental relations). The problem with this reading is that at least two of the principles in FC s 41(1) — which purports to bind all spheres of government and all organs of state — do not apply to horizontal intergovernmental relations. They are FC ss 41(1)(e) and 41(1)(g). The absence of any textual support for creating such exceptions gives the lie to this particular attempt to reconcile FC ss 40 and 41.

The courts have given meaningful content to this miasma of terminology. In IEC v Langeberg, the Constitutional Court began by remarking that 'the national sphere of government comprises at least Parliament and the national executive including the President.'[2] Parliament and the national executive were not organs of state as defined in s 239 'because they are neither departments nor administrations within the national sphere of government.'[3] Left unqualified, this dictum might have been read to imply that Parliament and the national executive were not bound by FC s 41(3) since that provision applies only to organs of state.

[1] See Cape Metropolitan Council v Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development & Others 1999 (11) BCLR 1229 (T) ('Cape Metro Council') at para 29 (The High Court wrote that the 'apparent autonomy and independence' of the local government sphere is 'relative and limited by unequivocally expressed constitutional restraints. Its status is, to a large extent, that of a junior partner in the trilogy of spheres which make up the government of the country'); Fedsure (supra) at para 48 (Constitutional Court held that the Interim Constitution recognized three distinct levels of government and that each level of government derived its powers from the IC, but that local government's powers were subject to definition and regulation by either national or provincial governments.) See also Member of the Executive Council for Local Government, Mpumalanga v Independent Municipal and Allied Trade Unions and Others 2002 (1) SA 76 (SCA)(Although FC ss 40 and 41 contemplate distinct spheres of government, the national and provincial governments have the responsibility to ensure that municipalities function effectively and to intervene in their affairs if necessary.)

[2] IEC v Langeberg (supra) at para 25.

[3] Ibid.

In National Gambling Board, the Court held that its remarks in IEC v Langeberg should be construed narrowly, such that 'Parliament, the President and the Cabinet are not organs of state within the meaning of paragraph (a) of the definition [in s 239].'[1] The National Gambling Board Court qualified the dictum in IEC v Langeberg such that Parliament, the President and the Cabinet might be regarded as organs of state in terms of s 239*(b)*. Since none of these state institutions or functionaries was party to National Gambling Board, the Court did not have to decide this point. It did, however, endorse the parties' agreement that the Minister of Trade and Industry and the Premier of KwaZulu-Natal were organs of state as contemplated in s 239*(b)(i)*.[2]

The National Gambling Board Court's gloss on IEC v Langeberg was recently revisited in Uthukela District Municipality v President of the Republic of South Africa.[3] In Uthukela District Municipality, three municipalities sought an order from the Constitutional Court confirming a High Court order directing the President, the national Minister of Finance and the national Minister of Provincial Government — and several other respondents — to pay them their equitable share of national revenue as required by FC ss 214(1)(a) and 227(1)(a). Although the matter had been settled prior to the confirmation hearing, the Court used the hearing as an opportunity both to clarify the extension and the application of the terms used in Chapter 3 and to offer an assessment of the chapter's requirements. Municipalities were expressly identified as 'organs of state in the local sphere of government.'[4] The three respondents — the President, the national Minister of Finance and the national Minister of Provincial Government — were expressly identified as 'organs of state in the national sphere of government.'[5] All parties — as organs of state — were found to be subject to the dispute resolution requirements of FC s 41(3)[6] and 41(1)(h)(vi).[7] Finally, the two sets of organs of state thus identified were found to have failed to make use of the dispute resolution mechanism created by the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act 'for fiscal disputes between organs of State in the national and local spheres.'[8]

---

[1] National Gambling Board v Premier of KwaZulu-Natal & Others 2002 (2) SA 715 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 156 (CC) ('National Gambling Board') at para 21.

[2] Given that National Gambling Board bound provincial premiers in terms of s 239*(b), the President, as head of the national executive, was almost certain to be regarded as an organ of state for the purposes of FC s 239(b)*, and therefore bound by FC s 41(3). Premier, WC v President provided additional support for this proposition. In Premier, WC v President the Constitutional Court assumed exclusive jurisdiction under FC s 167(4)(a) of the Constitution to hear a dispute between a provincial premier and the President. FC s 167(4) provides that '[o]nly the Constitutional Court may — (a) decide disputes between organs of state in the national or provincial sphere concerning the status, powers and functions of any of those organs of state.' The Court's decision to assume jurisdiction was based upon an express finding that the President was an organ of State in the national sphere. Ibid at para 2. It followed that the President would be bound by the general duty in FC s 40(2) to adhere to the principles in Chapter 3, the specific duties attached to these principles in FC s 41(1) as well as the duty to engage in extra-judicial dispute-resolution in FCs 41(3) prior to any litigation.

[3] 2003 (1) SA 678 (CC), 2002 (1) BCLR 1220 (CC)('Uthukela District Municipality').

[4] Ibid at para 18 citing, in support, IEC v Langeberg (supra) at para 19.

[5] Ibid at para 18 citing, in support, National Gambling Board (supra) at paras 19–21.

[6] Ibid at para 19.

[7] Ibid at para 22.

[8] Ibid at paras 20–23.

Despite the Constitutional Court's view that the President and the national Cabinet are organs of state as defined in FC s 239*(b)*,[1] the distinction drawn in FC ss 40 and 41 between spheres of government and organs of state within a particular sphere may still turn out to be significant. If it is decided that Parliament is not an organ of state, the duty imposed by s 41(3) to engage in extra-judicial dispute resolution will not bind the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces and, by extension, provincial legislatures and municipal councils. It seems difficult, at first blush, to believe that the drafters of the Final Constitution intended to immunize these bodies from the dictates of FC s 41(3). However, when interpreting the Intergovernmental Framework Relations Act, the Court in Matatiele held that the Act does not apply to disputes between Parliament and Provincial Legislatures.[2]

The decision in Uthukela District Municipality resolves the issue of whether provincial executive councils are to be treated as organs of state for purposes of FC s 41. Executive Council, WC was only authority for the proposition that a provincial government, represented by its executive council, will be regarded as a sphere of government for the purposes of FC ss 41(1)(e) and (g).[3] It was agnostic as to the status of a provincial executive council as an organ of state. Given that Uthukela District Municipality holds that members of the national cabinet are organs of state for the purposes of FC s 41, it seems unlikely that provincial cabinets would not be similarly bound.

In IEC v Langeberg, the Court suggested, in something of a throwaway line, that '[a]n intergovernmental dispute is a dispute between parties that are part of government in the sense of being either a sphere of government or an organ of State within a sphere of government.'[4] Taken at face value, this dictum might make the distinction between these two types of party irrelevant for the purposes of FC s 41(3). The problem with this remark is that it contradicts the clear wording of the subsection. FC s 41(3) refers only to 'organs of state'.

After Uthukela District Municipality, and the Court's holding that the President and the members of the Cabinet should be regarded as organs of state, the distinction between organs of state and spheres of government begins to look a bit less significant. There is, however, a limit to the effects of this elision. For there is, as yet, no authority for the proposition that the national legislature or provincial

[1] FC s 239*(b)*('In the Constitution, unless the context indicates otherwise, . . . 'organ of state' means (b) any other functionary or institution: (i) exercising a power or performing a function in terms of the Constitution or a provincial constitution; or ii. exercising a public power or performing a public function in terms of any legislation.')

[2] See Matatiele Municipalilty & Others v President of the RSA 2006 (5) SA 47 (CC). The Matatiele Court reads the IGRFA so that disputes between national and provincial legislatures remain governed by other sections of the Final Constitution, primarily FC ss 146-150. It may also be that disputes between legislatures — over the implementation of legislation — invariably become disputes between executives and organs of state. The execution of the will of the legislatures — by the executive or some organ of state — would invariably be subject to the dictates of FC s 41(3) and the IGRFA.

[3] Executive Council, Western Cape v Minister of Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development & Another; Executive Council, KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC)('Executive Council, WC') at paras 29 and 79.

[4] IEC v Langeberg (supra) at para 21.

legislatures are bound by FC s 41(3). Indeed, Matatiele points rather emphatically, the other way.

With those caveats firmly in mind, IEC v Langeberg and National Gambling Board still provide clear authority for two propositions.

First. IEC v Langeberg holds that the Independent Electoral Commission referred to in FC ss 190 and 191 is not 'an organ of State which can be said to be within the national sphere of government.'[1] Three reasons are advanced for this proposition: (1) the Commission is not a department or an administrative agency that is subject to the national executive's co-ordination function in terms of FC s 85(2); (2) the Commission is expressly described in Chapter 9 as being a state institution strengthening 'constitutional democracy' and 'state' is a broader concept than 'national government'; and (3) the Commission is described in FC s 181(2) as 'independent', a description that is incompatible with the notion of 'interdependence' in FC s 40(1).

All three reasons apply equally to the other institutions listed in FC s 181(1): the Public Protector; the Human Rights Commission; the Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities; the Commission for Gender Equality; and the Auditor-General. One can assert, with a certain amount of confidence, that: (a) none of these Chapter 9 institutions is bound to observe the principles in Chapter 3; and (b) a dispute involving any one or more of these institutions is not an intergovernmental dispute for the purposes of FC s 41(3).

Second. Most national and provincial regulatory authorities are organs of state within the national or the provincial spheres of government and are therefore bound by FC ss 40 and 41(1) and (3). In National Gambling Board, the Court endorsed the parties' agreement that the National Gambling Board and the KwaZulu-Natal Gambling Board were organs of state in the national and provincial spheres respectively.[2] Once again, the grounds for this particular finding (that the boards exercise a public power or performed public functions in terms of legislation in one or the other of these spheres) applies to a host of similarly situated regulatory bodies. For example, the dispute between the City of Cape Town and the National Electricity Regulator over the former's power to cross-subsidise the provision of free electricity would probably have been regarded as an intergovernmental dispute to which FC s 41(3) applied. On the other hand, the constitutional status of the Independent Communications Authority (ICASA) is closer to that of the Chapter 9 institutions. Although not mentioned in the list of state institutions strengthening constitutional democracy in FC s 181(1), at least some of ICASA's regulatory powers derive from FC s 192. FC s 192 — part of Chapter 9 — provides for 'an independent authority to regulate broadcasting.'[3] Following IEC v Langeberg, ICASA, as the successor to the IBA, should not be regarded as an organ of state within a particular, 'interdependent' sphere of government.

[1] IEC v Langeberg (supra) at para 27.

[2] National Gambling Board (supra) at paras 19–21.

[3] FC s 192 reads: 'National legislation must establish an independent authority to regulate broadcasting in the public interest, and to ensure fairness and a diversity of views broadly representing South African society.'

(c) FC s 41

Principles of co-operative government and intergovernmental relations:

(1) All spheres of government and all organs of state within each sphere must:
- (a) preserve the peace, national unity and the indivisibility of the Republic;
- (b) secure the well-being of the people of the Republic;
- (c) provide effective, transparent, accountable and coherent government for the Republic as a whole;
- (d) be loyal to the Constitution, the Republic and its people;
- (e) respect the constitutional status, institutions, powers and functions of government in the other spheres;
- (f) not assume any power or function except those conferred on them in terms of the Constitution;
- (g) exercise their powers and perform their functions in a manner that does not encroach on the geographical, functional or institutional integrity of government in another sphere; and
- (h) co-operate with one another in mutual trust and good faith by:
- (i) fostering friendly relations;
  - (ii) assisting and supporting one another;
  - (iii) informing one another of, and consulting one another on, matters of common interest;
  - (iv) co-ordinating their actions and legislation with one another;
  - (v) adhering to agreed procedures; and
  - (vi) avoiding legal proceedings against one another.

(2) An Act of Parliament must
- (a) establish or provide for structures and institutions to promote and facilitate intergovernmental relations; and
- (b) provide for appropriate mechanisms and procedures to facilitate settlement of intergovernmental disputes.

(3) An organ of state involved in an intergovernmental dispute must make every reasonable effort to settle the dispute by means of mechanisms and procedures provided for that purpose, and must exhaust all other remedies before it approaches a court to resolve the dispute.

(4) If a court is not satisfied that the requirements of subsection (3) have been met, it may refer a dispute back to the organs of state involved.

(i) FC s 41(1)

The principles set out in FC s 41(1) stand for two basic propositions. First, co-operative government does not diminish the autonomy of any given sphere of government.[1] It simply recognizes the place of each within the whole and the need for co-ordination in order to make the whole work.[2] Second,

[1] See, eg, First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 292 (The principles set out in FC s 41 'are not invasive of the autonomy of a province in a system of co-operative government.')

[2] See Van Wyk v Uys NO 2002 (5) SA 92 (C)(Court held that because FC s 41(1) enjoins the central, provincial and local spheres of government to support and assist each other, the MEC for local government could not act mero motu in a case where the municipal council had already taken definite steps to investigate an alleged breach of the code of conduct by councillors. Rather, FC s 41(1) required the provincial MEC to await the outcome of the council's own investigation and take cognisance of the council's recommendations before acting in terms of item 14 of Schedule 1 to the Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000.)

FC ss 41(1)(e), (g) and (h) re-inforce the notion that each sphere of government is distinct.[1]

(aa) FC s 41(1)(d): The rule of law

The majority of cases in which the principles of co-operative government have been invoked have not been disputes between different spheres of government and/or organs of state. The majority of these cases involve private parties suing some arm of the government. As a result, FC s 41(1)(d)'s injunction that 'all spheres of government and all organs of state within each sphere must . . . be loyal to the Constitution, the Republic and its people' has been interpreted much like an adjunct to the Constitution's commitment to the rule of law and the legality principle. For example, the Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape, & Another v Ngxusa & Others Court wrote:

> [W]hen an organ of government invokes legal processes to impede the rightful claims of its citizens, it not only defies [ss 41(1)(d) and 195(1)(e)] of the Constitution, which commands all organs of State to be loyal to the Constitution and requires the public administration to be conducted on the basis that 'people's needs must be responded to'. It also misuses the mechanisms of the law, which it is the responsibility of the courts to safeguard.[2]

It would seem reasonable, then, to read FC s 41(1)(d) — along with FC s 41(1)(b) and FC s 41(1)(c) — as designed to promote fairness in the administration of the state. Indeed, the Hardy Ventures v Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality court wrote that FC s 41(1), when read as a whole, required 'all spheres of government and all organs of state within each sphere' to provide 'effective, transparent, accountable and coherent government.'[3]

(bb) FC s 41(1)(e): Respect for institutional integrity

At least one court has held that this provision can be read to re-inforce the separation of powers doctrine. In Bushbuck Ridge Border Committee v Government of the Northern Province, the High Court held that FC s 41(1)(e) bolstered 'the constitutional separation of powers — in particular the principle that the courts should not usurp the function of the legislature.'[4] How exactly this provision accomplishes this feat is difficult to discern. While it may prevent different spheres of government from violating each other's institutional integrity, the subsection does not refer to the courts, nor are the courts generally thought to be engaged by these principles of co-operative government. They are the arbiters of disputes between spheres of government and organs of state, and not parties to such disputes.

---

[1] See Cape Metro Council (supra) at para 34 (FC ss 41(1)(e), (g) and (h) reinforce the protection afforded to municipalities by FC s 154(1)).

[2] 2001 (4) SA 1184 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1039 (SCA)('Ngxusa').

[3] 2004 (1) SA 199 (T)('Hardy Ventures').

[4] Bushbuck Ridge Border Committee v Government of the Northern Province 1999 (2) BCLR 193, 200-202 (CC).

(cc) FC s 41(1)(f): Enumerated powers

According to the Constitutional Court in Liquor Bill, the chapters following Chapter 3 should be 'read and understood' in light of the subordination of all spheres of government to the requirements of co-operative government.[1] These requirements include the duty imposed by FC s 41(1)(f) 'not to assume any power or function except those conferred on them in terms of the Constitution.' FC s 41(1)(f) is of a piece with FC ss 41(1)(e) and (g). The three subsections remind each sphere of government and every organ of state that the best way to realize co-operative governance is to ensure that all branches do exactly what they are empowered to do — and no more.

(dd) Section 41(1)(g): Abuse of power

FC s 41(1)(g) provides that '[a]ll spheres of government and all organs of state within each sphere must exercise their powers and perform their functions in a manner that does not encroach on the geographical, functional or institutional integrity of government in another sphere.' Because all the intergovernmental disputes that have come before the courts to date have concerned the proper allocation of powers and functions between the different spheres of government, determining the extension of this provision requires some precision. The provision requires one to distinguish between legitimate disputes about the ambit of a particular organ of state or sphere of government's powers, and the constitutionally forbidden encroachment by one organ of state or sphere of government onto the terrain of another.

In Premier, WC v President, the Court articulated this distinction as being one between 'the way power is exercised' and the question 'whether or not a power exists.'[2] In theory, this approach means that FC s 41(1)(g) becomes relevant to the determination of the dispute only once it is established that the powers on which the parties are relying exist. If a particular power does not exist, the dispute must be resolved on the basis that the party concerned is acting unlawfully. Only once it is established that the parties are acting lawfully may the further question arise as to whether any of the parties is exercising its powers in such a way as to 'encroach on the geographical, functional or institutional integrity' of the others. With regard to this question, the Court held that:

> The functional and institutional integrity of the different spheres of government must be determined with due regard to their place in the constitutional order, their powers and functions under the Constitution, and the countervailing powers of other spheres of government.[3]

Unfortunately, this passage blurs the neat distinction between 'the way power is exercised' and 'whether or not a power exists' by implying that the question as to whether FC s 41(1)(g) has been infringed must be answered relationally: that is, by looking at the place of the parties in the co-operative government system, including their respective powers and functions. In practice, this means that the

[1] Liquor Bill (supra) at para 41.
[2] Premier, WC v President (supra) at para 57.
[3] Ibid at para 58.

lawfulness of the exercise of a power and the alleged abuse of that power may not always be as easy to separate as the Court at first indicates. Where it is not crystal clear from the text of the Final Constitution that a sphere of government or an organ actually possesses the power it asserts, the Court's FC s 41(1)(g) doctrine suggests that the more constitutionally dubious thestatus of the asserted power is, the greater is the likelihood that it will be found to have been abused.[1]

In Premier, WC v President,[2] the Constitutional Court was asked to resolve a dispute between the Western Cape provincial government and the national government relating to the constitutional validity of certain amendments to the Public Service Act[3] as introduced by the Public Service Laws Amendment Act.[4] The Court held that the provisions of Chapter 3 of the Final Constitution were designed to ensure that in fields of common endeavour the different spheres of government co-operate with each other to secure the implementation of legislation in which they all have a common interest. In particular, FC s 41(1)(g) was crafted so as to prevent one sphere of government from using its powers in ways that could undermine other spheres of government.[5] In this respect, the national legislature's constitutional power to establish a single public service had to be exercised so as not to encroach on the ability of the provinces to carry out the functions that are constitutionally entrusted to them.[6]

[1] See Cape Metro Council (supra) at para 122 ('Section 41(1)(g) places a limitation or constraint on the manner in which a sphere of government or an organ of State may exercise its powers or perform its functions. It may be interpreted to mean that no interference with, or encroachment upon, the inviolate sphere of activities of another organ of State is to be tolerated. This is consonant with the spirit of co-operation based on mutual trust and good faith, as envisaged in section 41(1)(h). . . [S]ection 41(1)(g) appears to be directed at preventing one sphere of government from undermining others, thereby preventing them from functioning effectively. Such conduct could, indeed, be regarded as an abuse of power. In deciding whether or not there has been conduct constituting an abuse of power, however, all relevant facts and circumstances should be considered. This would include, as the said dictum suggests, the complainant sphere of government's position in the constitutional order or hierarchy and the relative weight of their applicable powers and functions'); Executive Council, WC (supra) at para 80 (Court holds that FC ss 41(1)(e) and (g) 'underscore the significance of recognising the principle of the allocation of powers between national government and the provincial governments. The Constitution therefore sets out limits within which each sphere of government must exercise its constitutional powers. Beyond these limits, conduct becomes unconstitutional.') See also Executive Council, WC (supra) at para 29 ('The Constitution therefore protects the role of local government and places certain constraints upon the powers of Parliament to interfere with local government decisions. It is neither necessary nor desirable to attempt to define these constraints in any detail. It is sufficient to say that the constraints exist, and if an Act of Parliament is inconsistent with such constraints it would to that extent be invalid.')

[2] 1999 (3) SA 657 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 382 (CC).

[3] Proclamation 103 of 1994.

[4] Act 86 of 1998.

[5] Ibid at para 58 ('Although the circumstances in which FC s 41(1)(g) can be invoked to defeat the exercise of a lawful power are not entirely clear, the purpose of the section seems to be to prevent one sphere of government using its powers in ways which would undermine other spheres of government, and prevent them from functioning effectively. The functional and institutional integrity of the different spheres of government must, however, be determined with due regard to their place in the constitutional order, their powers and functions under the Constitution, and the countervailing powers of other spheres of government.')

[6] Premier WC v president (supra) at paras 54–61.

The Premier, WC v President Court further held that a procedure requiring an agreement between the President and the Premier with respect to the legality of a proposed restructuring of the public service within a provincial administration was entirely consistent with the system of co-operative government.[1] The Court held that s 3(3)(b) of the amended Public Service Act, which permitted the Minister to direct that the administration of provincial laws be transferred from a provincial department to a national department or other body, impaired the ability of the executive authority of the province to administer its own laws. Section 3(3)(b) of the amended Act was therefore inconsistent with the Final Constitution to the extent that it empowered the Minister to make the determination without the consent of the Premier.[2]

(ee) FC s 41(1)(h): The duty to avoid litigation

FC s 41(1)(h)(vi) reads, in relevant part, that:

> all spheres of government and all organs of state within each sphere must co-operate with one another in mutual trust and good faith by avoiding legal proceedings against one another.

This principle is reinforced by FC s 41(3). FC s 41(3) provides that:

> An organ of state involved in an intergovernmental dispute must make every reasonable effort to settle the dispute by means of mechanisms and procedures provided for that purpose, and must exhaust all other remedies before it approaches a court to resolve the dispute.

FC s 41(4) provides that '[i]f a court is not satisfied that the requirements of subsection (3) have been met, it may refer a dispute back to the organs of state involved.' The meaning of these provisions has been considered at length in three cases: First Certification Judgment, National Gambling Board, and Uthukela District Municipality.

In First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court held that FC s 41(1)(h)(vi) had to be read together with FC s 41(3).[3] It implied that the latter provision was the primary source of the duty to avoid litigation: FC s 41(3) meant that 'disputes should where possible be resolved at a political level rather than through adversarial litigation.'[4] The inclusion of this provision did not, however, oust the courts' jurisdiction to hear intergovernmental disputes or 'deprive any organ of government of the powers vested in it under [the Final Constitution].'[5]

[1] Premier, WC v President (supra) at para 83. (Procedure requiring the President and the Premier to seek agreement concerning the legality of a proposed restructuring of the public service within a provincial administration cannot be said to invade either the executive power vested in the Premier by the Constitution, or the functional or institutional integrity of provincial governments.')

[2] Ibid at para 99.

[3] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 291.

[4] Ibid. Although the Langeberg Court was not asked to decide on the relationship between FC s 41(1)(h)(vi) and s 41(3) — and ultimately found FC s 41(3) not to apply to the organs of state before the Court — it appeared to assume that had the IEC been an organ of state within the national sphere of government, FC s 41(3) would have applied. IEC v Langeberg (supra) at paras 30–31.

[5] First Certification Judgment (supra) at 291.

In National Gambling Board, the Constitutional Court effectively reversed the normative hierarchy it had established between FC s 41(1)(h)(vi) and FC s 41(3) in First Certification Judgment.[1] The stated reason for the reversal was that, in the five years separating the two decisions, the Act of Parliament contemplated in FC s 41(2) had not been passed. As a consequence, no formal 'mechanisms and procedures' had been put in place to resolve intergovernmental disputes. Given the absence of such mechanisms and procedures, some doubt was expressed as to whether the Court could enforce FC s 41(3). In order to avoid having to decide this point, the Court held that the duty to avoid litigation could be independently founded on s 41(1)(h)(vi).[2] The Court then enunciated what this duty entailed.[3]

The first two judgments on the duty to avoid litigation can be reconciled by reading National Gambling Board as giving content to the Court's statement in First Certification Judgment that intergovernmental disputes should be resolved at a 'political level'. In both decisions, the Court drew a line between political and legal forms of dispute resolution. The question as to whether or not FC s 41(1)(h)(vi) has been violated, and by extension whether the requirements of FC s 41(3) have been met, depends on whether all extra-judicial avenues for resolving the dispute have been exhausted. Three factors are relevant to this inquiry: (1) the seriousness of each party's commitment to the extra-judicial resolution of the dispute; (2) the extent to which the dispute turns on a question of legal interpretation which might have been resolved amicably; and (3) the preparedness of the parties to strike compromises (i.e. each party's willingness to discharge its duty 'to re-evaluate its position fundamentally').[4]

Two more years passed before the Court was again asked to consider the relationship between FC s 41(1)(h)(vi) and FC s 41(3). In Uthukela District Municipality, the Court first analysed a dispute between several municipalities and the national government in terms of FC s 41(3). After setting out FC s 41(3)'s two-fold obligations, the Court found that a statutory dispute resolution mechanism exists for fiscal disputes between organs of State (in the form of the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act[5]). The Uthukela District Municipality Court then addressed the issue of what an organ of State is to do if the dispute resolution mechanism in question does not actually apply to the conflict in question. (The Court deemed it unnecessary to decide the actual merit of the contention that the Act did not apply to the dispute in question.) The Court held that, according to FC s 41(1)(h)(vi), organs of state are obliged 'to avoid litigation against one another irrespective of whether special structures exist or not.'[6]

Uthukela District Municipality confirms National Gambling Board's gloss on the requirements of FC s 41(1)(h)(vi) and FC s 41(3), and strengthens the view that

[1] National Gambling Board (supra) at para 33.
[2] National Gambling Board (supra) at para 31.
[3] Ibid at paras 35-36.
[4] National Gambling Board (supra) at paras 35-36 (The Court wrote that disputes about 'questions of interpretation' should be resolved 'amicably'. . . '[O]rgans of state's obligation to avoid litigation entails much more than an effort to settle a pending court case. It requires of each organ of state [involved in the dispute] to re-evaluate its position fundamentally').
[5] Act 97 of 1997.
[6] Uthukela District Municipality (supra) at para 22.

the two sections re-inforce one another. Uthukela District Municipality stands for two further propositions. First, neither s FC 41(1)(h)(vi) nor FC s 41(3) has primacy of place. Second, and more importantly, FC s 41(3) analysis can take place without the legislation contemplated by FC s 41(2). Of course, that lacuna in the law — with the enactment of the IGRFA — no longer exists. What matters, for FC s 41(3) analysis, is whether there is a dispute-resolution mechanism in place. The fact that the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act expressly required parties to use structures such as the Budget Forum prior to approaching a court was more than sufficient to justify the imposition of the obligations of FC s 41(3).

FC s 41(1)(h)(vi) has other implications for litigation flowing from intergovernmental disputes. Should a party request direct access to the Constitutional Court to adjudicate an intergovernmental dispute, the MEC for Health, KZN v Premier, KZN Court indicated that the Constitutional Court will refuse such an application if the applicant has failed to comply with the duty to avoid litigation.[1]

(ii) FC s 41(2)

When this chapter was initially published in 2004, the Act of Parliament envisaged by FC s 41(2) had yet to tabled, let alone passed. Initially, the courts and commentators seemed vexed by Parliament's failure to act. The National Gambling Board Court wrote that:

> It could be argued that the failure of Parliament to comply with its obligations in terms of s 41(2) has rendered the important provisions of ss 41(3) and 41(4) inoperative. For reasons that follow, it is not necessary to decide that now. However, even the possibility that such an argument could be raised emphasises the urgent need for the envisaged legislation. Co-operative government is foundational to our constitutional endeavour. The fact that the Act envisaged in section 41(2) has not been passed requires the attention of the Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development.[2]

As the discussion of Uthukela District Municipality indicates, the Court appears to have backed away from this aggressive stance. FC s 41(3) — and by necessity FC s 41(4) — would appear to be operational even in the absence of a FC s 41(2)-mandated Act.

There were a number of compelling explanations for the decade long delay in promulgating the IGRFA contemplated by FC s 41(2) — and hence the willingness on the part of the Constitutional Court not to be overly sanctimonious about the state's 'failure'. First, many parties seem inclined to allow a significant period

[1] MEC for Health, KwaZulu-Natal v Premier, KwaZulu-Natal: In Re Minister of Health and Others v Treatment Action Campaign 2002 (5) SA 717 (CC), 720, 2002 (10) BCLR 1028 (CC)('MEC for Health, KZN v Premier, KZN')(Constitutional Court held that it will rarely grant direct access to organs of state who have not duly performed their co-operative governmental duties under Chapter 3. Such duties are a privileged factor in deciding whether it is in the interests of justice to grant an organ of state leave to appeal directly to the court. Because the matter before the Court involved a political dispute and the parties had not complied with their obligation to effect co-operative government, leave to appeal was denied.) See also National Gambling Board (supra) at paras 33 and 37 ('If this Court is not satisfied that the obligation has been duly performed, it will rarely grant direct access to organs of state involved in litigation with one another.') to pass in order for various government actors and sectors to develop a regime of 'best practices' upon which any legislation might draw. Second, as the decision in Uthukela District Municipality appears to confirm, many parties believe that government sectors are better served by having sector-specific dispute-resolution mechanisms crafted to meet their particular needs than they would be by a general dispute-resolution framework. An audit undertaken by the Department of Provincial and Local Government reflects both lines of thought:

[2] Ibid at para 32.

> An act of Parliament is required under s 41 (2)(b) of the Constitution to provide for such alternative [non-judicial] mechanisms. In the absence of such an Act, disputes have to be settled politically and/or by means of intergovernmental relations. The Audit addresses these and recommends that legislation be delayed. It sees no compelling urgency to enact this legislation. Moreover, delay might allow best practices to emerge which can later be captured in effective legislation. The duty to exhaust all procedures before resorting to judicial remedies will obviously continue to apply. Sectorally-based legislation is however encouraged for settling disputes within a sector [eg, the National Environmental Management Act]. Such legislation is essentially issue-sensitive and can give content to a normative framework in terms of which disputes can be settled.[1]

Even if one agrees with the general sentiments of this 1999 DPLG Audit, it is fair, in 2009, to ask two questions. Had not a reasonable amount of time elapsed in which to pass constitutionally mandated legislation? The Audit suggested delaying enactment so that best practices might have time to emerge. The Audit could not — in the face of express constitutional dictates to the contrary — put forward the case for permanently shelving the legislation.[2] (However, the Audit's emphasis on sectoral legislation intimates just that.) Was it not possible to set out a basic set of principles — and perhaps a default forum — designed to govern intergovernmental disputes, without displacing the sectoral legislation that caters to the specific needs of a particular governmental domain? Such a two-track approach would appear to best fit the relationship already established between FC s 41(1)(h) (vi) and FC s 41(3). That is, if sectoral legislation provides an adequate forum for

[1] 'Executive Summary' The Intergovernmental Relations Audit: Towards a Culture of Co-operative Government Department of Provincial and Local Government (1999) 6 ('DPLG Audit'). See also 'Conclusions and Recommendations' The Intergovernmental Relations Audit: Towards a Culture of Co-operative Government Department of Provincial and Local Government (1999) 11('The audit revealed that intergovernmental disputes include constitutional issues, legislative interpretation and policy, and factual disagreements. The nature of the disputes differs as well as the need for expeditious settlement. It would neither be desirable nor practicable to prescribe a uniform mechanism and procedure for the settlement of all these disputes. The fear was expressed by interviewees that legislation should not make the process of dispute resolution inflexible or too cumbersome which would then defeat the object of the exercise. Examples were mentioned where a dispute had to be resolved within 24 hours. In view of the wide variety of disputes that may arise between a wide array of organs of state, the Act should list the broad range of dispute settlement mechanisms and procedures' available to parties rather than attempt to shoehorn all disputes into a single rubric.)

[2] India took several decades to create the Inter-State Council — an intergovernmental relations body designed to mediate federal-state disputes and to provide a forum for the discussion of policy initiatives of national and/or regional interest — despite the express mandate of Article 263 of the Indian Constitution. See § 14.2 supra. One important difference between FC s 41(2) and Article 263 is that the former is mandatory and the latter is permissive.

dispute resolution, then it ought to be the first port of call for potential litigants.[1] As we shall see, in para 14.5 below, the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act largely — and rightly — renders these questions moot.

The major intergovernmental disputes resolved by the Constitutional Court prior to 2005 did provide some guidance to the drafters of the IGRFA. These decisions also intimate that space remains for litigation under FC Chapter 3 without any initial recourse to the IGRFA. Five 'pure' intergovernmental disputes involved challenges to the constitutionality of legislation allegedly impinging on the powers and the functions of an organ of state in another sphere of government. The first four, Premier, WC v President, Cape Metro, Council Executive Council, WC and Uthukela District Municipality, concerned challenges by provincial or local governments to national legislation. In the fifth, National Gambling Board, the dispute turned on regulations promulgated under a provincial statute. National Gambling Board may be further distinguished from the others on the grounds that the challenge was brought by organs of state in the national sphere and the fact that private companies were party to the dispute. This last point indicates that the mere fact that a private citizen or body is party to a particular dispute does not remove it from the domain of intergovernmental disputes. However, it only becomes or remains an intergovernmental dispute if the main dispute lies between organs of state. The sixth case, MEC for Health, KZN v Premier, KZN, presented the Constitutional Court with a conflict between two members of the same provincial executive, each seeking to represent the province in another matter. The Court rapped both parties across the knuckles for 'proceed[ing] with an issue that should not have been brought before this Court and for failing to comply with their obligations to co-operate in government.'[2]

One can adduce at least four guiding principles from the case law (and these principles remain relevant to any future challenge to the IGRFA in terms of Chapter 3 or another section of the Final Constitution). The main type of dispute that the FC s 41(2) Act of Parliament was meant to regulate is a clash between organs of state over legislation passed by one sphere of government that allegedly impinges on the powers and functions of an organ of state in another sphere if government. The FC s 41(2) Act ought not to displace sector-based dispute resolution mechanisms which are more finely attuned to the kinds of issues raised in a given governmental domain. The FC s 41(2) Act ought to provide for expedited dispute resolution so that a matter that has yet to be politically engaged, and thus is not yet ripe, does not get placed before a court. The FC s 41(2) Act ought to distinguish clearly between disputes between state actors — to which it must apply — and disputes between the state and private persons — to which it must not apply.[1] As we shall see below, in § 14.5, the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act addresses all the concerns directly.

[1] When discussing both formal and informal MINMECs, the DPLG Audit contemplated a broadly principled framework, rather than a highly detailed code. The provisions of the envisaged Act could be applied asymmetrically to each structure, provided that any asymmetries are not inconsistent with the basic principles of the legislation. The Audit views the MINMECs as optimal sites for the settlement of political-sectoral disputes. See 'Conclusions and Recommendations' The Intergovernmental Relations Audit: Towards a Culture of Co-operative Government Department of Provincial and Local Government (1999) 4.

[2] MEC for Health, KZN v Premier, KZN (supra) at para 13.

(iii) FC s 41(3)

FC s 41(3) appeared, for a time, to be something of a dead letter. In National Gambling Board, the Constitutional Court wrote that 'in the absence of the Act of Parliament contemplated in s FC 41(2), the obligation on organs of state to avoid litigation against one another is founded on FC s 41(1)(h)(vi) rather than FC s 41(3) and (4).'[2] As we have already noted, the Uthukela District Municipality Court rejected the notion that the desiderata of s 41(3) do not obtain absent a singular FC s 41(2) Act.[3] Uthukela District Municipality stands for the proposition that FC s 41(3)'s requirements have purchase even when only a statutory dispute resolution mechanism specific to a given sector applies to the parties to a dispute.[4]

The requirements of FC s 41(3) — along with those of FC s 41(1)(h)(vi) — have been spelled out in a number of cases.[5] FC s 41(3) demands that organs of state: (1) make every reasonable effort to settle the dispute by means of mechanisms and procedures provided for that purpose; and (2) must exhaust all other remedies before they approach a court to resolve the dispute. The case law has put the following gloss on this two-part inquiry. A court interrogating the behaviour of parties to an intergovernmental dispute will appraise: (1) the seriousness of each party's commitment to the extra-judicial resolution of the dispute; (2) the extent to which the dispute turns on a question of legal interpretation which might have been resolved amicably; and (3) the preparedness of the parties to strike compromises which would require that they re-evaluate their positions.

Who is, and who is not, bound by the dictates of FC 41(3) has been covered in some detail in the discussion of parties bound by FC s 40(2).[6] To the extent that there was any doubt prior to Uthukela District Municipality, it now seems clear that the President, members of the national Cabinet, municipalities, as well as provincial premiers and MECs should be regarded as organs of state for the purposes of FC s 41(3) analysis. It also seems clear from the decision in IEC v Langeberg that Chapter 9 institutions supporting constitutional democracy are not organs of state 'which can be said to be within the national sphere of government.'[7] National

[1] See Member of the Executive Council for Local Government, Mpumalanga v Independent Municipal and Allied Trade Unions and Others 2002 (1) SA 76 (SCA)(Supreme Court of Appeal held that although national and provincial governments had responsibility to ensure that municipalities functioned effectively, such responsibility could not turn a dispute between the province and its employees into an intergovernmental dispute for the purposes of FC ss 41(3) and (4)).

[2] National Gambling Board (supra) at 33.

[3] See § 14.3*(a)*(iii)(ee) supra.

[4] It seems reasonable to extend Uthukela District Municipality's holding vis-à-vis FC s 41(3) to informal dispute resolution within a given sector. After all, FC s 41(3) reads, in pertinent part, that parties 'must make every reasonable effort to settle the dispute by means of mechanisms and procedures provided for that purpose.' It does not say that the mechanisms must be creatures of statute or take the form of a statute enacted as required by s 41(2).

[5] See § 14.3*(a)(iii)(ee)* supra.

[6] See § 14.3*(b)(i)(bb)* supra.

[7] IEC v Langeberg (supra) at para 27.

Gambling Board supports the proposition that most national and provincial regulatory authorities will be regarded as organs of state within the national or provincial sphere of government.[1] None of the cases thus far has addressed the question of whether national or provincial legislatures are bound by FC s 41(3).

(iv) FC s 41(4)

Now that FC s 41(3) has been recognized by the courts as an ineradicable part of the apparatus for settling intergovernmental disputes involving organs of state, FC s 41(4) will be invoked whenever a court is not satisfied that the requirements of FC s 41(3) have been met.

14.4 Intergovernmental relations in Practice

(a) Defining intergovernmental relations ('IGR')

This chapter has been concerned almost entirely with dispute resolution. It goes without saying that the main business of governance is policy construction and that the various arms of the state generally execute policy without dispute. The engines, mechanisms, procedures and structures by which spheres of government and organs of state co-operate to achieve their various ends are collectively known as intergovernmental relations.[2]

(b) Structures and Statutes for Intergovernmental Relations

The institutions that have greased the wheels of IGR in the last ten years include: (1) the National Council of Provinces ('NCOP'); (2) the Intergovernmental Forum ('IGF'); (3) the Presidential Co-ordinating Council ('PCC'); (4) Statutory and non-Statutory MINMECs; (5) the Forum for South African Directors' General ('FOSAD'); (6) the Fiscal and Financial Commission; (7) the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act; (8) the Division of Revenue Act; (9) the Public Finance Management Act; (10) the Provincial Tax Regulation Process Act; (11) the Borrowing Powers of Provincial Government Act; (12) the Medium Term Budget Statement; and (13) Provincial intervention in local government. This section is not meant to be an exhaustive overview of the various engines of IGR. It is, rather, an attempt to show how the Final Constitution, a burgeoning body of statutes and the government actors at the coalface have attempted to make manifest the concept of co-operative governance.

[1] National Gambling Board (supra) at paras 19-21.

[2] The DPLG Audit defined intergovernmental relations 'as an interacting network of institutions at national, provincial and local levels, created and refined to enable the various parts of government to cohere in a manner more or less appropriate to our institutional arrangements.' 'Executive Summary' The Intergovernmental Relations Audit: Towards a Culture of Co-operative Government Department of Provincial and Local Government (1999) 1. See also C Mentzel & J Fick 'Transformation Perspectives on Policy Management: Dynamics of Intergovernmental Relations with Specific Reference to the Eastern Cape' (1996) 2 Africanus 26 (Intergovernmental relations are a set of mechanisms for 'multi- and bi-lateral, formal and informal, multi-sectoral and sectoral, legislative, executive and administrative interaction entailing joint decision-making, consultation, co-ordination, implementation and advice between spheres of government at vertical as well as horizontal levels and touching on every governmental activity'); P Brynard & L Malan 'Conservation Management and Intergovernmental Relations: The Case of South African National and Selected Provincial Protected Areas' (2002) 21*Politeia* 101.

(i) The National Council of Provinces

The NCOP is charged with promoting provincial interests through the legislative process.[1] The NCOP's role with respect to constitutional amendments and legislation deemed not to affect the provinces is marginal. FC s 74 contains provisos designed to circumvent NCOP consideration of amendments. With respect to legislation deemed not to affect the provinces, FC s 75 allows the National Assembly to pass legislation with a simple majority — with or without NCOP approval. As a result, the primary function of the NCOP is the introduction and consideration of FC s 76 bills — legislation deemed to affect the provinces.[2]

The NCOP members are selected by the Provinces — some by the legislature, some by the Premier. This chamber, even with its diminished powers, exercises an important deliberative function. It is the national forum for debate of provincial issues. The NCOP also provides a structure within which national officials introduce national laws over which there is concurrent jurisdiction with the provinces.[3]

The legislative work of the NCOP is not inconsequential. Approximately 20% of the bills passed from 1999 through 2001 were FC s 76 bills. Perhaps the most important piece of FC s 76 legislation is the Division of Revenue Bill. According to s 227(1)(a), each province is entitled to an 'equitable share of the revenue raised nationally to enable it to provide basic services and functions allocated to it.' Five out of nine NCOP provincial delegations must approve the bill.[4]

Critiques of the NCOP as an IGR structure are legion. Reddy has suggested that the NCOP lacks focus, suffers from a lack of internal cohesion created by the presence of permanent and special delegates, allows the national Cabinet to dictate its agenda, does not challenge either national ministries or the National Assembly on matters of provincial interest and fails 'to express distinctive regional interests.'[5]

---

[1] See S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 17.

[2] The NCOP has 90 members — 10 member delegations from each of the 9 provinces. See FC s 60. Of the ten members from each delegation, only six are permanent. Four special delegates serve at the pleasure of the Premier of the province. Additional provision is made in FC s 67 for 10 part-time, non-voting representatives of local governments. The actual formula for political party representation in the NCOP is set out in FC Schedule 3.

[3] See FC s 68 ('In exercising its legislative power, the National Council of Provinces may consider, pass, amend, propose amendments to or reject any legislation before the Council, in accordance with this chapter; and initiate or prepare legislation falling within a functional area listed in Schedule 4 or other legislation referred to in section 76(3), but may not initiate or prepare money Bills.') See also FC s 42(4)(NCOP 'represents the provinces to ensure that provincial interests are taken into account in the national sphere of government. It does this mainly by participating in the national legislative process and by providing a national forum for public consideration of issues affecting the provinces.')

[4] See 'The NCOP: A Forum for Intergovernmental Relations' The Intergovernmental Relations Audit: Towards a Culture of Co-operative Government Department of Provincial and Local Government (1999) 4 ('The NCOP and Intergovernmental Relations Audit')(The Audit makes the case that the NCOP should spend less time debating the finer points of the national Appropriations Bill, and more time engaging the 'conditional grants that the Division of Revenue Bill allocates to provinces.')

[5] P Reddy 'Intergovernmental Relations in South Africa' (2001) 20 Politeia 21, 32–33.

De Villiers, while slightly more sanguine about the capacity of the NCOP, likewise notes its legislative impotence, its largely advisory function and the manner in which MINMECs usurp the second chamber's role in the formation of policy.[1] The Audit conducted by the Department of Provincial and Local Government ('DPLG') observes that not only are MINMECs the primary venue for 'productive discussion of new legislation and policy affecting the provinces, but that even when NCOP delegation votes must be cast on legislation, the decision on how to vote is made at the provincial level by MPLs and Premiers.'[2]

The DPLG Audit identifies a number of other structural problems. First, the 90-member NCOP cannot meaningfully review all FC s 75 and FC s 76 bills. Because the 4 special delegates in each delegation do not participate adequately in the committee system, the assessment of most bills rests with the permanent delegates. The 54 permanent delegates simply lack the time to engage in an adequate review of pending legislation. Second, provincial legislatures, which often take the important decisions for their respective NCOP delegations, likewise lack the capacity 'to cope with the exacting demands of legislative scrutiny or to deal with bills expeditiously within the legislative cycle.'[3] Neither the NCOP nor the Provinces are able to offer considered opinions on matters that affect them. Third, in addition to being a rubber-stamp for the National Assembly, the Audit suggests that the NCOP's limited resources impair its capacity to carry out its oversight responsibilities competently. This concatenation of flaws leads Reddy, De Villiers and the DPLG to describe the NCOP as an insignificant IGR actor.

(ii) The Intergovernmental Forum ('IGF') and the President's Co-ordinating Committee ('PCC')

The IGF was the most representative consultative body on IGR. It numbered the Ministers and Deputy Ministers of the national government, provincial Premiers and MECs, representatives from SALGA and the NCOP, Directors-General of all national and provincial departments, Chairpersons from select parliamentary committees as well as the Chairpersons from the Financial and Fiscal Commission and the Public Service Commission among its many members. While it quite consciously concerned itself with the business of co-operative governance, the IGF was abolished because it was unwieldy, met too infrequently, cost too much, was mainly an information-sharing exercise and had a marginal influence on the construction of national, provincial and local government policy.

The IGF has been replaced by the PCC. The PCC is both leaner and more focused than its predecessor. It is composed of the President, the Minister of Provincial and Local Government and the nine provincial Premiers.[4] It has been charged with the more limited task of developing provincial policy and ensuring

[1] De Villiers 'IGR in SA' (supra) at 202-204.
[2] DPLG 'The NCOP and Intergovernmental Relations Audit' (supra) at 4–8.
[3] Ibid at 8.
[4] See R Sizane 'The Nuts and Bolts of the South African Intergovernmental Relations System: A Practitioner's Perspective' Department of Provincial and Local Government (2001) 5.

adequate provincial administration of concurrent functions.[1] As with the IGF, the success of the PCC will turn on its ability to work effectively with the various MINMECs.

(iii) Intergovernmental Relation Committees of Ministers and Members of Executive Councils ('MINMECs')

Intergovernmental Relation Committees of Ministers and Members of Executive Councils consist of the national line-function Ministers and the equivalent provincial Members of the Executive Council of provinces. Some MINMECs are informal, advisory executive structures. Other MINMECs are creatures of statute with clearly delineated responsibilities. As a rule, MINMECs concern themselves with drafting intergovernmental line-function policies, guiding the different spheres of government in the formulation of their own sector-specific policies, harmonising legislation that engages concurrent competencies, transferring information and ensuring the optimal utilisation of financial resources.

A good example of a statutory MINMEC is the Budget Council.[2] The Council was established by the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act.[3] It consists of the Minister of Finance and the MEC of Finance for each province.[4] It meets at least twice annually and is charged with ensuring adequate consultation between the national and provincial governments on 'any fiscal, budgetary or financial matter affecting the provincial sphere,' 'any proposed legislation or policy which has a financial implication for the provinces,' and 'any matter concerning the financial management, or the monitoring of the finances, of the provinces.'[5] One strength is that a panel was set up to determine the 'best practices' for national-provincial fiscal relations prior to the passage of the enabling legislation for the Council. One

[1] FC ss 125(1) and (2), and ss 127(1) and (2), set out the extensive executive and administrative authority of provincial Premiers.

[2] Other examples of statutory intergovernmental relations bodies are the Committee for Environmental Co-ordination (as provided for by the National Environmental Management Act 107 of 1998) and the Council of Education Ministers (as provided for by the National Education Policy Act 27 of 1996). However, because the representation for the Committee for Environmental Co-ordination is not identical to that of the MINMEC for Environmental and Nature Conservation, each consultative body captures different constituencies and sometimes produces different outcomes. Each remains a valuable, if sometimes redundant, cog in the wheel of IGR. With respect to the limited number of IGR mechanisms created by statute, see C Murray 'The Constitutional Context of Intergovernmental Relations' in N Levy & C Tapscott (eds) Intergovernmental Relations in South Africa: The Challenges of Co-operative Government (2001) 66, 76.

[3] Act 97 of 1997. The Act, by creating the Council, gives indirect effect to the process of revenue sharing among the three spheres of government required by FC s 214. On the other hand, the Financial and Fiscal Commission Act 99 of 1997, by creating the Financial and Fiscal Commission, gives direct effect to the constitutional requirements of FC s 220. For more on intergovernmental fiscal relations, see R Kriel and M Monadjem 'Public Finance' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 27. See also G Penfold and P Reyburn 'Public Procurement' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 25.

[4] The Act also makes provision for a Budget Forum. The Forum is charged with oversight of national-local fiscal relations. The Forum consists of the Minister of Finance and the MEC for Finance for each province, five representatives from SALGA and one representative of local government from each of the nine provinces.

[5] Section 3 (a)–(c) of Act 97 of 1997.

weakness, consistent with the experiences of other MINMECs, is that the Council is under-resourced and incapable of providing all of the anticipated benefits of co-ordination.

Because no formal procedures govern the establishment and the operation of MINMECs, they vary in structure and competence.[1] However, several common problems surface across the MINMEC spectrum. First, departments may be organized differently at the national and provincial level. For example, discrete national ministries of culture, health and welfare may be combined into one department at the provincial level. The provincial MEC is thus left with responsibility for three MINMECs. Not surprisingly, this asymmetry may mean that the provinces lack the time and the energy necessary to make meaningful interventions. The result is that policy is determined de facto by the national government.[2] Second, under-resourced provincial MECs often do not have sufficient time to attend all meetings or to respond to all communiqués designed to set agendas. Once again, the result may be that shared national-provincial policy decisions fall primarily within the purview of the national government.[3]

(iv) Forum for South African Directors-General ('FOSAD')

FOSAD is made up of national and provincial Directors-General. Its broad terms of reference are to ensure the requirements of good governance in the public service as set out FC ss 41 and 195.[4] Its five cluster committees co-ordinate policy implementation between national and provincial departments and offer advice to the national Cabinet and the provincial Executive Councils.

(v) Fiscal and Financial Commission

FC s 220 requires the creation of the Financial and Fiscal Commission ('FFC'). This statutory body offers recommendations to the three spheres of government on the vertical division of nationally raised revenue and the horizontal division of revenue between provinces and municipalities. Section 9 of the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act requires the FFC to make similar suggestions. The FFC's role in intergovernmental relations does not end there. In terms of FC ss 214, 218, 228-230 — and various Acts — the FFC has a responsibility to provide opinions on loan guarantees, provincial tax legislation, municipal fiscal powers and functions, and provincial and municipal borrowing.[5]

The FFC has also been relatively vocal about how monies allocated ought to be spent. More pointedly, it has suggested that the national government ought to determine — through conditional grants and other modalities — to a significant degree the actual content of provincial and local government budgets. It

[1] See De Villiers 'IGR in SA' (supra) at 207–210. See also Reddy (supra) at 32.

[2] De Villiers 'IGR in SA' (supra) at 208.

[3] See De Villiers 'IGR in SA' (supra) at 209. See also Reddy (supra) at 32.

[4] See A Bodasing 'Public Administration' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 23A.

[5] For more on matters of public finance generally, see R Kriel and M Monadjem 'Public Finance' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service, March 2007) Chapter 27.

has recently written that: 'National government departments should clearly define minimum norms and standards for delivery in areas of concurrent responsibility. They should also monitor the performance of provinces in complying with these norms to ensure that the minimum requirement for the use of conditional grants is met.'[1] Similar sentiments have been articulated by members of the national treasury.[2]

(vi) The Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act[3]

The Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act provides a framework for the division of revenue between the three spheres of government. The Act also establishes the Budget Council. This consultative body is primarily designed to serve provincial needs: it creates the space for consultation on financial matters — including legislation — that may affect the provinces.

(vii) The Division of Revenue Act and the Explanatory Memorandum for the Division of Revenue

The Division of Revenue Act ('DORA')— passed annually — sets out the division of national revenue amongst the three spheres of government in quite substantial detail. The Act adumbrates the transfer of conditional and unconditional grants from the national government to the provinces and to municipalities. It also sets out the rules that govern the purpose and the use of these grants.

The Act is preceded by a Division of Revenue Bill. Perhaps the most important feature of that Bill is the Explanatory Memorandum for the Division of Revenue. This memorandum — required by section 10 of the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act — explains how the Bill meets the criteria set out in FC s 210(2)(a) — (j). It also contains the 'government's response to the annual recommendations of the FFC, and any assumptions and formulae used in arriving at the respective divisions among provinces'.[4]

---

[1] Fiscal and Financial Commission Submission for the Division of Revenue 2007/08 (2007).

[2] Former Minister of Finance, Trevor Manual wrote:

> On the back of a robustly growing economy and [an] efficient South African Revenue Service (SARS) we often find ourselves having more money than we are able to use. I say this with the full knowledge that there may be many people who will find it hard to believe. However, . . . if one examines the spending patterns for the first quarter of this year as contained in the section 32 report published in July it is not very hard to come to this conclusion. The report . . . showed that after three months or 25% of the financial year, spending on some of these [conditional] grants was around 14%. Given past trends it is not hard to predict that if nothing changes during the course of the year we might witness some underspending on some of these grants, yet again.

Department of Provincial and Local Government Provincial Budgets and Expenditure Review and Local Government Budgets and Expenditure Review (2006) 4-5.

[3] Act 97 of 1997.

[4] Department of Provincial and Local Government Provincial Budgets and Expenditure Review: 2002/03 — 2008/09 (2007) 6.

(viii) The Public Financial Management Act [1]

This Act, discussed at length elsewhere in this treatise, promotes greater accountability and strives to eliminate waste and corruption.

(ix) The Provincial Tax Regulation Process Act [2]

The Provinces, as we have already noted, have a limited capacity to raise their own revenue and are largely dependent on national government largesse. This Act ostensibly seeks to correct this constitutional imbalance and, on its face, provides a mechanism for provinces to introduce new taxes. In short:

> A province contemplating a new tax submits a detailed tax proposal developed according to the guidelines that have been agreed to with the Minister of Finance. After examining the proposal and taking account of the recommendations of the Financial and Fiscal Commission, the Minister approves or disapproves the requested tax.[3]

That, in any event, is how the Act is supposed to work in theory. However, in its eight years of existence, the Act has led to an approved provincial tax just once: the Western Cape fuel levy. Indeed, the fairly onerous steps required to secure approval — and the veto power that the Minister of Finance may exercise — means that no tax will be approved unless it is deemed to serve national, as opposed to provincial, priorities. Recent attempts by the Gauteng Provincial Government to promulgate a provincial tax designed to improve provincial roads and public transportation met with resistance from both SANRAL (the national roads agency) and other sectors of the national government. Even though the tax's purposes were entirely benign — and constituted one of the first major attempts to use toll roads to subsidize public transport — the national government's entrenched interest in maintaining control over the fiscus led to the untimely demise of this initiative.

(x) The Borrowing Powers of Provincial Governments Act[4]

The Borrowing Powers of Provincial Governments Act is another act that promises the provinces substantially more than it delivers. In the discussions that led to the passage of this Act, the Budget Council stated that > provincial borrowing would have to be linked to specific infrastructure programmes or projects; would not encumber any specific revenue stream for any funds borrowed, and the total amount of funds each province is allowed to borrow would be determined by its capacity to raise its own revenue, as well as the amount of funding it receives in the form of national infrastructure grants to provinces.

Given the onerous conditions placed upon provincial borrowing — along with the strictures placed upon their borrowing powers by the Final Constitution itself

[1] For more on the Public Financial Management Act 1 of 1999, see R Kriel and M Monadjem 'Public Finance' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service, March 2007) Chapter 27.

[2] The Provincial Tax Regulation Process Act 53 of 2001.

[3] Department of Provincial and Local Government Provincial Budgets and Expenditure Review: 2002/03 — 2008/09 (2007) 6.

[4] The Borrowing Powers of Provincial Governments Act 48 of 1996.

— it comes as no surprise that not a single province has borrowed money under the existing framework.

(xi) Medium Term Budget Policy Statement (MTBPS) and Medium Term Expenditure Framework (MTEF)

The Medium Term Budget Policy Statement is released several months before the annual budget is tabled. The statement is both a product of intergovernmental fora on financial and fiscal matters and mechanism intended to elicit responses from various state and civil actors over how the government wishes to spend public resources.

The Medium Term Expenditure Framework provides 'the first signal of the division of revenue and the transfers from nationally-raised revenue to provinces over the next three years and the policy priorities that underpin them'.[1] The Framework, published well before the statement and the budget, allows for greater intergovernmental and public debate over national policy and expenditure priorities.

(xii) Provincial intervention in local government

Since 1998, 5 provincial governments have intervened in local government affairs on at least 16 occasions in terms of FC s 139. FC s 139(1) reads, in relevant part,

> When a municipality cannot or does not fulfill an executive obligation in terms of the Constitution or legislation, the relevant provincial executive may intervene by . . .
> (a) issuing a directive to the Municipal Council . . . stating any steps required to meet its obligations;
> (b) assuming responsibility for the relevant obligations in that municipality…

According to the 15 Year Review Report on the State of Intergovernmental Relations in South Africa, these provincial interventions 'fell into three broad categories':

1. Governance: political infighting, conflict between senior management and councillors, human resource management issues.
2. Financial: Inadequate revenue collection, ineffective financial systems, fraud, misuse of municipal assets and funds.
3. Service delivery: Breach of sections 152 and 153 of the Final Constitution [outlines service delivery obligations of municipalities].[2]

Mot of the interventions took place in terms of FC s 139(1)(b). The national government's Department of Provinces and Local Government suggested that directives issued in terms of FC s 139(1)(a) ought to precede direct intervention in terms of FC s 139(1)(b).

[1] Department of Provincial and Local Government Provincial Budgets and Expenditure Review: 2003/04 – 2009/10 (2008) 9.

[2] Department of Provincial and Local Government 15 Year Review Report on the State of Intergovernmental Relations in South Africa (2008) 41.

(c) An Assessment of Intergovernmental Relations and Cooperative Government by the State and Civil Society

Naturally, one might expect the South African government — dominated for 15 years by the African National Congress — to paint a rosy picture of intergovernmental relations. And while the government does issue reports that emphasize improvement as well as compliance with constitutional and statutory obligations, it is hard to not arrive at the conclusion that the national government — as it is currently constituted — would rather not be bothered with co-operative government or more efficient and normatively legitimate intergovernmental relations.

The State's rather Manichean view of IGR and cooperative governance is on full display in its recent report on the subject: 15 Year Review Report on the State of Intergovernmental Relations in South Africa.[1] It expresses great pride in (a) the Acts that make the current system work (the Public Finance Management Act, the Municipal Finance Management Act, the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act, and the annual Division of Revenue Act); (b) its fairly transparent budget and policy formulation processes; and (c) an IGR system that allows for discretion and flexibility.[2] At the same time, it complains, rather bitterly, about:

> First, … misalignment between policy objectives and resource allocation. This can cause a divergence between policy intentions and actual outcomes. Budgets are an important link between policy objectives and policy outcomes. Policies that are not funded or that are inadequately funded are hardly implemented, and their objectives are therefore nor properly realised. . . .
>
> [S]econd . . . delivery: Sometimes the wrong sphere is blamed. A policy might fail because it has been badly designed. In that case it is not appropriate to blame the implementer. Conversely, a policy might not deliver intended outcomes because it has not been properly funded, and this could be due to decisions at the provincial level. In this case it is not appropriate to blame the policy maker. . .
>
> [T]hird . . . the assignment or configuration of certain [competences and] functions lends itself to inefficiency and ineffectiveness.[3]

In short, the national government often views provinces (and local governments) as impediments to the realization of national priorities. National government may ascribe this problem to a lack of qualified personnel, incompetence or malfeasance — but the song remains the same: the provinces are a problem. At the time of writing this revision (July 2009), national government has even floated the idea of eliminating the provinces in toto. Given that FC s 74(8) would appear to require the assent of the provincial legislatures to such an eventuality — and that one province currently remains in the hands of the Democratic Alliance — such a proposed constitutional amendment would appear to be no more than saber rattling.

[1] Department of Provincial and Local Government 15 Year Review Report on the State of Intergovernmental Relations in South Africa (2008).

[2] Department of Provincial and Local Government Provincial Budgets and Expenditure Review: 2003/04 – 2009/10 (2008) 3.

[3] Ibid.

Ronald Watts and Nico Steytler have reached similar conclusions about the national government's view of co-operative government and intergovernmental relations. However, both authors view the increased centralization of power as both a missed opportunity and a potential calamity.

Ronald Watts recognized, fairly early on, that both the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution created 'a hybrid system which contained many of the characteristics of a federation, but combined these with some features more typical of a unitary system with constitutional regionalization.'[1] Watts was less interested in taxonomy, however, and far more concerned about 'whether the new political framework can reduce the sense of insecurity or suppression within the regional communities and thereby win their loyalty and support for nation building in South Africa.'[2]

While an active participant in the creation of South African IGR, Watts remained skeptical of its tripartite system and its commitment to 'interconnectedness'.[3] That interconnectedness posed two potential problems: (a) policy gridlock and (b) top-down decision-making.[4]

Nico Steytler's assessment of current IGR and cooperative governance is particularly scathing — but, interestingly enough, not substantially different from the views of the national government or Ronald Watts. In casting his eye over the recently promulgated Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act, Steytler's gaze comes to rest on s 4, and the more detailed objects of the Act:

(a) coherent government;
(b) effective provision of services;
(c) monitoring implementation of policy and legislation; and
(d) realisation of national priorities. (emphasis added)

Steytler writes that:

> While the object of providing "coherent government" may seem a neutral goal, the coherence is . . . premised on the 'realisation of national priorities' . . . . Provinces and local government [become] the principal implementers of national legislation and policies . . . [and] the focus then shifts to "monitoring implementation" of those policy and legislation. . . . This focus … on the "realisation of national priorities" by provinces and local government … [turns] … national IGR forums [into] … monitoring rather than consultative forums.[5]

In sum, Steytler concludes, 'the model underpinning the [IGRFA] is the pursuit of national priorities as defined by the national government.'[6] Indeed from [1] R Watts 'Is the New South African Constitution Federal or Unitary?' in B de Villiers (ed) Birth of a Constitution (1994) 75, 86.

[2] Ibid.

[3] R Watts Intergovernmental Relations: A Report by Dr Ronald Watts for the Department of Constitutional Development and Provincial Affairs (1999) 10-11.

[4] R Watts 'Intergovernmental Relations: Conceptual Issues' in N Levy and C Tapscott (eds) Intergovernmental Relations in South Africa: The Challenges of Co-operative Government (2001) 22, 24.

[5] N Steytler 'Cooperative and Coercive Models of Intergovernmental Relations: A South African Case Study' (supra) at 7.

[6] Ibid at 9.

Steytler's analysis of the IGRFA, it would appear that the national government has ultimately secured what the pot-apartheid state (and the ANC) have always wanted: 'a traditional public administration model of government — hierarchical and rule-bound structures and procedures — rather than a decentralised system of government.'[1]

As a descriptive matter, the national government, Watts and Steytler are in accord as to what they see: a fairly centralized state with features of a federation. As a prescriptive matter, they differ. The ANC-led national government would like to see the provinces — in so far as they are impediments to the realization of national policy — removed. Watts and Steytler, on the other hand, view the provinces (and local government) as important sites for both policy experimentation and enhanced political participation.

14.5 The Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act 13 of 2005[2]

(a) The Purpose of the Act

The IGRFA finally fulfills the constitutional obligation contained in FC s 41(2):

(2) An Act of Parliament must—

(a) establish or provide for structures and institutions to promote and facilitate intergovernmental relations; and

(b) provide for appropriate mechanisms and procedures to facilitate settlement of intergovernmental disputes.

The IGRFA rehearses many of the standard tropes on co-operative government found in the Final Constitution. For example, it states that the government of the Republic of South Africa consists of national, provincial and local spheres of government which are distinctive, interdependent and interrelated.

Section 4 of the IGRFA further elaborates on the purpose of the Act:

> to provide within the principle of co-operative government… a framework for the national government, provincial governments and local governments, and all organs of state within those governments, to facilitate co-ordination in the implementation of policy and legislation, including—

(a) coherent government;

(b) effective provision of services;

(c) monitoring implementation of policy and legislation; and

(d) realisation of national priorities.

The Preamble places an additional, and rather striking (if not odd), gloss on the IGRFA. According to the Preamble, cooperative government is necessary for the progressive realization of our constitutional rights. It identifies the biggest challenges facing the nation as the 'need for government to redress poverty, underdevelopment, marginalization of people and communities and other legacies of apartheid and discrimination' and notes that these longstanding structural problems are best combated through 'a concerted effort by government in all spheres to work together and to integrate as far as possible their actions in the provision of services, the alleviation of poverty and the development of our people and our country'. It is odd that the IGRFA should be thought the appropriate vehicle to eradicate poverty and to promote development. As Chaskalson P noted in Premier, Western Cape, constitutional (or statutory) principles of co-operative government possess a two-fold purpose: (a) to enable our still new democracy to develop a system of government that enables each sphere to work together in a coherent fashion; and (b) to allow each sphere of government to function relatively autonomously within its scope of legislative competence.[1]

[1] Stoytler (supra) at 9 citing D Schmidt 'From Spheres to Tiers: Conceptions of Local Government in South Africa in the Period 1994-2006' in Consolidating Developmental Local Government: Lessons from the South African Experience (2008).

[2] Preamble, Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act 13 of 2005 ('IGRFA' or 'the Act'). The Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act 2005 came into force August 15, 2005.

(b) A Reasonable Period for Promulgation of the IGFRA?

One might ask — as a preliminary question when reflecting upon the constitutionality and the efficacy of the Act — whether the enactment of the IGRFA occurred 'within a reasonable period of the date the new Constitution took effect' in terms of FC s 21 of Schedule 6. On its face, the eight and a half year period — from the certification of the Final Constitution to the promulgation of the Act — might seem 'unreasonable'. Indeed, the Constitutional Court in United Democratic Movement found a piece of floor-crossing legislation — contemplated (if not required) by the Final Constitution — constitutionally infirm even though it had been promulgated within a much briefer period of time. Moreover, as we have already noted, the Department of Provincial and Local Government had defended the delay on the more than plausible grounds that the eight years was necessary in order to allow intergovernmental 'best practices' to develop and to enable Parliament to codify those practices in terms of the IGRFA.[2] Some commentators, such as Rassie Malherbe, have cast doubt on the constitutionality of the Act because it does not, as the DPLG would have it, reflect 'best practices' passed 'within a reasonable period of time'. They note that the Act implements an entirely new set of new procedures for resolution to intergovernmental disputes — nothing akin to what we have seen in South African law or practice. These commentators contend, in addition, that the delay merely allowed the perpetuation of a top-down system of governance in which provincial governments and municipalities were obliged to implement policy decisions made by the national government.[3] On this account, the strong words of the Constitutional Court in National Gambling Board, regarding the failure of the government to enact the legislation required by FC s 41(2), could buttress the claim that the IGRFA failed to meet 'within a reasonable period' requirement of s 21 of FC Schedule 6.[1]

[1] See Premier, Western Cape (supra) at para 58 (The Court, after examining FC s 41(1)(g), states that the purpose of the section (and Chapter 3 as a whole) 'seems to be to prevent one sphere of government from using its powers in ways which would undermine other spheres of government, and prevent them from functioning effectively.')

[2] The Intergovernmental Relations Audit: Towards a Culture of Co-operative Government (1999) 6.

[3] See, eg, Rassie Malherbe 'Does the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act 13 of 2005 Confirm or Suppress National Dominance' (2006) (4) Tydskrif vir die Suid-Afrikaanse Reg 810.

But there are good reasons to believe that no such contestation of the constitutionality of the IGRFA would succeed. First, the IGRFA is on the books — and no one has suggested that it is infirm on any other grounds. The UDM Court, it might be argued, opted to deploy technical arguments for dispatching with a constitutional challenge that offered other more substantive reasons for finding the legislation at issue infirm. Second, surely the novelty — one might even say ingenuity — of the legislation counts in its favor. That we did not see much evidence of the use of implementation protocols in law or practice prior to the promulgation of the IGRFA might well suggest that other methods for resolving intergovernmental disputes proved less successful. Indeed, that we have witnessed only one instance of an intergovernmental dispute being litigated in our courts over the past 4 years could well mean that the framework and dispute resolution mechanisms adumbrated in the IGFRA might have quite a lot going for them.

(c) How the IGRFA Works

(i) The Main Forums for Intergovernmental Cooperation and Coordination

The IGRFA deploys a number of innovative mechanisms designed to coordinate action between different spheres of government. These same structures and procedures are also designed to resolve any disputes that may arise in the course of such action: they thereby make good FC Chapter 3's clearly stated preference for political, rather than judicial, resolution of intergovernmental disputes. As the text of the Final Constitution clearly states, and as the Constitutional Court has repeatedly confirmed, only after these political measures have been exhausted can resort be had to judicial mechanisms.

Given the present dominance of the ANC in all spheres of government, and the resulting appointment of Premiers by the National government, some commentators have been quick to diminish the importance of FC Chapter 3 principles of cooperative governance and those statutory provisions of the IGRFA that amplify those constitutional principles. They often contend that, at present, both the principles and the statutory provisions are 'largely superfluous.[1] With respect, if the 2007 ANC Polokwane Conference and the 2009 elections have taught us anything, then it is that we operate in a complex, fluid and unpredictable political environment. The 2007 ANC Polokwane Conference — which split the party along provincial, patronage and ideological lines — and subsequent events such as the formation of a new (non-minority) party (the Congress of the People (COPE) by disgruntled (former) members of the ANC), a sustained period of mass action by unions and clear divisions within the governing faction of the ANC (between moderates, on the one hand, and leftists, from COSATU and the SACP, on the other) suggest that internal ANC politics are anything but settled. The electoral triumph of the Democratic Alliance in the Western Cape and in Cape Town will also test national government and provincial government relations.

[1] See National Gambling Board v Premier of KwaZulu-Natal (supra) at para 32: 'The Act of Parliament envisaged in section 41(2) has not been enacted yet. In view of the words in subsection (3) that have been underlined, it could be argued that the failure of Parliament to comply with its obligation in terms of subsection (2) has rendered the important provisions of subsections (3) and (4) inoperative. For reasons that follow, it is not necessary to decide that now. However, even the possibility that such an argument could be raised emphasizes the urgent need for the envisaged legislation. Co-operative government is foundational to our constitutional endeavour. The fact that the Act envisaged in section 41(2) has not be passed requires the attention of the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development.' However, the Constitutional Court's view of the lacuna in the law appeared to soften and to shift in Uthukela District Municipality v President of the Republic of South Africa, even as it endorsed its previous holdings in First Certification Judgment and National Gambling Board. In short, all extra-judicial avenues for resolving a dispute had to have been exhausted before they became justiciable. It then added the proposition that FC s 41(1)(h)(vi), when read with FC s 41(3), obliged organs of state 'to avoid litigation against one another irrespective of whether special structures [for dispute resolution] exist or not'. 2003 (1) SA 687 (CC)('Uthukela District Municipality') at para 22. The Uthukela District Municipality Court's change in heart can be explained by a belief shared by many parties: the state should allow a significant period to pass in order for various government actors and sectors to develop a regime of 'best practices' upon which any FC s 41(2) legislation might draw.

The Act envisages the creation of several intergovernmental forums — some mandatory, some optional. These forums are designed to increase the flow of information to various affected actors and to thereby better enable them to co-ordinate their activities in areas of either shared competence or devolved administration. The obligatory forums — the President's Co-ordinating Council,[2] the Premiers' Intergovernmental Forums[3] ("PIFs"), and the District Intergovernmental Forums[4] ("DIFs") — are composed primarily of high-ranking office bearers from various spheres of government. However, non-elected, non-political individuals may be invited to attend.

The Act contemplates at least five different optional forums. Any Minister can establish a National Intergovernmental Forum that relates to his or her area of functional competence. The forum consists of the appropriate representatives from National, Provincial and Municipal government.[5] Premiers can establish additional Premiers' Intergovernmental Forums to facilitate effective intergovernmental relations in either a particular functional or geographical area;[6] The Premiers of two or more provinces can jointly establish an Interprovincial Forum to promote intergovernmental relations between a discrete set of provinces.[7] Similarly, two or more municipalities may establish an Inter-municipality Forum[8]. Any of these forums can establish a Technical Support Structure. These structures — made up of members of the state bureaucracy — are designed to assist elected officials in any of the forums mentioned above.[9] Finally, and most importantly, these consultative forums — which may adopt resolutions and make [1] See V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition. OS, July 2006) Chapter 16.

[2] IGRFA s 6-8.
[3] IGRFA s 16-21.
[4] IGRFA s 24-27.
[5] IGRFA s 9-15.
[6] IGRFA s 21.
[7] IGRFA s 22-23.
[8] IGRFA s 28-29.
[9] IGRFA s 30.

recommendations — do not qualify as executive decision-making bodies for the purposes of the Act or the Final Constitution.[1]

(ii) Implementation Protocols

To facilitate policy formation and dispute resolution, the IGRFA created a new tool called 'implementation protocols'.[2] As section 35 of the IGRFA notes, implementation protocols are binding agreements between organs of state in different spheres of government,

> [w]here the implementation of a policy, the exercise of a statutory power, the performance of a statutory function or the provision of a service depends on the participation of organs of state in different governments, [and] those organs of state must co-ordinate their actions in such a manner as may be appropriate or required in the circumstances.[3]

Implementation protocols are not contracts — although they may appear that way.[4] They are meant to co-ordinate the actions of co-operating organs of government and to ensure that all parties to the agreement discharge their responsibilities in terms of the protocol. The last proviso is important: there will be circumstances in which government actors disagree about the manner in which a responsibility ought to be discharged, or there may be instances in which the parties fail to discharge their duties in terms of the implementation protocol.

The implementation protocol serves first as a reminder of that which the parties must do. As the IGRFA makes clear, however, they also provide the text which governs the resolution of disputes between organs of state in different spheres of government. Nevertheless, the IGRFA makes it exceptionally difficult for parties to an implementation protocol — or some other intergovernmental project — to "litigate" a dispute. First, it ensures that all existing sector-specific statutory dispute mechanisms are employed before resort is had to the IGRFA's dispute-resolution mechanisms. More importantly, it does not displace national or provincial interventions undertaken in terms of FC ss 100 or 139.[5] Second, it reinforces the constitutional duty of different organs of state to avoid litigation. It attempts to do so by ensuring that all formal agreements between organs of state

[1] IGRFA s 32.

[2] Implementation protocols ensure that organs of state collaborate and thereby vouchsafe 'the implementation of a policy, the exercise of a statutory power, the performance of a statutory function or the provision of a service.'

[3] Implementation protocols are, essentially, written agreements outlining a plan to execute effectively co-ordinated action. They must also provide dispute settlement provisions. See IGRFA s 35(3)(g)

[4] Protocols are an 'optional tool' to be utilized by parties to joint action. However, they must be considered if: the action in question concerns subject matter identified as a national priority; it would materially assist the national or provincial government to satisfy its constitutional obligation to build capacity in the area in question in the local sphere of government; it would materially assist the organs of state to co-ordinate their actions; the organ of state responsible for the action does not have the capacity to fulfill its responsibility. IGRFA s 35(2).

[5] IGRFA s 39(1): 'This Chapter does not apply — (a) to the settlement of specific intergovernmental disputes in respect of which other national legislation provides resolution mechanisms or procedures; or (b) to a dispute concerning an intervention in terms of section 100 or 139 of the Constitution.'

contain dispute resolution mechanisms.[1] It also makes getting to court extremely difficult: before non-judicial dispute resolution can occur, a party must declare that such a dispute exists. However, before such a declaration can be made, section 41(2) of the IGRFA states that, > the organ of state in question must, in good faith, make every reasonable effort to settle the dispute, including the initiation of direct negotiations with the other party or negotiations through an intermediary.

After efforts in terms of sections 40 and 41 of the IGRFA have been exhausted, sections 42 and 43 set out the terms in which the parties, assisted by a facilitator, must go about resolving the dispute. Indeed, section 44 of the IGRFA ensures that an appropriate Minister or an MEC will take ultimate responsibility for resolving the dispute through political compromise. Only when the various mechanisms outlined in the IGRFA have failed — from the implementation protocols identified in section 35 of the IGRFA to the dispute resolution mechanisms set out in sections 30 to 44 of the IGRFA — may a party seek judicial intervention to resolve the dispute.

(iii) Settlement of Intergovernmental Disputes

The IGRFA defines an intergovernmental dispute as:

> a dispute between different governments or between organs of state from different governments concerning a matter—
> (a) arising from—
> (i) a statutory power or function assigned to any of the parties; or > (ii) an agreement between the parties regarding the implementation of a statutory power or function; and
> (b) which is justiciable in a court of law, and includes any dispute between the parties regarding a related matter.[2]

If an intergovernmental dispute does arise, then an organ of state that is party to such a dispute with another government or organ of state can declare a Formal Intergovernmental Dispute ('FID') by making such a declaration in writing to the other party.[3] However, again, such a declaration may occur only after the organ of state in question has made every reasonable effort to resolve the dispute.[4] An FID declaration triggers an obligation to call a meeting that identifies the issues in dispute, mechanisms other than judicial proceedings available to resolve the dispute, and an appropriate facilitator to help resolve the dispute.[5] Depending on the identity of the parties to the dispute, the Minister or MEC for local govern-

[1] IGRFA s 40(2): 'Any formal agreement between two or more organs of state in different governments regulating the exercise of statutory powers or performance of statutory functions, including any implementation protocol or agency agreement, must include dispute-settlement mechanisms or procedures that are appropriate to the nature of the agreement and the matters that are likely to become the subject of a dispute.'

[2] IGRFA s 1.

[3] IGRFA s 41(1).

[4] IGRFA s 41(2).

[5] IGRFA s 42(1).

ment in the province can call this meeting if the parties fail to do so.[1] The parties must also satisfy any other legislative dispute resolution mechanisms that may be applicable to the dispute in question.[2] It is only upon making a declaration of a Formal Intergovernmental Dispute, and the failure of these procedures to resolve the dispute, that judicial proceedings can be initiated.[3]

Since the implementation of the IGRFA, we have witnessed a dramatic reduction in the number of legal disputes between different spheres of government brought to court. On it face, it appears that this reduction could well testify to the effectiveness of the Act.

But the truth may well lie elsewhere — in the hurly-burly of South African politics. The sole dispute resolved by the courts in terms of the IGRFA occurred in City of Cape Town v Premier, Western Cape, & Others.[4] The City of Cape Town — controlled by the Democratic Alliance — had received information that one of the councillors on the council of the City was guilty of certain misconduct. It engaged the services of a firm of private investigators to investigate the allegations. The probe culminated in a finding by a City disciplinary committee that the councillor in question was guilty of misconduct. The City council then requested that the responsible provincial MEC remove the councilor from office.

The provincial MEC and the Premier — both members of the ANC — refused. They proceeded instead to launch their own investigation in terms of s 106(1)(b) of the Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000. The Premier established a commission of enquiry into 'Possible Occurrences of Fraud, Corruption, Maladministration, Serious Malpractice and other unlawful conduct in the City and George Municipality'. While the Premier created the commission as an adjunct to the MEC's investigation, he did not rely on s 106(2) of the Systems Act. Nor did he rely on the apposite provision of the Systems Act when he shut down the first commission and established a new commission. The City, later joined by the Democratic Alliance as an intervening party, then approached the High Court seeking the following relief: (1) a declaration that the MEC's decision to establish his investigation under s 106(1)(b) of the Systems Act was unconstitutional; and (2) a declaration that the Premier's decisions to establish the first commission and the second commissions were unconstitutional. The substance of the High Court's findings are not especially germane to this discussion. However, the High Court did note that the Premier's power to appoint a commission to investigate the conduct of a municipality were not located in s 106(2) of the Systems Act but in FC s 127(2)(e), FC s 139, s 37(2)(e) of the Western Cape Constitution, and s 1(1)(a) of the Western Cape Commissions Act and that the Premier could not appoint the second commission as an adjunct to the MEC's initiative under s 106(1)(b) of the Systems Act without relying on s 106(2) of that Act. Not only did the Premier's actions lack a legal foundation, the Court held that

[1] IGRFA ss 42(3) and (4).
[2] IGRFA s 42(2).
[3] IGRFA s 45.
[4] 2008 (6) SA 345 (C).

> The Premier therefore did not possess an honest belief that good reasons existed for establishing the Second Erasmus Commission, and possessed such an ulterior motive. As a result his decision was not rationally related to the purpose for which the power was conferred, was arbitrary and therefore unlawful. Consequently, the decision of the Premier to establish the Second Erasmus Commission falls to be set aside.[1]

More pointedly, the High Court held that the Premier had lacked good reasons for establishing the second commission, and had acted with the ulterior motive of embarrassing political opponents. According to the High Court, the appointment of the judge was meant to obscure the Premier's ulterior motive.[2]

Our concern, of course, is how this 'dispute' was mediated by FC Chapter 3 and the IGRFA. Given the High Court's assessment that the Premier had acted male fides, it is not surprising that the judge finessed the relationship between FC Chapter 3 and the IGRFA. On the High Court's reading of both documents (together), FC ss 41(3) and (4) employs a relaxed standard that only obliges an organ of State to make 'every reasonable effort' to exhaust political channels before resorting to court. Despite the fact the IGRFA, as the super-ordinate legislation contemplated by FC s 41(2), would appear to require specific steps to be taken before resort is had to a judicial forum, the High Court found that, given the clear and uncontroverted 'bad faith' by the MEC and the Premier, the City 'could not reasonably have been expected to take the steps envisaged in the Framework Act before instituting the present proceedings', and that the court accordingly 'had the power to entertain the proceedings in terms of [FC] s 41(4)'.[3]

What to make of this single case? One might read the case as standing for the principle that under normal circumstances, all parties ought to follow the procedures and employ the mechanisms laid out in the IGRFA. However, if, as in City of Cape Town v Premier, Western Cape, & Others, the court's findings clearly suggest that no political resolution is possible, and that at least one of the parties to the dispute has acted illegally or unconstitutionally, then a court may decide that the strictures of the IGRFA may be loosened so as to allow judicial resolution of the conflict. As matters stand in 2009, a major city (Cape Town) and a province (the Western Cape) in Democratic Alliance control may well give rise to similarly intractable (and potentially 'unconstitutional') disputes.

(d) What Disputes the IGFRA Does Not Cover

(i) Conflicts between National Legislation and Provincial Legislation

The first kind of governmental dispute completely exempt and expressly excluded from the application of the Act involves any clash between national legislation and provincial legislation in functional areas of concurrent competence.[4] Such conflicts are addressed at length from FC ss 146 to 150 and seem to require no further amplification by the Act. The Constitutional Court addressed this express

[1] City of Cape Town v Premier, Western Cape (supra) at para 163.
[2] Ibid at para 176.
[3] Ibid at para 24.
[4] IGRFA s 2(2).

exclusion, albeit briefly, in Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the RSA & Others.[1] In challenging the validity of the Twelfth Amendment, the applicants contended that the State had failed to fulfil their constitutional obligations in terms of FC s 41 and their statutory obligations in terms of the IGFRA. The Constitutional Court, per Ngcobo J, swiftly dispatched this contention:

> It is difficult to make out what the precise complaint is in this regard. What is clear, however, is that s 41(2) contemplates that an Act of Parliament will be enacted that will establish structures and institutions to promote and facilitate intergovernmental relations. In addition, this statute will provide appropriate mechanisms and procedures to facilitate settlement of intergovernmental disputes. The respondents submitted that this legislation is the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act 13 of 2005 … The applicants did not contend otherwise. Nor could they. .... Section 2(2) provides that the Framework Act does not apply to Parliament and the provincial legislatures. On its face, therefore, this statute excludes Parliament and provincial legislatures from its ambit. It follows that the submission relating to co-operative government must fail. We are not called upon, and we express no view on whether the Framework Act can constitutionally exclude from its ambit Parliament and provincial legislatures. That is not the question before us.[2]

Although the Matatiele Court refused to engage the question as to whether the IGRFA Act's exclusion from its ambit of the actions of Parliament and provincial legislatures is constitutional, it seems fair to conclude — given the Court' previous judgments as to what Chapter 3 does and does not cover — that the IGFRA is neither suspect nor infirm with respect to this exclusion.

(ii) Intra-governmental Disputes between Provincial Departments

(aa) The Problem

As we have already noted, for years lawyers, jurists and academics bemoaned a great gaping hole in our law: the Final Constitution had promised to establish a legal regime to mediate and to resolve intergovernmental conflicts. During the first decade of post-apartheid South African life (1996 — 2005), Parliament failed to make good FC s 41(2)'s guarantee that intergovernmental disputes would be resolved by legislation that prevented different spheres of government and opposing organs of state from going to war (or court) over vital policy matters.

The courts did their part in holding things together. Although initially vexed by Parliament's failure to produce FC s 41(2)'s constitutionally mandated superordinate legislation, the Constitutional Court gradually became less sanctimonious about this lacuna in the law.[1]

[1] 2006 (5) SA 47 (CC)('Matatiele').
[2] Ibid at paras 55 – 57.

In the absence of FC s 41(2) legislation, the Court did the best with what it had. In First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court held that FC s 41(1)(h) (vi) had to be read together with FC s 41(3).[2] It seemed to imply that the latter provision was the primary source of the duty to avoid litigation. In particular, FC s 41(3) meant that 'disputes should where possible be resolved at a political level rather than through adversarial litigation.'[3] The inclusion of this provision did not, however, oust the courts' jurisdiction to hear intergovernmental disputes or 'deprive any organ of government of the powers vested in it under [the Constitution].'[4] In National Gambling Board, the Court effectively reversed the normative hierarchy it had established between FC s 41(1)(h)(vi) and FC s 41(3) in First Certification Judgment.[5] The stated reason for the reversal was that, in the five years separating the two decisions, the Act of Parliament contemplated in FC s 41(2) had not been passed and no formal 'mechanisms and procedures' were put in place to resolve intergovernmental disputes. Given the absence of such mechanisms and procedures, some doubt was expressed as to whether, in the absence of FC s 41(2) legislation, the Court could enforce FC s 41(3). In order to avoid having to decide this point, the Court held that the duty to avoid litigation could be independently founded on FC s 41(1)(h)(vi).[6] The Court then enunciated what this duty entailed.[7] The first two judgments on the duty to avoid litigation can be reconciled by reading National Gambling Board as giving content to the Court's statement in First Certification Judgment that intergovernmental disputes should be resolved at a 'political level'. In both decisions, the Court drew a line between political and legal forms of dispute resolution. The question as to whether or not FCs 41(1)(h)(vi) has been violated, and by extension whether the requirements of FC s 41(3) have been met, depends on whether all extra-judicial

[1] National Gambling Board v Premier of KwaZulu-Natal & Others 2002 (2) SA 715 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 156 (CC)('National Gambling Board') at para 32 ('I]t could be argued that the failure of Parliament to comply with its obligations in terms of [FC s 41(2] has rendered the important provisions of [FC ss 41(3) and 41(4)] inoperative. For reasons that follow, it is not necessary to decide that now. However, even the possibility that such an argument could be raised emphasizes the urgent need for the envisaged legislation. Co-operative government is foundational to our constitutional endeavor. The fact that the Act envisaged in section 41(2) has not been passed requires the attention of the Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development.')

[2] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1458 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 291.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Ibid.

[5] National Gambling Board (supra) at para 33.

[6] Ibid at para 31.

[7] Ibid at paras 35-36.

avenues (or remedies) for resolving the dispute have been exhausted.[1] Three factors are relevant to this inquiry: (1) the seriousness of each party's commitment

[1] We have consciously chosen to avoid the use of the term remedies — as it appears in FC s 41(3). Peter Birks taxonomy of remedies captures five different denotations of the term in English law: 'a cause of action', to 'a right born of a wrong', to 'a right born from a court order', 'a right born of an injustice' and 'right born of a court's order issued on a discretionary basis.' P Birks 'Rights, Wrongs and Remedies' (2000) 20 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 1, 9–17 (The two meanings not mentioned in the text are or grievance, and.) See also R Zakraewski Remedies Reclassified (2005). A panoply of purposes for the term exist in South African law: a statutory right (Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Wolfaardt 2002 (1) SA 49 (SCA) at para 2: 'The 1956 Act . . . created a statutory remedy for the commission of what was referred to as an "unfair labour practice" which was soon interpreted by the Courts to C include the unfair dismissal of an employee'); a common-law right (Standard Bank of South Africa Ltd v Oneanate Investments (Pty) Ltd (In Liquidation) 1998 (1) SA 811, 821A (A)('Its remedy, if any, was to sue oneanate by way of a condictio'); an order of summary judgment (First National Bank of SA Ltd v Myburgh 2002 (4) SA 176 (C) at para 8 ('Summary judgment is designed to give plaintiff a speedy and cost-effective remedy in the case where the defendant does not disclose a valid and bona fide defence. It is an extraordinary and stringent remedy'); a right of appeal (S v Dzukuda & Others; S v Tshilo 2000 (4) SA 1078 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1252 (CC) at para 48 ('If the provisions are misapplied the accused has an appeal remedy or may use the special entry mechanism of the CPA in case of irregularity'); a the court's order (Gory v Kolver NO & Others 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC) at para 21 ('The Starke sisters argue that reading words into section 1(1) as ordered by the High Court is not the appropriate remedy in this case'). See, generally, M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 9. See also I Currie and J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition 2005). As the case law and the denotations of emedies above suggests, a remedy generally requires a specific dispute resolution process that parties much exhaust before moving on to the next process — or to court. The IGFRA does not specify a remedy — but leaves it open to the parties to use informal 'political structures' — MINMECS, Premier Councils, for example — to secure a positive outcome. The reasons are obvious: normal dispute resolution mechanisms — in adversary structures like courts — often generate zero sum outcomes out of their zero sum games. Political solutions are to be preferred as a normative matter for two reasons: (1) deliberation and conversation may elicit more information and produce better outcomes; (2) multiple stakeholder processes create greater normative legitimacy. On information deficits: A growing contingent of constitutional law scholars have recognized that problems of information deficit, lack of cross-cultural understanding and limited institutional competence can be 'solved' by a subtle recasting of existing constitutional doctrines and judicial remedies that extract better information and thereby achieve more mindful results. See, e g, M Dorf & C Sabel 'A Constitution of Democratic Experimentalism' (1998) 98 Columbia LR 267; M Dorf & B Friedman 'Shared Constitutional Interpretation' (2000) Supreme Court Review 61; C Sabel & W Simon 'Destabilization Rights: How Public Law Litigation Succeeds' (2004) 117 Harvard LR 1015; C Sunstein Infotopia (2007); R Thaler & C Sunstein Nudge (2008) For the application of experimental constitutionalism to South African jurisprudence, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa 2 ed (OS February 2005) Chapter 31; S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa 2 ed (OS July 2006) Chapter 34; S Woolman The Selfless Constitution: Experimentation and Flourishing as the Foundations of South Africa's Basic Law (forthcoming 2010). For more on the possibility of normative legitimacy arising out of conflict about the fundamental norms undergirding a heterogeneous society, see R Cover 'Nomos and Narrative' (1983) 97 Harvard LR 42. More importantly, perhaps, the novelty of South Africa's constitutional design — as reflected in Chapter 3 and in the IGRFA — is that it tries through both constitutional provisions and a subordinate piece of legislation to ensure that politics remains relatively cabined, and that disputes that courts are ill-equipped to handle remain in the political domain. See C Murray and R Simeon 'Recognition without Empowerment: Minorities in a Democratic South Africa' (2007) 5 ICON 699 (The authors pay particular attention to the manner in which 'South African constitutional design, … gives strong recognition to diversity and difference in private life, while seeking to the greatest extent possible to prevent ethnocultural differences entering the public sphere … [and] trace this through the fundamental principles set out in the Constitution, the Bill of Rights, the designation of a multisphere [and co-operative] government.') to the extra-judicial resolution of the dispute; (2) the extent to which the dispute turns on a question of legal interpretation which might have been resolved amicably; and (3) the preparedness of the parties to strike comprises (ie each party's duty 'to re-evaluate its position fundamentally') and by extension whether the requirements of FC s 41(3) have been met, depends on whether all extra-judicial avenues for resolving the dispute have been exhausted. Three factors are relevant to this inquiry: (1) the seriousness of each party's commitment to the extra-judicial resolution of the dispute; (2) the extent to which the dispute turns on a question of legal interpretation which might have been resolved amicably; and (3) the preparedness of the parties to strike comprises (ie each party's duty 'to re-evaluate its position fundamentally').[1] The National Gambling Board Court wrote that disputes about 'questions of interpretation' should be resolved 'amicably'. . . '[O]rgans of state's obligation to avoid litigation entails much more than an effort to settle a pending court case. It requires of each organ of state [involved in the dispute] to re-evaluate its position fundamentally.'[2]

In Uthukela District Municipality v President of the Republic of South Africa, the Constitutional Court endorsed its previous holdings in First Certification Judgment and National Gambling Board. In short, all extra-judicial avenues for resolving a dispute had to have been exhausted before they became justiciable. It then added the proposition that FC s 41(1)(h)(vi), when read with FC s 41(3), obliged organs of state 'to avoid litigation against one another irrespective of whether special structures [for dispute resolution] exist or not'.[3] The Uthukela District Municipality Court's change in heart can be explained by a belief shared by many parties: the state should allow a significant period to pass in order for various government actors and sectors to develop a regime of 'best practices' upon which any FC s 41(2) legislation might draw.[4]

The Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act reflects the wisdom of the Constitutional Court's patient approach and adopts many of the Court's views as to how intergovernmental conflicts should be resolved. For the purposes of this section, what is important is that the Act defines intergovernmental relations as a 'relationships that arise between different governments or between organs of state from different governments in the conduct of their affairs.'[5] The Act is silent with regard to the problem of how co-operation between provincial departments within any given province should be regulated. We will call this 'horizontal

[1] National Gambling Board (supra) at paras 35 -36.

[2] Ibid. See, further, R Simeon & C Murray 'Multilevel Government in South Africa: An Interim Assessment' (2001) 31 Publius: The Journal of Federalism 65.

[3] 2003 (1) SA 687 (CC)('Uthukela District Municipality') at para 22.

[4] See Department of Provincial and Local Government The Intergovernmental Relations Audit: Towards a Culture of Co-operative Government (1999); C Mentzel & J Fick 'Transformaion Perspectives on Policy Management: Dynamics of Intergovernmental Relations with Specific Reference to the Eastern Cape' (1996) 2 Africanus 26.

[5] IGRFA s 1.

intra-governmental relations'.[1] Neither the Final Constitution's provisions on Co-operative Government in FC ss 40 and 41 nor the Act speak directly to these 'horizontal intra-governmental relations'.[2] The Final Constitution's muteness and the Act's silence with regard to 'horizontal intra-governmental relations' are important for two primary reasons. First, departments within the same sphere of government are often required to co-operate with respect to the discharge of their functions. Second, it is simply not possible to regulate horizontal relations through contracts or binding agreements between departments. Why? Provincial departments lack autonomous legal personality.

One object of this section is to determine whether the Act and its mechanisms for formalizing relationships and resolving disputes between organs of state by way of implementation protocols could be employed to manage intra-governmental relationships. This determination turns, in large part, on what constitutes an intergovernmental dispute for the purposes of the Act and the Final Constitution. Again, our reading of the constitutional provisions on co-operative government and the apposite provisions of the Act is that they are not meant to address or to resolve horizontal provincial intra-governmental conflict. However, both of these constitutional and statutory frameworks — and the case law that has arisen under them — suggest a set of best practices that might assist provincial departments in crafting documents that should ensure greater cooperation between departments and that could assist provincial MECs and the Premier with the resolution of any disputes that might arise between provincial departments.

The second and more important object of this section is to note that the silence of the Final Constitution and the Act is an unavoidable consequence of how provincial power is allocated. In terms of the Final Constitution, all authority over provincial departments, agencies and organs vests within the Premier. Disputes that arise within and between departments, agencies and organs must be resolved by the Premier or other members of the Executive Council.

As we shall see, the constitutional powers of the Premier — along with recent statutory developments and a venerable line of case law — determines the entire landscape for the resolution of provincial horizontal intra-governmental disputes. If the Premier, or the MEC responsible for the implementation of a given policy, wish to hold heads of department or other senior officials culpable for their actions, or their failure to act, then they can do so. I would contend that the most powerful tools for this purpose are performance agreements with heads of department and senior officials. Co-operation between provincial departments can, therefore, be regulated by making satisfaction of co-operation protocols or implementation protocols a component in performance agreements. In addition, the Premier can establish dispute resolution principles and intra-governmental forums, akin to those contemplated by the Final Constitution and the Act. Ultimately, however, the power to resolve provincial intra-governmental disputes lies wholly within the hands of the Premier.

[1] 'Horizontal intra-governmental disputes' is Stu Woolman's neologism. The denotation is clear. We have constitutional and statutory provisions regarding 'intergovernmental relations' — but none specifically aimed at intra-governmental disputes. We simply want to highlight that they exist, that there is a lacuna in the law regarding their regulation and that there are a couple of constructive ways of mediating those disputes.

[2] The Act does engage co-operation between distinct municipalities. For the purposes of this section, however, horizontal co-operation is restricted to co-operation — or lack thereof — between departments within a province.

(bb) Executive Authority of Provinces

FC s 125 tells us that 'executive authority is vested in the Premier of the Province.' In particular, it tells us that

> The Premier exercises the executive authority, together with the other members of the Executive Council, by (a) implementing provincial legislation in the province; (b) implementing all national legislation within the functional areas listed in Schedule 4 or 5 except where the Constitution or an Act of Parliament provides otherwise; . . . (d) developing and implementing provincial policy; (e) co-ordinating the functions of the provincial administration and its departments.

The language of FC s 125 leads, almost inexorably, to the conclusion that the Premier — along with members of the Executive Council (whom he may appoint and fire at will) — may determine how policy is implemented and how various departments are to work together to realize that policy. Should the Premier and his various line managers wish to establish dispute resolution mechanisms, there is nothing in the Final Constitution to prevent them from doing so. However, in the absence of such dispute resolution mechanisms — say in the form of provincial legislation or internal guidance documents or policy — the responsibility for deciding how disputes are resolved ultimately rests with the Premier and his deputies.

In sum, contrary to intergovernmental disputes in which the courts may, ultimately, be asked to resolve conflicts between organs of state within different spheres of government, the resolution of horizontal intra-governmental disputes between organs of state within the same province will remain the sole prerogative of the Premier. As we shall see in the next section, this result is legally necessary because different departments do not possess separate legal personality and cannot contract with each other or litigate against each other. Should a Premier wish to rearrange Departments — through merger, through disaggregation of responsibilities or through the shifting of portfolios — she has the constitutional power to do so.[1] A department that exists and functions largely at the behest of the Premier can hardly be expected to contest decisions taken by another department that exists and functions largely at the behest of the Premier. Both departments not only exist to serve the Premier. The departments are, at their most basic level, merely different manifestations of the Premier. The Premier can hardly be expected to contract with herself or sue herself for some breach of performance.

And yet, differences between provincial departments are commonplace, and many departments operate under the misapprehension that they can enter legally binding, and judicially enforceable, contracts with one another. In the next section, we attempt to further demonstrate exactly why provincial departments lack, under South African law, the legal personality necessary to enter contracts with other provincial departments in the same province. Having shown that provincial departments lack the legal personality to enter contracts with other intra-provincial departments, we will turn to the practical question that that animates the last portion of this section: How might a Premier might establish mechanisms for the resolution of disputes between entities that are, in the end, manifestations of her authority?

[1] See C Murray & O Ampofo-Anti 'Provincial Executive Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 20.

(cc) A Lack of Departmental Personality

The Final Constitution does not create provincial departments. Instead it creates nine provinces.[1] Each province, as FC s 125 declares, has a single executive headed by the Premier. Departments themselves are created by section 7(2) of the Public Service Act ('PSA').[2] Departments can be established or abolished by the President (of the national government). He or she may do so simply by amending Schedule 2 of the PSA by proclamation. Amendments of this kind are made 'at the request of the Premier of a province'.[3]

As a day-to-day matter, provincial departments function relatively autonomously. Each department, for example, has its own accounting officer.[4] Were the Premier to have to sign off on every decision, provincial government would grind to a halt. However, despite the appearance of departmental autonomy, the province produces consolidated finance statements for all its Departments, has a single provincial revenue fund controlled by the provincial treasury,[5] and has a single budget which controls the expenditure of Departments.[6]

The case law buttresses our contention that provincial departments lack the legal personality to contract legally and formally with other provincial Departments within the same province.[7] In Natal Provincial Administration v South African Railways and Harbours, the Natal Provincial Administration attempted to sue the South African Railway.[8] The railway was, at the time, located in another depart-

[1] See FC s 103(1).

[2] Proclamation No. 103 of 1994.

[3] PSA s 7(5)(a)(ii).

[4] See Public Finance Management Act 1 of 1999 ('PFMA') s 36(1). It is also accountable for its own financial management. See PFMA s 38.

[5] PSA s 21.

[6] PSA s 39(1)(a).

[7] We are not suggesting that departments lack the capacity to take decisions and enter into various contracts (but they do so on behalf of the Premier). Intragovernmental service agreements — unlike other service contracts — are not subject to resolution through litigation. The power to resolve these disputes vests in the Premier. The Premier may create or disband the entities in question.

[8] 1936 NPD 643. The courts have been clear that pre-1994 case law that coheres with the Constitution is still good law. In a number of relatively recent cases, the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal have deployed the doctrine of stare decisis in a manner that dramatically curtails the ability of High Courts to use the Bill of Rights, for example, and FC s 39(2), in particular, to develop the common law or to re-interpret legislation in ways that depart from Constitutional Court, Supreme Court Appeal, or Appellate Division precedent. The Constitutional Court in Walters restricted its conclusions about stare decisis to precedent handed down by the Constitutional Court, the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Appellate Division in the (rather ambiguously described) 'constitutional era.' Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: In re S v Walters & Another 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002

ment within the 'Crown'. The Province's claim was dismissed by the court because, given that both the province and the railway were departments of the Crown, the suit would be tantamount to the Crown suing itself.

Years later — in Government of the Republic of South Africa v Government of KwaZulu — the Appellate Division confirmed the 'general principle of our law that one organ of the State cannot sue another organ of the State.'[1] Despite this general statement of the law, the KZN Court permitted KwaZulu, a self-governing territory or 'Homeland', to sue the South African government. The Appellate Division found, in the instant matter, that 'there is sufficient separation in identity between the [the South African government], on the one hand, and … [KwaZulu], on the other hand, to entitle [KwaZulu], . . . to approach the Court for relief.'[2] However, the result in KZN is the exception — a natural anomaly thrown up by the absurdities of apartheid. The notion of 'indivisible sovereignty' is a doctrine that will not, therefore, always dispose of internecine conflicts. Indeed, today's South Africa is not an indivisible sovereign. Municipalities, provinces, and public entities have separate legal personality.[3] Thus, while the outcome of KZN seems incontrovertible, its principle applies only within a given organ of state.

The IGRFA, as we have seen, defines an 'intergovernmental dispute' as 'a dispute between different governments or between organs of state from different governments'. 'Government', in turn, is defined in IGRFA s 1, as '(a) the national-government; (b) a provincial government; or (c) a local government.' IGRFA s 40 contemplates a "formal agreement between two or more organs of state in different governments" (emphasis added) and regulates dispute resolution between those governments. But no provision is made whatsoever for agreements or disputes within a provincial government between provincial departments. This silence, read against the background of the Final Constitution, and the pre-constitutional case law, is a powerful indication that such agreements are, strictly speaking, not legally enforceable.

---

(7) BCLR 663 (CC)('Walters') at para 61. The Supreme Court of Appeal in Afrox extended binding precedent — backwards — past the very beginning of even the most controversial understanding of the constitutional era. Afrox Healthcare Bpk v Strydom 2002 (6) SA 21 (SCA)('Afrox'). The Afrox Court recognized that High Courts could retain constitutional jurisdiction for any direct attack on a rule of law grounded in a preconstitutional decision of the Appellate Division. However, where a High Court is persuaded that a pre-constitutional decision of the Appellate Division should be developed through FC s 39(2), so that it accords with the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights (true indirect application), its hands are tied. The High Court is bound to follow the pre-constitutional decisions of the Appellate Division. Brand JA, for the Afrox Court, writes: 'Die antwoord is dat die beginsels van stare decisis steeds geld en dat die Hooggeregshof nie deur artikel 39(2) gemagtig word om van die beslissings van hierdie Hof, hetsy pre- hetsy post-konstitusioneel, af te wyk nie. Ibid at para 29. There can be no doubt, as the law currently stands, about the continued binding authority of pre-1994 decisions handed down by South African courts. See further S Woolman & D Brand 'Is There a Constitution in This Courtroom: Constitutional Jurisdiction after Afrox and Walters' (2003) 18 SA Public Law 38.

[1] 1983 (1) 164, 205 (AD)('KZN').

[2] Ibid at 205A – 206 A (Emphasis added).

[3] Local Government: Municipal Systems Act 32 of 2000 s 2*(d)*. For more on the legal personality of municipalities, see N Steyler & J de Visser Local Government Law of South Africa (2007); N Steyler & J de Visser 'Local Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, M Bishop, J Klaaren & A Stein (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 22.

Moreover, the existence of a single provincial revenue fund means that the result of any such disputes would be that the unsuccessful party would make a payment from the provincial revenue fund to the successful party, who, in turn, would place the payment back into the revenue fund. Any intention to reallocate funds between the two departments — for whatever reason — could be more efficiently and less awkwardly achieved through a provincial adjustment in the budget.[1] The presence of a single revenue fund for both 'potential' litigants is one more strong indication that there is an insufficient separation in juristic identity for two governmental entities in the same province to sue each other.[2]

Furthermore, if provincial Departments could be established or abolished merely by amending the schedule to the Public Service Act, and provincial departments were treated as independent entities, then it would throw into doubt the status of all contractual claims against all abolished provincial departments. Who would pick up the tab if the department were abolished? As a matter of law, no provision is made in the PSA or the PFMA for the succession of departments. In addition, when provincial departments enter into contracts with third parties, they do so 'on behalf of' the province. Indeed, the State Liability Act states that the Minister or MEC of a department concerned with contractual litigation will be cited as the 'nominal defendant or respondent.'[3]

The Final Constitution, the IGRFA, the PSA, the PFMA, the State Liability Act, the extant case law, the organization of provincial revenue funds and the ability of a Premier to chop and to change departments at will points to a single conclusion. Provincial departments lack the legal personality necessary to enter formal legal agreements and to sue when other provincial departments — in the same province — fail to uphold their end of a bargain.

(dd) Finding a Legal Nexus

Inter-departmental co-operation is a necessary feature of effective provincial government. Even though provincial departments are not legally separate from each other, they develop their own performance requirements and their own organisational identity. They tend to interact with one another on an 'arm's length basis'. These practices have generated pressure for legally-binding protocols or memoranda that regulate inter-departmental co-operation. In other words, some provincial departments would like to be able to sue other provincial departments that fail to discharge obligations undertaken through inter-departmental memoranda — or at least to deal with disputes in a legally formal manner.

As we have already noted, the manner in which power vests within different spheres of government precludes the treatment of intra-governmental disputes between departments in the same province as formal legal disputes. Because departments are a creation of the provincial premier, and may be rationalised, re-organised, established or abolished at the discretion of the Premier, they do not possess separate legal identity. Hence, contracts with a provincial department of health are, in fact, contracts with the province, and litigation against a provincial department of health is, in fact, litigation against the province. Thus, just as it is impossible for a person to litigate against himself, so too is it impossible for provincial departments to litigate against each other.

[1] See PFMA s 31.

[2] See South African Railways v Kemp 1916 TPD 174, 177 (The existence of a separate Railway Fund undermined the notion of a unified sovereign.)

[3] Act 20 of 1957 s 2.

There are two possible responses to this problem. The first response is to develop protocols that regulate intra-governmental co-operation and are enforced by the Premier or the executive of the province. In the next section, we suggest how the Act can be used as a guide in developing such protocols for resolving intra-governmental disputes. (Of course, it follows from the logic of our argument that such disputes can also be resolved by the Premier by fiat.) The second (and related) response is to develop performance-based contracts of employment with senior officials within the Province. Compliance with memoranda of co-operation or intra-governmental implementation protocols can be made a key performance area monitored by MECs or the Premier. Failure to achieve key performance indicators within this performance area can result in reduced bonuses, lack of promotion, re-assignment or even dismissal. In short, because it is not possible to create binding agreements between provincial departments, one compelling alternative is to use the employment agreements of heads of departments or senior officials within the province to enforce memoranda of co-operation. The most effective legal mechanism for ensuring provincial inter-departmental co-operation is to be found in employment contracts — and nowhere else.

If a provincial department intends to pursue this second response, it will be necessary to review current employment contracts with senior officials and obtain labour advice on the possibility of amending these contracts to insert additional performance requirements. Further elaboration of this rather novel legal mechanism falls beyond the scope of this chapter.

(ee) Using The IGRFA as a Guide to Intra-Governmental Disputes

Although the Act cannot resolve a dispute between two or more departments of the same provincial government, we wish to suggest that it may serve as a "guide" to the formation of documents that might assist the province in the resolution of such conflicts. Section 35 of the Act introduces the concept of implementation protocols ('IPs'). IPs have, heretofore, often been referred to as memoranda of co-operation. The advent of the Act has refined the meaning and the scope of such agreements. As we have already noted, section 35(1) of the Act emphasises that where the implementation of a policy, the exercise of a statutory power or the performance of a statutory function, or the provision of a service is dependant on different state organs acting in concert, the state actors involved must coordinate their actions. They may do so by entering into an implementation protocol. This proviso means that while an IP is not compulsory, some form of agreement of cooperation is necessary. Section 35(2) demands that an IP must be considered in the following situations:

> an implementation protocol will materially assist the organs of state participating in the provision of a service in a specific area to co-ordinate their actions in that area; or an organ of state to which primary responsibility for the implementation of the policy, the exercise of the statutory power, the performance of the statutory function or the provision of the service has been assigned lacks the necessary capacity.[1]

(ff) Dispute Settlement

As we have been at pains to point out, neither FC Chapter 3 nor the Act provide mechanisms for the resolution of intra-governmental provincial dispute resolution. The power to determine such mechanisms vests in the Premier.

However, both FC Chapter 3 and the Act suggest how government officials might best resolve such disputes. One non-judicial mechanism might be an intra-governmental forum. Such a forum could be composed of designated officials from the relevant departments, the appropriate MECs and the Premier. The Act also suggests the following dispute resolution mechanisms: (a) the provincial Premier or relevant MECs could provide a facilitator; and/or (b) the facilitator could submit a non-binding report to the Premier.

(gg) Enforcement

Neither Chapter 3 of the Final Constitution nor the Act speak to intra-governmental dispute resolution. The reason for this silence is that intra-governmental disputes between provincial departments do not generate justiciable constitutional or legal conflicts. The power to resolve such disputes vests solely in the Premier of the province.

That the power to resolve such disputes vests solely in the Premier of the province does not mean that the Premier lacks the capacity to prevent intra-governmental conflicts. The Premier has an array of tools at his disposal to prevent — and to resolve — such conflicts. Agreements between departments — though not contracts in the normal justiciable sense — can be crafted in a manner that permits third parties to determine whether the provincial departments in question have discharged their duties. The Act's provisions regarding Implementation Protocols offer a reasonably good template for such agreements.

Ultimately, however, an intra-governmental agreement is only as good as the penalties in place for non-compliance. Such penalties for non-compliance might range from the withholding of performance bonuses for the parties responsible for the breach to the actual discharge of officials who repeatedly failed to comply with their statutory, ministerial or IP responsibilities. Agreements between provincial departments in the same province must make absolutely certain that all parties concerned understand that failure to discharge their duties may result in the imposition of such severe penalties.

(e) Practical Problems with the IGFRA: Premiers' Intergovernmental Forums and the District Intergovernmental Forums

Several studies have suggested that two types of forum envisaged by the IGRFA — the Premiers' Intergovernmental Forums (PIFS) and the District Intergovernmental Forums (DIFS) — are not living up to expectations. The primary problem is that their membership often suffers from being both over-inclusive and under-inclusive.

[1] IGRFA s 35(2)(c)-(d). The Act then elaborates, in IGFRA 35(3), the features that an IP must possess.

As we noted above, forum membership should consist largely of those politicians responsible for the issues under consideration. Research conducted by Nico Steytler, R Baatjies and other academics at the University of the Western Cape reveals a 'doors open' approach to attendance. As a result, forums often contain as many bureaucrats as politicians.[1] Such openness has its virtues: bureaucrats and politicians may exchange useful information. However, other avenues exist for the transmission of technical information. The purpose of the forums is the coordination of policy. The over-inclusiveness has three untoward effects. First, 'too many chefs' may well reduce the effectiveness of forum discussions. Second, the regular presence of bureaucrats may lead to their 'politicization' — when their function, in a well operating democracy, is to provide politicians with fairly objective assessments. Third, the research conducted by Steytler and others suggest that the presence of bureaucrats in these open forums is largely intended to intimidate politicians who hold opposing or minority views.[2] Indeed, the very possibility of such intimidation is one reason the Act sought to limit forum membership in the manner it did.[3]

The exclusion of local municipalities from PIFs appears to have based upon the assumption that information would be shared with local municipalities through DIFs. However, DIFs have not played this role. The under-inclusivity of PIFs is of particular import where a given municipality supplies a significant portion of the economic resources required to carry out the mandate of a given PIF.[4]

The studies conducted by the University of the Western Cape also reveal some confusion regarding the obligations each sphere of government and each organ of state have in terms of the IGRFA.[5] For example, many municipalities operate under the mistaken impression that the inclusion of bureaucrats in the DIFs amounts to the establishment of a Technical Support Structure.[6] Technical Support Structures are independent bodies and consist solely of governmental officials. If a sphere of government wishes to establish such structures, then they must comply with the requirements of the IGRFA.

---

[1] R Baatjies & N Steytler District Intergovernmental Forums and Premiers Intergovernmental Forums: A Preliminary Assessment of Institutional Compliance with the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act (2006) Local Government Project, Community Law Centre, University of the Western Cape.

[2] Ibid.

[3] The Intergovernmental Relations Audit reports confusion, especially in the DIFs, as to who is a formal member and who is merely an invitee.

[4] Ibid.

[5] R Baatjies & N Steytler 'Intergovernmental Relations in Practice' (2006) 8(5) Local Government Bulletin.

[6] R Baatjies & N Steytler District Intergovernmental Forums and Premiers Intergovernmental Forums: A Preliminary Assessment of Institutional Compliance with the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act (2006) Local Government Project, Community Law Centre, University of the Western Cape. See also Y Fessha & N Steytler (2006) Provincial Intergovernmental Forums: A post–Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act Compliance Assessment Local Government Project, Community Law Centre, University of the Western Cape (November 2006).

Finally, it comes as no surprise that provincial government officials often dominate PIFS and leave little opportunity for district officials to voice their opinions.[1] The PIFs appear to replicate many of the problems we have already identified with national/provincial fora such as the President's Co-ordinating Council.

(f) ANC Dominance and the Efficacy of the IGFRA

As we noted earlier, the Final Constitution creates space for two competing forms of federalism. Each form of federalism reflects a different conception of intergovernmental relations (IGR) and cooperative governance. The first form of integrated South African federalist state contemplated by the Final Constitution — call it cooperative IGR — assumes relative parity of power between the national government and subnational constituents (the provinces and the municipalities.)[2] The second form of integrated South African federalist state contemplated by the Final Constitution — call it coercive IGR — reflects a hierarchical distribution of power: national government largely dominates the nation's subnational constituent parts.[3] However, several important pieces of legislation — including the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act, the Provincial Tax Regulation Process Act 53 of 2001, the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act 97 of 1997, and the Division of Revenue Act — and constitutional provisions that determine the parameters of provincial and local fiscal autonomy tilt our body politic in the direction of coercive IGR. The marriage of political culture — ANC dominance — to political structures that favour the national government — and ANC dominance — underwrite this contention.[4] However, Steytler and Watt's analyses in this regard carry more than a whiff of disappointment — as if things might have been different. Mahlerbe likewise writes: 'The Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act reflects the present centralizing tendency from the side of the national government, and it will serve to confirm, no, reinforce, the de facto status

[1] R Baatjies & N Steytler District Intergovernmental Forums and Premiers Intergovernmental Forums: A Preliminary Assessment of Institutional Compliance with the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act (2006) Local Government Project, Community Law Centre, University of the Western Cape.

[2] N Steytler 'Cooperative and Coercive Models of Intergovernmental Relations: A South African Case Study' in Intergovernmental Relations: A Festhschrift for Ronald Watts (forthcoming, 2009, on file with author); R Watts Intergovernmental Relations: A Report for the Department of Constitutional Development and Provincial Affairs (1999).

[3] In 1997, Ronald Watts contended that the Final Constitution 'represents an innovative hybrid combining some federal features with some constitutionally decentralized unitary features'. R Watts Federalism: The Canadian Experience in Federalism: Theory and Practice Volume 2 (1997) 2. See also N Steytler 'One Party Dominance and the Functioning of South Africa's Decentralised System of Government' in Rudolf Hrbek (ed) Political Parties and Federalism (2004) 159.

[4] See R Watts 'Intergovernmental Relations: Conceptual Issues' N Levy and C Tapscott (eds) Intergovernmental Relations in South Africa: The Challenges of Co-operative Government (2001) 22; C Leuprecht and H Lazar, 'From Multilevel to "Multi-order' Governance?" in H Lazar and C Leuprecht (eds) (2007) Spheres of Governance: Comparative Studies of Cities in Multilevel Governance Systems' 1. Steytler writes: 'While the object of providing "coherent government" may seem a neutral goal, the coherence is, however, premised on the "realisation of national priorities"... Given that the nature and extent of these [provincial and municipal] services are prescribed in national policies and legislation, the focus then shifts to [the] "monitoring implementation" of [national] policy and legislation' and not the coordination of varying policy initiatives. N Steytler Cooperative and Coercive Models of Intergovernmental Relations' (supra) at 7.

of the other spheres as delivery agents of the national government.'[1] But given 15 years of political dominance by the ANC (65% of the electorate is still 65%) and its longstanding resistance to fully devolved federalism, it is hard to imagine how things might have turned out otherwise.

One incident serves as anecdotal evidence for the realpolitik view that 'coercion' animates current IGR and the manner in which the IGRFA is brought to bear on specific disputes. In 2006, the Democratic Alliance, with a plurality of the local government vote, secured sufficient support from other opposition parties to form a majority in the municipal government of Cape Town. The ANC controlled provincial government in the Western Cape attempted to change existing regulations in order to enable an ANC coalition to retain control of the municipality. The National government was, not surprisingly, strangely slow to intercede and to mediate the dispute.[2] Ultimately, the National government did intervene and a compromise was reached.[3] Such responses are indicative of coercive IGR and do little to demonstrate a genuine commitment to the Final Constitution's vision of three distinct, interdependent, and interrelated spheres of government.

[1] See R Malherbe 'Does the Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act 13 of 2005 Confirm or Suppress National Dominance' (2006) (4) Tydskrif vir die Suid-Afrikaanse Reg 810.

[2] P Joubert 'Zille: ANC Top Dogs in the Loop' Mail & Guardian (25 September 2006) available at http://www.mg.co.za/articlePage.aspx?articleid=284876&area=/insight_national, accessed on 1 May 2009.

[3] See D Dyzenhaus 'The Pasts and Future of the Rule of Law in South Africa' (2007) 124 SALJ 734.

15 Legislative Competence

Victoria Bronstein

15.1 Introduction 15-1
15.2 The legislative authority of the Republic 15-2
(a) Schedule 4 — Concurrent legislative competence 15-3
(b) Schedule 5 — Exclusive provincial legislative competence 15-4
(c) Exclusive national legislative competence and assignment of powers by the national legislature 15-5
(d) Other provincial legislative powers 15-5
15.3 Interpretive issues 15-7
(a) The categorisation function: Allocating legislation to functional areas. 15-7
(i) Presumptions and politics. 15-8
(ii) A functional approach 15-10
(iii) The purpose and effect of the legislation 15-12
(iv) An historical approach 15-12
(b) Interpreting the scope of the section 44(2) override . . . 15-13
(c) Interpreting the scope of the incidental power 15-14
(i) The current source of the incidental power 15-14
(ii) Implicit use of the incidental power in 'DVB Behuising'. 15-14
(iii) Approaching the incidental power 15-17
(iv) Is there a point beyond which the incidental power cannot go as implied by the minority judgement in 'DVB Behuising'? 15-20
(v) Another approach 15-20
(vi) The scope of the incidental power in relation to schedule 5 competences 15-20
(d) When is competence tested?. 15-21

15.1 INTRODUCTION

This chapter explores how the division of power amongst national and provincial governments in our Constitution affects the validity of legislation. Legislative competence is an important issue in all constitutional regimes with federal characteristics.[1]

The South African Constitution allocates legislative powers between central and provincial governments on the basis of the subject matter of the legislation.[2] According to the Final Constitution[3], the nine provincial legislatures in South Africa are entitled to legislate, inter alia, on a number of subjects that are listed in schedules 4 and 5 of the Final Constitution.[4] These subjects are called 'functional areas'. National and provincial governments share legislative competence in functional areas listed in schedule 4. Schedule 4 embraces crucial matters like 'health services' and 'housing'. The functional areas in schedule 5 are usually the exclusive domain of provincial and local governments. Residual matters, not mentioned in either schedule, are reserved for the national legislature.[5] For example, foreign affairs would be the preserve of the national government.[6]

In all litigation that turns on questions of legislative competence, one must first determine the subject matter of the legislation under scrutiny. In some cases this

[1] South Africa is a state with federal characteristics. However, only governmental practice married to judgments of the Constitutional Court will, over time, determine where South Africa rests on a continuum of states with different degrees of decentralization. For a discussion of the contours of various models of federalism and their influence on South Africa's political structures, see S Woolman, T Roux and B Bekink, 'Cooperative Government' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, A Stein and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 14.

R L Watts describes our Constitution as a 'unique South African hybrid' and adds:

> The Constitution is predominantly federal in character, although the label 'federation' has not been adopted. In my view, debates about whether South Africa is 'federal' or not are fruitless. More important is whether this particular form of hybrid makes possible effective governance and policy-making at both the national and sub national levels to meet the needs of the South African people, and whether modifications would help to meet these objectives.'

R L Watts 'Forward: States, Provinces, Lander, and Cantons: International Variety Among Sub National Constitutions' (2000) 31 Rutgers L J 941, 950. See also R L Watts 'Is the New South African Constitution Federal or Unitary' in B de Villiers (ed) Birth of a Constitution (1994) 75-88. (This analysis of the Interim Constitution would still be relevant as Constitutional Principle XVIII.2 provided that 'the powers and functions of the provinces' could not be substantially reduced by the Final Constitution).

[2] See R L Watts Federalism: The Canadian Experience (1997) 36-49; H M Seervai Constitutional Law of India (vol 1, 4 ed 1991) 287-289; Philip M Blair Federalism and Judicial Review in West Germany (1981) 71-92; P Hanks Australian Constitutional Law: Materials and Commentary (5 ed 1994) 348. See also In re National Education Policy Bill 1995, 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC); 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC) at para 22; B De Villiers (ed) Evaluating Federal Systems (1994); J Rose and J C Traut (eds) Federalism and Decentralization: Perspectives for the Transformation Process in Eastern and Central Europe (2002); D J Elazar Federalism: an Overview (1995); C Bolick European Federalism: Lessons from America (1994).

[3] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[4] FC ss 104(1)(b)(i) and 104(1)(b)(ii).

[5] FC s 33(1)(a)(iii).

[6] See Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa: In re Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ('Liquor Bill') at para 46.

assessment is straightforward. For example, in In re National Education Policy Bill 1995,[1] the National Education Policy Bill[2] was automatically characterised as being about 'education'. Other cases are more difficult. The categorisation of legislation may raise challenging questions of statutory interpretation that force the Court to engage delicate political issues.[3]

If Parliament or a provincial legislature is held not to have had the competence to pass specific legislation, the resulting law will be invalid. In many cases about provincial powers, there is only an apparent conflict between specific provincial and national legislation. Thus, the first step in all competence and conflicts cases is to examine both legislative schemes individually to determine whether they are independently competent. If either the provincial legislation, or the national legislation, or both, fail the test of competence, the offending statute or statutes are invalid and the conflict is illusory. In some cases both pieces of conflicting legislation will be fully competent and valid: as we have already noted, our Constitution allows for vast and important areas of concurrent national and provincial legislative competence.[4] (The resolution of such conflicts is dealt with in the next chapter.[5]) It must, however, be remembered that legislative conflict presupposes that the conflicting legislation is competent and valid. The question of competence is always logically prior to the question of conflict.

This chapter starts by explaining the way in which the Constitution regulates the division of powers between the national legislature and the provincial legislatures. It then explores three major interpretive issues: (1) the categorisation function; (2) the scope of the section 44(2) override; and (3) the scope of the incidental power.

15.2 The Legislative Authority of the Republic

In South Africa, the legislative authority of the national sphere of government is vested in Parliament by FC s 44. The legislative authority of the provincial sphere of government is vested in the provincial legislatures in terms of FC s 104.[6] There is at least one signal difference in the way the Final Constitution treats the two kinds of authority. FC s 43 reads:

> When exercising its legislative authority, Parliament is bound only by the Constitution, and must act in accordance with, and within the limits of, the Constitution.

[1] 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC).
[2] Act 83 of 1995.
[3] See DVB Behuising (Pty) Limited v North West Provincial Government and another 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347(CC) ('DVB Behuising').
[4] See FC Schedule 4.
[5] See V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, A Stein and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 16.
[6] FC s 43.

In principle, a provincial legislature is also only bound by the Final Constitution when it legislates.[1] However, in cases where a particular province has passed a Provincial Constitution, that province is bound by both the national and the provincial Constitution in question.[2]

(a) Schedule 4: Concurrent legislative competence

The functional areas listed in schedule 4 cover fields of concurrent legislative competence.[3] Both the national and the provincial legislatures may pass legislation that fits into these functional areas.[4] For example, both the national legislature and a provincial legislature may pass valid legislation about 'housing'.

Determining the priority of legislation in a shared area of competence is not always so simple. A complex provincial legislative scheme may contain a provision that intrudes into a matter that should be regulated nationally. It would obviously be undesirable to be too rigid about disallowing such provisions where they are necessary for the coherence of legislation. In other federations, judges have needed to find creative judicial solutions in order to preserve the element of common-sense flexibility that is necessary to avoid legislative paralysis.[5] South Africans are assisted by the following provision in the Final Constitution:

[1] FC s 104(3).

[2] FC s 104(3).

[3] The areas of concurrent legislative competence listed in Part A of schedule 4 are 'Administration of indigenous forests; Agriculture; Airports other than international and national airports; Animal control and diseases; Casinos, racing, gambling and wagering, excluding lotteries and sports pools; Consumer protection; Cultural matters; Disaster management; Education at all levels, excluding tertiary education; Environment; Health services; Housing; Indigenous law and customary law, subject to Chapter 12 of the Constitution; Industrial promotion; Language policy and the regulation of official languages to the extent that the provisions of section 6 of the Constitution expressly confer upon the provincial legislatures legislative competence; Media services directly controlled or provided by the provincial government, subject to section 192; Nature conservation, excluding national parks, national botanical gardens and marine resources; Police to the extent that the provisions of Chapter 11 of the Constitution confer upon the provincial legislatures legislative competence; Pollution control; Population development; Property transfer fees; Provincial public enterprises in respect of the functional areas in this Schedule and Schedule 5; Public transport; Public works only in respect of the needs of provincial government departments in the discharge of their responsibilities to administer functions specifically assigned to them in terms of the Constitution or any other law; Regional planning and development; Road traffic regulation; Soil conservation; Tourism; Trade; Traditional leadership, subject to Chapter 12 of the Constitution; Urban and rural development; Vehicle licensing; Welfare services'. Part B of schedule 4 includes 'the following local government matters to the extent set out in section 155(6)(a) and (7): Air pollution; Building regulations; Child care facilities; Electricity and gas reticulation; Firefighting services; Local tourism; Municipal airports; Municipal planning; Municipal health services; Municipal public transport; Municipal public works only in respect of the needs of municipalities in the discharge of their responsibilities to administer functions specifically assigned to them under this Constitution or any other law; Pontoons, ferries, jetties, piers and harbours, excluding the regulation of international and national shipping and matters related thereto; Stormwater management systems in built-up areas; Trading regulations; Water and sanitation services limited to potable water supply systems and domestic waste-water and sewage disposal systems'.

[4] The national legislature has the power in terms of FC ss 44(1)(a)(ii) and 44(1)(b)(ii). The provincial legislature has the same power in terms of FC s 104(1)(b)(i).

[5] See K Swinton 'The Supreme Court and Canadian Federalism: The Laskin-Dickson Years' in P Macklem, R C B Risk, C J Rogerson, K E Swinton, L E Weinrib, J D Whyte Canadian Constitutional Law (Vol 1 1994) 143, 145.

> Provincial legislation with regard to a matter that is reasonably necessary for, or incidental to, the effective exercise of a power concerning any matter listed in Schedule 4, is for all purposes legislation with regard to a matter listed in Schedule 4.[1]

The scope of this power (referred to as the 'incidental power' in this chapter) raises interesting interpretive questions that will be looked at in more detail below.[2]

(b) Schedule 5: Exclusive provincial legislative competence.

Schedule 5 of the Final Constitution contains a list of discrete and (it is fair to say) relatively minor functional areas of exclusive provincial legislative competence.[3] Some functional areas possess slightly broader implications: for example, 'provincial cultural matters'. One or two, like 'liquor licenses', may have material financial implications.

The provincial legislatures have the power to pass legislation for their provinces with regard to any matter within a functional area listed in Schedule 5.[4] The general rule is that the national parliament does not have the power to legislate in these areas.[5] This rule is subject to an exception contained in FC s 44(2). This proviso allows the national legislature to 'intervene' and to legislate in Schedule 5 areas when the legislation is:

> Necessary to maintain national security; to maintain economic unity; to maintain essential national standards; to establish minimum standards required for the rendering of services; or to prevent unreasonable action taken by a province which is prejudicial to the interests of another province or to the country as a whole.

[1] FC s 104(4). See also FC s 44(3) which states: 'Legislation with regard to a matter that is reasonably necessary for, or incidental to, the effective exercise of a power concerning any matter listed in Schedule 4 is, for all purposes, legislation with regard to a matter listed in Schedule 4.'

[2] M Chaskalson and J Klaaren have suggested that there is also an incidental power that enables provincial legislation to have some operation outside the territory of a particular province. See M Chaskalson and J Klaaren 'Provincial Government' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) 4-2.

[3] Part A of Schedule 5 lists the following areas of exclusive provincial competence: 'Abattoirs; Ambulance services; Archives other than national archives; Libraries other than national libraries; Liquor licences; Museums other than national museums; Provincial planning; Provincial cultural matters; Provincial recreation and amenities; Provincial sport; Provincial roads and traffic; Veterinary services, excluding regulation of the profession'. Part B of Schedule 5 includes 'the following local government matters to the extent set out for provinces in section 155(6)(a) and (7): Beaches and amusement facilities; Billboards and the display of advertisements in public places; Cemeteries, funeral parlours and crematoria; Cleansing; Control of public nuisances; Control of undertakings that sell liquor to the public; Facilities for the accommodation, care and burial of animals; Fencing and fences; Licensing of dogs; Licensing and control of undertakings that sell food to the public; Local amenities; Local sport facilities; Markets; Municipal abattoirs; Municipal parks and recreation; Municipal roads; Noise pollution; Pounds; Public places; Refuse removal, refuse dumps and solid waste disposal; Street trading; Street lighting; Traffic and parking.'

[4] FC s 104(1)(b)(ii).

[5] FC s 44(1)(a)(ii).

When FC s 44(2) applies, the national legislation automatically prevails.[1] If the subsection does not apply, the national legislation will be invalid.[2]

For this reason disputes about Schedule 5 powers will tend to be disputes that are primarily about legislative competence rather than conflict. Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa in re: Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill illustrates this point. The judgment, which deals with a Schedule 5 area, focuses on competence rather than conflict.

(c) Exclusive national legislative competence[3] and assignment of powers by the national legislature.

'The national level of government has exclusive power in respect of all matters other than those specifically vested in the provincial legislatures' by the Constitution.[4] The general principle is that residual matters outside the scope of the functional areas in Schedules 4 and 5 are the preserve of the national legislature.[5] The Final Constitution also contains provisions that specifically empower the national legislature to enact legislation. For example, the security services must be 'structured and regulated by national legislation' in terms of FC s 199(4).

It must, however, be remembered that valid provincial legislation can regulate matters that are reasonably necessary for, or incidental to, the effective exercise of a power concerning a matter listed in Schedule 4.[6] Consequently, provincial powers can bleed into areas of exclusive national jurisdiction.[7] A provincial legislature can also acquire extra powers by assignment: Parliament may 'assign any of its legislative powers, except the power to amend the Constitution, to any legislative body in another sphere of government.'[8] Finally, a provincial legislature may play an advisory role in matters outside its authority.[9]

(d) Other provincial legislative powers

Provincial legislatures have the power to pass and to amend provincial

[1] FC s 147(2).

[2] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC); 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) ('First Certification Judgment') at para 335.

[3] The words 'exclusive national legislative competence' are not used in the Final Constitution. But see the substance of the formulation in First Certification Judgment (supra) at fn 163.

[4] Ibid at para 256.

[5] J Klaaren believes that the following matters fall within this residual legislative competence: 'justice, prisons, foreign affairs, labour, mining, energy, land, water, national public enterprises, broadcasting and posts and telecommunications.' See J Klaaren 'Federalism' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) 5-5, fn 1.

[6] FC s 104 (4).

[7] The implications of FC s 104 (4) are dealt with at § 15.2 infra.

[8] FC s 44(1)(a)(iii) read with s 104(1)(b)(iii). See T Madlingozi and S Woolman 'Provincial Legislative Authority' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, A Stein and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 19.

[9] FC s 104(5).

Constitutions.[1] They may pass legislation with regard to 'any matter for which a provision of the Constitution envisages the enactment of provincial legislation.'[2] They can assign any of their legislative powers to a municipal council in their province.[3] (Other specific competences in respect of local government are dealt with in the chapter on 'Local Government'.[4]) The provinces possess limited provincial taxing powers.[5] A provincial legislature may impose:

(a) Taxes, levies and duties other than income tax, value-added tax, general sales tax, rates on property or customs duties; and

(b) flat-rate surcharges on any tax, levy or duty that is imposed by national legislation, other than on corporate income tax, value-added tax, rates on property or customs duties.[6]

These powers 'may not be exercised in a way that materially and unreasonably prejudices national economic policies, economic activities across provincial boundaries, or the national mobility of goods, services, capital or labour.'[7] Furthermore, provincial taxes 'must be regulated in terms of an Act of Parliament, which may be enacted only after any recommendations of the Financial and Fiscal Commission have been considered.'[8] Hence, provincial taxing powers are subject to national legislation that may significantly restrict their ambit. However, as Chaskalson and Klaaren argue, the national legislature may not completely 'extinguish the provincial taxing power.'[9]

Parliament has passed the Provincial Tax Regulation Process Act[10] to regulate provincial taxes.[11]

[1] FC s 104(1)(a).

[2] FC s 104(1)(b)(iv). See also First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 256.

[3] FC s 104(1)(c).

[4] See R Kriel, M Monadjem and Barry Bekink 'Local Government' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, A Stein and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2005) Chapter 20.

[5] See T Madlingozi and S Woolman 'Provincial Legislative Authority' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, A Stein and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 19.

[6] FC s 228 (1).

[7] FC s 228 (2)(b).

[8] FC s 228(2).

[9] M Chaskalson and J Klaaren 'Provincial Government' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) 4-19.

[10] Act 53 of 2002

[11] A full analysis of this Act is beyond the scope of this chapter. But for commentary on the Act when it was still in Bill form see P Surtees 'Bill Would Allow South African Provinces to Impose Taxes' Worldwide Tax Daily (11 June 2001), available at: http://www.deneysreitz.co.za/news/news.asp?This-Cat=5&ThisItem=76) (accessed on 28 January 2004).

15.3 INTERPRETIVE ISSUES

(a) The categorisation function: Allocating legislation to functional areas

According to the Constitutional Court in DVB Behuising, assigning legislation to functional areas 'involves the determination of the subject matter or the substance of the legislation, its essence, or true purpose and effect, that is, what the [legislation] is about.'[1] An analysis of the subject matter of legislation is not just a global assessment of an entire Act. Different parts of a legislative scheme may be split up and characterized in different ways. The DVB Behuising Court writes:

> A single statute may have more than one substantial character. Different parts of the legislation may thus require different assessment in regard to a disputed question of legislative competence.[2]

[1] DVB Behuising (supra) at para 36. In Canada, Albert Abel has argued that the process of categorization should be divided into the following three separate steps that should not be conflated. (1) Identify the matter of the legislation; (2) Delineate the 'scope of the competing classes' in the Constitution; (3) Determine the class into which the legislation falls. Swinton believes that it is impossible to keep these three questions apart. The answers to the initial questions are 'affected by the ultimate objective of linking the statute to the classes of subjects in the constitution.' K Swinton 'The Supreme Court and Canadian Federalism: The Laskin-Dickson Years' in P Macklem, R C B Risk, C J Rogerson, K E Swinton, L E Weinrib, J D Whyte (eds) Canadian Constitutional Law (Vol 1 1994) 143, 144.

The outcomes of categorisation analysis can sometimes be unexpected. In German Television, the Land (Province) of Hamburg had given a broadcasting monopoly to Norddeutscher Rundfunk. 12 BVerfGE 205 (1961). The problem was whether the federal government was entitled to make provision for broadcasts into the province which would have the effect of subverting this monopoly. The national government was unsuccessful despite the fact that 'telecommunications' was an area of exclusive federal authority under the Basic Law. In its interpretation the Court explored the constitutional 'text, context, structure, purpose, and history [which] combined to give the provision for exclusive federal power over telecommunications a narrower scope than an untutored observer might have expected'. D Currie The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (1994) 38. Currie writes:

> As a textual matter, said the Constitutional Court, the term 'telecommunications' [embraced only] 'the technical processes of transmitting signals,' not the field of broadcasting as a whole. This conclusion was confirmed, the Court added, by the use of the broader term broadcasting ('Rundfunk') in connection with freedom of expression in Article 5(1). Moreover, radio and television programming was a cultural matter, and the 'fundamental decision' of the Basic Law to leave cultural matters to the Lander (by omitting them from the list of federal powers) made it impossible to uphold federal authority over anything cultural in the absence of clear language. In addition, the reason for the grant of federal authority was to prevent the 'chaos' that might result from disuniform regulation of such matters as the location and strength of transmitters and the allocation of frequencies; there was no comparable need for uniformity with respect to the content of broadcasts. Tradition was not to the contrary since the Lander had disputed the exercise of federal authority over programming throughout the Weimer period; and the record of the Constitutional Convention confirmed that the cultural side of broadcasting was not within the new grant of federal power. Accordingly, the monopoly granted by Hamburg was invalid as to the technical aspects of transmitting radio and television signals but valid as to everything else; and for similar reasons the competing federal network could be authorised only to transmit signals, not to determine what was to be transmitted.

Ibid at 37-8. It is essential to note that in German constitutional law there is a pattern of powers being construed against the central government and in favour of the provinces. Ibid at 38. Our law contains no such presumption.

[2] DVB Behuising (supra) at para 63.

When characterizing legislation, the Constitutional Court has expressly approved a purposive approach to interpretation.[1] The Court has also said that the effects of the law are relevant[2] and that statutes should be looked at in historical context.[3] With respect to categorization, it is not just a matter of what the Court has said, but what it actually does. For example, a functional approach to categorisation dominates the analysis in Liquor Bill. (These approaches are discussed below.[4] The section on different models of federalism in the next chapter may also be relevant to characterization.[5])

(i) Presumptions and politics

Federal constitutions tend to reflect pragmatic responses to political cleavages or pressures.[6] South Africa is no exception. It is fair to say that from the start of constitutional negotiations the African National Congress championed strong national government at the expense of provincial powers. Opposition parties with strong regional support — the Inkatha Freedom Party in KwaZulu-Natal and the National Party in the Western Cape — advocated decentralized distributions of power.[7] The Constitutional Court has been strikingly even-handed in its treatment of federalism cases. The two Certification judgments demonstrate the Court's desire to maintain a dignified distance above the political fray.[8]

The Court has correctly attempted to use rigorous legal discipline in order to insulate itself from the claim that it pursues a particular political agenda. The history of the characterization issue in DVB Behuising (Pty) Limited v North West Provincial Government and another can be used to support the proposition that

[1] See DVB Behuising (supra) at para 36; Ex Parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature: In re KwaZulu-Natal Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Amendment Bill of 1995; Ex parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature: In re Payment of Salaries, Allowances and Other Privileges to the Ingonyama Bill of 1995 1996 (4) SA 653 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 903 (CC) at para 19.

[2] Ibid at para 36.

[3] Ibid.

[4] See § 15.3*(a)*(1)-(10).

[5] See V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, A Stein and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 16.

[6] See D J Elazar Exploring Federalism (1987).

[7] See, eg, W Beinart Twentieth-Century South Africa (2001) 276, 279. See also S Friedman and R Humphries (eds) Federalism and its Foes (1993).

[8] First Certification Judgment (supra) and Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of The Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997(2) SA 97 (CC), 1997(1) BCLR 1 (CC) ('Second Certification Judgment'). South Africa does not have judges who are associated with an aggressive federalist stance. In some countries judges develop definite profiles in division of powers matters. For example in Canada, Katherine Swinton has contrasted the 'centralist' views of Judge Bora Laskin with the federalist or provincial vision of Judge Jean Beetz. K Swinton 'The Supreme Court and Canadian Federalism' (supra) at 229-234.

classification questions are not merely questions of politics. There are objectively better and worse legal answers to federalism questions.[1]

In the court a quo in DVB Behuising, Mogoeng J held that:

> (a) Provincial legislatures have a 'clearly defined and very limited legislative authority' and have to operate 'within the strict parameters' of that authority. (b) In construing the powers of provincial legislatures the relevant provisions of the Constitution must 'be given a strict interpretation. This is necessary to ensure that no provincial legislature is allowed to exercise the authority it does not have and thereby usurp the functions of Parliament.[2]

In light of these initial conclusions, Mogoeng J had to establish whether an apartheid Proclamation made under the Black Administration Act fell under national or provincial competences in terms of the Interim Constitution. He found that the Proclamation was predominantly about 'land, land tenure or ownership, the registration of deeds and the establishment and abolition of townships'[3] (national competences) rather than 'housing', 'local government', 'trade' and 'industrial promotion' (provincial competences).

When the case came before the Constitutional Court, Justices O'Regan, Sachs and Goldstone expressed concern about the consequences of a finding that would place the Proclamation within the sphere of provincial competence. Despite this fear, they were unable to support Mogoeng J's finding that the predominant legal subjects of the Proclamation were national competences.[4] They could not do so because the argument that the Proclamation chiefly regulated 'local government' issues was more compelling.

The Constitutional Court made it clear that there is no presumption in the text that assists judges in deciding how to categorise legislation. On behalf of the majority of the Court, Justice Ngcobo wrote:

> I respectfully disagree with the view expressed by Mogoeng J to the effect that the functional areas of provincial legislative competence set out in the schedules should be 'given a strict interpretation'. In the interpretation of those schedules there is no presumption in favour of either the national legislature or the provincial legislatures. The functional areas

[1] There is a level of indeterminacy in characterisation questions. When the different methods of interpretation run out, R Lederman suggests a last resort: 'In the making of these very difficult relative-value decisions, all that can rightly be required of judges is straight thinking, industry, good faith and a capacity to discount their own prejudices. No doubt it is also fair to ask that they be men [and women] of high professional attainment, and that they be representative in their thinking of the better standards of their times and their countrymen [and women].' R Lederman 'Classification of Laws and the British North America Act' in R Lederman Continuing Canadian Constitutional Dilemmas (1981) extracted in P Macklem, R C B Risk, C J Rogerson, K E Swinton, L E Weinrib, J D Whyte Canadian Constitutional Law (Vol 1 1994) 166, 169.

[2] DVB Behuising (supra) at para 16 (Ngcobo J). The judgment of the court a quo in DVB Behuising (Pty) Ltd v North West Provincial Government and Another, Bophuthatswana High Court, Case No 308/99 (27 May 1999) is not yet reported.

[3] DVB Behuising (supra) at para 16.

[4] Ibid at para 102.

must be purposively interpreted in a manner which will enable the national Parliament and the provincial legislatures to exercise their respective legislative powers fully and effectively.[1]

(ii) A functional approach

When judges use a functional approach to federalism problems they consider how different levels of government can function most effectively within the given framework of a constitutional scheme. Decisions are 'guided by . . . beliefs about the optimal balance of power between the federal and provincial governments.'[2] Judges explicitly weigh the 'values of uniformity and diversity'[3] in specific contexts.

In Liquor Bill, the Bill under scrutiny had been passed by the National Legislature.[4] It was referred to the Constitutional Court by the President for a finding on its constitutionality.[5] The Bill aimed to regulate comprehensively 'the manufacture, distribution and sale of liquor on a uniform basis' throughout South Africa.[6] This objective was fraught with difficulty. 'Liquor licenses' is, after all, an exclusive provincial legislative competence listed in Schedule 5.[7]

The initial question in this case was one of characterisation. It was necessary to establish the scope of the term 'liquor licenses' in Schedule 5 in order to determine whether the national legislature had strayed into an area of exclusive provincial legislative competence. Categorisation is always a problem because the topics in the schedules are not watertight and discrete. For example, the functional area 'liquor licenses' overlaps with the concurrent functional areas 'trade' and 'industrial promotion.'[8] Despite this natural linguistic overlap, the Court found that an analysis of the overall constitutional scheme reveals that Schedule 5 matters need to be interpreted as having distinct identities which can be differentiated from other functional areas.[9]

[1] DVB Behuising (supra) at para 17. The majority of the Constitutional Court is protective of provincial legislative power and respectful of democracy. Ngcobo J acknowledges that: 'The North West legislature is itself a democratic institution and, it was fully entitled to make the legislative choice [that it did]'. Ibid at para 69. The minority take a much more interventionist position. They engage with the situation created by the legislation and try to achieve the best substantive outcome. The majority's position is easier to defend- but there may be some justification for the minority approach in our broken legislative reality.

[2] K Swinton 'The Supreme Court and Canadian Federalism: The Laskin-Dickson Years' in P Macklem, R C B Risk, C J Rogerson, K E Swinton, L E Weinrib, J D Whyte Canadian Constitutional Law (Vol 1 1994) 143, 145.

[3] Ibid.

[4] B 131B-98.

[5] Liquor Bill (supra) at para 2.

[6] Ibid at para 21.

[7] The Western Cape government formulated the following complaint:

> The Bill exhaustively regulates the activities of persons involved in the manufacture, wholesale distribution and retail sale of liquor; and that even in the retail sphere the structures the Bill seeks to create reduce the provinces, in an area in which they would (subject to section 44(2)) have exclusive legislative and executive competence, to the role of funders and administrators. The province asserts that the Bill thereby intrudes into its area of exclusive legislative competence.

Ibid at para 38.

[8] Ibid at para 48.

[9] Ibid at para 56.

The Court's functional approach in Liquor Bill becomes even more evident when it distinguishes matters on the basis of whether they require regulation 'inter-provincially, as opposed to intra-provincially.'[1] It concludes 'that where provinces are accorded exclusive powers these should be interpreted as applying primarily to matters which may appropriately be regulated intra-provincially.'[2] The functional area 'liquor licenses' is consequently interpreted to mean 'intra-provincial liquor licenses.'[3]

The elegance of this analysis becomes evident when it is applied to the Liquor Bill's 'three-tier' structure.[4] The Bill contains schemes of regulation for (1) control of manufacturing or production of liquor, (2) distribution and (3) retail trade in liquor. The Liquor Bill Court concludes that both manufacturers and distributors of liquor are likely to operate across provincial boundaries:

> If production and distribution of liquor were to be regulated by each province, manufacturers and distributors would require licences from each province for the purpose of conducting national trading, and possibly a national licence for export.[5]

On the other hand, retail trade in liquor rarely operates across provinces and it is appropriate for it to be regulated provincially. As a result, retail licensing was held to be exclusively within the legislative competence of the provincial legislatures.[6] Thus, it could not be interfered with by the National Legislature in the absence of a ground to be found in FC s 44(2).[7]

One should keep in mind that not all characterisation problems are the same. The fact that Liquor Bill involved the delineation of an exclusive provincial legislative competence had an important impact on the Court's reasoning. The reasoning in the judgment would not apply to the interpretation of Schedule 4 competences because the Constitution regulates those areas so differently.

It is interesting to note that the Liquor Bill Court chose not to mention the Constitutional Principles.[8] (The way in which the Constitutional Principles form a background to the Constitutional text and their interpretive role is discussed elsewhere in the book.[9]) The text of Constitutional Principle XX1.1 would have made a compelling addition to Liquor Bill's functional arguments. The Principle states:

> The level at which decisions can be taken most effectively in respect of the quality and rendering of services, shall be the level responsible and accountable for the quality and the rendering of the services, and such level shall accordingly be empowered by the Constitution to do so.

---

[1] Liquor Bill (supra) at para 53.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid at para 75.
[4] Ibid at para 73.
[5] Ibid at para 74.
[6] Ibid at para 80. This category includes 'micro-manufacturers whose operations are essentially provincial.' Ibid at paras 84 and 88.
[7] See § 15.3*(b)* infra.
[8] But see Liquor Bill (supra) at para 52 (Alluding to the principles).
[9] See J Kentridge and D Spitz 'Interpretation of the Bill of Rights' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, A Stein and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2005) Chapter 31.

The Court's reluctance to breathe new life into the Principles is understandable. However, they could have meaningful interpretive force in the context of federalism.

(iii) The purpose and effect of the legislation

The Constitutional Court 'has regard to' the purpose and effect of legislation when categorising it in terms of functional areas.[1] The purpose of a statute is what the law 'was enacted to achieve.'[2] Although the following statement was made in the context of Schedule 6[3] of the Interim Constitution, the form of analysis remains the same under the Final Constitution. The KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature wrote:

> If the purpose of legislation is clearly within schedule 6, it is irrelevant whether the Court approves or disapproves of its purpose. But purpose is not irrelevant to the schedule 6 enquiry. It may be relevant to show that although the legislation purports to deal with a matter within schedule 6 its true purpose and effect is to achieve a different goal which falls outside the functional areas listed in schedule 6. In such a case a Court would hold that the province has exceeded its legislative competence. It is necessary, therefore, to consider whether the substance of the legislation, which depends not only on its form but also on its purpose and effect, is within the legislative competence of the provincial legislature.'[4]

The preamble and the legislative history of a statute are also relevant in establishing the purpose of legislation.[5]

The effect of legislation may also be relevant. For example, in Texada Mines v AG BC[6] the Canadian Supreme Court decided that 'Where a provincial tax had the effect of making a commodity too expensive to sell in interstate commerce, the tax was held to relate to the Canadian federal power of interprovincial commerce.'[7]

(iv) An historical approach

Legislative history is a useful tool to help establish the purpose of legislation and hence its characterisation.[8] The Court is also receptive to, although not necessarily persuaded by, broader historical arguments presented to it. In Liquor Bill, the Minister of Trade and Industry argued that Parliament had the competence to [1] DVB Behuising (supra) at para 36.

[2] Ibid.
[3] Schedule 6 of the Interim Constitution listed functional areas in which the provinces had legislative competence.
[4] Ex Parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature (supra) at para 19.
[5] DVB Behuising (supra) at para 36.
[6] [1960] SCR 713.
[7] J Klaaren 'Federalism' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, A Stein and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) 5-6.
[8] DVB Behuising (supra) at para 36.

pass the Liquor Bill in the light of the 'history of overt racism in the control of the manufacturing, distribution and sale of liquor' in South Africa.[1] Historical arguments about apartheid land law figured prominently in all the judgments in DVB Behuising. Historical analyses also pay attention to an Act's social context.

(b) Interpreting the scope of the section 44(2) override

FC Section 44(2) provides:

> Parliament may intervene, by passing legislation in accordance with section 76 (1), with regard to a matter falling within a functional area listed in schedule 5, when it is necessary:
> (a) to maintain national security;
> (b) to maintain economic unity;
> (c) to maintain essential national standards,
> (d) to establish minimum standards required for the rendering of services, or > (e) to prevent unreasonable action taken by a province which is prejudicial to the interests of another province or to the country as a whole.

In the First Certification Judgment, the Court held that the 'power of intervention [under 44(2)] is defined and limited. If regard is had to the nature of the schedule 5 powers and the requirements of [s 44(2)], the occasion for intervention by Parliament is likely to be limited.'[2] This dictum implies that the five requirements for intervention will be interpreted narrowly. (The Court does hedge its bets slightly by using the word 'likely'.) The Justices are somewhat less equivocal in the Second Certification Judgment: They speak of the 'compelling importance of the matters referred to in' FC s 44(2).[3] This phrase implies that intervention will not be easily countenanced under this subsection.

There is, however, one possible interpretation of Liquor Bill that suggests that FC s 44(2)(b) may be more easily satisfied when economic activity is understood to take place at a national level rather than an intra-provincial one. Cameron AJ wrote:

> In the context of trade, economic unity must in my view therefore mean the oneness, as opposed to the fragmentation, of the national economy with regard to the regulation of inter-provincial, as opposed to intra-provincial, trade. In that context it seems to follow that economic unity must contemplate at least the power to require a single regulatory system for the conduct of trades which are conducted at a national (as opposed to an intra-provincial) level.[4]

The Justices are correct to be concerned about the possibility of provincial powers being used to create barriers to trade within the national economy. But provincial legislation need not create barriers. A province may want to deregulate a sector in order to allow operators easier access. In such a case, it is hard to

[1] Liquor Bill (supra) at para 32.
[2] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 257.
[3] Second Certification Judgment (supra) at para 106.
[4] Liquor Bill (supra) at para 76.

imagine why, in principle, the national government would be able to intervene in order 'to maintain economic unity.'[1] It must be remembered that the Court said that 'the desirability from the national government's point of view of consistency' cannot, on its own, warrant FC s 44(2) intervention.[2] That said, in some cases such provincial deregulation could cause intervention to be justified on the basis of the need to 'maintain essential national standards' (FC s 44(2)(c)); or to 'establish minimum standards required for the rendering of services' (FC s 44(2)(d)).

Acting Justice Cameron's statements are set against the background of an industry that most agree requires a high level of regulation. Indeed, the Minister of Trade and Industry convinced the Court that multiple regulators across the country would be inimical to the maintenance of economic unity in the context of the liquor manufacturing and distribution sectors.[3] Readers must locate the reasoning of the judgment in its particular context.

(c) Interpreting the scope of the incidental power

(i) The current source of the incidental power

FC Section 104(4) states that:

> Provincial legislation with regard to a matter that is reasonably necessary for, or incidental to, the effective exercise of a power concerning any matter listed in schedule 4, is for all purposes legislation with regard to a matter listed in schedule 4.

FC 44(3) reads the same with respect to national legislative authority:

> Legislation with regard to a matter that is reasonably necessary for, or incidental to, the effective exercise of a power concerning any matter listed in schedule 4 is, for all purposes, legislation with regard to a matter listed in schedule 4.

I refer to both of these powers as 'incidental' powers. Acting Justice Cameron has stated that '[t]he phrase 'reasonably necessary for, or incidental to' should be interpreted as meaning 'reasonably necessary for and reasonably incidental to'.'[4]

(ii) Implicit use of the incidental power in 'DVB Behuising'

The incidental power was an important factor in the outcome of DVB Behuising. The case arose because the North West Provincial legislature purported to repeal Proclamation R293 of 1962 in the North West Province. The Proclamation, which had been issued in terms of the Native Administration Act 38 of 1927, was a relic of old apartheid land law that was based on a policy of 'residential segregation.'[5] It made provision for the establishment of special types of

[1] FC s 44(2)(b).
[2] Liquor Bill (supra) at para 81.
[3] Ibid at para 79.
[4] Ibid at para 81.
[5] DVB Behuising (supra) at para 41.

townships on land held by the South African Native Trust in which African South Africans could only acquire inferior types of insecure tenure. The proclamation also contained provisions relating to the control of trading and other activities in the affected townships.[1]

The constitutional analysis in DVB Behuising is complicated by transitional provisions that affected the Proclamation in question.[2] However, one of the central issues turns on a simple question of categorization. Could the proclamation be classified as fitting into the list of legislative competences of the provinces as set out in schedule 6 of the Interim Constitution?

The majority of the Court held that the Proclamation '[disclosed] an orchestrated scheme for the establishment, management and regulation of informal townships and establishment of local government.'[3] The Proclamation was found in substance to be in the functional areas of 'regional planning and development, urban and rural development and local government': all are provincial competences under the Interim Constitution. However, these areas were not the only functional areas engaged by the Proclamation. The Proclamation also contained provisions that dealt with land tenure, which is a national competence. Justice Ngcobo held for the majority:

[1] DVB Behuising Pty Ltd sold houses to individuals in the North West. As a result of the repeal of Proclamation R293 of 1962 in the North West, the limited tenure rights known as 'deeds of grant' that new home-owners acquired could not be registered. Consequently the banks refused to provide finance for these new buyers. DVB Behuising argued that the repeal of parts of the Proclamation was beyond the legislative competence of the North West legislature. DVB Behuising (supra) at para 3.

[2] The case illustrates the operation of IC s 235 of the Interim Constitution, particularly IC ss 235(6) and (8). The Constitutional Court had previously explained the role of IC s 235 by saying:

> The overall purpose to be achieved through the application of s 235 [was] a systematic allocation of the 'power to exercise executive authority' in terms of each of the 'old laws', to an authority within the national government or authorities within the provincial governments The purpose of this power is clearly to provide a mechanism whereby a fit can be achieved between the old laws and the new order.

Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature, and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC); 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) at para 84.

The power to exercise executive authority in respect of Proclamation R293 of 1962 had been assigned to the North West by Government Notice 110 of 1994. The assignment could only have been made – under s 235(6)(b) of the Interim Constitution – and was only made, in respect of the parts of the Proclamation that fell within the legislative competences listed in schedule 6 of the Interim Constitution. Schedule 6 of the Interim Constitution exhaustively listed the legislative competences of provinces. Hence the assignment only applied in the areas of concurrent competence between the national and the provincial government.

The definition of 'provincial legislation' in the Final Constitution includes 'legislation that was in force when the Constitution took effect and that is administered by a Provincial Government'. FC s 239. Consequently, in as far as the assigned Proclamation falls within the functional areas listed in schedule 6 ('and does not deal with matters referred to in paragraphs (a) to (e) of s 126(3)), it is provincial legislation and it can be validly repealed by the North West legislature. Ibid at paras 20 and 26.

Hence the central question in DVB Behuising became whether the proclamation dealt with a matter that was listed in schedule 6 of the Interim Constitution. This same type of characterization exercise would have occurred in all cases of provincial legislative competence under the Interim Constitution.

[3] DVB Behuising (supra) at 48.

> I am satisfied that the 'tenure' and deeds registration provisions of the Proclamation were inextricably linked to the other provisions of the Proclamation and were foundational to the planning, regulation and control of the settlements. These provisions were an integral part of the legislative scheme of the Proclamation and accordingly fell within schedule 6.[1]

Hence, the tenure provisions were within the competence of the provincial government.

In the minority judgment, Justices O'Regan, Sachs and Goldstone expressed doubt about this characterization of the subject matter:

> There is much to be said, in our view, for the proposition that [the tenure provisions] are provisions regulating matters which fall outside schedule 6 of the Interim Constitution. It is clear that 'land tenure and registration' are not functional areas within the scope of schedule 6 as Mogoeng J observed. We accept that regulating the allocation of sites for trading and residential purposes are matters which fall within the functional areas of local government and/or urban development. Similarly, we accept that establishing a township involves creating sites and selling them or leasing them to the public and even attaching specific conditions to title. However, the proposition that it is an integral part of local government or urban development to establish specific and limited forms of land tenure or procedures for their registration, seems much less certain. In our view, the functional area of urban development requires the process of land alienation and allocation within the framework of the land tenure and registration system provided nationally. We find it hard to accept that establishing novel forms of land tenure or registration is an aspect of the functional area concerned with local government or that concerned with urban development.[2]

This statement does not really get to grips with the force of the majority judgment. The majority see the tenure issues as integral to the particular legislative scheme in the proclamation and thus as a valid part of the assignment to North West Province. The general proposition 'that it is an integral part of local government or urban development to establish specific and limited forms of land tenure or procedures for their registration'[3] is dubious at best. More importantly, it is not the proposition defended by the majority of the Court. The majority holds that the tenure provisions were an integral part of a legislative scheme that was predominantly within functional areas of provincial competence.

One problem with DVB Behuising is that although the reasoning of the majority judgment is convincing, it provides no clear system for establishing the scope of the incidental power.[4] Readers of the judgment might think that there are no meaningful doctrinal grounds for judges to regard a particular power as incidental to a provincial power or to regard the matter as one that should be reserved for the national legislature. As I will show below, there are indeed better — and worse — ways of delineating incidental powers.

[1] DVB Behuising (supra) at 96 (Madala J, concurring). Ibid para 58 (Ngcobo J).
[2] Ibid at 102.
[3] Ibid.
[4] This result may flow from the fact that the Court was not called upon to decide a simple question of provincial legislative competence using the sections of the Constitution that provide for the incidental power. (The provision dealing with incidental power in the Interim Constitution was 126(2).) Rather it was confronted with a messy case involving high apartheid legislation and transitional arrangements mediated by both the Interim and Final Constitutions.

A second problem with the majority judgment is that it does not explore the proper perspective for looking at a legislative scheme when assessing whether provisions — which are essentially out of place in a piece of provincial legislation — are acceptable on the basis of the incidental power. The perspective you adopt plays an important role in determining what you see. The broader your perspective, the more likely you are to see the provisions under scrutiny as necessary or incidental to a broader scheme. As you narrow your focus, the less likely the provisions are to appear necessary and redeemable. If you fixate exclusively on the problematic provisions, the possibility of incidentality or necessity disappears altogether. The next section looks at how this problem of perspective can best be approached.

(iii) Approaching the incidental power

Comparative law must be used with caution in federalism cases. Each federal system reflects pragmatic and context-specific responses to political power relations in a particular country.[1] Each federation creates and responds to its own functional problems. Despite this initial caveat, a number of Canadian cases provide useful heuristic devices for exploring the limits of our incidental power.

Kitkatla Band v British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture) involves 'culturally modified trees' which are heritage objects of significance to many of the aboriginal peoples of Canada.[2] The Heritage Conservation Act is a statute of the province of British Columbia.[3] It provides for the protection of heritage objects in the Province and gives administrative discretion to a Minister to consent to destruction of these artefacts in some circumstances.[4] In Kitkatla Band, the Minister had made an administrative decision allowing a logging company to cut down approximately 40 out of 120 culturally modified trees in a specific area.[5]

The aboriginal litigants attacked the Heritage Conservation Act on federalism grounds. It was common cause that the Act was within provincial jurisdiction: 'property and civil rights' within the province. However, in Canada, 'Indians and Land reserved for the Indians' is a national competence.[6] Hence the litigants argued — unsuccessfully — that the power to allow for the removal or alteration of Native American cultural objects was beyond the scope of the provincial legislature. They contended that the Act should be struck down 'to the extent

[1] Ex Parte Speaker of the National Assembly: In Re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the National Education Policy Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC) at paras 21-3.
[2] Kitkatla Band v British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture) ('Kitkatla Band') 2002 SCC, 31 [2002] 2 SCR 146.
[3] R.S.B.C 1996, c. 187
[4] Ibid at para 37.
[5] Ibid at para 64.
[6] Ibid at para 29.

that it [allowed] for the alteration and destruction of native cultural objects.[1] The province argued that the Heritage Conservation Act was within provincial competence and that 'any intrusion into federal jurisdiction [was] simply incidental and constitutionally permissible.'[2]

In Canadian jurisprudence, subject classifications for division of powers purposes are known as 'pith and substance' analyses. Identifying the 'pith and substance' of a law involves finding 'the dominant or most important characteristic' of that law.[3] Canadians also speak of 'pith and substance' describing the dominant purpose of a particular provision.[4] The different parties in Kitkatla Band wanted to employ different methods of analysis. As Judge LeBel stated:

> There is some controversy among the parties to this case as to the appropriate approach to the pith and substance analysis where what is challenged is not the Act as a whole but simply one part of it. The appellants [the band] tend to emphasize the characterization of the impugned provisions outside the context of the Act as a whole. The respondents and interveners take the opposite view, placing greater emphasis on the pith and substance of the Act as a whole. The parties also disagree as to the order in which the analysis should take place: the appellants favour looking at the impugned provisions first, while the respondents and interveners tend to prefer to look at the Act first.[5]

This statement clearly illustrates the need for a relatively straightforward and uncontroversial method of analysis. What must be incidental or necessary to what? The Canadian Supreme Court has set out a useful analytical framework in General Motors of Canada Ltd. v. City National Leasing.[6]

First, the City National Leasing test requires the court to inquire into the subject matter of the specific provisions that are being challenged (hereafter referred to as the 'impugned provisions').[7] The impugned provisions need to be interpreted naturally in context, but after that, their role has to be looked at in isolation for the purpose of characterisation.[8] If the impugned provisions 'can stand alone' because they are within the powers of the particular legislature, they need 'no

[1] Kitkatla Band (supra) at para 1 (Emphasis added).
[2] Ibid at para 37.
[3] P W Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (Volume 1, 3rd Edition, 1992) § 15.7. See also R L Watts Federalism: The Canadian Experience (1997) 45-6 ('Many statutes have one feature or aspect that comes under a provincial, and another under a federal, head of power. For example, a law prohibiting careless driving has a criminal aspect, which is federal, and a highway regulation aspect, which is provincial. The courts make a judgment as to the most important feature of the law and characterize the law by that primary feature- its 'pith and substance.')
[4] See Kitkatla Band (supra) at para 58 and General Motors of Canada Ltd v City National Leasing [1989] 1 SCR 641, 58 DLR (4th) 255 ('City National Leasing').
[5] Kitkatla Band (supra) at para 55.
[6] City National Leasing (supra) at para 54, available at http://www.lexum.umontreal.ca/csc-scc/en/pub/1989/vol1/html/1989scr1_0641.html para 54.
[7] Kitkatla Band (supra) at para 58.
[8] City National Leasing (supra) at para 42.

other support'. If not, it is necessary to continue with the analysis.[1] If the impugned provisions intrude into the exclusive legislative sphere of another level of government, it is necessary to establish the extent of the incursion. That is, the court must determine how invasive the intrusion is.[2]

Second, the Court must ask whether the impugned provision is part of a broader legislative scheme that is within the competence of the relevant legislature. (Identifying the scheme is a conceptual matter. It may include the entire statute. It may only consist of part of a statute that could have been enacted alone and can be severed from the rest of the law.[3] In some cases a regulatory scheme may embrace a number of statutes intended to govern different aspects of a common field.)

If the legislative scheme is within the competence of the relevant legislature, 'the relationship between the particular impugned provision and the scheme' comes under scrutiny. The court then asks '[h]ow well [is] the provision integrated into the scheme of the legislation and how important [is it] for the efficacy of the legislation.'[4]

At this stage the Canadian courts engage in a proportionality exercise. Earlier we asked how far the impugned provision pushes the boundaries of the appropriate legislative sphere. The more the provision encroaches, the more essential the provision must be to an otherwise valid legislative scheme in order to be considered incidental. The less it intrudes, the easier it will be to persuade a court that it should survive.[5]

[1] Kitkatla Band (supra) at para 57. See also City National Leasing (supra) at para 44.

[2] City National Leasing (supra) at para 46.

[3] Ibid at para 48. Dickson CJC, for the City National Leasing Court, wrote:

> A regulatory scheme may be found in only a part of the act in question, if that part can stand alone, or it may found in the entire act. The portion of the statute necessary to establish the existence of a regulatory scheme will not always be easy to discern. In those instances where a challenged provision, taken alone, comprehends a complete regulatory mechanism, the provision itself constitutes the appropriate starting point. In other cases, it will be necessary to examine the entire statute before a regulatory scheme may be identified. Once the presence of a regulatory scheme has been shown it will be necessary to determine its constitutional validity.

[4] Ibid at para 49.

[5] Ibid at para 53. Dickson CJC wrote:

> In numerous cases courts have considered the nature of the relationship which is required, between a provision which encroaches on provincial jurisdiction and a valid statute, for the provision to be upheld. In different contexts courts have set down slightly different requirements, viz.: 'rational and functional connection' in Papp v Papp [1970] 1 OR 331; R v Zelensky [1978] 2 SCR 940, and Multiple Access Ltd v McCutcheon [1982] 2 SCR 161; 'ancillary', 'necessarily incidental' and 'truly necessary' in the Regional Municipality of Peel v MacKenzie, supra; 'intimate connection', 'an integral part' and 'necessarily incidental' in Northern Telecom Ltd v Communications Workers of Canada [1980] 1 SCR 115; 'integral part' in Clark v Canadian National Railway Co [1988] 2 SCR 680; a 'valid constitutional cast by the context and association in which it is fixed as a complementary provision' in Vapor Canada,

(iv) Is there a point beyond which the incidental power cannot go as implied by the minority judgment in 'DVB Behuising'?

The Canadian approach seems sensible. Moreover, it coheres with the majority judgment in DVB Behuising. When interpreting the scope of the incidental power, it seems best to start with a broad assumption that almost any impugned provision can be saved (and found to be 'legislation with regard to a matter listed in schedule 4' in terms of FC ss 44(3) or 104(4)) if the above tests are satisfied. This assumption is justified because any incidental power automatically operates in an area of de facto provincial and national concurrency. When a court needs to draw a line beyond which a provincial legislature cannot go, it is not appropriate to limit the scope of the incidental power. Section 146 of the Final Constitution (which regulates conflicts between provincial and national legislation) is the more appropriate place for the analysis.[1]

(v) Another approach

Another rule of thumb has been suggested to help define the scope of the incidental power. Where the 'end' intended by the legislation is competent, the 'means' are likely to be acceptable.[2]

(vi) The scope of the incidental power in relation to schedule 5 competences.

No specific constitutional provision regulates powers that are ancillary to Schedule 5 competences. However, in First Certification Judgment the Court states:

> [T]he provinces would necessarily also be the repository of powers incidental to the powers vested in them in terms of NT schedule 5.[3] supra; and 'truly necessary' in R v Thomas Fuller Construction Co (1958) [1980] 1 SCR 695. I believe the approach I have outlined is consistent with the results of this jurisprudence. These cases are best understood as setting out the proper test for the particular context in issue, rather than attempting to articulate a test of general application with reference to all contexts. Thus the tests they set out are not identical. As the seriousness of the encroachment on provincial powers varies, so does the test required to ensure that an appropriate constitutional balance is maintained.

[1] See V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, A Stein and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 16.

[2] P M Blair Federalism and Judicial Review in West Germany (1981) 115. See also L H Tribe American Constitutional Law (3rd Edition, Vol 1, 2000) 798-9.

[3] See First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 244. The First Certification Judgment Court also wrote:

> Although the NT does not specifically authorise provinces to enact legislation authorising the imposition of user charges, such a power would be within the express or implied power to legislate with regard to matters reasonably necessary for or incidental to the effective exercise of an NT sch 4 or 5 competence. It cannot seriously be suggested that provinces cannot pass legislation making provision for a user charge for abattoirs, health services, public transport etc. In so far as charges might be raised which are unrelated to the actual use of services provided, they would be within the general power to impose rates and levies.

Ibid at para 438.

Our discussion of incidental powers demonstrates that provincial legislatures may sometimes validly legislate in areas of exclusive national legislative competence. The opposite contention, that the national legislature can legislate incidentally in the area of Schedule 5 functional areas, is more controversial. In Liquor Bill, Acting Justice Cameron wrote:

> Determining the place of section 44(3) in the constitutional scheme, and in particular its relationship to the exclusive provincial legislative competences in schedule 5, is not free from difficulty . . . On one approach, section 44(3) authorises an enlarged scope of encroachment on the exclusive competences by permitting national intrusion into schedule 5 where this is reasonably necessary for, or incidental to the effective exercise of a schedule 4 power.[1]

The question of the impact of FC s 44(3) on Schedule 5 competences was ultimately left unanswered.

(d) When is competence tested?

The determination of competence would appear to be a one-off test that applies at the date that the legislation was passed. For example, legislation that was competent when it was passed cannot later become incompetent. This position coheres with the attitude to assignment taken by a number of commentators when they talk about assignment of legislative powers by the national legislature to the provinces.[2] They argue that even if the national legislature retracts an assignment of its powers, the provincial legislation properly made under the assignment remains valid.

Although the above approach seems to be the most coherent, the answers to these questions are not self-evident. For example, take the case of a legislative provision that is valid by virtue of the incidental power. What happens if that provision is left standing while the rest of the legislative scheme upon which it depends is repealed? Can the hypothetical provision survive on the basis that it was valid at the time that it was originally enacted? It is reasonable to conclude that the provision would be invalidated on the ground that it is no longer 'reasonably necessary for, or incidental to, the effective exercise of a power concerning any matter listed in schedule 4.'[3]

[1] Liquor Bill (supra) at para 44.

[2] See M Chaskalson and J Klaaren 'National Government' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) Chapter 3; S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, A Stein and S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 17.

[3] FC s 104(4).

16 Conflicts

Victoria Bronstein

16.1 Introduction 16–1
(a) Textual background 16–2
(b) Political background 16–2
16.2 Overview of legislative conflict in areas of concurrent competence 16–4
16.3 The threshold question: When does conflict exist between national legislation and provincial legislation? 16–5
(a) A preliminary issue: the relevance of comparative jurisprudence 16–5
(b) Test for direct conflict 16–5
(c) Pre-emption 16–9
(d) How should the question of a conflict between provincial legislation and national legislation be handled under the Final Constitution? 16–11
(i) Protecting deliberate regulatory space 16–11
(ii) Finding inconsistency where the 'limits are shifted' 16–14
(e) Justifying this approach in the light of FC s 150 16–16
16.4 Does the national legislation prevail in terms of FC s 146? Creating meaningful federalism 16–17
(a) General 16–17
(i) Language 16–17
(ii) The drafting history 16–18
(iii) Function and democracy 16–19
(iv) Form of analysis 16–19
(b) Interpreting the constituent clauses of FC s 146 16–21
(i) Uniform application of national legislation 16–21
(ii) National overrides 16–21
(aa) Deference 16–21
(bb) Matters that cannot be regulated effectively by individual provinces 16–21
(cc) Framework legislation 16–24
(dd) Necessity 16–25
(ee) Preventing unreasonable action by a province 16–28

16.5 FC s 148: When the court cannot decide whether national legislation prevails 16–29
16.6 Subordinate national legislation and provincial legislation . . 16–29
16.7 Conflicts between national legislation and a provincial constitution 16–29
16.8 Conflicts in Schedule 5 areas 16–31
16.9 Building genuine co-operative government: Do courts possess a residual power to invalidate legislation on federalism grounds in the absence of legislative conflict? . . 16–31

CONFLICTS

146. (1) This section applies to a conflict between national legislation and provincial legislation falling within a functional area listed in Schedule 4.

(2) National legislation that applies uniformly with regard to the country as a whole prevails over provincial legislation if any of the following conditions is met:

(a) The national legislation deals with a matter that cannot be regulated effectively by legislation enacted by the respective provinces individually.

(b) The national legislation deals with a matter that, to be dealt with effectively, requires uniformity across the nation, and the national legislation provides that uniformity by establishing —

(i) norms and standards;

(ii) frameworks; or

(iii) national policies.

(c) The national legislation is necessary for —

(i) the maintenance of national security;

(ii) the maintenance of economic unity;

(iii) the protection of the common market in respect of the mobility of goods, services, capital and labour;

(iv) the promotion of economic activities across provincial boundaries;

(v) the promotion of equal opportunity or equal access to government services; or

(vi) the protection of the environment.

(3) National legislation prevails over provincial legislation if the national legislation is aimed at preventing unreasonable action by a province that —

(a) is prejudicial to the economic, health or security interests of another province or the country as a whole; or

(b) impedes the implementation of national economic policy.

(4) When there is a dispute concerning whether national legislation is necessary for a purpose set out in subsection (2)(c) and that dispute comes before a court for resolution, the court must have due regard to the approval or the rejection of the legislation by the National Council of Provinces.

(5) Provincial legislation prevails over national legislation if subsection (2) or (3) does not apply.

16.1 Introduction

(a) Textual background

The Final Constitution[1] allocates legislative powers between central and provincial governments on the basis of the subject matter of the legislation. According to the Final Constitution, the nine provincial legislatures in South Africa are entitled to legislate on a number of subjects listed in FC Schedule 4.[2] FC Schedule 4 contains areas of concurrent national and provincial legislative competence. As a result, both Parliament and the provincial legislatures may pass legislation on these topics.[3] This chapter focuses on conflicts between national legislation and provincial legislation in functional areas listed in Schedule 4.

As we shall see, the Final Constitution contemplates four discrete phases of Schedule 4 conflict's analysis. First, one must establish the competence of the national legislation. Second, the provincial legislation must be subjected to the same test.[4] Third, once both the national legislation and the provincial legislation have passed the test of competence, one must establish whether a conflict between them exists. The latter question is called 'the threshold question'. Fourth, if the answer to the threshold question is affirmative, then the analysis proceeds to FC s 146.[5]

(b) Political background

Although the vast and important areas of concurrent legislative competence listed in FC Schedule 4 create the theoretical possibility of frequent significant legislative conflict, the political reality is rather different. At the time of writing [2013], the African National Congress ('ANC') exercises control over eight of the nine provinces. The Western Cape is currently in the hands of the Democratic Alliance ('DA'). In 2001, when the ANC dominated only seven of the nine provinces, Nico Steytler observed:

> [T]he dominance of the ANC … does not result in the passing of competing [provincial] legislation. This party has a very centralised system of political governance… . Questions of

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('FC' or 'Final Constitution').

[2] FC s 104(1)(b)(i).

[3] The national legislature has the power in terms of FC ss 44(1)(a)(ii) and 44(1)(b)(ii) while the provincial legislature has the same power in terms of FC s 104(1)(b)(i). Schedule 4 powers are also deemed to include incidental powers. FC s 104(4) reads: 'Provincial legislation with regard to a matter that is reasonably necessary for, or incidental to, the effective exercise of a power concerning any matter listed in Schedule 4, is for all purposes legislation with regard to a matter listed in Schedule 4.' FC s 44(3) provides: 'Legislation with regard to a matter that is reasonably necessary for, or incidental to, the effective exercise of a power concerning any matter listed in Schedule 4 is, for all purposes, legislation with regard to a matter listed in Schedule 4.' For detailed treatment of the incidental power, see V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 15.

[4] For a discussion of competence, see V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 15.

[5] See, generally, G Devenish 'Federalism Revisited: The South African Paradigm' 2006 (1) Stellenbosch Law Review 129, 154–157.

> policy and its implementation through legislation are dealt with in a closed party hierarchy rather than in the open political and legislative processes.[1]

ANC dominance, and the centralization of power within the party's National Executive Committee, has meant that when the central government issues instructions, most provincial executives and legislatures simply accede to its demands.[2]

Another dimension of the problem is that the provincial legislatures are simply not performing their expected roles.[3] In 2004, the DA Provincial Leader of the Free State, Andries Botha, was quoted as saying: 'The legislature is not functioning at all. It's comatose.'[4] Another commentator asked whether the Eastern Cape Provincial Legislature, with a budget of R95 million as of 2005, served any purpose at all:

> To what extent does it serve any real function other than generally being a rubber stamp for executive action? Certainly it is a comfortable billet with a certain amount of somewhat ill-founded status, but given the socio-economic challenges facing the Eastern Cape, should it not perhaps be reduced to a part-time institution? … The bulk of the laws are passed in Cape Town and apply to South Africa as a whole. There is very little that the provincial legislature can do by way of passing laws.[5]

Little has changed in the intervening years.

Because of the centripetal force and the centrifugal force exerted by the ANC's NEC through the central government, constitutional provision for legislative conflict has created little dynamic tension between the national government and the provinces. This state of affairs will only change if and when control over the citadel becomes more hotly contested.

How might our conflicts jurisprudence shape 'cooperative' federal relationships in a more politically polycentric South Africa? The courts could play a dual role in relation to conflict resolution:

First, they should continue to support the provinces. Provincial diversity needs to be viewed as a healthy manifestation of democracy. (Regional differences have already played an important role in the dispute about the distribution of nevirapine to combat mother-to-child transmission of HIV/AIDS.) Second, they need to protect national unity and the indivisibility of the Republic. This chapter suggests that the courts should retain a residual power to invalidate protectionist provincial legislation even in the absence of conflicting national legislation.

---

[1] N Steytler 'Concurrency and Co-operative Government: The Law and Practice in South Africa' (2001) 16 SA Public Law 241, 245. See also S Choudhry '"He Had a Mandate": The South African Constitutional Court and the African National Congress in a Dominant Party Democracy' (2009) 2 Constitutional Court Review 1 (Discusses the consequences of continued ANC dominance for constitutional law generally); H Klug 'Finding the Constitutional Court's Place in South Africa's Democracy: The Interaction of Principle and Institutional Pragmatism in the Court's Decision Making' (2010) 3 Constitutional Court Review 1.

[2] See R Simeon & C Murray 'Multi-level Governance in South Africa' in B Berman, D Eyoh & W Kymlicka Ethnicity and Democracy in Africa (2004) 277, 288-89.

[3] See Simeon & Murray (supra) at 290-91.

[4] See J Rademeyer & S Ndlangisa 'Free State Governance Crisis Reaches Breaking Point' Sunday Times (14 November 2004).

[5] P Cull 'All Has Been Said and Done before in Bisho' Eastern Province Herald (6 December 2005).

16.2 Overview of legislative conflict in areas of concurrent competence

Four questions have to be answered when solving problems of legislative conflict in terms of FC Schedule 4:
1. Is the national legislation competent and valid? If yes:
2. Is the provincial legislation competent and valid? If yes:
3. Is there conflict between the national and the provincial legislation? If yes:
4. Does the national legislation prevail in terms of FC s 146?

The first two questions deal with legislative competence. It is logically impossible to have conflict in the absence of competent and valid provincial legislation and national legislation.[1] Once both pieces of legislation have independently passed the test of competence, it is necessary to establish whether a conflict between them exists. (I call question 3 the 'threshold question'.) Only once 'conflict between national legislation and provincial legislation falling within a functional area listed in Schedule 4'[2] has been established, can the fourth question engaging FC s 146 be asked.

But it is not so easy to establish genuine conflict. Indeed, FC s 150 is designed to avoid such a finding.[3] It reads:

> When considering an apparent conflict between national and provincial legislation, or between national legislation and a provincial constitution, every court must prefer any reasonable interpretation of the legislation or constitution that avoids a conflict, over any alternative interpretation that results in a conflict.

Iain Currie and Johan de Waal argue that:

> A court will, and indeed must, prefer an interpretation of legislation that avoids conflict, rather than one that results in conflict … . The Constitutional provisions relating to conflict only apply when it is not possible to resolve the conflict through interpretation.[4]

[1] For a more detailed examination of this issue, see V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 15. It is also important to keep in mind that FC s 146 applies only to conflicts in FC Schedule 4 areas. See Maccsand (Pty) Ltd v City of Cape Town and Others 2012 (4) SA 181 (CC), 2012 (7) BCLR 690 (CC), [2012] ZACC 7 at para 50 ('Section 146 finds no application to the present dispute for the reason, among others, that the MPRDA is not legislation falling within a functional area listed in Schedule 4 of the Constitution.').

[2] FC s 146(1).

[3] Compare the much softer language of other interpretation clauses in the Final Constitution. For example, FC s 39 reads:

> '(1) When interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court, tribunal or forum–
> (a) must promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom;
> (b) must consider international law; and
> (c) may consider foreign law.
> (2) When interpreting any legislation, and when developing the common law or customary law, every court, tribunal or forum must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.'

[4] I Currie & J de Waal The New Constitutional and Administrative Law: Volume 1 (2001) 221.

FC s 150 can be read as yet another manifestation of the spirit of reconciliation, compromise, harmonization and co-operation that marked South African politics in the 1990s. It could also be read as consistent with Chapter 3 of the Final Constitution's commitment to co-operative government.[1]

FC s 150 may not, however, be as innocuous as it seems. The routine harmonization of conflicting legislation could have deleterious effects. Later on in the chapter, I offer a gloss on FC s 150 that coheres with my preferred reading of the Final Constitution's approach to legislative conflict.

16.3 THE THRESHOLD QUESTION: WHEN DOES CONFLICT EXIST BETWEEN NATIONAL LEGISLATION AND PROVINCIAL LEGISLATION?

(a) A preliminary issue: the relevance of comparative jurisprudence

The Constitutional Court has warned against over-reliance on comparative law in federalism cases.[2] The Court is justified in being cautious because regional arrangements are generally pragmatic responses to specific political pressures, and basic principles of federalism differ dramatically from country to country.[3]

(b) Test for direct conflict

How do we establish that conflict exists between national legislation and provincial legislation? The most tempting solution is a simple test for direct conflict. The test asks whether both the national legislation and the provincial legislation can be obeyed at the same time. Citizens have a duty to obey the laws promulgated by both their national legislature and their provincial legislature. Consequently '[w]here the two laws can be obeyed at the same time there is no inconsistency' or conflict.[4]

The Constitutional Court has already employed the test for direct conflict. In Certification of the Constitution of the Province of Kwazulu-Natal, 1996,[5] the Court had to deal with inconsistencies between a Bill of Rights in the proposed provincial Constitution of KwaZulu-Natal and the Bill of Rights in the Interim Constitution.[6] The Court wrote:

---

[1] See S Woolman and T Roux 'Co-operative Government and Intergovernmental Relations' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS 1, July 2009) Chapter 14.

[2] See Ex parte Speaker of the National Assembly: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the National Education Policy Bill 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC) at paras 21–23.

[3] Vicki Jackson points out that:

> [F]ederalism questions are particularly likely to raise difficult comparability problems, for two related reasons. First, federalism arrangements are, by nature, interdependent and complex package deals. Second, these packages are likely to be the result of specific, historically contingent compromises, serving as a practical rather than a principled accommodation of competing interests and thus arguably less amenable to transnational understandings.

V Jackson 'Comparative Constitutional Federalism and Transnational Judicial Discourse' (2004) 2 International Journal of Constitutional Law 91.

[4] See Clyde Engineering Co Ltd v Cowburn (1926) 37 CLR 466, 504 ('Clyde Engineering').

[5] Ex parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal, 1996 1996 (4) SA 1098 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1419 (CC)('Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal, 1996').

[6] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or 'Interim Constitution').

> For purposes of the present inquiry as to inconsistency we are of the view that a provision in a provincial bill of rights and a corresponding provision in Chapter 3 are inconsistent when they cannot stand together, or cannot both be obeyed at the same time. They are not inconsistent when it is possible to obey each without disobeying either. There is no principal or practical reason why such provisions cannot operate together harmoniously in the same field.[1]

The Court has thus far limited use of the direct conflict test to the specific context of certification of a provincial constitution.[2]

The test for direct conflict minimizes conflict. This effect emerges clearly from Higgins J's defence of the test in the Australian case of Clyde Engineering. In his dissenting judgment, Higgins J writes:

> When is a law 'inconsistent' with another law? Etymologically, I presume that things are inconsistent when they cannot stand together at the same time; and one law is inconsistent with another law when the command or power or other provision in one law conflicts directly with the command or power or provision in the other. When two Legislatures operate over the same territory and come into collision, it is necessary that one should prevail; but the necessity is confined to actual collision, as when one legislature says 'do' and the other says 'don't.' But in the present case the [Federal] award says 'don't work the employee beyond 48 hours,' and the State law says, as to the State citizens, 'don't work the employee beyond 44 hours.' By obeying the State law the award is obeyed also.[3]

In the same case, Powers J makes a similar point in the following hypothetical example:

> If 9s. a day is allowed by a State law as a minimum wage and 10s. a day by a Federal award as a minimum wage, they are not inconsistent laws and both can be obeyed, because the payment of a minimum wage of 9s. required by the State Act is obeyed by paying 10s. under the Federal award. In the same way, if a State law fixes 10s. a day as a minimum wage and the Federal award fixes 9s. a day as a minimum wage…, they are not inconsistent laws and both can be obeyed by paying 10s. minimum under the State Act. That being the case, if the State Act in question only adds one-eleventh to the Federal minimum rate (12s. instead of 11s.), how can it be held to be inconsistent with the Federal award in question, as both orders can be obeyed by paying 12s.? The test usually adopted by this and other Courts is whether both laws can be obeyed.[4]

In both of the fact patterns described above the provincial (or state) legislature has a more benign policy towards employees than the national legislature. Exponents of the test for direct conflict find no conflict in these cases. The direct conflict test requires employers in the province to comply with the more regulated environment because both laws can be obeyed. However, while the direct conflict

[1] Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal, 1996 (supra) at para 24.

[2] The allusion to operating 'harmoniously in the same field' also shows that the Court does not regard direct conflict as the only possible test. For a discussion of field pre-emption, see § 16.3*(c)* infra

[3] Clyde Engineering (supra) at 503.

[4] Ibid at 517.

test minimizes legislative conflict, it also tends to maximise regulation. For example, it often conduces to multiple licensing requirements for businesses.[1]

If such cases were to arise in South Africa, and one assumed (perhaps erroneously)[2] that the legislation in question was competent, the test for direct conflict would screen out the inconsistencies. In the absence of direct conflict, the questions posed by FC s 146 would never be reached. The substantive issues implicated in raising the minimum wage or lowering working hours in one region of the country would remain constitutionally invisible. (Considerations that relate to the national government's conscious trade-off between minimum conditions of employment and unemployment would be deemed irrelevant.) And they would remain invisible despite the fact that FC s 146 was created to deal with precisely these types of concerns.

The following hypothetical example should help to illustrate the potential problem with the test for direct conflict. Imagine that a legislative scheme could be depicted as a spider's web with each individual provision comprising a strand of the web. A laboratory technician cuts every strand of silk individually and organizes each one thematically. He then pastes each strand onto the bottom of a card so that the fragments of web take the form of a bar graph. Eventually all the rules in the legislative scheme are shown on a bar graph with the vertical lines reflecting legal obligations. Imagine further that all of the pieces of extant national legislation are charted on one graph while all extant pieces of provincial legislation in the same field are charted on to another. What happens when the national grid is superimposed on the provincial grid?

The test for direct conflict tells us that where national and provincial legislation overlap, they should be obeyed at the same time. Where legislative provisions overlap, the bars on the new superimposed graph would often automatically lengthen or the longer lines would automatically prevail. (I will argue later that it is precisely this lengthening that conduces to over-regulation.) In cases where the lines on the grid conflict, the Final Constitution tells us that FC s 146 would be used to determine which legislative provision should prevail. Either the national line or the provincial line on the bar graph would be chosen. In cases of conflict, citizens would never be expected to conform to an elongated combination of the two lines. (In the USA or Australia, the national lines on the grid would normally displace the conflicting provincial lines.)

[1] On the effect of the direct conflict test on multiple licensing requirements by both national government and the relevant provincial government, see A Raptis and Son v State of South Australia (1977) 138 CLR 346, 357 ('The State Act forbids any person to take fish unless he holds a licence under the State Act. The Commonwealth Act forbids any person to engage in fishing unless he holds a license under the Commonwealth Act. It is of course possible to obey both laws without disobeying either, by obtaining the licences necessary under both Acts, but since Clyde Engineering Co Ltd v Cowburn (1926) 37 CLR 466 that has not been the test of the inconsistency of the two laws.') For a recent treatment of this problem, see Council of the Municipality of Botany v Federal Airports Corporation (1992) 175 CLR 453, Commercial Radio Coffs Harbour Limited v Fuller & Another (1986) 161 CLR 47. For more South African jurisprudence on multiple licensing requirements in the context of our quasi-federalist state, see § 16.3*(d)*(i) infra.

[2] See V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 15.

The test for direct conflict seems to resonate with FC s 150 by ensuring that 'any reasonable interpretation of the legislation … that avoids a conflict' is preferred 'over any alternative interpretation that results in a conflict'.[1] The direct conflict test read together with FC s 150 would ensure that the minimum number of cases would undergo scrutiny in terms of FC s 146. From one point of view, this non-interventionist approach possesses the virtue of keeping the judiciary out of politics. On the other hand, the direct conflict test tends to function in a manner that leads to the proliferation of regulation in a mechanical, unconsidered manner. The direct conflict test is also difficult to square with the FC s 146 imperative that provincial legislation should prevail unless the national legislative override is specifically justified.

Another potential problem with the direct conflict test arose elliptically in Abahlali Basemjondolo Movement SA & Another v Premier of the Province of Kwazulu-Natal & Others.[2] The applicants mounted a challenge to s 16 of the KwaZulu-Natal Elimination and Prevention of the Re-emergence of Slums Act[3] ('the KZN Slums Act') on the basis that the section's procedures for eviction violated the Constitution and were in conflict with the Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act[4] ('PIE'). Justice Yacoob (dissenting) interpreted s 16 of the KZN Slums Act benignly. On his account, both acts conformed to the Constitution and the KZN Slums Act incorporated the principles of PIE.[5] He therefore avoided the possibility of a conflict between the provincial and national laws. Yacoob J's interpretation relied on two basic premises. First, legislation should be interpreted in a way that conduces to constitutionality.[6] Second, the KZN Slums Act expressly referred to PIE. Section 16 therefore incorporated the protections given to illegal occupiers by PIE. FC s 150 was irrelevant because the express mention of PIE in the KZN Slums Act allowed the two to be reconciled. The majority never reached the question of conflict between the Slums Act and PIE because it found s 16 of the KZN Slums Act to be unconstitutional.

However, the exchange between Moseneke DCJ's and Yacoob J foreshadows the type of problems that could easily arise when applying FC s 150. Moseneke DCJ found Yacoob J's interpretation of the Slums Act 'excessively strained' and 'intrusive'. He held that 'the rule of law requirement that the law must be clear and ascertainable' and 'separation of power considerations' do not allow courts to 'embark on an interpretative exercise which would in effect re-write the text under consideration'.[7] The majority cautioned courts against bending over

[1] FC s 150. For a correct finding on absence of conflict, see the facts of Bingo (KZN) (Pty) Ltd v The Premier, KwaZulu-Natal Province [2008] 4 All SA 416, 420G (N).

[2] 2010 (2) BCLR 99 (CC), [2009] ZACC 31.

[3] Act 6 of 2007.

[4] Act 19 of 1998.

[5] His approach is similar to that adopted by Tshabalala JP in the High Court. Abahlali Basemjondolo Movement SA v and Another v Premier of Kwazulu-Natal and Others 2009 (3) SA 245 (D), 2009 (4) BCLR 422 (D), [2009] 2 All SA 293 (D), [2009] ZAKZHC 1.

[6] FC s 39(2) read with Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences and Others v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd and Others In re: Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd and Others v Smit NO and Others 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC), [2000] ZACC 12 at para 23.

[7] Abahlali Basemjondolo (supra) at paras 123-125.

backwards to rescue legislation — whether from unconstitutionality, or FC s 150 conflict — by interpretive means. Even the direct conflict depends, ultimately, on the proper or 'reasonable interpretation' of the two statutes. The questions of 'reasonable interpretation' will occasion further debates regarding the application of FC s 150.[1]

(c) Pre-emption

What are the alternatives to the test for direct conflict? Pre-emption — known in the US as 'field pre-emption'[2] and in Australia as 'covering the field'[3]— is another way of establishing whether conflict exists in a concrete situation.

Pre-emption is a fairly indirect technique for determining whether legislative conflict exists in a specific situation. It is, at bottom, an approach to statutory interpretation. Suppose that, in some imaginary country, the national legislature passes a competent National Housing Act. It passes the National Housing Act despite the fact that one of the provincial legislatures has already passed its own valid Housing Act. In systems that employ a pre-emption doctrine, the adjudicator will ask two questions that should determine whether the national legislature intended to cover the field when it passed the National Housing Act. Did the national legislature intend to regulate the entire area of 'housing' comprehensively and exclusively? Alternatively, did the national legislature intend to allow the provincial legislature to co-regulate the area so that provincial provisions could augment the national legislation?

In the USA and Australia, the pre-emption doctrine is based on the premise that competent national legislation automatically overrides conflicting provincial legislation. Hence it is only relevant to ask about the intention encoded in the national legislation. If the national legislature evinced an intention to cover the field, then the provincial legislation is subordinate.

However, there is, in fact, nothing automatic about pre-emption. The approach only applies where the national legislature expresses or implies its intention to cover the field. In the United States, the courts display some 'reluctance … to infer preemption in ambiguous cases'.[4] State (provincial) action will generally only be pre-empted 'where it stands as an obstacle to the accomplishment and execution of the full purposes and objectives of Congress'.[5]

---

[1] For more on the limits of statutory interpretation, see M Bishop & J Brickhill '"In the Beginning Was the Word": The Role of Text in the Interpretation of Statutes' (2012) 129 SALJ 681. See also National Credit Regulator v Opperman and Others [2012] ZACC 29 (Contains fascinating debate between Van der Westhuizen J (majority) and Cameron J (minority) on how to interpret a vague or meaningless statute); and Natal Joint Municipal Pension Fund v Endumeni Municipality 2012 (4) SA 593 (SCA), [2012] 2 All SA 262 (SCA), [2012] ZASCA 13.

[2] See LH Tribe American Constitutional Law (3rd Edition, Volume 1, 2000) 1172 ff.

[3] See Clyde Engineering (supra) at 478-99 (Isaacs J). See also Ex parte McLean (1930) 43 CLR 472, 483; K Booker, A Glass & R Watt 1 (2nd Edition, 1998) 293–296; A Murray-Jones 'The Tests for Inconsistency under Section 109 of the Constitution' (1979) 10 Federal Law Review 25.

[4] Tribe (supra) at 1175.

[5] Ibid at 1176 quoting Hines v Davidowitz 312 US 52, 67 (1941).

What happens if a court finds that the national legislature did have an intention to cover the field and exclude provincial legislation in the area? Once there is an intention to cover the field, the national regulation can be visualized as a beautiful, intact spider's web. All the strands of the spider's web are significant. The spaces between the strands that give the web its shape are seen as architecturally significant and deliberate. The web covers the legislative field and bits of provincial legislation are not allowed to randomly poke through and damage or disrupt the spider's web. The web is to be viewed as seamless, and provincial legislation in the area must be rendered dormant or invalid.

Pre-emption is not a universally popular doctrine. For instance, it has systematically been rejected by Canadian courts in favour of the test for direct conflict.[1] Provincial powers are jealously guarded in Canada and pre-emption is seen as an interpretive approach that increases the power of the national legislature at the expense of the provincial legislatures.[2] Pre-emption is also perceived by some as granting the judiciary too much discretion with respect to national legislative overrides of provincial legislation.[3] In South Africa, however, the doctrine of 'federal paramountcy' has been displaced by FC s 146. As a result, neither pre-emption nor the test for direct conflict should have any meaningful role to play.

From what has been said, it must already be clear that the doctrine of pre-emption cannot simply be adopted in South Africa. In terms of the Final Constitution, national legislation does not automatically prevail in areas of conflict. Take the following simple example. The treatment of HIV/AIDS falls within the legislative competence of 'health services' listed in FC Schedule 4. Assume that Parliament passes a National HIV/AIDS Act. The Act contains a provision that expressly states that the National HIV/AIDS Act is intended to comprehensively cover the entire field of HIV/AIDS care in South Africa. Despite this statement, the province of Mpumalanga passes its own HIV/AIDS statute. How would such a situation be analyzed? Assuming that Parliament's express intention to cover the field passes constitutional muster in the first place,[4] the effect of covering the field would be to create a conflict between the entire Mpumalanga HIV/AIDS Act and

[1] See P Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd Edition, RS 1, 2004) 16-8, 16-13. See also E Colvin 'Legal Theory and the Paramountcy Rule' (1979) 25 McGill Law Journal 82; J Leclair 'The Supreme Court of Canada's Understanding of Federalism: Efficiency at the Expense of Diversity' (2003) 28 Queen's Law Journal 411, 420–21 (Argues that field pre-emption has recently become part of Canadian law.) I doubt whether the cases cited really back up the argument. For example, in my view, Husky Oil Operations Ltd v Minister of National Revenue [1995] 3 SCR 453 reads more like a case of direct conflict than one of field pre-emption.

[2] See Leclair (supra) at 420–421.

[3] Ibid.

[4] The competence of such legislation would be questionable because health services are explicitly included in the list of concurrent legislative competences. One could even take the problem further and imagine a situation that would be unthinkable in the US or Australia. Could a province successfully evince an intention to cover the field in an area of concurrent legislative competence? Would such an intention create explicit conflict that would have to be resolved in terms of FC s 146? See Ex parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature: In Re KwaZulu-Natal Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Amendment Bill 1995; In Re the Payment of Salaries, Allowances and Other Privileges to the Ingonyama Bill of 1995 1996 (4) SA 653 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 903 (CC), [1996] ZACC 15 at para 36.

the national legislation. In the USA or Australia, the national legislation would automatically prevail. In South Africa, the conflict would have to be resolved using FC s 146.

(d) How should the question of a conflict between provincial legislation and national legislation be handled under the Final Constitution?

I have argued that the strict test for direct conflict is too crude a measure for establishing whether legislative conflict exists. Long-term use of the test (in a more politicized federalist environment than the one that exists at the moment) conduces to mechanical over-regulation. It also filters out precisely the type of case that FC s 146 was designed to tackle. Although no coherent rationale for defending the direct conflict test in South Africa exists, one could argue that FC s 150 requires its use.[1]

The doctrine of pre-emption is not an antidote to the test for direct conflict. Advocates of pre-emption have the tools to protect both the coherence of a legislative scheme and the spaces deliberately left open by a legislature. However, they face profound conceptual difficulties because the Final Constitution provides for concurrent legislative competence in the absence of a doctrine of 'federal paramountcy'.[2]

There is a third way. Certain interpretive methods can be used to assist a court charged with establishing whether legislative conflict exists. South African jurists, practitioners and academics need to be taught how to 'hear' legislative silence as deliberate in appropriate circumstances.

(i) Protecting deliberate regulatory space

Like spaces in a spider's web, regulatory gaps sometimes reflect a deliberate pattern: a structured silence. On this approach, silence in national legislation is capable of having sufficient texture to conflict with provincial legislation. Gaps in provincial legislation can also conflict with Acts of Parliament. (Once a conflict is found, FC s 146 analysis can take place.)

This method differs markedly from the direct conflict test. For proponents of direct conflict, regulatory spaces are simply holes. On their view, cluttering up the space is always preferable to precipitating conflict. The following paragraphs offer a few examples of the benefits associated with my theory regarding protected regulatory space.

[1] In this way, South Africa differs significantly from Canada. The structure of Canadian constitutional law ensures that the test serves as a bulwark that protects provincial powers.

[2] Rassie Malherbe argues that pre-emption is not part of South African law. See R Mahlerbe 'The Role of the Constitutional Court in the Development of Provincial Autonomy' (2001) 16 SA Public Law 255, 271–272.

Assume that the national legislature passes legislation requiring businesses that provide literacy training to be properly accredited. The accreditation process is complex and s 4 of the Act exempts small and micro-enterprises from the requirement. One day the Limpopo legislature passes a law requiring small and micro-enterprises to gain provincial accreditation after undergoing a procedure similar to the one found in the national legislation. Is there conflict between the national legislation and the provincial legislation with regard to small and micro-enterprises? Using the direct conflict test, one could argue that no conflict exists between the national exemption and the provincial accreditation requirement. They can both be obeyed at the same time. An alternative interpretation would treat the national statute's regulatory space as deliberate. Section 4 intentionally creates a regulatory gap for small and micro-enterprises. Thus, the national statute conflicts with the provincial statute in a manner that requires resolution in terms of FC s 146.

Imagine that the national government introduced measures to 'streamline' Environmental Impact Assessments (EIAs) and fast-track 'small, non-destructive projects' so that they could get official approval more easily.[1] Crispian Oliver, the Director-General of the national Department of Environment was quoted as saying: 'We are trying to unclog a system that has virtually ground to a halt. Some developers … wait three years for their plans to be approved.'[2] Some environmental groups expressed displeasure at this loosening up of the existing regulatory scheme.

Moving again from fact to fantasy, imagine that an environmental group successfully lobbies the KwaZulu-Natal provincial legislature to pass a new law subjecting small projects to special environmental scrutiny at the provincial level. Is there conflict between the national legislation and the provincial legislation? It's patently irrelevant that both the national legislation and the provincial legislation can be obeyed at the same time. The national Department is attempting to prevent over-regulation. The KwaZulu-Natal legislation may constitute over-regulation. A clear conflict between the 'purpose' of the national legislation and the 'purpose' of the provincial legislation exists. Of course, a direct conflict would obviously exist if Parliament explicitly stated in the legislation itself that it supercedes all other pieces of legislation. However, even in this hypothetical example, a clear conflict exists, qua purpose, irrespective of whether a specific provision in either piece of legislation expressly creates that conflict. The conflict between national ends and provincial goals needs to be resolved using FC s 146.

It is also possible for spaces in provincial legislation to conflict with specific provisions in national legislation. Imagine South Africa had no comprehensive national legislation requiring EIAs. The Western Cape legislature (which finds itself in an excellent position to evaluate the trade-off between development and environmental control in that province) passes a new Environmental Management Act that requires EIAs for a range of projects. The Act provides that promoters of certain types of small project do not have to apply for consent from the Department. At a later date, the national legislature passes a much more comprehensive Environmental Protection Act. The latter Act requires very rigorous EIAs for all small developments. In this case, one could argue that the gaps in the Western Cape legislation that allow some small projects to proceed without scrutiny conflict with the National Environmental Protection Act. This conflict exists irrespective of whether promoters of small projects can comply with both regulatory systems at the same time. A finding that a conflict exists is a good result because such a conflict is just the type of issue that should be considered under FC s 146.[1]

[1] See Business Report 'Ministry Proposes Changes to EIA Rules' (June 25 2004), available at www.busrep.co.za/general/print_article.php?fArticleId=2126649&fS (accessed on 21 April 2006).

[2] Ibid.

[1] Although overregulation should be avoided, instances obtain in which it is completely appropriate for companies to have to contend with different licensing requirements in different spheres of government. Two cases — Maccsand and Wary Holdings — raise an array of issues surrounding appropriate multiple regulation. (At the same time, the reader should be aware that they turn on findings about municipal executive competence and not questions of national and provincial legislative conflict already surveyed.) In Maccsand (Pty) Ltd v City of Cape Town and Others 2011 (6) SA 633 (SCA), [2011] ZASCA 141 ('Maccsand SCA'), a mining company had been granted an appropriate mining permit from the national government in terms of the Minerals and Petroleum Resources Development Act 28 of 2002. ('MPRDA'). The court had to decide whether the company also had to obtain re-zoning approval from the municipality under the provincial Land Use Planning Ordinance 15 of 1985. ('LUPO') before it could begin to mine. Plasket AJA held that LUPO and the MPRDA were 'directed at different ends' and hence 'no duplication' existed. Maccsand SCA (supra) at para 34. He continued: '[D]ual authorisations by different administrators, serving different purposes, are not unknown, and not objectionable in principle — even if this results in one of the administrators having what amounts to a veto.' Ibid. This position was effectively upheld by the Constitutional Court. Maccsand (Pty) Ltd v City of Cape Town and Others 2012 (4) SA 181 (CC), 2012 (7) BCLR 690 (CC), [2012] ZACC 7 ('Maccsand CC'). The Maccsand Court also dismissed the argument that national legislation and provincial legislation which might give rise to contradictory licensing requirements in different spheres of government amounted to legislative conflict that fell to be dealt with in terms of FC s 146. Ibid at para 51 ('[FC ss 146 and 148] do not apply because there is no conflict between LUPO and the MPRDA. Each is concerned with different subject matter.') In Wary Holdings (Pty) Ltd v Stalwo (Pty) Ltd & Another 2009 (1) SA 337 (CC), 2008 (11) BCLR 1123 (CC), [2008] ZACC 12, the case turned on the definition of 'agricultural land' in the Subdivision of Agricultural Land Act 70 of 1970. The primary issue was the continued role of the national government in regulating land use in light of the increased role of municipalities in the new constitutional structure. Kroon AJ rejected an interpretation that would limit the national government's role. He argued as follows: 'There is no reason why two spheres of control cannot co-exist even if they overlap and even if, in respect of the approval of subdivision of "agricultural land", the one may in effect veto the decision of the other. It should be borne in mind that the one sphere of control operates from a municipal perspective and the other from a national perspective, each having its own constitutional and policy considerations.' Wary Holdings (supra) at para 80. This judgment can be contrasted with City of Johannesburg Metropolitan Municipality v Gauteng Development Tribunal and Others 2010 (2) SA 554 (SCA), 2010 (2) BCLR 157 (SCA), [2010] 1 All SA 201 (SCA), [2009] ZASCA 106 at para 1 (Nugent JA correctly had no tolerance for legislative schemes that cause chaos by creating 'parallel authority in the hands of two separate bodies, with … potential for the two bodies to speak with different voices on the same subject matter'.)

Judges open to the possibility that some regulatory space should be defended possess the tools within our constitutional conceptual framework to undertake the type of analysis that the doctrine of pre-emption affords courts in other systems. However, given the structured silence of a regulatory space, a finding that the space reflects a deliberate regulatory space would have to be the result of an interpretive exercise specific to the individual case.

Some evidence exists for the proposition that the Constitutional Court recognises the value of maintaining regulatory spaces. As discussed earlier,[1] the Abahlali Basemjondolo Court was confronted with a potential conflict between a provincial statute and a national statute regulating evictions. The majority never reached the question of conflict because it found the offending provision of the provincial law — s 16 — unconstitutional. There may, however, be a subtle indication in the majority judgment that the Court has some sympathy for the view that in the correct set of circumstances a 'carefully esablished' legislative framework by one sphere of government can overcome the need to assess whether a conflict even exists, let alone which piece of legislation ought to be given preference. As Deputy Chief Justice Moseneke writes:

> There is indeed a dignified framework that has been developed for the eviction of unlawful occupiers and I cannot find that section 16 is capable of an interpretation that does not violate this framework. Section 26(2) of the Constitution, the national Housing Act and the PIE Act all contain protections for unlawful occupiers. They ensure that their housing rights are not violated without proper notice and consideration of other alternatives. The compulsory nature of section 16 disturbs this carefully established legal framework by introducing the coercive institution of eviction proceedings in disregard of these protections.[2]

While the Court was not engaged in conflict analysis, the value it places on a 'carefully established legal framework' suggests that it recognizes the danger of over-regulation.

(ii) Finding inconsistency where the 'limits are shifted'[3]

I have argued that regulatory spaces should sometimes be regarded as deliberate and capable of conflict with other legislation. But take the facts of the Australian case of Clyde Engineering.[4] The dispute arose because a full working week in the engineering industry constituted 48 hours in terms of federal (national) law. The New South Wales Forty-Four Hours a Week Act provided that the working week would be forty-four hours.[5] The effect of the legislation was that workers would earn the same minimum for 44 hours in New South Wales as they would for 48 hours elsewhere in the country. Higgins J, in dissent, applied the direct conflict test. He found no conflict between the New South Wales legislation

[1] See §16.3*(b)* above.
[2] Abahlali Basemjondolo (supra) at para 122 (my emphasis).
[3] Clyde Engineering (supra) at 493.
[4] Ibid at 475.
[5] Clyde Engineering (supra) at 503.

and the national legislation. Employers in New South Wales could obey both provisions at the same time by giving employees the benefit of the 44-hour week.

In a judgment particularly useful for South African purposes, Knox CJ and Gavan Duffy J rejected the crude direct conflict test without resorting to the doctrine of pre-emption.[1] They found a conflict between the national legislation and the New South Wales legislation on the grounds that legislation of this type does not simply 'impose duties' on employers.[2] It also confers rights:[3]

> [O]ne statute is inconsistent with another when it takes away a right conferred by that other even though the right be one which might be waived or abandoned without disobeying the statute which conferred it.[4]… An award that a person shall pay a certain minimum rate of wage involves, in its negative aspect, that he need pay no more.[5]

Isaacs J expresses the same idea in Clyde Engineering in somewhat different terms when he says that inconsistency exists where the 'limits are shifted'.[6]

Let us return to the hypothetical example offered above by Powers J. In that intuition pump, the minimum wage set by provincial law is 10s, while the national minimum wage is 9s. The worker's right to receive 10s in one province contradicts the employer's right to pay only 9s under national law. The conflict between the national minimum wage and the provincial minimum wage cannot be cured simply by requiring the employer to pay the higher amount. This penetrating example shows that the minimum wage cannot just be conceptualized as an entitlement. It is also deliberately gives employers the legal space to pay only the smaller, national minimum. Such limits or entitlements create a different type of regulatory space.

The majority of the Court in Clyde Engineering views the specific amount or limit that a legislature sets as significant. It is appropriate that the judiciary treat this limit with respect because the setting of a minimum wage or minimum conditions of employment is a delicate matter. It does not only have an impact on the quality of life of employees. It also has an overall impact on growth and employment in a given sector of the economy. Assuming that this case arose in South Africa (and that the legislation was competent), it would be an appropriate case for resolution

[1] Ibid at 474–78. Isaacs J authors a separate judgment on covering the field at 278–99.

[2] Ibid at 478.

[3] Ibid. See Booker, Glass & Watt (supra) at 292 (The authors call this test the 'denial of rights test' and cast it as a development of the direct-conflict test. It is a subsidiary test in Australia. If my argument is accepted, this test should do much more work in South Africa.)

[4] Clyde Engineering (supra) at 478.

[5] Ibid at 525 (Starke J).

[6] Ibid at 493.

in terms of FC s 146.[1] It would be far less sound to find that no conflict exists on the basis of the direct conflict test.

(e) Justifying this approach in the light of FC s 150

The strict version of the direct conflict test has severe limitations and it should not be used exclusively. Judges need to be amenable to seeing legislative silence as deliberate in appropriate cases: they need to be open to finding conflict where 'limits are shifted'.[2] But can this approach be squared with FC s 150? FC s 150 reads:

> When considering an apparent conflict between national and provincial legislation … every court must prefer any reasonable interpretation of the legislation … that avoids a conflict, over any alternative interpretation that results in a conflict.

A literal interpretation of FC s 150 appears to favour a strict test for direct conflict. The strict FC s 150 test minimizes conflict. However, the section cannot be properly understood in isolation. It needs to be read with FC s 146. FC s 146 anticipates a judiciary that plays an active and substantive role in adjudicating legislative conflict. Eventually judges will have the opportunity to build a body of jurisprudence that clarifies the meaning of FC s 146 and its relationship to FC s 150. However, if FC s 150 is interpreted mechanically, numerous cases will be excluded from principled evaluation merely because there happens to be no finding of direct conflict.

Although the direct conflict test often allows judges to avoid playing politics, in the long term it will hamper the judiciary's ability to discharge its duty to create institutions and doctrines that serve a well-functioning democracy. When the problems discussed above are screened out by a direct conflict approach, judges do not have an opportunity to consider the relative merits of 'uniformity and diversity'[3] in important federalism matters. Moreover, given our express commitment to cooperative government, the courts are denied the opportunity consider whether 'one level [or sphere] of government is undermined in its

[1] Isaacs J treats this approach with scorn. He writes:

> If an award fixes the obligation of an employer at (say) £5 as 'the' minimum wage and a State Act then fixes 'the' minimum wage at another sum, whether £4 or £6, there is necessarily inconsistency. Apply the question to the ordinary affairs of life. If I contract to buy a horse for £5, that is the minimum price. I can be compelled to pay that, but not more. It is not the maximum I may give. I can, no doubt, give more if I please. But if some competent authority says I must pay £6 as minimum, it seems to me hardly possible any person could be found to assert there was no inconsistency between my obligation as stated by the contract and my obligation as declared by the outside authority. But that is precisely what is maintained for by the respondent in the present case; that is, that there is no inconsistency. And the reason given is that I could obey both by giving £6.

Clyde Engineering (supra) at 493.

[2] Ibid at 493.

[3] KE Swinton 'The Supreme Court and Canadian Federalism: The Laskin-Dickson Years' in P Macklem, RCB Risk, CJ Rogerson, KE Swinton, LE Weinrib & JD Whyte Canadian Constitutional Law (Vol 1, 1994) 143, 145.

essential functions by the laws of another level of government'.[1] A direct-conflicts test silences meaningful federalism analysis.

One might contend that identifying a pattern of deliberate legislative silence and finding conflict when limits are shifted requires no more than a nuanced form of interpretation that can take place during the direct conflict test. Such considerations could then be incorporated into the test rather than being regarded as part of an entirely separate approach. Not much turns on this semantic distinction. What matters is that the mode of analysis allows for ventilation of a full array of federalism issues.

16.4 Does the national legislation prevail in terms of FC s 146? Creating a meaningful form of federalism

It is counter-productive to routinely harmonize legislation and thereby preclude FC s 146 analysis from taking place. Furthermore, FC s 146 should not become a means for the increased centralization of power. It should, instead, facilitate 'democratic accountability at the most appropriate level' of government.[2]

(a) General

FC s 146 'gives preference to provincial legislation, and protects it against national legislation, unless circumstances exist in which a national override can be justified'.[3] National legislation prevails if 'the substantive requirements of at least one of the override clauses' are met.[4] In addition, '[a] decision by a court that legislation prevails over other legislation does not invalidate that other legislation, but that other legislation becomes inoperative for as long as the conflict remains.'[5] In other words, if a provision of national legislation prevails over Limpopo legislation, the Limpopo legislation becomes ineffective, but not invalid. If the national legislation were to be repealed, then the conflict would fall away and the Limpopo legislation would automatically be revived.

(i) Language

FC s 146 is formulated in strong language. National legislation will prevail:

- in specific cases of necessity;[6]
- if the national legislation deals with a matter that 'cannot be regulated effectively' by the provinces on an individual basis;[7]

[1] D Tucker 'Interpretations of Federalism: The Australian Doctrine of State Immunity and the Problem of Collective Choice' in J Goldsworthy & T Campbell (eds) Legal Interpretation in Democratic States (2002) 245, 261.

[2] Ibid at 246.

[3] Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of The Republic of South Africa, 1996, 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [1996] ZACC 24 ('Second Certification Judgment') at para 109.

[4] J Klaaren 'Federalism' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, OS, 1996) 5-12.

[5] FC s 149.

[6] FC s 146(2)(c).

[7] FC s 146(2)(a).

- in matters that require 'uniformity across the nation' in order to 'be dealt with effectively';[1]
- to prevent 'unreasonable' provincial action.[2]

The emphatic language of FC s 146 implies that national override has to be properly justified.[3]

(ii) The drafting history

The original version of FC s 146 possessed two major problems that 'weighed heavily' on the First Certification Judgment Court when it decided that the 'powers and functions of the provinces in the New [Constitutional] Text as a whole were substantially less than or substantially inferior to their corresponding powers and functions in the Interim Constitution.'[4]

First, the original FC s 146(4) was rejected by the Constitutional Court because it included a presumption of necessity that would tilt the analysis in favour of the national government in FC s 146(2)(c) analysis. It provided:

> National legislation that deals with any matter referred to in subsection (2)(c) and has been passed by the National Council of Provinces, must be presumed to be necessary for the purposes of that subsection.[5]

The Court found that this presumption might be difficult or even impossible to displace in practice.[6] Thus it was an unacceptable enhancement of the powers of national government at the expense of the provinces. The Constitutional Assembly responded by jettisoning the presumption in favour of a watered-down FC s 146(4).[7]

Second, the original text of FC s 146(2)(b) — which allowed national legislation to prevail 'in the interests of the country as a whole' — was also held to substantially reduce provincial powers. The Constitutional Assembly redrafted the subsection to reflect the 'more stringent criterion' that 'the national legislation must deal with a matter that, to be dealt with effectively, requires uniformity across the nation.'[8]

The alterations in the language of FC s 146 indicate that provincial legislation should not be lightly regarded. The tone of the two Certification Judgments fortifies the view that FC s 146 ought not to become a rubber stamp for centralism.

---

[1] FC s 146(2)(b).

[2] FC s 146(3).

[3] But see Mashavha v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2005 (2) SA 476 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (CC) at para 47.

[4] Constitutional Principle XVIII.2. See Second Certification Judgment (supra) at para 153.

[5] Second Certification Judgment (supra) at para 152.

[6] Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC), [1996] ZACC 26 at para 336.

[7] FC s 146(4) reads: 'When there is a dispute concerning whether national legislation is necessary for a purpose set out in subsection (2) (c) and that dispute comes before a court for resolution, the court must have due regard to the approval or the rejection of the legislation by the National Council of Provinces.'

[8] Second Certification Judgment (supra) at para 154.

(iii) Function and democracy

The judiciary has, as yet, not had an opportunity to explore the various interpretive questions raised by FC s 146. Given how the courts have responded in the first two decades of constitutional democracy, they are more likely than not to use a functional approach to interpretation when they analyze questions of legislative conflict.[1] The functional approach to constitutional interpretation is canvassed in the chapter on legislative competence.[2] In essence, such an approach demands that an appropriate balance be struck between preserving national unity on the one hand and promoting diversity on the other.[3]

How will judges know where exactly to strike that balance? One useful question that courts can ask themselves when confronted with conflicts and competence issues is what outcome will facilitate 'democratic accountability at the most appropriate level'.[4] When confronted with a question of conflicts, courts should be inclined to protect provincial autonomy where 'no collective choice is necessary'.[5]

Tucker argues that judges 'assist in the democratic process' by allowing the legislators 'who have the best claim to make the decision' to regulate the contested area of competence.[6] The most successful judgments in federalism cases manage to keep these axiomatic principles within their line of vision.[7]

(iv) Form of Analysis

In order to arrive at a finding as to which piece of legislation prevails, it is necessary to thoroughly analyse both the national legislation and the provincial legislation. Once a conflict has been established, FC s 146 analysis takes place.

---

[1] V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) § 15.3*(a)*(ii).

[2] Ibid.

[3] KE Swinton 'The Supreme Court and Canadian Federalism: The Laskin-Dickson Years' in P Macklem, RCB Risk, CJ Rogerson, KE Swinton, LE Weinrib & JD Whyte Canadian Constitutional Law (Volume 1, 1994) 143, 145.

[4] Tucker (supra) at 246–247.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Tucker (supra) at 259. See also R Malherbe 'Grondwetlike Bevoegdheidsverdeling: 'n Stap Agteruit vir Provinsiale Regering? Mashavha v President of the RSA 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (KH)' (2005) 4 TSAR 862, 869.

[7] See for example, City of Johannesburg Metropolitan Municipality v Gauteng Development Tribunal and Others 2010 (2) SA 554 (SCA), 2010 (1) BCLR 157 (SCA), [2010] 1 All SA 201 (SCA), [2009] ZASCA 106 (Nugent JA); Maccsand (Pty) Ltd v City of Cape Town and Others 2011 (6) SA 633 (SCA), [2011] ZASCA 141 (Plasket AJA). See also Premier: Limpopo Province v Speaker: Limpopo Provincial Legislature and Others 2011 (11) BCLR 1181 (CC), 2011 (6) SA 396 (CC), [2011] ZACC 25 (Yacoob J and Cameron J dissenting). For more on the negative consequences of Premier Limpopo, see R Williams & N Steytler 'Squeezing out Provinces' Legislative Competence in Premier: Limpopo Province v Speaker: Limpopo Provincial Legislature & Others I & II' (2012) 129 South African Law Journal 621. See also J Brickhill & M Bishop 'Constitutional Law' (2009) Annual Survey of South African Law 143, 198. Based on the premise that a functional approach to federalism needs to be kept in mind by judges, Brickhill and Bishop criticise Corrans v MEC for the Department of Sport, Recreation, Arts and Culture, Eastern Cape Government and Others 2009 (5) SA 512 (ECG), [2009] ZAECGHC 17 (discussed in the next section) for failing to consider the potentially strong argument that 'those closest — physically and culturally — [to objects and buildings] important to their heritage [should be allowed] to determine their fate'.)

In Corrans v MEC for the Department of Sport, Legislation Recreation, Arts and Culture, Eastern Cape Government and Others,[1] both the national legislation and the provincial legislation were found wanting.[2] In deciding whether the National Heritage Resources Act[3] prevailed over the Eastern Cape Heritage Resources Act,[4] the judgment examined the long title of the national Act. The long title states that the Act is designed to promote the following objectives:

> To introduce an integrated and interactive system for the management of the national heritage resources; to promote good governance at all levels, and empower civil society to nurture and conserve their heritage resources so that they may be bequeathed to future generations*; to lay down general principles for governing heritage resources management throughout the Republic; to introduce an integrated system* for the identifications, assessment and management of the heritage resources of South Africa; to establish the South African Heritage Resources Agency together with its Council to co-ordinate and promote the management of heritage resources at national level; to set norms and maintain essential national standards for the management of heritage resources in the Republic and to protect heritage resources of national significance; to control the export of nationally significant heritage objects and the import into the Republic of cultural property illegally exported from foreign countries; to enable the provinces to establish heritage authorities which must adopt powers to protect and manage certain categories of heritage resources; to provides for the protection and management of conservation-worthy places and areas by local authorities; and to provide for matters connected therewith.[5]

The emphasis on the objects of the national Act raises a possible pitfall of FC s 146 analyses: The long titles and preambles of large swathes of national legislation are generally framed in a way that purports to meet the requirements of FC s 146 in cases of legislative conflict. The language of FC s 146 is often imported into Acts precisely for that reason. For purposes of deciding which legislation prevails in conflict cases, it is not enough to show that the Act purports to fulfil the requirements for national override in FC s 146. The judgment needs to analyse the content of the legislation carefully in order to show that the Act does indeed do so.[6]

---

[1] 2009 (5) SA 512 (ECG), [2009] ZAECGHC 17 ('Corrans').

[2] The judgment dangerously dismisses the provincial Act as an 'aberation'. Ibid at para 17. See also Brickhill & Bishop 'Constitutional Law' (supra) at 198 (Criticizing the judgment for failing to closely consider the provincial Act both for purposes of establishing whether conflict existed and also for deciding which legislation should prevail.).

[3] Act 25 of 1999.

[4] Act 9 of 2003.

[5] Currans (supra) at para 10 (emphasis on sections of Act added).

[6] This approach follows the lead of In re: KwaZulu-Natal Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Amendment Bill of 1995, In re: Payment of Salaries. Allowances and Other privileges to the Ingonyama Bill of 1995 1996 (4) SA 653 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 903 (CC), [1996] ZACC 15 at para 19 (Chaskalson P held that If the purpose of legislation is clearly within [IC] Schedule 6 it is irrelevant whether the court approves or disapproves of its purpose. But purpose is not irrelevant to the Schedule 6 enquiry. It may be relevant to show that although the legislation purports to deal with a matter within Schedule 6 its true purpose and effect is to achieve a different goal which falls outside the functional areas listed in Schedule 6. In such a case a court would hold that the province has exceeded its legislative competence.' In essence, the Court held that a 'provincial legislature would exceed its competence where it enacted legislation purporting to deal with a functional area listed in the said [IC] schedule 6, but the true purpose and effect of which was to achieve a different goal falling outside the functional areas listed in schedule 6.') G Devenish 'Federalism Revisited: The South African Paradigm' 2006 (1) Stell LR 129. The same would be true of national legislation which claimed to fulfil the grounds in FC s 146 but in substance failed to do so.

(b) Interpreting the constituent clauses of FC s 146

(i) Uniform application of national legislation

In terms of FC s 146(2), only national legislation that applies 'uniformly with regard to the country as a whole' is capable of prevailing over provincial legislation. Jonathan Klaaren has suggested that a law purporting to apply nationally, but crafted to pertain only to a manufacturing process in the Western Cape, may well fail to satisfy the requirement of uniform applicability. Should the province choose to regulate such a matter, its legislation would prevail.[1]

When FC ss 146(2) and 146(3) are read together, it appears that national legislation that is selectively targeted at one or more provinces may not prevail in terms of FC s 146(2). However, selectively targeted legislation may prevail where, in terms of FC s 146(3), it prevents unreasonable provincial action.

(ii) National overrides

(aa) Deference

Who decides whether a matter 'requires uniformity across the nation' to be dealt with effectively[2] or if national legislation is 'necessary'[3] for specific purposes? The Constitutional Court has held that 'political' questions are objectively justiciable.[4] The Court is, however, mindful of the need to treat the subjective intention of the national legislature with caution and respect:[5]

> The test in each case is ultimately objective because it is not the subjective belief of the national authority which is the jurisdictional fact allowing the national legislation to prevail over the provincial legislation, but there is inherently some subjective element involved in the assessment of what the interests of the country require or what is necessary. Some deference to the judgment of the national authority in these areas is inevitable.[6]

(bb) Matters that cannot be regulated effectively by individual provinces

In terms of FC s 146(2)(a), national legislation prevails if it 'deals with a matter that cannot be regulated effectively by legislation enacted by the respective provinces individually'. In terms of FC s 146(2)(b), national legislation prevails if it engages matters that require 'uniformity across the nation'.

When interpreting FC s 146(2)(a) and (b), the courts should not advance uniformity for uniformity's sake. While the judiciary has a duty to promote national unity,[7] that duty does not require identical regulatory regimes throughout the country. In the United States, Regan contends that there is no 'judicially

[1] Klaaren (supra) at 5–13.
[2] FC s 146(2)(b). Logically FC s 146(2)(a) should be treated in the same manner.
[3] FC s 146(2)(c).
[4] Second Certification Judgment (supra) at paras 155, 157.
[5] Ibid at para 157.
[6] First Certification Judgment (supra) at fn 277.
[7] See FC s 1.

enforceable constitutional interest in uniformity of commercial regulation' and that the 'idea that there is a general interest in uniformity is inconsistent with our decision to have separate states with separate legislative competences, including separate competences to regulate commerce.'[1] However, since the 1930s, the US Supreme Court has read the US Constitution's Commerce Clause so as to ensure that virtually all national legislation that has an affect on the country's economy — no matter how local — passes constitutional muster.

The Constitutional Court appeared to acknowledge Regan's point in Mashavha v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others ('Mashavha'):

> It is inherent in our constitutional system, which is a balance between centralized government and federalism, that on matters in respect of which the provinces have legislative powers they can legislate separately and differently. That will necessarily mean that there is no uniformity.[2]

However, areas of competence exist in which the need for uniformity is absolutely compelling. Transport and communications are two such domains. For example, the United States Supreme Court prevented Wisconsin from prohibiting the operation of trucks longer than 55 feet on their highways because of the burden such a prohibition would place on interstate commerce.[3] An Arizona law that aimed to limit the length of trains to 14 passenger cars or 70 freight cars could not be applied for the same reason.[4] These laws, which would have been extremely disruptive with respect to interstate commerce, could not be successfully defended on safety grounds. In South Africa, FC s 146(2)(a) and (b) should enable national legislation to prevail in similar situations.

The only meaningful authority on the reach of FC s 146(2)(a) and (b) is a case that neither deals with legislative conflict nor engages FC s 146.[5] In Mashavha, the applicants challenged the presidential assignment to the provinces of almost the whole of the Social Assistance Act.[6] This assignment could only have been validly made in respect of powers that fell within the legislative competences listed in Schedule 6 of the Interim Constitution[7] and did not fall within the parameters of IC s 126(3). (IC s 126(3) was the predecessor of FC s 146(2).) The Mashauha Court assumed, without deciding, that the social grant system fell within the functional

[1] DH Regan 'The Supreme Court and State Protectionism: Making Sense of the Dormant Commerce Clause' (1986) 84 Michigan Law Review 1091, 1881.

[2] 2005 (2) SA 476 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (CC)('Mashavha') at para 49.

[3] See Raymond Motor Transportation, Inc v Rice 434 US 429 (1978).

[4] See Southern Pacific Co v State of Arizona ex Rel Sullivan 325 US 761 (1945).

[5] Mashavha illustrates the operation of IC s 235(8). The Constitutional Court previously explained the role of IC s 235 by saying:

> The overall purpose to be achieved through the application of s 235 [was] a systematic allocation of the 'power to exercise executive authority' in terms of each of the 'old laws', to an authority within the national government or authorities within the provincial governments The purpose of this power is clearly to provide a mechanism whereby a fit can be achieved between the old laws and the new order.

Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) at para 84.

[6] Act 59 0f 1992.

[7] IC Schedule 6 listed the legislative competences of provinces.

area 'welfare services',[1] but found that the administration of the social grant system was not validly assigned to the provinces because such administration dealt with a matter (a) that could not be regulated effectively by provincial legislation, (b) that needed to be regulated or coordinated by uniform norms or standards that applied generally throughout the Republic in order to be performed effectively, and (c) that was necessary to set minimum standards across the nation for the rendering of public services.[2]

Despite the fact that the issue in the case was the administration of the system of social grants rather than the amount of the grants, the Court noted that:

> Equality is not only recognized as a fundamental right in both the interim and 1996 Constitutions, but is also a foundational value. To pay, for example, higher old age pensions in Johannesburg in Gauteng than in Bochum in Limpopo, or lower child benefits in Butterworth than in Cape Town, would offend the dignity of people, create different classes of citizenship and divide South Africa into favoured and disfavoured areas.[3]

This statement is rather curious. Different amounts of grant money paid throughout the country are likely to be related not to considerations of equality — or systemic discrimination — but to convenience, administrative workability and the desire to prevent regional distortions. The most tenable basis for social assistance grants is need and, in theory, if the cost of living is different in different parts of the country, then it is not clear why it would be unacceptable to pay different amounts. The greatest problem with variation in the value of social grants is that such variation could set off a race to the bottom as provinces tried to pay the least attractive welfare grants so as to minimize the number of poor people who might otherwise be attracted to the province. In such circumstances, a standardised rate for social grants may well be necessary. (Of course, even that hypothetical state of affairs fails to account for the possibility that a given province might offer a panoply of other more attractive benefits.)

But once again, such pragmatic concerns are not what drive the Mashavha Court. Instead, the Court offers the following justification for requiring uniform grant administration:

> In my view social assistance to people in need is indeed the kind of matter referred to in section 126(3)(a), and in a wider sense envisaged by the meaning of the need for minimum standards across the nation in subsection (c). Social assistance is a matter that cannot be regulated effectively by provincial legislation and that requires to be regulated or co-ordinated by uniform norms and standards that apply generally throughout the Republic, for effective performance. Effective regulation and effective performance do not only include procedural and administrative efficiency and accuracy, but also fairness and equality for example as far as the distribution and application of resources and assistance are concerned. A system which disregards historical injustices and offends the constitutional values of equality and dignity could result in instability, which would be the antithesis of effective regulation and performance.[4]

[1] See Mashavha (supra) at 34.
[2] See IC s 126 (3)(a), (b) and (c).
[3] Mashavha (supra) at para 51.
[4] Ibid at para 57.

The judgment, like the applicants, appears not to have accurately identified the problem. The real issue in the case seems to have been inefficient administration of social grants. The intractable problems with grant administration may have caused litigants to aim at the wrong target. Social grant systems must be administered in places where poor people actually are. It matters not whether the administration is controlled regionally or nationally. The ANC government has always had the power and the ability to deploy proper management in the affected provinces. One assumes that the personnel who currently administer the grant system in the provinces will continue to do so under national authority. The Court should have grappled with the question of how the administrative problems of litigants like Mr Mashavha would be solved by the introduction of a national system of administration.

The reasoning in Mashavha was shaped, at least in part, by the lack of real opposition to the contention that the grant system should be administered nationally. ANC dominance meant that no provincial MECs resisted the application. The only opposition was contained in one renegade brief from KwaZulu-Natal. The consensus between the litigants on the desired outcome weakens the reasoning in the judgment and ultimately undermines its authority.[1]

One hopes that the Mashavha Court's optimism about national grant administration is justified. However, the national government's failure to effect the transition from provincial administration to national administration within the required 18 months suggests that such optimism maybe misplaced.[2]

(cc) Framework legislation

FC s 146(2)(b) allows national framework regulation to prevail over provincial legislation when —

> [t]he national legislation deals with a matter that, to be dealt with effectively, requires uniformity across the nation, and the national legislation provides that uniformity by establishing —
> (i) norms and standards;
> (ii) frameworks; or
> (iii) national policies.

However, the Constitutional Court has indicated that framework legislation will not automatically prevail as 'the criterion of uniformity is a significant limitation of the range of national policies and frameworks which may override provincial legislation.'[3]

FC s 146(2)(b) was controversial at the time of certification because it seemed to extend the scope of the corresponding provision in the Interim Constitution

[1] See R Malherbe 'Grondwetlike Bevoegdheidsverdeling: 'n Stap Agteruit vir Provinsiale Regering? Mashavha v President of the RSA 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (KH)' (2005) 4 Journal of South African Law 862.

[2] See Ex parte Minister of Social Development & Others 2006 (5) BCLR 604 (CC).

[3] Second Certification Judgment (supra) at 157 (my emphasis). But see Corrans v MEC for the Department of Sport, Recreation, Arts and Culture, Eastern Cape Government and Others 2009 (5) SA 512 (ECG), [2009] ZAECGHC 17 (High Court loses sight of this point.) See also J Brickhill & M Bishop 'Constitutional Law' (2009) Annual Survey of South African Law 143, 198.

and diminish provincial autonomy. The Interim Constitution only allowed for framework legislation that established 'norms or standards and minimum standards'. FC s 146(2)(b) embraces, in addition, 'frameworks and national policies'.[1] The Second Certification Judgment Court rejected objections to FC s 146(2)(b). It wrote:

> One of the definitions of 'uniform' given in the Concise Oxford Dictionary is 'conforming to the same standard, rules or pattern'. The achievement of uniformity in the context of AT 146(2)(b) therefore requires the establishment of standards, rules or patterns of conduct which can be applied nationally. As we have stated above, this is an objectively justiciable criterion. Under the IC, an override for the purpose of uniformity is permitted where legislation contained norms or standards. Neither of these words is capable of precise definition. The Concise Oxford Dictionary defines 'standard' as 'an object or quality or measure serving as a basis or example or principle to which others conform or should conform or by which the accuracy or quality of others is judged'. 'Norm' is defined as 'a standard or pattern or type'. Given the ill-defined import of the words norms and standards, and the governing criterion of uniformity, it is likely that even under the IC, framework legislation and national policies which sought to establish uniformity by establishing standards, rules or patterns of conduct would have been held to fall within the scope of norms and standards.[2]

I have argued above that courts should be prepared to view legislative silence as deliberate in some circumstances and thus open to finding a conflict between national legislation and provincial legislation in cases where regulatory space has been intentionally left open by a legislature. Given the possibility of such 'silence', a national 'policy', a 'norm' or a 'standard' might be implicit in legislation rather than explicit.

(dd) Necessity

FC s 146(2)(c) provides that:

> (2) National legislation that applies uniformly with regard to the country as a whole prevails over provincial legislation if any of the following conditions is met:
> (a) …
> (c) The national legislation is necessary for
> (i) the maintenance of national security;
> (ii) the maintenance of economic unity;
> (iii) the protection of the common market in respect of the mobility of goods, services, capital and labour;
> (iv) the promotion of economic activities across provincial boundaries;
> (v) the promotion of equal opportunity or equal access to government services; or
> (vi) the protection of the environment.

The Second Certification Judgment Court clearly stated that the conditions set out in FC s 146(2)(c) were objectively justiciable:

> The issue as to whether or not the particular national legislation dealt with a matter which was necessary for the maintenance of national security or economic unity or the protection > of the common market or any of the others factors listed in NT 146(2)(c) is now objectively justiciable in a court without any presumption in favour of such national legislation.[1]

[1] Second Certification Judgement (supra) at para 159.
[2] Ibid.

FC s 146(4) provides that:

> When there is a dispute concerning whether national legislation is necessary for a purpose set out in subsection (2)(c) and that dispute comes before a court for resolution, the court must have due regard to the approval or the rejection of the legislation by the National Council of Provinces.

The Second Certification Judgment Court placed the following gloss on FC s 146: 'The obligation to pay 'due regard' means simply that the court has a duty to give to the approval or rejection of the legislation by the NCOP the consideration which it deserves in the circumstances.'[2]

FC s 146*(c)*(2)(ii), (iii) and (iv) reflect functional issues that occur in every federation. For example, what happens when a province passes legislation that smacks of economic protectionism? Such legislation is generally condemned in the USA in the absence of compelling justification. Interprovincial (or state) protectionism has a disintegrating effect on the nation as a whole because it encourages retaliation by other provinces.[3] Interprovincial protectionism also 'diverts business away from presumptively low-cost producers' without 'justification in terms of a benefit that deserves approval from the point of view of the nation as a whole'.[4]

Existing case law indicates, however, that FC s 146(2)(c)(ii) does not only allow national legislation to prevail over protectionist provincial legislation. In an obiter dictum in Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa: In re Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill, national legislation that regulated the manufacture and distribution of liquor was held to be 'necessary to maintain economic unity' for purposes of FC s 44(2)(b).[5] (The language of FC s 44(2)(b) is echoed in FC s 146(2)(c)(ii).) Cameron J held that it would be too inconvenient to allow provinces to regulate the manufacture and the distribution of liquor.[6] The Liquor Bill Court held:

> In the context of trade, economic unity must in my view therefore mean the oneness, as opposed to the fragmentation, of the national economy with regard to the regulation of inter-provincial, as opposed to intraprovincial, trade. In that context it seems to follow that economic unity must contemplate at least the power to require a single regulatory system for the conduct of trades which are conducted at a national (as opposed to an intra-provincial) level. Given the history of the liquor trade, the need for vertical and horizontal regulation, the need for racial equity, and the need to avoid the possibility of multiple regulatory systems affecting the manufacturing and wholesale trades in different parts of the country, in my view the economic unity requirement of section 44(2) has been satisfied … The Minister's affidavit states in this regard that duplicated or varying provincial licensing

[1] Second Certification Judgment (supra) at para 155.
[2] Ibid.
[3] DH Regan 'The Supreme Court and State Protectionism: Making Sense of the Dormant Commerce Clause' (1986) 84 Michigan Law Review 1091, 1114.
[4] Ibid at 1118.
[5] 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Liquor Bill').
[6] V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 15, § 15.3*(a)*(ii).

> requirements would be unduly burdensome for manufacturers and that it was therefore economically imperative that control over the activities of manufacturers should take place at national level. He states that major industries, including the liquor industry as a single integrated industry should not have to run the risk of fragmentation arising out of a variety of differing regulatory regimes being imposed upon their operations in different provinces, including what he described as the deleterious effects of cross-border arbitrage between competing provinces. He avers that [w]ithout a national system of regulation and a national standard to which wholesalers will have to adhere the results would be chaotic. The spectre arises of a single business operation having to be separately licensed on differing terms and conditions in different parts of South Africa. For the reasons given earlier, the Constitution entrusts the legislative regulation of just such concerns to the national Parliament, and I am of the view that the Minister has shown, at least in regard to manufacturing and distribution of liquor, that the maintenance of economic unity necessitates for the purposes of section 44(2)(b) the national legislature's intervention in requiring a national system of registration in these two areas.[1]

Liquor Bill implies that protectionism is not the only thing that would necessarily trigger FC s 146(2)(c)(ii). However, the idea that national regulation of the manufacture and the distribution of liquor is necessary for the maintenance of economic unity seems to overstate the case. (If the matter had arisen in the context of FC s 146, FC s 146(2)(c)(iii) and (iv) would have formed the basis for more suitable challenges.)

Similarly, the drafters of the Final Constitution could never have anticipated that the 'protection of equal opportunity or equal access to government services'[2] might require identical treatment between citizens of all provinces in all circumstances. Rassie Malherbe makes a similar point in his assessment of the Mashavha:

> Per slot van rekening is elke provinsie beter in staat as die nasionale regering om die behoeftes en omstandighede binne sy jurisdiksiegebied gesaghebbend vas te stel, wat goedskiks daartoe kan lei dat differensiasie tussen die provinsies ter wille van substantiewe gelykheid nodig blyk te wees. Dit is dus moontlik dat die oogmerk van substantiewe gelykheid meer doeltreffend nagestreef kan word deur die provinsies hulle regmatige plek in die regulering van sosiale bystand as konkurrente saak te gee as om alle gesag oor sosiale bystand te sentraliseer. ['After all, each province is in a better position than the national government authoritatively to determine the needs and circumstances within is jurisdiction, from which it may easily be concluded that differentiation between the provinces could be necessary in the interests of substantive equality. It is thus possible that the objective of substantive equality could be more effectively pursued by giving the provinces their rightful place in the regulation of social welfare as a concurrent competence rather than centralizing all power over social welfare.'][3]

Access to state services is one of the most contentious issues in all modern societies. Delivery always involves trade-offs at regional and local levels of government. The model of federalism on display in the Final Constitution requires space for legitimate diversity in service provision by democratically elected governments at provincial and municipal spheres of government.[1] Diversity means that 'protection of … equal access to government services' cannot be taken literally in any individual case. It needs to be understood as aggregate access to services rather than equal access to individual services. Unfortunately, it also needs to be appreciated that, like the socio-economic rights provisions in the Final Constitution, FC s 146(2)(c)(v) has an aspirational quality. The main barriers to equal access to government services are infrastructural rather than legal. Courts need to be realistic about the capacity of national legislation to promote 'equal opportunity or equal access to government services' before they decide that national legislation should override provincial legislation.

[1] Liquor Bill (supra) at paras 75–78.
[2] FC s 146(2)(c)(v).
[3] Malherbe (supra) at 862.

Realism does not, of course, entail abdication. FC s 146 contemplates a number of specific instances in which national intervention in provincial affairs is a necessity. For example, judges have to be especially vigilant about protection of the environment, in terms of FC s 146(2)(c)(v), in circumstances where provinces may create environmental burdens or negative externalities for other provinces whose citizens are not represented in the provincial legislature.

(ee) Preventing unreasonable action by a province

'Unreasonableness' — a famously difficult legal concept to understand — raises important questions regarding separation of powers and deference.[2] There have, as yet, been no decisions that interpret 'unreasonable action by a province' in the context of FC s 146(3). That does not mean that we are without academic or judicial guidance as to its extension. Jon Klaaren describes the standard of unreasonableness as a 'high threshold' aimed at 'renegade or out-of-place provincial legislation'.[3] He argues that 'provincial legislation which either directly discriminates against out-of-province actors or does so indirectly without justification' is most likely to be overridden by national legislation in terms of this section.[4]

The question of legislative unreasonableness arose in New National Party v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others.[5] In a dictum that will no doubt be enthusiastically invoked by advocates of subsidiarity, the majority of the Court pronounced: 'Decisions as to the reasonableness of statutory provisions are ordinarily matters within the exclusive competence of Parliament.'[6] Although this statement may seem appealing on the surface, it is difficult to see how it could be successfully applied in the particular context of FC s 146(3). Does it mean that the reasonableness of provincial legislation is ordinarily a matter within the exclusive competence of the provincial legislature? Alternatively, should a court

[1] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 24 ('[T]he national legislation authorised by NT 146(2)(c)(v) does not per se preclude the provincial governments from also taking such measures as are required to guarantee equality of opportunity or access to a government service.')

[2] On unreasonableness in administrative law, see C Hoexter The New Constitutional and Administrative Law: Volume 2 (2002) 170–187.

[3] Klaaren (supra) at 5-16.

[4] Ibid.

[5] 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)(National legislation that required citizens to have bar-coded identity documents in order to vote was challenged, but ultimately upheld.)

[6] Ibid at para 24 (Yacoob J). O'Regan J adopts an alternative approach consistent with meaningful powers of judicial review and thoroughly appraises the reasonableness of the legislation in a powerful dissent. Ibid at paras 108-16.

defer to Parliament's assurance that 'national legislation is aimed at preventing unreasonable action'[1] by a province? The words 'aimed at' might lend credence to the latter view. However, the better interpretation is that the national legislation should prevail over provincial legislation if it is intended to prevent unreasonable action by a province and it is 'objectively probable' that it will achieve that end.[2] Excessive deference to the national legislature does not resonate with the strength of the word 'unreasonableness' and the Court's insistence that that the matters raised by FC s 146 are objectively justiciable.[3]

16.5 FC s 148 when the court cannot decide whether national legislation prevails

FC s 148 provides: 'If a dispute concerning a conflict cannot be resolved by a court, the national legislation prevails over the provincial legislation or provincial constitution.' In the First Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court stated that it could not really envisage a situation in which the section would apply.[4] No meaning has yet been assigned to FC s 148.

16.6 Subordinate national legislation and provincial legislation

The general rule is that subordinate legislation validly made in terms of empowering legislation becomes part of that legislation for the purposes of FC s 146.[5] This rule is subject to the proviso that subordinate legislation 'made in terms of an Act of Parliament or a provincial act can prevail only if that law has been approved by the National Council of Provinces'.[6] Without such approval, the subordinate law lacks the capacity to prevail.[7]

16.7 Conflicts between national legislation and a provincial constitution

FC s 147(1) regulates conflict between national legislation and provincial constitutions. In cases of conflict, provincial constitutions have no special status

[1] FC s 146(3).

[2] See E Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where? Introducing the Interim Bill of Rights' (1994) 10 South African Journal on Human Rights 31, 46–48.

[3] In the context of socio-economic rights, national government programmes to provide housing and to prevent mother to child transmission of HIV have been subjected to scrutiny and found to be unreasonable by the courts. See Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC); Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (No 2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC).

[4] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 246.

[5] See the definitions of 'national legislation' and 'provincial legislation' in FC s 239.

[6] FC s 146(6) (my emphasis). That the NCOP should approve subordinate provincial legislation may be counter-intuitive to some readers. See C Murray & L Nijzink Building Representative Democracy: South Africa's Legislatures and the Constitution (2002) 106-108.

[7] What happens when neither the national subordinate laws nor the provincial subordinate laws have been approved by the National Council of Provinces? Jonathan Klaaren has suggested that FC s 148 might be used in such cases. The national legislation would prevail. See Klaaren (supra) at 5–17.

that elevates them above ordinary provincial legislation. In the First Certification Judgment, the Court held that:

> Preference [over the provisions of a provincial constitution] is given to national legislation which is specifically required or envisaged by the [Final Constitution] and to national legislative intervention made in terms of [FC s] 44(2). Conflicts between national legislation and provisions of a provincial constitution in the field of the concurrent legislative competences set out in [FC Schedule] 4 are to be dealt with in the same manner as conflicts in respect of such matters between national legislation and provincial legislation.[1]

FC s 147(1) was controversial at the time of certification. It was, however, ultimately deemed certifiable.

While conflicts between national legislation, provincial constitutions and provincial legislation should formally be treated in the same manner, the substantive position may be subtly different. When interpreting FC ss 146(2) and 44(2), courts need to be sensitive to the fact that provincial constitutions are created by a super-majority of the provincial legislature. The need for such sensitivity flows, as Stu Woolman notes, from the fact that:

> FC s 147 limits, even if it does not quite defeat, the Constitutional Court's efforts to guarantee that the certification of a provincial constitution is both final and certain … . [A] strong reading of FC 147 would make a provincial constitution's certification contingent upon its consistency with the extant legislation identified in categories (b), (c) and (d). Any such conflict resolved in favour of the national legislation would render the provision of the provincial constitution inoperative, as an objective matter, from the very moment that the provision of the provincial constitution was certified. Any provision of a provincial constitution that will be stillborn at the moment of birth hardly satisfies the general conditions of finality and certainty said to govern this [certification] process.[2]

In addition, Woolman correctly observes that, while a conflict decided in favour of national legislation will render the particular provision in the provincial constitution inoperative in terms of FC s 147, it will not affect the certifiability of the provincial constitution.[3] As Woolman writes, two good reasons ground this conclusion:

> First, … certification of a provincial constitution or a provincial constitutional amendment only requires that they not be inconsistent with the Final Constitution… . Second, were the Constitutional Court to treat provisions of a provincial constitution that could be inconsistent with national legislation in the same manner as it has treated suspensive clauses and consistency clauses in provincial constitutions, it would make the certification process inordinately more complicated. Provincial constitutions would have to be tested against the text of the Final Constitution, and the texts of existing pieces of national legislation. FC s 147 should be read, therefore, as recognizing the potential for such conflicts with national legislation, but wisely disaggregating such assessments from the certification process.[4]

[1] See First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 269.

[2] S Woolman 'Provincial Constitutions' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 21, 21-18–21-19 (citations omitted).

[3] Ibid at 21-19–21-20.

[4] Ibid.

16.8 Conflicts in schedule 5 areas

Conflict in Schedule 5 areas is dealt with in the chapter in this work on legislative competence.[1]

16.9 Building genuine co-operative government: Do courts possess a residual power to invalidate legislation on federalism grounds in the absence of legislative conflict?[2]

Judges might possess a residual power to invalidate legislation on federalism grounds even in the absence of legislative conflict. FC s 41(1) states:

> All spheres of government and all organs of state within each sphere must —
> (a) preserve the peace, national unity and the indivisibility of the Republic;
> (b) secure the well-being of the people of the Republic …

FC s 41(1) can be read in a manner that grants courts the power to invalidate provincial legislation on the grounds that such legislation seeks to advance the ends of a particular province at the expense of another province. Such protectionism may lead to 'a debilitating and destabilizing spiral of protectionist measures and anti-competitive countermeasures'.[3] The United States Supreme Court has found it necessary to assume the power to prevent certain types of protectionism in the absence of specific textual support in the US Constitution.[4] While our courts are hardly in the thrall of American jurisprudence, our Constitutional Court could well find itself compelled to invalidate provincial legislation on FC s 41(1) grounds.

---

[1] V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 15.

[2] For more on co-operative governance, see S Woolman & T Roux 'Co-operative Government & Intergovernmental Relations' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS1, July 2009) Chapter 14 (In general, cooperative governance — in terms of the both the Final Constitution and various pieces of legislation — requires that all parties to a conflict exhaust every possible means of dispute resolution before a court will consider hearing a matter.)

[3] LH Tribe American Constitutional Law (3rd Edition, Volume 1, 2000) 1040. On protectionism, see DH Regan 'The Supreme Court and State Protectionism: Making Sense of the Dormant Commerce Clause' (1986) 84 Michigan Law Review 1091, 1112-18.

[4] See Tribe (supra) at 1030. For example the dormant commerce clause has been used to prevent Wisconsin from prohibiting the operation of trucks longer than 55 feet on their highways because of the burden on interstate commerce. Raymond Motor Transportation, Inc v Rice 434 US 429 (1978). An Arizona law that aimed to limit the length of trains to 14 passenger cars or 70 freight cars could not be applied for the same reason. Southern Pacific Co v State of Arizona ex Rel Sullivan 325 US 761 (1945). A law that made it illegal to sell milk as pasteurized unless it had been pasteurized and bottled at an approved plant within 5 kilometres of the central square of Madison was invalidated. Dean Milk co v City of Madison, Wis 340 US 349 (1951). Alaska was barred from requiring timber taken from state land to be processed within the state before export. South-Central Timber Dev, Inc v Wunnicke 467 US 82 (1984). For a detailed analysis of the dormant commerce clause jurisprudence, see Tribe (supra) at 1029ff. See also MA Lawrence 'Toward a More Coherent Dormant Commerce Clause: A Proposed Unitary Framework' (1998) 21 Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 395.

17 National Legislative Authority

Michael Bishop & Ngwako Raboshakga

17.1 Introduction 17–1
17.2 Composition of Parliament 17–2
(a) The National Assembly 17–2
(b) The National Council of Provinces 17–4
(i) Composition and electoral system 17–5
(ii) The National Council of Provinces and the legislative process 17–6
(c) Membership and defections 17–11
(d) The relationship between the NA and the NCOP 17–13
17.3 The National Legislative Process 17–14
(a) Bills amending the Constitution 17–14
(b) Bills affecting the provinces 17–22
(c) Bills not affecting the provinces 17–26
(d) Money Bills and the Division of Revenue Bill 17–27
(e) Presidential assent and publication 17–28
(f) Challenges by the President or MPs 17–31
(i) FC s 79: Referral by the President 17–31
(ii) FC s 80: Referral by MPs 17–32
17.4 Timing of Challenges to Legislation 17–33
(a) While a Bill is being deliberated on by Parliament 17–34
(b) After a Bill has been passed by Parliament, but before the President has assented 17–36
(c) After a Bill is assented to, but before it comes into force 17–37
17.5 Substantive Constraints on Legislative Authority 17–38
(a) Federalism constraints 17–38
(b) Fundamental rights constraints 17–39
(c) Extraterritorial competence constraints 17–43
(d) Separation of powers constraints 17–43
(e) Delegation constraints 17–45
(i) Delegation to the executive 17–45
(ii) Delegation to provincial legislatures and municipal councils 17–51

(iii) Sub-delegation 17–52
(iv) Reviewing delegated powers 17–55
(f) Constraints imposed by the legality principle. 17–56
(i) Rationality 17–57
(ii) Vagueness. 17–58
(g) Constraints on the power to amend the Constitution . 17–60
17.6 Procedural Constraints on Legislative Authority. 17–63
(a) Public Participation 17–64
(i) Jurisdiction, standing and timing. 17–64
(ii) The place of public participation in the South African democracy and the reasonableness enquiry. 17–66
(aa) The Doctors for Life majority 17–67
(bb) The Doctors for Life dissents. 17–70
(cc) Application of reasonableness standard . . 17–72
(1) Doctors for Life 17–72
(2) Matatiele II 17–73
(3) Merafong 17–74
(4) Poverty Alleviation Network 17–75
(5) Glenister II 17–77
(iii) Assessment. 17–77
(b) Tagging. 17–83
(i) The appropriate test 17–84
(ii) Consequences of mistaken tagging 17–86
(iii) Discussion 17–88
(c) Bills requiring extra-parliamentary consultation. 17–90
17.7 Internal Regulation of Parliament 17–91
(a) Control over the internal proceedings of Parliament . 17–91
(b) Rules and orders of the National Assembly and the NCOP. 17–96
(i) The limits on Parliament's rule-making power. . . 17–97
(ii) The consequences of non-compliance with the rules 17–102
(c) Parliamentary privilege. 17–102
17.8 Political Parties 17–106
(a) Public or private. 17–107
(b) The role of political parties in the legislative process. . 17–109

17.1 Introduction*

This chapter explores the inner dynamics and the external effects of the National Legislature. The National Legislature occupies a critical space in South Africa's constitutional democracy. It embodies the realisation of the long and bitter struggle for liberation as made manifest by universal representation. It constitutes, at least in form, the primary driver of democratic rule. The Constitution also envisages a legislature that will make good the basic law's many promises. Yet, Parliament — precisely because of its vast powers and popular mandate — often poses the greatest threat (of the three branches of government) to hard won constitutional rights.

With these dangers in mind, the Final Constitution carefully calibrates the need to afford Parliament the necessary power to discharge its constitutional mandates, while cabining those same powers in a manner designed to prevent overreach and abuse. Those limits take a number of forms — most obviously the Bill of Rights and the assignment of certain powers to other spheres of government and organs of state. Parliament is also constrained by the procedures that it must follow in passing laws. Only laws that emerge from procedures clearly delineated in the Constitution are valid. These procedures go beyond purely formal niceties. They give life to forms of participatory democracy and direct democracy expressly contemplated by the Constitution. They likewise entrench our commitment to the rule of law.

Understanding how South Africa's Parliament manages to accomplish these various ends while remaining within constitutional confines first requires a somewhat detailed exploration of how it functions. This chapter cannot, within the space afforded, provide an exhaustive account of how (and how well) Parliament discharges its national legislative authority. To fully understand how Parliament acquits itself one would need to examine the basic principles of democracy from which it draws support,[1] the election of its members,[2] and the manner in which it shares power with the coordinate branches of national government,[3] the provinces,[4] and local government.[5] One would be obliged to traverse the express

* The authors wish to thank Steve Budlender for use of material from the first iteration of this chapter. We have drawn extensively from Steve's work — particularly in §§ 17.2, 17.3 and 17.5. We deeply appreciate his generosity in allowing us to take some of the credit for his excellent efforts. However, all the positions expressed in this chapter — and any errors — are ours alone.

[1] T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 10.

[2] G Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 29.

[3] S Seedorf & S Sibanda 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 12.

[4] T Madlingozi & S Woolman 'Provincial Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 19; C Murray & O Ampofo-Anti 'Provincial Executive Authority' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 20; V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2005) Chapter 15; V Bronstein 'Conflicts' S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 16.

[5] N Steytler & J De Visser 'Local Government' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 22; S Woolman & T Roux 'Cooperative Government' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS2, July 2009) Chapter 14.

substantive limits[1] on Parliament's powers to make laws in addition to the implicit limits[2] that flow from the aforementioned relationships and principles. Because these concerns are dealt with in detail elsewhere in this book, we engage them largely in passing. The chapter focuses primarily on the composition of Parliament, the interaction between its two houses, the procedures it follows to pass laws, how it regulates its internal proceedings and some of the more procedural limits on its powers.

§ 17.2 sets the stage by describing the make-up of Parliament and the interaction between the National Assembly ('NA') and the National Council of Provinces ('NCOP'). In § 17.3 we describe in detail — and with diagrammatic representations — how Parliament passes each type of law within its power. § 17.4 initiates the daunting task of considering the constitutional limits on Parliament's power by examining this surprisingly complex question: At what stage in the legislative process can litigants challenge legislation? Once we have established when a challenge can be brought, we examine the types of challenges that can be mounted. §17.5 provides an overview of the range of substantive challenges available: federalism, fundamental rights, extra-territoriality, separation of powers, delegation and legality constraints. The next section — § 17.6 — discusses oft-litigated and now well-ventilated procedural limits on Parliament's powers: public participation and tagging. The penultimate section asks some questions about the internal workings of Parliament. What are the limits of its rule-making power? And, what happens when Parliament breaks its own rules? Finally, we consider the role of the primary players in the legislative process: political parties.

17.2 Composition of Parliament

South Africa has a bicameral Parliament consisting of the NA and the NCOP. The NA 'is elected to represent the people'[3] while the NCOP 'represents the provinces to ensure provincial interests are taken into account in the national sphere of government'.[4] This section details how both houses are constituted, and how they interact with each other. We first discuss each house in general terms, then consider the relationship between the two, before finally looking in more detail at membership of, and defections from, both houses.

(a) The National Assembly

The NA is the first House of Parliament and the House to which the national executive is accountable.[5] The Constitution provides that it must consist of between [1] All the chapters in this four volume treatise that cover substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights fall into this category.

[2] F Michelman 'Legality, the Rule of Law and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 11.

[3] FC s 42(3).

[4] FC s 42(4).

[5] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC') s 55(2). If the National Assembly passes a vote of no confidence in the President and the Cabinet, the President and other members of the Cabinet must resign. The national executive is not accountable to the National Council of Provinces. Compare FC s 55(2) with FC s 68.

350 and 400 members elected by an electoral system based on a national common voters roll and producing, in general, proportional representation.[1]

Decisions by the NA are generally decided by majority vote.[2] The quorum of the NA is a majority of its members when a vote is taken on a Bill and one-third of the members in most other matters.[3]

The NA is the primary legislative power in Parliament.[4] It can legislate over the objections of the NCOP: (1) by a simple majority if the legislation does not affect provincial interests[5] and (2) by a two-thirds majority if the legislation does affect provincial interests.[6] It can also veto any legislation passed by the NCOP.[7] Members of the NA and committees of the NA can prepare and introduce in the NA any Bill other than a money Bill.[8]

The NA is chaired by the Speaker.[9] The Speaker is the representative and spokesperson of the Assembly in its collective capacity.[10] The Speaker may therefore give binding undertakings on behalf of the NA. Such undertakings may even embrace the expenditure of moneys in relation to the legislative process.[11] Though the Speaker may be removed by a resolution of the NA,[12] the Speaker must not bow to political pressure and is 'required by the duties of his office to exercise, and display, the impartiality of a judge.'[13]

Section 57(1) of the Constitution gives the NA the power to determine its internal arrangements and procedures and to make rules and orders concerning its business. The scope of these rules and their relationship to the constitutional text has already been the subject of litigation.[14] Section 57(2) requires that the rules of the NA provide inter alia for the establishment of committees and requires that minority parties be allowed to participate on these committees in a manner consistent with

[1] FC s 46(1). See also Electoral Act 73 of 1998.

[2] FC s 53(1)(c). The special majorities required for amendments to the Constitution are discussed at § 17.2*(a)* infra.

[3] FC ss 53(1)(a) and (b).

[4] See § 17.2 infra for discussion of the national legislative process.

[5] FC s 75.

[6] FC s 76(1) and (2).

[7] FC s 76(2)(i).

[8] FC s 55(1)(b) and s 73(2). Only the Minister of Finance may introduce a money Bill in the Assembly.

[9] FC s 52. Note that the section provides also for an office of Deputy Speaker.

[10] Gauteng Provincial Legislature v Kilian 2001 (2) SA 68 (SCA), 2001 (3) BCLR 253 (SCA) ('Killian') at para 26.

[11] Ibid at para 29. The SCA held that the Speaker of the Gauteng Provincial Legislature had the power to give an undertaking to minority political parties that the Legislature would cover the legal costs incurred in referring a pending bill to the Constitutional Court.

[12] FC s 52(4).

[13] Kilian (supra) at para 30.

[14] Speaker of the National Assembly v De Lille & Another 1999 (4) SA 863 (SCA), 1999 (11) BCLR 1339 (SCA)('De Lille'). See the discussion at § 17.7*(a)* and (d) infra.

democracy.[1] For these reasons, the rules of the Assembly provide that parties are to be represented on the committees in substantially the same proportion as they are represented in the NA[2] and that, as far as possible, each party is entitled to at least one representative in each committee.[3] Meetings of the NA's committees are generally open to the public.[4]

The committees contemplated by s 57 include portfolio committees. The portfolio committees play a crucial role in Parliament's legislative and oversight functions.[5] They are responsible for the detailed consideration and debate of Bills after their first 'reading' and are also the institutions to which public comment on Bills is usually addressed. The portfolio committees also play an oversight role by monitoring the performance of members of the national executive and their particular portfolios. The NA's committees also have the powers to summon any person to appear before them to give evidence or to produce documents and the power to require organs of state to report to them.[6] Through the judicious use of these powers the committees can be important tools for responsible, accountable and transparent government.

(b) The National Council of Provinces

The second House of Parliament is the NCOP. The NCOP, as its name suggests, aims to give the provinces representation in the national legislative process. Its composition, powers and processes were designed to offer more effective national representation for provincial interests than was provided by the Senate under the Interim Constitution.[7]

Although the primary function of the NCOP is legislative, it has the secondary role of providing a national forum for consideration of issues affecting provinces.[8] The latter role distinguishes the NCOP from the NA. Another important

[1] FC s 57(2)(b). See Democratic Alliance & Another v Masondo NO & Another 2003 (2) SA 413 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 128 (CC), [2002] ZACC 28 ('Masondo') at para 18 (Constitutional Court held that the 'purpose of these provisions is to ensure that minority parties can participate meaningfully in the deliberative processes of parliament.') For comment on Masondo, see T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman & M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 10. Section 57(2) (d) provides for the recognition of the leader of the largest opposition in the Assembly as the "Leader of the Opposition". There is nothing in the Constitution that suggests that this requirement has anything but symbolic meaning.

[2] This general rule does not apply to those committees where a specific composition is prescribed by the Rules. NA Rule 125(1). Note that, generally, parties appoint their members to sit on particular committees. NA Rule 126. Therefore in practical terms, the majority party will be able to control the election of the chairperson of any committee. See NA Rule 129.

[3] NA Rule 125(2).

[4] NA Rule 152.

[5] See NA Rules 199-203. The equivalent NCOP committees are the select committees. See NCOP Rules 151-5.

[6] FC s 56 and NA Rule 138. The NCOP committees have similar powers. See FC s 69 and NCOP Rule 103.

[7] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC'). See Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC), [1996] ZACC 26 ('First Certification Judgment') at paras 318-33, particularly para 331.

[8] FC s 42(4).

difference between the Houses is that the NCOP is not an organ of responsible government. The national executive is accountable to the NA and not to the NCOP.[1]

(i) Composition and electoral system

The NCOP consists of nine provincial delegations of ten members each.[2] The delegates are selected by the provincial legislatures on the basis of party political proportional representation.[3] Each delegation has six permanent members:[4] however, even these members are subject to recall by the party which nominated them if they lose the confidence of the provincial legislature.[5] The balance of the delegation is composed of four special members. These special members of the provincial legislature are sent to participate in particular NCOP business.[6] With one exception,[7] voting within the NCOP takes place by delegation. Each provincial delegation casts one vote in accordance with a provincial mandate determined by the provincial legislature.[8] A resolution requires the votes of five provinces to be adopted.[9] This process attempts to subordinate party allegiance to allegiance to the province as a whole.[10] The purpose of the voting procedure is to enhance the representation of provincial interests within the NCOP and to prevent the

[1] Compare FC s 55(2) with FC s 68.

[2] FC s 60(1). Provision is made in FC s 67 for a tenth delegation representing local government to participate in the deliberations of the NCOP when local government matters are discussed. The local government delegation does not have voting rights.

[3] FC s 61(1), read with Part B of Schedule 3, sets out the formula for determining the representation of parties in the provincial delegations. Item 7 of Schedule 6 specifies the number of special delegates and permanent delegates to which the respective parties are entitled in each province. Item 7 applies only for the duration of the term of office of each provincial legislature. Once a new legislature is elected the distribution of special and permanent delegates will be governed by national legislation. See FC s 61(2)(a).

[4] The presence of permanent delegates in the NCOP serves an important function by providing a continuous provincial political presence in Parliament and prevents the legislative process from being taken over entirely by both civil servants and national political interests. By contrast, the German Bundesrat has no permanent delegates and tends to be run by civil servants. For a discussion of the strengths and weaknesses of the NCOP as a mechanism for intergovernmental relations, see S Woolman & T Roux 'Co-operative Government and Intergovernmental Relations' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS 1, July 2009) Chapter 14.

[5] FC s 62(4)(c).

[6] FC s 60(2)(a).

[7] Where the NCOP votes on legislation that does not relate to provincial matters, there is no delegation vote and individual members cast separate votes. FC s 75(2).

[8] FC s 65(1)(a). Section 65(2) requires Parliament to pass national legislation that will provide a uniform procedure by which provincial legislatures will mandate delegations to cast their votes. That legislation — the Mandating Procedures of Provinces Act 52 of 2008 — is discussed in § 17.2*(b)*(ii) below.

[9] FC s 65(1)(b).

[10] It also means that the presence in the NCOP of individual members of provincial delegations is frequently unnecessary. Hence there is no requirement that a minimum number of members of the Council must be present before votes can take place. By contrast, FC s 53(1)(b) requires the presence of at least a third of the members of the National Assembly before a vote can be taken on any issue and an actual majority of all members for other votes.

Council from becoming a second House of Assembly in which the national political party Whip prevails over provincial concerns.[1]

(ii) The National Council of Provinces and the legislative process

The NCOP exercises a veto over certain constitutional amendments.[2] The ordinary legislative powers of the NCOP are strongest with respect to legislation affecting the provinces.[3] Where there is a dispute between the NCOP and the NA regarding such legislation, mediation between the two houses takes place. Unless a settlement is reached, the NA can pass the legislation only with a two-thirds majority.[4] Where there is a dispute between the NCOP and the NA regarding other legislation, no mediation takes place and the NA is free to enact the legislation by a simple majority.[5]

The different powers of the NCOP with respect to legislation on provincial matters and other legislation are reflected in different legislative processes within the NCOP. The default process in the NCOP — which applies to 'provincial' legislation and constitutional amendments — involves the execution of a provincial mandate, with voting taking place by delegation and not by member.[6] It is for that reason that, in its Second Certification Judgment, the Constitutional Court described the NCOP as: '[a] council of provinces and not a chamber composed of elected representatives. Voting by delegation reflects accurately the support of the different provincial legislatures. In this manner the provincial legislatures are given a direct say in the national law-making process through the NCOP.'[7]

During the certification process, the system of mandated voting was challenged as failing to comply with Constitutional Principle ('CP') XIV. CP XIV required minority parties to participate in the legislative process 'in a manner consistent with democracy.' Because each province only has one vote in the NCOP, the challengers contended that minority parties' voices would not be heard. The Constitutional Court rejected the complaint, noting that minority parties would be fully heard in the NA. The Court also held that, '[g]iven the purpose of the NCOP, which is to involve the provinces in the enactment of certain legislation and to provide a forum in which provincial interests can be advanced, the method of voting is not inappropriate.'[8]

Because the vote of the provincial delegation is determined by a decision of the provincial legislature, there is less need for a substantial committee process in the

[1] This usurpation of provincial prerogatives was perceived to have been one of the failings of the Senate under the Interim Constitution. See First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 320 (Counsel for the Constitutional Assembly described the Senate as 'a mirror image of the National Assembly'.)

[2] See § 17.3*(a)* infra.

[3] This category encompasses all of the matters in respect of which the NCOP passes legislation in terms of s 76. See § 17.3*(b)* infra.

[4] See § 17.3*(b)* infra.

[5] See § 17.3*(c)* infra.

[6] FC s 65(1).

[7] Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [1996] ZACC 24 ('Second Certification Judgment') at para 61.

[8] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 227.

Council itself on 'provincial' legislation.[1] The mandated nature of the legislative process on Bills involving provincial matters also implies that there is limited scope for debate over such Bills in the Council as a whole. For the purposes of public accountability and transparency, it is appropriate for delegations to give detailed explanations in Council of the reasons for their vote on Bills involving provincial matters.[2] These recommendations should, however, be distinguished from debating the merits of the Bill. Such debate would, for the most part, be irrelevant to the legislative process because delegates are voting on the basis of provincial mandates.

The Constitution requires an Act of Parliament that provides a uniform procedure for provincial legislatures to confer authority on their delegations to cast votes on their behalf.[3] This legislation was finally passed in 2009. Unfortunately, the Mandating Procedures of Provinces Act ('Mandates Act')[4] is not a model of statutory clarity. It distinguishes between four types of mandates: negotiating, final, legislative and voting.

First, a negotiating mandate contains the instructions the province's delegation must follow when the Bill is negotiated in committee and may include proposed amendments to the Bill.[5] Negotiating mandates are conferred by committees of the provincial legislature and are compulsory when an NCOP committee considers a Bill.[6]

Second, a final mandate tells the delegation how to vote on the Bill in committee.[7] They are conferred by the provincial legislature, and are mandatory for decisions on Bills.[8]

Third, the Act provides two complementary (and somewhat conflicting) definitions of a 'legislative mandate'. According to the definitions section, a legislative mandate is 'the conferral of authority by a provincial legislature on its provincial delegation to the NCOP to cast a vote on a question contemplated in [FC ss 64, 74, 76 or 78].'[9] Section 7 indicates that a legislative mandate includes both a negotiating and a final mandate, and is required for decisions under FC ss 74 and 76.[10] The best

[1] One possible NCOP committee function would be to summon the Cabinet member promoting the Bill to give answers to questions on the Bill where they are required. The answers could then be used to inform any provincial debate on the Bill. Provincial portfolio committees may not have the power to require the attendance of national Ministers (FC s 115 is open to conflicting interpretations in this regard). NCOP committees do. See FC s 66(2).

[2] The NCOP's presiding officer may, on request, allow each province to give a declaration explaining the province's vote. NCOP Rule 71*(b)*.

[3] FC s 65(2).

[4] Act 52 of 2008.

[5] Mandates Act s 1.

[6] Mandates Act s 5, which reads: 'A committee designated by a provincial legislature must in accordance with the format prescribed in Schedule 1 confer authority on its provincial delegation to the NCOP of parameters for negotiation when the relevant NCOP select committee considers a Bill after tabling and before consideration of final mandates, and may include proposed amendments to the Bill.'

[7] Mandates Act s 1.

[8] Mandates Act s 6, which reads: 'A provincial legislature must confer authority on its provincial delegation to the NCOP to cast a vote when the relevant NCOP select committee considers a Bill prior to voting thereon in an NCOP plenary.'

[9] Mandates Act s 1. FC s 64 deals with votes for the Chairperson and Deputy Chairperson of the NCOP. FC s 78 concerns decisions of the Mediation Committee.

[10] Mandates Act s 7 actually refers to FC ss 74(1)(b), 74(2)(b), 74(3)(b), 74(8), rather than s 74 generally. However, those specific subsections are all the parts of FC s 74 that require a vote by the NCOP, so it can fairly be replaced with a reference to FC s 74 generally.

interpretation of the definition read with s 7 seems to be that a combination of negotiating and final mandates is required when a delegation votes on a s 74 or s 76 question in committee. Presumably, both mandates must be conferred simultaneously. The omission of FC ss 64 and 78 from the list in s 7 is difficult to explain. The only plausible explanation is that a legislative mandate is permissible, but not required, for those decisions.

Fourth, while the negotiating, final and legislative mandates all apply to votes in committee, the voting mandate conveys the province's vote for a question in an NCOP plenary session. It must be conferred by the provincial legislature.[1] To avoid interminable consultations between the provincial legislature and its delegation, s 8(2) provides: 'If no matter arises from the deliberations of the NCOP select committee when considering final mandates which may necessitate consideration by a provincial legislature, the provincial delegation to the NCOP must table its province's final mandate in the NCOP plenary as that province's voting mandate.'

In addition to categorising the types of mandates, the Mandates Act also sets out basic, formal requirements that all mandates must meet to be valid.[2] Presumably, a mandate that does not meet these conditions will be invalid. But it remains unclear what will happen if the NCOP acts on what later turns out to have been an invalid mandate. We discuss the question of failures to comply with internal procedures generally in the section on the Internal Regulation of Parliament.[3]

However, the Mandates Act is vague on an even bigger question: How must provincial legislatures determine their mandate? Negotiating mandates must be conferred by committees of the provincial legislatures, while final, legislative and voting mandates come from the provincial legislatures themselves. But the Act allows the provinces to decide what process they will follow to confer the non-negotiating mandates. Are provinces required to have a plenary vote, or may they delegate the function — through their rules or practice — to a committee or the speaker? Can provinces adopt different requirements for different types of questions? The only constitutional limitation, in our view, is that a question under s 74(8) must be decided by a plenary vote. Given this omission, the Mandates Act may not actually fulfil its constitutional purpose to 'provide for a uniform procedure in terms of which provincial legislatures confer authority on their delegations to cast votes on their behalf.' The actual mechanism for conferring authority is left to the provinces. The Mandates Act only regulates the form in which that authority must be expressed in the NCOP.

The mandating procedure has been the topic of litigation several times in the Constitutional Court. All of these cases predated the Mandates Act. However, their disposition by the Constitutional Court remains illustrative of the Court's reluctance to decide some difficult issues. In United Democratic Movement

[1] Mandates Act s 8(1), which reads: 'A provincial legislature must confer the authority on the head of the provincial delegation to the NCOP, or a delegate designated by the head of the delegation, to cast a vote in an NCOP plenary.'

[2] Mandating Act s 3 (A mandate must: (a) indicate the name and number of the bill; (b) indicate how the province votes; (c) be signed by the Speaker of the provincial legislature or a delegate; and (d) be addressed to the Chairperson of the NCOP or a delegate.)

[3] § 17.7 below.

& Others v President of the RSA & Others,[1] the applicants attempted to rely on the failure of some of the provincial delegations properly to confer and present their mandates in order to challenge the validity of one of the Acts at issue in the case.[2] The respondents, in turn, contended that a court was not competent to enquire into compliance with the NCOP rule that governed mandates; only the NCOP was competent to determine compliance with its internal rules and procedures so long as no violation of the Constitution was alleged.[3] The Constitutional Court in United Democratic Movement ducked this question, presumably because the Act in question was declared invalid on other unrelated procedural grounds.

In President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Quagliani the applicants argued that South Africa's extradition treaty with the United States of America was invalid because the mandates in the NCOP had not been properly conferred.[4] In terms of FC s 231(2), treaties must be approved by resolution in both legislative houses.[5] The Court avoided deciding the mandates issue for three procedural reasons. First, the applicants had not joined the speakers of the provincial legislatures.[6] Second, the complaint was inordinately delayed.[7] Finally, the Court held that a bald allegation that mandates were not conferred was insufficient. An applicant had to provide some evidence to indicate that the proper procedure had not been followed.[8] These findings serve as important reminders of the procedural hurdles for anybody planning a future mandates challenge.

The only detailed consideration of the role of mandates occurs in Merafong Demarcation Forum & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others.[9] The issue in Merafong was whether a provincial delegation to the NCOP could propose an amendment to a s 74(8) Bill amending provincial boundaries. We address that question in more detail later.[10] For now, we focus on the Court's comments about the nature of the mandated voting system in the NCOP. Van der Westhuizen J held that '[a]lthough the NCOP fulfils an important function in the protection of provincial interests, there is no scope for debate and for substantive amendments as far as bills altering provincial boundaries are concerned.'[11] Citing an earlier passage from the original iteration of this chapter (which we retain),[12] he argued that

[1] United Democratic Movement & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC), [2002] ZACC 21 ('United Democratic Movement').

[2] Loss or Retention of Membership of National and Provincial Legislatures Act 22 of 2002.

[3] In making this argument, the respondents relied on FC ss 70(1)(a) and 71(2) read with ss 36 and 37 of the Powers and Privileges of Parliament Act 91 of 1963.

[4] 2009 (4) BCLR 345 (CC), [2009] ZACC 1.

[5] FC s 231(2) reads: 'An international agreement binds the Republic only after it has been approved by resolution in both the National Assembly and the National Council of Provinces'.

[6] Quagliani (supra) at para 27.

[7] Ibid at paras 28-29.

[8] Ibid at para 30.

[9] 2008 (5) SA 171 (CC), 2008 (10) BCLR 968 (CC), [2008] ZACC 10 ('Merafong').

[10] §17.3*(a)* below.

[11] Merafong (supra) at para 81.

[12] S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2005) 17-5 ('Such debate would, for the most part, be irrelevant to the legislative process because delegates are voting on the basis of provincial mandates.')

'[t]he reason is of course the mandated nature of the process. Delegates to the NCOP vote on the basis of provincial mandates. They cannot agree to support an amendment which they have not been mandated by their provincial legislatures to support.'[1]

This conclusion cannot possibly be correct. What Steve Budlender was (correctly) pointing out in the quoted passage is that the mandated nature of the process makes it pointless for the delegates to engage in substantive debate with each other about a Bill. For ss 74 and 76 Bills the substantive debate occurs through sharing and altering mandates. The NCOP is merely a mechanism through which the provincial legislatures negotiate with each other: the delegates are merely mouthpieces. But that does not mean that it is pointless to propose amendments to ss 74 and 76 Bills. All it means is that the amendments must be proposed in terms of negotiating or legislative mandates received from the provincial legislatures. Those mandates can propose amendments which the other provinces can accept or reject when they confer their final and voting mandates. Merafong evinces a serious misunderstanding or mischaracterisation of the mandating process. The Court should revisit this issue at the earliest opportunity to avoid the potential for stifling meaningful discussion between provinces in the NCOP.

In the case of 'non-provincial' s 75 legislation, the considerations outlined above do not apply because voting within the Council takes place by individual members[2] and the provincial mandate does not operate.[3] In the case of such 'non-provincial' legislation, the Constitution also requires that minority parties be allowed to participate in the proceedings of the NCOP and its committees 'in a manner consistent with democracy'.[4] The meaning of this phrase was considered by the Constitutional Court with reference to s 160(8). Section 160(8) imposes a similar obligation on Municipal Councils.[5] Langa DCJ, for the majority, held that the 'purpose of these provisions is to ensure that minority parties can participate meaningfully in the deliberative processes of parliament'.[6] O'Regan J (in dissent) contended that the phrase 'implies that the majority must always be able to determine decisions.'[7]

This requirement does not apply when the NCOP deals with 'provincial' legislation or other matters — in such cases the NCOP rules and orders are required instead to provide for the participation of all the provinces in a manner consistent with democracy and there is, understandably, no reference to minority parties.[8]

[1] Merafong (supra) at para 81.
[2] FC s 75(2).
[3] FC s 65(2) applies only to those cases where the provincial delegation casts a single vote.
[4] FC s 70(2)(c).
[5] Democratic Alliance & Another v Masondo NO & Another 2003 (2) SA 413 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 128 (CC), [2002] ZACC 28.
[6] Ibid at para 18.
[7] At para 61.
[8] FC s 70(2)(b).

This distinction has also been reflected in the NCOP rules regarding its select committees. These committees have to deal both with non-provincial matters under s 75 and with matters that affect the provinces. The rules therefore provide that each province is entitled to an equal number of permanent members on each committee[1] and that each party represented in the NCOP is entitled to proportional representation on the committee or, where this is not possible due to the committee size, at least one representative on the committee.[2] Committee decisions on s 75 matters require a simple majority of the votes cast, whereas committee decisions on 'provincial' legislation or other matters require the supporting vote of five provinces.[3] On matters affecting the provinces, provincial legislatures will, through their committees, facilitate public involvement in their legislative processes in their respective constituencies, making it unnecessary that the same task be undertaken by the NCOP's committees.[4]

(c) Membership and defections

The story of the constitutional regulation of members' defection from political parties is long, complicated and ends where it begins. Under the Interim Constitution, a member of the NA who ceased to be a member of the party that nominated him or her had to vacate his or her seat.[5] This 'anti-defection'

[1] NCOP Rule 154*(a)*.

[2] NCOP Rule 154*(b)*.

[3] NCOP Rule 152(2) and (3). Note that these rules also provide that the quorum requirement is different in each of these situations.

[4] In Doctors for Life International, the Court emphasised the interdependency between the work of the NCOP and the provincial legislatures, and consequently their respective committees. Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC), [2006] ZACC 11 ('Doctors for Life') at paras 159-163. The Court considered the 'question as to whether the duty of the NCOP to facilitate public involvement in its legislative process may be met through public hearings that are conducted by the provincial legislatures'. It found that functional and practical considerations generally weigh in favour of holding public hearings in the provinces by the provincial legislatures rather than at the seat of the NCOP. The functional advantages include the fact that some members of the provincial delegation in the NCOP are also members of the provincial legislature, able to partake in the facilitation of public involvement at the provincial level. Practically, the Court found it wasteful of the government's limited resources if both the NCOP and provincial legislatures were to hold separate public hearings in the same provinces. However, the Court came short of laying down a hard and fast rule in this regard and held that the 'ultimate question' remains 'whether the provincial interests on the legislation under consideration were taken into account in the national legislative process'. Thus '[w]hether public hearings conducted by provincial legislatures are sufficient to satisfy the obligation of the NCOP under s 72(1)(a) ultimately depends on the facts and the nature of the process of facilitating public involvement that has occurred in the provinces, including the extent to which NCOP delegations therein were involved in and have access to the information gathered during that process.' Ibid at para 163. For further discussion of Doctors for Life, see § 17.6 below provision was kept in place under the Final Constitution[1] and was unsuccessfully challenged in the First Certification proceedings.[2]

[5] IC s 43*(b)*.

In 2002, Parliament passed four Acts,[3] including two constitutional amendments, that aimed to allow defections at national, provincial and local government levels. The constitutionality of these Acts was challenged in the Constitutional Court in United Democratic Movement & Others v President of the RSA & Others.[4] The Court rejected the bulk of the challenges. It held that the constitutional amendments did not destroy the 'basic structure' of the Constitution[5] and that they were not inconsistent with the founding values of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.[6] The Court also rejected the contention that the amendment allowing defections at local government level was inconsistent with the Constitution.[7] The only challenge that the Court upheld was the challenge to the Loss or Retention of Membership of National and Provincial Legislatures Act ('Membership Act'). This Act, though it amended the transitional provisions of the Final Constitution, had been passed by the procedure for ordinary legislation (s 76(1)) rather than by the procedure for constitutional amendments (s 74(3)). The Court recognised that

[1] FC s 47, which deals with membership of the National Assembly, did not itself contain an anti-defection clause. The anti-defection clause was contained in FC Schedule 6, item 6(3) read with item 23A of Annexure A to Schedule 6, which provided:

(1) A person loses membership of a legislature to which this Schedule applies if that person ceases to be a member of the party which nominated that person as a member of the legislature.

(2) Despite subitem (1) any existing political party may at any time change its name.

(3) An Act of Parliament may, within a reasonable period after the new Constitution took effect, be passed in accordance with section 76(1) of the new Constitution to amend this item and item 23 to provide for the manner in which it will be possible for a member of a legislature who ceases to be a member of the party which nominated that member, to retain membership of such legislature.

(4) An Act of Parliament referred to in subitem (3) may also provide for—

(a) any existing party to merge with another party; or

(b) any party to subdivide into more than one party.

[2] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC), [1996] ZACC 26 ('First Certification Judgment') at paras 182-7. The Court rejected submissions that, by submitting legislators to the authority of their parties, the anti-defection clause: was inimical to accountable, responsive, open, representative and democratic government; that universally accepted rights and freedoms, such as freedom of expression, freedom of association, the freedom to make political choices and the right to stand for public office and, if elected, to hold office, are undermined; and that the anti defection clause militates against the principles of 'representative government', 'appropriate checks and balances to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness' and 'democratic representation'.

[3] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Act 18 of 2002, Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Act 21 of 2002, Local Government: Municipal Structures Amendment Act 20 of 2002 and Loss or Retention of Membership of National and Provincial Legislatures Act 22 of 2002.

[4] 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC), [2002] ZACC 21 ('United Democratic Movement' or 'UDM').

[5] Ibid at para 17. The Court found that it did need to decide whether the 'basic structure doctrine' formed part of South African law. See § 17.5*(g)* infra.

[6] United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 75. The Court therefore concluded that there had been no need to pass the amendments in accordance with the requirements of FC s 74(1) or (2). The amendments had been correctly passed in accordance with FC s 74(3). See § 17.3*(a)* infra.

[7] United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 84. This was on the assumption that Schedule 6A (which was created by the amendment) had the status of ordinary legislation due to the way it could be amended and could therefore be assessed against the provisions of the Final Constitution.

the Constitution had vested a special power in Parliament to amend these particular transitional provisions of the Constitution by an ordinary Act of Parliament, rather than by a constitutional amendment.[1] However, it held that the proviso that the Act had to be promulgated 'within a reasonable period after the new Constitution took effect' meant that the special power had lapsed.[2] The Membership Act was consequently declared invalid on procedural grounds. Following this decision, Parliament duly passed a constitutional amendment[3] to replace the Membership Act. This regime — in place until 2009 — permitted defections at national, provincial and local levels, but only during specified periods and under certain conditions.

In 2008, Parliament passed the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Constitutional Amendment Acts that repealed all the 2002 floor-crossing provisions. The amendments came into force on 17 April 2009. The position on defections and floor crossing now is precisely what it was before the 2002 amendments: if a member leaves her political party, she loses her seat. Period. The seat belongs to the party, not the member.

Although we have ended where we began, the floor-crossing saga tells us something important about the nature of our democracy: it is flexible and dynamic. The 'multi-party representative' democracy envisioned in the Constitution is capable of embracing several different variations. At the very least, proportional representation is compatible with a system that links seats partly to individual members rather than entirely to parties.[4]

(d) The Relationship between the NA and the NCOP[5]

It is easy to see the NCOP as the less important house of Parliament. It has fewer powers and can, on most issues, be overridden by a sufficiently determined NA. This description is not inaccurate: where both Houses and the majority of provinces are dominated by a single party, the NCOP tends to play a secondary role.

Despite the actual place of the NCOP in our legislative process, the Constitutional Court has developed and applied a nuanced conception of the NCOP's place in the constitutional firmament.

> Its role is both unique and fundamental to the basic structure of our government. It reflects one of the fundamental premises of our government, which sees national, provincial and

[1] See United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 104 and the provisions of item 23A(3) of Annexure A to Schedule 6 of the Final Constitution.

[2] Ibid at para 105 (The Court held that 'In determining what is a reasonable period … it is necessary to have regard to all relevant facts and circumstances. The relevant considerations depend in the first instance upon the nature of the task that has to be performed, and in the second instance upon the object for which the time is given. Here the task to be performed was the passing of legislation to modify transitional provisions that had a limited life… . Having regard to all the circumstances, we are unable to conclude that an amendment passed more than five years after the Constitution came into force, to change a provision which had only another two years to run, was passed within a reasonable period.')

[3] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Act 2 of 2003.

[4] For a critique of UDM, see T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 10; G Devenish 'Political Musical Chairs — The saga of Floor-crossing and the Constitution' (2004) 15 Stell LR 52.

[5] For an excellent discussion on the role of the NCOP, see C Murray & R Simeon 'From Paper to Practice: The National Council of Provinces after its First Year' (1999) 14 SA Public Law 96.

> local governments as 'spheres within a single whole' which are distinctive yet interdependent and interrelated. The NCOP ensures that national government is responsive to provincial interests while simultaneously engaging the provinces and provincial legislatures in the consideration of national policy. From this perspective, the NCOP plays a pivotal role 'as a linking mechanism that acts simultaneously to involve the provinces in national purposes and to ensure the responsiveness of national government to provincial interests.'[1]

That account certainly reflects a constitutional ideal. But when eight of the nine provinces and the NA are controlled by the same political party, the NCOP will always fade into the background. We discuss the consequences of the ANC's dominance of the political scene in more detail in § 17.8*(b)* below. For now, we note that the role of the NCOP and the relationship between the two Houses will depend on how political power is actually distributed.

17.3 The National Legislative Process

The Constitution creates four different legislative processes: amendments to the Constitution, Bills affecting provinces, Bills not affecting the provinces, and Money Bills. The processes (except that for Money Bills) are illustrated in diagrammatic form in Figures 17.1, 17.2, 17.3 and 17.4.[2] A narrative description of the three processes follows below. After we have described each process, we consider the final step that all forms of legislation must take: assent by the President. Lastly, we look at the possibility for the President or Members of Parliament ('MPs') to refer legislation to the Constitutional Court.

Before we describe the different processes, we must raise (and immediately bracket) the question of 'tagging'. Tagging is the determination of which process applies to a bill. Tagging constitutes the first step in the legislative process. Voting can only commence once Parliament knows what type of Bill has been tabled. Tagging is dealt with in full in § 17.6*(b)* below.

(a) Bills amending the Constitution

There are several different types of constitutional amendments, each with slightly different requirements. We first address the procedures that apply to all amendments. Next, we consider the different variations and the problems each raises. Lastly, we identify some general difficulties regarding the NCOP's participation in amending the Constitution.

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 79 quoting C Murray & R Simeon 'From Paper to Practice: The National Council of Provinces after its First Year" (1999) 14 SA Public Law 96, 98 and 101 (footnotes omitted) (The Court noted that the NCOP was modeled on the Bundesrat in Germany. 'Like the NCOP, the Bundesrat represents the interests of the Länder, which in this context are equivalent to the provinces in our country, in the national government. … The members of the Bundesrat are members of the state governments and are appointed and subject to recall by the states. They serve in the council as representatives of the Länder. The German Constitution provides that the Länder shall participate, through the Bundesrat, in the national legislative process.' Doctors for Life (supra) at para 80.)

[2] Figures 17.1, 17.2, 17.3 and 17.4 are based on diagrams prepared by M Phillips for the Gauteng Legislative NCOP Workshop, October 1996.

Constitutional amendments may only be introduced in the NA.[1] At least 30 days prior to the introduction of a Bill to amend the Constitution, particulars of the Bill must be published in the Gazette for public comment and must be submitted to the provincial legislatures for their views.[2] Any written comments on an amendment Bill received from the public or the provincial legislatures must be tabled in the NA on the introduction of the Bill.[3] An amendment Bill may not include provisions other than constitutional amendments and matters connected with the amendments.[4] The NA considers all Bills to amend the Constitution and (with one exception) may pass them only with a supporting vote of two-thirds of its members.[5]

We have identified five types of constitutional amendments:

(i) Amendments to FC ss 1 or 74;
(ii) Amendments to the Bill of Rights;
(iii) Amendments that affect the provinces generally;
(iv) Amendments that affect a specific province or provinces;
(v) All other amendments.

The first variation, set out in s 74(1), is an amendment that affects the Constitution's basic principles. The founding provisions of s 1[6] are specially entrenched and may only be amended with a supporting vote of 75 per cent of the members of the NA,[7] and the vote of six of the nine provinces in the NCOP.[8] There is an argument developed by the Indian Supreme Court — which we discuss later[9] — that there are some principles of the Constitution that are so central to the nature of the Constitution that they are un-amendable. The Constitution does not raise this possibility explicitly and any doctrine of that sort would have to be created by the courts.

Second, amendments that alter the Bill of Rights must garner the ordinary two-thirds majority in the NA and six provincial votes in the NCOP.[10]

There is some debate over whether the super-majority of 75 per cent required by s 74(1) applies only when the founding values in s 1 are explicitly amended, or whether it also applies to an amendment to other parts of the Constitution where the proposed amendment is inconsistent with the founding values in s 1. A similar debate could be had about amendments that are inconsistent with — but do not change the language of — the Bill of Rights. In United Democratic Movement, the Constitutional Court operated on the assumption that the latter view was correct

[1] Compare FC s 73(1) and FC s 73(3) read with FC s 76(3). See also Joint Rule 173*(b)*.
[2] FC s 74(5).
[3] FC s 74(6)(a).
[4] FC s 74(4).
[5] FC s 74(2) and (3).
[6] For more on the founding values, see, C Roederer 'Founding Provisions' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 13.
[7] FC s 74(1) provides that amendments to the amendment section itself must be passed with a vote of 75% of the members of the National Assembly.
[8] FC s 74(1).
[9] §17.5*(g)* below.
[10] FC s 74(2).

and so the stricter requirements would apply.[1] However, the UDM Court expressly left the issue undecided as it was not germane to the disposition of the matter.[2]

In our view, the Court should, when faced with an appropriate matter, adopt a broader construction of s 74(1). The founding values are rarely used directly. They could be severely undermined if the s 74(1) process could be bypassed by using the less onerous s 74(2) and s 74(3) processes to pass amendments inconsistent with the founding values. The same is true of amendments to Chapter 2. It would subvert s 74(2) if it could be avoided simply by locating amendments that affect the Bill of Rights in other parts of the text of the Constitution.

However, that position needs to be tempered by an additional point made in United Democratic Movement. The Court stressed that the Constitution, as amended, had to be read as a whole and its provisions interpreted in harmony with one another.[3] Amendments that could be interpreted to be inconsistent with s 1 should, if possible, be read to be consistent with the Constitution. Only if the amended text is not reasonably capable of a harmonious reading should the constitutional amendment have to follow the FC s 74(1)/(2) procedure.

The Court's extant jurisprudence suggests that this more expansive approach relates only to amendments that are inconsistent with the founding values. It will not, and should not, apply to amendments that do no more than influence one's reading of the founding values. In Premier, KwaZulu-Natal, & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others[4] the Constitutional Court was faced with an argument that amendments to the Interim Constitution that might affect the scope of the legislative and executive powers of the provinces (contained in IC ss 126 and 144) should comply with the special procedures that governed amendments to those two sections. The Court rejected this argument. It held that since the two amendments did not actually amend either s 126 or 144, the procedures in question did not need to be applied.[5]

In United Democratic Movement, the Court also left open the question whether the founding values and Bill of Rights could be amended by inference or whether it is necessary to draw attention to this possibility in s 74(5) notices and to state specifically that the provisions of s 74(1) and (2) are applicable to such amendments.[6] To give full effect to the principles and purposes underlying s 74, the latter view is to be preferred.

The third variation, dealt with in FC s 74(3)(b), is amendments that affect the provinces because they: (a) involve the NCOP;[7] (b) alter provincial boundaries, powers, functions or institutions;[8] or (c) amend a provision of the FC that deals specifically with a provincial matter.[9] These amendments have the same require-

[1] United Democratic Movement (supra) at paras 18-20.
[2] Ibid at para 75.
[3] Ibid at para 12.
[4] Premier, KwaZulu-Natal, & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1996 (1) SA 769 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1561 (CC), [1995] ZACC 10 ('Premier, KwaZulu-Natal').
[5] Ibid at paras 27-8, 43.
[6] United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 75.
[7] FC s 74(3)(b)(i).
[8] FC s 74(3)(b)(ii).
[9] FC s 74(3)(b)(iii).

ments as those requirements that amend the Bill of Rights: two-thirds in the NA and the votes of six of the nine provinces in the NCOP.[1] The provisions giving this veto power to the NCOP are not themselves directly entrenched against amendment. However, they are indirectly entrenched: Any amendment of such a provision would be an amendment that affects the powers of the Council and would therefore have to be passed with the support of six provinces in the Council.[2]

The fourth variation on the s 74 process applies to an amendment covered by s 74(3)(b) and 'concerns only a specific province, or provinces'. In terms of FC s 74(8), the NCOP can only pass those amendments if it has been approved by the provincial legislature*(s)* of the affected province*(s)*. It is important to note a specific variation on the normal mandate procedure here. As we explained earlier, neither the Constitution nor the Mandates Act specifies how a provincial legislature must confer a mandate. It may do so through a committee, a plenary vote, or some other mechanism. However, when it comes to s 74(8) the Constitution requires 'the provincial legislature' to approve that part of the Bill which affects the province. In our view, this process demands a plenary vote.

Section 74(8) effectively gives each province a veto over any constitutional amendment that singles them out. 'It is not difficult,' according to Ngcobo J, 'to imagine the purpose of this provision. Its purpose is to ensure that the boundaries of a province are not reduced without its consent. This protects the territorial integrity of a province.'[3] While it is true that s 74(8) will most often be applicable when provincial boundaries are altered, it is not confined to that arena. It applies whenever provinces are treated differently. An amendment that attempted to reduce the influence of a specific province — or a class of provinces — in the NCOP or to limit their functional areas would be subject to a s 74(8) veto.

[1] A Bill amending the Constitution which affects only a specific province or provinces cannot be passed unless it is approved by the legislature or legislatures of the province or provinces concerned. See FC s 74(8).

[2] Ex parte the Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996, 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [1996] ZACC 24 ('Second Certification Judgment') at para 70.

[3] Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (1) 2006 (5) SA 47 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 622 (CC), [2006] ZACC 2 ('Matatiele I') at para 60. The Court expanded on this theme in Merafong Demarcation Forum & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2008 (5) SA 171 (CC), 2008 (10) BCLR 968 (CC), [2008] ZACC 10 ('Merafong') at paras 23-24 ('When a constitutional amendment alters provincial boundaries, whole communities may, by the stroke of the proverbial pen, be relocated from one province to another, even though not physically. They may involuntarily end up in another province. … The fundamental right of a citizen to enter, remain in and reside anywhere in the Republic is also at stake. The attachment of people to provinces in which they live should not be underestimated. The very identity of people may be affected. … It must be added that the history of South Africa is — sadly — one of the balkanisation of our country, as well as of the separation and the forcible removal and relocation of our people. …When democracy was about to dawn and a new constitutional dispensation was negotiated, the question of whether South Africa should be a unitary state, or a federation, or a variation of any of these, was hotly debated. The Constitution embodies a carefully crafted balance. … But our country has nine constitutionally entrenched provinces with inhabitants who may well strongly identify with the province in which they live. Thus the boundaries, powers, or functions of provinces may not easily be altered.')

Whether an amendment 'concerns' a province is a more difficult question than it may seem. In Matatiele II the Court was confronted with a constitutional amendment[1] that altered the building blocks that defined the area of provinces from magisterial districts to municipalities.[2] The amendment also shifted the boundaries of some, but not all, of the provinces. The government argued that s 74(8) should not apply because the change in how provincial territories are defined affected all the provinces. The Court roundly rejected this contention:

> The provisions of section 74(8) are clear and admit of no ambiguity. They apply where a "Bill … or any part of the Bill concerns only a specific province or provinces." The plain and ordinary meaning of this phrase is that if any part of a proposed constitutional amendment concerns a specific province or provinces only, the provisions of section 74(8) apply. It is sufficient that a part of the proposed constitutional amendment concerns only a specific province or provinces and not other provinces. The fact that the proposed amendment deals with all provinces matters not. What matters is that there are parts of the proposed amendment which concern "only a specific province or provinces" and not other provinces.[3] (our emphasis.)

While the court certainly arrives at the correct conclusion, its analysis throws up a number of interesting procedural problems. First, how many votes does a province receive when voting on a s 74(8) amendment? In Matatiele II, the Court seemed to hold that a province would have two votes: one on the Bill as a whole, and a separate veto on the part of the Bill that affects the province specifically.[4] However, the Court seemed to retreat from this position in Merafong. In dissent, Mosenke DCJ adopted the Matatiele II position. In criticising advice given to the Gauteng Provincial Legislature that it could only vote 'aye or nay' on the Twelfth Amendment that would alter Gauteng's boundary by moving part of the Merafong municipality to the North West, he wrote:

> [T]his is a misconception of the power and obligation of the Province under the Constitution. The Province could have supported the [Twelfth Amendment] but declined to support that part of the [Twelfth Amendment] relating to the incorporation of Merafong-Gauteng into the North West Province. This is so because the power and duty of a province in relation to the adoption of a constitutional amendment that re-draws its boundary must be distinguished from the power and duty it bears in relation to any other constitutional amendment. … [I]t could have … vot[ed] in favour of the [Twelfth Amednment] while declining to support that part of the Bill which affected its boundary. Despite the early counsel, the Legislature thought that the only option it had was to vote 'aye' or 'nay' on the entire Bill. This demonstrates a failure on the part of the Province to appreciate its nuanced duty under the Constitution. The Province had at least two valid legislative options open to it. It could have, at once, achieved the termination of cross-boundary municipalities by supporting the Bill and defeated the re-drawing of its boundary in relation to Merafong.[5]

---

[1] The Constitution Twelfth Amendment Act of 2005.

[2] Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (2) 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC), [2006] ZACC 12 ('Matatiele II').

[3] Matatiele II (supra) at para 21. The Court endorsed this reasoning in Merafong (supra) at para 20.

[4] Matatiele II (supra) at para 25 ('The legislatures of KwaZulu-Natal and the Eastern Cape were only required to approve those parts of the amendment that concerned them specifically. However, these two provinces were still required to cast their votes on the proposed constitutional amendment as a whole in terms of section 74(3)(b)(ii).')

[5] Merafong (supra) at para 180.

Van der Westhuizen J, writing for the majority, disagreed. He held that multiple votes are 'not envisaged by sections 74(3) and (8) of the Constitution which refer to a Bill or the relevant part of a Bill that alters provincial boundaries.'[1] However, he does not explain why the sections do not allow for multiple votes. Nor does he indicate precisely how the s 74(8) procedure should work. Several possibilities exist. A province might receive one vote, and if it votes against a Bill it may be deemed to have used its s 74(8) veto power. Or, a province which disagrees with a Bill may have an election to either: (a) vote against the Bill, without exercising its veto; or (b) exercise its veto. The only option specifically excluded by the Merafong majority is that endorsed by Moseneke DCJ: a vote for the Bill in general, plus a veto of the part that affects its boundary. In our view, a province must have a choice to vote against the Bill without using its veto. The province may support the part of the Bill that affects it, but disagree with other parts of it. It should be able to formally express that view.

Second, what are the consequences of a veto? Section 74 is silent about whether a veto stops the entire Bill in its tracks, or whether it only affects that part of the Bill being vetoed, while the rest is passed as is. The Constitution does not provide an answer. The Joint Rules do. As the Merafong Court noted, in terms of rule 174, the Bill can proceed without the vetoed portion. However, it must be referred back to the NA. The NA must pass it again, without the vetoed portion.

To complete the taxonomy of constitutional amendments we return to the fifth and final type of constitutional amendment. These Bills do not amend FC s 1, the Bill of Rights, or affect the provinces. These Bills are simply passed by the NA with a two-thirds vote. The NCOP is not required to vote on type five amendments. However, particulars of the Bill must be submitted to the NCOP for public debate at least thirty days before the Bill is introduced in the NA.[2]

[1] Merafong (supra) at para 105.

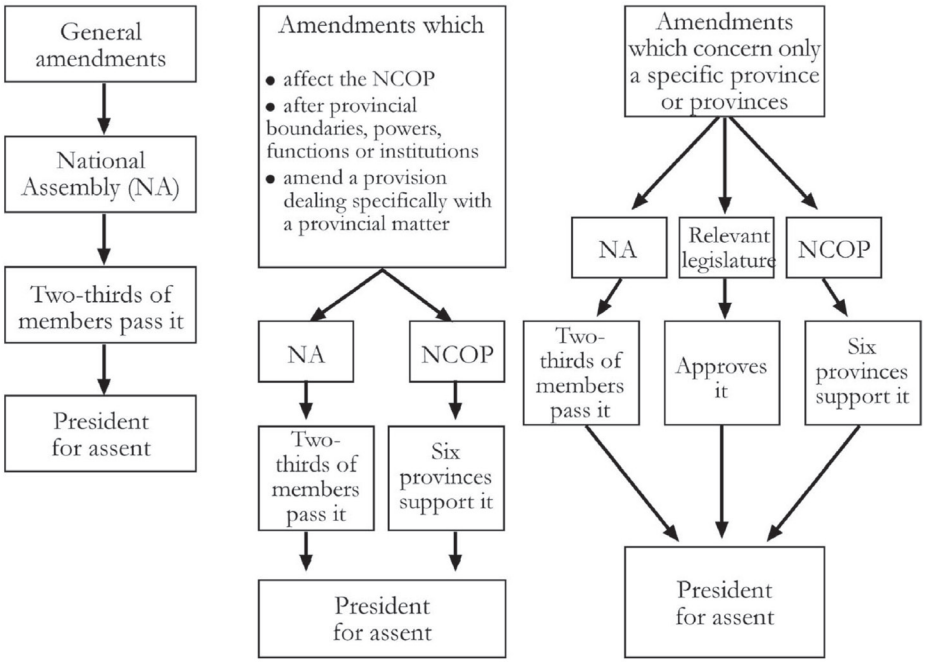
[2] FC s 74(5)(c). Paragraph (c) of FC s 74(5) makes no express provision for the proceedings of the NCOP debate to be tabled in the Assembly when the Bill is considered (compare paras (a) and (b)), but this is probably implicit in s 74(5).

Figure 17.1 How the Constitution may be amended (s 74)



Before we move on from constitutional amendments, we need to address whether the NCOP can propose amendments to Bills amending the Constitution. As we have already noted, unlike FC ss 75 and 76, s 74 is silent on this score. As we explain in more detail in the following sections, where the two houses pass different versions of ss 75 or 76 Bills, the Constitution creates a procedure to settle the dispute.[1] Strangely, s 74 simply does not seem to contemplate the possibility that the two houses could pass different versions of a Bill.

The consequence of this omission arose squarely arose in Merafong. The applicants argued that the Gauteng Provincial Legislature had acted under the mistaken legal advice that it could not propose an amendment to the Bill that would keep Merafong in Gauteng. They argued that this flawed legal advice rendered the provincial parliament's mandate to its NCOP delegation to support the Bill invalid. To address this challenge, the Court had to decide whether the legal advice was, indeed, wrong. The Court unanimously held that it was not.

Van der Westhuizen J offerred three bases for his conclusion. First, he makes the point that s 74 makes no mention of amendments. Second, the fact that the procedure in the NCOP is mandated makes amendments impractical. In the Court's words:

[1] For s 75 Bills, the NA can simply pass its own version again. When the Bill concerns the provinces, the houses must seek a solution through a mediation committee, although the NA can ultimately override the provinces' concerns with a two-thirds vote.

> Although the NCOP fulfils an important function in the protection of provincial interests, there is no scope for debate and for substantive amendments as far as bills altering provincial boundaries are concerned. The reason is of course the mandated nature of the process.[1] Delegates to the NCOP vote on the basis of provincial mandates. They cannot agree to support an amendment which they have not been mandated by their provincial legislatures to support.[2]

Third, rule 174(3) of the Joint Rules of Parliament only makes provision for amendments following a s 74(8) veto which affects part of a Bill. In that case the Bill reverts to the NA which must reconsider the new version — the Bill minus the vetoed portion. The NA may amend the Bill. And the process starts again. The implication, according to the Court, is that there is no space for amendments that do not follow this process.

These reasons, individually and collectively, fail to support the Court's conclusion. The problem is not that they are 'wrong'; they are all technically correct. The problem is that each of the three rationales is too thin to do the work the Court requires.

In respect of the Court's first reason, it is true that the Constitution is conspicuously silent on the issue of amendments to s 74 Bills. But it does not explicitly prohibit them. It is plausible to interpret this silence, as the Court does, as prohibiting amendments. But is there any underlying principle supporting the reading that such amendments are prohibited?[3] It surely does not serve to enhance any form of democracy. The inability to propose amendments severely restricts the ability of delegations to the NCOP to debate the merits of the amendment. A delegation may be aware of the concerns of other provinces, but if it cannot respond by supporting a change to the legislation that they are considering, then the scope for delegations to inform their provincial legislatures of those concerns and for the provincial legislatures in turn to accommodate those concerns all but disappears. The only option is unattractive: rejecting a Bill altogether. Outright rejection will often not be a real option when most legislation contains a range of provisions, or when it is on an urgent timetable. The Merafong rule also renders representatives less able to convey the wishes of their constituents.

The Court's second reason concerned the mandated nature of NCOP voting on s 74 Bills. As we already explained, FC s 65(1) makes a mandated vote the default mechanism for all decisions in the NCOP. Only where the Constitution provides otherwise — as it does, for example, in s 75 for Bills that do not affect the provinces — are votes taken without mandates. The Constitution explicitly contemplates the possibility of amendment within the mandated structure for s 76 Bills, and the Joint Rules explain how that occurs. Is there any reason why amendments are considered eminently practical for ordinary Bills that affect the provinces, but not appropriate for constitutional amendments? No, not one. If anything, amendments to our basic law require greater deliberation, participation and more effective representation than ordinary legislation. Those goods are largely what prohibition of amendment denies.

[1] See S Budlender (supra) at 17-5: 'Such debate would, for the most part, be irrelevant to the legislative process because delegates are voting on the basis of provincial mandates.' (original footnote).

[2] Merafong (supra) para 80.

[3] For a discussion of this element of Merafong, see M Bishop 'Vampire or Prince? The Listening Constitution and Merafong Demarcation Forum & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others' (2009) 2 Constitutional Court Review 313, 345-347.

How, then, do we deal with the difference between ss 75 and 76 on the one hand, and s 74 on the other? The best explanation is that the Constitution leaves it up to the various legislative bodies — the NA, the NCOP and the various provincial legislatures — to decide how to deal with amendments to s 74 Bills. That leads us to the most glaring omission in the Court's reasoning with respect to its third reason. The Court inexplicably fails to mention that the Joint Rules and the NCOP's rules make specific provision for provincial delegations to propose amendments to s 74 Bills in the NCOP.[1] Rule 224(1)(a) of the NCOP Rules reads: 'After a [s 74] Bill has been placed on the Order Paper but before the Council decides the Bill a member may place amendments to the Bill on the Order Paper.' The rest of NCOP rule 224 and rules 225 and 228 go on to describe in great detail which amendments can be made, how they must be made, and the procedure to follow after amendment. That procedure is largely replicated in Joint Rules 176-179 and involves referral to a mediation committee virtually identical to the procedure followed for a s 76 Bill.

But isn't there a difference between s 74(8) Bills and other s 74 Bills? Perhaps the Court believed that rule 174(3) deals exclusively with s 74(8) Bills and the other rules that we quote above do not apply to s 74(8) Bills. There is no reason to credit that suggestion. First, the Court's reasoning applies to all s 74 Bills. Second, there is nothing in the rules to suggest that s 74(8) Bills can only be amended by veto while other s 74 Bills can be amended ordinarily. Nor is there any principled reason to treat s 74(8) Bills differently. The explanation for rule 174(3) is that it is not at all concerned with the power to propose amendments in the NCOP but with the consequences of exercising the s 74(8) veto. Amendments for all s 74 Bills are covered by the detailed procedure in the subsequent rules.

No good textual or principled argument exists to prevent provincial legislatures, through their delegations, from proposing amendments to s 74 Bills in the NCOP. If presented with an opportunity the Court should reconsider the position it took in Merafong and permit the sensible practice adopted by the Legislature through its rules.

(b) Bills affecting the provinces

FC s 76 identifies a category of Bills affecting the provinces. The category embraces primarily those Bills relating to Schedule 4 matters.[2] However, it also encompasses Bills relating to a range of specific matters enumerated in the section: the provincial mandate for NCOP delegations,[3] organised local government,[4] the Public Protector,

[1] The GPL's rules do not directly address the question, but they say nothing to suggest that the GPL could not mandate its delegation to propose an amendment.

[2] Schedule 4 covers matters in respect of which there is concurrent national and provincial legislative competence.

[3] FC s 76(3)(a) read with s 65(2).

[4] FC s 76(3)(b) read with s 163.

the Public Service Commission, the public service and public administration,[1] the Financial and Fiscal Commission,[2] Schedule 5 matters,[3] and matters contemplated in chapter 13 of the Constitution that affect provincial finances.[4]

Bills affecting the provinces may be tabled in either House of Parliament. A Bill passed by one House must be referred to the other House. The second House considering a Bill may then pass it, pass an amended version of it, or reject it. If both Houses pass the same version of the Bill, it is submitted to the President for assent.[5] If the second House passes an amended version of the Bill passed by the House in which the Bill originated, then the amended version is referred to that House for its consideration and, if it is passed, is submitted to the President for assent.[6]

In all cases where the two Houses do not agree on a single version of the Bill, the matter is referred to the mediation committee.[7] The mediation committee is composed of nine members of the NA proportionally representing the parties in that House and one delegate from each provincial delegation in the NCOP.[8] To be carried, decisions in the mediation committee require the support of at least five NA members and five NCOP members.[9] In order to facilitate negotiation and mediation, meetings of the mediation committee are closed to non-members of the Committee, including the public and the media, except with the permission of the committee.[10]

The mediation committee may agree on the Bill in the form passed by either House or in another form.[11] If the mediation committee fails to agree on any version of the Bill within 30 days, the Bill lapses unless it originated in the NA and is again passed by the NA with the support of two-thirds of its members.[12] If the mediation committee does agree on a version of the Bill, the Bill must be referred to the House or Houses that did not pass it in the version accepted by the mediation committee. If the Bill is then passed by the relevant House or Houses, it is submitted to the President for assent.[13] If the Bill as agreed by the mediation committee is not passed by the relevant House or Houses, it lapses unless it (or an earlier version of the Bill passed by the NA) is passed again by the NA with the support of two-thirds of its members.[14] [1] FC s 76(3)(c)-(f) read with ss 182 and 195-197.

---

[2] FC s 76(4) read with s 220(3).

[3] FC s 76(4) read with s 44(2). These are the Bills concerning matters in respect of which Parliament is able to intervene in areas which otherwise fall within the exclusive legislative competence of the provinces.

[4] FC s 76(4). Money Bills are excluded from this category of Bills. FC s 77 provides that they are passed in accordance with the procedures of FC s 75.

[5] FC s 76(1)(b) and 76(2)(b).

[6] FC s 76(1)(c) and 76(2)(c).

[7] FC s 76(1)(d) and 76(2)(d). See Joint Rules 104-10.

[8] FC s 78(1)(a) and (b). Joint Rule 104(2) provides that a political party which is represented in the National Assembly or NCOP, but which is not represented in the mediation committee, may designate one of its members in the Assembly or NCOP to attend the meetings of the mediation committee. Such a member may speak in the committee, but may not vote.

[9] FC s 78(2)(a) and (b).

[10] Joint Rule 110.

[11] FC s 76(1)(f)-(h) and 76(2)(f)-(h).

[12] FC s 76(1)(e) and 76(2)(e).

[13] FC s 76(1)(g) and (h) and 76(2)(g) and (h).

[14] FC s 76(1)(i) and (j) and 76(2)(i).

Figure 17.2 Legislative process: Bills affecting provinces initiated by National Assembly (NA) (s 76(1))

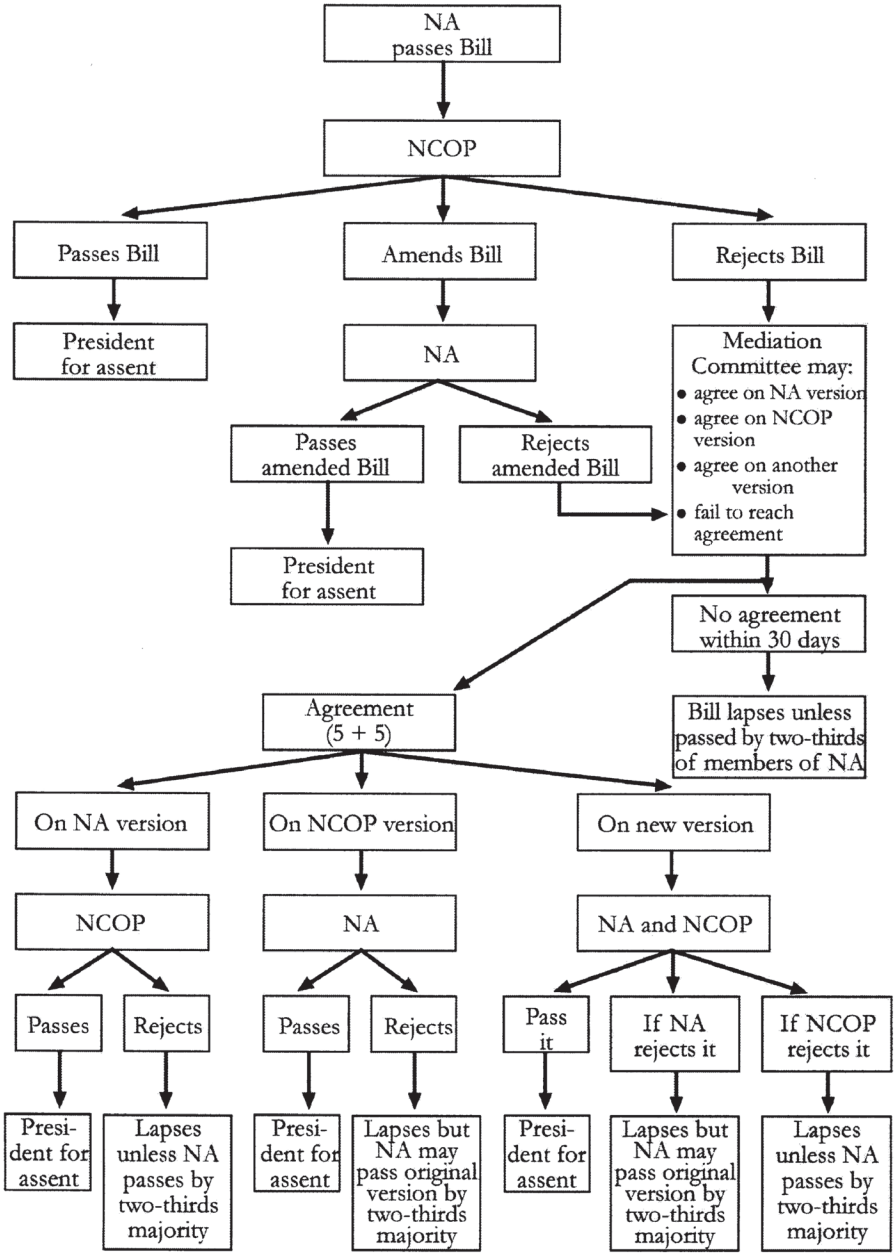

Figure 17.3 Legislative process: Bills affecting provinces initiated by NCOP (s 76(2))

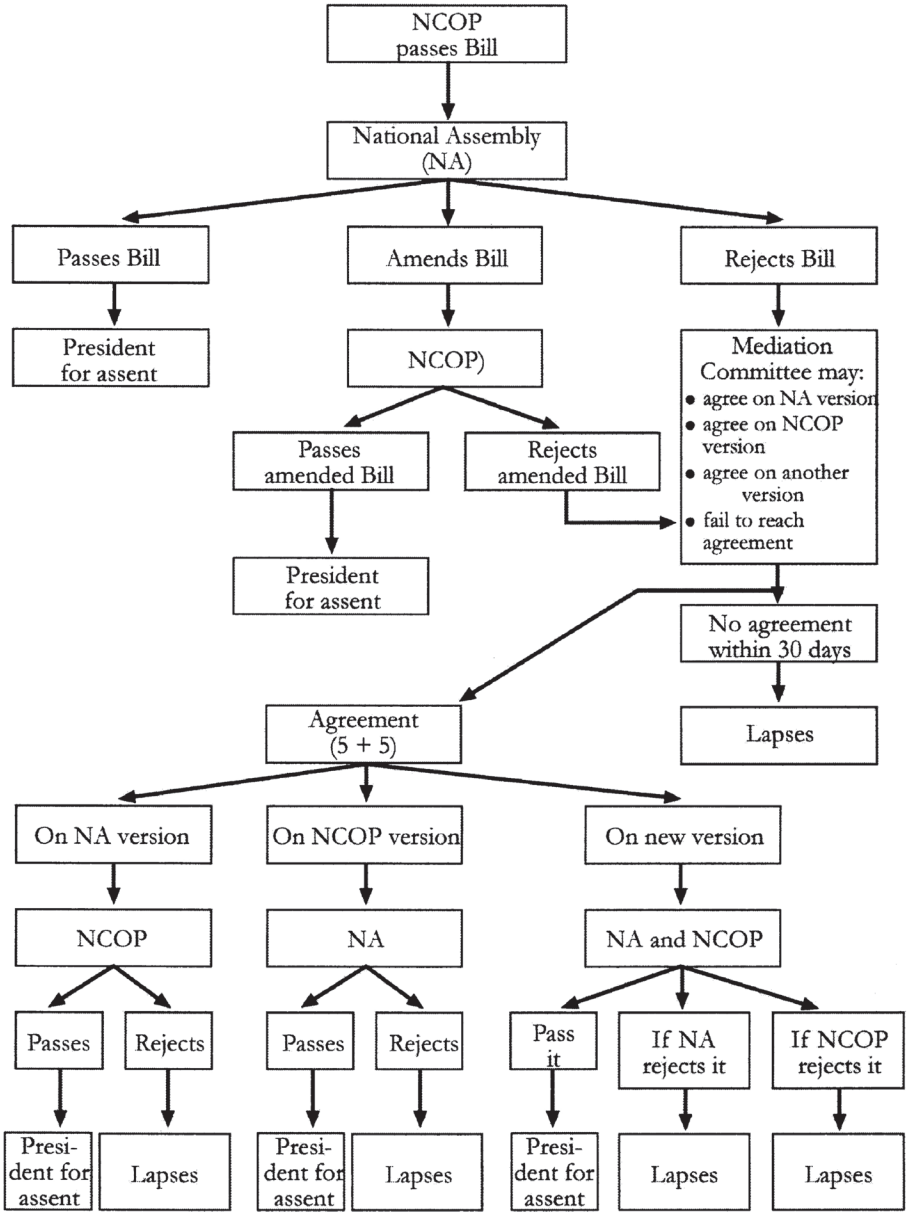
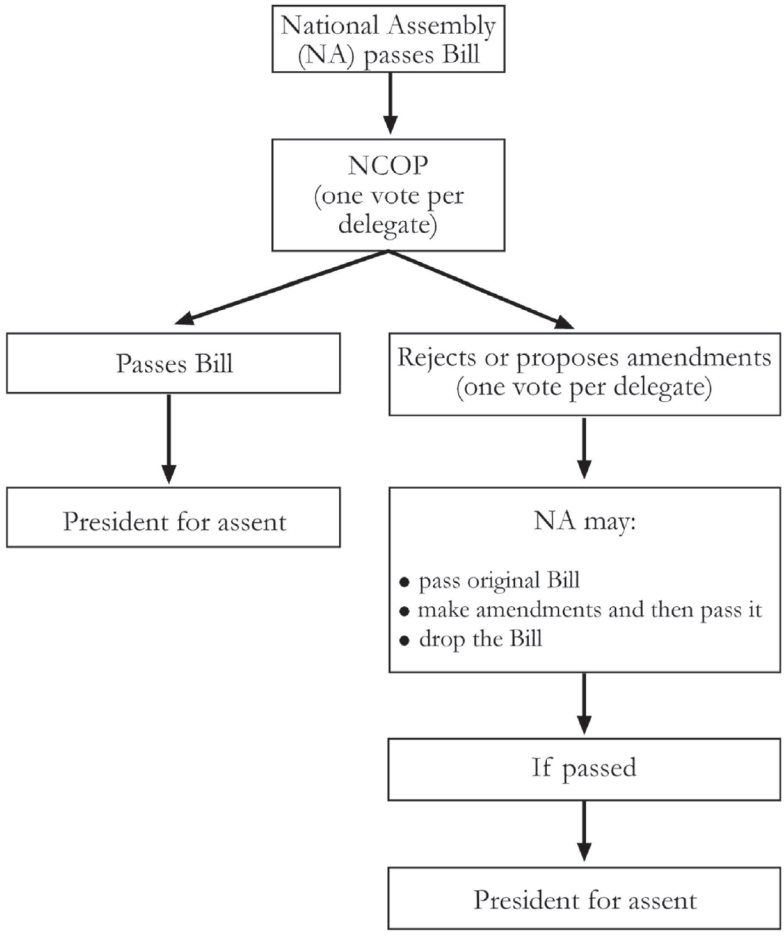


(c) Bills not affecting the provinces

Bills that do not amend the Constitution or affect the provinces, may be introduced only in the NA.[1] If such a Bill is passed by the NA, it must be referred to the NCOP. The NCOP then considers the Bill and votes on it by individual member rather than delegation.[2] If the NCOP passes the Bill, it is submitted to the President for assent. If the NCOP rejects the Bill or passes an amended version of the Bill, the Bill is returned to the NA for reconsideration and the NA may pass the Bill with or without any amendments proposed by the NCOP or may let the Bill lapse.[3] A Bill passed by the NA in any form after a referral from the NCOP is submitted to the President for assent.[4]

Figure 17.4 Legislative process: Bills not affecting provinces (s 75)



[1] Compare FC s 73(1) and FC s 73(3) read with FC s 76(3).
[2] FC s 75(2).
[3] FC s 75(1)(c).
[4] FC s 75(1)(d).

(d) Money Bills and the Division of Revenue Bill

Money Bills are defined in FC s 77(1) as Bills that appropriate money, impose or alter taxes or authorise direct charges against the National Revenue Fund.[1] The Final Constitution states that the procedure for passing money Bills is basically the same as s 75 Bills, with a few important differences. First, money Bills can only be introduced by the Minister of Finance.[2] Second, money Bills cannot contain any provisions that do not fall under FC s 77(1) or are not incidental thereto.[3] Third, until recently there was no legislative procedure for amending money Bills — they either had to be accepted or rejected as presented by the Minister. FC s 77(3) requires an Act of Parliament to regulate how amendments may be made to money Bills. That legislation — the Money Bills Amendment Procedure and Related Matters Act[4] — only came into force on 16 April 2009. The Act creates a detailed framework, timetable and procedure for the passage of several specific forms of money Bills — the Appropriation Bill,[5] a Revenue Bill[6] and an Adjustments Appropriation Bill,[7] other money Bills,[8] and the annual division of revenue Bill in the NA and the NCOP.[9] The Act also provides that the committees of the NA and the NCOP must conduct public participation, in the form of joint public hearings on the fiscal framework (a mandatory framework which must precede all money Bills) and revenue proposals.[10] Further, the standing rules of Parliament must make provision for the relevant committees to conduct public hearings on the Appropriation Bill, a Revenue Bill and the Division of Revenue Bill.[11]

---

[1] FC s 77(1) reads in full:

A Bill is a money Bill if it—

(a) appropriates money;

(b) imposes national taxes, levies, duties or surcharges;

(c) abolishes or reduces, or grants exemptions from, any national taxes, levies, duties or surcharges; or

(d) authorises direct charges against the National Revenue Fund, except a Bill envisaged in section 214 authorising direct charges.

[2] FC s 73(2).

[3] FC s 77(2).

[4] Act 9 of 2009.

[5] Money Bills Act s 10.

[6] Money Bills Act s 11. Revenue Bills are 'Bills which impose or abolish national taxes, levies, duties, surcharges or which abolish, reduce or grant exemption from any national taxes, levies, duties or surcharges.'.

[7] Money Bills Act s 12.

[8] Money Bills Act s 13.

[9] Money Bills Act s 9. A Division of Revenue Bill is not a money Bill, but a prerequisite of annual legislation required in terms of FC s 214 which determines and divides among provinces and local governments their equitable share and other conditional allocations from the revenue raised nationally. In addition to what is provided for in the Money Bills Act, the Intergovernmental Fiscal Relations Act 97 of 1997 provides conditions and procedure applicable to the passing of the Division of Revenue Bill. For more on the division of revenue, see, R Kriel & M Monadjem 'Public Finances' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 27.

[10] Money Bills Act s 8(2).

[11] Money Bills Act ss 9(5)(b), 10(8)(a) and 11(4)(a).

(e) Presidential assent and publication

When a duly passed Bill is submitted to the President for assent, the President must assent to and sign the Bill. Only if the President has reservations about the constitutionality of the Bill may he or she may refer it back to the NA for reconsideration.[1] The procedure for such a referral is dealt with by the Joint Rules of Parliament[2] and contemplates referrals due to concerns regarding either procedural defects or substantive defects.[3] Once a Bill has been resubmitted to the President, the President must assent to and sign the Bill if it fully accommodates his or her reservations. Otherwise the President must refer the Bill to the Constitutional Court for a decision on its constitutionality.[4]

Once the President has assented to and signed a Bill, it becomes an Act of Parliament and must be published promptly.[5] An Act takes effect either when it is published or on a date determined in terms of the Act.[6] The Constitutional Court has made clear that Parliament has the power to provide that the date an Act comes into operation will be determined by the President.[7] However the Court has also stressed that when Parliament gives such a power to the President, this power must be exercised lawfully. The power cannot be used by the President to veto or otherwise block the implementation of an Act.[8]

The power also cannot be exercised irrationally. On two occasions, the Court has been required to repair faulty attempts by the President to bring legislation into force. In Pharmaceutical Manufacturers the President had, based on flawed advice from the Department of Health, brought an Act regulating the use of medicines into force before the necessary regulations had been written.[9] The result was that the use and possession of many dangerous substances inadvertently became legal. The Constitutional Court granted the request, supported by the President, to set aside the proclamation.[10] It held that although the act of bringing legislation into force was not administrative action — Chaskalson P concluded that it was primarily legislative in nature — it was still subject to review under the principle of legality. This standard of review requires that the President act in consonance with the objects of the legislation:

---

[1] FC s 79(1). The NCOP must participate in the reconsideration of the Bill if the President's reservations relate to a procedural matter that involves the NCOP or if the Bill is a constitutional amendment bill or a s 76 bill. FC s 79(3).

[2] Joint Rules 202-12.

[3] Joint Rules 205-6.

[4] FC s 79(4). See § 17.3*(e)*(i) infra.

[5] FC s 81.

[6] Ibid.

[7] Ex Parte Minister of Safety and Security: in re S v Walters 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC), [2002] ZACC 6 at para 71.

[8] Ibid at para 73.

[9] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa & Another: In re Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC), [2000] ZACC 1 ('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers').

[10] The decision of the High Court, which came to the same conclusion, is reported as Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA & Another: In re Ex parte President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1999 (4) SA 788 (T).

> Powers are not conferred in the abstract. They are intended to serve a particular purpose. That purpose can be discerned from the legislation that is the source of the power and this ordinarily places limits upon the manner in which it is to be exercised. If those limits are transgressed a court is entitled to intervene and set the decision aside.[1]

A power not exercised for the purpose for which it was granted would be irrational and set aside. Rationality has to be judged objectively, not subjectively. The President's good faith belief that his decision is rational is irrelevant if no objective grounds exist for his action.[2]

In the second case of presidential confusion — Kruger v President of the Republic of South Africa — the Constitutional Court was confronted with an unusual, perhaps unique, situation.[3] The President had issued a proclamation ('the First Proclamation') bringing into effect certain sections of an Act[4] amending the Road Accident Fund Act.[5] The sections would come into force on 31 July 2006. Unfortunately, he named the wrong sections. Instead of bringing into force ss 1-4, he brought into force ss 4, 6 and 10-12.[6] Before the sections actually came into force, the President realised his error and issued a new proclamation ('the Second Proclamation'). The Second Proclamation aimed to amend the First Proclamation so that it referred to the correct sections. However, the Second Proclamation was only published on 31 July — the day the sections were, in terms of the First Proclamation, due to come into force.

The constitutionality of the First Proclamation was challenged on the ground that it was irrational. The applicant claimed that the consequences of the error had created great uncertainty. The High Court upheld the claim on the basis that the President did not have the power to amend a proclamation bringing an Act into force. Granting the President such a power would permit him 'the power to revoke by proclamation any Act that he or his predecessors have previously brought into operation by publishing a proclamation to that effect in the Gazette. … Such a regime will simply be government by decree which is the antithesis of the Rule of Law which is one of the cornerstones of our Constitution.'[7] When the case came before the Constitutional Court, the validity of the Second Proclamation was also in issue.[8]

Skweyiya J, writing for the majority, held, first, that the First Proclamation was irrational. It contained a random selection of sections which, if enacted, would create serious practical problems.[9] Next, Skweyiya J addressed the danger alluded to by the High Court. In his view, the power to enact legislation must necessarily

---

[1] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 76.

[2] Ibid at paras 86 and 89.

[3] Kruger v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2009 (1) SA 417 (CC), 2009 (3) BCLR 268 (CC), [2008] ZACC 17 ('Kruger').

[4] Road Accident Fund Amendment Act 19 of 2005.

[5] Act 56 of 1996.

[6] The numbers the President referred to were the sections of the original act that the amending act would alter, not the numbers of the amending act that would do the altering.

[7] [2007] ZAGPHC 352.

[8] Kruger did not challenge the Second Proclamation, but the Road Accident Fund made an application for direct access — which the Court heard — to challenge the Second Proclamation.

[9] Kruger (supra) at paras 50-54.

include the power to withdraw an erroneous proclamation, provided it is done before the original proclamation takes effect.[1] The Court supported the holding of the High Court that a President cannot undo a proclamation once it has brought legislation into force.

However, in this case the President could not alter or withdraw the First Proclamation because it was invalid from its inception: 'The President cannot have the power to amend a nullity.'[2] The solution in such a situation, Justice Skweyiya reasoned, is to issue both a withdrawal of the invalid proclamation and a new proclamation.[3] The withdrawal was necessary because there might be doubt about whether a proclamation was indeed irrational. If it was in fact irrational, a withdrawal would be unnecessary. The Court recognised that this approach may place form above substance, but held that 'the principle that substance should take precedence over form … must yield in appropriate cases to the rule of law.'[4] Accordingly, the Court declared both proclamations invalid, but suspended the orders to prevent any disruption and to afford the President an opportunity to pass a new, valid proclamation.

In his dissent,[5] Jafta AJ argued that Kruger was different from Pharmaceutical Manufacturers for two reasons. First, in Kruger the President became aware of the defect before the legislation was in force.[6] Second, the error in Kruger was purely clerical. What he intended to do was rational, but the proclamation was incorrectly drafted[7] In Pharmaceutical Manufacturers the President intended to do something that was substantively irrational. For these reasons, he found that the First Proclamation was not irrational. The problem was instead that the proclamation failed to fully reflect the President's rational intention.[8] Only the part of the Proclamation that failed to reflect the President's true intention was invalid and could be rectified by amending the Proclamation accordingly. While there is something alluring about Acting Justice Jafta's approach, it is flawed. However much sense it makes in theory to distinguish between the express wording of the Proclamation and the President's actual intention, in the context of enacting legislation, the need for publicity and certainty require that courts ought to assume that proclamations in fact reflect the President's intention. The alternative — that the validity of a [1] Kruger (supra) at para 61.

[2] Ibid at para 64. The Court seems to be saying that a withdrawal is always possible, even if the original amendment was invalid. This cannot, technically, be true as you cannot withdraw something that does not exist. However, in many cases it may be unclear to the President whether the proclamation was invalid or not and a withdrawal provides the certainty that, even if the proclamation was originally valid, it no longer is. If the proclamation was originally invalid, the withdrawal does nothing but remove doubt.

[3] Ibid at para 67.

[4] Ibid at para 62.

[5] Yacoob J also dissented. However, his dissent is more about the appropriate remedy. He agreed with Skweyiya J that the First Proclamation was invalid. But he would have held that it was not just and equitable to declare that proclamation invalid ab initio. Instead, he would have severed the part of the First Proclamation referring to the wrong sections, and read-in the appropriate alterations to make the First Proclamation rational. Ibid at para 135.

[6] Ibid at para 97.

[7] Ibid at para 98.

[8] Jafta AJ found that only part of the First Proclamation should be declared invalid, as the President had correctly brought s 4 into operation. Ibid at para 95.

proclamation can depend on the intention of its maker alone, and not its content — would lead to unacceptable uncertainty.

(f) Challenges by the President or MPs

The final stage in the legislative process allows for either the President or MPs to refer the legislation directly to the Constitutional Court for a decision on its constitutionality. If, after the President has asked Parliament to reconsider a bill, she still has reservations about its constitutionality, she can refer the Bill to the Constitutional Court for a decision on its constitutionality.

(i) FC s 79: Referral by the President

Section 79[1] permits the President to refer a Bill to the Constitutional Court for a decision on its constitutionality before he assents to it. However, he or she may do so only if the Bill has first been remitted to the NA for reconsideration and Parliament has failed to address the concerns relating to the constitutionality of the Bill despite having been given the opportunity to do so.[2] Only the Constitutional Court has jurisdiction to decide on the constitutionality of a Bill at the insistence of the President.[3]

The President has only used this power once. In 1999, the President referred the Liquor Bill — which would regulate the liquor industry — on the basis that he was concerned that it would impair provincial powers. In its decision — Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa: In Re Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill — the Constitutional Court made it clear that when the President acts under FC s 79, the Court is required to consider only the reservations the President has expressed.[4] The Court explained that a s 79 referral does not entail a 'mini-certification' process. While the President is entitled to express reservations about as much, or as little, of the Bill as he wishes,[5] the Court is not required to certify conclusively that every part of the Bill accords with the Constitution.[6] Therefore, a finding by the Court under a s 79 referral that a particular Bill was constitutional does not exclude a subsequent constitutional challenge to a different part of the Bill — except to the extent that such a challenge rehearses issues that the Court had already decided in considering the President's challenge to the Bill.[7] In Liquor Bill, the Court concluded that part of the Bill was indeed unconstitutional. Parliament

[1] FC s 121 provides a similar process for Premiers to refer the constitutionality of provincial bills to the Constitutional Court.

[2] FC ss 79(1), 79(4)(b), 84(2)(b) and 84(2)(c). See also Rule 14 of the Rules of the Constitutional Court, which governs the procedure to be followed in cases of referral of a Bill.

[3] FCS s 167(4)(b).

[4] 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [1999] ZACC 15 ('Liquor Bill') at para 14. The Court did not decide whether it could ever be appropriate for the Court acting in such circumstances to consider other provisions which are manifestly unconstitutional but which are not amongst the President's reservations. In our view, the need for clarity in the President's reservations and the need for respect to be shown to the legislature would mean that it would never be appropriate.

[5] Ibid at para 16.

[6] Ibid.

[7] Ibid at para 20.

was therefore required to reconsider the Bill and either amend it to accommodate the Court's findings, or abandon it.

(ii) FC s 80: Referral by MPs

Unlike the Interim Constitution,[1] the Final Constitution makes no provision for abstract judicial review of Bills by the Constitutional Court at the instance of MPs. However, MPs may refer legislation to the Court once it has become an Act. Section 80 allows one third of the members of the NA to apply for abstract review of an Act within 30 days of the date upon which the President assented to the Act and signed it. When it receives an application for abstract review, the Constitutional Court may grant an interim order suspending the operation of the Act, or those sections of the Act that are subject to review, until the main application has been decided. The discretion of the Court in this regard is limited to cases where the application has reasonable prospects of success and the interests of justice require the suspension of the operation of the legislation.[2] FC s 80 therefore offers a fast-track mechanism to determine whether widely held concerns about the constitutionality of newly enacted legislation are legitimate.

The changes from the Interim Constitution to the Final Constitution concerning abstract review are to be welcomed. FC ss 79 and 80 have none of the uncertainties of s 98(2)(d) and 98(9) of the Interim Constitution. The provisions in the Final Constitution ensure that a minority in the legislature is unable to interfere with the legislative process by applying for the review of Bills before they are enacted. It allows them a limited but significant opportunity to challenge legislation.[3] Section 80 places in the hands of the Constitutional Court the decision as to whether legislation will operate pending resolution of the challenge to

[1] In terms of IC s 98(2)(d), the Constitutional Court had jurisdiction over the constitutionality of a Bill before Parliament or a provincial legislature. IC s 98(9) provided that this jurisdiction could be exercised only at the request of the Speaker of the National Assembly, the President of the Senate, or the Speaker of a provincial legislature. These legislative officers seemed to have a general discretion to request abstract review of any Bill, but they were obliged to make such a request when one-third of the members of the National Assembly, the Senate or the provincial legislature petitioned them to do so. Parliament could control the procedure which it followed in relation to the referral of Bills. See Ex parte Speaker of the National Assembly: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the National Education Policy Bill No 83 of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC), [1996] ZACC 3 at paras 43-44.

[2] FC s 80(3). See also Rule 15 of the Rules of the Constitutional Court, which governs the procedure to be followed in cases of abstract review of an Act.

[3] See Gauteng Provincial Legislature v Kilian 2001 (2) SA 68 (SCA), 2001 (3) BCLR 253 (SCA)('Kilian') at paras 25 and 29. The Supreme Court of Appeal held that the determination concerning the constitutionality of a Bill under IC s 98(9) was 'in the interests of the provincial legislature and its effective and efficient functioning' and thus 'part and parcel of the legislative process'. It held further that under such circumstances 'the petitioners acted at all relevant times not in their personal capacities, but in their capacities as members of the legislature and, [unless their action was frivolous, vexatious or due to improper motives,] were not personally liable for costs.' The SCA therefore upheld an undertaking given by the Speaker to pay such costs.

It is unlikely that this principle will be applicable to abstract review proceedings under FC s 80. In terms of FC s 80 abstract review takes place only after the legislative process has been concluded, but before 30 days have elapsed. FC s 80 proceedings should therefore be seen as somewhat outside the legislative process. FC s 80 is a provision which confers on members with the requisite support a form of political standing to bring abstract challenges to Acts of Parliament upon their enactment. Members its constitutionality and provides the Court with an appropriate framework within which to take this decision.

17.4 Timing of Challenges to Legislation

The next two sections consider the substantive and procedural limits to Parliament's power. But first, we consider the surprisingly complex question as to when legislation can be challenged. As we just explained, the final part of the legislative process involves the opportunity for the President or MPs to bring challenges to legislation. The Constitution specifically regulates those powers; the President may question a Bill before he assents, but only after giving Parliament an opportunity to respond. MPs may only challenge legislation directly in the Constitutional Court after it has become an Act. But at what stage can ordinary citizens challenge legislation on either procedural or substantive grounds? Obviously, it is always open to members of the public, with the requisite legal standing, to challenge legislation once it has become law. But may they bring challenges at earlier stages in the legislative process? The short answer is: No. However, the Court has left a tiny amount of wiggle room that may in very rare occasions permit a challenge by members of the public before the President assents to a statute.

The question was first considered in President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v United Democratic Movement. The Court concluded that 'on a proper reading of the Constitution, [the Constitutional Court may not], save as provided in [FC s] 79 … , consider the constitutionality of a bill before the National Assembly.'[1] This finding was, strictly speaking, obiter as the laws in question had already been signed by the President. But the rule was confirmed in the leading decision on abstract review: Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others.[2]

Doctors for Life, as we discuss in greater detail below,[3] involved challenges to four pieces of legislation on the grounds that they had been enacted without the necessary public participation. One of those four laws — the Sterilisation Amendment Act[4] — had been passed by Parliament but had not yet been signed by the President. The Court was therefore forced to decide whether it had the power to intervene at that stage of the legislative process. Justice Ngcobo identified three phases in the legislative process, with different rules at each stage: (a) while the bill is still being deliberated by Parliament; (b) after the bill has been passed by Parliament, but before it has been signed by the President; and (c) after the bill had been signed, but before it has come into force.[5] We follow his lead that exercise this political standing should not be entitled to do so at the expense of the legislature. See also FC s 80(4), which contemplates the award of costs orders against applicants for abstract review.

[1] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v United Democratic Movement 2003 (1) SA 472 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1164 (CC), [2002] ZACC 34 at para 26. FC ss 79 and 121 specifically reserve the referral power to the President in terms of national legislation and to the Premier in terms of provincial legislation.

[2] 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC), 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), [2006] ZACC 11 ('Doctors for Life').

[3] See § 17.6*(a)* below.

[4] Act 3 of 2005.

[5] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 34.

and consider the position at each stage, while taking into account developments since Doctors for Life.

Before we begin, it is important to note that the 'crucial time for determining whether a court has jurisdiction is when the proceedings commenced.'[1] In Van Straaten v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others, the Constitutional Court refused to hear a challenge to a bill that had since become an Act because, at the time the case was filed, the bill had not yet been signed by the President.[2]

(a) While a Bill is being deliberated on by Parliament

This is clearly a delicate question as the Court has twice avoided giving a straight answer. Although the question was not in issue in Doctors for Life, Justice Ngcobo indicated that '[w]hat courts should strive to achieve is the appropriate balance between their role as the ultimate guardians of the Constitution and the rule of law including any obligation that Parliament is required to fulfil in respect of the passage of laws, on the one hand, and the respect which they are required to accord to other branches of government as required by the principle of separation of powers, on the other hand.'[3] He canvassed the law in other Commonwealth jurisdictions,[4] and distilled the following general approach:

> where the flaw in the law-making process will result in the resulting law being invalid, courts take the view that the appropriate time to intervene is after the completion of the legislative process. … But intervention will occur in exceptional cases, such as where an aggrieved person cannot be afforded substantial relief once the process is completed because the underlying conduct would have achieved its object.[5]

In Glenister I, the Court's ability to intervene at this stage of the legislative process was squarely on the table.[6] Glenister, a businessman, had challenged the decision of the executive to introduce Bills[7] that would abolish a specialised crime fighting body, the Directorate of Special Operations (known as 'the Scorpions'). The Court had to decide whether it was competent to intercede at that stage, or whether Glenister would have to wait for the Bills to be enacted. Noting the same concerns that troubled the Doctors for Life Court, Chief Justice Langa assumed, without deciding, that the Court could intervene. He then set out the circumstances that

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 57.

[2] 2009 (3) SA 457 (CC), 2009 (5) BCLR 480 (CC), [2009] ZACC 2.

[3] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 70.

[4] Ibid at n52-53. The Court discusses the following foreign case law: Rediffusion (Hong Kong) Ltd v Attorney-General of Hong Kong and Another [1970] AC 1136 (Privy Council); Bahamas District of the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas v Symonette; Poitier v Methodist Church of the Bahamas [2000] JCJ 31, 26 July 2000 (Privy Council); Cormack and Another v Cope and Others; The State of Queensland and Another v Whitlam and Others [1974] HCA 28; 131 CLR 432 (High Court of Australia); In re Canada Assistance Plan (B.C.) [1991] 2 SCR 525 (Supreme Court of Canada); In re Amendment of the Constitution of Canada (1981) 125 DLR (3d) 1 (SCC) (Supreme Court of Canada).

[5] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 69.

[6] Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2009 (1) SA 287 (CC), 2009 (2) BCLR 136 (CC), [2008] ZACC 19 ('Glenister I').

[7] The National Prosecuting Authority Amendment Bill of 2008 (NPAA Bill) (B23-2008) and the General Law Amendment Bill of 2008, which has been renamed the South African Police Service Amendment Bill of 2008 (SAPSA Bill) (B30-2008).

would justify intervention. Largely adopting the position taken by foreign courts, the Chief Justice adopted the following test:

> Intervention would only be appropriate if an applicant can show that there would be no effective remedy available to him or her once the legislative process is complete, as the unlawful conduct will have achieved its object in the course of the process. The applicant must show that the resultant harm will be material and irreversible.[1]

Although he stressed that '[t]his is a formidable burden',[2] and that 'intervention on this approach will be extremely rare',[3] Langa CJ declined to identify situations that might justify court involvement.

However, we are given some sense of what the Court might require by its conclusion that Glenister had not met the high burden for intervention. Glenister argued that the Bills were already causing irreversible harm as many members of the DSO were leaving because of the perceived threat to their jobs. This exodus threatened to 'undermine the state's capacity to render basic security and cause harm to the constitutional order itself.'[4]

The Court held that Glenister's challenge could not raise the risk of irreparable harm for the following simple reason: 'Parliament may choose to make significant and substantial amendments to the draft legislation or it may choose not to enact the legislation at all. Until the content of the legislation has been determined by Parliament, the effect of the legislation cannot be determined.'[5] The Chief Justice also stressed that Parliament had its own duty to uphold the Constitution and that courts should proceed on the basis that they would do so.[6] Glenister bided his time and ultimately succeeded in having the legislation overturned after it had been passed by Parliament.[7]

The limited room for intervention identified in Glenister I only applies to the Constitutional Court — an order cannot be sought in the High Court. This was confirmed by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Minister of Finance & Another v Paper Manufacturers Association of South Africa.[8] The applicant sought and obtained an interdict from the High Court preventing the Minister from introducing a Bill to Parliament. The SCA reversed the decision. It held that the High Court did not have the power to grant an interdict with regard to a Bill.[9]

It seems reasonable to ask, given the high threshold for intervention, what possible circumstances could prompt the Court to act. It is probably best to dis-

---

[1] Glenister I (supra) at para 43.
[2] Ibid at para 43.
[3] Ibid at para 46.
[4] Ibid at para 49.
[5] Ibid at para 50.
[6] Ibid at para 55 ('I must proceed on the basis that Parliament will observe its constitutional duties rigorously. If it is correct that the draft legislation does threaten structural harm to the Constitution or the institution of the NPA, something which I expressly refrain from deciding, then Parliament will be under a duty to prevent that harm. It would be institutionally inappropriate for this Court to intervene in the process of law-making on the assumption that Parliament would not observe its constitutional obligations.')
[7] Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others [2011] ZACC 6 ('Glenister II')(we discuss Glenister II in more detail in §§ 17.5*(b) and* 17.8*(b)* below).
[8] 2008 (6) SA 540 (SCA).
[9] Ibid at para 22.

tinguish between substantive challenges (like Glenister I) and procedural challenges (like Doctors for Life). It is difficult to imagine a substantive challenge succeeding. Despite any perceived threat to democracy, or the Constitution, the Court must — as the Chief Justice tells us — assume that Parliament will uphold its constitutional duty not to pass legislation that violates the Constitution. Even if a Bill proposed to ban opposition parties or install a president for life, there is no reason for the Court not to allow Parliament the opportunity to debate and decide the issue itself in line with its constitutional responsibilities. While this may seem overly deferential, there truly are very few acts that could not be rectified by judicial action after intervention. The one substantive claim that might succeed is to legislation that would somehow preclude or delay judicial intervention or access to the judiciary by the public after the legislation was enacted. But even then, it is difficult to see how the Court would get around the argument that Parliament must be trusted to uphold the Constitution.

Procedural challenges will also be rare. As Doctors for Life demonstrates, procedural flaws that move people to litigation generally concern laws that were passed following a flawed procedure. That harm is not irreparable because the legislation can be set aside and the legislature can be forced to pass the law again, following the correct procedure. There is, however, one possibility: When Parliament acts unconstitutionally to prevent a Bill from being passed that would have been passed if it had followed the proper process.

The best example is a good faith tagging mistake.[1] If Parliament tags a Bill as s 76, when it is objectively a s 75 Bill, there may be a risk that it will not pass because of the higher threshold set by s 76.[2] In that instance, somebody who will suffer irreparable harm if the Bill is not enacted has no other recourse than a challenge during the legislative process. She cannot wait until the Bill becomes an act, because the tagging mistake has prevented that from occurring. The only solution is for the Court to intervene and re-tag the Bill as a s 75 Bill. This example avoids the 'Parliament must be trusted' argument because Parliament has acted unconstitutionally once it mistags the Bill, or at least once the Bill fails to pass. There may be similar instances where a procedural decision prevents a Bill from being passed that may warrant judicial intervention.

(b) After a Bill has been passed by Parliament, but before the President has assented

The Doctors for Life Court confirmed the conclusion in UDM: The Constitutional Court may only consider the constitutionality of a Bill at this stage when it is raised by the President in terms of FC s 79.[3] After all, the wording of s 167(4)(b) — which affords the Court exclusive jurisdiction to hear s 79 claims — explicitly states that it may consider a Bill 'only in the circumstances anticipated in section 79.'

[1] We discuss tagging at length in § 17.6*(b)* below.

[2] It is also possible (although extremely unlikely) that a Bill that would not pass as a s 75 Bill, would pass as a s 76 Bill.

[3] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 43.

The Doctors for Life applicants tried to get around this problem by arguing that there was a difference between considering the substantive constitutionality of a Bill — which was prohibited under FC s 167(4)(b) — and a challenge to the parliamentary procedure in passing the Bill — which was permitted by FC s 167(4)(e). Section 167(4)(e) affords the Constitutional Court exclusive jurisdiction to hear challenges that Parliament has failed to fulfil a 'constitutional obligation'.[1] The obligation to facilitate public involvement, they argued, was such a 'constitutional obligation' that could be challenged at any time. They also submitted that the nature of a challenge about the failure to facilitate public involvement had to be enforced 'there and then', to prevent Parliament from passing a Bill without following the necessary procedure.

Ngcobo J rejected this line of argument. He held, first, that FC s 79(3) permitted the President to raise both substantive and procedural reservations to the constitutionality of a Bill.[2] Second, FC ss 167(4)(b) and (e) had to be read together. This would be best achieved by reading the specific s 167(4)(b) to limit the ambit of the more general s 167(4)(e).[3] Finally, he held that it is not only the Court that has a duty to ensure that Parliament fulfils its constitutional obligations in the legislative process. The President also has a constitutional duty to ensure the proper processes are followed. The separation of powers require the Court to permit her an opportunity to perform that duty.[4] This mirrors the holding of Langa CJ about the role of Parliament in Glenister I. Justice Ngcobo concluded that the Court could not consider the constitutionality of the Sterilisation Amendment Act.[5]

(c) After a Bill is assented to, but before it comes into force

The Court had earlier held, in Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others,[6] that it had the power to consider acts that had not yet been brought into force. Mokgoro J cited FC s 81 which provides that '[a] Bill assented to and signed by the President becomes an Act of Parliament'. After assent, the law is an Act and the Court can consider it under FC s 172.[7] In Doctors for Life, the Court considered an argument not raised in Khosa: Does FC s 80 — which empowers 30 per cent of MPs to challenge an Act after it has been assented to — operate in a similar manner to s 79 to remove the Court's jurisdiction to consider a claim to an Act not yet in force? Justice Ngcobo held that it did not:

> There is nothing in the wording of [FC s] 80 that precludes this Court or any other court from considering the validity of an Act of Parliament at the instance of the public. Nor is there anything in the scheme for the exercise of jurisdiction by this Court that precludes it from considering the constitutional validity of a statute that has not yet been brought

[1] For more on FC ss 167(4)(b) and (e), see S Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) § 4.3*(b)*.

[2] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 45.

[3] Ibid at para 52.

[4] Ibid at para 55.

[5] See also, Van Straaten v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2009 (3) SA 457 (CC), 2009 (5) BCLR 480 (CC), [2009] ZACC 2 (refusing to hear a challenge to legislation that had not yet been signed by the President when the challenge was lodged.)

[6] 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC), [2004] ZACC 11.

[7] Ibid at para 90.

into operation. The legislative process is complete, and there can be no question of interference in such a process. Once a bill is enacted into law, this Court should consider its constitutionality.[1]

17.5 Substantive Constraints on Legislative Authority

The national legislative authority is vested in Parliament.[2] However, in exercising this authority, Parliament is bound by the Constitution and must act within its limits.[3] In this section we discuss the substantive limits on its powers: (a) federalism; (b) fundamental rights; (c) extra-territorial competence; (d) separation of powers; (e) delegation constraints; (f) the legality principle; and (g) specific constraints on the power to amend the Constitution. In several of these areas, our discussion is very brief and we simply set out the basic position and refer the reader to the part of this text where the issue is more fully canvassed.

(a) Federalism constraints

In a significant departure from the Interim Constitution, the system of federalism embodied in the Final Constitution imposes clear limitations on the legislative power of Parliament. Under the Interim Constitution, the legislative competence of Parliament was plenary and subject only to a few insignificant exceptions in which provincial legislative competence was exclusive.[4] Under the Final Constitution, however, Parliament has no express legislative competence over matters within the functional areas listed in Schedule 5. It may legislate over matters within the functional areas listed in Schedule 5 only if it meets the requirements set out in FC s 44(2). Various other constraints relating to the legislative powers of Provincial Legislatures and Municipal Councils also limit Parliament's legislative competence.[5]

The Constitution imposes a further federalism-related constraint on Parliament's legislative authority. These provisions relate to conflicts between national and provincial legislation.[6] Thus, even if Parliament is competent to pass a particular piece of legislation, the legislation may become inoperative if it is in conflict with provincial legislation in circumstances where that provincial legislation prevails.[7] The conflicts provisions of the Constitution are discussed elsewhere in this work.[8]

---

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 64.

[2] FC s 44(1).

[3] FC s 44(4). See also Executive Council of the Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development & Another, Executive Council of KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Afria & Others 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC), [1999] ZACC 13 at paras 25-6.

[4] IC s 156(1B) gave provinces the exclusive competence to impose taxes in respect of casinos, gambling, wagering, lotteries and betting. Parliament had no legislative power to impose such taxes. The Interim Constitution tacitly precluded Parliament from legislating in respect of provincial official languages, IC s 3(5), and the names of the provinces, IC s 124(1).

[5] See V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 15.

[6] FC ss 146-150.

[7] FC s 149.

[8] See V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 16.

(b) Fundamental rights constraints

The legislative authority of Parliament is constrained by the rights contained in the Bill of Rights. The general framework for rights-based challenges,[1] and the constraints imposed by particular fundamental rights are discussed elsewhere in this work. Parliament must refrain from interfering with any of the rights in the Bill of Rights except to the extent that the Constitution allows. Parliament's legislative authority does not extend to limitations of rights other than those authorised by s 36, the limitations clause.[2]

However, Parliament is not only obliged to refrain from interfering with fundamental rights. It must also give effect to fundamental rights by positive action. This duty is captured in FC s 7(2)'s requirement that the state must 'respect, protect, promote and fulfill' the rights in the Bill of Rights.[3]

This injunction is repeated specifically with regard to a number of individual rights.[4] The Constitutional Court has already pronounced on these positive obligations.[5] 'Positive' and 'negative' obligations often inter-relate and overlap, raising difficult questions about Parliament's obligations with regard to specific rights.[6]

---

[1] The general framework for rights analysis goes something like this: (a) Does the right apply? (b) What is the content of the right and has it been limited? (c) Is the limitation justifiable? and (d) What is the appropriate remedy? See S Woolman 'Application' S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31; L Du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 32; S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34; and M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 9.

[2] See Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra).

[3] National Education Health and Allied Workers Union (NEHAWU) v University of Cape Town & Others 2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), [2002] ZACC 27 at para 14, J & Another v Director General, Department of Home Affairs & Others 2003 (5) SA 62 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC), [2003] ZACC 3 ('J & Another') at para 25.

[4] See, for example, FC s 9(4) (equality and private discrimination), FC s 24*(b)* (environmental rights), FC s 25(5)-(7) (land rights), FC s 26(2) (housing), FC s 27(2) (health, food, water, and social security), FC s 32(2) (access to information), and FC s 33(3) (just administrative action).

[5] See New National Party v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC), [1999] ZACC 5 ('New National Party') at para 23 ('Parliament is obliged to provide for the machinery, mechanism or process that is reasonably capable of achieving the goal of ensuring that all persons who want to vote, and who take reasonable steps in pursuit of that right, are able to do so.') Ibid at paras 118-9 (O'Regan J explains the positive obligations on Parliament and other parts of the state), reaffirmed in Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Re-integration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR (CC), [2004] ZACC 10 at para 28. See also J & Another (supra) at para 25 ('The executive and legislature are … obliged to deal comprehensively and timeously with existing unfair discrimination against gays and lesbians'); Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC), [2000] ZACC 19 ('Grootboom') at paras 41-2 (emphasising that the 'precise contours and content of the measures to be adopted are primarily a matter for the legislature and the executive' but that 'legislative measures by themselves are not likely to constitute constitutional compliance'.)

[6] See New National Party (supra) at para 20. In the context of the right to vote, Yacoob J pointed out that:

> Any scheme designed to facilitate the exercise of this right carries with it the possibility that some people will not comply with its provisions. But that does not make the scheme unconstitutional. The decisive question which arises for consideration in this case is the following: when can it legitimately be said that a legislative measure designed to enable people to vote in fact results in a denial of that right?

In Glenister II the Constitutional Court relied on s 7(2) to invalidate legislation that abolished one corruption-fighting organization, the Directorate of Special Operations ('the Scorpions'), and replaced it with another specialised crime-fighting body, the Directorate of Priority Crime Investigation ('the Hawks'), which was somewhat less independent of the executive.[1] We discuss the intricacies of the decision below.[2] At this juncture we need only look at the Court's understanding of s 7(2). In vivid language, Mosenke DCJ and Cameron J[3] described the consequences of corruption:

> There can be no gainsaying that corruption threatens to fell at the knees virtually everything we hold dear and precious in our hard-won constitutional order. It blatantly undermines the democratic ethos, the institutions of democracy, the rule of law and the foundational values of our nascent constitutional project. It fuels maladministration and public fraudulence and imperils the capacity of the state to fulfil its obligations to respect, protect, promote and fulfil all the rights enshrined in the Bill of Rights. When corruption and organised crime flourish, sustainable development and economic growth are stunted. And in turn, the stability and security of society is put at risk.[4]

Specifically, the Court held, corruption impacts on the rights to 'equality, human dignity, freedom [and] security of the person, administrative justice and socio-economic rights, including the rights to education, housing, and health care.'[5] Considering the pernicious and pervasive effects of corruption, '[t]he state's obligation to 'respect, protect, promote and fulfil' the rights in the Bill of Rights thus inevitably, in the modern state, creates a duty to create efficient anti-corruption mechanisms.'[6]

Generally, a Court should 'not be prescriptive as to what measures the state takes, as long as they fall within the range of possible conduct that a reasonable decision-maker in the circumstances may adopt.'[7] The standard therefore goes beyond mere rationality and is some form of reasonableness review akin to that used in socio-economic rights cases, administrative review and public participation challenges. In this case, however, Moseneke DCJ and Cameron J concluded that, considering South Africa's international obligations, 'the state must create an anti-corruption entity with the necessary independence, and that this obligation is constitutionally enforceable.'[8] According to the majority of the Court, the Hawks were insufficiently independent and Parliament was given 18 months to fix the defect.[9]

In dissent, Chief Justice Ngcobo was unwilling to take this final step.[10] While he recognised that FC s 7(2) imposed an obligation on the state to 'take effective

[1] Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2011 (3) SA 347 (CC), [2011] ZACC 6 ('Glenister II').

[2] See § 17.8*(b)* below.

[3] Froneman, Nkabinde and Skweyiya JJ concurring.

[4] Glenister II (supra) at para 166.

[5] Ibid at para 198.

[6] Ibid at para 177.

[7] Ibid at para 191.

[8] Ibid at para 197.

[9] For a discussion of this part of the judgment, see S Woolman 'Security Services' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS 3, May 2011) Chapter 23B.

[10] Mogoeng and Yacoob JJ and Brand AJ concurring.

measures to fight corruption',[1] it did not oblige the state to establish an independent entity to combat corruption. The difference between the majority and the minority seems to operate on two levels. On one level, it is a disagreement about the role of South Africa's international obligations in interpreting the Constitution. But on another level it is about the degree of action required by FC s 7(2), and the latitude given to the state to realise its obligations. The minority stresses that '[h]ow [the FC s 7(2)] obligation is fulfilled and the rate at which it must be fulfilled must necessarily depend upon the nature of the right involved, the availability of government resources and whether there are other provisions of the Constitution that spell out how the right in question must be protected or given effect.'[2] In its view, the majority is guilty of 'read[ing] into our Constitution a constitutional obligation that the Constitution does not expressly create.'[3] To the majority, anything other than establishing an independent entity is not a sufficient attempt to tackle corruption.[4]

Moving on from FC s 7(2), it should be noted that impermissible limitations of fundamental rights are not confined to direct infringements of those rights. Importantly, 'the implementation of an Act which passes constitutional scrutiny at the time of its enactment, may well give rise to a constitutional complaint, if, as a result of circumstances which become apparent later, its implementation would infringe a constitutional right.'[5] Though this provision primarily implicates the executive, it should be borne in mind when Parliament adopts legislation. Furthermore, legislation could be invalid if it grants benefits to individuals on condition that they act in a manner that compromises their fundamental rights.[6]

[1] Glenister II (supra) at para 84.

[2] Ibid at para 107.

[3] Ibid at para 109.

[4] Without getting into a long debate about the correctness of either of these approaches, it is worth pointing a significant weakness of the majority decision. The Hawks share the jurisdiction to fight corruption with other units of the South African Police Service ('SAPS'). The only difference is that the Hawks investigate matters which, in the view of its Head, are national priority offences and those offences or category of offences referred to it from time to time by the National Commissioner of the SAPS, subject to any policy guidelines issued by the Ministerial Committee. The majority does not seem to consider that a vast number of the offences of corruption may be investigated by other units of the SAPS, which lack the independence the Court sought of the Hawks. Why does it fulfil the s 7(2) duty if only some corruption offences are addressed by an independent body, while many others are addressed by the clearly less independent (at least by the majority's standards) SAPS?

[5] New National Party (supra) at para 22.

[6] An example of such legislation might be a taxation statute which granted rebates to soldiers who took an oath of loyalty to the government. See Speiser v Randall 357 US 513, 78 SCt 1332 (1958). This sort of case is dealt with in the United States under the 'unconstitutional conditions' doctrine. For discussion of this doctrine and the confusion surrounding its application, see KM Sullivan 'Unconstitutional Conditions' (1989) 102 Harvard LR 1415; C Sunstein The Partial Constitution (1993) Chapter 10. The Canadian Supreme Court appears to have contemplated the competence of an individual to bargain away some of his or her rights, provided that the bargaining is rational. See Douglas College v Douglas/Kwantlen Faculty Association, Attorney-General of Canada et al, Interveners [1990] 77 DLR (4th) 94, 3 SCR 570, 585.

The Constitutional Court has repeatedly stated that if Parliament intends to limit fundamental rights, it should do so expressly and clearly.[1] Furthermore, when Parliament enacts legislation that gives officials a discretion that could affect someone's fundamental rights, it must provide the appropriate guidance to those officials:

> It is for the legislature to ensure that, when necessary, guidance is provided as to when limitation of rights will be justifiable. It is therefore not ordinarily sufficient for the legislature merely to say that discretionary powers that may be exercised in a manner that could limit rights should be read in a manner consistent with the Constitution in the light of the constitutional obligations placed on such officials to respect the Constitution. Such an approach would often not promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. Guidance will often be required to ensure that the Constitution takes root in the daily practice of governance. Where necessary, such guidance must be given. Guidance could be provided either in the legislation itself, or where appropriate by a legislative requirement that delegated legislation be properly enacted by a competent authority.[2]

At the same time, the Court has been sensitive to the fact that Parliament must be given a wide degree of latitude in its law-making provided that it acts within the constraints of the Constitution:

> The duty of a court is to decide whether or not the legislature has overreached itself in responding, as it must, to matters of great social concern …. [W]hen giving appropriate effect to the factor of 'less restrictive means', the court must not limit the range of legitimate legislative choice in a specific area.[3]

When crafting remedies for violations of rights, the Court has articulated similar concerns and tried to avoid limiting Parliament's options.[4]

---

[1] August & Another v Electoral Commission & Others 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC), [1999] ZACC 3 at para 33; Lesapo v North-West Agricultural Bank 2000 (1) SA 409 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1420 (CC), [1999] ZACC 16 at para 9; and National Union of Metal Workers of South Africa & Others v Bader BOP (Pty) Ltd & Another 2003 (3) SA 513 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 182 (CC), [2002] ZACC 30 at para 37. See also Ngcobo & Others v Salimba 1999 (8) BCLR 855 (SCA), 1999 (2) SA 1057 (SCA) at para 13 (On problems of drafting legislation to meet such a demand).

[2] Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC), [2000] ZACC 8 ('Dawood') at para 54.

[3] S v Manamela & Another 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC), 2000 (1) SACR 414 (CC), [2000] ZACC 5 at para 34. See also S v Baloyi 2000 (2) SA 425 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 86 (CC), 2000 (1) SALR 81 (CC), [1999] ZACC 19 at para 30; S v Jordan & Others 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 499 (CC), [2002] ZACC 22 particularly at paras 25-6 and 94. See also Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Re-integration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR (CC), [2004] ZACC 10 at para 35 (Court recognised that 'there may … be cases where the concerns to which the legislation is addressed are subjective and not capable of proof as objective facts. A legislative choice is not always subject to courtroom fact-finding and may be based on reasonable inferences unsupported by empirical data. When policy is in issue it may not be possible to prove that a policy directed to a particular concern will be effective. It does not necessarily follow from this, however, that the policy is not reasonable and justifiable.')

[4] See, for example, National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC), [1999] ZACC 17 at paras 66, 76, 84-6; J & Another (supra) at paras 21, 26. See generally M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 9.

(c) Extraterritorial competence constraints

Can Parliament legislate beyond the national boundaries? The answer before the Interim Constitution was in the affirmative.[1] This position seems to have been unaffected by the adoption of either the Interim Constitution or the Final Constitution. There are a number pieces of legislation on the statute book that have extra-territorial application.[2]

(d) Separation of powers constraints[3]

The doctrine of the separation of powers limits the legislative authority of Parliament. The separation of powers under the Constitution, though 'intended as a means of controlling government by separating or diffusing power, is not strict'.[4] Rather the doctrine

> [e]mbodies a system of checks and balances designed to prevent an over-concentration of power in any one arm of government; it anticipates the necessary or unavoidable intrusion of one branch on the terrain of another; this engenders interaction, but does so in a way which avoids diffusing power so completely that government is unable to take timely measures in the public interest.[5]

The constraint placed by the separation of powers on Parliament's authority is most obvious in the context of the separation between the powers of the judicial branch of government, on the one hand, and the legislative and executive branches, on the other. Legislation that brings judicial organs of state under the control of Parliament or the executive can be struck down under the separation of powers doctrine even if such legislation does not conflict with any of the express provisions of the Constitution.[6]

---

[1] S v Fazzie & Others 1964 (4) SA 673 (A).

[2] Examples include the Regulation of Foreign Military Assistance Act 15 of 1998; the Implementation of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court Act 27 of 2002; the Prevention and Combating of Corrupt Activities Act 12 of 2004; the Anti-Personnel Mines Prohibition Act 36 of 2003; the Prohibition or Restriction of Certain Conventional Weapons Act 18 of 2008.

[3] See generally, S Seedorf & S Sibanda 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 12.

[4] S v Dodo 2001 (3) SA 382 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 594 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 423 (CC), [2001] ZACC 16 ('Dodo') at para 16.

[5] Ibid.

[6] See Bernstein & Others v Bester NO & Others, 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC), [1996] ZACC 2 at para 105 (The doctrine of separation of powers underpins the access to court rights protected by IC s 22. Thus many cases raising the separation of powers of the judicial branch of government can also be argued under IC s 22. Nevertheless, there remain some cases which cannot be brought within the ambit of IC s 22, but may yet be argued on the basis of the separation of powers doctrine.) See also Ex parte Attorney-General, Namibia: In re the Constitutional Relationship between the Attorney-General and the Prosecutor-General 1995 (8) BCLR 1070 (NmS)(Case concerned s 35 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977. The section provided that the powers of the Prosecutor-General were to be exercised subject to the control and direction of the Attorney-General, a member of the Namibian executive. The section was held to be inconsistent with the Namibian Constitution on the grounds that it allowed a member of the executive to exercise control over the prosecutorial discretion which was the function of the judicial branch of government. The section was also found to be inconsistent with certain express provisions of the Namibian Constitution.)

However, not every legislative venture into the perceived domain of judicial decision-making is a violation of the separation of powers. For example, the Constitutional Court has stressed that it is 'pre-eminently the function of the legislature to determine what conduct should be criminalised and punished.'[1] That said, the Court cautioned that:

> The legislature's powers are decidedly not unlimited. Legislation is by its nature general. It cannot provide for each individually determined case. Accordingly such power ought not, on general constitutional principles, wholly to exclude the important function and power of a court to apply and adapt a general principle to the individual case. This power must be appropriately balanced with that of the judiciary.[2]

Attempts by the legislature to control executive policy may also raise separation of powers issues. For instance, can the legislature specify that it has to be consulted before certain executive action is taken? In one pre-1994 case, a South African court insisted on just such a procedure being followed.[3] Such procedures are likely to have remained valid under the Final Constitution.[4]

Parliament is also constrained by its obligations to the State Institutions Supporting Constitutional Democracy.[5] These constraints are very similar to those produced by the separation of powers. With respect to these Chapter 9 bodies, Parliament's obligations are twofold. Firstly, it must not interfere with the independence and impartiality of these institutions.[6] Secondly, Parliament must provide for funding 'reasonably sufficient' to enable these institutions to carry out their constitutional mandate.[7]

---

[1] Dodo (supra) at para 22.

[2] Dodo (supra) at para 26. The Court therefore upheld the validity of legislation prescribing life imprisonment unless the sentencing court was satisfied that 'substantial and compelling circumstances' exist that justify the imposition of a lesser sentence. See S v Dlamini; S v Schietekat; S v Joubert; S v Dladla 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 51 (CC), [1999] ZACC 8 at paras 37-44 (The Court held that Parliament was entitled to legislate to provide guidelines concerning factors relevant to the grant or refusal of bail, provided that the existence of such factors or any other factors, and the weight to be attributed to them, was left to the judgment of the presiding judicial officer.) See also S & Others v Van Rooyen & Others (General Council of the Bar of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC), [2002] ZACC 8 ('Van Rooyen')(In the context of the administration of the judiciary, the Van Rooyen Court held that the fact that the executive and the legislature make or participate in the appointment of judges is not inconsistent with the separation of powers or the judicial independence that the Constitution requires. Ibid at para 106. The Court also upheld the involvement of Parliament, in appropriate circumstances, in the reduction of magistrates' pay and the removal of magistrates. Ibid at paras 149 and 211.)

[3] More v Minister of Co-operation and Development & Another 1986 (1) SA 102 (A) (Court upholds the need for parliamentary resolution before executive can relocate a black traditional group against its will).

[4] See, for instance, s 11(6) of the Provincial Service Commission Act 3 of 1994 (Gauteng), which required that a decision taken by that Commission to dispense with certain procedures had to be reported to the Speaker of the provincial legislature and could be overruled by the legislature.

[5] These are the Public Protector; the South African Human Rights Commission; the Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities; the Commission for Gender Equality; the Auditor-General; and the Electoral Commission. For discussions of these institutions, see S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS) Chapters 24A-F.

[6] FC s 181(2), (3) and (4). See also New National Party (supra) at para 78.

[7] New National Party (supra) at para 98. These institutions are also accountable to the National Assembly and must submit reports on their performance at least once a year. FC s 181(5).

Separation of powers has also been central to determining on which courts can decide whether Parliament has fulfilled its constitutional obligations as contemplated in FC s 167(4)(e). Section 167(4)(e) identifies a peculiar set of circumstances in which only the Constitutional Court, as 'the highest court on constitutional matters and … the ultimate guardian of the Constitution and its values', is suited to adjudicate.[1] The obligation on Parliament to facilitate public involvement in its legislative and other processes, for example, is a member of the family of politically consequential questions[2] of high importance that may only be considered by the Constitutional Court.[3]

(e) Delegation constraints

This section outlines Parliament's power to delegate its legislative function to other bodies. The primary form of delegation is legislation that affords the executive the power to make regulations. We address this first. Second, we briefly discuss the delegation of national legislative powers to provincial legislatures and municipal councils. We look, third, at the possibility for those who are delegated powers to sub-delegate them to another actor, including private parties. Finally, we consider whether delegated laws are subject to more stringent review than laws made directly by the national legislature.

(i) Delegation to the executive

The Interim Constitution was silent on the question whether Parliament could delegate its authority to legislate. In Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others ('Executive Council 1995'),[4] the Constitutional Court — in its first year — highlighted that delegating subordinate regulatory authority was not only constitutionally permissible, but was necessary for effective governance.[5] However, the Court also ruled that there were limitations, under the Interim Constitution, on the legislative authority that Parliament could delegate. The 'delegation doctrine' that imposes such limits is derived from the separation of powers doctrine: that law-making,

[1] 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC), 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), [2006] ZACC 11 ('Doctors for Life') at para 22.

[2] These instances are listed in section 167(4)(e).

[3] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 22.

[4] Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC), [1995] ZACC 8 ('Executive Council 1995').

[5] Ibid at para 51. After surveying the approach in several foreign jurisdictions, the Court concluded that limited guidance could be found from foreign precedent and that 'where Parliament is established under a written constitution, the nature and extent of its power to delegate legislative powers to the executive depends ultimately on the language of the Constitution, construed in the light of the country's own history.' Ibid at para 61. See also, ibid at para 136 (Mahomed DP, concurring)('The competence of a democratic Parliament to delegate its law-making function cannot be determined in the abstract. It depends inter-alia on the constitutional instrument in question, the powers of the legislature in terms of that instrument, the nature and ambit of the purported delegation, the subject-matter to which it relates, the degree of delegation, the control and supervision retained or exercisable by the delegator over the delegatee, the circumstances prevailing at the time when the delegation is made and when it is expected to be exercised, the identity of the delegatee and practical necessities generally.') as the proper domain of the legislature, should not be delegated excessively to the executive branch of government.[1] In Executive Council 1995, the Court was asked to address the constitutionality of s 16A of the Local Government Transition Act.[2] The section purported to confer on the President a power to amend the Act itself by Proclamation. A majority of the Constitutional Court held this delegation of legislative power went beyond constitutionally acceptable limits:

> In a modern state detailed provisions are often required for the purposes of implementing and regulating laws, and Parliament cannot be expected to deal with all such matters itself. There is nothing in the Constitution which prohibits Parliament from delegating subordinate regulatory authority to other bodies. The power to do so is necessary for effective law-making. It is implicit in the power to make laws for the country and I have no doubt that under our Constitution Parliament can pass legislation delegating such legislative functions to other bodies. There is, however, a difference between delegating authority to make subordinate legislation within the framework of a statute under which the delegation is made and assigning plenary legislative power to another body, including, as s 16A does, the power to amend the Act under which the assignment is made.[3]

Permitting the President to amend statutes would be subversive of the provisions of the Interim Constitution that dictate how Parliament can pass laws,[4] and 'could be used to introduce contentious provisions into what was previously uncontentious.'[5] Although Executive Council 1995 seems to exclude the possibility that Parliament can ever delegate the power to amend legislation, it leaves open

[1] That the excessive delegation doctrine was developed in the United States by American courts intent on frustrating the New Deal does not undermine the coherence of policy considerations underlying it. See Panama Refining Co v Ryan 293 US 388, 55 SCt 241 (1935)(Congress had set no policy to guide the President in deciding whether to authorize administrative codes to regulate interstate shipment of oil); Schechter Poultry Corp v United States 295 US 495, 55 SCt 837 (1935)(Legislation giving force of law to regulatory codes drawn up by industry associations struck down; in general, delegation of law-making power to private groups disfavoured). More recently, however, the influence of the delegation doctrine in the US has weakened and cases have turned on whether the delegated power touches constitutionally protected rights. Broad grants to administrative agencies that do not affect constitutionally protected rights have been upheld. See Lichter v United States 334 US 742, 68 SCt 1294 (1948) (Statute empowering administrative agency to apply standard of 'excessive profits' upheld because sufficient administrative practice had built up to make standard specific).

In countries where the executive is accountable to the legislature the delegation doctrine has not been applied to any significant extent. See City View Press v An Chomhairle Oiliuna [1980] IR 381, 399 (In Ireland, the delegation doctrine exists, but not applied in this case: 'the test is whether that which is challenged as an unauthorized delegation of parliamentary power is more than a mere giving effect to principles and policies which are contained in the statute itself'); Victoria Stevedoring Co v Dignan 46 CLR 73 (1931) (Australian court refuses to apply delegation doctrine); Hodge v The Queen (1883) App Cas 117 (Canadian) (Refusing to apply delegation doctrine).

[2] Act 209 of 1993.

[3] Executive Council 1995 (supra) at para 51. See also Minister of Health & Another v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd & Others 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC), 2006 (8) BCLR 872 (CC), [2005] ZACC 14 ('New Clicks') at para 113 (Chaskalson CJ)('The making of delegated legislation by members of the executive is an essential part of public administration. It gives effect to the policies set by the legislature and provides the detailed infrastructure according to which this is to be done.')

[4] Executive Council 1995 (supra) at para 62.

[5] Ibid at para 63.

the possibility that such a power might be delegable in times of war or national emergency.[1]

Like the Interim Constitution, the Final Constitution is silent on the question of delegating legislative authority to the executive. The constitutional position therefore remains the same.[2] Parliament may generally still delegate subordinate regulatory authority to members of the executive, but may not assign plenary legislative power to the executive (save for exceptional circumstances).[3] This delegation doctrine has the virtue of balancing the need for efficiency in government against the need to avoid subverting the constitutional legislative framework.[4] As we discuss in more detail below,[5] the Constitution also permits delegation of legislative powers to private actors.[6]

While this is an accurate description of the general approach, the Constitutional Court pointed out in Executive Council 1999 that the specific enquiry is > whether the Constitution authorises the delegation of the power in question. Whether there is constitutional authority to delegate is therefore a matter of constitutional interpretation. The language used in the Constitution and the context in which the provisions being construed occur are important considerations in that process.[7]

The issue in Executive Council 1999 was whether s 24(1) of the Local Government Municipal Structures Act,[8] which permitted a Minister to determine the terms of municipal councils, was an unconstitutional delegation considering that FC s 159 requires Councils' terms to be 'determined by national legislation.' Ngcobo J stressed that the Constitution uses a range of expressions when it confers legislative power upon the national legislature with regard to local government. Where the Constitution states that 'national legislation must' or 'as determined by national legislation', this constitutes a strong indication that the legislative power cannot be delegated by the legislature.[9] Justice Ngcobo accordingly found that s 24(1) was an unconstitutional delegation of a power that the Constitution determined could only be exercised by the legislature.

Executive Council 1999 raised, but technically left un-answered, two important, related questions about the limits Parliament must place on delegations: (a) whether Parliament must provide clear criteria for the exercise of the delegated power; and (b) whether a delegation must contain safeguards against the abuse

[1] Executive Council 1995 (supra) at para 62 and para 140 (Mahomed DP, concurring).

[2] See Executive Council of the Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development & Another, Executive Council of KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Afria & Others 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC), [1999] ZACC 13 ('Executive Council 1999') at para 124 (Holding that the same principles apply to the Final Constitution.) See also Van Rooyen (supra) at para 118-9 (Constitutional Court applied the holding in Executive Council 1995 in evaluating the constitutionality of a delegation of subordinate regulatory authority.)

[3] Executive Council 1995 (supra) at para 62.

[4] Ibid at para 62-3.

[5] See § 17.5*(e)*(iii) below.

[6] AAA Investments (Proprietary) Limited v Micro Finance Regulatory Council & Another 2007 (1) SA 343 (CC), 2006 (11) BCLR 1255 (CC), [2006] ZACC 9.

[7] Executive Council 1999 (supra) at para 124.

[8] Act 117 of 1998.

[9] Executive Council 1999 (supra) at paras 125-6 .

of the delegated power.[1] The Court answered (a) In Affordable Medicines Trust & Others v Minister of Health & Another.[2] The challenge concerned a delegation to the Director General of Health to prescribe the conditions under which a medical practitioner could be issued a licence to compound and dispense medicine. The challenger complained that there was no direct guidance about the types of conditions the Director General could attach to a licence. Ngcobo J emphasised that, as a general rule, Parliament was permitted to afford those to whom it delegated powers discretion in how they exercise the power.[3] 'However,' he continued, > the delegation must not be so broad or vague that the authority to whom the power is delegated is unable to determine the nature and the scope of the powers conferred. For this may well lead to the arbitrary exercise of the delegated power. Where broad discretionary powers are conferred, there must be some constraints on the exercise of such power so that those who are affected by the exercise of the broad discretionary powers will know what is relevant to the exercise of those powers or in what circumstances they are entitled to seek relief from an adverse decision. These constraints will generally appear from the provisions of the empowering statute as well as the policies and objectives of the empowering statute.[4]

While the power was not directly limited, it was 'limited by the context in which [the] powers [were] to be exercised.'[5] Ngcobo J reasoned that the power must be exercised in the light of the purpose of the legislation, the purpose of providing the Director General with discretionary powers, and the obligations of medical practitioners. 'All this,' he concluded, 'provides sufficient constraint on the exercise of the discretionary powers conferred by the sub-section.'[6]

This is a fairly narrow restraint on Parliament's ability to delegate. It stands in contrast to the limits the Court has placed on the exercise of administrative discretion that affect fundamental rights. In Dawood,[7] the Court held that legislation that gives administrators discretion to take decisions that might infringe a fundamental right must provide guidelines for the exercise of that discretion. As O'Regan J explained:

> There is … a difference between requiring a court or tribunal in exercising a discretion to interpret legislation in a manner that is consistent with the Constitution and conferring a broad discretion upon an official, who may be quite untrained in law and constitutional interpretation, and expecting that official, in the absence of direct guidance, to exercise the discretion in a manner consistent with the provisions of the Bill of Rights. Officials are often extremely busy and have to respond quickly and efficiently to many requests or applications. The nature of their work does not permit considered reflection on the scope of constitutional rights or the circumstances in which a limitation of such rights is justifiable.[8]

[1] Executive Council 1999 (supra) at paras 116-8.

[2] 2006 (3) SA 247 (CC), 2005 (6) BCLR 529 (CC), [2005] ZACC 3 ('Affordable Medicines').

[3] Ibid at para 33 citing Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC), [2000] ZACC 8 at para 53.

[4] Affordable Medicines (supra) at para 34.

[5] Ibid at para 38.

[6] Ibid.

[7] Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC), [2000] ZACC 8 ('Dawood').

[8] Ibid at para 46 (The legislation at issue in Dawood concerned the granting of residence permits for foreign spouses.)

Should delegated lawmaking powers that have the potential to affect constitutional rights be less strictly guided than the implementation of laws with the same effect? Arguably, yes. The concerns that seem to motivate the Dawood Court concern the pressures of urgent decision-making. Drafting regulations is a more extended process where the executive will have greater opportunity for reflection on the consequences for constitutional rights. It is therefore sensible to apply the Affordable Medicines standard to all secondary legislation, whether it affects rights or not. However, it would also be plausible to adopt a slightly stricter standard of review for delegations of powers that impact on rights. The Court has yet to take a firm position.

As to (b) — which is arguably just a variant of (a) — the best answer comes in Executive Council 1999. Although professing to leave the issue undecided, Ngcobo J basically wrote off the idea that a delegation could be invalid because it was open to abuse: '[T]he enquiry is not whether the delegated power is open to abuse. … The enquiry is whether there is constitutional authority to delegate the power in question. … If delegated power is abused, the conduct of those abusing the power would be unconstitutional and therefore open to challenge.'[1] It is difficult to see how that line of thought could ever permit a challenge based on a delegated power's potential to be misused.

Although we appreciate the logic that informs the Court's answers to both (a) and (b), we remain somewhat uncomfortable with the endpoint. Affordable Medicines suggests that it will be difficult to find a delegation where the discretion is imperfectly circumscribed. All legislation will have an over-arching purpose or goal, and if adhering to that goal constitutes sufficient guidance for the exercise of delegated law-making power, only the rare legislation that lacks a coherent goal could possibly contain a delegation that gave overbroad discretionary powers. And, as we noted, the Court has in reality excluded the possibility of challenges based on the potential for abuse. This opens the door for Parliament to confer virtually unfettered discretion on the executive to draft laws as long as: (a) it does not alter the text of legislation; and (b) there is no specific constitutional mandate for the legislature to act. The potential for such transfers of power does not sit easily with traditional notions of the separation of powers.

The answer — which the Court itself gives in Executive Council 1999 — is that it remains possible to challenge the exercise of a delegated power, just not the delegation of the power. That is, of course, true. But the basis for the challenge is different. A challenge to the exercise of a delegated power alleges that the executive actor has exceeded the bounds of the delegation. A challenge to the delegation alleges that it was improper to afford the executive actor such wide powers, no matter how they are in fact exercised.

There are two problems with relying on exercise-challenges. First, since the Court does not require guidelines, it will be difficult to tell whether the exercise of the power falls within the terms of the delegation. If a power is bound only by the general purposes of the legislation, courts are likely to defer to the executive's interpretation of that purpose. Therefore, although attacks on the exercise of a delegated power are possible in theory, they will seldom succeed in practice, precisely because the Court does not require guidelines on how the power must be exercised. Second, an exercise-challenge is a reaction; one must wait until the power is used before attacking it. This creates difficulties for the minority of challenges that will, in fact, succeed. The executive might in good faith interpret legislation to permit it to make a regulation, only to find out later that it has exceeded its powers. In addition, it is likely that the public will be affected by the illegal use of the regulatory power before its illegality is remedied.

[1] Executive Council 1999 (supra) at para 117.

While we do not take a strong stance for or against the Court's approach to the limits of the legislature's delegating powers, we do believe that it needs to think more carefully about the consequences of its approach than it has to date. It may be wise to impose slightly stricter constraints. The Court in Glenister II could be read to have backtracked slightly on its earlier position. The issue was not technically about delegation, but whether the Hawks — which Parliament had created to deal with national priority offences, including serious corruption — were sufficiently independent from the executive. In concluding that they did not enjoy the necessary degree of independence, Moseneke DCJ and Cameron J were particularly concerned about a provision that permitted a Ministerial Committee to set policy guidelines for the institution. While those guidelines could be 'broad and harmless', 'the power of the Ministerial Committee to determine guidelines appears to be untrammelled. The guidelines could, thus, specify categories of offences that it is not appropriate for the [Hawks] to investigate — or, conceivably, categories of political office-bearers whom the [Hawks are] prohibited from investigating.'[1] The problem for the Court was that the legislation did not 'rule out far-fetched inhibitions on effective anti-corruption activities. On the contrary, it leaves them open.'[2] The thought process of the Glenister II majority suggests that the Court might be more open to complaints about the lack of guidelines for delegated law-making; not only when rights are directly at stake, as in Dawood, but also when the independence of an institution is threatened.

Finally, we must note that the delegation doctrine cannot be used to challenge the validity of delegated legislation that was made before the Interim Constitution came into effect.[3] It seems likely, however, that the doctrine does apply to regulations made after the commencement of the Interim Constitution but in terms of an enabling statute that was passed before 27 April 1994.[1]

[1] Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2011 (3) SA 347 (CC), [2011] ZACC 6 ('Glenister II') at para 230.

[2] Ibid at para 231.

[3] Ynuico Ltd v Minister of Trade and Industry & Others 1996 (3) SA 989 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 798 (CC), [1996] ZACC 12 ('Ynuico'). The doctrine drew its constitutional force from IC s 37, which vested the legislative authority of the Republic in Parliament. IC s 37 could have no bearing on the validity of regulations that were made before it came into existence, because the Interim Constitution did not have retroactive effect. In terms of IC s 229, these regulations continued in force. As Didcott J pointed out in Ynuico, IC s 229 was designed to avoid the impracticality of dismantling all existing statutory law on 27 April 1994. In so doing it gave continued effect to laws whose genesis was tainted. Whether that taint arose out of the racially exclusive nature of the old Parliament or the fact that legislative authority was vested in executive actors did not affect the operation of IC s 229. Ibid at para 8.

(ii) Delegation to provincial legislatures and municipal councils

FC s 44(1)(a)(iii) explicitly allows Parliament to assign its legislative powers, except the power to amend the Constitution, to provincial legislatures and municipal councils. This power is known as legislative inter-delegation.

The assignment of legislative competence proceeds by Act of Parliament.[2] An assignment extends legislative powers to the provincial legislature for as long as the Act of Parliament is in force. If the Act is repealed, provincial laws already made under it would continue to be valid. However, the province would not be

[1] See Ynuico (supra) at para 5. Ynuico does not make clear the attitude of the Court to this question. However, it is submitted that the doctrine must apply to such legislation. The basis of the doctrine is that, with effect from 27 April 1994, the legislative authority of the Republic vested in Parliament. After that date no law could vest plenary legislative authority in an organ other than Parliament. Whether the law itself was passed before or after 27 April 1994 is irrelevant to this inquiry.

In terms of IC s 229 any law passed before the commencement of the Constitution continued in force subject to the Constitution. Provisions of such a law, which purported to confer plenary legislative authority on an executive organ of state, would therefore have been of no force and effect after 27 April 1994. Likewise, Item 2(1) of Schedule 6 of the Final Constitution provides that all law that was in force when the 1996 constitution took effect continues in force subject to consistency with the new Constitution.

But see Janse van Rensburg NO v Minister van Handel en Nywerheid 1999 (2) BCLR 204, 213-214 (T) (Van Dijkhorst J reached the contrary conclusion. The learned judge erred by approaching the problem from the incorrect starting point. The constitutional source of the delegation doctrine was that IC s 37 vested the legislative authority of the Republic in Parliament. The effect of IC s 37 was a constitutional principle that no law could vest plenary legislative authority in a body other than the Interim Constitution Parliament. The rule that Parliament under the Interim Constitution could not delegate plenary legislative authority to any other body was a rule which flowed from this constitutional principle, but it was not the beginning and end of the principle itself. In Janse van Rensburg, Van Dijkhorst J assessed the constitutionality of s 12 of the Harmful Business Practices Act 71 of 1988 by looking only at the delegation rule and not at the underlying constitutional principle. The applicant in Janse van Rensburg argued that s 12 delegated unfettered legislative authority to the Minister of Trade and Industry and was therefore unconstitutional. Van Dijkhorst J rejected this argument on the following grounds: because the Parliament which had passed s 12 was not bound by the delegation rule; the delegation of legislative authority had been valid in 1988; it was therefore preserved by IC s 229 and FC Item 2 of Schedule 6 and remained valid today. By holding that the status of the original delegation of legislative authority in 1988 was decisive of the validity of s 12 after 27 April 1994, Van Dijkhorst J conflated the broad constitutional principle of parliamentary legislative authority with the delegation rule which is but one manifestation of this principle. Both IC s 229 and FC Schedule 6 Item 2 preserved existing legislation only 'subject to the Constitution'. IC s 37 (and FC s 43*(a)*) created a constitutional principle that no law could vest legislative authority in a body other than Parliament. From 27 April 1994, therefore, the validity of s 12 of the Harmful Business Practices Act 71 of 1988 depended not on whether it had been valid in 1988, but on whether it impermissibly purported to clothe the Minister of Trade and Industry with the type of legislative power which IC s 37 vested exclusively in Parliament. If it did, then it was inconsistent with IC s 37 and became prospectively invalid when the Interim Constitution took effect.)

[2] It might be argued that the assignment of legislative power could take place by proclamation. There are, however, indications in the Constitution that this is not permissible. FC s 104(1)(b)(iii) provides that assignment must take place by 'national legislation'. This suggests an Act of Parliament rather than a proclamation. Moreover, FC s 44(1)(a)(iii) vests the power to assign legislative competence in the National Assembly. There is no corresponding power of assignment vested in the President or any other functionary who makes proclamations.

able to make any further laws in respect of matters covered by the Act because it would no longer have the assigned legislative competence to do so.

National legislation prevails over conflicting provincial laws made under an assigned legislative competence.[1] It does not invalidate that legislation. Parliament does not have the legislative competence to repeal provincial laws — whether those laws are made under an original or an assigned competence.[2]

(iii) Sub-delegation

Not only is it possible for the legislature to delegate a power to another, it is also permissible for the delegatee, in turn, to 'sub-delegate' that power to another. It is possible to sub-delegate not only executive and administrative powers — the implementation of regulations — but also legislative powers. This includes the possibility of delegating to private actors.

In general, the legislature may provide for sub-delegation directly in legislation. It may, for example, delegate a regulation-making power to the Minister, and expressly provide that he may delegate some of those powers to the Director General. That is perfectly ordinary and permissible. The difficulty arises where the legislation is silent about sub-delegation. The general principle in those cases is delegatus delegare non potest which translates as: 'a person who is delegated a power to do something may not delegate it further.'[3] This is by no means a strict rule, but a starting point for analysis. Sub-delegation will still be permissible where it is 'reasonably necessary' to fulfil the purpose of the statute.[4]

AAA Investments v (Pty) Ltd v Micro Finance Regulatory Council & Another is an excellent example of how these principles play out. Section 15A of the Usury Act[5] permitted the Minister of Finance to exempt certain categories of loans from the strict provisions of the Act. This provision was designed to permit the functioning of the micro-finance industry which could not operate under the stringent limitations of the Act that applied to ordinary lenders. The Minister was also entitled to set the conditions for an exemption in order to provide some consumer protections. The Minister created a set of rules for exemption which included a requirement that lenders register with a regulatory authority. The only authority recognized by the Minister was the Micro Finance Regulatory Council ('the Council'), a not-for-profit company set up by various private and government institutions. The Council in turn created its own set of rules for member-

[1] A conflict between provincial legislation of this nature and a national law would not fall under FC s 146 or FC s 147(2) because the provincial legislation would likely not relate to matters within Schedules 4 and 5. Thus the conflict would, in all likelihood, be one which 'cannot be resolved by a court' within the meaning of FC s 148, and in terms of that section the national legislation would prevail.

[2] See Ex parte Speaker of the National Assembly: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the National Education Policy Bill No 83 of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC), [1996] ZACC 3 at paras 16-19. See also FC s 149.

[3] AAA Investments (Proprietary) Limited v Micro Finance Regulatory Council & Another 2007 (1) SA 343 (CC), 2006 (11) BCLR 1255 (CC), [2006] ZACC 9 ('AAA Investments') at para 117 (O'Regan J, concurring).

[4] Ibid at para 82 (Langa CJ, dissenting).

[5] Act 73 of 1968.

ship. AAA Investments complained that the rules of the Council were effectively new conditions for exemption that, in terms of s 15A, could only be set by the Minister. It argued that the Council had improperly exercised legislative power, and any implied sub-delegation by the Minister was impermissible.

The High Court had upheld the challenge on the grounds that the Council, as a private body, could not exercise legislative powers.[1] The Supreme Court of Appeal reversed, viewing the matter entirely as a question of the Council's powers under company law.[2] The Constitutional Court disagreed, holding that the Council did exercise public, legislative powers. Provided the powers had been properly delegated to it, it was perfectly constitutional for a private body to, in effect, legislate. In Justice Yacoob's words:

> [T]he Council exercised … a rule-making power aimed at fulfilling the duties imposed by the Minister. They are legislative. But the Council does not, by making rules, or by exercising legislative power properly delegated to it, usurp national, provincial or municipal legislative power. It makes binding rules authorised by law and with the force of law in the fulfilment of a national legislative purpose as set out in section 15A.[3]

O'Regan J (in a concurrence) stressed the necessity of this privatisation of legislative power in the same terms used to justify delegation to the executive in Executive Council 1995:

> The power to delegate subordinate legislative authority in a modern state is an important power. No modern state could hope to regulate all its affairs through legislation passed in the national, provincial and local spheres of government. Courts should therefore be cautious to avoid adopting unduly restrictive rules in this area which will limit the possibility of effective ordering of our society by organisations which may not form part of government.[4]

The majority of the Court did not address whether delegations to private bodies should be treated any differently from delegations to the non-legislative branches of the state. However, in dissent Langa CJ made the following commendable observations:

> [A]ccountability is a central value of our Constitution. This means that our law must be developed and interpreted in a manner that ensures that all bodies exercising public power are held accountable. However, to my mind, it also means that courts should be slow to infer the delegation of power to bodies that cannot be held directly accountable through ordinary political processes. … [A]lthough the Council exercises public powers and may be classified as an organ of state, it remains a private company. … The Council is not elected nor is it directly accountable to the public. It is only accountable through the very limited control exercised by the Minister.[5]

[1] AAA Investments (Pty) Ltd v Micro Finance Regulatory Council & Another 2004 (6) SA 557 (T).
[2] Micro Finance Regulatory Council v AAA Investments (Pty) Ltd & Another 2006 (1) SA 27 (SCA).
[3] AAA Investments (supra) at para 49.
[4] Ibid at paras 122-123.
[5] Ibid (Langa CJ, dissenting) at paras 89-90.

While this did not rule out the possibility of affording private parties the power to make laws, it did countenance caution in monitoring the degree of power private bodies are allowed to exercise. We agree with the Chief Justice. But, although the majority did not contradict his views, they did not support them either. We should also note that, although in AAA Investments the Council received its legislative power through sub-delegation, direct delegation from the legislature would be equally permissible.

While the Court was unanimous that the Council could exercise rule-making powers, it split over whether the Minister's rulemaking powers had indeed been properly delegated to the Council. Justice Yacoob wrote for the majority holding that the powers were properly delegated. First, because AAA Investments had not challenged the validity of the regulation requiring lenders to register with the Council, it had to be assumed that the delegation was valid.[1] Second, there was no problem with the Council going beyond the confines of the rules created by the Minister to create its own rules. He held that 'the legislative purpose of empowering the Minister to set the conditions was … to make it possible for the Minister to ensure that the micro-lending industry is sufficiently controlled and that borrowers are appropriately protected.'[2] The Minister chose to do that through a regulatory institution. Once that decision had been taken, the Council had to be afforded all the powers necessary to meet the goal of the legislation, including the power to make rules.[3]

O'Regan J (joined by Ngcobo J) and Langa CJ both wrote separate opinions in which they considered the question of delegation in much greater depth. In their view, the decision to regulate through a private institution was not sufficient to justify whatever rules that institution might make. The Court still had to ask: (a) Did the Usury Act in fact permit some sub-delegation to the Council? (b) If it did, were the rules the Council made within the bounds of permissible sub-delegation? Langa CJ and O'Regan J agreed that some delegation was permissible, but disagreed on the extent of the delegation. Langa CJ would only have permitted rules that were necessary to implement the regulations passed by the Minister, not rules that 'create new hurdles for exemption.'[4] He would have found invalid several rules that imposed requirements unrelated to the conditions established by the Minister. O'Regan J, on the other hand, gave the Council much greater latitude and would have upheld all the rules the Council had made. While there is not much to separate the two judgments, the Chief Justice's approach is ultimately preferable. He is the only judge to give sufficient weight to the private character of the Council. Affording private bodies legislative powers too easily risks undermining the important principles of accountability that are built into our constitutional system.

[1] AAA Investments (supra) at paras 47-48.
[2] Ibid at para 51.
[3] Ibid at para 54.
[4] Ibid at para 93.

Minister of Health & Another v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd & Others involved a more run-of-the-mill case of improper sub-delegation.[1] The case concerned medicine-pricing regulations. Although the Court was splintered on a variety of issues, it unanimously identified three impermissible sub-delegations. First, the Court held that it was impermissible for the Minister of Health to delegate the responsibility to determine the methodology by which prices would be benchmarked to international prices to her Director General. While it was acceptable for the Director General to do the calculations to set individual prices, allowing her to determine the methodology in effect gave her the power to set prices, a power that the legislation reserved for the Minister and a specialist Pricing Committee.[2] Second, the Court set aside a regulation that delegated the duty to conduct an annual review of prices to the Minister, when the Act assigned that duty to both the Minister and the Pricing Committee.[3] Lastly and in a similar vein, while the Act required the Minister to set a logistics fee on the recommendation of the Pricing Committee, the regulations impermissibly assigned the duty to the Minister alone.[4] New Clicks demonstrates the importance of both the language of the delegating legislation, and the relative expertise of the various actors involved in determining whether a sub-delegation is permissible. It also shows that it can be an invalid sub-delegation to assign a power that was meant to be exercised jointly to a single actor.

(iv) Reviewing delegated powers

An important consequence of delegating legislative powers — rather than exercising them directly — is that they are likely to become subject to stricter judicial scrutiny. Prior to the Interim Constitution, it was accepted that regulations made in terms of delegated powers were administrative action subject to judicial review.[5] The position under the Final Constitution is, surprisingly, far less clear. This issue is discussed in more detail elsewhere in this work,[6] but we provide an outline of the current position.

The proximate cause of the confusion is the Constitutional Court's splintered judgment in New Clicks.[7] The Court rejected the High Court's finding that regulations are administrative action under FC s 33(1), but not under the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act ('PAJA'),[8] but still managed to take four different positions, none of which garnered a majority. Writing for himself and Justice O'Regan, Chief Justice Chaskalson held that all regulation making (ie. delegated lawmaking) is subject to the control of both FC s 33(1)

[1] Minister of Health & Another v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd & Others 2006 (8) BCLR 872 (CC), 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC), [2005] ZACC 14 ('New Clicks').

[2] Ibid at para 281.

[3] Ibid at para 286.

[4] Ibid at para 300.

[5] Ibid at paras 101-106 (Chaskalson CJ, plurality).

[6] For a full analysis of the Court's cases on the topic, see G Penfold & J Klaaren 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) §63.3*(b)*(vi).

[7] New Clicks (supra).

[8] Act 3 of 2000.

and PAJA. Ngcobo J, joined by two other Justices,[1] held that the specific regulations at issue in New Clicks were administrative action, but was unwilling to extend that finding to all regulations. Four of the remaining Justices[2] signed on to Moseneke J's opinion, which simply avoided the issue. Last, Sachs J held that regulations are not administrative action, but should be subject to a wide conception of legality.

The Court has provided no further guidance since New Clicks, so the exact position remains uncertain. The recent change in composition of the Court makes the eventual answer even less predictable.[3] However, it is almost certain that regulations will be subject to some additional level of scrutiny, even if it is not full administrative review. There are very good reasons for courts to show less deference to regulations than they do to legislation. Permitting some delegation is, as we discussed earlier, necessary for a modern state to function. But: The principled justifications for wide judicial deference to legislative rule-making do not apply when the legislature chooses to assign its central function to the executive. Regulations are not made by elected and accountable representatives. They are generally not the result of an open, deliberative, legislative process. Courts should therefore ensure that when legislative powers are exercised by non-legislative bodies, they are subject to some additional scrutiny.

(f) Constraints imposed by the legality principle

The rule of law is one of the founding values of the Final Constitution.[4] The legality principle that flows from the rule of law is binding on all legislative and executive organs of state in all spheres of government. The legality principle was first articulated by the Constitutional Court in Fedsure v Greater Johannesburg Metropolitan Council.[5] The Fedsure Court held that the legality principle provided that legislative and executive organs of state 'may exercise no power and perform no function beyond that conferred upon them by law'.[6] Thus stated, the legality principle was hardly controversial and would have no impact on the national legislature outside the federalism constraints already discussed. Indeed, its only relevance to the outcome in Fedsure concerned questions of jurisdiction, rather than questions of substantive law.[7] However, the far-reaching significance of the legality principle lies in the rationality and vagueness doctrines.

[1] Langa DCJ and Van der Westhuizen J.

[2] Madala, Mokgoro, Skweyiya and Yacoob JJ.

[3] Three of the five justices supporting Chaskalson CJ or Ngcobo J have left (Chaskalson CJ, Langa DCJ and O'Regan J) as have two of those who sided with Moseneke J (Madala and Mokgoro JJ). Sachs J, too, has retired.

[4] FC s 1*(c)*.

[5] Fedsure v Greater Johannesburg Metropolitan Council 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC), [1998] ZACC 17 ('Fedsure') at para 58.

[6] Ibid.

[7] Ibid. See also President of the Republic of South Africa v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 1999 (2) SA 14 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 175 (CC), [1998] ZACC 21 at para 28.

(i) Rationality

In New National Party of SA v Government of the RSA & Others,[1] Yacoob J stated that laws and acts that are not rationally related to a legitimate government purpose are unconstitutional because arbitrariness is inconsistent with the legality principle. That the rule of law prohibits all irrational laws was reaffirmed by the Constitutional Court in United Democratic Movement v President of the RSA,[2] and has been regularly applied since. The legality principle extends the Final Constitution's commitment to the rule of law and constitutionalism such that even where an Act of Parliament does not affect fundamental rights, it must be rationally related to a legitimate governmental purpose in order to be valid.[3]

That said, the legality principle's rationality standard is a relatively easy one for Parliament to meet. It must not be conflated with the more stringent test of 'reasonableness'[4] applied in limitations analysis and certain other contexts.[5] In Pharmaceutical Manufacturers,[6] the Court explained the rationality standard as follows:

> [It] does not mean that the courts can or should substitute their opinions as to what is appropriate, for the opinions of those in whom the power has been vested. As long as the purpose sought to be achieved by the exercise of public power is within the authority of the functionary, and as long as the functionary's decision, viewed objectively, is rational, a court cannot interfere with the decision simply because it disagrees with it or considers that the power was exercised inappropriately.[7]

In United Democratic Movement, the Court confirmed that this relatively lenient standard applies 'also and possibly with greater force to the exercise by Parliament

[1] 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC), [1999] ZACC 5 ('New National Party') at para 24 ('Courts do not review provisions of Acts of Parliament on the grounds that they are unreasonable. They will do so only if they are satisfied that the legislation is not rationally connected to a legitimate government purpose. In such circumstances, review is competent because the legislation is arbitrary. Arbitrariness is inconsistent with the rule of law which is a core value of the Constitution.')

[2] 2003 (1) SA 488 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1213 (CC), [2002] ZACC 33 ('United Democratic Movement' or 'UDM') at para 55.

[3] This standard is virtually identical to the one imposed by FC s 9(1). Under s 9(1), any differentiation between groups of people must be rationally related to a legitimate government purpose. Technically, the rationality standard rooted in the rule of law does not require a differentiation. However, in practice virtually any law can be framed as a differentiation. Nonetheless, the range of the legality-based rationality standard is wider than its s 9(1) relative because it applies to the limited set of cases that are not covered by the Bill of Rights, particularly constitutional amendments.

[4] The greater scrutiny involved in a reasonableness enquiry is best illustrated by comparing the majority judgment of Yacoob J in New National Party with the dissenting judgment of O'Regan J. Yacoob J believed a rationality approach was appropriate. New National Party (supra) at para 24. O'Regan J believed a reasonableness test should be applied. Ibid at paras 122-3. Naturally, they reached different conclusions. See also Bel Porto School Governing Body v Premier of the Province of the Western Cape, 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC), [2002] ZACC 2 at para 46. See also, A Price 'The Content and Justification of Rationality Review' (2010) 25 SAPL 345, 358 ('Whereas an act is reasonable if the reasons for it defeat the reasons against it, an act is merely rational if, notwithstanding the reasons against it, there is at least one reason or rationale for it.')

[5] See, eg, the rights to administrative action, FC s 24, and some socio-economic rights, FC ss 26 and 27.

[6] Ex parte President of the RSA: In re Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC), [2000] ZACC 1.

[7] Ibid at para 90. Footnote omitted.

of the powers vested in it by the Constitution, including the power to amend the Constitution.'[1]

In dealing with the rule of law and the legality principles in United Democratic Movement, the Court emphasised the need to distinguish a legitimate governmental purpose from the motive of those who voted for the legislation. In response to an argument that the purpose of the defection legislation was to enable the African National Congress and New National Party to take advantage of the break-up of the Democratic Alliance, the United Democratic Movement Court held that:

> Courts are not … concerned with the motives of the members of the legislature who vote in favour of particular legislation, nor with the consequences of legislation unless it infringes rights protected by the Constitution, or is otherwise inconsistent with the Constitution.[2]

A fuller discussion of rationality jurisprudence lies outside the scope of this chapter. Fortunately, the intricacies of the rationality test are addressed in more detail elsewhere in this work,[3] and one of the authors has provided an extensive account of it in South African Public Law.[4] For now, we simply note that rationality review is far more complicated, malleable and subjective than it may, at first, appear.

(ii) Vagueness

In addition to irrational legislation, the legality principle also prohibits vague legislation. The standard statement of the law comes from Affordable Medicines:

> The doctrine of vagueness is founded on the rule of law, which, as pointed out earlier, is a foundational value of our constitutional democracy. It requires that laws must be written in a clear and accessible manner. What is required is reasonable certainty and not perfect lucidity. The doctrine of vagueness does not require absolute certainty of laws. The law

[1] United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 68. United Democratic Movement illustrates well the relatively low level of scrutiny that a rationality enquiry entails. The Court rejected the argument that it was irrational for Parliament to limit defections by members of a legislature to two window periods in the life of a legislature and, in doing so, emphasised the conflicting views expressed in Parliament on the issue and the expert opinions that had been obtained. Ibid at para 69. The Court also stressed that even though other parties would not necessarily have been affected by the break-up of the Democratic Alliance which prompted the legislation, 'it cannot be said to be irrational to pass a law of general application to deal with a concrete situation, rather than a law which would apply only to members of the DA, the DP and the NNP.' Ibid at para 70.

The Court also held that it was not irrational to apply differing procedures to the first defection period while applying the same procedure to all subsequent defection periods. Ibid at para 70. Lastly, the Court held that it was not irrational, in the event of the death or expulsion of a member of parliament who had defected, to allow the new party of the member to fill the seat in question. Ibid at para 74.

[2] United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 56.

[3] C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 35.

[4] M Bishop 'Rationality is Dead! Long Live Rationality! Saving Rational Basis Review' (2010) 25 SAPL 312. See also A Price 'The Content and Justification of Rationality Review' (2010) 25 SAPL 345; M Bishop 'Vampire or Prince? The Listening Constitution and Merafong Demarcation Forum v President of the Republic of South Africa' (2010) 2 Constitutional Court Review 313; A Price 'Rationality Review of Legislation and Executive Decisions Poverty Alleviation Network and Albutt' (2010) 127 SALJ 580.

> must indicate with reasonable certainty to those who are bound by it what is required of them so that they may regulate their conduct accordingly.[1]

Relying on this test, the Court found a regulation that listed factors to be taken into account when granting a medical practitioner a licence to dispense medicines unconstitutionally vague because the government had stated in the litigation that the factors were irrelevant. This contradiction rendered it impossible for medical practitioners to know how their applications would be determined.[2]

The best example of the vagueness principle is the Court's decision in South African Liquor Traders Association & Others v Chairperson Gauteng Liquor Board & Others to invalidate provincial legislation regulating shebeens.[3] The problem was the definition of a 'shebeen'. The legislation defined a shebeen as a 'any unlicensed operation whose main business is liquor and is selling less than ten (10) cases consisting of 12 x 750ml of beer bottles'. Unhelpfully, the law did not specify the period within which the 10 cases could be sold: Per day? Per week? Per month? As O'Regan J put it, the legislation's 'meaning cannot … be ascertained with any precision. It is simply not clear which unlicensed liquor traders will fall within the definition and which without.'[4] The Court read-in the phrase 'per week' to cure the vagueness.

While the legislation in Liquor Traders was obviously vague, in Bertie Van Zyl, the Court split over whether a definition of 'security service' was impermissibly vague.[5] Section 20(1)(a) of the Private Security Industry Regulation Act[6] made it a crime for anybody not registered in terms of the Act to perform a 'security service'. The Act defined 'security service' to include 'protecting or safeguarding a person or property in any manner'. The applicant's employees were charged with violating s 20(1)(a) for acting as security guards on its farms. It argued that the definition was impermissibly vague, as it was unclear how far it extended. A person providing child care services could be seen as 'safeguarding a person'. Would they have to register under the Act?

The majority of the Court, per Mokgoro J, held that, when read in context, the definition was not unconstitutionally vague. 'The provisions of the Act themselves might not provide absolute clarity,' the Justice wrote, 'in that there may be cases on the margins where it may not immediately be determined whether or not registration is required under the Act. That, however, is the inevitability of broadly stated legislation.'[7] She interpreted the definition, in terms of FC s 39(2), to provide a much more precise meaning than its text would suggest.

Justice O'Regan dissented. 'Language', she held, 'is often imprecise and in many cases it will not be possible to draw with complete certainty the boundaries of a [1] Affordable Medicines Trust and Others v Minister of Health and Another 2006 (3) SA 247 (CC), 2005 (6) BCLR 529 (CC), [2005] ZACC 3 at para 108.

[2] Ibid at paras 120-121.

[3] 2009 (1) SA 565 (CC), 2006 (8) BCLR 901 (CC), [2006] ZACC 7 ('Liquor Traders').

[4] Ibid at para 26.

[5] Bertie Van Zyl (Pty) Ltd & Another v Minister for Safety and Security & Others 2010 (2) SA 181 (CC), 2009 (10) BCLR 978 (CC), [2009] ZACC 11 ('Bertie Van Zyl').

[6] Act 56 of 2001.

[7] Bertie Van Zyl (supra) at para 52.

legislative prohibition. … However, where a provision has no certain core meaning at all, or where it has a significant penumbral scope of uncertainty, it will probably be constitutionally impermissible.'[1] The need for certainty is particularly strong in criminal provisions like s 20(1)(a). She held that the provision could not be interpreted to contain the degree of certainty demanded by the principle of legality.

The disagreement between Mokgoro and O'Regan JJ is both about the content of the vagueness principle and the proper limits of statutory interpretation. In any vagueness challenge, these two elements will inevitably overlap; the more willing a judge is to impute meaning to a statute that is not explicit in the text, the easier it will be for her to find that the statute is not vague. In our view, Mokgoro J stretches the bounds of statutory interpretation too far — and thereby allows impermissibly vague legislation.[2] While it may be possible for judges with the benefit of dense legal argument and ample time to reflect to divine the proper meaning of 'security service', the average policeman, prosecutor or citizen would likely not be able to do so. And if legislation — especially criminal legislation — is impenetrable to those who are bound by it and those who must enforce it, it cannot be constitutional.

(g) Constraints on the power to amend the Constitution

There are no expressly stated substantive limits on the power of Parliament to amend the Final Constitution.[3] The narrow scope, if any, for substantively challenging constitutional amendments has been made clear by the Constitutional Court:

> Amendments to the Constitution passed in accordance with the requirements of s 74 of the Constitution become part of the Constitution. Once part of the Constitution, they cannot be challenged on the grounds of inconsistency with other provisions of the Constitution. The Constitution, as amended, must be read as a whole and its provisions must be interpreted in harmony with one another. It follows that there is little if any scope for challenging the constitutionality of amendments that are passed in accordance with the prescribed procedures and majorities.[4]

This principle was upheld in Matatiele I.[5] The Court was confronted with an amendment to the Constitution that changed provincial boundaries and, as a result, also necessitated changes to municipal boundaries. The applicants argued

[1] Bertie Van Zyl (supra) at para 102.

[2] For a discussion of Bertie Van Zyl, see M Bishop & J Brickhill 'Constitutional Law' (2009) 2 Juta's Quarterly Review §2.3.

[3] Compare s 74 of the Interim Constitution, which stated that Parliament had no power to amend any of the provisions of chapter 5, the chapter dealing with the adoption of the Final Constitution by the Constitutional Assembly. Some provisions of chapter 5 of the Interim Constitution were not amendable. See IC s 74(1). The remaining provisions could be amended only by a two-thirds majority of the Constitutional Assembly. See IC s 74(2). There are procedural restraints on the amending power of Parliament under the Final Constitution. See § 17.3*(a)* supra.

[4] United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 12 (footnote omitted).

[5] Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (1) 2006 (5) BCLR 622 (CC), 2006 (5) SA 47 (CC), [2006] ZACC 2 ('Matatiele I').

that the power to change municipal boundaries was assigned by FC s 155(3)(b) exclusively to the Municipal Demarcation Board and Parliament could not, even by constitutional amendment, usurp that power. Ngcobo J held that Parliament had the power to amend provincial boundaries through a constitutional amendment, and that included the power to amend municipal boundaries if doing so was reasonably necessary for changing provincial territories.[1] What Parliament could not do by ordinary legislation, it could accomplish through constitutional amendment.

In addition, UDM appears to have to put paid to any suggestion that the Constitutional Principles contained in Schedule IV to the Interim Constitution could place substantive limits on Parliament's amending power.[2] The Court held that although Constitutional Principle VIII required an election system resulting in proportional representation, the founding values in s 1 of the Constitution omitted any reference to proportional representation while including each of the other aspects of Constitutional Principle VIII.[3] UDM indicates that while the Constitutional Principles remain useful at the level of interpretation, they cannot provide substantive limits on Parliament's ability to amend the Constitution.

There is, however one accepted substantive limit on Parliament's power to amend the Constitution: amendments must be rational. The rationality of a constitutional amendment has been attacked on three occasions: UDM, Merafong and Poverty Alleviation Network. Interestingly, the Court never explicitly states that the rationality requirement applies to constitutional amendments. Its holdings all seem to be carefully ambiguous. In UDM the Court writes that the limited role of the rationality principle 'applies also and possibly with greater force to the exercise by Parliament of the powers vested in it by the Constitution, including the power to amend the Constitution.'[4] This could fairly be interpreted as applying the rationality standard to constitutional amendments. Yet, in Matatiele I, the Court directed the parties to address them on whether constitutional amendments are subject to rationality review.[5] It then avoids the issue in Matatiele II because it invalidates the amendment on procedural grounds. In Merafong, the Court repeats the UDM dictum and then writes that, in view of the fact that it rejects the rationality challenge, 'it is not necessary to take this specific point any further.'[6] In Poverty Alleviation, the Court never explicitly considers the issue, seeming to assume that

[1] Matatiele I (supra) at paras 49-53.

[2] This suggestion was based on the fact that the Final Constitution could not take effect until the Constitutional Court had certified that it complied with all the Principles contained in Schedule IV. See IC s 71(2). It thus appeared anomalous to allow Parliament to amend the Final Constitution so as to introduce provisions that did not comply with the Constitutional Principles, and which thus could not have formed part of the original text of the Final Constitution. However, in the previous edition of this work, Chaskalson and Klaaren evaluated this argument and correctly concluded that as a matter of both legal logic and political necessity, it was not sustainable. M Chaskalson & J Klaaren 'National Government' in M Chaskalson et al (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) Chapter 3.

[3] United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 28-9.

[4] Ibid at para 68.

[5] Matatiele I (supra) at para 86.

[6] Merafong Demarcation Forum & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2008 (5) SA 171 (CC), 2008 (10) BCLR 968 (CC), [2008] ZACC 10 ('Merafong') at para 64.

the standard applies to constitutional amendments.[1] In our view, despite the lack of an unambiguous statement, the Court's practice indicates that it is willing to hold constitutional amendments to the rationality standard, although it will very seldom find that the standard has been breached.

A more controversial, far-reaching limitation is the 'basic structure doctrine'. This doctrine originated in India where the Supreme Court held that despite the Indian Parliament's apparently unlimited power of amendment,[2] the amending power did not extend to any amendment which would alter the basic structure of the constitution.[3] In Kesavananda v State of Kerala the court held:

> We may now deal with the question as to what is the scope of the power of amendment under Article 368. This would depend upon the connotation of the word 'amendment'. Question has been posed during arguments as to whether the power to amend under the above article includes the power to completely abrogate the Constitution and replace it by an entirely new Constitution. The answer to the above question, in my opinion, should be in the negative. … Although it is permissible under the power of amendment to effect changes, howsoever important, and to adapt the system to the requirements of changing conditions, it is not permissible to touch the foundation or to alter the basic institutional pattern.[4]

While the basic structure doctrine has been confirmed by the Indian Supreme Court in later cases, it is applied with caution. For the most part it has been invoked by the Supreme Court to strike down only those constitutional amendments that affect the rule of law and the separation of powers between the judiciary and the legislature.[5] Outside of this domain, the court has allowed Parliament an almost unfettered power of amendment. Even the repeal of particular fundamental rights has been held not to affect the basic structure of the Constitution.[6]

---

[1] Poverty Alleviation Network & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2010 (6) BCLR 520 (CC), [2010] ZACC 5 ('Poverty Alleviation Network').

[2] Article 368 of the Indian Constitution provides:

(1) Notwithstanding anything in the Constitution, Parliament may in exercise of its constituent power amend by way of addition, variation or repeal any provision of this Constitution in accordance with the procedure laid down in this article.

(2) An amendment of this Constitution may be initiated only by the introduction of a Bill for the purpose in either House of Parliament, and when the Bill is passed in each House by a majority of the total membership of that House and by a majority of not less than two-thirds of the members of that House present and voting, it shall be presented to the President who shall give his assent to the Bill and thereupon, the Constitution shall stand amended in accordance with the terms of the Bill.

[3] The German Basic Law contains an express provision to this effect. Article 79(3) states: 'Amendments to this Basic Law affecting … the principles laid down in Articles 1 and 20 shall be prohibited.' The basic structure doctrine has, however, been rejected by the courts of Sri Lanka and Singapore. See In re Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution and the Provincial Councils Bill [1990] LRC (Const) 1, 13h-14g and Teo Soh Lung v Minister for Home Affairs & others [1990] LRC (Const) 490, respectively.

[4] AIR 1973 SC 1461, 1859-1860 at para 1437

[5] See, for example, Indira Gandhi v Raj Narain AIR 1975 SC 2299; Minerva Mills v Union of India AIR 1980 SC 1789; SP Gupta v President of India AIR 1982 SC 149.

[6] In the case which first recognized the doctrine, the repeal of the right to property was held not to affect the basic structure of the constitution. See Kesavananda v State of Kerala AIR 1973 SC 1461.

In Premier, KwaZulu-Natal,[1] the Constitutional Court left open the possibility that it might subsequently incorporate the basic structure doctrine into South African constitutional law:

> It may perhaps be that a purported amendment to the Constitution, following the formal procedures prescribed by the Constitution, but radically and fundamentally restructuring and reorganising the fundamental premises of the Constitution, might not qualify as an 'amendment' at all.[2]

However, in both Premier, KwaZulu-Natal[3] and United Democratic Movement,[4] the Court held that even if this doctrine was to be recognised as part of South African constitutional law, none of the amendments dealt with in either case could 'conceivably fall within [the] category of amendments so basic to the Constitution as effectively to abrogate or destroy it.'[5]

One potential barrier to the adoption of the basic structure doctrine under the Constitution is FC s 74(1). Section 74(1) expressly contemplates the amendment of s 1: the provision that sets out the founding values of the Republic of South Africa.[6] If the founding values of s 1 are subject to amendment — albeit only by a vote with the support of 75 per cent of the NA and the support of six provinces in the NCOP — then it is difficult to argue that the basic structure doctrine means that other provisions of the Constitution are unamendable. However, it may be possible to reconcile s 74(1) with the basic structure doctrine by reading s 1 as shaping the operation of a slightly more limited basic structure doctrine. If s 1 is interpreted to delimit the basic structure of the Constitution, amendments inconsistent with the values of s 1 would be impermissible under the basic structure doctrine unless s 1 itself was amended by the special provisions of s 74(1).[7] It was, arguably, the absence of an equivalent of s 74(1) in the Indian Constitution that motivated the Supreme Court to develop the basic structure doctrine. The presence of s 74(1) in our Constitution makes the basic structure doctrine unnecessary.

17.6 Procedural Constraints on Legislative Authority

This section deals with constitutional limits on the procedure that Parliament must follow in enacting legislation. We discuss the two topics that have been

---

[1] Premier, Kwazulu-Natal & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1996 (1) SA 769 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1561 (CC), [1995] ZACC 10 ('Premier, KwaZulu-Natal').

[2] Ibid at para 49.

[3] Ibid at para 47.

[4] United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 17.

[5] Premier, Kwazulu-Natal (supra) at para 49.

[6] The foundational values are:

(a) Human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms.

(b) Non-racialism and non-sexism.

(c) Supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law.

(d) Universal adult suffrage, a national common voters roll, regular elections and a multi-party system of democratic government, to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness.

[7] In United Democratic Movement while not addressing the issue directly, the Constitutional Court appeared to reach a similar conclusion, but without using the basic structure doctrine. UDM (supra) at paras 18-20 and 75.

litigated thus far: public participation in the legislative process; and tagging of legislation.

As a preliminary note, failure to comply with the procedures discussed in § 17.3 will result in invalidity. We do not discuss these 'manner and form' provisions here in order to avoid duplication. It is enough to say that if they are not followed, the legislation will be invalid.

(a) Public Participation

According to FC s 59(1)(a), 'the National Assembly must facilitate public involvement in the legislative and other processes of the Assembly and its committees.' FC s 72(1)(a) imposes an identical duty on the NCOP, as does FC s 118(1)(a) for provincial legislatures. We refer to these three provisions collectively as 'the public involvement provisions'. Without doubt they pursue a laudable goal. But is it an enforceable constitutional obligation?

Yes. In 2005, Doctors for Life International — a group of medical doctors opposed to abortion — challenged the constitutionality of four acts related to health issues passed in 2004 and 2005: the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Amendment Act ('the Choice Act');[1] the Sterilisation Amendment Act;[2] the Traditional Health Practitioners Act ('the Traditional Health Act');[3] and the Dental Technicians Amendment Act ('the Dental Act').[4] They argued that the NCOP had failed in their duty to facilitate public involvement. In Doctors for Life[5] the Constitutional Court held that the failure to facilitate public involvement rendered both the Choice Act and the Traditional Health Act invalid.

The Constitutional Court has applied that holding in four subsequent cases: Matatiele II; Merafong; Poverty Alleviation Network; and Glenister II. We discuss the five participation cases in three parts. First, we discuss the preliminary issues of jurisdiction and the timing of the challenge. Next we consider the heart of the debate: the reasonableness standard the Court has set to determine whether the obligation has been met. We consider the views of both the majority and minority in Doctors for Life and then analyse how the standard has been applied in subsequent cases. Lastly, we provide an assessment of the current state of public participation doctrine and its prospects for future.

(i) Jurisdiction, standing and timing

The first question in Doctors for Life was whether the Constitutional Court had jurisdiction to consider the challenge as a Court of first instance. The Court's jurisdiction is addressed in detail elsewhere in this book.[6] Here we just outline the Court's the basic position. The Constitutional Court has, under FC

[1] Act 38 of 2004.
[2] Act 3 of 2005.
[3] Act 35 of 2004.
[4] Act 24 of 2004.
[5] Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC), [2006] ZACC 11 ('Doctors for Life').
[6] See S Seedorf 'Jurisdiction' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 4.

s 167(4)(e), exclusive jurisdiction to 'decide that Parliament … has failed to fulfil a constitutional obligation'. The Doctors for Life Court had to decide whether the public involvement provisions imposed a 'constitutional obligation' in terms of FC s 167(4)(e). Not every obligation imposed on Parliament is a 'constitutional obligation' under s 167(4)(e). Justice Ngcobo held that only obligations that concerned 'crucial political' questions should be reserved for the Constitutional Court. A crucial political issue would arise 'where the obligation requires Parliament to determine in the first place what is necessary to fulfil its obligation'.[1] The obligation to facilitate public involvement was precisely that sort of question and the Court therefore had exclusive jurisdiction to determine it.

In order to limit the potentially destabilising effect of its newly-minted doctrine, the Doctors for Life Court established two requirements for a party to have standing to bring a participation challenge: (1) the applicant must have 'sought and been denied an opportunity to be heard on the Bills'; and (2) the applicant must have 'launched his or her application for relief in this Court as soon as practicable after the Bills have been promulgated.'[2] As Ngcobo J explained: 'Rules of standing of this sort will prevent legislation being challenged … many years after the event by those who had no interest in making representations to Parliament at the time the legislation was enacted. … In my view, this restricted form of standing further reflects this Court's concern to protect the institutional integrity of Parliament, while at the same time seeking to ensure that the duty to facilitate public involvement is given adequate protection.'[3] In Doctors for Life and Matatiele II[4] the cases were brought timeously.

However, in Merafong, Poverty Alleviation Network and Glenister II, the government argued that the challenge had come too late. In Merafong, the legislation was initially passed in March 2006. It was then subject to a participation challenge in Matatiele II. While the residents of Merafong waited for the outcome of Matatiele II, they still waited almost a year before launching their participation challenge. While noting that the delay was 'troublesome', and reiterating the need for disputes to resolved speedily, the Court found the applicants' explanation sufficient.[5] In Poverty Alleviation Network, the Matatiele community was back in court to challenge the constitutional amendment which re-instated the law that they had successfully challenged in Matatiele II. However, the second time round they waited nearly nine months to challenge the legislation. They argued that the delay was caused by their attempts to resolve the matter through negotiations with the ANC and submissions to the Human Rights Commission.[6] For Nkabinde J, the

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 26.
[2] Ibid at para 216.
[3] Ibid at para 219.
[4] Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (2) 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC), [2006] ZACC 12 ('Matatiele II').
[5] Merafong Demarcation Forum & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2008 (5) SA 171 (CC), 2008 (10) BCLR 969 (CC), [2008] ZACC 10 ('Merafong') at para 15.
[6] Poverty Alleviation Network & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2010 (6) BCLR 520 (CC), [2010] ZACC 5 ('Poverty Alleviation Network') at para 26.

explanation was 'not entirely satisfactory.'[1] However, the Court did not decide whether the delay was so serious as to prevent the challenge since the Court in any event found against Matatiele's residents on substantive grounds. In Glenister II the applicant had delayed the challenge because the other grounds on which it sought to challenge the legislation would ordinarily be raised in the High Court.[2] The applicant only raised the public participation challenge together with its appeal from the High Court — a year and three months after the President signed the legislation. The Court unanimously held that the explanation was unacceptable and that this delay barred the claim.[3] Instead of approaching the High Court and the Constitutional Court separately, Glenister should have attempted to urge the Constitutional Court to consider his other claims together with the public participation challenge.[4]

While challenges should be brought early, they should not be brought too early. The Doctors for Life Court had to decide whether a challenge to Parliament's failure to facilitate public involvement could be brought before the legislative process was complete. We discuss the problem of bringing a challenge to parliamentary procedure too early elsewhere in this chapter, as it applies to all procedural challenges.[5] In short, except in exceptional circumstances, the challenge can only be brought after the President has signed the Bill and it has become an act.

(ii) The place of public participation in the South African democracy and the reasonableness enquiry

Doctors for Life provides a rich trove of thought on the complex nature of democracy in South Africa, and a paean to the value of civic participation. The Court describes South African democracy as being constituted by 'mutually-supportive' representative and participatory elements.[6] The majority of the Court held that this is implicit in the preamble to the Constitution and the founding values in FC s 1*(d)*. These provisions envisage a democracy where citizens delegate law-making power to elected representatives by participating in periodic elections and in turn the elected representatives must exercise this power in an accountable, responsive and open manner by facilitating public involvement in their governing processes. In Justice Ngcobo's words:

> General elections, the foundation of representative democracy, would be meaningless without massive participation by the voters. The participation by the public on a continuous basis provides vitality to the functioning of representative democracy. It encourages citizens of the country to be actively involved in public affairs, identify themselves with the institutions of government and become familiar with the laws as they are made. It enhances the civic dignity of those who participate by enabling their voices to be heard and taken account of. It promotes a spirit of democratic and pluralistic accommodation calculated to

[1] Poverty Alleviation Network (supra) at para 29.
[2] Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2011 (3) SA 347 (CC), [2011] ZACC 6 ('Glenister II').
[3] Ibid at para 28.
[4] Ibid at para 27.
[5] See §17.4 above
[6] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 115.

> produce laws that are likely to be widely accepted and effective in practice. It strengthens the legitimacy of legislation in the eyes of the people. Finally, because of its open and public character it acts as a counterweight to secret lobbying and influence peddling. Participatory democracy is of special importance to those who are relatively disempowered in a country like ours where great disparities of wealth and influence exist.[1]

In order to protect the participatory elements of our democracy, public involvement in the processes of Parliament are considered a fundamental right given effect by the positive obligations in the public involvement provisions.

In summing up the Court's account of the place of public participation in South Africa's conception of democracy, one of the authors has written elsewhere that:

> [Doctors for Life] signifies an intensive effort by the Constitutional Court to declare the place and meaning of public involvement in the legislative process within our conception of democracy. This was an exercise of contextual, purposive and historical interpretation of the Constitution. The position, which is now settled, is that our democracy embraces representative and participatory elements which are mutually supportive or at least in constructive tension with each other. This warrants a peculiarly constructive relationship between the government and the governed, where the people elect representatives who are in turn mandated to govern by guaranteeing meaningful consideration of the will of the people in the law-making process. This is constitutive of a right of members of the public to participate in the legislative process and the correlative duty on the concerned legislature to facilitate such public involvement. This is enforceable by the Constitutional Court using the reasonableness standard.[2]

It is against this background that the Court developed the meaning and the scope of the constitutional obligation to facilitate public involvement. The Court split on this question. The majority[3] would require Parliament to take reasonable measures to facilitate public involvement in the passage of each piece of legislation. The dissenters[4] would have limited the Court's role to considering whether Parliament had passed rules that could facilitate public involvement. We unpack the majority's decision in some detail, and then consider the minority's counter-arguments. Finally, we look at how the majority's reasonableness standard has been applied, and what it really means for public participation in Parliament.

(aa) The Doctors for Life majority

The majority construed 'facilitate' to mean that Parliament has a duty to 'promote', 'help forward' or 'make it easy or easier' for the public to participate in the legislatures' processes.[5] In short, the legislature must 'tak[e] steps to ensure that the public participate in the legislative process.'[6] The Court 'will consider what Parliament has

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 115.

[2] N Raboshakga 'The Adequacy of the Reasonableness Approach in Public Involvement Cases' LLM Research Report, University of the Witwatersrand (2009, on file with authors) 17.

[3] Ngcobo J, joined by Langa CJ, Moseneke DCJ, Madala J, Mokgoro J, Nkabinde J, O'Regan J and Sachs J. Sachs J also wrote a concurring judgment.

[4] Yacoob J wrote the chief dissent, joined by Skweyiya J. Van der Westhuizen J wrote a separate dissent, largely supporting Yacoob J.

[5] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 119.

[6] Ibid at para 120.

done in [each] case.'[1] Merely passing rules to permit or facilitate public involvement would not be sufficient.

What standard would the Court use to evaluate what Parliament had done? The majority concluded that 'reasonableness' was the standard of review that adequately discharged the underlying purpose of the public involvement provisions. 'Reasonableness,' Justice Ngcobo explained 'is an objective standard which is sensitive to the facts and circumstances of a particular case. "…[C]ontext is all important."'[2] The Court noted that 'reasonableness' is 'used as a measure throughout the Constitution' including, most obviously, as the yardstick for whether the state has fulfilled its positive obligation to realise socio-economic rights.[3]

Ultimately, Parliament must provide a meaningful and effective opportunity for public participation in the law-making process.[4] In determining whether the legislature has done enough, 'the Court must balance, on the one hand, the need to respect parliamentary institutional autonomy, and on the other, the right of the public to participate in public affairs.'[5]

In that vein, while stressing that 'Parliament and the provincial legislatures must be given a significant measure of discretion in determining how best to fulfil their duty to facilitate public involvement,'[6] the Court also gave fairly specific guidelines on how the legislatures' attempts to facilitate participation would be judged. To begin, the Court held that there are 'at least two aspects of the duty to facilitate public involvement': (a) 'the duty to provide meaningful opportunities for public participation in the law-making process'; and (b) 'the duty to take measures to ensure that people have the ability to take advantage of the opportunities provided.'[7] The first involves the traditional acts of inviting written representations, holding public hearings, or any other structures that provide a space for people to be heard. The second duty acknowledges the legacy of apartheid that left the majority of the population without the 'education, financial resources, access to knowledge and other areas that are crucial for effective participation in the law-making process. Merely to allow public participation in the law-making process is, in the prevailing circumstances, not enough. More is required.'[8] Steps to close this gap could include 'road shows, regional workshops, radio programs

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 146.

[2] Ibid at para 127 quoting Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC), [2004] ZACC 11 at para 49.

[3] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 126. The Court also identified the sections which permit legislatures to take 'reasonable measures' to regulate access to their hearings. FC ss 59(1)(b), 72(1)(b) and 118(1)(b). Other obvious uses of 'reasonableness' in the Constitution are: the guarantee of 'reasonable' administrative action (s 33); and the general limitations clause which only permits limitations of rights that are 'reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society' (s 36).

[4] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 129 ('In the end … the duty to facilitate public involvement will often require Parliament and the provincial legislatures to provide citizens with a meaningful opportunity to be heard in the making of the laws that will govern them. Our Constitution demands no less.' Ibid at para 145.)

[5] Ibid at para 146.

[6] Ibid at para 124.

[7] Ibid at para 129.

[8] Ibid at para 130.

and publications aimed at educating and informing the public about ways to influence Parliament'.[1]

Trying to put a bit more meat on the bones of the 'reasonableness' test, Ngcobo J listed the following factors as relevant to determining the reasonableness of a legislature's acts in any case: (a) 'rules, if any, adopted by Parliament to facilitate public participation'; (b) 'the nature of the legislation under consideration'; (c) 'whether the legislation needed to be enacted urgently'; (d) 'what Parliament has assessed as being the appropriate method';[2] and (e) 'practicalities such as time and expense, which relate to the efficiency of the law-making process'.[3] Of course, the best explication of what sort of efforts will meet the reasonableness bar is to look at how the Court has dealt with the cases that have come its way.

Justice Ngcobo also dealt with the constraints imposed by the doctrine of separation of powers when reviewing compliance with the constitutional obligations of Parliament. He held that legislatures 'have broad discretion to determine how best to fulfil their constitutional obligation to facilitate public involvement in a given case [which 'may be fulfilled in different ways and is open to innovation on the part of the legislatures'], so long as they act reasonably'.[4] His approach appropriately views the doctrine of the separation of powers as rights enforcement. The Justice's approach structures the analysis as follows: (1) the true meaning of the Constitution is first construed: (2) the Court determines the minimum way to give it effect, and (3) Parliament is allowed to choose the best way to achieve the constitutional goal while observing the minimum content defined. The majority emphatically rejected the minority's fears that judicial review of the conduct of the legislature in terms of a broad reasonableness test is 'too intrusive into the domain of the legislature'.[5]

To summarise, the majority held: (i) a court must examine whether public participation has been facilitated with regard to each piece of legislation; (ii) the NA, the NCOP and the provincial legislatures all bear an obligation with regard to each piece of legislation; (iii) the steps the legislatures take must be reasonable; (iv) what is reasonable will depend on the legislation in question; and (v) the Court will show appropriate deference to the legislatures in 'determining how best to fulfil their duty to facilitate public involvement'.

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 132. It is unclear from the judgment whether a challenge to a specific law can raise these broader, education-related duties. Can a general failure to hold road shows and radio programs result in the invalidity of a piece of legislation? Generally, we do not think so. In our view, challenges to legislation will almost always rely on the first duty, not the second. A case could be brought to force Parliament to do more to fulfil the second part of the duty, but it would aim at a mandamus to force Parliament to change its ways, not the invalidity of a law. There may be some cases where the importance of the legislation is so great that a failure to educate about the specific possibilities to participate would make Parliament's acts unreasonable. But we do not believe the Court requires Parliament to operate a separate education campaign for each act it passes.

[2] Ibid at para 146.

[3] Ibid at para 128.

[4] Ibid at paras 123 and 124 and Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others SA 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC), [2006] ZACC 12 ('Matatiele II') at para 67.

[5] Raboshakga (supra) at 28 and 40.

(bb) The Doctors for Life dissents

Yacoob, Van der Westhuizen and Skweyiya JJ took a very different approach regarding the place and the fundamentality of public involvement in our democracy. Although their view did not carry the day, they offer a compelling argument based on text and principle. Ultimately, experience may suggest that their approach — particularly the somewhat cynicial realism of Van der Westhuizen J — more accurately depicts the role that the Court can play in promoting participation in the legislative process.

Yacoob J's departure from the majority's opinion can be split into three parts. First, he has a philosophical disagreement about the role that participation should play in a democracy, and tells a very different story about South Africa's history:[1]

> Citizens of this country cast their votes in favour of political parties represented in the National Assembly and the provincial legislatures. … It is these elected representatives that govern the people and their representative activities are activities of the people. … To undermine these representatives is to undermine the political will of the people and to negate their choice at free and fair elections. … Constitutionally speaking, it is the people of our country who, through their elected representatives pass laws.
>
> …
>
> The oppression and exploitation of people in apartheid was not the result of the absence of public participation in government processes in the sense in which it is used in the Constitution. Oppression and exploitation during apartheid was the result of the painful fact that the majority of people had no vote and were not represented in Parliament. … The failure to accord due weight to the actions and decisions of the representatives of the people of South Africa would demean the very struggle for democracy. … [I]t would, in my view, require the clearest language to justify the construction of any 'public involvement' provision to mean that these elected representatives exercising the power of the people consequent upon their vote cannot pass a law unless they have public hearings or give the public an opportunity to make written or oral submissions before that law can be validly passed.[2]

Yacoob J sees the type of participation at issue in Doctor for Life as secondary to the primary means of participation in a democracy: voting and standing for office. The subsidiary form of democracy should not be permitted to undermine the primary. His reading of the Constitution impacts on his criticism and rejection of the reasonableness standard.

Second, he rejects the majority's 'reasonableness' standard for public participation challenges. There is nothing in the text of the Constitution to suggest that the legislature must act reasonably. Indeed, FC s 72(1)(a), which is the source of the obligation to facilitate public involvement, does not make any reference to reasonableness. Instead, the term 'reasonable' is only used in FC s 72(1)(b) and FC s 72(2). FC s 72(1)(b) allows the legislature to take 'reasonable measures' to regulate public access and search people attending NCOP sittings. Under

[1] For a discussion of the different perceptions of history in Doctors for Life, see M Bishop 'Transforming Memory Transforming' in W le Roux & K Van Marle (eds) Law Memory and the Legacy of Apartheid: Ten Years after AZAPO v President of South Africa (2007) 31, 41-44.

[2] Doctors for Life (supra) at paras 292 and 294. Van der Westhuizen J offers a similar justification. Ibid at para 244.5.

FC s 72(2) the Council may exclude the media or the public if it is 'reasonable and justifiable'. In Yacoob J's view, the fact that these two sub-sections use the term reasonable, while s 72(1)(a) does not, is compelling textual evidence that reasonableness is not an appropriate standard.[1] He also dismisses the assertion that the phrase 'to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness' in FC s 1*(d)* has any relation to public participation in the law-making process. He calims that it only relates to 'a universal franchise, a national voters' roll, regular elections and multi-party system of democracy'.[2]

Third, Justice Yacoob stresses that '[t]he process by which legislation is passed … must be clear, specific and sufficiently comprehensible to enable legislators to know exactly what steps they need to pass any legislation.'[3] The danger of the 'reasonableness' standard is that it is vague and creates uncertainty about whether legislation is valid or not. While this is a legitimate concern, in our view the majority's approach will not introduce undue doubt. For one, there is a strict time limit on when participation challenges can be brought. Moreover, the Court's attitude in applying the standard after Doctors for Life has tended to be somewhat deferential. It is unlikely that a court will find that a legislature that honestly attempted to facilitate public involvement has failed to do so. This prediction has been borne out: Since the Court announced the reasonableness standard in Doctors for Life, and reaffirmed it Matatiele II, all three public participation challenges have failed.

Ultimately, the dissenters preferred an interpretation of the Constitution that reads the obligation to facilitate public involvement in the legislative process and the obligation to make rules with due regard to public involvement together as narrowly requiring Parliament to adopt rules which make provision for public involvement.[4] Accordingly, Parliament would only default on its constitutional obligations if it adopted rules which made no such provision or failed to adopt any rules.[5]

Justice Van der Westhuizen's judgment largely supports and re-iterates the sentiments expressed by Justice Yacoob. But he also made the following prescient observation:

> I do not necessarily know how I might respond if members of the legislature decide to pursue the policies of their political party and in the process reject or ignore submissions made to them by a member of the public, which I may regard as eminently more reasonable. If the will of the Parliamentary majority will in the end mostly prevail in any event, and all that is required is to 'involve' the public by for example mechanically holding public hearings for every piece of legislation — or to make sure that hearings are not promised as in this case — participatory democracy would appear to be quite cosmetic and empty, in spite of any idealistic and romantic motivation for promoting it.[6]

Although the dissenters ultimately lost the fight, their arguments for a more limited judicial role in ensuring public participation have continued to haunt the Court in

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 317.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid at para 316.
[4] This requires that FC ss 72(1)(a) and 70(1)(b) be read together in relation to the NCOP; and FC ss 59(1)(a) and 57(1)(b) in relation to the National Assembly. See Doctors for Life (supra) at para 322.
[5] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 325.
[6] Ibid at para 244 (10).

its application of the reasonableness standard. They also show that the majority had to manipulate the text of the Constitution to establish the strong obligation to facilitate involvement in every legislative exercise. As we discuss in more detail later, the dissenters also tacitly adopt a different answer to the difficult question of what role the judiciary should play in regulating Parliament's internal processes.[1]

On the other hand, the dissenters fail to recognise the Constitution's 'deep principle of democracy'. This principle includes mutually-supportive representative and participatory elements.[2] Their drier account of South African democracy does not seem to fit as well with the aspirational and transformative nature of the Constitution. In addition, Yacoob J's interpretation of history and its relevance is debatable. The assertion that the oppression and exploitation of people in apartheid was limited to black people's disenfranchisement is simply judicial notice taken too far. It ignores the fact that even when black people did not vote they also did not participate in law-making in any other manner. It also ignores other patterns of discrimination; colonial and apartheid policies were hostile to women and homosexual people. Even more importantly, in our view, it undermines the corrective nature of the Constitution, which is to prevent recurrence of en masse disregard of sections of society without them having inevitably to approach courts for redress.

Ultimately, the application of the reasonableness standard will demonstrate whether the majority adopted a sustainable approach.

(cc) Application of reasonableness standard

The Doctors for Life test has now been applied in five cases. In two cases, the legislation has been set aside. We consider all five cases in order to try and draw some lessons about the impact and future of Doctors for Life.

(1) Doctors for Life

We begin with the different results in respect of the public involvement challenges to the legislation under consideration in Doctors for Life. First, we must note that there was no complaint about the processes followed in the NA. Doctors for Life International complained about the lack of participation in the NCOP and the provincial legislatures. The NCOP had decided that, considering the importance of, and public interest in, the Bills, public hearings should be held for the Choice Act and the Traditional Health Act. The Choice Act concerned abortion, always a hot-button issue. The Traditional Health Act had also generated significant public interest and controversy. In addition, the NCOP determined that the hearings should be held by the provincial legislatures, not by the NCOP itself. Justice Ngcobo noted that it was both more practical and more effective for the provinces to hold public hearings across the country than for the NCOP to do so.[1] However, taking the decision was not enough — the hearings would actually have to occur to meet the NCOP's obligation.

[1] See §17.7 below.

[2] See T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 10: see also Raboshakga (supra) at 13-17.

In the case of the Traditional Health Act, only three provinces held hearings or invited written submissions. The participation in the Choice Act was even more paltry. Although four provinces wanted to hold public hearings, only Limpopo in fact did so. Justice Ngcobo noted that several provinces had wished to hold public hearings, but had been unable to do so because of the time constraints imposed by the NCOP's legislative timetable. While acknowledging that time was a relevant consideration, he held that 'the temptation to cut down on public involvement must be resisted. Problems encountered in speeding up a sluggish timetable do not ordinarily constitute a basis for inferring that inroads into the appropriate degree of public involvement are reasonable. The timetable must be subordinated to the rights guaranteed in the Constitution, and not the rights to the timetable.'[2]

The Court in Doctors for Life concluded that, given the importance of the legislation and that the NCOP itself had decided that hearings were necessary, the NCOP had acted unreasonably. Within the framework the Court had created, the decision was fairly easy. The Court did not have to impose its own view of what was appropriate. The Court could simply tell the NCOP that it had failed to follow the process that it had deemed necessary.

(2) Matatiele II

The Court was able to perform a similar manoeuvre in Matatiele II. The legislation concerned the alteration of provincial boundaries, specifically the boundary between KwaZulu-Natal and the Eastern Cape. Accordingly, under FC s 74(8), each provincial legislature had to approve the amendment.[3] The decision was based on each provincial legislature's duty under FC s 118(1)(a), not the general duty of the NCOP under FC s 72(1)(a). The Eastern Cape held hearings in seven affected areas and invited submissions from relevant stakeholders. The Court therefore concluded that it had fulfilled its obligation.[4] On the contrary, the KwaZulu-Natal legislature held no hearings and did not invite written submissions. Considering the impact the Bill would have on the province's citizens, and the fact that many within the legislature and the NCOP had called for public hearings, the Court found this failure unreasonable.[5]

By contrast to the big issues at stake in Matatiele II and the two Doctors for Life Bills discussed above, the Dental Act was somewhat inconsequential. Considering its lesser importance, and the fact that it had generated no public interest, the NCOP did not propose public hearings or invite written submissions for the Dental Act. Ngcobo J agreed that, considering the mundane nature of the Bill, it was reasonable not to attempt to solicit further public interest that did not exist.[6]

---

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at paras 160-161.
[2] Ibid at para 194.
[3] See §17.3*(a)* above.
[4] Ibid at paras 70-73.
[5] Ibid at paras 76-84.
[6] Ibid at para 192.

(3) Merafong

In hindsight, Doctors for Life and Matatiele II were relatively easy applications of the reasonableness standard. Merafong presented a much more difficult question.[1] The Merafong Demarcation Forum ('MDF') challenged the same constitutional amendment at issue in Matatiele. This challenge concerned incorporating the whole of the Merafong municipality, the boundaries of which fell mostly in Gauteng, into the North West Province. The twist was that the Gauteng Provincial Legislature ('GPL') had in fact held a public hearing on the Bill, taken account of the community's view and sent a negotiating mandate to the NCOP recommending that the legislation be amended to keep Merafong in Gauteng, thus seemingly having been persuaded during the participation process. However, Gauteng's NCOP delegation was informed that they could not propose amendments to the Bill — they had to either accept it or reject it.[2] Faced with that choice, the GPL reversed course and instructed its delegates to the NCOP to support the Bill.

The MDF had three reasons for alleging that the participation was nonetheless unreasonable. First, they complained that the decision had been taken by the ANC's National Executive Committee, and that the GPL was therefore not open to persuasion. Van der Westhuizen J rejected this argument for lack of evidence. It did not explicitly decide if a claim of this nature might succeed with sufficient evidence. The Court intimates that it could: 'Public involvement cannot be meaningful in the absence of a willingness to consider all views expressed by the public.'[3] If an applicant could show that legislators were not willing to consider the public's representations because they were committed to implementing party policy, it is possible that the participation would not be 'meaningful'. However, that will always be nearly impossible to prove.

Second, MDF submitted that participation was not 'meaningful' because the MDF's desires did not prevail. The Court easily rejected this argument. 'There is no authority', the Court wrote, 'for the proposition that the views expressed by the public are binding on the legislature if they are in direct conflict with the policies of Government. Government certainly can be expected to be responsive to the needs and wishes of minorities or interest groups, but our constitutional system of government would not be able to function if the legislature were bound by these views.'[4]

Finally, in oral argument, Justice Sachs suggested that the GPL should have returned to the Merafong community after discovering that it could not propose the required amendment to explain its change of heart as well as the limitations of the legislative process. The majority rejected this proposal. While it may have been 'desirable' for the GPL to have explained themselves to the people of Mera-

[1] For a full discussion of Merafong, see M Bishop 'Vampire or Prince? The Listening Constitution and Merafong Demarcation Forum & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others' (2009) 2 Constitutional Court Review 313.

[2] See §17.3*(a)* above for a discussion on why the conclusion that provincial delegations cannot propose amendments to s 74(8) Bills — which the Court supported — is wrong. See also, Bishop 'Vampire or Prince?' (supra) at 345-347.

[3] Merafong (supra) at para 51.

[4] Ibid at para 50.

fong, it was not constitutionally required. 'If they had gone back to Merafong to explain the situation to the people,' Justice Van der Westhuizen hypothesised, 'a better understanding might have been fostered, but it is unlikely that the majority would have been sufficiently impressed by the explanation to change their strongly held views.'[1] A further danger loomed that 'continuing discussion which does not result in a changed outcome, could strengthen possible perceptions that the consultation was not meaningful.'[2]

Sachs J would have upheld this complaint. Although 'participatory democracy does not require constant consultation by the Legislature with the public',[3] in the unique circumstances of this case, further engagement was required. He held that 'when expectations of candour and open dealing have been established and certain unambiguous commitments have been made', a change of commitment without further consultation can be disruptive of the constitutionally-required relationship of dialogue between the legislature and members of the public.[4] Only continued dialogue would have satisfied the standard of reasonableness and the lack thereof violated the primary purpose of public involvement in law-making.[5] The 'abrupt about-turn' violated the 'civic dignity' of participants; it 'denied any spirit of accommodation and produced a total lack of legitimacy for the process and its outcome in the eyes of the people'; and it gave rise to a strong perception that the GPL in the end merely rubber-stamped a political decision and that the public involvement process was a sham.[6] Considering the importance of the legislation and its impact on the people of Merafong, it was unreasonable not to engage in further discussion.

(4) Poverty Alleviation Network

Poverty Alleviation Network[7] possesses a strong family resemblance to Merafong. The case was the third time the residents of Matatiele approached the Constitutional Court to try and remain in KwaZulu-Natal. After they successfully set aside the Constitution Twelfth Amendment Act, Parliament passed another constitutional amendment (the Constitution Thirteenth Amendment Act) again altering provincial boundaries to place Matatiele in the Eastern Cape. Parliament learnt its lesson, and this time round, Nkabinde J held, 'there [could] be no doubt that public participation was indeed facilitated by both Parliament and the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature.'[8] The NA and the NCOP invited written submissions and the NCOP held hearings. The provincial legislatures of both provinces held separate and joint hearings where opponents of the legislation were allowed to freely

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 59.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid at para 293.
[4] Ibid at para 291.
[5] Ibid at para 292. See Doctors for Life (supra) at para 115. Sachs J came to this conclusion upon taking cognisance of the consciousness on the part of the Legislature's Portfolio Committee that a further consultation with the community may be required but without explanation, they in fact do not do so. Merafong (supra) at para 289.
[6] Merafong (supra) at para 292.
[7] 2010 (6) BCLR 520 (CC), [2010] ZACC 5.
[8] Ibid at para 38.

express their views. The vast majority again opposed moving Matatiele to the Eastern Cape. Nonetheless, the KwaZulu-Natal Legislature again assented to the alteration of its borders.

The applicants acknowledged the legislature's position, but still contended that the Legislature had not acted reasonably. First, they argued that they should have been consulted as a 'discrete group'. This argument was based on the following statement in Matatiele II: 'The more discrete and identifiable the potentially affected section of the population, and the more intense the possible effect on their interests, the more reasonable it would be to expect the Legislature to be astute to ensure that the potentially affected section of the population is given a reasonable opportunity to have a say.'[1] This statement does not mean, Justice Nkabinde held, that 'when seeking to involve an identifiable and discrete group, participation of only this group, to the exclusion of all others, is required.'[2] It merely requires that the group, like all others, be afforded a reasonable opportunity to state its views.

Second, they contended that the NA should have accepted oral, in addition to written, submissions. The Court held that the applicants had had numerous other opportunities to voice their concerns. In addition, 'in the context of a constitutional amendment that affects provinces, public participation is facilitated at various levels.'[3] The applicants had made oral submissions to the provincial legislatures.

Third, the Matatiele residents made a similar argument to that made by the residents of Merafong: although they were heard, the decision to move Matatiele had already been taken and 'the public hearings were a formalistic sham'.[4] While allowing that 'lawmakers should keep an open mind and consider the input by the populace',[5] the Court gave the same answer it gave the residents of Merafong: 'Although due cognisance should be taken of the views of the populace, it does not mean that Parliament should necessarily be swayed by public opinion in its ultimate decision. Differently put, public involvement and what it advocates do not necessarily have to determine the ultimate legislation itself.'[6] The record of the participation indicated that the legislature had listened to its constituents concerns, but had ultimately rejected them.

In addition to its public participation challenges, the residents argued that moving them to the Eastern Cape was irrational because it was not related to a legitimate government purpose. The Poverty Alleviation Network Court rehearsed the argument made in Merafong: abolishing cross-boundary municipalities is a legitimate government purpose. That end is achieved irrespective of whether Matatiele is placed in KwaZulu-Natal or the Eastern Cape and it is not for the Court to second guess the legislature where an end can be achieved in two

[1] Matatiele II (supra) at para 68, quoted in Poverty Alleviation Network (supra) at para 52.
[2] Poverty Alleviation Network (supra) at para 53.
[3] Ibid at para 58.
[4] Ibid at para 59.
[5] Ibid at para 60.
[6] Ibid at para 62.

ways. We think there are limits to this reasoning.[1] For now we just want to draw attention to the relationship between rationality review and public participation. Doctrinally, it makes sense to treat them as separate, unrelated challenges. However, in substance, a great deal connects them. As one of the authors has argued:

> rationality is … connected to deliberation and participation. How carefully the Court is willing to scrutinise the rationality of government action determines the outer boundaries of the quality of deliberation the Constitution demands. The more exacting the Court is, the closer it pushes the legislative (and executive) branch to the ideal of deliberation where only public reasons count and the decision-maker acts only after considering all views. The less demanding the Court's review, the more space it provides for unprincipled decision-making based on private interests and for government to take decisions without listening to alternatives, whether from political parties, interest groups or the general public.[2]

It helps to understand the Court's approach in both Merafong and Poverty Alleviation Network to see this link between rationality and participation.

(5) Glenister II

As we discuss elsewhere, Glenister II concerned a challenge to legislation replacing one corruption-fighting organ with another. Although the primary motivation behind the challenge was a concern that the new body was not sufficiently independent, one of the grounds for the challenge was that Parliament had failed to facilitate public involvement. The applicant acknowledged that Parliament had held public hearings, but argued that the Bill should not have been treated as urgent. The law was a result of a resolution taken at the ANC's December 2007 Polokwane Conference. It was approved by Cabinet in April 2008, hearings were held in the NA in August and September, and in the provinces in September and October. The law was passed on 23 October 2008, and signed by the President on 27 January 2009. Ngcobo CJ did not directly engage the urgency complaint, but by looking at the time that was spent on public hearings concluded that Parliament had facilitated public involvement and that the applicant had been given a fair hearing.[3] The lesson seems to be that self-imposed urgency is not a problem when Parliament still acts reasonably to involve the public.

(iii) Assessment

The previous section described the judicial application of the public participation rule. In this section, we evaluate the Court's approach, and consider its future.[4]

When it was decided, Doctors for Life seemed to be a brave decision that would force the legislature to take the concerns of ordinary people to heart. That view

[1] See M Bishop 'Vampire or Prince? The Listening Constitution and Merafong Demarcation Forum v President of the Republic of South Africa' (2009) 2 Constitutional Court Review 313, 343-345 and M Bishop 'Rationality is Dead! Long Live Rationality! Saving Rational Basis Review' in D Bilchitz & S Woolman (eds) Is This Seat Taken? Conversations at the Bar, the Bench and the Academy (2011).

[2] Bishop 'Vampire or Prince' (supra) at 334.

[3] Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2011 (3) SA 347 (CC), [2011] ZACC 6, ('Glenister II') at paras 35-38.

[4] This section draws, in part, from Bishop 'Vampire or Prince' (supra) and Raboshakga (supra).

was confirmed by Matatiele II: a decision that over-turned a constitutional amendment no less. However, Merafong and Poverty Alleviation Network starkly illustrate the emergence of the initial fears of minority judges in the rest of the Court and points to what are seemingly very real limits of the participation doctrine.

Doctors for Life gave effect to the deep principle of democracy envisioned in the Constitution. This principle possesses supportive, representative, and participatory elements. In turn, according to the Doctors for Life Court, this deep principle must inform a reasonableness standard characterised by a meaningful and effective facilitation of public involvement by Parliament. Justice Ngcobo's approach positions the doctrine of separation of powers in a manner that does not undermine the deep principle of democracy.[1] So the Doctors for Life Court hopes.

The majority decision in Merafong notably de-emphasised the participatory element of our democracy in determining the margins of what constituted reasonable facilitation of public involvement in the circumstances of this case. Van der Westhuizen J found that, notwithstanding the subsequent disregard for their views, a single public hearing afforded the people of Merafong a real and meaningful opportunity to be heard. The message from the Merafong majority is that politicians hold the upper hand in our democracy. That conclusion reflects the same vision of democracy that Yacoob J endorsed in his Doctors for Life dissent. And yet in Doctors for Life, the majority had so eloquently repudiated Yacoob J's position in favour of one that placed representative and participatory democracy on a more equal footing. Although the rhetoric remains the same, one is left with the feeling that either something changed or that Merafong is merely on aberation.

Not only does Merafong undermine the deep principle of democracy pronounced in Doctors for Life, it turns what seemed to be a substantive duty to involve people in decision-making into a procedural, tick-the-boxes requirement that can be met without ever actually considering the merits of people's submissions. This pathology manifests in two ways.

First, the majority of the Court in Merafong holds the view that where a single public hearing in which interested persons had an opportunity to express their views has been held in good faith, the obligation to facilitate public involvement is fulfilled.[2] The conclusion by Van der Westhuizen J that an ongoing dialogue between interested members of the public and the legislature is not required by previous jurisprudence of the Court is questionable. In Doctors for Life and Matatiele II, the Court's account of what reasonable facilitation of public involvement in the legislative process entails that there be 'a meaningful and effective opportunity for public participation in the law-making process'. Depending on the circumstances of the matter at issue, reasonableness will entail 'a continuum [ranging] from

[1] See Raboshakga (supra) at 40.

[2] Merafong (supra) at para 59 (Van der Westhuizen J held: 'In all probability little would have been achieved by another round of exchanging views, other than to inform and perhaps educate the community. Whereas speculation about the likely outcome of further consultation is not ultimately decisive, the fact is that the community had a proper opportunity to air their views. The previous decisions of this Court, on which the applicants rely, do not require an ongoing dialogue.' (our emphasis)).

providing information and building awareness, to partnering in decision-making'.[1] Surely, 'partnering in decision-making' potentially requires an ongoing dialogue between the legislature and interested members of the public where the legislature explains its response to the community's concerns and seeks further feedback? The question the Court ought to have answered is whether the circumstances of the case required a bare minimum of merely providing a forum for the community to air its views, or a more substantive, ongoing dialogue with the community.[2]

Second, while the Court states in both Merafong and Poverty Alleviation Network that legislatures must act with an open mind, as a practical matter in most cases it will be virtually impossible to prove that legislators were not open to persuasion. There were good reasons in both cases to suspect that the provincial legislators were simply taking orders from their political superiors, yet the Court accepted their assurance that they merely came to a different policy conclusion than their constituents. The Court was probably right to take this course — absent very strong evidence, it would be imprudent for a court to find that legislators had failed to fulfil their constitutional obligation to consider the views of the people. The probability is that such strong evidence will seldom be forthcoming.[3]

If we are correct in this assertion, then we are left with a situation where all the legislature need do to fulfil its duty is perform the formal function of holding public hearings or inviting written submissions. Whether those acts have any potential to influence the legislation is irrelevant. This outcome is precisely what Van der Westhuizen predicted in his Doctors for Life dissent:

> If the will of the Parliamentary majority will in the end mostly prevail in any event, and all that is required is to 'involve' the public by for example mechanically holding public hearings for every piece of legislation — or to make sure that hearings are not promised as in this case — participatory democracy would appear to be quite cosmetic and empty, in spite of any idealistic and romantic motivation for promoting it.[4]

Now that the participation cases have largely run their course, we appear to be left with a doctrine that is 'quite cosmetic and empty'. Skweyiya J, whose views were concurred in by Yacoob J and Van der Westhuizen J, recognises this disquieting possibility in his concurrence in Merafong. For him, the Court has no role to play in the differences between the legislature and members of the public in the process of deciding what is right and wrong.[5] 'While the Constitutional Court is the highest court in the land, it cannot and should not be seen as a panacea.'[6] If politicians act discourteously, disrespectfully or dishonestly, voters should hold them

[1] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 129. See Matatiele II (supra) at paras 54 and 97.

[2] See Raboshakga (supra) at 34-35.

[3] But see Mlokoti v Amathole District Municipality & Another 2009 (6) SA 354 (E)(The Court invalidated a decision by the Municipal Council to appoint a municipal manager. The judgment rested, in part, on a letter by the Mayor to the head of the Regional ANC Executive Committee acknowledging that the Council had ignored the appointment process and recommendations and acted solely on the orders of the ANC.)

[4] Doctors for Life (supra) at para 244(10).

[5] Merafong (supra) at 306.

[6] Ibid at para 307.

accountable in periodic elections.[1] This tilts the scale almost entirely in favour of representative democracy and away from participatory democracy.

Defenders of the Court could proffer four arguments that identify some substance in our public participation doctrine post-Merafong. The Court in Doctors for Life initially crafted a strong approach to participation and the possibilities of the Doctors for Life approach might redeem the current, less hopeful position.

First, they could argue that there really was no workable alternative. Requiring ongoing engagement or inquiring too deeply into the motives of legislators is neither practically workable nor theoretically desirable. That high level of court involvement would place too heavy a burden on legislators and courts and would vitiate the separation of powers doctrine. There is certainly something to this — courts should be careful not to take over the role of legislators, or to make the business of legislating so complicated or uncertain that legislators cannot pass laws efficiently. Yet, we do not believe the approach proposed by Justice Sachs would have resulted in such an outcome. Sachs J was very careful to note that the obligation to return to the community depended on the circumstances of the case. It is possible that, as Van der Westhuizen argued, continuing dialogue would not have made any practical difference. But it would have recognised the importance of participatory governance and demonstrated respect for the citizens of Merafong. As it would only arise occasionally, and would be fairly limited in scope, we believe Sachs J identified a happy medium that does not result in judicial overreach

Even if it did, there is a weaker option that would have improved the position: reason-giving.[2] Legislators need not go back and engage with the community in further hearings if they reject their views, but they should provide reasons for rejecting the main submissions made by the public. The members of a committee that conduct a public participation process should, presumably, write a report for the legislature on what submissions were made, and why they were accepted or rejected. Requiring that a similar document be made easily available to those who made the submissions does not seem like an undue burden. The advantage of reason-giving is that it holds the lawmakers directly accountable for their decisions and forces them to actively listen. They cannot simply go through the motions; they must provide reasons that the public might find acceptable. If they cannot do so, the voters will know that there is some other reason why their suggestions were rejected.

Second, what if the staunch adherence to separation of powers in Merafong is momentary and will only be applied in certain cases that are too politically sensi-

[1] Merafong (supra) at para 308 ('A democracy such as ours provides a powerful method for voters to hold politicians accountable when they engage in bad or dishonest politics: regular, free and fair elections.') The majority judgment also records a similar sentiment. Van der Westhuizen J expressed that 'politicians, who are perceived to disrespect their voters or fail to fulfil promises without explanation, should be held accountable [through] the democratic system [provided for by] regular elections.' See Merafong at para 60.

[2] For a fuller discussion of this option, see Bishop 'Vampire or Prince?' (supra) at 340-342.

tive? Relying on Theunis Roux's analysis of the decision of the Constitutional Court in UDM,[1] Raboshakga has argued as follows:

> Without having adequately recognized the deep principle of democracy and the nature of the proposed amendment and its circumstantial impact on the Merafong community, the majority could not set a minimum content for reasonableness that met the meaningfulness requirement. Similarly, the invocation of the separation of powers was also misplaced in the Court's mistaken methodology.
>
> … .
>
> The failure by the majority to follow precedent without offering a viable alternative approach suggests an unwarranted reluctance to contradict the Gauteng Legislature's political decision finally to support the incorporation of Merafong into North West. It may be inferred from the Court's attitude in this regard that it was applying the meta-principle of deferring to [politicians] in politically sensitive cases. Accordingly the Merafong decision is … not to be seen as a rejection of the developments in Doctors for Life International and Matatiele II, but as a once-off compromise of principle in what was clearly a politically sensitive case. After all, a political solution was found in this dispute upon further lobbying of politicians by the community of Merafong.[2]

This passage was written before the Court had decided Poverty Alleviation Network and thus did not consider whether the same argument could apply to both cases. The merit of Raboshakga's argument cannot be established until the Court decides one or more participation cases involving different circumstances in future.

The third defence of Merafong is that, even if it is purely procedural, it is better than nothing. Even if legislators begin the process with no intention of changing their views, they may nonetheless be convinced or enlightened by the views of the public. As Czapinskiy and Manjoo note: 'It may be difficult … for legislators to listen to people as the decision requires and not take their views into account, at least to some degree. By listening, legislators may learn about the lives of people different from themselves. They may open the door to understanding and empathy.'[3] This is undoubtedly true, and there is no doubt that a procedural right is better than no right at all. But a substantive right is better.

---

[1] United Democratic Movement (supra). See T Roux 'Democracy' in Woolman & Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) at § 10-69. Roux submits that:

'[UDM] cannot be said to have altered the more extended principle discernible in the entire constitutional text. By declining to engage with the substantive values underpinning multi-party democracy, UDM does not stand for a countervailing interpretation of the democratic principle, but for an independent principle of judicial deference in politically sensitive cases, such as those involving the design of the electoral system. Whatever one thinks of the correctness of UDM, therefore, it cannot be said to impact on the principle of democracy. Rather, UDM stands for the meta-principle that where the principle of democracy and the principle of judicial deference in politically sensitive cases conflict, the latter principle must prevail. As it so happens, that part of the UDM decision strikes one as intuitively wrong, but it is not necessary to make a case for that intuition here. It is sufficient to conclude that the statement of the principle of democracy discernible in the constitutional text need not be altered in order to accommodate UDM.'

[2] Raboshakga (supra).

[3] S Czapanskiy & R Manjoo 'The Right of Public Participation in the Law-Making Process and the Role of Legislature in the Promotion of this Right' (2008) 19 Duke Journal of Comparative and International Law 1 at 19.

The fourth defence is the most complicated. One of the current authors has argued that Merafong needs to be understood in the context of the different types of participation open to the public.[1] Citizens can participate in public affairs outside of formal hearings and requests for submissions. They can march, protest, write petitions and use the media and social networks to get their point across to government and their fellow citizens. Such radical participation is quite consciously contemplated by our Constitution.[2] Moreover,the history of the downfall of apartheid and the recent revolutions in North Africa and the Middle East demonstrate its power. Participation also happens in a more mutual way — citizens engaging with government (normally at a local level) to solve shared problems. All three forms of participation — traditional, radical and mutual — are useful and important. The argument in favour of Merafong is that citizens have a limited amount of energy to spend on participation. If the courts were to intervene to make traditional participation more substantive, citizens will be more likely to use it to express their grievances, rather than engaging in radical or mutual participation. This is a danger because, even with greater court intervention, formal participation is limited because government sets the agenda and ultimately holds all the cards. By limiting courts' role in making formal participation substantive, Courts funnel citizens energy into other forms of participation that are, arguably, more productive.

We believe the tale of public participation challenges has already had its climax. First, as we have argued above, the requirement is almost entirely formal — as long as Parliament invites submissions and holds hearings, it will — absent unlikely admissions that the process was a farce — comply with its constitutional obligations. Now that Parliament knows what it is required to do, it is arguable that it is unlikely (especially with important or controversial legislation) that it will make the mistake of failing to go through the motions of facilitating public involvement. On this argument, there will be few future challenges, as there will be no basis to bring challenges. In some sense, this should be seen as a real success of Doctors for Life. Whatever the limitations of the Court's attitude, it undoubtedly will increase the opportunities for the public to participate in the legislative process. We have also sought to demonstrate that perhaps only future cases will determine whether the Doctors for Life hope is sustained or is completely trumped by the Court's fears or other considerations revealed by Merafong and Poverty Alleviation Network. Whatever happens, one thing is clear: Doctors for Life is a success story and it lives on in our constitutional democracy — but its future role in litigation is uncertain.

A particularly contentious issue that could arise in future cases will be where evidence clearly demonstrates that decisions have been taken by a political party and imposed on legislatures. In his Doctors for Life dissent, Yacoob J suggested that the Constitution anticipated that elected representatives would be held account-

[1] Bishop 'Vampire or Prince? (supra).

[2] See also S Woolman 'My Tea Party, Your Mob, Our Social Contract: Freedom of Assembly and the Constitutional Right to Rebellion in Garvis v SATAWU (Minister of Safety & Security, Third Party). 2010 (6) SA 280 (WCC)' (2011) 27 SAJHR (forthcoming).

able by political parties.[1] Yet, the Court has still held that 'lawmakers should keep an open mind and consider the input by the populace'.[2] And in Merafong, Sachs J, in coming to the conclusion that there had not been reasonable facilitation of public involvement, specifically considered the perception by members of the community that the Gauteng Legislature had rubber-stamped the decision taken by the African National Congress.[3] Judging from the pronouncements of the Court in Doctors for Life International, Merafong and Poverty Alleviation Network, the current position must be: the policies of political parties must be seen as mere recommendations to Parliament or provincial legislatures until public involvement has been facilitated by such legislatures where appropriate and the legislatures have made the final decision to enact that legislation or not. Where evidence shows that the party instructed its members to vote in a certain way and neither the MPs nor the party were open to persuasion based on public participation, there may be reason to invalidate the legislation. Again, evidence of this nature will be very hard to come by. To manage potential hostility between the political party and its representatives in the legislature, the party may be further consulted by members of the legislature upon the completion of the public involvement process: as long as rubber-stamping or mere disregard of the views of members of the public does not make itself manifest. We discuss the relationship between party and parliament in more detail below.[4]

(b) Tagging

The different procedures prescribed by the Constitution for different types of Bills create a problem which was probably not contemplated by the Constitutional Assembly. In order to enact a Bill, Parliament has to determine correctly at the outset of the legislative process whether the Bill falls to be processed by FC s 74, s 75, s 76 or s 77. This process — called 'tagging' — may seem simple, but it is not. The Joint Rules of Parliament create a special procedure — the Joint Tagging Mechanism ('JTM') — to tag Bills. The JTM consists of the National Assembly's Speaker and Deputy Speaker and the NCOP's Chairperson and permanent Deputy Chairperson. For the purposes of parliamentary proceedings, the JTM's classification of a Bill is final and binding on both Houses.[5]

While it is relatively easy to determine whether a Bill amends the Constitution or is a money Bill — and must be passed under FC s 74 or s 77 respectively — the distinction between FC s 75 and s 76 Bills is much less precise. While we focus exclusively on the distinction between FC ss 75 and 76, keep in mind that the same principles will apply to mistakes in tagging FC ss 74 and 77 Bills.

[1] Doctors for Life International at para 278. He held: 'The citizen's right to participate in the activities of a political party is the route by which any citizen would, in a real way, be able to bring influence to bear on the way in which that representative performs her functions in the relevant legislature… . This is how a multi-party system of democracy ensures accountability, responsiveness and openness.'

[2] Poverty Alleviation Network (supra) at para 60.

[3] Merafong (supra) at para 292.

[4] §17.7 below.

[5] See Joint Rules 151-8.

Recall: FC s 76 must be used in three general sets of circumstances: (a) when Parliament changes its seat in terms of FC s 42(6); (b) if the legislation concerns the specific constitutional provisions listed in FC ss 76(3)-(4); and (c) if the Bill 'falls within a functional area listed in Schedule 4'.[1] It is the third, general rule that makes tagging a complicated business.

Whether a Bill 'falls within' a Schedule 4 functional area will often be a matter open for considerable debate. To begin with, the functional areas are couched in wide terms — 'trade', 'environment', 'cultural matters' and 'population development', for example — which cover a huge range of potential legislation and cannot easily be defined. Moreover, many Bills deal with multiple topics or impact on areas adjacent to the primary focus of the law. Does 'fall within' mean the Bill must deal only with Schedule 4 issues, that it must directly address a Schedule 4 functional area, or that it must merely affect one of the areas of concurrent competence? And, if a court finds that a Bill was incorrectly tagged, what is the result? Is the legislation automatically invalid? Does it depend on whether Parliament acted in good faith, or on what degree of support the Bill attracted?

As these questions suggest, the two primary questions in tagging jurisprudence are: (a) What is the appropriate test to determine if a Bill is a s 76 Bill? and (b) What are the consequence of incorrect tagging? Both questions have (largely) been answered by a pair of Constitutional Court decisions. We discuss each issue in turn.

(i) The appropriate test

Until recently, Parliament relied on the 'pith and substance' test[2] imported from Canadian, English and Indian law to tag legislation. This test asks what the 'true nature and character of the legislation [is] in order to ascertain the class of subject to which it really belongs.'[3] It is the test endorsed by the Constitutional Court for determining whether the national or provincial legislatures has the competence to legislate in a particular subject area.[4] To pith and substance adherents, every Bill has a single ultimate character, and all other issues addressed by the Bill are incidental and therefore irrelevant for tagging. Despite Parliament's preference for this essentialist approach, the Constitutional Court has considered the question

[1] This is the wording used in FC s 77(3). FC s 44(1)(b) — which confers legislative authority on the NCOP — uses slightly different wording. It gives the NCOP the power to pass, in accordance with FC s 76, 'legislation with regard to any matter within a functional area listed in Schedule 4'. We do not believe that the slight difference in phrasing has any significance.

[2] C Murray & R Simeon '"Tagging" Bills in Parliament: Section 75 or Section 76?' (2006) 123 SALJ 232, 244. See also, Tongoane & Others v National Minister for Agriculture and Land Affairs & Others 2010 (6) SA 214 (CC), 2010 (8) BCLR 741 (CC), [2010] ZACC 10 ('Tongoane') at para 47 (Reproducing the Speaker of the NA's defence of Parliament's tagging process based on the 'pith and substance' test).

[3] Russel v The Queen (1882) 7 App Cas 829, 839-40.

[4] See Western Cape Provincial Government & Others: In re DVB Behuising (Pty) Ltd v North West Provincial Government & Another 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347 (CC), [2000] ZACC 2 at para 36; and Ex parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature: In re KwaZulu-Natal Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Amendment Bill of 1995 1996 (4) SA 653 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 903 (CC), [1996] ZACC 15 at para 19; Tongoane (supra) at para 49. See generally, V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 15.

on two occasions, and has twice rejected the 'pith and substance' test in favour of one that accounts for the multiple purposes that modern legislation often serves.

In Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa: In re Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill the Court considered a challenge to national legislation attempting to regulate liquor licensing.[1] 'Liquor licenses' is listed in Schedule 5 as an area of exclusive provincial competence. The primary dispute in Liquor Bill was whether Parliament could invoke the FC s 44(2) override to legislate in the zone ordinarily reserved for the provinces. The tagging question arose in the following way. The Bill had been passed in terms of FC s 76. When the matter came to Court, the Government tried to avoid the complaint that the Bill didn't satisfy FC s 44(2) by arguing that in reality the Bill was primarily concerned with issues within the national competency and only incidentally affected liquor licenses. The Western Cape government — who opposed the Bill — retorted that, if that was true, the legislation was really a national concern, and should have been tagged as a s 75 Bill, not a s 76 Bill.

Ultimately, the Liquor Bill Court found that Parliament had properly followed the s 76 procedure. Cameron AJ held that, s 76(3) 'must be understood as requiring that any Bill whose provisions in substantial measure fall within a functional area listed in Schedule 4 be dealt with under section 76.'[2] Even if the Bill did not trench on the exclusive Schedule 5 power to regulate liquor licenses, it did 'fall within' the Schedule 4 functional areas of 'trade' and 'industrial promotion' and was therefore properly tagged as a s 76 Bill.[3]

In Tongoane & Others v National Minister for Agriculture and Land Affairs & Others the Court endorsed the 'substantial measure' test developed in Liquor Bill and explicitly rejected the pith and substance approach.[4] Various communities affected by the Community Land Rights Act ('CLARA')[5] challenged it on the basis that it had been incorrectly tagged. The Act had been tagged as a s 75 Bill. The applicants argued that, although the legislation was targeted primarily at land reform, it would have a substantial impact on indigenous law — a functional area listed in Schedule 4 — and therefore should have been tagged as a s 76 Bill. The High Court agreed with the applicants that CLARA had been incorrectly tagged, but for reasons we discuss below, held that this should not render the Act invalid.[6] The communities took their complaint to Braamfontein.

Chief Justice Ngcobo upheld the High Court's finding that CLARA had been incorrectly tagged. First, the Court endorsed the 'substantial measure' test enunciated in Liquor Bill. The Court explained how it differed from the 'pith and substance' test: 'Under the [pith and substance test], provisions of the legislation

[1] 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [1999] ZACC 15 ('Liquor Bill').

[2] Ibid at para 26 (our emphasis).

[3] Ibid at paras 27-9.

[4] For commentary on Tongoane, see Rassie Malherbe 'Parlementêre Prosedure as Demokratiese Instrument: Inagneming van Provinsiale Standpunt in Parlementêre Besluitneming' (2010) TSAR 826; M Bishop & J Brickhill 'Constitutional Law' 2010(2) Juta's Quarterly Review § 2.1.

[5] Act 11 of 2004.

[6] Tongoane & Others v National Minister for Agriculture and Land Affairs & Others 2010 (8) BCLR 838 (GNP) [2009] ZAGPPHC 127.

that fall outside of its substance are treated as incidental. By contrast, the tagging test … focuses on all the provisions of the Bill in order to determine the extent to which they substantially affect functional areas listed in Schedule 4 and not on whether any of its provisions are incidental to its substance.'[1] In sum, the 'substantial measure' test would require Bills to be tagged as s76 Bills when 'the main substance … falls within the exclusive national competence, but the provisions … nevertheless substantially affect the provinces.'[2]

The need for two different tests for seemingly similar concerns was dictated by the specific purpose served by establishing different mechanisms for legislation affecting the provinces:

> Tagging is not concerned with determining the sphere of government that has the competence to legislate on a matter. Nor is the process concerned with preventing interference in the legislative competence of another sphere of government. The process is concerned with the question of how the Bill should be considered by the provinces and in the NCOP, and how a Bill must be considered by the provincial legislatures depends on whether it affects the provinces. The more it affects the interests, concerns and capacities of the provinces, the more say the provinces should have on its content.[3]

As Ngcobo CJ notes, if the s 76 procedure only applied where provinces were competent to legislate concurrently, it would have little practical purpose as they could simply enact their own, preferred laws. 'Yet it is where matters substantially affect them outside their concurrent legislative competence that it is important for their views to be properly heard during the legislative process.'[4]

Applying this reasoning, the Court concluded that CLARA had been incorrectly tagged. CLARA's purpose was 'to introduce a new regime that will regulate the use, occupation and administration of communal land'.[5] That task was currently regulated, largely, by indigenous law. This was sufficient to satisfy the 'substantial measure' test.

(ii) Consequences of mistaken tagging

Probably because it did not need to decide the issue (as it found the Bill had been properly tagged) the Liquor Bill Court fudged the question of the consequence of bad tagging. Cameron AJ first highlighted the three principal differences between the s 75 procedure and the s 76 procedure.[6] First, s 76 gives more weight to the position of the NCOP, primarily because of the role of the Mediation Committee.[7] The second difference is that where a s 76 Bill is introduced in the National Assembly, the Assembly can override the objections of the NCOP only by passing the Bill with a two-third majority. By contrast, under s 75, only a simple majority in the Assembly is needed to override the objections of the NCOP.[8]

[1] Tongoane (supra) at para 59.
[2] Ibid at para 72.
[3] Ibid at para 60.
[4] Ibid at para 63.
[5] Ibid at para 95.
[6] Liquor Bill (supra) at para 25.
[7] Ibid.
[8] Ibid.

Third, when the NCOP votes on a s 76 Bill, each province has a single vote cast on its behalf by the head of the province's delegation and five votes are required to pass the Bill. By contrast, when the NCOP votes on a s 75 Bill, each delegate to the NCOP has a vote on the Bill.[1] The Court stressed that the third difference, is 'of import since whether a provincial delegation votes corporately through its head of delegation, as prescribed by s 65, or individually by each member casting a vote, as prescribed by s 75(2), may in defined circumstances be determinative as to whether the NCOP passes a Bill.'[2]

Cameron AJ then made the following obiter comment about what the consequences might be if a Bill were incorrectly tagged:

> It would be formalistic in the extreme to hold a Bill invalid on the ground that those steering it through Parliament erred in good faith in assuming that it was required to be dealt with under the s 76 procedure, when the only consequence of their error was to give the NCOP more weight, and to make passage of the Bill by the National Assembly in the event of inter-cameral disputes more difficult. It is hard to see how a challenge based on the first two differences between the relevant parliamentary procedures can invalidate the enactment of a statute.[3]

If we applied Cameron AJ's approach, tagging would only result in invalidity if Parliament acted in bad faith. The final sentence suggests that invalidity might also result if there is evidence to suggest that the Bill would not have passed if the vote had been taken by mandates instead of individually (or vice versa).

Relying on this statement, the High Court in Tongoane did not declare CLARA invalid. Despite finding that it had been improperly tagged, Ledwaba J held that as Parliament had acted in good faith, and the provinces had an adequate hearing, CLARA was valid.[4]

The Constitutional Court in Tongoane reversed both the High Court and the Liquor Bill approach to tagging. It held that where a Bill that was objectively a s 76 Bill was passed as a s 75 Bill, the result would always be invalidity. It rejected the suggestion in Liquor Bill that invalidity should not be the result when Parliament had acted in good faith. Quoting Doctors for Life, Ngcobo CJ re-iterated that '[f]ailure to comply with manner and form requirements in enacting legislation renders the legislation invalid. … [The Constitutional] Court not only has a right but also has a duty to ensure that the law-making process prescribed by the Constitution is observed. And if the conditions for law-making processes have not been complied with, it has the duty to say so and declare the resulting statute invalid.'[5] However, the Court was not willing to commit itself on the consequences of the reverse situation: where a s 75 Bill was incorrectly passed under the more onerous s 76 procedures. 'It may well be,' the Chief Justice mused, 'that different

[1] Liquor Bill (supra) at para 25.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid at para 26.
[4] Tongoane & Others v National Minister for Agriculture and Land Affairs & Others 2010 (8) BCLR 838 (GNP), [2009] ZAGPPHC 127 at paras 24-26.
[5] Tongoane 2010 (6) SA 214 (CC) at para 106, quoting Doctors for Life (supra) at paras 208 and 211.

considerations apply where the section 76 procedure is followed instead of the one prescribed by section 75.'[1]

(iii) Discussion

In sum, the law on tagging is: A Bill must be tagged as s 76 if it will affect in 'substantial measure' any of the functional areas in Schedule 4. If a Bill is mistakenly tagged s 75 instead of s 76 and passed on that basis, the resultant Act is invalid. It is uncertain what the consequences are if the Bill is tagged s 76 when it should have been tagged s 75. Tongoane provides a lucid explanation of the law and rightly rejects the 'pith and substance' approach. Yet, certain difficulties remain.

First, it is difficult to conceive why Bills mistakenly tagged s 75 should be treated differently from those incorrectly tagged s 76. The logic justifying the conclusion that incorrect tagging must result in invalidity is that any failure to follow a constitutionally prescribed process renders the resulting legislation invalid. The only meaningful difference is that, because the s 76 procedure requires more votes from the NCOP (and the NA if it wishes to override the NCOP) it is only when Bills are mistakenly tagged s 75 that they will be passed without the necessary number of votes. There are two gaps in this argument.

One, it omits the theoretical possibility that, because s 76 is a mandated procedure and s 75 is not, a Bill that would pass in the NCOP under s 76 might not pass under s 75. It is also possible that the NA would decide not to override the NCOP. The Constitution clearly contemplates that the NA might decide not to use the override — even though it had already passed the Bill — otherwise there is no purpose in requiring the NA to reconsider the legislation.

Two, and more importantly, the Court has made clear in its public participation cases — Doctors for Life, Matatiele and Merafong — that it is irrelevant whether following the proper procedure would affect the outcome of the legislative process. If we were concerned only with whether following the correct procedure would have changed the result, then we should enquire even in a case like Tongoane how many votes the legislation received. If it had been passed with 90 per cent of the votes in both Houses, it would still have been passed had the correct, s 76 procedure been followed. The Tongoane Court is uninterested in this vote-counting exercise precisely because the practical consequences of following the wrong procedure do not matter. And if that is true, there is no room to prevaricate about the alternative, Liquor Bill scenario.

If we accept that mistaken tagging in either way results in invalidity,[2] then a bigger dilemma raises its head. While the 'substantial measure' test is easier to apply consistently than the 'pith and substance' approach, it does not provide

[1] Tongoane (supra) at para 103.

[2] If you are convinced that only Bills like CLARA that are wrongly tagged as s 75 Bills should be declared invalid, a different difficulty awaits. The consequence will be that Parliament will be incentivized to tag any Bill where there is any doubt as a s 76 Bill to avoid the possibility of it being declared invalid. This will skew the balance the Constitution tries to strike between the powers of the national and provincial governments. Some Bills that should be passed under s 75 (with less provincial input) will be passed under s 76 (with greater provincial influence). We may think this is a good thing, but it is probably not what the Constitution envisages.

bright line rules. In some cases there will be room for reasonable debate about how to tag a Bill. We can assume that the accumulation of judicial opinion will, over time, provide greater guidance as to exactly where the line between ss 75 and 76 lies, but in the interim Parliament is stuck with a difficult conundrum. Even acting with the best of intentions, it might accidently tag a Bill incorrectly. The consequence (if the law is challenged) will be invalidity either way, resulting in a huge waste of government resources. To avoid that, we need a more finely grained test than Tongoane supplies.

Murray and Simeon have suggested a nifty five-part tagging test that could help to provide greater clarity. Although proposed prior to Tongoane, the Murray-Simeon test tries to give more definite content to the 'substantial measure' approach.[1] It does so by identifying the circumstances where a province should legitimately have a greater say in the passage of law — either for reasons of federalism, or efficacy. The test is as follows:

(a) Does the Bill expect provinces to implement any part of it under FC s 125(2)(b)? If so, the Bill should follow the s 76 procedure.

(b) Does the Bill contain provisions that would normally fall for implementation by the provinces under s 125(2)(b) but over which the national government retains the responsibility for implementation? If so, the Bill should follow the s 76 procedure.

(c) Could this law, in the future, conflict with a provincial law? Or, in other words, are there provisions in this law that deal with matters over which a province has jurisdiction? If so, the Bill should follow the s 76 route.

(d) Does the Bill have implications for any policy or law which provinces are already implementing or may implement? If so, the Bill should follow the s 76 procedure.

(e) Is the intrusion of the national Bill on a Schedule 4 matter trivial? If so, the Bill should follow the s 75 route.[2]

Were Parliament and the Court to adopt this test — or something similar — it would bring much greater clarity to the tagging process. While there may be some Bills that still escape easy classification, it is likely to be a far smaller set.

The alternative solution to the tagging problem, that Parliament has in fact adopted, is to create a new procedure to deal with difficult to classify Bills. In an effort to alleviate some of the difficulties involved in classifying and separating s 75 and s 76 matters, the Joint Rules of Parliament provide for a Bill to be classified as a 'mixed section 75/76 Bill'.[3] This is a Bill which contains provisions that must to be passed under s 75 as well as provisions that must to be passed under s 76. The Joint Rules provide that such a Bill may only be proceeded with where the Bill is of a nature that a dispute between the two houses is unlikely to arise, where the Bill is drafted in a way that its s 75 and s 76 components can be isolated if necessary and where the Bill is unlikely to lead to any unmanageable procedural complications.[4] The procedure to be used for passing mixed Bills attempts to ensure that the requirements of both s 75 and s 76 are met. For example, mixed

[1] C Murray & R Simeon '"Tagging" Bills in Parliament: Section 75 or Section 76?' (2006) 123 SALJ 232.

[2] Ibid at 256-259.

[3] Joint Rules 191-201.

[4] Joint Rule 191.

Bills may not be introduced in the NCOP[1] as this would conflict with s 75, and when the NCOP considers a mixed Bill it must first vote by province to satisfy s 76 and then by individual member to satisfy s 75.[2] Where a mixed Bill runs into procedural difficulties, such as where the two houses disagree, it must be split into separate s 75 and s 76 Bills and these separate Bills must be retabled accordingly.

While this is a novel solution, it is, alas, unconstitutional. The Constitution makes no reference at all to mixed Bills — the procedure and classification derives solely from the Joint Rules of Parliament. It is presumably for this reason that although the procedure for mixed Bills has been approved by the Joint Rules Committee, it has not yet been implemented pending clarity on its validity.[3] It could be argued that the mixed Bill procedure is constitutionally unobjectionable because it is more onerous than the constitutionally required procedure.[4] The Court's suggestions in both Liquor Bill and Tongoane that Bills mistakenly classified as s 76 might not be invalid gives some credence to that line of thought.

However, as we argued earlier, the reasoning involved in accepting the mixed Bills procedure is flawed. The mixed Bills procedure is not merely more onerous than the s 75 and s 76 procedures; it is different to these procedures and is in fact unknown to the Constitution. While it may well be within Parliament's power to make the passing of particular Bills more complex by, for example, requiring extra consultation with the public or local government, it is altogether a different matter when Parliament imposes additional voting requirements on certain Bills that may prevent them being passed at all — thus undermining the constitutional legislative process. Therefore, however much the mixed Bills procedure may be considered a pragmatic solution to the difficulties involved in separating and classifying s 75 and s 76 Bills, the courts should be slow to accept the procedure as being consistent with the Constitution.

A final interesting question is worth considering. Thus far, we have only considered tagging challenges to a Bill that was passed. But would there be any recourse if a Bill was incorrectly tagged and for that reason failed to pass? Imagine Parliament mistakenly tags a s 75 Bill as a s 76 Bill. The NA passes it with a slim majority. The NCOP rejects it, mediation fails, and the NA is unable to muster the two-thirds necessary for an override. Could somebody with an interest in the Bill being passed challenge the tagging of the Bill and force Parliament to reconsider it under the correct procedure? We deal with the general form of this question earlier,[5] and suggest that this would be one example where a court might be justified in interfering before Parliament concludes the legislative process.

(c) Bills requiring extra-parliamentary consultation

The Constitution provides that certain categories of Bills may not be passed by Parliament unless appropriate bodies have been consulted or have had the

[1] Joint Rule 193.
[2] Joint Rule 197.
[3] See the comment in the Joint Rules, at Joint Rule 191.
[4] See I Currie and J De Waal The New Constitutional and Administrative Law (2001) 188.
[5] See § 17.4 above.

opportunity to make representations beforehand. The following is a list of the categories with the corresponding bodies to be consulted:

- Bills affecting the status, institutions, powers or functions of local government: organized local government, municipalities and other interested parties (s 154(2));
- Bills providing for the equitable distribution of national revenue between national, provincial and local governments: provincial governments, organised local government and the Financial and Fiscal Commission (s 214(2));
- Bills regulating the powers of national, provincial and local governments to raise and to guarantee loans: the Financial and Fiscal Commission (ss 218(2) and 230(2));
- Bills providing a framework for the salaries, allowances and benefits of elected representatives and traditional leaders: the commission on the remuneration of elected representatives and traditional leaders (s 219(3)); and
- Bills regulating the taxing powers of provinces and local governments: the Financial and Fiscal Commission (ss 228(2)(b) and 229(5)).

17.7 Internal Regulation of Parliament

While the Constitution determines a great deal of how Parliament functions, the day-to-day details of parliamentary process are left for Parliament to figure out for itself. The Constitution affords the NA and the NCOP the power to control their internal proceedings and to make rules and orders to manage their business. This section examines the limits of those powers. First, we discuss Parliament's general power to regulate its proceedings and the ancient principle that the judiciary should not interfere in the inner workings of the Legislature. Second, we consider Parliament's rule-making power. We ask what the limits of the power to make rules are, and what consequences (if any) flow from breaking the rules. Last, we look at the right of MPs to speak their mind in legislative proceedings.

(a) Control over the internal proceedings of Parliament

Sections 57(1)(a) and 70(1)(a) of the Final Constitution confer on the NA and the NCOP, respectively, the general power to 'determine and control [their] internal arrangements, proceedings and procedures'. The subsequent grant of power to create rules and orders — FC ss 57(1)(b) and 70(1)(b) — is best understood as an element of that power.

The right of legislatures to regulate their own proceedings without interference by other branches of government is a hallmark of democratic government. As long ago as 1884, Lord Coleridge held:

> What is said or done within the walls of Parliament cannot be inquired into in a court of law. … The jurisdiction of the Houses over their own members, their right to impose discipline within their walls, is absolute and exclusive.[1]

[1] Bradlaugh v Gossett (1884), 12 QBD 271, 275 (Eng QB).

In Bloem & Another v State President of the Republic of South Africa & Others, MT Steyn J quoted this passage and confirmed that, prior to 1994, the principle of Parliamentary immunity was part of South African law.[1]

Apartheid South Africa was by no means alone; the House of Lords,[2] the Supreme Court of Canada,[3] the High Court of Australia[4] and the Supreme Court of the United States[5] all endorse some variation on the theme that, as long as the lawmaking branch complies with the manner and form provisions of the Constitution, courts should not inquire into how Parliament manages its domestic affairs. While the jurisdictions differ on the details, the position in most is that once a court decides that an act falls under one of the recognised 'parliamentary privileges', a court has no jurisdiction to question its exercise, even if it might violate a constitutional right.[6]

[1] 1986 (4) SA 1064 (O)(The court quoted extensively from Bradlaugh and other English decisions, and concluded that 'the exclusive right of Parliament to establish and control its own domestic procedure and the denial of jurisdiction to the Courts of law to pronounce thereon, [has] been embodied in our own Constitution.' Ibid at 1088E.)

[2] British Railways Board v Pickin [1974] AC 765, 790 (Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest)('It must be for Parliament to decide whether its decreed procedures have in fact been followed. It must be for Parliament to lay down and to construe its Standing Orders and further to decide whether they have been obeyed: it must be for Parliament to decide whether in any particular case to dispense with compliance with such orders.')

[3] New Brunswick Broadcasting Co v Nova Scotia (Speaker of the House of Assembly) [1993] 1 SCR 319 ('New Brunswick')(McLachlin J held that 'Canadian legislative bodies properly claim as inherent privileges those rights which are necessary to their capacity to function as legislative bodies.' Ibid at para 125. Once a court established that a certain type of conduct or decision was necessary, Parliament's decisions in that area were completely immune from judicial review, including compatibility with the Charter. The court held that the right to exclude strangers from proceedings and to regulate their conduct was such a power. A broadcasting company could not, therefore, rely on the right to freedom of expression for permission to film the proceedings of the Nova Scotia House of Assembly.)

[4] R v Richards; Ex parte Fitzpatrick and Browne (1955) 92 CLR 157, 162, ('it is for the courts to judge of the existence in either House of Parliament of a privilege, but, given an undoubted privilege, it is for the House to judge of the occasion and of the manner of its exercise.' Quoted with approval in Egan v Willis [1998] HCA 71 at para 27.)

[5] Marshall Field & Co v Clark 143 US 649, 12 S.Ct. 495 (1892)(The court created what is known as the 'enrolled bill doctrine'. The doctrine holds: 'The signing by the speaker of the house of representatives, and by the president of the senate … of an enrolled bill, is an official attestation by the two houses of such bill as one that has passed congress …. And when a bill, thus attested, receives [the President's] approval, and is deposited in the public archives, its authentication as a bill that has passed congress should be deemed complete and unimpeachable …. The respect due to coequal and independent departments requires the judicial department to … accept, as having passed congress, all bills authenticated in the manner stated'. Ibid at 672, as paraphrased in I Bar-Siman-Tov 'Legislative Supremacy in the United States?: Rethinking the "Enrolled Bill" Doctrine' (2009) 97 Georgetown LJ 323, 328-329. This principle, it seems, does not exclude courts from examining constitutional manner and form requirements, only from compliance with its own rules. United States v Munoz-Flores 495 US 385 (1990)(The court held that it could enquire whether Congress had complied with the constitutional requirement that revenue bills originate in the House of Representatives.))

[6] The US is different. It requires Congress to abide by the Bill of Rights in all its internal processes. United States v Ballin 144 US 1, 5, 12 SCt. 507, 509 ('The constitution empowers each house to determine its rules of proceedings. It may not by its rules ignore constitutional restraints or violate fundamental rights, and there should be a reasonable relation between the mode or method of proceeding established by the rule and the result which is sought to be attained. But within these limitations all matters of method are open to the determination of the house, and it is no impeachment of the rule to say that some other way would be better, more accurate, or even more just.')

A trio of Canadian cases demonstrates how this rule operates. The Supreme Court of Canada has held that a broadcaster could not rely on the right to freedom of expression to gain permission to film the sessions of a provincial legislature because the right to remove strangers from Parliament and to regulate visitors' behaviour is a parliamentary privilege.[1] However, the Court also held that parliament's privileges did not extend to hiring and firing its chauffeurs, and so held that an ex-chauffeur could sue Parliament for discrimination.[2] Applying these precedents, the Ontario Court of Appeal held that a provincial legislature was immune from a challenge that its practice of reading a prayer at the start of each session violated the religious liberty rights of one of its members.[3] It reasoned that since standing rules were an element of Parliament's exclusive zone of competence, and the prayer was required by the rules, a court could not intervene.

Before we go further, a quick note about terminology is necessary. The phrase 'parliamentary privilege' is used in two ways. It is used to describe both the right of Parliament as an institution to be free from outside interference, and the right of individual MPs to speak their minds when in Parliament. The second is really an element of the first, but to avoid confusion, we try to use the phrase 'parliamentary immunity' when referring to the first, institutional guarantee, and 'parliamentary privilege' when discussing the second, individual protection. However, the case law does not make a similar distinction, so readers should be careful to note the context in which the phrase 'parliamentary privilege' is employed.

There is a dual rationale behind the rule of parliamentary immunity. First, the separation of powers requires each branch to permit the other to perform its functions without interference. As one commentator has put it:

> The reason for, and purpose of, parliamentary [immunity] is not to protect parliament and parliamentarians from individuals; rather it is to protect them from the Courts and the Executive. … Parliamentary [immunity] provides the constitutional space for free and democratic discourse to take place.[4]

While it may often appear to immunise Parliament from legal standards that apply to all other bodies — an appearance that may sometimes be justified — that is deemed necessary to guarantee Parliament's independence.

---

[1] New Brunswick (supra).

[2] Canada (House of Commons) v Vaid [2005] 1 SCR 667 (SCC)

[3] Ontario (Speaker of the Legislative Assembly) v Ontario (Human Rights Commission) 201 DLR (4th) 698 at paras 19 and 23 ('In the case under appeal, the privilege asserted by the Speaker on behalf of the Legislative Assembly is the right to establish and regulate the House's own internal affairs without any interference from the other two branches of government, the executive and the judicial. In addressing the problem in this case, we are weighing the constitutional rights of a citizen of the state against the right of legislative assemblies, hard won over the centuries, to control their own affairs independent of the Crown. … The question is not whether the prayers are necessary, but whether the Standing Orders governing the conduct of the business of the Assembly are necessary. If the Standing Orders are determined to be necessary to the proper functioning of the House - and they include the prayers - that is the end of the inquiry. The Standing Orders are protected by parliamentary privilege and neither the courts nor any quasi-judicial body have the right to inquire into their contents or to question whether a particular part of the Standing Orders (including the recitation of prayers) is necessary or indeed lawful.')

[4] S Chaplin 'House of Commons v. Vaid: Parliamentary Privilege and the Constitutional Imperative of the Independence of Parliament' 2 Journal of Parliamentary & Political Law 153.

The second, and more practical, justification for parliamentary immunity is to ensure the smooth functioning of Parliament. The business of Parliament would be far more difficult — if not impossible — if every internal decision could be reviewed in the courts. To employ an evocative phrase from an earlier age: 'They would sink into utter contempt and inefficiency without it.'[1] Or in the words of McLachlin J: 'The rule that the legislative assembly should have the exclusive right to control the conditions in which that debate takes place is … of great importance, not only for the autonomy of the legislative body, but to ensure its effective functioning.'[2]

With this strong historical precedent, foreign support and principled and practical justification, one might expect our Constitutional Courts to adopt a similar approach. But one would be wrong. Although there is not a developed jurisprudence on this issue, the constitutional text and the few cases we have indicate that courts in South Africa will be far less deferential to the legislature. To begin with, FC s 2 states: 'The Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic; law or conduct inconsistent with it is invalid, and the obligations imposed by it must be fulfilled.' And FC s 8(1) explicitly states that the Bill of Rights 'binds the legislature'. The most obvious interpretation of these provisions is that the legislature is as bound by the Constitution as any other public body. However, they need to be read in conjunction with the provisions that afford Parliament the ability to determine its own rules. It could be argued that ss 57(1)(a) and 70(1)(a) create a constitutional bubble of immunity for the legislature when regulating its internal functions. There can be no constitutional conflict, the argument goes, because the Constitution itself envisions that Parliament will not be subject to the ordinary strictures of the Constitution.[3]

The Supreme Court of Appeal has firmly rejected this interpretation. In Speaker of the National Assembly v De Lille Mahomed CJ wrote:

> [T]he Constitution of the Republic of South Africa … is Supreme — not Parliament. It is the ultimate source of all lawful authority in the country. No Parliament, however bona fide or eminent its membership, no President, however formidable be his reputation or scholarship and no official, however efficient or well meaning, can make any law or perform any act which is not sanctioned by the Constitution. Section 2 of the Constitution expressly provides that law or conduct inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid and the obligations imposed by it must be fulfilled. It follows that any citizen adversely affected by any decree, order or action of any official or body, which is not properly

[1] Bradlaugh v Gossett (1884), 12 QBD 271, 275 (Eng QB).

[2] New Brunswick (supra) at para 140.

[3] This is similar to the argument that convinced the Supreme Court of Canada to exempt the legislative branch from compliance with the Canadian Charter. New Brunswick (supra).

> authorised by the Constitution is entitled to the protection of the Courts. No Parliament, no official and no institution is immune from Judicial scrutiny in such circumstances.[1]

As we discuss in greater depth below,[2] De Lille concerned whether the National Assembly had the power to suspend one of its members as a punishment for remarks made during a debate. The Supreme Court of Appeal held that, although FC s 57(1)(a) gave the NA the power to suspend a member to prevent disruption of a debate, it did not afford it the power to use suspension as a punishment. It did not actually reach the question of whether the NA would be bound by the Bill of Rights — or any other restraints — in exercising a power afforded to it by the Constitution,[3] although the tenor of the judgment suggests that it would.

The High Court in De Lille was not so hesitant. It held:

> The National Assembly is subject to the supremacy of the Constitution. It is an organ of State and therefore it is bound by the Bill of Rights. All its decisions and acts are subject to the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. … It is subject in all respects to the provisions of our Constitution. It has only those powers vested in it by the Constitution expressly or by necessary implication or by other statutes which are not in conflict with the Constitution. It follows therefore that Parliament may not confer on itself or on any of its constituent parts, including the National Assembly, any powers not conferred on them by the Constitution expressly or by necessary implication.[4]

Hlophe J (joined by King DJP) found that the decision to suspend De Lille violated her rights to freedom of expression, access to courts and administrative justice.

The endorsement of constitutional supremacy and the limited weight afforded parliamentary immunity in both De Lille judgments is indirectly supported by the Constitutional Court's attitude in Doctors for Life.[5] Recall[6] that the majority, over the vociferous dissent of Yacoob J, read the seemingly bland obligation to 'facilitate public involvement' as a requirement for the validity of legislation and, although affording Parliament significant deference, was willing to examine whether Parliament had acted reasonably in meeting that duty with regard to each and every law that it passed. The Court could have found — as the dissenters did — that

---

[1] Speaker of the National Assembly v De Lille & Another 1999 (4) SA 863 (SCA), 1999 (11) BCLR 1339 (SCA)('De Lille') at para 14. See also, De Lille & Another v Speaker of the National Assembly 1998 (3) SA 430 (C), 1998 (7) BCLR 929 (C)('De Lille HC') at para 22 ('In terms of s 2 the Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic and any law or conduct inconsistent with it is invalid. Section 8(1) also provides that the Bill of Rights applies to all law and binds the Legislature, the Executive, the Judiciary and all organs of State. Thus any privilege inconsistent or incompatible with the Constitution is invalid. Surely the extent of privilege is inextricably bound with the exercise thereof. In other words, the determination of the extent of privilege must surely relate to its exercise. The contrary view is untenable. Otherwise Parliament would have a blank cheque to set the limits of its own powers. The Constitution, particularly s 2 thereof, enjoins us to ensure that the obligations imposed by the Constitution - which is the supreme law - must be fulfilled.')

[2] See § 17.7*(c)* below.

[3] Ibid at para 32 (The Court declined to decide the issue that had been at issue in New Brunswick: Whether Parliament is bound by the Bill of Rights.)

[4] De Lille HC (supra) at para 25.

[5] Doctors for Life International v Speaker of National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC), [2006] ZACC 11 ('Doctors for Life').

[6] See §17.6*(a)* above.

Parliament need merely enact some rules to promote public involvement, but that courts could not enquire any further than that.

However, Doctors for Life does build in a limited form of judicial deference in another way: Courts must — absent exceptional circumstances — wait until Parliament completes the legislative process before it intervenes.[1] This only applies when the internal function at issue concerns the passing of legislation. When — as was the case in De Lille — there is no legislative process to complete, the judiciary can intervene at any stage.

The general principles that emerge from the case law are these:

(a) Parliament can only act if there is a legal source for its power;
(b) FC ss 57(1)(a) and 70(1)(a) are not blank cheques; a court can decide whether Parliament has exceeded its power to 'determine and control its internal arrangements';
(c) The exercise of all Parliament's powers is constrained by the Bill of Rights and the Constitution;
(d) A court is likely to show significant deference to how Parliament chooses to regulate its processes;
(e) Courts cannot intervene before legislation has been passed.

This power is constrained by other provisions of the Constitution, in particular ss 59 and 72, which oblige the Assembly and the NCOP to facilitate public involvement in their processes and to conduct their business in an open manner and in public. The Assembly and the NCOP are entitled to take reasonable measures to regulate public and media access to their proceedings.[2] However, the general public and the media may be excluded from the proceedings of committees of the Assembly and the NCOP only when it is reasonable and justifiable to do so in an open and democratic society.[3]

(b) Rules and orders of the National Assembly and the NCOP

The Assembly[4] and the NCOP[5] have the power to make rules and orders concerning the conduct of their business. In addition, FC s 45 requires the two houses to 'establish a joint rules committee to make rules and orders concerning [their] joint business'. In this section we ask two questions about the rule-making power: (a) what are the limits on Parliament's power to make rules? (b) what are the consequences, if any, if Parliament fails to comply with a rule?

[1] See § 17.4 above.
[2] It is not clear that this power would entitle the NA or the NCOP to refuse permission for their proceedings to be broadcast on television. Cf New Brunswick Broadcasting Co v Nova Scotia 100 DLR (4th) 212 (SC), [1993] 1 SCR 319.
[3] FC s 59(2) and 72(2). See also NA Rule 152 and NCOP Rule 110.
[4] FC s 57(1)(b).
[5] FC s 70(1)(b).

(i) The limits on Parliament's rule-making power

We first consider the explicit limits on the rule-making power, then implicit constraints. For the first part, we consider the joint and individual rule-making powers separately, while when discussing the tacit limits we discuss the power to make rules generally.

There are two explicit constraints on the houses' individual rule-making power in the Constitution. First, it has to be exercised with due regard to representative and participatory democracy, accountability, transparency, and public involvement.[1] This limitation has not yet been tested, but it seems likely that a court will give Parliament a great degree of deference in deciding whether a rule runs contrary to these principles. The principles are vague, so there will always be some doubt whether a rule fails to respect transparency or public participation. In addition, the Constitution does not require that the rules promote or comply with the listed principles, merely that they are adopted 'with due regard' to those principles. Even rules that may seem to inhibit, for example, transparency would pass constitutional muster if it was adopted with an attempt to limit the impact on transparency, or for some other justifiable reason. Finally, as the rule-making power concerns the inner working of the legislature, the judiciary will rightly be hesitant to intervene. Absent obviously undemocratic rules, the principled limits in ss 59(1)(b) and 70(1)(b) will act primarily as largely unenforceable guidelines for Parliament, or as an interpretive guide when rules are unclear.

Secondly, ss 57(2) and 70(2) prescribe constitutionally mandated content for the rules and orders that differs slightly for each house:

(a) In both houses: The establishment of committees;[2]

(b) In the NA: Recognise the leader of the largest opposition party as the leader of the opposition;[3]

(c) In both houses: The participation of minority parties in parliamentary and committee proceedings in a manner consistent with democracy.[4] The Constitutional Court has held that the 'purpose of these provisions is to ensure that minority parties can participate meaningfully in the deliberative processes of parliament.'[5]

(d) In the NA: Ensure that all parties represented in the NA are given sufficient financial and administrative assistance to operate effectively in the Assembly;[6] and

[1] FC ss 57(1)(b) and 70(1)(b). These provisions are reinforced by the requirements of openness imposed by ss 59 and 71, discussed in § 17.6 (a) supra.

[2] FC s 57(2)(a) and 70(2)(a) read: 'the establishment, composition, powers, functions, procedures and duration of its committees'. The different roles of committees in the Assembly and the NCOP are discussed in §§ 17.1 (a) and (b)(ii) supra.

[3] FC s 57(2)(d).

[4] FC s 57(2)(b) and 70(2)(c). When applied to the NCOP, the provision only applies to s 75 Bills, because that is the only time delegates have an individual vote. When voting as a delegation, party affiliation is irrelevant. See First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 224 (Constitutional Court emphasized that this requirement was capable of judicial enforcement.)

[5] Democratic Alliance & Another v Masondo NO & Another 2003 (2) SA 413 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 128 (CC), [2002] ZACC 28 ('Masondo') at para 18.

[6] FC s 57(2)(c).

(e) In the NCOP: The participation of all the provinces, 'in a manner consistent with democracy'.[1]

Requirements (a) and (b) are basic and are unlikely to provoke controversy. By contrast, the remaining requirements are vital bulwarks against the abuse of the rule-making power by the majority party. Like all other decisions, the adoption of the rules is taken by a simple majority vote.[2] A party with a clear majority could amend the rules to exclude or weaken minority parties and make it easier to push its agenda through without debate.[3] The limits in FC ss 57(2) and 70(2) are a real, enforceable tool to prevent that.

FC s 45 creates a number of specific tasks for the Joint Rules Committee:

(a) It must 'determine procedures to facilitate the legislative process, including setting a time limit for completing any step in the process'. This is an important power; as we discuss in more detail shortly, the Constitution is taciturn about the details of the legislative process and the rules need to provide those details.
(b) Establish joint committees to report on s 74 and s 75 Bills;
(c) Establish a joint committee to review the Constitution at least annually;
(d) Regulate the business of all the joint committees;

Unlike FC ss 57 and 70, FC s 45 does not place any value-based limits on the joint rule-making power. When acting together, the NA and the NCOP are not explicitly required to consider participatory democracy, the representation of minority parties and so on. Should those limits also apply to the writing of the joint rules? Yes. There is no reason of principle to exempt the Joint Rules from respecting basic principles of democracy. Sections 57 and 70 can easily be read to constrain each house's power to make rules whether it is exercising it individually or in conjunction with the other house.

In addition to these two direct limits on the rule-making power, there are also implicit constitutional limits on the rules Parliament can make. Can Parliament make rules that add requirements to the processes set out in FC ss 74-77? The obvious answer is: No. But the real answer is more complicated. The starting point is an obiter remark of the Constitutional Court in Executive Council of the Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development & Another.[4] The Court was concerned, not with Parliament's rule-making power, but with the similar power FC s 160(6) assigns municipal councils to make by-laws regulating their internal arrangements.[5] Interpreting FC s 160(6), the Court compared it to FC s 57:

[1] FC s 70(1)(b).
[2] FC ss 53(1)(c) and 65(1)(b).
[3] For more on the possibility of the legislative process being distorted by a dominant party, see §17.8*(b)* below.
[4] 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC), [1999] ZACC 13 ('Executive Council 1999').
[5] FC s 160(6) reads: 'A Municipal Council may make by-laws which prescribe rules and orders for–
(a) its internal arrangements;
(b) its business and proceedings; and
(c) the establishment, composition, procedures, powers and functions of its committees

> It is clear that [FC s 57] confers a power upon the National Assembly to regulate its internal proceedings, business and working committees. However, that power must be read in the context of the other provisions of the Constitution regulating the National Assembly, such as the regulation of the election and removal of the Speaker and Deputy-Speaker, the regulation of the voting procedures and quorums in the National Assembly and the regulation of public access to the National Assembly. In addition, it should be noted that in the case of the national legislature, the election, appointment and functioning of what is, in effect, its executive committee, the President and Cabinet, is fully regulated by sections 83 to 102. Thorough constitutional regulation of provincial executives is similarly to be found in sections 125 to 141. These provisions make it plain that the constitutional power of legislatures to regulate the internal proceedings of committees is a narrow power, not a broad one, and is related not to the executive committees of these legislatures, but only to other committees entrusted with specific tasks or portfolios. The power also does not relate to a power to regulate the main structural components of the legislature, which are fully regulated by the Constitution, but only to those working committees which either chamber of the legislature may decide to establish, and also disestablish, from time to time.[1]

This is fair enough. The power to make rules certainly does not extend to altering the constitutional requirements for quorums or votes, nor to controlling the President and the Cabinet. But, the last sentence is too strongly stated; the rulemaking power is not limited 'only to those working committees which either chamber of the legislature may decide to establish'. While Parliament may not alter the 'main structural components of the legislature', it may (and must) fill in the details that the broad language of the Constitution leaves open.

A quick look at the Joint Rules or the rules of either house demonstrates this. While much of the rules are devoted to non-legislative motions and the composition and functioning of committees — matters the Constitution leaves unregulated — they also deal in great depth with the intricacies of parliamentary debate and the legislative process.[2] And, as we explained earlier, FC s 45 explicitly recognises that the Joint Rules can 'determine procedures to facilitate the legislative process' and set time limits. While this power is not explicitly assigned to the NA and the NCOP when they act separately, it is necessary for them to function. We provide a few examples of rules which have nothing to do with committees but which affect the legislative process. Some of them are obviously permissible, while others could arguably be said to exceed the legislature's authority.

1. The power to introduce Bills

The Constitution affords all Ministers, Deputy Ministers, Members of the NA and committees of the NA the power to introduce legislation in the National Assembly.[3] Yet business in the Assembly would likely come to a screeching halt if every one of the 400 members could demand a full consideration of every one of their pet legislative projects. The power could easily be abused to tie up the Assembly with hopeless proposals to prevent it from passing legislation that a minority opposed. There must be some method to filter the proposals so that the

[1] Executive Council 1999 (supra) at para 100
[2] Chapter 13 of the NA Rules; Chapter 10 of the NCOP Rules; and Chapter 4 of the Joint Rules
[3] FC s 73(2).

Assembly spends its limited time on feasible legislation. The NA Rules provide a careful filter to achieve just that.[1] It could be argued that sifting proposals in this way limits the constitutional right of members to propose legislation. Or, the mechanism could be defended as making the right a workable reality.

2. The Joint Tagging Mechanism

Earlier,[2] we discussed the Joint Tagging Mechanism — the method by which Parliament determines what process to follow in passing a Bill. The Constitution does not require such a process, yet it would be impossible for Parliament to function without some way to decide how to classify Bills.

3. Certification of constitutionality

NA rule 243(1A) requires that Bills introduced by the executive are certified by the Chief State Law Adviser as complying with the Constitution and being 'properly drafted in the form and style which conforms to legislative practice'. While the legislation may be proceeded with even if the Law Adviser does not certify the legislation, the Bill cannot proceed until the Law Adviser expresses her opinion. This extra step is not to be found in the Constitution. Does rule 243(1A) create an extra-constitutional hurdle for the passage of legislation? Or is the NA merely regulating its internal proceedings?

4. Amendments to constitutional amendments

Earlier,[3] we discussed the Constitutional Court's holding in Merafong[4] that the Constitution does not permit amendments to constitutional amendments in the NCOP. We explained there why that conclusion is inarguably wrong. Without rehashing that argument, we want to consider the interesting abstract question that situation raises. Unlike FC ss 75 and 76, s 74 makes no provision for what happens if the NA and the NCOP pass different versions of a constitutional amendment. Does Parliament have the power to create a procedure to deal with that eventuality? The Merafong Court did not address this question; it denied the NCOP power to propose amendments without acknowledging the fact that Parliament — in its Joint Rules — had in fact created a procedure for it to do so. It could be asserted that the absence of a mediation process in s 74 implies that mediation should not be permitted for constitutional amendments. On this view, Parliament's attempt to establish a procedure is unconstitutional. But there is no

[1] NA rules 234-237 (The Rules require the member to submit a memorandum to the Speaker. The memorandum is tabled in the Assembly and referred to the Committee on Private Members' Legislative Proposals and Special Petitions. The Committee considers the proposal and makes a recommendation to the Assembly on whether it should be considered. The recommendation and the original memorandum are tabled in the Assembly, which votes on whether to consider the proposal. If it votes in favour, the member may prepare a draft Bill which is then referred to the JTM to be tagged, and the legislative process begins.)

[2] § 17.6*(b)* above

[3] § 17.3*(a)* above.

[4] Merafong Demarcation Forum & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2008 (5) SA 171 (CC), 2008 (10) BCLR 968 (CC), [2008] ZACC 10 ('Merafong').

explicit constitutional prohibition on creating a mediation process for s 74 Bills, no constitutionally prescribed alternative for solving conflicts between the NA and the NCOP, and no principled reason to prevent the NCOP from proposing amendments. This view holds that denying Parliament this power merely promotes inefficiency in the legislative process by forcing Bills that could be passed through mediation to fail and begin the legislative process afresh.

5. Mixed s 75/76 Bills

As we discussed earlier,[1] the Joint Rules make provision for mixed s 75/76 Bills to avoid the possibility of a tagging mistake. These provisions have (wisely) not been implemented because of doubts about their constitutionality. While these might improve the efficiency of the legislative process — by removing the need to split Bills and the possibility of good faith tagging errors — they do not fit the process devised by the Constitution for passing legislation.

Hopefully, these examples demonstrate both that Parliament must have significant power to make rules concerning the legislative process, and that it will sometimes be difficult to tell whether they have moved from making the constitutional process work, to re-writing that process. In our view, the best approach would be twofold. First, a court would ask whether the rule performs a function that is necessary for the law-making process to work. Second, if it is, then the rule will be valid, unless it imposes an unreasonably arduous additional obstacle to passing the legislation. If the rule is not necessary for the law-making process, it will be invalid unless it imposes a negligible obstacle to passing a law. While that is by no means a bright line, it is the beginning of a useful standard.

In addition to limiting Parliament to rules that do not add unnecessary requirements to passing a law, the Legislature must adopt rules that are rationally related to their function. This requirement is best illustrated by the dictum of a US Supreme Court case. In US v Ballin, the Supreme Court was confronted with a disagreement about whether a law had in fact obtained the required majority of votes.[2] The parties disputed the method the House of Representatives used to count votes. 'The constitution', the Court noted, 'has prescribed no method of making this determination, and it is therefore within the competency of the house to prescribe any method which shall be reasonably certain to ascertain the fact.'[3] It continued:

> [The House] may prescribe answer to roll-call as the only method of determination; or require the passage of members between tellers, and their count, as the sole test; or the count of the speaker or the clerk, and an announcement from the desk of the names of those who are present. Any one of these methods, it must be conceded, is reasonably certain of ascertaining the fact; and as there is no constitutional method prescribed, and no constitutional inhibition of any of those, and no violation of fundamental rights in any, it follows that the house may adopt either or all, or it may provide for a combination of any two of the methods.[1]

[1] § 17.6*(b)*(iii) above.
[2] 144 US 1 (1892).
[3] Ibid at 6.

This is really a re-iteration of the standard approach our courts have taken to rationality — as long as the means is related to the end, courts will not ask if there was a better way to achieve the end. That principle will undoubtedly apply to any rules Parliament makes.

(ii) The consequences of non-compliance with the rules

What happens if the NA or the NCOP breaks one of its own rules? There is, again, no simple answer. First, we need to distinguish between three situations: (a) the rule only affects MPs; (b) the rule affects third parties; and (c) the rule affects the legislative process. For each of these situations, a court is likely to take a different approach both to whether the rule has been violated, and to the consequences of violation.

When the rule only concerns MPs — such as the suspension of MP De Lille — courts are likely to defer to Parliament's interpretation of its rules. If the rule affects third parties — such as a rule governing the testimony of witnesses in committee — courts will rightly require stricter adherence to the rules. A person who testifies before Parliament is entitled to have that body obey its own rules. If it fails to do so, a court will set aside any decision that negatively affects the third party.

The most difficult category consists of rules that deal with the legislative process. Where a rule is relatively unimportant and non-compliance with it does not affect the constitutional manner-and-form requirements or make the passage and debate of the Bill undemocratic, courts should probably let it go. It does not serve anybody if every minor good faith mistake in interpreting the rules could result in the invalidity of legislation — and there is no constitutional reason to take that path. However, where the rules mirror or give effect to a constitutional requirement, the position may be different. For example, where there is no electronic voting mechanism, the NA Rules have a complex, multi-step process to count votes. If this process is not followed, and there is some debate about whether the required number of votes was cast, it could be argued that the legislation should be set aside. The real reason for setting the legislation aside is not that it does not comply with the rules, but that there is doubt about whether it complies with the Constitution.

In addition, wherever Parliament or one of its actors acts in bad faith or irrationally in interpreting or applying rules, a court will be able to set it aside on the basis of the rule of law doctrine.

(c) Parliamentary privilege

FC s 58 provides that cabinet members and members of the National Assembly have freedom of speech in the Assembly, subject to its rules and orders, and may not be held criminally or civilly liable for any statements that they make in the Assembly or anything arising out of such statements. FC s 71 contains an equivalent provision for the NCOP. The Constitutional Court has held that the purpose of such protections is to 'encourage vigorous and open debate in the process of decision-making. This is fundamental to democracy.'[1] In a later judgment, Mokgoro J wrote:

[1] 144 US 1 (1892).

> Immunising the conduct of members from criminal and civil liability during council deliberations is a bulwark of democracy. It promotes freedom of speech and expression. It encourages democracy and full and effective deliberation. It removes the fear of repercussion for what is said. This advances effective democratic government.[2]

The importance of the privilege was further confirmed in Speaker of the National Assembly & Another v De Lille. The Supreme Court of Appeal held in De Lille that the freedom of speech conferred by FC s 58(1) was a 'crucial guarantee' and that the remainder of FC s 58 should not be interpreted in a way that would detract from that guarantee.[3]

To understand the scope of this privilege, it is useful to ask four questions. First, in which fora does the privilege apply? Second, to whom does it apply? Third, is there any speech that it does not protect? Fourth, can a member be subjected to internal sanctions for speech?

The geographical scope of the privilege has twice been addressed by the Constitutional Court in the context of s 28(1) of the Local Government: Municipal Structures Act.[4] Since s 28(1) virtually mirrors FC ss 58(1) and 71(1) its interpretation of this section applies with equal force to privilege in the NA and NCOP. In Swartbooi the Court held that:

> The words 'said in', 'produced before' and 'submitted to' the council taken together are wide enough to cover all the conduct in the council that is integral to deliberations at a full council meeting and to the legitimate business of that meeting.[5]

Swartbooi also holds that the privilege will apply to all 'legitimate business' of the NA and NCOP[6] and will apply even to resolutions that are subsequently set aside due to unlawfulness or unconstitutionality.[7]

Dikoko v Mokhatla provided a test of the reach of the privilege. Mr Dikoko, a mayor of a municipality in the North West, was called before a provincial legislative committee to explain his excessive cell phone bill. At the meeting, he made

[1] Swartbooi v Brink 2006 (1) SA 203 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 502 (CC), [2003] ZACC 25 ('Swartbooi') at para 20.

[2] Dikoko v Mokhatla 2006 (6) SA 235 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [2006] ZACC 10 ('Dikoko') at para 39.

[3] De Lille (supra) at para 20.

[4] Act 117 of 1998.

[5] Swartbooi (supra) at para 12. The Court also commented that the 'function or purpose of a committee might well be relevant to the question whether a municipal councillor is exempted from liability for conduct which amounts to participation in the affairs of the committee of a municipal council in a particular case'. Ibid at para 17. The Court found it unnecessary to resolve this issue in Swartbooi because the conduct at issue took place during the full council meeting. However, the issue is equally relevant to the question of privilege in the committees of the NA and NCOP.

[6] Swartbooi (supra) at para 18.

[7] Ibid at para 19.

defamatory remarks about Mr Mokhatla, the CEO of the municipality. Mokhatla sued Dikoko for defamation and the latter claimed privilege. Mokgoro J initially suggested that the case would raise the difficult issue of whether the privilege covers the discussion of legitimate legislative business outside of the formal parliamentary setting. Ultimately, she left the question undecided, as Dikoko's remarks could not be considered legitimate council business, no matter where they occurred.[1]

Although our courts have thus far avoided the issue, it is clearly a difficult one. We briefly discuss some cases from Canada and New Zealand to demonstrate the difficulties that can arise. In Stopforth v Goyer the defendant — a minister — made comments as part of his testimony before a parliamentary committee that defamed the plaintiff.[2] He then repeated those allegations to reporters on the steps of the legislature. The Ontario High Court held that the later statement was not covered by parliamentary privilege. A similar situation in New Zealand had a similar result. In Prebble v Television New Zealand Ltd, the Privy Council held that repeating a statement made in Parliament to reporters was an 'effective repetition' and constituted a fresh act of defamation that was not covered by privilege.[3] The New Zealand Court of Appeal has taken the issue even further: if an MP merely refuses to retreat from defamatory remarks made in Parliament, he can be held liable for defamation.[4] This issue has not arisen in South Africa yet, but it seems that it could threaten the purpose of parliamentary privilege if MPs were unable to repeat or defend their remarks outside of Parliament. An MP would be unable to discuss a statement made in Parliament as part of an ongoing and public debate. As the Constitutional Court has noted, the purpose of the privilege is to promote free debate.

The second question is to whom the privilege applies. FC ss 58 and 71 are fairly explicit: Cabinet members, Deputy Ministers and members of the NA and NCOP. It does not apply to people outside this list testifying before parliamentary committees. In Dikoko the Constitutional Court made it quite clear that these words could not be read to include anybody not explicitly listed.[5]

Third, is there any speech that the privilege does not cover? In Swartbooi, the Court acknowledged the possibility that there could be conduct 'that is so at odds with the values mandated by our Constitution that … the Constitution … could [not] conceivably have contemplated its protection' but found it unnecessary to decide the point.[6] In doing so, the Court raised the questions whether a council member who admitted during council proceedings that they had committed a serious criminal offence would be protected from criminal proceedings and whether councillors could attract personal liability by utilising the council's processes for a party political or other ulterior purpose. While the Court was correct to leave open the possibility that there may be some situation in which privilege is not

[1] Dikoko (supra) at para 40.
[2] 87 D.L.R. (3d) 373.
[3] [1994] 3 NZLR 1 (PC).
[4] Jennings v Buchanan [2002] 3 NZLR 145.
[5] Dikoko (supra) at para 45.
[6] Ibid at para 22.

protected, it must be emphasised that this must only be in highly exceptional circumstances if the protection is not to be silently eroded through uncertainty amongst MPs over whether they are protected.

Finally, while FC ss 58 and 71 protect MPs from civil and criminal liability, they do not exclude the possibility of punishment through Parliament's own rules — FC ss 58(1)(a) and 70(1)(a) make the exercise of freedom of speech subject to the house's rules and orders. Whether Parliament had the power to suspend a member for what she said in parliamentary proceedings was the issue in De Lille. De Lille was a member of the NA who made a statement in the NA suggesting that certain members of the African National Congress had been informers for the pre-1994 apartheid government. The African National Congress used its parliamentary majority to pass a resolution of the NA suspending de Lille as a punishment for her statement.

The Supreme Court of Appeal held that the NA could legitimately exclude members who were 'disrupting or obstructing its proceedings or impairing unreasonably its ability to conduct its business in an orderly or regular manner acceptable in a democratic society.'[1] This was inherent in its power to regulate its own proceedings. However, while it was necessary for Parliament to be able to suspend members who were disrupting debate, Parliament did not need the power to suspend a member after the infraction as punishment.[2] The Court concluded that the suspension imposed on de Lille was not authorized by the Constitution itself nor by any relevant legislation or the rules of the Assembly.[3] The resolution was accordingly held to be void.

This strict reading of FC s 58 is correct. Freedom of speech in Parliament is essential to the political process. The proper functioning of representative democracy depends on MPs having the freedom to speak openly in Parliament. Any issue that is placed beyond the protection of freedom of speech in Parliament is an issue that cannot be addressed by the political process. Moreover, if MPs do not know what they can or cannot say in Parliament without exposing themselves to internal punishment, they will incline towards self-censorship. Such a sword of Damocles would undermine deliberative democracy. In order to avoid these consequences, exceptions to freedom of speech in Parliament must be confined to a minimum and must be clearly defined. FC s 58(1)(a) and 71(1)(a) address these concerns by requiring all such limitations to be codified by the NA and the NCOP in rules which themselves have to be made with due regard to representative and participatory democracy, accountability and transparency.

In terms of FC ss 58(2) and 71(2), national legislation may prescribe additional privileges and immunities of the Assembly, the NCOP, Cabinet members, members of the Assembly and delegates to the NCOP, beyond those provided by FC ss 58(1) and 71(1). The Powers, Privileges and Immunities of Parliament and Provincial Legislatures Act has now fulfilled this role, but has only minimally extended the privileges and immunities already conferred by the Final Constitution.[1]

[1] De Lille (supra) at para 16.

[2] Ibid at para 17, citing Kielly v Clarkson [1842] EngR 593; [1842] 13 ER 225 (PC).

[3] De Lille (supra) at para 30. See also De Lille & Another v Speaker of the National Assembly 1998 (3) SA 430 (C), 1998 (7) BCLR 929 (C)('De Lille HC') at para 35 (Hlophe J reached the same conclusion as the Supreme Court of Appeal on a similar, but somewhat broader basis. He held that the s 58(1) guarantee was not subject to general limitation under s 36 of the Constitution, but could be limited only in terms of the rules and orders of the Assembly. Because the suspension imposed on de Lille was not authorized by the rules of the Assembly, the resolution was held to be an unconstitutional violation of her freedom of speech in the Assembly.)

The Act does, however, specifically permit the suspension of a member as punishment.[2] This solves the authorization problem identified by the Supreme Court of Appeal in De Lille. It could still be argued that ex post facto punishment violates FC s 58(1) and the right to freedom of expression. This was the conclusion of the High Court in De Lille. However, the challenge would have to take the form of a constitutional challenge to the Act. As discussed above, a court reviewing the Act is likely to give the legislature a significant degree of deference as it concerns the internal functioning of Parliament.

17.8 Political Parties

Political parties are integral to the legislative process. They are, ultimately, the bodies that, through their influence over both Parliament and the executive drive, direct and determine the legislative agenda and the outcomes of the legislative process. The role of political parties is particularly intense when one party has a clear majority in both houses.[3] The line between party and government is often blurred and Parliament loses some of its autonomy and may be perceived as a mere implementing agent of the ruling party's policies.

Yet how the law should regulate political parties is a very difficult question. Political parties are the quintessential voluntary association. There is not only a general constitutional right to association,[4] but also a specific right to form a political party[5] and participate in the activities of a political party.[6] State interference in the decisions parties take, or the way they are structured would risk violating these elemental political rights.

Yet, at the same time, political parties take decisions that are decidedly public in character. They effectively determine the membership of the legislature by writing party lists for elections, controlling their own membership and nominating delegates to the NCOP. They often initiate policy, and have enormous power over the executive and the legislature concerning the implementation of policy. It would be naïve to pretend that political parties are just another voluntary association, like a [1] Section 6 of the Act extends the existing privileges and immunities to joint sittings of the two houses.

[2] Powers Act ss 12 and 13.

[3] For a critical discussion of the role of a dominant ANC in South Africa and its relationship with the Constitutional Court, see S Choudhry '"He Had a Mandate"; The South African Constitutional Court and the African National Congress in a Dominant Party Democracy' (2009) 2 Constitutional Court Review 1.

[4] FC s 18(1). See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman & Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31.

[5] FC s 19(1)(a).

[6] FC s 19(1)(b). For a discussion of FC s 19(1), see J Brickhill & R Babiuch 'Political Rights' in S Woolman, Bishop & Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) §45.8.

chess club, a stokvel or a neighbourhood watch organisation. Political parties are different and should be treated differently, but where exactly do we draw the line?

Are they private entities like any other voluntary association, unbound by the strictures that regulate the state? Or are they elements of our constitutional system of government that bear the same constitutional responsibilities and limitations as other organs of state? The answer falls somewhere between these two extremes. In this section we discuss the general role and status of political parties. We then look at how the Constitutional Court has dealt with their role in the legislative process.

(a) Public or Private

There are several decisions that consider whether political parties are public or private bodies. Most of them arise in the context of the right to administrative justice, which is addressed elsewhere in this book.[1] No coherent position has yet emerged as there is significant disagreement at High Court level.

First, in Bushbuck Ridge Border Committee, a local association attempted to force the ANC (and the governments it controlled) to honour a promise made prior to the 1994 elections to move the area where they lived from the Northern Province (now Limpopo) to Mpumalanga.[2] The ANC had attempted to amend the Interim Constitution to that end, but failed to secure the required votes in the NA. The applicants argued that the ANC's failure to fulfil its promise violated their right to just administrative action. Kirk-Cohen J easily rejected the claim directed at the ANC: '[I]t is a political party which did not perform any administrative act, nor could it do so. It merely made promises, as did all concerned, which promises were of a political nature.'[3]

In Marais v Democratic Alliance the court considered whether a decision to strip the mayor of Cape Town of his membership of a political party — and thereby remove him from office — constituted administrative action.[4] Van Zyl J concluded that the decision was a purely political one that, despite the public interest in the outcome, could not be described as administrative action. However, the court nonetheless set the party's decision aside for failing to comply with the rules of natural justice.[5]

[1] J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 63.

[2] Bushbuck Ridge Border Committee & Another v Government of the Northern Province & Others 1999 (2) BCLR 193 (T).

[3] Ibid.

[4] 2002 (2) BCLR 171 (C).

[5] This decision applied the common law standard of administrative review and so is not directly applicable under the new, constitutionalised system of administrative law. However, the decision may still be used to interpret the meaning of administrative action under PAJA.

Third, in Van Zyl v New National Party & Others[1] — a case that reflects naked political maneuvering[2] — the High Court held that the decision of a political party to recall a provincial delegate to the NCOP was administrative action under the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act ('PAJA').[3] Van Reenen J concluded that PAJA applied to all juristic persons — including political parties — who performed administrative acts as defined in PAJA. The main question was whether the decision to recall Van Zyl was 'public'. The Judge reasoned that the decision to recall 'has an influence on how the NCOP; the delegations of the respective provinces; and the joint committees on which delegates may serve, are constituted and may affect the manner in which those bodies perform their functions and duties, and that in turn may impact upon the interests of the community on provincial and national levels. Accordingly the exercising of that authority has a strong public component.'[4]

While Marais and Van Zyl support the proposition that that decisions of political parties that impact on who holds public office are 'public', the disclosure of who funds political parties is not, according to Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Others v African National Congress & Others, a public issue.[5] IDASA — an NGO working in support of good government — wanted to use the Promotion of Access to Information Act ('PAIA')[6] to force the four main political parties to disclose records of the donations they had received. One of the questions the High Court had to answer to decide the claim was whether political parties were public or private bodies in terms of PAIA.[7] The Act defined public bodies as including any 'functionary or institution when — (i) exercising a power or performing a duty in terms of the Constitution or a provincial constitution; or (ii) exercising a public power or performing a public function in terms of any legislation.' The important word here, as Griesel J noted, is 'when'. PAIA later makes explicit[8] that an institution can be public with respect to certain functions, but private regarding other actions. The IDASA Court concluded that, with respect to soliciting and receiving donations, political parties were acting entirely as private, voluntary associations.[9]

[1] 2003 (10) BCLR 1167 (C)('Van Zyl').

[2] Van Zyl — a member of the Western Cape provincial legislature — was subject to party disciplinary proceedings for proposing a motion of thanks to a disgraced former Premier. While those proceedings were ongoing, the Party nominated her as a delegate to the NCOP. In order to accept the post, she resigned her membership of the Provincial Legislature. Immediately following her appointment to the NCOP, the Provincial Legislature (dominated by the Party's members) passed a vote of no confidence in her ability to represent the province in the NCOP. The Party then resolved to recall her from the NCOP. The offer of the NCOP position was simply an elaborate political ploy to strip Van Zyl of her political influence without concluding the internal disciplinary process.

[3] Act 3 of 2000.

[4] Van Zyl (supra) at para 76.

[5] 2005 (5) SA 39 (C), [2005] 3 All SA 45 (C), [2005] ZAWCHC 30 ('IDASA'). For a discussion of the case, see S Bosch 'IDASA v ANC — An Opportunity Lost for Truly Promoting Access to Information' (2006) 123 SALJ 615.

[6] Act 2 of 2000.

[7] This was an important distinction because public bodies have a wider duty of disclosure than private bodies. Private bodies need only disclose information that is 'required for the 'exercise or protection of any rights'. PAIA s 50(1)(a).

[8] PAIA s 8(1).

[9] IDASA (supra) at paras 30-32.

'Such activities, insofar as they relate to the private funding of political parties, are not regulated by legislation. The respondents are, accordingly, entirely at liberty to generate an income from any lawful means, including donations, soliciting contributions from members, the sale of merchandise, the realisation of investments, and the like.'[1]

IDASA nicely demonstrates the current position: some activities of political parties are 'public', others are not. This is likely to be the case whether the challenge is based on PAJA, PAIA, other legislation, or the Constitution. Political parties occupy a strange hybrid position between a private voluntary association and organ of state. The law needs to recognise both faces — public and private. The courts have yet to develop a full theory identifying which powers or functions are public and which are private. And we do not attempt to do so here. It is an issue that is likely to be decided, to indulge in cliché, 'one case at a time'.

(b) The Role of Political Parties in the Legislative Process

While the previous section considered the general question of the nature of political parties and how the law regulates their actions, this section looks at the relationship between parties and the legislature. Some of the most contentious political struggles in recent years have raised the complicated relationship between the ANC as a political party, the ANC-led government, and the political strucutres that mediate and dictate the actions and policies of both the party and the state. The Court has uniformly declined to police the boundary between party and legislature.

When the Constitutional Court considered the challenge to floor-crossing legislation in United Democratic Movement,[2] the applicants argued that the legislation was irrational because its purpose was to promote the interests of the ANC and the New National Party. The Court was not impressed. In its view, the argument improperly 'equate[d] purpose with motive.'[3] Courts, it held, should not be 'concerned with the motives of the members of the legislature who vote in favour of particular legislation'.[4] In hewing to a clear separation between law and politics, the Court defined its role as confined to determining whether the legislation itself is constitutional.

In Glenister I the Court rejected an argument that it should intervene to prevent Parliament from considering a Bill on the basis that the Bill was introduced by Cabinet on the instruction of the ruling party.[5] The applicant contended that the purpose of abolishing the Directorate of Special Operations (better known as 'the Scorpions') was its success in prosecuting corruption within the ruling party. This allegation was not enough to move the Court to action. '[T]here is nothing wrong,'

[1] IDASA (supra) at para 30.

[2] United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (African Christian Democratic Party & Others Intervening ; Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Another as Amici Curiae) (No 2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC), [2002] ZACC 21 ('UDM').

[3] UDM (supra) at para 56.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2009 (1) SA 287 (CC), 2009 (2) BCLR 136 (CC), [2008] ZACC 19 ('Glenister').

Langa CJ wrote, 'in our multi-party democracy, with Cabinet seeking to give effect to the policy of the ruling party.'[1]

A similar issue arose in Merafong.[2] The challengers alleged that the facilitation of participation by the Gauteng Provincial Legislature was a charade because the issue invoked in the proposed legislation had already been decided by the ANC National Executive Committee ('NEC'). The NEC had allegedly instructed its members in Parliament and the provincial legislatures to vote in favour of the proposed change. The Court took a slightly different approach.

The Court did not reject this submission outright. Van der Westhuizen J held, first, that the community had failed to prove that the members present at the hearings were not open to their concerns. He also held that public participation does not mean that 'the views expressed by the public are binding on the legislature if they are in direct conflict with the policies of Government.'[3] However, finding that the public's views are not binding 'is not the same as cynically stating that the legislature is not required to keep an open mind when engaging in a process of that kind. Public involvement cannot be meaningful in the absence of a willingness to consider all views expressed by the public.'[4] The Merafong Court's holding implies that legislators have a duty to be willing to consider views opposed to the views of the party they represent. Of course, this duty is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to enforce.[5] However it does suggest that the Court now possesses a more nuanced vision the relationship between parties and Parliament.

One of the Court's more recent direct examination of the ANC's influence on Parliament — Poverty Alleviation Network[6] — also concerned provincial boundary legislation, and seems to close down some of the space left open in Merafong (although in a different doctrinal context). As discussed earlier,[7] Matatiele Municipality had been moved from KwaZulu-Natal to the Eastern Cape. The Court found that the KwaZulu-Natal provincial legislature had not met its constitutional obligation to facilitate public involvement and struck the law down. The legislature — in line with the ANC policy on the matter — duly passed the legislation again,[8] this time following the correct procedure. The people of Matatiele again took their case to the Constitutional Court. They argued that the law was irrational because the legislators simply voted as they were instructed by the ANC. Rehashing the Court's reasoning in UDM and Merafong, Nkabinde J complained that the 'argument requires the Court to go behind the rationally enacted constitutional

[1] Glenister I (supra) at para 53. We must note one caveat about this holding: It was based on the very high hurdle for intervention before a Bill becomes an act.

[2] Merafong Demarcation Forum & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2008 (5) SA 171 (CC), 2008 (10) BCLR 968 (CC), [2008] ZACC 10, ('Merafong').

[3] Ibid at para 50.

[4] Ibid at para 51.

[5] In the absence of some sort of 'smoking gun', it will be impossible to prove that an MP was not open to convincing as she will always be able to allege that she simply weighed the arguments and came down on the side of government policy.

[6] Poverty Alleviation Network & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others, 2010 (6) BCLR 520 (CC), [2010] ZACC 5 ('Poverty Alleviation Network').

[7] See §17.6*(a)(ii)(cc)*(4) above.

[8] Thirteenth Constitutional Amendment, 2007.

amendment and investigate the motives of Parliament and the ruling party. This the Court cannot do.'[1] She continued:

> The Court cannot concern itself with the individual motives of legislators. There is good reason for this: if the Court preoccupies itself with what precedes the passing of the legislation (the motive), to the exclusion of its actual purpose, it would fail to focus on the proper object of the enquiry, which is the rationality of the legislation and not necessarily the motives of those who enacted it.[2]

Together, UDM, Glenister I, Merafong and Poverty Alleviation Network paint a picture of a Court unwilling to ensure that the legislatures retain some autonomy from the ruling party's internal decision-making bodies. While it would probably prefer parties to afford legislators some leeway, it will not prevent a party from forcing its members in the country's legislative bodies from adhering to party discipline.

Sujit Choudhry has recently argued that these cases 'reflect[ ] the Court's inadequate understanding of the concept of a dominant party democracy, its pathologies, the pressure it puts on what is otherwise a formally liberal democratic system because of the lack of alternation of power between political parties, and how this pressure is generating constitutional challenges.'[3] He has suggested an alternative set of doctrines that would afford the Court a central role in regulating the relationship between party and state.

South Africa, Choudhry argues, is a dominant party democracy — a democracy where one party retains power for a significant period of time. 'Dominant party democracies', he argues, 'display a characteristic set of pathologies:'

> (a) the use of public resources by dominant political parties as political [resources] to distort electoral competition;
> (b) deliberate attempts by dominant parties to change the rules of electoral competition to fragment opposition parties and diminish their ability to offer a credible alternative;
> (c) the erosion of federalism to undermine the ability of opposition parties to form governments at the sub-national level and deploy the political resources provided by incumbency to enhance their competitiveness at the national level;
> (d) the subordination of the parliamentary wing of a dominant political party to its non-parliamentary wing, thereby shifting politics into the party and out of the legislature, diminishing the central role of the legislature in national political life.[4]

All of these practices are present — to varying degrees — in South Africa.

Choudhry argues that the Constitutional Court should play a strong role in trying to avoid the dangers of dominant party democracy. He suggests five doctrines that the Court could employ to achieve that end. First: 'anti-domination'. This doctrine would outlaw 'any exercise of public power that has as its principal goal the preservation, enhancement or entrenchment of the dominant status of a dominant political party.'[5] UDM is an example of this phenomenon because floor-crossing

[1] Poverty Alleviation Network (supra) at para 73.
[2] Ibid.
[3] S Choudhry "'He Had a Mandate"; The South African Constitutional Court and the African National Congress in a Dominant Party Democracy' (2009) 2 Constitutional Court Review 1.
[4] Choudhry (supra) at 32.
[5] Ibid at 34.

was designed — at least in part[1] — to increase the ANC's majorities in the national and provincial legislatures. Although the Court was rightly hesitant to examine legislators' motives in all cases, Choudhry's anti-domination doctrine is limited to laws which are motivated by a desire to entrench the power of the dominant party.

Second, Choudhry argues that courts should not permit the dominant party to capture independent institutions. In a dominant party democracy, independent institutions prevent abuse of power by the ruling party by taking decisions that would otherwise be taken by the state. The role of courts is to 'focus their efforts on strengthening and buttressing the institutional structures that check partisan abuse in dominant party democracies, as opposed to checking those individual abuses themselves.'[2]

Third, the non-usurpation doctrine aims to prevent elected representatives from having all of their actions determined by unelected structures and members of the party. Merafong and Poverty Alleviation Network are, on Choudhry's telling, examples of this unwelcome phenomenon. 'The real problem', he contends, 'is not abdication; it is the seizure of public power. The purpose of the [non-usurpation] doctrine is to protect public officials who are democratically elected, and through them, the democratic process, from unelected party officials who lack democratic legitimacy and attempt to usurp and wield public power.'[3] The Constitutional Court should, Choudhry argues, have relied on this doctrine — rather than public participation or rationality — to invalidate the ANC's attempt to instruct legislators how to vote on the boundary amendments. While enthusiastic about this doctrine in theory, Choudhry notes that the evidentiary difficulties of determining who took a decision will cause courts to under-enforce the doctrine.[4]

Finally, Choudhry takes on cadre deployment. In his view, the ultimate evil of the ANC's dominance is the deployment and removal at whim of its members from legislative and executive posts. The ANC's power to dictate to MPs and MPLs how to vote ultimately 'depends on the threat of deployment, and redeployment, to be effective. If political office-holders do not toe the party line, they can be removed by the ANC NEC, and replaced with cadres who will be compliant. Thus, dictation presupposes deployment.'[5] Choudhry's opposition to cadre deployment takes two forms: anti-seizure and anti-centralisation. Drawing on decisions of the German Constitutional Court,[6] he argues that cadre deployment 'directly rob[s] voters of their power', because '[i]nstead of voters electing MPs through their inclusion

[1] The main opposition party, the Democratic Alliance, also supported the legislation as it hoped to gain seats as a result.

[2] Choudhry (supra) at 52.

[3] Ibid at 67.

[4] Choudhry (supra) at 70 ('The relationship between the parliamentary and non-parliamentary wings of political parties in fact lies on a continuum, between the poles of complete independence and subservience. There will be numerous situations in which the interplay between both wings of the party will defy easy categorisation. The evidence will be ambiguous. Moreover, the precise location of ultimate decision-making power may vary by issue. … Indeed, judicial self-doubt regarding the dangers of over-enforcement — ie to label a public decision as occurring under dictation, when in fact, it did not — may prompt courts to systematically under-enforce the doctrine of nonusurpation.')

[5] Ibid at 70.

[6] Ibid at 72 citing DP Currie The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (1995) 106-7.

in a list, MPs can be removed and appointed by the ANC NEC.'[1] The anti-seizure doctrine would find the ANC's statutory power to deploy MPs unconstitutional. The anti-centralisation doctrine applies the anti-seizure doctrine to the provinces. The anti-centralisation doctrine recognises that the Constitution's commitment to 'co-operative government' between distinct spheres or levels of government is undermined by the concentration of power that should be held by the majorities of provincial legislatures in a single, unelected, national body: the ANC NEC.[2]

Choudhry offers a coherent and comprehensive alternative to the Court's current evasion of the problem of continued ANC dominance of the political scene. We remain agnostic about whether his approach is, all-things-considered, to be preferred. While attractive, it has significant weaknesses. First, were the Court to enforce these doctrines in the manner that Choudhry suggests, it would place itself on a direct collision course with the ANC. That may put the Court's very existence at risk. Second, all Choudhry's doctrines rely on clear evidence of who took a decision or why the decision was taken. That will often be impossible to determine with any certainty. A court — while generally sympathetic to Choudhry's concerns — may feel unable to assume that the ANC or the legislature has acted with a nefarious motive unless there is unquestionable proof. Third, Choudhry's approach means that practices that are permissible in a competitive political environment become threats to democracy when one party controls all the levers of power. There are sound interpretative reasons to believe that the Constitution should remain constant no matter what the current balance of political power might be.

Finally, several of Choudhry's doctrines — particularly the anti-domination doctrine — could themselves be seen as anti-democratic. When an overwhelming majority of the population places their votes and their faith in a party, does it really promote democracy for an unelected judiciary to put obstacles in its way? Our objection does not simply re-hash the counter-majoritarian chestnut. Choudhry's thesis is not merely that courts should apply the law and if that thwarts the ruling party, so be it. His thesis is that the courts should actively interpret the law so as to try and curb the power of a dominant party: The stronger the democratic mandate, the more courts are justified in hindering it. Can Choudhry's suspicion of centralised control really be reconciled with our proportional representation, list-based electoral system where voters vote for the party — with all its policies, structures and leadership — rather than individual candidates?[3] While we take no stand, that is a possible troublesome implication.

Despite our skepticism regarding both the practical utility and the substantive virtue of the Choudhry doctrine, in 2011 the Court indicated that it might be willing at least to start down that path. In Glenister II, a narrow majority of the Constitutional Court held that the Constitution imposed a duty on the legislature to enact an independent corruption-fighting body.[1] The decision needs to be understood against the political background that led to the challenge. The original anti-corruption body — the Scorpions — was housed in the National Prosecuting Authority. It investigated several high-ranking ANC officials, including Jacob Zuma. It was accused — not without possible justification — of being used as a political weapon by one faction against another within the ANC. When Zuma won the ANC presidency from Thabo Mbeki at the 2007 ANC Polokwane Conference, one of the primary resolutions of the ruling party was to abolish the Scorpions. They were ultimately replaced with a new body called 'the Hawks'. The Hawks, unlike the Scorpions were located in the South African Police Service.[2] Hugh Glenister — a concerned businessman — challenged the legislation on various grounds.

[1] Choudhry (supra) at 73 (Moreover: 'The ANC NEC can remove a President, regardless of whether she has lost the confidence of the National Assembly. The ANC NEC can likewise remove a member of the cabinet, regardless of whether she has been dismissed by the President, or whether the National Assembly has passed a motion of no-confidence in the cabinet.' Ibid.)

[2] Ibid at 76.

[3] We thank Jason Brickhill for alerting us to this problem.

While the Court rejected public participation[3] and rationality challenges, the majority accepted the argument that the legislation violated the government's s 7(2) duty to respect, protect and promote the Bill of Rights. Moseneke DCJ and Cameron J held that s 7(2) requires the government to establish an independent unit to fight corruption. In their view, the Hawks were insufficiently independent. We discussed the wisdom of the Court's use of s 7(2) above.[4] Here, we consider the details of the majority's views on the Hawks' independence.

There were two primary reasons why the Glenister II Court found the Hawks' structural guarantees of independence inadequate. First, the security of employment was insufficiently guarded. In sum: 'the lack of employment security, including the existence of renewable terms of office and of flexible grounds for dismissal that do not rest on objectively verifiable grounds like misconduct or ill-health, are incompatible with adequate independence. So too is the absence of statutorily secured remuneration levels. We have further found that the appointment of its members is not sufficiently shielded from political influence.'[5]

Second, the Court's 'gravest disquiet' lay with the political oversight of the Hawks. The legislation empowered a Ministerial Committee to set policy guidelines for the Hawks. While it acknowledged that the Committee could issue perfectly innocent guidelines, it was also possible that the guidelines could 'specify categories of offences that it is not appropriate for the [Hawks] to investigate — or, conceivably, categories of political office-bearers whom the [Hawks] is prohibited from investigating.'[6] In the clearest suggestion that the history of corruption investigations of senior government officials was playing on their minds, Moseneke DCJ and Cameron J wrote:

[1] Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2011 (3) SA 347 (CC), [2011] ZACC 6 ('Glenister II').

[2] For more on the demise of the Scorpions and the rise of the Hawks, as well as Glenister I and Glenister II, see S Woolman 'Security Services' in S Woolman, M Bishop & J Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, RS3, 2011) Chapter 23B.

[3] § 17.6*(a)(iii)(cc)*(5) above.

[4] § 17.5*(f)*(i) above.

[5] Glenister II (supra) at para 249.

[6] Ibid at para 230.

> It cannot be disputed that those very political executives [on the Ministerial Committee] could themselves, were the circumstances to require, be the subject of anti-corruption investigations. They "oversee" an anti-corruption entity when of necessity they are themselves part of the operational field within which it is supposed to function.[1]

The majority could easily have said that they should presume that the power to issue guidelines would not be abused. The Court's heightened suspicion can best be explained by a fear that the political elite would exploit the power for its own ends. That makes the finding a classic example of Choudhry's 'anti-capture' and 'anti-domination' doctrines in action. Glenister II must encourage those who hope that the Court can be an effective tool to manage the ANC's continued political dominance nationally and the DA's control of the Western Cape.

[1] Glenister II (supra) at para 232.

18 The President and the National Executive

Christina Murray & Richard Stacey

18.1 Introduction 18-1
18.2 The President as Head of State and Head of the National Executive 18-4
(a) Distinguishing the President as Head of State and as Head of the National Executive 18-5
(b) The President as Head of State 18-8
(c) The President as Head of the national executive 18-16
(i) Specific powers allocated by the Constitution to the President as head of the national executive . . . 18-17
(ii) Allocating portfolios, transferring functions under FC s 97 and temporary assignment of functions under FC s 98 18-20
(iii) Review of executive decisions taken by the President as head of the national executive. 18-21
(d) Formalities and executive decision making by the President — FC s 101. 18-21
(e) Appointment, end of term and removal 18-23
(f) The President in court. 18-25
18.3 Cabinet 18-27
(a) Appointment and dismissal of Cabinet members and Deputy Ministers and assignment of portfolios. 18-27
(b) The President, the Presidency and Cabinet committees. . . . 18-29
(c) Powers of Cabinet 18-30
(d) A collaborative venture — Cabinet decision making . . . 18-32
(i) Cabinet solidarity. 18-32
(ii) Executive decision-making 18-35
(iii) Accountability and responsibility 18-38
(iv) Who is bound by Cabinet solidarity and for what are Cabinet members accountable? 18-39

(e) Individual ministerial accountability 18-40
(f) Outsourcing, privatisation and Cabinet accountability . . 18-43
(i) Outsourcing arrangements 18-44
(ii) Privatisation 18-46
(g) Votes of no confidence under FC s 102 18-50
(h) Ethics 18-51
(i) The Minister of Finance 18-52
(j) Executive control of the defence force 18-53
(k) Foreign affairs 18-55
(l) Assignment and delegation of executive powers under FC ss 99 and 238 18-60
18.4 Multisphere Government 18-63
(a) FC ss 100 and 139: Interventions in provinces and municipalities 18-64
(b) FC s 125 18-65

18.1 Introduction

The President, who is elected by the National Assembly, is both Head of State and head of the national executive. In exercising powers as Head of State, the President acts alone.[1] However, when the President exercises 'executive authority'[2] he or she must do so together with the other members of Cabinet.[3] The Cabinet consists of the President, the Deputy President and Ministers,[4] all but two of whom must be drawn from the National Assembly. It is the Cabinet that governs the country, and all members of Cabinet are accountable to Parliament for the exercise of their powers.[5]

These apparently simple provisions frame a complicated, and sometimes unclear, set of legal and political relationships. The relationships between Cabinet and the President when 'Head of State' powers are exercised and between the President and the incumbents sof positions established by the Final Constitution, for instance, are particularly unclear. Secondly, the relationship between Cabinet and Parliament, briefly sketched in the Final Constitution, must be understood in the context of a complex matrix of constitutional, political and administrative arrangements that characterise the modern state. Thirdly, as government itself changes, and the influence of the New Public Management is felt in public administration in South Africa, relationships between Ministers, parastatals, privatised institutions providing public services and Parliament, are changing. Difficult questions of accountability are thrown up by these changes.

This chapter considers these issues. Its focus, like Chapter 5 of the Final Constitution, is the national executive. It is not concerned with what the Final Constitution terms the 'public administration' (often referred to as the public service and dealt with elsewhere in this work).[6] Instead it covers the constitutional arrangements that relate to the politicians who are collectively responsible for government in South Africa: the President and Ministers who form the national executive, as well as Deputy Ministers. Thus, following the Final Constitution, it uses the term 'the executive' more narrowly than many commentators who might include under it the Presidency, departmental Directors General and others.[7]

The way in which what the Final Constitution terms 'executive authority' is exercised is a central concern of the chapter. The Final Constitution uses the term 'executive authority' to describe the power vested in the National Executive

* We would like to thank Jeremy Raizon for excellent research assistance.

1 FC s 84(2).

2 Under FC s 85(1) the executive authority of South Africa is vested in the President.

3 FC s 85(2).

4 FC s 91(1).

5 FC s 92.

6 See A Bodasing 'Public Administration' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 23A.

7 See, for example, A Butler Contemporary South Africa (2004) 92-95.

but does not define it. Instead, FC s 85(2) explains how executive authority may be exercised. The list the section provides — which includes developing policy, coordinating the functions of government departments and implementing legislation — describes the familiar role of government: the national executive is responsible for implementing laws. But, more broadly, it also has the power to carry out the political agenda of the governing party provided that it acts within the constraints of the Final Constitution and has the support of Parliament.

(a) A parliamentary system

Political scientists often divide systems of government into three broad categories: parliamentary, presidential and 'hybrid'.[1] Usually, a purely presidential system has (i) a directly elected president,[2] who (ii) serves a fixed term; (iii) is both head of state and head of the national executive; (iv) is not accountable to the legislature; and (v) is subject to removal by the legislature only in special circumstances. On the other hand, a parliamentary system is characterised by a separate head of state and chief executive officer (usually called a Prime Minister) and an executive that (i) is comprised of members of the legislature; (ii) serves terms that are not fixed; and (iii) is accountable to Parliament. In parliamentary systems accountability to Parliament means that the executive must retain the confidence of Parliament to govern and can, usually, be dismissed by a simple majority. Most democratic systems, and almost all of those in Africa, now fall somewhere between these two models. The French system is, of course, the most famous hybrid, and many African jurisdictions have emulated it. There is a large number of variations. In Africa, elements of a presidential system tend to dominate political structures, and South Africa is one of just seven sub-Saharan countries that can be said to have a parliamentary system.[3]

Of course, no two systems of government are identical and South Africa's departs in a number of ways from the Westminster model of parliamentary democracy from which it was derived. First, in South Africa, the President is both Head of State and head of the executive and, although he or she must be elected from amongst the members of the National Assembly, once elected, the President

[1] This characterization risks oversimplification. Many studies propose more categories. See, for instance, A Siaroff 'Comparative Presidencies: The Inadequacy of the Presidential, Semi-presidential and Parliamentary Distinction' (2003) 42 European Journal of Political Research 287; A Siaroff 'Varieties of Parliamentarianism in the Advanced Industrial Democracies' (2003) 24 International Political Science Review 445. However, for the purposes of understanding the South African system, the key differences are captured by the traditional tripartite division used here.

[2] In other words, such a president is elected by the people on a ballot that is separate from the election and the ballot for the national legislature.

[3] The other parliamentary systems in Africa are in Botswana, Lesotho, Mauritius, Eritrea, Ethiopia and, depending on one's definition, Swaziland.

relinquishes his or her seat in the Assembly.[1] Second, two Cabinet Ministers may be chosen from outside the National Assembly.[2] Third, the term of Parliament is fixed to the extent that usually the National Assembly may not be dissolved within three years of an election.[3] These features distinguish South Africa's system from many in the Commonwealth. In particular, the fusion of head of state and head of executive in a single 'president' who is not a member of Parliament prompts the idea that the system is a presidential one. This deviation from the traditional parliamentary model may affect the manner of political leadership, but it has very little impact on the formal constitutional or legal operation of government. It is likely that the restriction on the National Assembly's power to call early elections is the more meaningful departure from the usual parliamentary arrangements. It is intended to introduce stability into the system by stopping opportunistic elections. But even this change to the system is not absolute. If the National Assembly does not elect a new President after a vote of no confidence under FC 102(2), the Acting President must call an election even if fewer than three years have elapsed since the last national election.[4]

Currently, three political, rather than constitutional, considerations distinguish South Africa from the parliamentary systems on which it is modelled: (1) dominance of the governing African National Congress Party (leading to South Africa's classification as a one-party-dominant state);[5] (2) the absence of parliamentary practices such as a regular and robust 'question time' in which the President as head of the executive and other Cabinet members must defend government policy;[6] and (3) the very limited chance of a change of government in the foreseeable future. These differences mean that government in South Africa often

[1] FC s 83. The Constitution Eighteenth Amendment Bill introduced in the National Assembly as a private member's Bill in June 2007 proposed the substitution of the President as Head of State and head of the national executive by a President as Head of State and a Prime Minister as head of the national executive. The preamble and the explanatory memorandum to the Bill argue that an executive Head of State is besmirched by ordinary politics while a Head of State 'above … political influence' can better fulfil his or her role as guarantor of the Constitution and institutional integrity. Similarly, an executive Prime Minister is able to carry out executive and policy responsibilities of government without concerning him- or herself with matters of State. For discussions of the roles of Presidents and Prime Ministers, see R Rose 'Presidents and Prime Ministers' (1988) 25/2 Society 61 and M Shugart & J Carey Presidents and Assemblies: Constitutional Design and Electoral Dynamics (1992) 28ff

[2] FC s 91(3)(c). Ministers may be appointed from outside Parliament in other parliamentary systems. Such appointments occur occasionally in the UK and Canada but then arrangements will be made to secure a seat for that person as soon as possible. On Canada, see P Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (2001-1) 9.7. Australia allows ministers to be chosen from outside Parliament but they must secure a seat in Parliament within three months. Constitution of Australia s 64.

[3] FC s 50(1).

[4] FC s 50(2).

[5] On the governing dominance of the ANC and South Africa's classification as a one-party dominant state, see H Giliomee and C Simkins (eds) The Awkward Embrace: One Party-Domination and Democracy (1999).

[6] For criticism of the question-time practices in the National Assembly and the NCOP, see C Murray and L Nijzink Building Representative Democracy: South Africa's legislatures and the Constitution (2002) 92-96; J February 'More than a Law-Making Production Line? Parliament and its Oversight Role' in S Buhlungu, J Daniel, R Southall and J Lutchman (eds) South Africa 2005-2006: State of the Nation (2006) 137-138; L Nijzink 'Opposition in the New South African Parliament' (2001) 8 Democratization 53.

looks very different from that in other parliamentary systems in the Commonwealth. Nevertheless, while South Africa develops its own practices, it is helpful to understand the way in which the systems with which it has most in common operate. Accordingly, we refer to practice in other parliamentary democracies where that is appropriate.

18.2 The President as Head of State and Head of the National Executive

FC s 83 opens Chapter 5 of the Final Constitution with the emphatic statement that '[t]he President … is the Head of State and head of the national executive'.[1] It continues that the President must 'uphold, defend and respect the Constitution as the supreme law of the Republic',[2] and, somewhat more generally, 'promote[] the unity of the nation and that which will advance the Republic'.[3] As the Final Constitution is the only source of power, the President may exercise only those powers conferred on him or her by the Final Constitution or by law that is consitent with the Final Constitution.[4] Where the President acts ultra vires, his or her actions are inconsistent with the Final Constitution and invalid.[5]

These constitutional arrangements mean that whenever the President acts, he or she must do so either as Head of State or as head of the national executive. FC ss 84 and 85 set out the powers of the two positions. The Constitutional Court has accepted that the powers and functions listed in FC s 84(2) are incidences of the President's role as Head of State, while those listed in FC s 85(2) are incidences of the President's role as head of the national executive:[6] even though the Final Constitution itself is not explicit in this regard. Indeed, the only explicit difference between the powers and functions of the President under FC ss 84 and 85 is the requirement of collective action in the latter section. The President exercises or performs the powers and functions set out in FC s 85(2) 'together with the other members of the Cabinet', while the President alone 'is responsible for' the functions set out in FC s 84(2). The exercise of executive authority in terms of FC s 85(2) is thus 'a collaborative venture in terms of which the President acts together with the other members of Cabinet'.[7] As [1] FC s 202(1) establishes the President as Commander-in-Chief of the defence force but stipulates clearly that this power is an incident of the President's position as head of the executive.

[2] FC s 83(2)(b).

[3] FC s 83(2)(c).

[4] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA and Another: In re Ex parte President of the RSA and Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC)('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers') at paras 17-20. See further I Currie & J De Waal The New Constitutional & Administrative Law Volume 1: Constitutional Law (2001) 235-237 (On the position of presidential powers not enumerated in the Constitution or national legislation.)

[5] FC s 2.

[6] President of the Republic of South Africa v South African Rugby Football Union 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC)('SARFU III') at para 144. See also President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC)('Hugo') at paras 5-7 and § 18.2 (a), (b) and (c) infra.

[7] SARFU III (supra) at para 41. See § 18.3 (d) infra.

Head of State, however, the President need consult no one when exercising a power or performing a function.[1]

(a) Distinguishing the President as Head of State and as head of the national executive

FC s 84(2) provides a precise list of the functions that the President performs as Head of State while FC s 85(2) describes broadly the ambit of executive authority that must be exercised by the President together with Cabinet. These constitutional provisions suggest that when the President merely formalises a decision made elsewhere, he or she usually acts as Head of State. But, where the exercise of a power involves some element of political discretion, that power usually falls within the President's capacity as head of the national executive and triggers the requirement that Cabinet support the decision.[2]

The presidential power of appointment provides a useful platform from which to distinguish the President's powers as Head of State and as head of the national executive because the President makes appointments in each of these roles. FC s 84(2)(e) empowers the President to make 'any appointments that the Constitution or legislation requires [him or her] to make, other than as head of the national executive'. FC s 85(2)(e), in turn, contemplates that the President will exercise any power and perform any function provided for in the Constitution or in national legislation together with the Cabinet, which may include appointments. FC ss 173(3) and (4), for example, empower the President, 'as head of the national executive', to appoint the Chief Justice, Deputy Chief Justice, the President and Deputy President of the Supreme Court of Appeal, and the remaining judges of the Constitutional Court. Similarly, FC s 209(2) requires the President 'as head of the national executive' to appoint the heads of the national intelligence agencies. On the other hand, using the language of Westminster, FC s 174(6) states that the President must make other judicial appointments 'on the advice of the Judicial Service Commission' (JSC). No mention is made of the capacity in which the President acts in this section, but the absence of the qualification 'as head of the national executive' and the language of the provision (indicating that the President has no discretion and is bound to appoint the candidates that the JSC selects), support the view that the President acts as Head of State under FC s 84(2)(e) in such cases.[3] Similarly, FC s 193(4) requires the President to appoint members of the Chapter 9 institutions 'on the recommendation of the National

[1] But see the discussion of FC s 101, § 18.2 (d) infra.

[2] This requirement is captured in the South African system by the words 'together with the other members' in FC s 85(2).

[3] The term 'on the advice of' means 'on the instruction of' and leaves no discretion. See C Murray 'Who Chooses Constitutional Court Judges?' (1999) 116 SALJ 865, 865; H Corder 'Judicial Authority in a Changing South Africa' (2004) 24 Legal Studies 253, 263; Currie & De Waal New Constitutional and Administrative Law (supra) at 304.

Assembly'. No discretion can be exercised here and the President acts as Head of State, formalising decisions made in the National Assembly.

This interpretation of the different roles of the President, which categorises those functions which are formalities as Head of State functions and those which require discretion to be exercised as head of executive functions is supported by practice. The Manual of Executive Acts of the President states that '[t]he Office of the President interprets … Head of State appointments to be those appointments that the President makes for ceremonial or similar reasons such as when he is required to merely confirm candidates selected by another body or when he appoints persons under his powers listed under section 84(2) of the Constitution'.[1]

However, the division of the President's position into Head of State and head of the national executive with the power to act alone only in the first role and an obligation to act 'together with' Cabinet in the second, is not as clear cut as the opening words of Chapter 5 of the Final Constitution may suggest. First, FC s 84(1) is ambiguous: 'The President has the powers entrusted by the Constitution and legislation, including those necessary to perform the functions of Head of State and head of the national executive.' This section cannot be read to mean that the President has powers other than those that fall under one or other of the two named roles. The language of FC s 83, the absence of any other indication in the Final Constitution that the President has some other functions, and the fact that such a grant of authority would be a significant departure from usual understandings of the functions of the head of executive in both parliamentary and presidential systems, do not admit this interpretation. Instead, the better interpretation is that FC s 83 is a catch-all provision inserted to ensure that the President has all the power necessary to carry out the functions that he or she is given under the Final Constitution or legislation.[2]

A second question linked to the constitutional division of presidential powers between those exercised as Head of State and those exercised as head of the national executive is whether or not the list in s 84(2) is exhaustive of the powers of the president as Head of State. It is clear that none of the old common-law prerogative powers (that are not listed) continue to exist.[3] But the fact that the prerogative no longer exists is not conclusive of the question of whether all the powers that the President may exercise as Head of State are listed in FC s 84(2). Although the structure of the Final Constitution and the

[1] Executive and Legal Services: Office of the President Manual of Executive Acts of the President of the Republic of South Africa (March 1999) at para 3.10.

[2] In a careful interpretation of this provision, Currie & De Waal argue similarly, pointing to the distinction between 'powers' and 'functions'. They contend that the subsection ensures that the President has the powers necessary to carry out his functions or legal responsibilities. See I Currie & J De Waal New Constitutional and Administrative Law (supra) at 235-236. Of course, FC s 84(1) reflects a 'belts and braces' approach to drafting typical of the tradition of statutory drafting in South Africa but not particularly appropriate to a constitution which necessarily includes broad provisions that must be interpreted in context.

[3] For a brief discussion of prerogative powers, see § 18.2 infra.

tenor of the Court's judgments in Hugo, SARFU III and Mohamed make it clear that additional 'Head of State' powers should not be readily assumed, a couple of constitutional functions of the President that are not listed in FC s 84(2) seem to be best categorised as functions exercised as Head of State. For instance, FC s 177 requires the President to suspend and remove judges under certain circumstances. Here the decision is made by Parliament and the President has no discretion. It is not a function in which the Cabinet has any role and to require the President to act together with Cabinet in such cases would be meaningless. Such an action is thus best categorised as falling under the President's power as Head of State. Similarly, FC s 50 requires the President to dissolve the National Assembly if a majority of its members support such a motion and three years have passed since the last election. Again, here the President merely fulfils a formal role and presumably acts as Head of State. On the other hand, following the principle that where the Final Constitution is silent on the role in which the President fulfils a function, but discretion is to be exercised, the President must act together with the rest of Cabinet, the choice of the national anthem (FC s 4) and calling and setting dates for elections (FC s 49) are decisions taken as head of the national executive.[1]

A third ambiguity in the dual roles of the President is that some functions that seem most appropriately classified as 'head of the national executive functions' are not exercised 'together with' Cabinet. These intensely political functions relate to the formation of government and allocation of Cabinet responsibilities. Thus, the President acts alone in selecting, appointing and dismissing the Deputy President, the other members of Cabinet,[2] and Deputy Ministers, in allocating their portfolios, and in designating a Cabinet member as leader of government business in the National Assembly. In addition, the power to reallocate Cabinet portfolios must be one which the President may exercise alone — although it too is best understood as an aspect of his or her role as head of the National Executive.[3]

[1] Many of the sections in the Final Constitution that confer a power on the President state expressly that the power is to be exercised by the President as head of the national executive. See, for example, FC s 173(3) and (4) empowering the President, 'as head of the national executive', to appoint the Chief Justice, Deputy Chief Justice, the President and Deputy President of the Supreme Court of Appeal, and the remaining judges of the Constitutional Court, and FC s 209(2) requiring the President 'as head of the national executive' to appoint persons as heads of the national intelligence agencies.

[2] See FC s 91(2); Mphele v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1996 (7) BCLR 921 (Ck)(For the view that the power to appoint and dismiss includes a power to suspend.) See, further, § 18.3 (a) infra.

[3] The Presidency treats the reallocation of responsibility for specific Acts under FC s 97 as actions taken by the President as head of the executive as they are signed '[b]y order of the President-in-Cabinet'. Currie & De Waal classify the appointment of the Deputy President, other members of the Cabinet, Deputy Ministers and the leader of government business as acts which the President performs as Head of State. Currie & De Waal New Constitutional and Administrative Law (supra) at 241. Certainly, these actions could fall under the appointment power in FC s 84(2). However, that provision does not cover the power to assign portfolios. Moreover, although the classification does not appear to have any practical consequences, the suggestion that these functions are Head of State functions seems to undermine the constitutional intention to create some distinction between those activities that are political, and thus appropriately partisan, and those that should not be so.

Often the distinction between the President's roles as Head of State and head of the national executive will not matter. However, as we discuss below, the President must exercise the powers in FC s 84(2) him or herself. On the other hand, when acting as head of the national executive, the President must have the support of his or her Cabinet colleagues.

(b) The President as Head of State[1]

These powers exercised by the President as Head of State are, in general, different in nature to the powers and functions conferred on the President as head of the national executive and can usually be distinguished from decisions as head of the national executive by a lack of political discretion. Some of the President's powers as Head of State cast him or her as 'overseer' of the democratic process, such as the powers relating to abstract review of Bills in FC ss 84(2)(a), (b) and (c).[2] Others anticipate him or her activating mechanisms to resolve political problems, such as the power to summon extraordinary sittings of Parliament (FC s 84(2)(d))[3] or to call a referendum (FC s 84(2)(g)). Some of the powers and functions are, in essence, ceremonial: the receiving and recognising of foreign diplomatic and consular representatives (FC s 84(2)(h)), and conferring honours (FC s 84(2)(k)). Other powers of appointment require the President merely to confirm decisions taken elsewhere in the political process (FC s 84(2)(e)). The FC s 84 power to appoint judges other than Constitutional Court judges and the President and Deputy President of the Supreme Court of Appeal is just such an example.

Under FC s 79, President must assent to a bill passed by Parliament for it to become law. The exercise of this Head of State power, covered in FC ss 84*(a)*, (b) and (c), is not a formality. FC s 79(1) contemplates that if the President has concerns about the constitutionality of a Bill he or she can refer it back to the National Assembly for reconsideration. If, after the National Assembly has reconsidered a Bill, the President is still concerned about its constitutionality he or she 'must either (a) assent to and sign the Bill; or (b) refer it to the Constitutional Court for a decision on its constitutionality' (FC s 79(4)).[4] Importantly, in deciding whether or not to assent to a bill, the President may raise 'constitutional' reservations only,

[1] For a review of the principal powers as Head of State, see Currie & De Waal New Constitutional and Administrative Law (supra) at 239-245.

[2] C Murray 'Who Chooses Constitutional Court Judges?' (supra) at 866.

[3] President Thabo Mbeki summoned an extraordinary sitting of both Houses of Parliament in June 2005 when he dismissed Deputy President Jacob Zuma. See 'Deputy President Sacked' Mail & Guardian Online (14 June 2005) available at http://www.mg.co.za/articlePage.aspx?articleid=243121&area=/breaking_news/breaking_news__national (accessed 20 June 2007).

[4] On the Constitutional Court's powers of abstract review see S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 17. See also Ex parte President of the Republic of South Africa: In re Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).

and not political ones.[1] And, where the National Assembly accommodates the President's concerns following a referral in terms of FC s 79(4), the President must assent to and sign the Bill. Similarly, where the Constitutional Court decides that a Bill referred to it by the President is constitutional, he or she must assent to and sign the Bill (FC s 79(5)). As with other obligations borne by the President as Head of State, failure to perform these functions would amount to a failure to perform a constitutional obligation and would be justiciable before the Constitutional Court (FC s 167(4)(e)).

It would overstate the matter to claim that no Head of State functions have a potentially partisan element. In particular, the pardoning power is a powerful political tool — as its use since 1994 demonstrates.[2] Similarly, a decision to consti-

[1] See Currie & De Waal New Constitutional and Administrative Law (supra) at 240-241. This section was used three times under Mandela's five year presidency and once since 1999 (Broadcasting Bill B94F-98, Tobacco Products Control Amendment Bill B117F-98, Liquor Bill B131B-98, Independent Communications Authority of South Africa Amendment Bill B32D-2005). The Liquor Bill was the first bill to be sent to the Constitutional Court by the President, pursuant to his powers under FC ss 84(2)(c)/79(1). The Liquor Bill was passed by Parliament in November 1998. The President referred it back to the National Assembly for reconsideration but the National Assembly returned it to the President without amendments. The President then referred it to the Constitutional Court for a decision on its constitutionality. See Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa NO: In re Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 1.. In April 2006, President Mbeki sent the Independent Communications Authority of South Africa Amendment Bill back to the National Assembly under FC s 84. Parliament approved changes and the President assented to the Bill (now the Independent Communications Authority of South Africa Amendment Act 3 of 2006). See Parliament of the Republic of South Africa Announcements, Tablings and Committee Reports 44 -2006 (26 April 2006) 562; L Gedye 'Mbeki Bounces Icasa Bill' Mail & Guardian Online 21April 2006 available at www.mg.co.za/articlePage.aspx?articleid=269702&area=/insight/insight__national/ (accessed 5 February 2008) and South African Associated Press, 'Committee Approves Draft Changes to Icasa Bill' Mail & Guardian Online 26 May 2006 available at http://www.mg.co.za/articlePage.aspx?articleid=272820&area=/breaking_news/breaking_news__national/ (accessed 5 February 2008).

[2] On 27 June 1994, acting pursuant to his powers under IC s 82(1)(k) , President Mandela and the Executive Deputy Presidents De Klerk and Mbeki signed a document styled Presidential Act No. 17, in terms of which special remission of sentences was granted to certain categories of prisoners. The category of direct relevance to the Hugo proceedings was 'all mothers in prison on 10 May 1994, with minor children under the age of twelve (12) years'. The Presidential Act provided, inter alia, that:

> In terms of section 82(1)(k) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1993 (Act 200 of 1993), I hereby grant special remission of the remainder of their sentences to:
>
> — all persons under the age of eighteen (18) years who were or would have been incarcerated on 10 May 1994; (except those who has escaped and are still at large)
> — all mothers in prison on 10 May 1994, with minor children under the age of twelve (12) years;
> — all disabled prisoners in prison on 10 May 1994 certified as disabled by a district surgeon.
>
> Provided that no special remission of sentence will be granted for any of the following offences or any attempt, soliciting or conspiracy to commit such an offence:
>
> — murder; culpable homicide; robbery with aggravating circumstances; assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm; child abuse; rape; any other crimes of a sexual nature; and trading in or cultivating dependence producing substances.'

See Hugo (supra) at para 2, fn 3.

In 1999 Allen Boesak, who at the time charges were laid was chairperson of the Western Cape branch of the ANC, was convicted on four counts of fraud and sentenced to prison (http://www.sahistory.org.za/pages/people/bios/boesak-a.htm). Boesak applied for a pardon twice. On 15 January 2005, acting pursuant to his powers under FC s 84(2)(j), the President granted Boesak a pardon and tute a commission of enquiry and the choice of its members may serve partisan political purposes even if the commission itself operates within a legal framework that protects its independence.

What is clear is that if the President allows the powers in FC s 84(2) to be exercised by another person, as a result of an abdication, a delegation or what is referred to in administrative law as unlawful referral or dictation,[1] that election would be inconsistent with FC s 84(2) and invalid.[2] Nevertheless, although the President must make the final decision when acting as Head of State, the Constitutional Court has held that 'it is not inappropriate for him or her to act upon the advice of the Cabinet and advisers.'[3] his criminal record was expunged. See statement of the Department of Justice and Constitutional Development; 'The Process for Presidential Pardon in terms of section 84(2) (j) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 to expunge criminal records a special reference to Dr Allan Aubrey Boesak's case' 18 January 2005, available at http://www.info.gov.za/speeches/2005/05011815151001.htm (accessed 3 February 2008).

On 21 November 2007, pursuant to FC s 84(2)(j), the President, announced a process for the consideration of pardon requests from 'people convicted for offences they claim were politically motivated, and who were not denied amnesty by the TRC'. He stated that Government was 'in possession of at least 1062 applications for presidential pardons by people who have been found guilty of offences which were allegedly committed with a political motive, arising from the conflicts of the past'. Relying on the Constitutional Court decision in *Hu*go the President stated; 'I believe that the sum total of all this is that the President has an obligation to consider all requests made to him or her to pardon or reprieve offenders and remit any fines, penalties or forfeitures. At the same time, having thus applied his or her mind, the President is under no obligation to accede to the requests made to him or her, provided that she or he proceeds in a rational manner.' The President established a Parliamentary Reference Group made up of representatives of each political party represented in the National Assembly to assist him in properly discharging his constitutional responsibility to consider the requests made to the President to pardon those who have been convicted of the crimes in issue. The President noted, however, that the Reference Group would 'not in any way subtract from the obligation placed by the Constitution on the President, and described by the Constitutional Court, for the President to grant pardons, etc. In other words, the constitutional task to grant pardons and so on will remain with the President'. The cut off date for applications for pardon under these arrangements is 15 April 2008. 'Address of the President of South Africa, Thabo Mbeki, to the Joint Sitting of Parliament to Report on the Processing of some Presidential Pardons — Cape Town' (21 November 2007) available at http://www.thepresidency.gov.za/main.asp?include=president/sp/2007/sp11211540.htm (accessed 3 February 2008). The pardoning power is discussed in Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (supra) at paras 114–117.

[1] See C Hoexter Administrative Law in South Africa (2007) 243-46. See also Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism and another v Scenematic Fourteen (Pty) Ltd 2005 (6) SA 182 (SCA) at para 20; Hofmeyr v Minister of Justice 1992 (3) SA 108, 117 (c).

[2] SARFU III (supra) at para 38. See also FC s 2.

[3] SARFU III (supra) at para 41. However, many functions listed in FC s 84 give the President no discretion. FC ss 101(1) and (2) require any decision by the President taken in terms of legislation or with legal consequences to be in writing and countersigned by the member of Cabinet whose functions the decision concerns. See § 18.2 (a)(ii)(aa) infra.

As the Constitutional Court has noted on a number of occasions, the powers of the Head of State, listed in FC s 84(2), 'have their origins in the perogative powers exercised under former constitutions by heads of state'.[1] Indeed, they are often referred to as 'prerogative powers'. But their status changed fundamentally by their express inclusion in the Final Constitution. Before 1994, following the Westminster model, the 'prerogative' was a source of power for South African Heads of State, derived not from the Constitution or other statutes, but from the common law. Over time, in Britain, most of the once immense prerogative powers of the Crown (or Head of State) were brought under the control of Parliament. Nevertheless, some remained outside parliamentary control. Thus Dicey states that '[t]he prerogative is the name for the remaining portion of the Crown's original authority….Every act which the executive government can lawfully do without the authority of the Act of Parliament is done in virtue of this prerogative.'[2] More recently, in Britain, South Africa and elsewhere, the view that courts could not examine the way in which the remaining prerogative powers were exercised was challenged and gradually eroded.[3] The Interim Constitution brought the debate to an end in South Africa. The Constitutional Court has said emphatically that the Head of State has none of the old prerogative powers other than those listed in FC 84(2)[4] and that these powers are subject to review under both the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution.[5]

---

[1] Mohamed and Another v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others (Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty in South Africa and Another Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC) para 31. See also SARFU III (supra) at para 144 and, for the same proposition in relation to IC s 82(1), Hugo (supra) at para 8. In keeping with a constitutional democracy in which all power is derived from the Constitution, neither the Interim Constitution nor the Final Constitution uses the language of the royal prerogative. Under the South Africa Constitution Act 32 of 1961, the President 'as Head of the State' was expressly authorised to exercise the powers that the Queen was entitled to exercise 'by way of prerogative' prior to the commencement of the Act (s 7(4)). The South Africa Constitution Act 110 of 1983 contained a similar provision, again referring expressly to prerogative powers. The Interim Constitution made no reference to the prerogative powers, but the powers of the President as Head of State which originated from the royal prerogative were to be found in IC s 82(1). This approach is followed in FC s 84(2). See Hugo (supra) at para 7. Although derived from the prerogative powers traditionally exercised by the English Monarch, these powers are not identical in all respects to the royal prerogatives. See Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 116.

[2] A Dicey The Law of the Constitution (10th ed 1959) 424-5 as quoted in C Turpin British Government and the Constitution Text, Cases and Materials (5th ed 2005) 420. For role of English law relating to the prerogative in South Africa, see Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa In re: The Ex Parte Application of the President of the RSA 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) at para 36.

[3] See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 32-34 especially fn 183.

[4] SARFU III (supra) para 144; Mohamed and Another v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others (Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty in South Africa and Another Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC) at para 31. See also Hugo (supra) at para 8 for the same proposition in relation to IC s 82(1).

[5] Hugo (supra) at para 13. The position is the same under the Final Constitution. FC s 8(1) states that the Bill of Rights applies to all law and binds the executive. Further, while IC s 75 required the President to exercise and perform his or her powers and functions subject to and in accordance with this Constitution', FC s 83*(b)* states that the President 'must uphold, defend and respect the Constitution as the supreme law of the Republic'. See also Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 116.

The critical question is what level of review applies to such action. The broad distinction between administrative action and other exercises of state power needs to be kept in mind. Administrative action is subject to a more searching form of review than 'executive action'.

President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo was the first case concerning the review of the President's powers as Head of State and settled the initial question by finding that such actions are reviewable. However, the context and circumstances of Hugo limit the extent of the finding. The question in Hugo was whether a decision by the President to pardon female prisoners with children below the age of 12 was inconsistent with the equality provisions of the Interim Constitution because it discriminated against male prisoners in the same position. The basis of the complaint was that the President's conduct was invalid in light of IC s 4, which, like FC s 2, stated that the Constitution 'is the supreme law of the Republic' and 'conduct inconsistent with it is invalid'. The Court held that where the substance of a presidential decision is inconsistent with a provision of the Final Constitution, or the effect of the decision is to violate a right in the Bill of Rights, the decision will be found invalid. Hugo did not deal with the question of whether courts are able to regulate the exercise of presidential power on grounds other than the substance or effect of the action.

The question in President of the Republic of South Africa v South African Rugby Football Union (SARFU III)[1] was whether the President's decision in terms of FC s 84(2)(f) to appoint a commission of inquiry into the functions of the South African Rugby Football Union (SARFU) amounted to an administrative action for the purposes of FC s 33(1). If it did, the President would have had to comply with the requirements of lawfulness, reasonableness and procedural fairness imposed by FC s 33(1).[2] In considering this question the Court made several important

[1] 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC).

[2] FC s 33(1) and (2) reads:

'(1) Everyone has the right to administrative action that is lawful, reasonable, and procedurally fair.

(2) Everyone whose rights have been adversely affected by administrative action has the right to be given written reasons.'

In terms of Item 23(2)(b) of Schedule 6 to the Constitution, FC s 33(1) and (2) were, until the enactment of national legislation required by FC s 33(3) to 'give effect to' these rights, deemed to read as follows:

Every person has the right to –

(a) lawful administrative action where any of their rights or interests is affected or threatened;

(b) procedurally fair administrative action where any of their rights or legitimate expectations is affected or threatened;

(c) be furnished with reasons in writing for administrative action which affects any of their rights or interests unless the reasons for that action have been made public; and

(d) administrative action which is justifiable in relation to the reasons given for it where any of their rights is affected or threatened.

At the time SARFU III was decided the provisions of Item 23(2)(b) of Schedule 6 were still operative but the Court was nevertheless called on to decide whether the President's decision constituted administrative action or not.

observations as to the rest of the powers listed in FC s 84(2). It held that the powers in FC s 84(2)(a)-(c) are 'directly related to the legislative process', and in exercising these functions 'the President is clearly not performing administrative acts within the meaning of s 33'.[1] FC s 84(2)(d) and (e) are 'similarly narrow constitutional responsibilities which are not related to the administration of legislation but to the execution of provisions of the Constitution'.[2] The remaining powers in FC s 84(2), the SARFU III Court held, are closely related to policy and are not concerned with the implementation of legislation.[3] These powers too, are not within the ambit of FC s 33. The appointment of a commission of inquiry, the SARFU III Court concluded, is 'an adjunct to the policy formulation responsibility of the President', and cannot be described as administrative in character.[4]

However, SARFU III also stated that presidential action in terms of FC s 84(2) is subject to a range of constraints[5] and can be scrutinised by the courts on the basis of any of these constraints:

> [T]he President is required to exercise the powers personally and any such exercise must be recorded in writing and signed; …the exercise of the powers must not infringe any provision of the Bill of Rights; the exercise of the powers is also clearly constrained by the principle of legality and, as is implicit in the Constitution, the President must act in good faith and must not misconstrue the powers.[6]

Of these constraints on presidential power, the requirement to act consistently with the doctrine of legality has proved most important. In New National Party of SA v Government of the Republic of South Africa and others,[7] the Constitutional Court held that '[a]rbitrariness is inconsistent with the rule of law', and that legislation not rationally connected to a legitimate government purpose is arbitrary and therefore unconstitutional.[8] In Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA and Another: In re Ex parte President of the RSA and Others,[9] this aspect of the rule of law was held to apply equally to exercises of public power, generally, and presidential power, in particular:

---

1 SARFU III (supra) at para 145.
2 Ibid.
3 Ibid at para 146.
4 Ibid at para 147.
5 SARFU III drew on Hugo and Fedsure Life Assurance and Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council. 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC). In Fedsure, the Constitutional Court introduced the concept of the doctrine of legality. South Africa is a democratic state founded on the supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law (FC s 1*(c)*). As a result, every exercise of public power must conform to the principles of the rule of law. The doctrine of legality is implicit in these principles, and it requires every act of public power to be lawful. The executive 'may exercise no power and perform no function beyond that conferred upon them by law' Ibid at para 58. Every exercise of a public power must be rooted in law, and can be scrutinised by a court for compliance with the terms of the empowering law. See F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 11.
6 SARFU III (supra) at para 148 (footnotes omitted).
7 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)('NNP').
8 Ibid at para 24.
9 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC)('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers').

> It is a requirement of the rule of law that the exercise of public power by the Executive and other functionaries should not be arbitrary. Decisions must be rationally related to the purpose for which the power was given, otherwise they are in effect arbitrary and inconsistent with this requirement.[1]

The Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Court did go on to note the limitations of this doctrine:

> The setting of this standard [of rationality] does not mean that the Courts can or should substitute their opinions as to what is appropriate for the opinions of those in whom the power has been vested. As long as the purpose sought to be achieved by the exercise of public power is within the authority of the functionary, and as long as the functionary's decision, viewed objectively, is rational, a Court cannot interfere with the decision simply because it disagrees with it or considers that the power was exercised inappropriately.

The conclusions of the Court in the SARFU III and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers cases are to a large extent codified in the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 (PAJA). A decision or action must fit the definition of 'administrative action' in s 1 of PAJA before it can be reviewed by a court or tribunal against the grounds of review listed in s 6 of the Act.[2] Importantly, a number of specific actions and decisions are excluded from the definition of 'administrative action', putting them beyond the scope of PAJA and FC s 33.[3] Among the exclusions are responsibilities of the President acting as Head of State including assent to legislation under FC s 79(1) and (4) and all but two of the s 84(2) functions. Consistent with the reasoning of SARFU III, the presidential power to appoint commissions of inquiry in FC s 84(2)(f) is excluded from the definition of administrative action. The two 'Head of State' powers that are conspicuously absent from the list of exclusions are the powers listed in FC s 84(2)(e) (appointments) and (j) (pardons and related matters).

Despite this omission, the reasoning of SARFU III is that where a power is closely related to policy rather than to the implementation of legislation, the

[1] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 85.

[2] See J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2002) Chapter 63.

[3] The possibility that the meaning given to 'administrative action' in PAJA is not consistent with the understanding of the term contemplated in FC s 33 has been raised in a number of forums. See Minister of Health v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC) para 97 (per Chaskalson CJ) and para 423 (per Ngcobo J); Grey's Marine Hout Bay (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Public Works 2005 (6) SA 313 (SCA); C Hoexter Administrative Law in South Africa (supra) at 216-17, R Stacey, 'Substantive Protection of Legitimate Expectations in the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act – Tirfu Raiders Rugby Club v SA Rugby Union' (2006) 22 SAJHR 664, 664. A court would be entitled to engage with the constitutionality of the definition in PAJA only where a litigant directly challenged PAJA's definition of administrative action as under-inclusive and inconsistent with FC s 33 (for cases setting out the principle that legislation can be declared unconstitutional only consequent upon a direct challenge to that effect, see Ingledew v Financial Services Board: In Re Financial Services Board v Van Der Merwe and Another 2003 (4) SA 584 (CC) at paras 20 and 22; Member of the Executive Council for Development Planning and Local Government, Gauteng v Democratic Party and Others 1998 (4) SA 1157 (CC) at paras 61-2; and Du Toit v Minister of Transport 2006 (1) SA 297 (CC) at para 29).

exercise of that power should not be treated as an administrative action. Applying the same reasoning to the omitted powers suggests that they do not constitute administrative action — they are all more closely related to policy than the implementation of legislation.[1] However, the omission of certain and specific executive powers from the list of exclusions in PAJA, alongside the inclusion of others, cannot be overlooked.[2]

There are differences in the nature of the various executive powers listed in the Final Constitution. This difference has to do with the extent of the discretion exercised by members of the executive when exercising executive powers. The broad extent of the discretion conferred by FC s 84(2)(j)'s power to grant pardons suggests that the power is policy-laden rather than administrative in nature and does not constitute administrative action in terms of FC s 33.

In this light it is hard to make sense of the omission of FC s 84(2)(j) from the list of exclusions in the definition of administrative action in PAJA. The intention of the legislature in pointedly enumerating specific executive powers to be excluded from the definition of administrative action seems clear: the executive powers set out in s 84(2) not excluded from the definition are to be considered administrative action if their exercise meets the other requirements of the definition of administrative action in s 1 of PAJA. A possible explanation of this apparent contradiction is that, by implicitly including the FC s 84 pardoning power, the scope of the definition of 'administrative action' in section 1 of PAJA simply exceeds the scope that FC s 33 contemplates for the term, and that section 1 of PAJA is unconstitutional to the extent of this inconsistency. A more productive approach is to notice that those executive powers not excluded from the definition of PAJA do not for that reason alone constitute administrative action. An action must still, in terms of PAJA, be 'a decision of an administrative nature' (see the definition of 'decision' in section 1 of PAJA). The determining characteristic is thus whether the decision is of an administrative nature. When it omitted FC s 84(2)(j) from the list of exclusions in PAJA, the legislature has anticipated that a decision to pardon or reprieve prisoners will on occasion be 'administrative in nature'.

[1] Hoexter argues that the powers 'to appoint ambassadors, to recognise diplomatic representatives, to confer honours and pardon offenders all refer to policy-laden activities likely to bear little or no relation to the implementation of legislation.' Hoexter Administrative Law in South Africa (supra) at 34.

[2] Minister of Health and Another v New Clicks SA (Pty) Ltd and Others (Treatment Action Campaign and Innovative Medicines SA as Amici Curiae*)* 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC), 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 126. Chaskalson CJ concluded on the basis of this reasoning that regulations made by the Minister of Health constituted administrative action and were reviewable as such (para 135). Four members of the Court concurred (Langa DCJ, Ngcobo J, O'Regan J and Van der Westhuizen J), while five judges found the question of PAJA's applicability need not be decided (Madala J, Mokgoro J, Skweyiya J and Yacoob J concurring in the judgment of Moseneke J). No clear authority in this regard has yet been established, and courts continue to struggle with whether ministerial regulation-making is subject to review in terms of PAJA. See McDonald and Others v Minister of Minerals and Energy and Others 2007 (5) SA 642 (c) at para 25.

The omission from the list of executive actions excluded from the definition of administrative action of FC s 84(2)(e), conferring on the President the power to make appointments as Head of State, should be seen in the same light. It must be assumed that the legislature envisaged that certain appointments made by the President as Head of State will be 'administrative in nature'. Where the President is required to make appointments as Head of State, however, the exercise of the power is usually purely formal. Where the President appoints judges to courts other than the Constitutional Court in terms of FC s 174(6), he or she is afforded no discretion, and 'must' make the appointment recommended by the Judicial Service Commission. The 'mechanical' nature of this power does not itself imply that it is not 'administrative'.[1] Even so, where the President exercises the power in FC s 176(4), there will be little to review. If the President failed to discharge the obligation to make the appointments recommended by the Judicial Service Commission, then he or she would have 'failed to fulfil a constitutional obligation'.[2]

In short, it seems unlikely that an FC s 84(2) power will ever fall within the definition of administrative action. But where the exercise of presidential power does not satisfy the requirements of the definition, it can nonetheless be reviewed against the less exacting standards of lawfulness and rationality inherent in the doctrine of legality. All presidential actions and decisions are thus subject to some form of regulation by the courts.

(c) The President as head of the national executive

As noted above, national executive authority is vested in the President but is exercised by the President 'together with the other members of the Cabinet'. This wording reflects the collaborative nature of a Cabinet in a parliamentary system and means, among other things, that Cabinet members are collectively responsible for decisions that are made in the exercise of national executive authority, whether or not they were party to the decision. This matter is discussed more fully below. Here we consider the functions of the President as head of the Cabinet.

Currently the Cabinet has 30 members — the President and Deputy President and 28 Ministers, all of whom are members of Parliament. As head of Cabinet, the President chairs Cabinet, may manage its agenda and determines its committee system. Currently, the President also appoints directors general (the bureaucratic heads of national departments). Taken together with the power to appoint and dismiss Ministers, these powers are considerable and have led observers of the British system, in which the Prime Minister wields similar powers, to argue that 'Cabinet government' has given way to 'prime ministerial government'.[3] However,

[1] See Hoexter Administrative Law in South Africa (supra) at 45-6.

[2] FC s 167(4)(e). A complaint is justiciable before the Constitutional Court alone.

[3] See C Turpin British Government and the Constitution: Text, Cases and Materials (2005) 222ff; Butler Contemporary South Africa (supra) at 94-95.

studies in Britain suggest that the power of the head of the executive in parliamentary systems is in large part dependent on the political support that he or she commands and his or her particular style of leadership.

The short history of South Africa's new Cabinet system tells us little about the degree to which practice here will mirror that elsewhere. On the one hand, one might expect the electoral system of closed-list proportional representation through which all politicians are heavily dependent on their political party for their positions, rather than the electorate, to increase the power of the President over Cabinet. Individual Cabinet members have less incentive to promote the views of the electorate. On the other hand, the ANC's constitution requires its politicians to 'carry out loyally decisions of the majority and decisions of [ANC] higher bodies'.[1] When, as is currently the case, the party is controlled by a group that is different from that supporting the President, this schism may reduce the control of the President over his Cabinet colleagues.

We do know that during Mandela's presidency, the business of government was largely under the control of his deputy, Thabo Mbeki, and that Mbeki had some influence over the President's selection of ministers and deputy ministers.[2] Generally it is believed that since Mbeki became President, he has managed Cabinet firmly. And there is some speculation about whether the president's advisers in the Presidency are more powerful than ministers.[3] But the AIDS controversy shows how even a very powerful President, who may desire to exercise considerable control over government, must be responsive to political pressures. So, in 2002, in the face of the pressure of his Cabinet colleagues and the National Executive Committee of the ANC and despite his strong views on the subject, President Mbeki largely withdrew from the HIV/Aids debate and the government embarked on a major treatment programme with which he disagreed.[4]

(i) Specific powers allocated by the Constitution to the President as head of the national executive

The Final Constitution allocates some specific responsibilities to the President acting in his or her role as head of the national executive. These responsibilities encompass the appointment of the judges of the Constitutional Court, the President and Deputy President of the Supreme Court of Appeal,[5] four members of [1] Clause 5.2 (g) African National Congress Constitution (As amended by and adopted at the 51st National Conference, December 2002) available at http://www.anc.org.za/show.php?doc=./ancdocs/history/const/const2002.html (accessed 11 February 2008).

[2] M Gevisser Thabo Mbeki: The Dream Deferred (2007) 659.

[3] R Calland Anatomy of South Africa (2006) 27ff, 61-62; N de Jager 'The ANC Government, Co-optive Power and the Perpetuation of Party Dominance' Konrad-Adenauer Stiftung Seminar Report No 17 Johannesburg (October 2006) Challenges to Democracy by One-Party Dominance: A Comparative Assessment 19-20.

[4] Gevisser (supra) at 755-761; Butler (supra) at 95.

[5] FC s 174(3) and (4).

the Judicial Service Commission,[1] the National Director of Public Prosecutions,[2] the 'military command' of the defence force,[3] the National Commissioner of the police force,[4] heads to any intelligence services that may be established,[5] an inspector responsible for monitoring any intelligence services,[6] and members of the Financial and Fiscal Commission;[7] authorisation of the use of the defence force 'in co-operation with the police service; … in defence of the Republic; or …in fulfilment of an international obligation';[8] the declaration of a 'state of national defence';[9] and the establishment of any intelligence services.[10] In addition, in terms of FC s 202(1), the President is Commander-in-Chief of the defence force. Of course, although the Final Constitution states that the President must make the appointments noted above and fulfil various responsibilities relating to the security services, he or she must always act 'together with the other members of Cabinet'. This requirement means that he or she must have the support of the Cabinet.

In Masetlha v President of the Republic of South Africa,[11] the power to appoint heads of the intelligence services under FC s 209(2) was held to include the power to dismiss:

> [T]he power to dismiss a head of the Agency is a necessary power without which the pursuit of national security through intelligence services would fail. Without the competence to dismiss, the President would not be able to remove the head of the Agency without his or her consent before the end of the term of office, whatever the circumstances might be. That would indeed lead to an absurdity and severely undermine the constitutional pursuit of the security of this country and its people.[12]

But the power to dismiss is not an automatic ancillary to the power of appointment.[13] The exercise of this power turns on the constitutional role of the office concerned[14] and the language of the relevant provisions. The Masethla argument does apply

[1] FC s 178(1)(j).
[2] FC s 179(1)(a).
[3] FC s 202(1).
[4] FC s 207(1).
[5] FC s 209(2).
[6] FC s 210*(b)*.
[7] FC s 221(1).
[8] FC s 201(2).
[9] FC s 203.
[10] FC s 209(1).
[11] 2008 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).
[12] Ibid para 68.
[13] See, further, O Ampofo-Anti, K Robinson & S Woolman 'Security Services' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 23B.
[14] In Masetlha, Moseneke DCJ notes the importance of the 'operative constitutional and legislative scheme' (para 31) and Sachs J concurring notes the particular relationship that the Constitution envisages between the President and the head of the National Intelligence Agency in contrast, for instance, to that between the President and Ministers. Masetlha (supra) at para 228.

to the appointment of the military command of the defence force and the National Commissioner of Police because the primary responsibility of the incumbents of these positions is to execute government policy. Although the wording changes slightly in each case, the constitutional provisions under which the positions are established clearly stipulate that incumbents are directly responsible to Cabinet.[1] On the other hand, the power to appoint certain judges does not encompass a power to dismiss them because, to secure the independence of the judiciary, the Final Constitution sets out a special procedure for the removal of judges.[2] FC s 221(3) deals expressly with removal of members of the Financial and Fiscal Commission, permitting it on grounds of 'misconduct, incapacity or incompetence' only. Similarly, the role of the National Assembly in the appointment of the inspector of intelligence services suggests that the President could not dismiss that person without at least the involvement of the National Assembly.[3] The removal of those members of the Judicial Service Commission chosen by the President should also follow the appointment process. FC s 178(1)(j) requires the President to consult 'leaders of all the parties in the National Assembly' when making the appointments and thus he or she would need to consult similarly when removing them.[4]

The situation in relation to the removal of the National Director of Public Prosecutions (NDPP) is not spelt out but is evident from the broader constitutional role of the NDPP. First, unlike the head of an intelligence service, the military command of the defence force and the National Commissioner of the Police, each of whom must implement policy determined by Cabinet, the NDPP and the relevant Minister jointly determine prosecuting policy.[5] Second, FC s 179(4) states that national legislation 'must ensure' that the prosecuting authority can exercise its functions 'without fear, favour or prejudice'. Together these provisions point

[1] Under FC s 202(2) the defence force is 'directed' by a member of Cabinet. A Cabinet member must be 'responsible for' policing (FC s 206(1)) although the police are under the 'control' of the National Commissioner and not the Minister.

[2] FC s 177. It could also not be argued that the President could 'demote' judges by removing them from the specific positions to which he or she has appointed them without infringing their independence.

[3] Section 7 of the Intelligence Services Oversight Act 40 of 1994 limits grounds of removal to 'misconduct, incapacity, withdrawal of his or her security clearance, poor performance or incompetence'.

[4] IC s 105 (1)(i) provided for presidential nominees on the Judicial Service Commission. The Judicial Services Commission Act 9 of 1994 was promulgated to give effect to IC s 105. It has not been amended to bring it in line with FC s 178. On the removal of JSC members, section 2 states:

> (1) The members of the Commission designated as such in terms of section 105(1)(c), (e), (f), (g), (h) and (i) of the Constitution shall hold office for a term not exceeding five years: Provided that —
>
> (a) the President shall remove any such member from office at any time if the designator who or which designated such member, so requests; or
>
> (b) any such member may resign from office by giving at least one month's written notice thereof to the chairperson.

[5] FC s 179(5)(a).

to a level of independence in the prosecuting authority not shared by members of the security forces. It would be impossible for the NDPP to act 'without fear, favour or prejudice' if he or she were subject to dismissal on the same terms as the National Commissioner of Police. The legislation enacted under FC s 179(4) is the National Prosecuting Authority Act.[1] The most significant protection it offers the prosecutorial service is to limit the grounds on which the NDPP may be dismissed.[2] The grounds are limited to 'misconduct; … continued ill health; … incapacity to carry out his or her duties of office efficiently; or …[a finding that] he or she is no longer considered a fit and proper person to hold the office concerned'.[3]

(ii) Allocating portfolios, transferring functions under FC s 97 and temporary assignment of functions under FC s 98

FC s 91(2) states the President must assign powers and functions to the Deputy President and Ministers. This is commonly referred to as the allocation of portfolios. The only constitutional formality is FC s 101's requirement that decisions taken by the President that have legal consequences must be in writing. Nevertheless, following the practice in other parliamentary systems, until June 1999 Cabinet appointments and changes in the allocation of portfolios were reported by a general notice in the Government Gazette.[4]

Acts of Parliament commonly specify the Cabinet member who should be responsible for their administration. Thus, legislation dealing with immigration will usually identify the Minister of Home Affairs as the responsible minister; legislation on courts, the Minister of Justice and so on.[5] FC s 97 anticipates that, in managing the allocation of responsibilities, the President may, nevertheless, wish to allocate the responsibility for a particular Act to another minister by proclamation.[6] This process allows the President to arrange Cabinet responsibilities in the way that he or she thinks will work best.[7]

[1] Act 32 of 1998.

[2] FC s 179(4) also means that one cannot argue that the Act unconstitutionally limits a power (the power to dismiss) that the President may exercise under the Constitution.

[3] Section 12(6)(a).

[4] See, for example, GN 1065 Government Gazette 15792 3 June 1994; GN 1792 Government Gazette 16027 21 October 1994; GN 213 Government Gazette 16263 17 February 1995; and GN 1392 Government Gazette 20261 2 July 1999. There appear to be no similar Notices since July 1999.

[5] A problem with this approach is that the titles of ministerial portfolios may change. Some recent Acts are more sophisticated. Thus, the National Forests Act 84 of 1998 s 1 states that '"Minister" means the Minister to whom the President assigns responsibility for forests in terms of section 91 (2) of the Constitution'.

[6] See, for example, GN 21 Government Gazette 26164 26 March 2004 transferring responsibility for the National Key Points Act 102 of 1980 from the Minister of Defence to the Minister of Safety and Security and GN 27 Government Gazette 17875 27 March 1997 transferring responsibility for the Administration of the Land Bank Act 13 of 1944 from the Minister of Finance to the Minister of Agriculture.

[7] FC s 97, of course, limits the power of Parliament to regulate the allocation of responsibilities amongst Cabinet members. It also implies that Ministers may not reallocate functions amongst themselves. Only the President may do this. As we discuss below, at § 18.3*(a)*, FC s 99 is concerned with the assignment of functions between spheres of government and is not concerned with the allocation of responsibilities amongst Cabinet members.

FC s 98 serves a different purpose. It allows the President to assign the powers and functions of a member 'who is absent from office or is unable to exercise that power or function' to another member on a temporary basis. In such cases, no proclamation is necessary.[1]

(iii) Review of executive decisions taken by the President as head of the national executive

Action by the President that falls within the definition of administrative action will be subject to review under PAJA and FC s 33. Those actions that are not classified as administrative action must nonetheless comply with the principle of legality and can be reviewed against the standards of lawfulness and rationality.[2] The President therefore does not have an entirely unfettered or 'personal' discretion.[3]

(d) Formalities and executive decision making by the President — FC s 101

According to FC s 101, decisions of the President taken in terms of legislation or which have legal consequences must be in writing.[4] A written decision of the President must be countersigned by another Cabinet member 'if that decision concerns a function assigned to that other Cabinet member'.[5] Many presidential decisions, whether taken as Head of State or head of the national executive have legal consequences.[6] However, because FC s 101 is headed 'Executive decisions', it has been argued that the provisions of ss (1) and (2) do not apply to 'Head of State' decisions. This argument runs counter to the Constitutional Court's view of executive powers in Hugo. There, speaking for the majority, Goldstone J asserts unambiguously that actions of the President are always 'executive':

> There are only three branches of government viz. legislative, executive and judicial. The powers of the President, other than those set out in section 82(1), are without question executive powers. The question is whether those referred to in section 82(1) fall within a different category. In my opinion they do not. Whether the President is exercising constitutional powers as head of the executive (ie the Cabinet) or as head of state, he is acting as an executive organ of government. His powers are neither legislative nor judicial and there is no fourth branch of government.[7]

[1] There is some debate about the meaning of the word 'assign' in this and other constitutional contexts. See § 18.3*(l)*infra.

[2] See § 18.2 (b) supra; Klaaren & Penfold (supra) at Chapter 63.

[3] See also IM Rautenbach & EFJ Malherbe Constitutional Law (4th Edition, 2004) 190.

[4] FC s 101(1).

[5] FC s 101(2).

[6] Manual of Executive Acts of the President (supra) at para 1.6 (Notes that decisions that do not have legal consequences would be 'purely political or policy decisions relating to the administration of the Cabinet which do not themselves constitute legal authority of the exercise of any Executive powers. A decision, for example, to host a banquet or to attend a function need not be reduced to writing.')

[7] Hugo (supra) at para 11.

The Hugo Court decided this matter under the Interim Constitution. But, as the Constitutional Court confirmed in SARFU III,[1] the provisions of the Interim Constitution and Final Constitution relating to the dual role of the President as Head of State and head of the National Executive are similar.

This interpretation of FC s 101 — that it covers all presidential decisions that have legal consequences or are taken in terms of legislation — seems right even if it were to be argued that the Constitutional Court was too hasty in deciding that all head of state functions are 'executive'. The wording of the provision is clear. Moreover, it is entirely appropriate that, in a system in which lawful government action is the central principle, the decisions described in FC s 101(1) should be reduced to writing. Nevertheless, this reading creates a puzzle. Why should decisions that are taken by the President acting in his or her capacity as Head of State, and thus unconstrained by the requirement that Cabinet support the decision, be countersigned by a minister? And, what role does the ministerial signature play? What are the consequences of a failure to secure the countersignature? When the President takes decisions as head of the executive, the requirement of the countersignature of the relevant minister imposed by FC s 101(2) is entirely consistent with the notion of collective Cabinet responsibility. In making decisions that affect the portfolio of a Cabinet colleague, the President must confer with that Cabinet member. If he or she refuses to sign, the absence of Cabinet support is apparent and the decision of the President cannot take effect.[2] But this argument cannot apply to the requirement of a countersignature when the President exercises his powers as Head of State. The best way of interpreting the FC s 101(2) requirement in such cases is that it ensures that the relevant Cabinet member is aware of the exercise of a power that affects that Cabinet member's portfolio.[3] Here the provision simply promotes coordination and transparent government. Thus, for example, appointments of ambassadors, plenipotentiaries and diplomatic and consular representatives,[4] the exercise of the power to pardon and the appointment of a commission of inquiry would have to be countersigned by the responsible minister. And, because the signature of the minister in such cases merely confirms that he or she has been informed of the President's act, it would not be appropriate for the Cabinet member to refuse to sign: there is no Cabinet veto right.[5] Despite the absence of such a veto, such a presidential decision will be

[1] Hugo (supra) at para 144.

[2] See Currie & De Waal New Constitutional and Administrative Law (supra) at 246. The Manual of Executive Acts of the President asserts that a countersignature will be considered proof that appropriate Cabinet consultation has taken place. Manual (supra) at para 2.14.

[3] See Manual (supra) at para 2.6, which, citing L Baxter Administrative Law (1984), notes that before 1983, by convention, the Governor General or President was required to have decisions countersigned. Section 23 of the 1983 Constitution and IC s 83(1) expressly required countersignatures.

[4] See Currie & De Waal New Constitutional and Administrative Law (supra) at 243.

[5] Currie & De Waal argue that a failure to obtain a countersignature where a presidential power as Head of State is exercised will result in invalidity only where the President deliberately withholds information from the relevant Cabinet member or acts in a grossly negligent fashion. Ibid at 240). A better approach, one less likely to lead to uncertainty about the validity of presidential decisions and avoiding the need to interrogate the behaviour of the President, may be to argue that the Minister concerned may be ordered to sign. If he or she does not sign it, then the President may replace the Minister.

incomplete and thus ineffective until it is countersigned as the Final Constitution requires.

Presidential decisions are recorded by means of two instruments: President's Minutes and President's Acts. President's Minutes are recorded when the instrument recording the decision of the President must be countersigned by a Cabinet member. President's Acts, on the other hand, are recorded when the President exercises his powers and functions without consulting the Cabinet and without obtaining the countersignature of a Minister.[1] Such Acts are not common as most decisions with legal consequences concern the functions of another Cabinet member.

(e) Appointment, end of term and removal

The National Assembly must elect a President from amongst its members at its first sitting after its election or at another time if the presidency is vacant.[2] A person elected as President by the National Assembly ceases to be a member of the National Assembly.[3]

The President's term of office begins when he or she is sworn into office by the Chief Justice or another judge, and expires either when the next person elected President by the National Assembly assumes office[4] or if the term is ended for another reason such as resignation or death. The President's term of office is thus usually tied to the duration of the National Assembly: five years.[5]

The President may leave office before the expiry of his or her term if a motion of no confidence is passed by the National Assembly under FC s 102(2), if the National Assembly removes him or her,[6] or if he or she resigns or dies. When a vacancy occurs in the office of the President, an acting President must be appointed,[7] and the National Assembly must elect a new President. If a new President is not elected within 30 days, the acting President must dissolve the National Assembly and elections must be held.[8]

---

[1] See Manual (supra) at para 1.5. The term Executive Act covers both President's Minutes and President's Acts.

[2] FC s 86(1). The Chief Justice or a judge designated by the Chief Justice presides over the election of the President. FC s 86(2). Part A of Schedule 3 to the Final Constitution contains the procedure for the election of the President.

[3] FC s 87. The President is not directly elected by the electorate. There have been suggestions that the method by which the President is appointed should be changed and that an individual should be directly elected as President by the electorate. See for a criticism of these views, J Kane-Berman 'Presidents should be elected by the people' Business Day (26 April 2007), available at http://www.businessday.co.za/articles/topstories.aspx?ID=BD4A447515 (accessed 19 June 2007).

[4] FC ss 87(1) and 88(1) as well as Schedule 2. The President may be sworn in by oath or solemn affirmation.

[5] FC s 49(1).

[6] FC s 89(1). See § 18.2*(a)*(iv) infra.

[7] FC s 90.

[8] FC ss 50(2) and 49(2).

Two sets of constitutional provisions allow the National Assembly to remove the President. First, under FC s 89, the President may be removed from office by a resolution adopted in the National Assembly with a supporting vote of at least two thirds of its members.[1] This process of impeachment may be used for the removal of the President only if the President is responsible for a serious violation of the Final Constitution or the law, has engaged in serious misconduct or is unable to perform the functions of office.[2] A person removed from the office of President on either of the first two of these three grounds may not receive any benefits of the office, and may not again serve in any public office.[3]

Secondly, as in other parliamentary systems, the Final Constitution requires the President and Cabinet to have the support of the National Assembly. Thus, FC s 102(2) requires the President, the rest of Cabinet and any Deputy Ministers to resign if the National Assembly, by a vote supported by a simple majority of all its members, passes a motion of no confidence in the President.[4] In parliamentary systems, a vote of no confidence removing the government of the day will usually occur only after floor-crossing or if a substantial number of the governing party back-benchers fear the party's electoral prospects under the current leader. The electoral system of closed list proportional representation, which gives the party considerable control over individual members of Parliament and the limited opportunities for floor-crossing, may suggest that a successful vote of no confidence in the President is very unlikely. However, in the current context of ANC governance — in which the party is controlled not by its public representatives in the National Assembly but by its National Executive Committee — another situation in which a vote of no confidence may occur suggests itself: a change of leadership in the party or a significant shift in party policy that is not supported by the national President and Cabinet may trigger efforts to remove the President by MPs whose membership of the party requires that they promote party policy.[5]

No person may serve more than two terms as President. However, when someone fills a vacancy between national elections, the period served as President until the next national elections is not regarded as a term.[6]

---

[1] FC s 89(1).

[2] FC s 89(1)(a), (b) and (c).

[3] FC s 89(2). The question whether courts may review parliamentary decisions to impeach has exercised Nigerian courts. See, for instance, Abaribe v The Speaker of the Abia [2000] FWLR (Pt. 9) 1558; Inakoju v Adeleke [2007] All FWLR (Pt. 353) 3; Ekpenkhio v Egbadon [1993] 7 NWLR (Pt. 308) 717; and Asogwa v Chukwu [2004] FWLR (Pt. 189) 1204. See, generally, E Nwauche 'Is the End Near for the Political Question Doctrine in Nigeria' (Paper presented at the African Network of Constitutional Lawyers Conference, Niarobi, April 2007).

[4] FC s 102(2).

[5] Clause 5.2 of the ANC Constitution (African National Congress Constitution (As amended by and adopted at the 51st National Conference, December 2002)) available at http://www.anc.org.za/show.php?doc=./ancdocs/history/const/const2002.html (accessed 11 February 2008)), requires ANC members who hold elective office to abide by the decisions of the ANC. See also T Lodge 'The Future of South Africa's Party System' (2006) 17 Journal of Democracy 152, 159 (A Code of Conduct stipulates that ANC MPs are subordinate to the ANC National Executive Committee).

[6] FC s 88(2).

(f) The President in court

The fundamental constitutional principle that every exercise of power must be according to law raises the question of how the lawfulness of presidential acts may be tested. President Mandela gave evidence in person in the Transvaal High Court in South African Rugby Football Union & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others.[1] The case engaged the question of whether the President had exercised his power to establish a commission under FC s 84(2) improperly. The decision to order the President to give evidence was challenged in the Constitutional Court. The SARFU III Court held that while the President is a competent and compellable witness,[2] he or she should be compelled to testify in exceptional circumstances only:

> [T]wo aspects of the public interest which might conflict in cases where a decision must be made as to whether the President ought to be ordered to give evidence. On the one hand, there is the public interest in ensuring that the dignity and status of the President is preserved and protected, that the efficiency of the executive is not impeded and that a robust and open discussion take place unhindered at meetings of the Cabinet when sensitive and important matters of policy are discussed. Careful consideration must therefore be given to a decision compelling the President to give evidence and such an order should not be made unless the interests of justice clearly demand that this be done. The judiciary must exercise appropriate restraint in such cases, sensitive to the status of the head of state and the integrity of the executive arm of government. On the other hand, there is the equally important need to ensure that courts are not impeded in the administration of justice.[3]

In SARFU III, the Constitutional Court commented that there was no evidence that 'the administration of justice would have been injured in any way if the President had not been ordered to submit himself to cross-examination'.[4] Accordingly the court a quo was wrong to have ordered the President to testify. The 'special dignity and status of the President together with his busy schedule and the importance of this work' also mean that usually it will be appropriate to make special arrangements for taking testimony.[5]

Different considerations may arise if the President is not a witness but an accused. The Final Constitution does not grant a President immunity from

---

[1] 1999 (4) SA 147 (CC), 1998 (10) BCLR 1256 (CC).

[2] SARFU III (supra) at paras 240-245. See also PJ Schwikkard and SE van der Merwe Principles of Evidence (2002) 400; DT Zeffertt, A Paizes and A St Q Skeen The South African Law of Evidence (2003) 682. See, for a discussion of American Presidents giving testimony, RD Rotunda 'Presidents and ex-Presidents as Witnesses: A Brief Historical note' (1975) University of Illinois Law Forum 1. For the head of state immunity doctrine in the United States see MJ Rozell 'The Law: Executive Privilege: Definition and Standards of Application' (1999) 29 Presidential Studies Quarterly 918 and J Isenbergh 'Impeachment and Presidential Immunity from Judicial Process' (2000) 18 Yale Law and Policy Review 53.

[3] SARFU III (supra) at para 243.

[4] Ibid at para 244.

[5] Ibid at paras 242 and 245.

criminal suits. The US Constitution also does not contain any express presidential immunity from criminal prosecution and the question whether the President is, nonetheless, immune from prosecution has engaged Americans. An implied immunity from civil proceedings was urged in Mississippi v Johnson,[1] but the Court found it unnecessary to reach this question. In United States v Nixon[2] it was argued that respect for the doctrine of the separation of powers implies immunity from criminal prosecution. The Supreme Court held that the doctrine of separation of powers cannot sustain an absolute and unqualified immunity from judicial process. In another case, the Supreme Court said:

> No man in this country is so high that he is above the law. No officer of the law may set that law at defiance with impunity. All the officers of the government, from the highest to the lowest, are creatures of the law and are bound to obey it. It is the only supreme power in our system of government, and every man who by accepting office participates in its functions is only the more strongly bound to submit to that supremacy, and to observe the limitations which it imposes upon the exercise of the authority which it gives.[3]

The arguments usually made in favour of a presidential immunity in the United States are 'functionalist'. Their proponents urge that prosecution of the president would immobilise the executive branch and '[put] the entire executive branch at the mercy of the judiciary'.[4] The US Supreme Court was unconvinced by this argument.[5] In South Africa, where executive authority is to be exercised by the President 'together with the other members of the Cabinet', this argument is even less compelling. Moreover, the focus of the inquiry should not be whether a President subject to criminal prosecution is able to exercise executive authority, but whether, in the words of SARFU III, the 'interests of justice clearly demand' that the President appear in court. The absence of express presidential immunity

---

1 71 US (4 Wall) 475 (1866).

2 418 US 683 (1974).

3 United States v Lee 106 US 196 (1882), 220.

4 AR Amar & BC Kalt 'The Presidential Privilege against Prosecution' (1997) 2 Nexus 11, 17. See also AR Amar 'On Prosecuting Presidents' (1999) 27 Hofstra Law Review 671. See, frrther,, the testimony of Professors Amar and Bloch before the US Senate hearings into the prosecution of incumbent American Presidents: Is a sitting President subject to compulsory criminal process? : Hearings before the Subcommittee on Constitutionalism, Federalism, and Property Rights of the Senate Judiciary Committee on S105-964, 'Indictment or Impeachment of the President', 105th Congress 23 (9 September 1998), quoted by J Turley "'From Pillar to Post": The Prosecution of American Presidents' (2000) 37 American Criminal Law Review 1049, 1076-7.

5 In Clinton v Jones, the US Supreme Court, dealing with the question of immunity from civil suit, held that President Clinton > errs by presuming that interactions between the Judicial Branch and the Executive, even quite burdensome interactions, necessarily rise to the level of constitutionally forbidden impairment of the Executive's ability to perform its constitutionally mandated functions….As Madison explained, separation of powers does not mean that the branches 'ought to have no partial agency in, or no control over, the acts of each other.' The fact that a federal court's exercise of its traditional…jurisdiction may significantly burden the time and attention of the Chief Executive is not sufficient to establish a violation of the Constitution.

520 US 681, 702-703 (1997).

from criminal prosecution in the South African Constitution, the unpersuasiveness of the functionalist argument, and the requirement that courts are not impeded in the administration of justice urge the conclusion in the South African context that the President is not immune to criminal prosecution.

18.3 Cabinet

As in other modern democracies, the executive is the dominant branch of government in South Africa. It controls policy-making, Parliament's legislative agenda and the implementation of both laws and policy. Although FC s 85(1) states that '[t]he executive authority of the Republic is vested in the President', this authority is exercised 'together with the other members of the Cabinet'. This section first describes the way in which Cabinet is constituted and the assignment of portfolios to ministers. Secondly, it considers the current institutional arrangements for the management of Cabinet affairs. Thirdly, it sets out the powers of the executive. Fourthly, it considers the principle of collective Cabinet responsibility and Cabinet decision making. The fifth part deals with individual ministerial responsibility and the rest of the section covers accountability for outsourced and privatised functions, votes of no confidence, ethics, the Minister of Finance, the control of the defence force, foreign affairs and assignment and delegation of executive functions.

(a) Appointment and dismissal of Cabinet members and deputy ministers and assignment of portfolios

Cabinet, FC s 91(1) tells us, 'consists of the President, … a Deputy President and Ministers'. As we note above, the President appoints the members of Cabinet. He may choose as many Cabinet members as he or she wishes, but the Deputy President and all but two Ministers must be drawn from the National Assembly. The Final Constitution specifically empowers the President to appoint Deputy Ministers.[1] Although Deputy Ministers now attend Cabinet meetings, they are not members of Cabinet.

The President assigns powers and functions to the members of Cabinet with few constitutional constraints. The Final Constitution requires one Cabinet member to be appointed leader of government business in the National Assembly.[2] It also anticipates that individual members of the Cabinet will be identified as responsible for finance, local government affairs, the administration of justice, defence and policing.[3]

[1] FC s 93. Only two deputy ministers may be drawn from outside Parliament. There are currently 20 deputy ministers.

[2] FC s 91(4).

[3] See FC s 224 (2) (Cabinet member responsible for national financial matters); FC s 139 (2)(a)(i) (Cabinet member responsible for local government affairs); FC s 175(2)(Cabinet member responsible for the administration of justice); FC s 201(1)(Cabinet member responsible for defence); FC s 206(1) (Cabinet member responsible for policing).

Provisions of the Interim and Final Constitutions relating to the Government of National Unity, which applied until 30 April 1999, put certain constraints on the President's choice of Cabinet members and his or her power to dismiss them. In the case of reallocation of portfolios or dismissal, the President was required to consult the leader of the political party to which an affected Cabinet member belonged and was permitted to make such changes only if they 'become necessary for the Constitution or in the interests of good government'.[1] No such constraints exist now. Under the Final Constitution, the choice of members, reallocation of Cabinet portfolios and dismissal of members is entirely at the discretion of the President. Improving government and political interests, such as ensuring that an influential political constituency is adequately represented in Cabinet or avoiding dissent amongst Cabinet members, dominate these decisions. Because Cabinet members hold office at the discretion of the President and the choice of Cabinet members is a highly political decision, Ministers do not have a right to a hearing prior to dismissal or suspension.[2] However, political parties may impose some restraints on the discretion of the President to compose a Cabinet. Thus, the British Labour Party requires Cabinet positions for members of its Parliamentary Committee[3] and a similar practice prevailed in the Australian Labour Party until the 2007 elections. This does not appear to be the practice in South Africa.

[1] IC ss 88(4)(d) and (e).

[2] On 27 March 1995, President Mandela dismissed Winnie Mandela from the post of Deputy Minister of Arts, Culture, Science and Technology. No reasons were given for the dismissal but the media cited grounds of continued insubordination which included an unauthorized trip abroad, clashes with other black leaders, and repeated jibes at the government. On 12 April 1995, Mrs Mandela applied to court for her reinstatement, arguing, among other things, that President Mandela failed to write her letter of dismissal on stationery bearing the government seal and did not consult with all of his partners in the coalition government. Acting President Thabo Mbeki revoked the dismissal 'to spare the government and the nation the uncertainties which might follow protracted litigation on this issue'. However, upon the return of President Mandela, Mrs Mandela was dismissed again, in compliance with technicalities raised (presumably consultation with partners in the government of national unity as required by the IC). See B Keller 'Winnie Mandela out of Cabinet for defying presidential orders' The New York Times (28 March 1995); World News Briefs 'Winnie Mandela sues to get her job back' The New York Times 12 April 1995; B Keller 'Winnie Mandela is Reinstated on Technicality' The New York Times (13 April 1995). See also ANC Press Statement 'Reinstatement of Winnie Mandela' (12 April 1995) and ANC Press Statement 'Statement by the African National Congress on the dismissal of Mrs Winnie Mandela from her Deputy Ministerial Post' (14 April 1995), both available from http://www.anc.org.za/ancdocs/pr/1995/index.html (accessed 6 February 2008). The power to suspend a Minister (or Deputy Minister) is an incident of the power to dismiss. See Mpehle v Government of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (7) BCLR 921 (Ck). In Mpehle, an MEC suspended by the Premier of the Eastern Cape argued that he had a right to a hearing. Because this was conceded by the respondent the matter was not decided. Insofar as Mpehle might be read to suggest that there should be consultation before dismissal, the decision must be read to apply to the special circumstances under the IC and not to the FC. Ibid at 943G. Nevertheless, it appears that President Mbeki did consult former Deputy President Jacob Zuma before dismissing him in June 2005. Usually such consultation is intended to give the person concerned an opportunity to resign. The former Deputy President declined to resign. See 'Zuma Axed' The Star (14 June 2005) available at http://www.iol.co.za/index.php?set_id=1&click_id=2976&art_id=vn20050614071051531C805432, (accessed 21 June 2007)). Note Sachs J's distinction between Ministers and officials such as the Director of Public Prosecutions in Masetlha. Masetlha v President of the Republic of South Africa 2008 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 228.

[3] Turpin British Government (supra) at 227.

Moreover, although the vertical division of the state into national, provincial and local spheres of government shapes the practice of government, it has had no obvious impression on the composition of cabinet and the allocation of portfolios. Unlike Canada, in South Africa no expectation exists that provinces will be 'represented' in the Cabinet. Similarly, no Cabinet members have responsibility for different regions.

FC s 219 requires Parliament to pass an Act that provides a framework for determining the salaries of Cabinet members (including the President) and deputy ministers. Salaries and limits on other forms of remuneration are discussed in Chapter 20: Provincial Executive Authority.[1]

(b) The President, the Presidency and Cabinet committees

Modern Cabinets rely on Cabinet (or ministerial) committees to enable them to handle the large volume of work they must do, to facilitate coordination amongst government departments and to give ministers who must work together, but who may disagree, an opportunity to resolve their disagreements properly. In 1998, the Report of the Presidential Review Commission identified poor coordination of government activities and policy as a significant problem.[2] In response to this report, the existing, relatively small Cabinet committee system was transformed into what is now commonly referred to as the system of 'Cabinet clusters'. The clusters consist of six Cabinet committees that draw together related departments and parallel clusters of departmental directors general. According to the Presidency, 'Cabinet Committees meet to discuss areas of work, facilitate collaborative decision-making, and make recommendations to Cabinet'.[3] The Cabinet committees are chaired by the President or the Deputy President. They are large — for instance the Committee for the Social Sector has twenty members — and many ministers serve on a number of the committees: the Minister of Education serves on five of the six committees.

The British Ministerial Code of 2001 stated that an effective system of ministerial committees means that few appeals may be made to the full Cabinet. Most matters must be settled in the committees.[1] There is little information about how successful the South African Cabinet committees are when assessed in terms of this criterion. What is clear is that proposed legislation and major policy initiatives are considered by the full Cabinet at its weekly meetings. Generally, it appears that Cabinet does not vote — although voting has occurred on occasion.

[1] See C Murray & O Ampofo-Anti 'Provincial Executive Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 20, 20.3*(g)*.

[2] 'Report of the Presidential Review Commission on the Reform and Transformation of the Public Service in South Africa' (27 February 1998) para 2.4.1.1 available at http://www.info.gov.za/otherdocs/1998/prc98/index.html (accessed 4 February 2008).

[3] 'Presidency Annual Report 2004-5' para 3.2 available at http://www.thepresidency.gov.za/main.asp?include=docs/reports/annual/2005/index.htm (accessed 30 January 2008). The six Cabinet Committees are the Cabinet Committee for the Economic Sector (ES); the Cabinet Committee for Investment and Employment (IE); the Cabinet Committee for Justice, Crime-Prevention and Security (JCPS); the Cabinet Committee for the Social Sector (SS); the Cabinet Committee for Governance and Administration (G&A); and the Cabinet Committee for International Relations, Peace and Security (IRPS).

Administrative support for Cabinet and the Cabinet committees is supplied by the Cabinet Office in the Presidency. According to the 2004-2005 Annual Report of the Presidency, the Cabinet Office:

> implements administrative systems and processes to ensure the overall optimal functioning of the Cabinet and its committees. It facilitates the management of decision-making processes of the Cabinet and its Committees, and ensures that the decisions of the Cabinet are acted upon through mechanisms that enable the Cabinet to monitor itself. It maintains the integrity of the decisions of the Cabinet, and acts as custodian of such decisions. It also promotes the integrated decision-making system and co-operative approach to governance.

This role is clearly not merely administrative. It anticipates that, through the Cabinet Office, the Presidency will maintain control over Cabinet.[2]

(c) Powers of Cabinet

The Final Constitution does not list the powers of Cabinet. Instead, FC s 82(2) describes the way in which executive authority is exercised. Executive authority is exercised by —

(a) implementing national legislation except where the Constitution or an Act of Parliament provides otherwise;
(b) developing and implementing national policy;
(c) co-ordinating the functions of state departments and administrators;
(d) preparing and initiating legislation; and
(e) performing any other executive function provided for in the Constitution or in national legislation.

This list sets out the usual functions of an executive in a parliamentary system and ends with a broadly worded provision which ensures that the executive will be able to fulfil any functions that are legally authorised. Thus, the national executive has those powers that the Final Constitution and legislation grant it.

Paragraph (a) sets out the main function of the executive — to implement laws. It also recognises that not all national laws will be implemented by the national government. First, in terms of FC s 125(2)(b), it is provinces and not the national executive that will ordinarily be responsible for the implementation of national acts that fall under Schedule 4 and thus within the concurrent competence of provinces and the national sphere of government. Secondly, in modern states much law is implemented not by government but by other agencies ranging from parastatals over which the executive has considerable control to institutions such as the Stock Exchange which act independently within a framework provided by law.

[1] See Turpin British Government (supra) at 233. The Code has been revised three times since 2001. The latest Code (Cabinet Office Ministerial Code (July 2007) available at http://www.cabinetoffice.gov.uk/upload/assets/www.cabinetoffice.gov.uk/propriety_and_ethics/ministerial_code_current.pdf (accessed 19 February 2008)) is much briefer and does not explain the purposes of Cabinet practices. However, it appears that the purpose of Cabinet committees remains unchanged.

[2] N de Jager (supra) at 19 — 20.

FC s 85(2)(d) captures another central function of the executive: preparing (ie drafting) and initiating legislation (ie, introducing it in either the National Assembly or the NCOP). Despite the fact that Parliament is designated the 'law-making' authority, executives actually drive the law-making process in parliamentary systems. Very few laws are initiated by parliaments. In fact, paragraph (b), which asserts the role of the executive in 'developing and implementing national policy', is more controversial in South Africa. Members of the executive and bureaucrats have used paragraph (b) to resist attempts by Parliament to question government policies. They assert that Parliament has no role (or at best a limited role) in relation to government policy: its functions are to consider bills and oversee the executive in its implementation of the law. Although Parliament has resisted this claim, in practice its engagement with new policy has been relatively weak.

Finally, paragraph (e) is a catch-all provision that ensures that the executive will be able to carry out functions not covered by the preceding paragraphs. The critical limitation here is the word 'executive'. In an implicit recognition of the separation of powers, paragraph (e) puts judicial and legislative functions outside the ambit of executive authority.[1]

Cabinet members 'are responsible for powers and functions of the executive assigned to them by the President'.[2] In practice, the President allocates portfolios, while the extent of the portfolio is usually largely determined by Acts of Parliament that allocate responsibility for particular laws to specific ministers.[3] In Magidimisi NO v Premier of the Eastern Cape, Froneman J considers the responsibility that provincial Premiers and MECs bear as members of provincial Executive Councils. His findings apply equally to members of the national Cabinet. Thus,

[1] See S Seedorf & S Sibanda 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 12.

[2] FC s 92(1).

[3] The Constitutional Court has held that this provision indicates that where ministers perform other ministerial duties in terms of legislation, they 'exercise no more than subordinate, delegated authority'. Minister of Home Affairs v Liebenberg 2002 (1) SA 33 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1168 (CC) para 13. This holding must not be read to mean that ministers are not accountable in terms of FC s 92(2) for ministerial duties performed in terms of legislation. Indeed, FC s 85(2)(e) provides that executive authority, the exercise of which Cabinet is undoubtedly accountable for, includes any other executive function provided for in national legislation. The Court in Liebenberg was seized with the question of whether regulations made by a minister in terms of legislation constituted an Act of Parliament for purposes of a declaration of invalidity by a High Court in terms of FC s 172(2)(a). The judgment offers no clear statement about the limits or extent of ministerial accountability.

following Froneman J, the President 'bears the ultimate responsibility' to ensure that the national government fulfils the law and other Cabinet members bear responsibility for the operation of their departments.[1]

(d) A collaborative venture — Cabinet decision making

(i) Cabinet solidarity

As already noted, the Constitutional Court has described the exercise of executive authority in South Africa as 'a collaborative venture in terms of which the President acts together with the other members of Cabinet'.[2] Three constitutional provisions provide the basis of this understanding: FC s 85(2), from which the Court quotes, states that '[t]he President exercises the executive authority, together with the other members of the Cabinet'; FC s 92, which stipulates that members of Cabinet are 'accountable collectively and individually to Parliament'; and FC s 102, which gives the National Assembly the power to pass a vote of no confidence in the Cabinet as a whole and thus forcing it to resign.

The idea that members of Cabinet must act together and share responsibility for their actions is often referred to as 'Cabinet solidarity' or collective Cabinet responsibility. Although the exact parameters of the doctrine are not fixed, as Marshall describes, '[t]here are three traditional branches to the collective responsibility convention: the confidence rule, the unanimity rule and the confidentiality rule.'[3] The 'confidence rule', which requires the Cabinet to retain the support (or confidence) of Parliament to remain in power, is constitutionalised in South Africa in the provision concerning a vote of no confidence. The 'unanimity rule' is implied in FC ss 85(2) and 92: in the references to Cabinet acting 'together' and its collective accountability to Parliament. The 'confidentiality rule', which protects the confidentiality of discussions in Cabinet, is not specified in the Final Constitution but is applied in practice.

The convention was developed in Britain as politicians sought to assert greater control of government. Of 19th century British practices, Pares writes:

> The king did nearly all business with the ministers in the room called his closet. He normally saw them one by one…. The business of the closet does not appear, at first sight, to have afforded the ministers much opportunity for collective action. But they know how to counteract the tendency to separate and confine them. On any question of general political importance, they would agree beforehand what to say, and then go into the closet, one by one, and repeat the identical story.[4]

---

[1] Eastern Cape High Court, Case No 2180/04, Unreported (Decided 25 April 2006) at paras 20-23. See also C Murray & O Ampofo-Anti 'Provincial Executive Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) § 20.3.

[2] SARFU III (supra) at para 41.

[3] G Marshall Constitutional Conventions: The Rules and Forms of Political Accountability (1989) 55.

[4] R Pares King George III and the Politicians (1953) 148-149 cited in House of Commons Research Paper 04/82 The Collective Responsibility of Ministers — An Outline of the Issues (15 November 2004) at 7 available at http://www.parliament.uk/commons/lib/research/rp2004/rp04-082.pdf (accessed 11 February 2008).

Over the two centuries since the practice developed, the reasons for the retention of the principle of collective responsibility have changed. In most of the countries in which it currently applies, it has become both less rigid and more controversial. Now, governments usually rely on it to 'present a united front against the Opposition'.[1] But it also contributes to effective and democratic government. In this regard, collective Cabinet responsibility or Cabinet solidarity performs two broad functions. First, the practice ensures government cohesion, and enables the government to administer public affairs in a coherent way and to implement policies relatively consistently over a reasonable period. Second, together with its counterpart, individual accountability, the convention strengthens Parliament's ability to hold the government to account.[2] At the same time, critics note that it contributes to secrecy in government.

The Ministerial Code issued by the British Cabinet Office in 2007 describes the principle as follows:

> Decisions reached by the Cabinet or Ministerial Committees are binding on all members of the Government…. Collective responsibility requires that Ministers should be able to express their views frankly in the expectation that they can argue freely in private while maintaining a united front when decisions have been reached. This in turn requires that the privacy of opinions expressed in Cabinet and Ministerial Committees should be maintained.[3]

There is no similar statement of the doctrine in South Africa[4] but the British formulation appears to reflect practice in South Africa. Moreover, the confidentiality of Cabinet discussions is protected by PAIA[5] and its importance has been acknowledged by the Constitutional Court.[6]

---

[1] See Turpin British Government (supra) at 215 (Offers a description of practice in Britain which is generally applicable to parliamentary systems in the Commonwealth.)

[2] For a useful summary of the history of the development of ministerial government in England in the 19th Century which emphasises these two strands, see M Flinders The Politics of Accountability in the Modern State (2001) 2-9.

[3] Cabinet Office Ministerial Code: A code of Conduct and Guidance on Procedures for Ministers July 2007 available at http://www.cabinetoffice.gov.uk/upload/assets/www.cabinetoffice.gov.uk/propriety_and_ethics/ministerial_code_current.pdf (accessed 19 February 2008). The Australian Cabinet Handbook issued by the Department of the Prime Minister and Cabinet (5th edition updated 2005) 4ff and the Irish Cabinet Handbook issued by the Department of the Taoiseach (1998) para 1.1 — 1.5 describe the convention of collective responsibility in similar terms but the Irish Handbook provides more detail.

[4] The Manual on Executive Acts of the President (1999) presents the government's understanding of the requirements of FC s 85(2). See § 18(3)(d)(ii) infra. See also Egan v Willis (1998) 195 CLR 424, 451 (Australian High Court said that '[i]t should not be assumed that the characteristics of a system of responsible government are fixed in time or that the principles of ministerial responsibility which developed in New South Wales after 1855 necessarily reflected closely those from time to time accepted at Westminster'.) The same might be said for South Africa. However, just as the Australian court nonetheless consulted practice in Britain in Egan, at least until practices are better established in South Africa, an understanding of the way in which Cabinet solidarity and ministerial responsibility function in other parliamentary systems is useful to understanding the South African constitutional framework.

[5] Section 12 (a) of the Promotion of Access to Information Act 2 of 2000 exempts the provisions of the Act from applying to records of 'the Cabinet and its Committees'.

[6] SARFU III (supra) at para 243.

As noted above, collective Cabinet responsibility is usually assumed to mean that a Cabinet member may not vote or speak out against government policy. If a Cabinet member is unable to support a policy, he or she should resign. Secondly, decisions by individual members of Cabinet are regarded as decisions of the whole government whether or not other members are party to them. Thirdly, as the statement of the principle quoted above indicates, it requires confidentiality. In other words, Ministers should not reveal the content of discussions in Cabinet nor should former Cabinet ministers reveal Cabinet secrets.[1]

In most modern systems, practice is a great deal more nuanced than the description above allows. Thus, although there are examples in other parliamentary systems (but not post-apartheid South Africa) of members of Cabinet resigning in the face of policies that they cannot support,[2] other 'safety valves' are used to allow Ministers to remain in government while indicating that they hold views that differ from government policy on a particular matter. Brazier describes the 'unattributal leak' as the 'life-saver of collective responsibility'.[3] An 'unattributable leak' ensures that the views of the dissenting Cabinet member are known to the public whose support he or she wishes to maintain — usually without jeopardising his or her membership of Cabinet. At the same time, the head of Cabinet does not have to contend with open dissent. Moreover, as Brazier and others note, the unattributable leak 'has another general and beneficial side effect. Ministerial solidarity involves the stifling of open dissent: it thereby contributes to secrecy in government…. The leak will … occasionally draw that screen to one side.'[4] British practice also shows that not all leaks will reflect dissent in Cabinet. They may be used strategically by Cabinet to test proposed policies. If the policy receives strong public opposition, it can then be abandoned with a claim by government that it had, in fact, never intended to pursue such a course of action.[5]

[1] See British Cabinet Office Ministerial Code para 18. In Britain the question of ministerial memoirs has been controversial. See House of Commons Research Paper The collective responsibility of Ministers 36 and Attorney-General v Jonathan Cape [1976] 1 QB 752 concerning the publication of Crossman's diaries. The present formulation in the Cabinet Office Code incorporates recommendations made by a Committee of Privy counsellors under Lord Radcliffe after Crossman.

[2] For example, on 17 March 2003 Robin Cook resigned his Cabinet post as Leader of the British House of Commons in opposition to the Cabinet position on the war in Iraq. In announcing his resignation Cook said 'It is with regret I have today resigned from the cabinet…I can't accept collective responsibility for the decision to commit Britain now to military action in Iraq without international agreement or domestic support' ('Cook Quits over Iraq Crisis' BBC Online (17 March 2003), available at http://news.bbc.co.uk/1/hi/uk_politics/2857637.stm (accessed 11 February 2008)). Brazier cites earlier British examples of Ministers of all ranks resigning or being required to resign because they could not accept collective responsibility for some decision or other including the resignations of Mr Heseltine as Secretary of State for Defence in 1986, Mr Nigel Lawson as Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1989 and Sir Geoffrey Howe as Leader of the House of Commons, Lord President of the Council and Deputy Prime Minister in 1990. See R Brazier Constitutional Practice (2nd Ed, 1994) 140-141, esp. fns 71-74. For further examples of Cabinet resignations in the United Kingdom between 1945 and 1986, see Marshall Constitutional Conventions (supra) at 62-66.

[3] Brazier Constitutional Practice (supra) at 141.

[4] Ibid at 141-2.

[5] AP Tant '"Leaks" and the Nature of the British Government' (1995) 66 Political Quarterly 197 cited in Turpin British Government (supra) at 220.

Two other safety valves are seen at work when the public statements of Cabinet ministers fall just short of open dissent with government policy, but nonetheless signal likely disagreement, and when ministers develop policy without prior Cabinet support. Whether or not Cabinet members will do engage in such behaviour turns, to a large extent, on whether or not they will be reprimanded or dismissed will depend greatly on the issue and on the style of the President. The response of the head of the Cabinet will be a matter of political strategy. A weak leader may be unable to act against such behaviour. A strong leader may not need to respond. Thus far, South Africa has little experience of open Cabinet dissent since 1994. That said, it appears that some Cabinet reshuffles that cost ministers their jobs may have been triggered by dissent within Cabinet.

In Britain, a final safety valve that may soften the effect of a rigid application of the principle of collective Cabinet responsibility is 'an agreement to differ'. As the name suggests, an agreement to differ allows individual Cabinet members to speak against government policy.[1] It is controversial in Britain and is used infrequently but, in the case of the 1975 decision to remain a member of the European Community, it held the government together. In a system of single member constituencies, in which Ministers need to look to their individual electoral support as well as the concerns of their party, it provides a useful, if drastic, way of dealing with hotly contested policies. In a system of closed-list proportional representation, with its even greater emphasis on the positions of the governing party, it may be unnecessary.

The practice of collective Cabinet responsibility need not freeze all debate. For instance, Cabinet members have been relatively open in the debate about proposals to introduce a 'Basic Income Grant'. It is well known that the Minister of Finance, Trevor Manuel, is opposed to such a grant, while the Minister of Social Development, Zola Skweyiya supports it.[2]

In coalition Cabinets collective responsibility or Cabinet solidarity may operate in a very different way. Most commonly, coalition partners will be bound by Cabinet solidarity on certain matters, usually set out in the agreement on which the Cabinet is based. On other matters, Cabinet members will be able to express divergent views openly.

(ii) Executive decision making

Collective Cabinet responsibility or Cabinet solidarity does not dictate a decision-making process.[3] It does not mean that all or even certain executive decisions must be made by the entire Cabinet. Nor does it mean that every Cabinet member

[1] See Brazier Constitutional Practice (supra) at 143; Commons Research Paper The Collective Responsibility of Ministers (supra) at 24.

[2] C Terreblanche 'Basic Income Grant on the Cards' IOL (11 February 2007), available at http://www.iol.co.za/index.php?set_id=1&click_id=13&art_id=vn20070211081742198C653630, accessed 5 April 2008.

[3] For a discussion of the some of the ways in which Cabinets operate, see E McLeay 'Buckle, Board, team or Network? Understanding Cabinet' (2006) 4 NZJ Pub & Int'l L 37.

need be aware of all executive decisions for which they are collectively responsible. Certainly, as Turpin notes, the principle of collective responsibility makes most sense when executive decisions are indeed made collectively.[1] Nowadays, however, collective decision making is necessarily limited. As we have described above, many significant policy decisions are made in Cabinet committees rather than the full Cabinet. Yet others are made outside Cabinet structures altogether. These practices do not mean that the principle does not apply to such decisions.[2] The modern functions of collective responsibility are to ensure coherent government and avoid competing policies within government through an insistence that the government presents a unified face, and to secure the ability of Parliament to hold the executive to account. As a result, the principle must apply to all executive decision-making. A Cabinet member could not disown a government policy or refuse to answer questions about a policy merely because he or she was not present when the policy was agreed to or because the policy or decision was not brought to Cabinet by the responsible Minister or Cabinet committee.[3]

How the Cabinet operates will depend largely on the style of the President and the political context. The President is at liberty to decide what matters should be discussed by Cabinet as a whole, what can be dealt with in Cabinet committees and what matters need not come to Cabinet at all. The South African Manual on Executive Acts of the President captures this well. It says that the requirement that the President must act 'together with the Cabinet' > implies that the president takes his decisions in accordance with the 'way of working together' that the Cabinet and President have determined….[The] phrase captures the idea of collective responsibility but allows the Cabinet and the President to determine the way and procedure by which they work together, including leaving certain matters or kinds of matters to be dealt with by a single member of the Cabinet.[4]

The Manual states that the current way of working in the Cabinet is that consultation is not needed on all matters but that > matters of substance — whether ministerial or Presidential should be brought to Cabinet. Accordingly, if a matter is not routine … it must first be referred to Cabinet as must all matters that Cabinet itself has decided should come to it….Whether a matter was routine or not is a question for the Minister's judgement…. [B]oth the President and individual Ministers are duty-bound to take to the Cabinet issues of policy, significant decisions, decisions with financial consequences outside a department's approved budget and any matter the Cabinet has referred to it.[5]

---

[1] See Turpin British Government (supra) at 215.

[2] Cf Currie & De Waal who suggest that members of Cabinet are collectively accountable to Parliament only for those decisions taken collectively. Currie & De Waal New Constitutional and Administrative Law (supra) at 256. This view, which implies that it is consistent with the idea of collective Cabinet accountability for a Cabinet member to disagree in Parliament with the position adopted by a Cabinet colleague, is simply wrong.

[3] Of course, there will be situations in which it would be reasonable for a member of Cabinet may say that he or she does not have the information necessary to answer a question. Under such circumstances, the responsible minister should attend Parliament. If that minister were not to attend it would be reasonable for Parliament to expect his or her colleagues to deal with the issue.

[4] Manual of Executive Acts of the President (1999) para 2.9.

[5] Ibid at 2.10 — 12.

The Manual suggests that a failure to take such decisions to Cabinet could undermine their validity. But, as we have already noted, the Final Constitution does not specify what procedures are necessary for the 'collaborative' exercise of Cabinet government in South Africa. This omission is surely deliberate. Different Presidents may run their cabinets in different ways while complying with the constitutional imperative that executive decisions should be made together with Cabinet. This view is consistent with the framework of parliamentary government with which FC s 85 must be read. The appropriate remedy for the President when he or she believes that a Minister is not pursuing the government's policy or has failed to consult Cabinet when he or she ought to have done so is to dismiss that Minister.[1] Thus the decision in Eisenberg is wrong. There HJ Erasmus J set aside regulations made by the Minister of Home Affairs under the Immigration Act 13 of 2002 in part because he found that making such regulations, involving matters of national policy, was a matter of collective responsibility and thus required Cabinet approval, which had not been secured.[2] Again it misunderstands parliamentary government to read the Final Constitution as identifying which decisions must be taken to Cabinet and which may be taken without a full meeting of Cabinet.

Currie and De Waal also misunderstand the doctrine when they state that:

> [i]n principle, the President and the other members of the Cabinet are individually responsible to Parliament for powers exercised individually, and collectively responsible for powers exercised collectively. …[T]his means that the Cabinet is collectively responsible for major policy decisions. The President is individually responsible for the exercise of head of State powers and powers conferred to the President in terms of ordinary legislation. Ministers are individually responsible for the exercise of powers conferred on them by ordinary legislation, which is not of a nature where the approval of Cabinet is necessary.[3]

This gloss on the doctrine suggests far too rigid an approach. Cabinet members cannot escape responsibility for major policy decisions by absenting themselves from the decision-making process. The notion of Cabinet solidarity implicates all Cabinet members in the policy of the government. Certainly, in practice, a

[1] The reciprocal remedy for ministers who believe that the FC s 85(2) principle of Cabinet solidarity is not being honoured by the President is to resign or to refuse to countersign presidential decisions.

[2] See President of the Republic of South Africa v Eisenberg & Associates (Minister of Home Affairs Intervening) 2005 (1) SA 247, 264 (c). Eisenberg was not wrong because it did not apply the understanding of FC s 85(2) adopted in the Manual on Executive Acts of the President (1999). It is courts, not politicians or bureaucrats, who provide authoritative interpretations of the constitution. It is wrong because it misunderstood the constitutional provision. Currie & De Waal assert that in certain circumstances, such as where the President's decision affects government 'as a whole' or has 'real political importance', the approval of Cabinet must be obtained. See Currie & De Waal New Constitutional and Administrative Law (supra) at 245-246. Again, their position seems wrong, as does their suggestion that Cabinet can delegate decision making powers to individual members under FC s 238. This argument seems to be derived from the fact that IC 82(3) expressly allowed Cabinet to delegate particular functions to particular ministers. However, that provision was necessitated by the power sharing arrangements in Cabinet under the government of national unity. The FC does not provide for a government of national unity and so such a provision become redundant. If South Africa were to have a coalition government, then it is possible that a similar provision might be included in the agreement establishing the coalition.

[3] Currie & De Waal New Constitutional and Administrative Law (supra) at 256.

government is unlikely to fall if a single minister mismanages his or her department or is responsible for a failed or unpopular policy initiative. Similarly, Parliament is unlikely to expect a minister to account for matters that fall within the portfolio of a colleague. But, as described above, ministers are expected to defend government policies and the application of the doctrine of collective accountability is not limited by a distinction between those powers that may be exercised only with the approval of Cabinet and others that can be exercised independently by individual ministers. If legislation requires a particular minister to act or make a decision, then that too is considered a decision of Cabinet for which members are collectively accountable to Parliament.[1]

(iii) Accountability and responsibility

FC s 92 is headed 'accountability and responsibilities' and states:

> (1) The Deputy President and Ministers are responsible for the powers and functions of the executive assigned to them by the President.
> (2) Members of the Cabinet are accountable collectively and individually to Parliament for the exercise of their powers and the performance of their functions.
> (3) Members of the Cabinet must-
> (a) act in accordance with the Constitution; and > (b) provide Parliament with full and regular reports concerning matters under their control.

Subsections (1) and (2) suggest a distinction between 'responsibility' and 'accountability'. Cabinet members are responsible to the President and accountable to Parliament for the performance of their functions. Sometimes accountability is defined as the obligation 'to give a reckoning or account' while 'responsibility' is said to include 'liability to be blamed for loss or failure'.[2] This definition provides an adequate initial description of the relationship between Parliament and the executive. Members of Cabinet, including the President, must provide an account to Parliament of matters that fall within their responsibility. Still, FC s 102 confirms that Cabinet members also owe political responsibility to the National Assembly for decisions that they make and the performance of the departments under their control. Should they fail, they may be dismissed collectively in a vote of no confidence.

[1] See P Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (2003 — Rel 1) at 9.9 ('Where a statute requires that a decision be made by a particular minister, then the cabinet will make the decision, and the relevant minister will formally authenticate the decision. Of course a cabinet will be content to delegate many matters to individual ministers, but each minister recognises the supreme authority of the cabinet should the cabinet seek to exercise it.'). But there may be exceptions. For instance, in Britain '[b]y convention some kinds of decision are taken on the personal responsibility of the minister concerned, without engaging the collective responsibility of ministerial colleagues. This applies, for instance, to decisions of the home Secretary in extradition cases.' Turpin (supra) at 212.

[2] For a discussion of the debate on this matter in Britain, see G Drewry 'The Executive: Towards Accountable Government and Effective Governance?' in J Jowell & D Oliver (eds) *The Changing Constitution (*5th Edition 2004) 280, 294ff . For a discussion of the position in South Africa in relation to parastatals and other similar organs of state, see § 18.3 (f) below.

Although only the National Assembly may dismiss Cabinet in a vote of no confidence, Cabinet members are accountable to both the National Assembly and the NCOP.[1] That they are accountable to the National Assembly is unremarkable. The National Assembly provides their budget and represents the electorate in matters of concern to the national sphere of government. The accountability of Cabinet members to the NCOP requires more explanation. The NCOP is a house of the provinces in which provincial governments and legislatures are represented. Cabinet members are not drawn from the NCOP nor are they directly responsible for government in the provinces. However, the system of shared powers established by the Final Constitution means that the implementation of law and policy often involves close cooperation between the national and provincial spheres of government.[2] The power of the NCOP to call Cabinet members to account ensures that provincial governments can engage with the national government on its responsibilities in the provinces.[3]

FC s 92(3) adds the specific obligation to provide Parliament, and thus the public, with regular reports but Parliament's power to hold Cabinet members to account extends beyond receiving periodic reports. FC ss 56 and 69 back up Parliament's power to call Cabinet members to account under s 92 by specifying the power of the National Assembly and NCOP to summons people and demand reporting.[4]

(iv) Who is bound by Cabinet solidarity and for what are Cabinet members accountable?

FC ss 85(2) and 92 address members of Cabinet only. They exclude Deputy Ministers. The focus of FC s 92 is understandable. It identifies those members who are accountable to Parliament for managing government. However, because the principle of collective responsibility is concerned not only with accountability to Parliament, but is also a mechanism to secure party cohesion, it is likely that political leaders will expect Deputy Ministers to adhere to it as well. Practice in [1] FC s 92(2) holds Cabinet members accountable to Parliament.

[2] On shared legislative competence, see V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 15. On shared powers and co-operative government, see S Woolman, T Roux and B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 14.

[3] For further discussion of the role of the NCOP in holding the national Cabinet to account, see C Murray, D Bezrui, L Ferrell, J Hughes, Y Hoffman-Wanderer and K Saller Speeding Transformation — The Oversight Role of the NCOP: A Report for NDI and the South African National Council of Provinces (2004).

[4] See Egan v Willis (1998) 195 CLR 424. The High Court of Australia confirmed that the upper house of the New South Wales legislature could punish a minister for his failure to comply with a resolution that he should table certain papers in the house. However, a subsequent case, Egan v Chadwick, held that Parliament could not demand the presentation of Cabinet papers. [1999] NSWCA 176. See C Mantziaris 'Egan v. Willis and Egan v. Chadwick: Responsible Government and Parliamentary Privilege' Parliament of Australia Parliament Library Research Paper 12 1999-2000, available at http://www.aph.gov.au/library/Pubs/rp/1999-2000/2000rp12.htm (accessed 20 February 2008).

South Africa since 1994 bears out this understanding. In 2007, in dismissing the Deputy Minister of Health, President Mbeki referred to her constitutional obligation to 'work collectively to develop and implement national policies', an obligation, he implied, she had not fulfilled.[1] As Turpin notes, 'collective responsibility, if strictly observed, exacts its price. By stifling open dissent it contributes to secrecy in government.'[2] The competing interests are apparent. Politicians depend on the President for executive positions and thus will seldom be inclined to gainsay mainstream policy. Presidents and Prime Ministers often take advantage of this indebtedness.[3] Nevertheless, in selecting Ministers and, particularly, Deputy Ministers, the President may also need to include people from different sectors of the governing party. These Ministers and Deputy Ministers may not be willing to forego the right to express views that are not shared by their Cabinet colleagues.

The more important, related question is how far the accountability of Cabinet members extends. This concern has grown recently: in part triggered by the rise of big government, and, in part, by the increasing tendency to establish parastatals to carry out government functions and the privatisation of many others. Under these circumstances, one must ask how a Cabinet member can reasonably be held responsible for actions of public servants and institutions over whom he or she has no direct control. Accordingly, in the UK, when confronted with embarrassing examples of government failure, ministers have argued that while they are responsible for policy matters, they are not responsible (or accountable) for operational matters in their departments or in government agencies and parastatals. This question is considered in section (f) below.

(e) Individual ministerial accountability

FC s 92(2) holds Cabinet members accountable — both collectively and individually — to Parliament. While collective accountability requires Cabinet members to act in a collaborative way, individual accountability ensures that Parliament can identify the Cabinet member who is responsible for a particular matter and can call that person to explain the government's actions. The traditional, text book definition of individual ministerial responsibility would have ministers responsible for everything that is done in the departments under their control — with an obligation to resign if things go seriously wrong. It is not clear that this view ever had purchase outside the classroom. Both its components are contested. First, as

[1] C Terreblanche and F Kockott Sunday Independent (August 12, 2007) 1.

[2] British Government and the Constitution 217.

[3] Burnell talks of the 'payroll vote' in Zambia where, in 2002, 68 ministers and deputy ministers were appointed from a 158-seat Parliament. See P Burnell 'Legislative-Executive Relations in Zambia: Parliamentary Reform on the Agenda' (2003) 21 Journal of Contemporary African Studies 47, 58. In Namibia 'almost all Swapo [governing party] MPs are members of Cabinet or tasked to attend Cabinet meetings on behalf of their ministers.' H Melber 'People, Party, Politics and Parliament: Government and Governance in Namibia' in MA Mohammed Salih (ed) Between Governance and Government: African Parliaments (2005) 142, 151. In Britain, Parliament controls this practice to some extent by limiting the number of ministerial salaries that can be paid (Ministerial and Other Salaries Act 1975). The Indian constitution restricts the number of ministers to 15% of the members of the legislature. Indian Constitution Section 75 (1-A)(Inserted in 2003).

already noted, many argue that it is unreasonable to hold ministers accountable for matters of which they have no knowledge and of which, in an age of big and complex government, they could not be expected to know. Second, resignation is an extreme sanction and there is little evidence to substantiate assertions that it is a firm convention of parliamentary government.[1] Resignations seem more often to be a response to public pressure by the party in power, used by the party to demonstrate accountability for the mismanagement or the misjudgement in question. British practice suggests that Cabinet members can survive even serious problems if their colleagues are prepared to ride the storm.[2]

The best explanation of what Cabinet members are accountable for takes into account both the size and complexity of government and the importance of having elected representatives bearing responsibility for the actions of government. As Turpin comments, there 'should be a limit to the ability of ministers to escape responsibility by attributing blame to their officials'.[3] Thus, Parliament can at least expect a Cabinet minister to explain what measures have been taken to ensure that the department under his or her control is properly run and, in case of mismanagement, what steps have been taken to rectify the maladministration.[4] This view, which insists that the accountability of Cabinet members covers more than matters of policy, is consistent with the FC's strong, overall commitment to accountable government. Nevertheless, the line between matters for which officials bear responsibility and matters for which the minister must shoulder the blame, is difficult to draw n practice. Following British practice, the Public Finance Management Act (PFMA)[5] acknowledges this difficulty in stipulating, in s 64, that

[1] The Final Report of the Ad-Hoc Committee on Ministerial Accountability of the Gauteng Legislature states that '[a]n Executive Council member could be required/or expected to resign on four counts' (see 'Final Report' 8 December 2003) 6.2.9.2. Only one of these falls within the usual ambit of individual accountability — inept or corrupt policies. The others (embarrassment in his or her personal life; disagreement with the government; and lying to the legislature) seem to demand resignation for the member's personal unsuitability for the position.

[2] See Turpin (supra) at 453ff.

[3] See Turpin (supra) at 461

[4] This principle may be thought to be compromised by the present practice that the bureaucratic heads of departments (Directors General) are appointed by the President. However, the doctrine of collective responsibility means that a minister cannot avoid accounting to Parliament by claiming a lack of control over the choice of Director General.

[5] Act 1 of 1999. The PFMA is legislation required by FC s 216. The relevant part of FC s 216 provides:

Treasury control

(1) National legislation must establish a national treasury and prescribe measures to ensure both transparency and expenditure control in each sphere of government, by introducing-
   (a) generally recognised accounting practice;
   (b) uniform expenditure classifications; and
   (c) uniform treasury norms and standards.

(2) The national treasury must enforce compliance with the measures established in terms of subsection (1), and may stop the transfer of funds to an organ of state if that organ of state commits a serious or persistent material breach of those measures.

The object of the Act is to ensure transparency, accountability and sound financial management in the institutions to which it applies. Preamble read with section 2.

a departmental accounting officer is responsible for unauthorised expenditure that he or she has been directed to incur by a minister unless that accounting officer has informed the minister in writing that the expenditure is unauthorised and, nonetheless, been directed, in writing, to proceed. This procedure ensures that the responsibility lies with the minister.

Yet more complicated questions of accountability arise in the case of parastatals and other, privatised or partially privatised government functions. The general position is that Cabinet members are accountable to Parliament for all matters that fall within their portfolios, including public entities operating as companies.[1]

The question of what sanctions Parliament can impose when Cabinet members fail to fulfil their responsibilities adequately is a vexed one. As already noted, resignations are rare — and there have been none in South Africa since 1994. In a system in which the balance of power between government and opposition is fine, Cabinet members are constantly aware of the need to retain the confidence of their parliamentary colleagues. This peer pressure encourages them to take their accountability to Parliament seriously. Parliament also has other mechanisms to enforce accountability. FC s 92(3) requires Cabinet members to report to Parliament regularly. This requirement is supplemented by parliamentary practices such as question time. Nevertheless, the dominance of government business in Parliament, and the ability of the majority party to control proceedings and the agenda, reduce the effectiveness of the convention of individual accountability of Cabinet members.

Interesting questions arise here: Could the opposition rely on the (unusual) fact that Cabinet accountability is spelt out in the Final Constitution to insist that Cabinet members attend Parliament and answer questions even if the Speaker and programme committee of the National Assembly does not require this? Is it a matter that is appropriately adjudicated by a court or is it a matter of internal proceedings of Parliament? As the Constitutional Court recognised in Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly and others,[2] although the 'constitutional principle of separation of powers requires that other branches of government refrain from interfering in parliamentary proceedings…[c]ourts are required by the Constitution "to ensure that all branches of government act within the law" and fulfil their constitutional obligations.'[3] Moreover, following Doctors for Life, a

[1] The Gauteng Legislature's Report classifies the responsibility of members of the executive to account to the legislature under five headings. One of these is 'redirectory responsibility'. This responsibility, according to the Report, requires the member of the Executive to 'redirect questions from members [of the legislature] to the relevant quasi-government or parastatal agency for which she/he is accountable' (6.2.9.2.1). However, the Report does not take this matter further instead recommending that the question of accountability for public entities receive further attention (7.1). Note that the British Cabinet Office Ministerial Code (2007) states that 'ministers have a duty to Parliament to account, and be held to account, for the policies, decisions and actions of their departments and agencies' (emphasis added) (para 1.2*(b)*).

[2] 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR (CC).

[3] Ibid at paras 37 and 38.

failure by Parliament to hold Cabinet members to account would touch upon a matter central to the model of democracy established by the Final Constitution.[1] Doctors for Life suggests that such a failure may, in a proper case, be justiciable.[2]

(f) Outsourcing, privatisation and Cabinet accountability

In South Africa, as in many parts of the world, functions that have been performed by government in the past fifty or so years are increasingly being performed by corporate entities at some remove from government.[3] The trend of privatising and outsourcing government services and government functions is often considered from the perspective of administrative law. These measures raise questions of the extent to which courts can review powers exercised by non-governmental entities.[4] But consideration must also be given to whether members of Cabinet are accountable to Parliament for the performance of governance functions delegated to non-governmental entities. At least part of the justification for delegated governance is the replacement of sometimes ineffective methods of political accountability with accountability to shareholders.[5] However, in Britain, some argue that the delegation of functions to organisations with some degree of autonomy from direct ministerial control has 'challenged constitutional processes of accountability' and reduced individual ministerial accountability to Parliament.[6] In the United States, delegated governance has been accompanied by a shift in attitude from legal process to performance, wherein accountability to Congress is sometimes seen as a hindrance to performance and a nuisance to be avoided.[7] Although managers are thus institutionally insulated from political accountability, the idea is that they remain accountable for the achievement of 'real results'.[8] [1] Ibid at para 32. In the context of FC s 92 the principle would be accountable government, enshrined in FC s 1 and elsewhere.

---

[2] See T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 10.

[3] See Y Burns 'Government Contracts and the Public/Private Divide' (1998) 13 SA Public Law 234; R Malherbe 'Privatisation and the Constitution: Some Exploratory Observations' (2001) Tydskrif vir die Suid Afrikaanse Reg 1. In relation to Britain, see generally, G Drewry 'The executive: Towards accountable government and effective governance?' in Jowell & Oliver The changing constitution 280; M Flinders 'MPs and Icebergs: Parliament and Delegated Governance' (2004) 57 Parliamentary Affairs 767. In relation to the United States, see R C Moe 'The Emerging Federal Quasi Government: Issues of Management and Accountability' (2001) 61 Public Administration Review 290.

[4] See, for example, Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 147-150; S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31; J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 63.

[5] JF Handler Down from Bureaucracy: The Ambiguity of Privatization and Empowerment (1996) 3; Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 148.

[6] Flinders 'MPs and Icebergs' (supra) at 767.

[7] Moe 'The Emerging Federal Quasi-government' (supra) at 306; Flinders 'MPs and Icebergs' (supra) at 774.

[8] Moe (supra) at 305-306.

There are arguments, however, that these institutions are, ultimately, totally unaccountable. The relevant question in the context of this section is the extent to which the national executive remains responsible or accountable for governance functions once they have been delegated.

In South Africa, the transfer of governmental functions usually takes one of two forms. An outsourcing arrangement involves the conclusion of a contract between government and a corporate entity in terms of which the entity undertakes to perform certain traditionally governmental functions.[1] Privatisation involves the formation of a corporate entity with its own legal personality distinct from government to which responsibility for the performance of a function or provision of a service is transferred.

(i) Outsourcing arrangements

Outsourcing involves the 'contracting out' of specific state functions to the private sector, wherein a person, group, company or entity other than the state is enlisted by means of a contract to provide services directly to the public.[2] Before the constitutional era the power to enter into contracts was an element of the executive's common-law authority derived from English prerogative powers.[3] While the Final Constitution does not expressly mention an executive power to contract, Floyd argues that, in light of item 2(1) of Schedule 6 to the Final Constitution, providing that all law in force at the time the Constitution took effect continues in force to the extent of its consistency with the Final Constitution,[4] the common-law empowerment of the state to conclude contracts remains valid.[5] Public contracts may also be expressly authorised by statute.[6]

[1] See Burns (supra) at 235-236.

[2] See Burns (supra) at 236. See also C Turpin Government Contracts (1972); ACL Davies Accountability: A Public Law Analysis of Government by Contract (2001); C Saunders & K Yam 'Government Regulation by Contract: Implications for the Rule of Law' (2004) 15 Public Law Review 51; JB Auby 'Comparative Approaches to the Rise of Contract in the Public Sphere' (2007) Public Law 40, 43-44; and J Freeman 'The Contracting State' (2000) 28 Florida State University Law Review 155, 164-165.

[3] See Minister of Home Affairs and Another v American Ninja IV Partnership and Another 1993 (1) SA 257 (a); Sedgefield Ratepayers' and Voters' Association and Others v Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others 1989 (2) SA 685 (c).

[4] See M Chaskalson 'Transitional Provisions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 28.

[5] T Floyd 'The Capacity of Government to Conclude Contracts: Still an Unlimited Power?' (2005) 20 South African Public Law 378, 387. See also P Bolton The Law of Government Procurement in South Africa (2007) 73ff. The FC s 82(2) power to implement legislation and policy may also be interpreted to authorise state contracts.

[6] On the power of local government executives to contract, see s 10C(7)(a) of the Local Government Transition Act 209 of 1993 and Cape Metropolitan Council v Metro Inspection Services (Western Cape) CC and Others 2001 (3) SA 1013 (SCA) at para 18. On the power of provincial governments to contract. See Provincial Tender Board Act (Eastern Cape) 2 of 1994 and Cash Paymaster Services (Pty) Ltd v Eastern Cape Province and Others 1999 (1) SA 324 (CkH).

A frequently voiced concern is that widespread 'contracting out' of services impedes parliamentary oversight and supervision, and allows the executive body as well as the non-governmental entity to escape scrutiny for the provision of services outsourced in terms of a contract.[1] Saunders and Yam explain the problem:

> Representative democracy assumes the accountability of elected representatives to the people for the exercise of public power. Parliament is accountable directly, through its public procedures and through the electoral process. Governments are accountable to Parliaments between elections. …Theoretically, governments are also responsible to Parliament for action that they take pursuant to statute and in the course of administration. However, the consistency of this in practice is open to question. The difficulties of enforcing the responsibility of government to Parliament are further augmented by any departure from the traditional governance model.[2]

Responsibility for the fulfilment of the governmental functions of service provision remains with the executive even where the executive outsources the actual provision of services through contract. Accordingly, the executive remains accountable to Parliament for these outsourced functions. Unlike the case of privatisation, in which national legislation makes provision for the formal delegation of responsibility to a non-government entity, a contract regulates only who performs a particular service and not who bears ultimate political responsibility for the provision of that service. In this context, the most crucial difference between privatisation and outsourcing arrangements is that Parliament is involved when a privatisation scheme delegates responsibility for a service previously provided by the government, while an outsourcing arrangement can be concluded by a contract to which Parliament is not privy.[3] Where a national department seeks to outsource the provision of a service or performance of a function for which it is responsible by means of a contract, without parliamentary involvement, it is clear that the Cabinet member in charge of that department and, indeed Cabinet as a whole, remain accountable to Parliament for the provision of that service or the performance of that function. As we discuss below, where Parliament is involved in the delegation of a function or power, as in the case of a privatisation, the situation is more complicated.

The difficulty created by outsourcing arrangements is not one of mere theory. It does not present conceptual problems of where accountability does or ought to [1] Auby writes: 'Contractual public policies are often conducted in such a way that they are largely out of the reach of any parliamentary supervision.' Auby (supra) at 54. Freeman echoes this concern and indicates that the weakening of executive and legislative oversight places a greater burden on the judiciary. Freeman (supra) at 201.

[2] Saunders & Yam (supra) at 58 (footnotes omitted).

[3] Although the authority of an executive organ to enter into a contract may be conferred by legislation, the conferral of an authority to contract does not amount to a delegation of responsibility for the subject-matter of the contract. On the differences between delegation and contracting out, see Saunders and Yam (supra) at 62-64.

fall. Rather, the difficulty is a practical one inherent in parliamentary oversight of executive functions performed in fact by entities other than the executive.[1]

(ii) Privatisation

Privatisation has been succinctly described and promoted by its supporters as 'the systematic transfer of appropriate functions, activities or property from the public to the private sector, where services, production and consumption can be regulated more efficiently by the market and price mechanisms'.[2] The corporations to which functions are transferred are sometimes referred to as quasi-autonomous non-governmental organisations or 'quangos', non-departmental public bodies or institutions of the New Public Management in Britain, and as hybrid organisations in the United States.

In South Africa, the Public Finance Management Act (PFMA)[3] regulates the financial management of various government and non-governmental bodies. The PFMA captures privatised institutions within a range of institutions that fulfil public functions with varying degrees of independence from government. It establishes lines of financial accountability for government and provincial departments as well as corporations that perform public functions, and refers to these corporations as national or provincial 'public entities'. Public entities are defined in section 1 of the PFMA to include national and provincial 'government business enterprise[s]'. The latter are in turn are defined as juristic persons under the [1] This section does not consider how these practical problems may be resolved. See Saunders and Yam (supra) at 61-67; Freeman (supra) at 201-207; and SL Schooner 'Contractor Atrocities at Abu Ghraib: Compromised Accountability in a Streamlined, Outsourced Government' (2005) 16 Stanford Law and Policy Review 549, 571-572.

[2] N Kusi 'The Fiscal Impact of Privatisation in South Africa' South African Network for Economic Research Working Paper 18 (November 1998) 4 cited in Malherbe 'Privatisation and the Constitution' (supra) at 1. For a discussion of the extent to which privatisation and outsourcing out to permit a government entity to insulate itself from constitutional scrutiny see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31.

[3] Act 1 of 1999. The PFMA is legislation required by FC s 216. The relevant part of FC s 216 provides:

Treasury control

(1) National legislation must establish a national treasury and prescribe measures to ensure both transparency and expenditure control in each sphere of government, by introducing-
   (a) generally recognised accounting practice;
   (b) uniform expenditure classifications; and
   (c) uniform treasury norms and standards.

(2) The national treasury must enforce compliance with the measures established in terms of subsection (1), and may stop the transfer of funds to an organ of state if that organ of state commits a serious or persistent material breach of those measures.

The object of the Act is to ensure transparency, accountability and sound financial management in the institutions to which it applies (Preamble read with section 2).

control and ownership of the national or provincial executive, which have been assigned financial and operational authority to carry on a business activity. Quangos, institutions of the New Public Management and hybrids will be referred to in this section in accordance with the nomenclature of the PFMA.

In the case of 'formal privatisation', where the entity to which a function is transferred remains wholly or mainly state-owned, private accountability to shareholders for the achievement of results seems to offer no justification for the transfer or delegation of the function. On the contrary, formal privatisation may be seen to be a cunning way of avoiding both the direct political accountability that members of the national executive owe to Parliament and the private commercial accountability that directors of companies owe to shareholders. In South Africa, there are a number of commercial entities performing public or governmental functions that are wholly or mostly owned by the state.[1]

While dilution or attenuation of accountability seems an inevitable consequence of privatisation, executive accountability is maintained to some degree by statutory structures. FC s 92(2) means that Ministers remain accountable for institutions that fall within their policy portfolios. The PFMA establishes mechanisms by which financial accountability is maintained, designating Cabinet members as executive authorities in relation to national public entities.[2] The respective

[1] For example, section 3(1) of the Post Office Act 44 of 1958 (as amended) contemplates the incorporation of two public companies to conduct postal and telecommunications services. These companies have since been incorporated as the SA Post Office Limited and Telkom SA Limited. Shares in the companies are in terms of sections 3(4)(a) and 5(1) issued to the state, and the powers and duties of the state as shareholder are exercised and performed by the Minister (section 3(6)). Similar structures are in place in regard to the South African Broadcasting Corporation Limited (Broadcasting Act 4 of 1999, section 8(1)-(2)), Transnet Limited (Legal Succession to the SA Transport Services Act 9 of 1989, section 2(1)), the Armaments Corporation of South Africa Limited (Armaments Corporation of South Africa Limited Act 51 of 2003, section 2(2)), the Airports Company of South Africa (Airports Company Act 44 of 1993, section 3(3)) and Eskom Holdings Limited (Eskom Conversion Act 13 of 2001, section 2). The Central Energy Fund holds funds for the financing and promotion of fossil-fuel energy resources, and is controlled by a proprietary company, CEF (Pty) Ltd, established in terms of the Central Energy Fund Act 38 of 1977. While the legislation establishing the other entities mentioned so far contemplates that the state may transfer its shares to any other person, usually subject to some form of ministerial approval, the Central Energy Fund Act provides that shares in CEF (Pty) Ltd are to be taken up the state only and cannot be transferred (section 1D(2) and (5)).

[2] In terms of section 1 of the PFMA, each member of Cabinet accountable to Parliament for a national department is designated as the 'executive authority' for that department for the purposes of the PFMA. Various duties and functions of 'executive authorities' are provided for in the PFMA. The executive authority must, for example, receive the annual report, the audited financial statements and the Auditor-General's report in relation to the national department for which he or she is responsible (s 40(1)(d)) and must table these reports in the National Assembly (s 65(1)(a)). The 'executive authority' of a national public entity is defined in the PFMA as 'the Cabinet member who is accountable to Parliament for that public entity or in whose portfolio it falls'. (our italics) The PFMA thus seems to contemplate two situations: one where a Cabinet member is accountable to Parliament for a national public entity and another where the Cabinet member is not accountable for the public entity but is responsible for the field of activity in which the entity's activities fall. However, this distinction does not appear to be sustained in the PFMA which refers directly to Ministers 'responsible for' public entities and which, in section 65(1)(a) provides that a Cabinet member is responsible, as the executive authority of a public entity, for tabling reports.

legislative frameworks establishing public entities supplement this broad requirement. Nevertheless, the statutory framework is not absolutely clear.

The PFMA's definition of national public entities embraces national government business enterprises, but also recognises a class of public entities that are not government business enterprises. This category of public entity is defined as any board, commission, company, corporation, fund or other entity other than a national government business enterprise that is established in terms of national legislation and accountable to Parliament.[1] The definition of this second class of national public entities suggests that its member entities are directly accountable to Parliament. Such direct accountability may be read to displace the accountability of the relevant Minister. But Parliament cannot by legislation remove accountability which the Final Constitution demands of members of Cabinet. Under the Final Constitution, Cabinet remains responsible for the exercise of the executive authority of the state.

As already indicated, under the PFMA, national government business enterprises are a subcategory of public entities. The PFMA defines national government business enterprises as juristic persons under the 'ownership control of the national executive'. An entity in which the state is the sole or majority shareholder is, if it meets the other criteria set in the definition, a national government business enterprise.[2] In the case of the South African Broadcasting Corporation, a major public entity listed in Schedule 2 of the PFMA, the state is the sole shareholder.[3] The situation is the same for Transnet Limited,[4] the Central Energy Fund (Pty) Ltd,[5]

[1] The definition states:
"national public entity" means —
(a) a national government business enterprise; or
(b) a board, commission, company, corporation, fund or other entity (other than a national government business enterprise) which is —
(i) established in terms of national legislation ;
(ii) fully or substantially funded either from the National Revenue Fund, or by way of a tax, levy or other money imposed in terms of national legislation; and
(iii) accountable to Parliament.

[2] The definition in its entirety reads:
"national government business enterprise" means an entity which —
(a) is a juristic person under the ownership control of the national executive;
(b) has been assigned financial and operational authority to carry on a business activity;
(c) as its principal business, provides goods or services in accordance with ordinary business principles; and
(d) is financed fully or substantially from sources other than —
(i) the National Revenue Fund; or
(ii) by way of a tax, levy or other statutory money.

[3] Section 8A(2) of the Broadcasting Act 4 of 1999 reads: 'The Corporation must have a share capital as contemplated in section 19 of the Companies Act [61 of 1973] with the State as its sole shareholder.'

[4] Legal Succession to the SA Transport Services Act 9 of 1989, section 2(1). The Act does contemplate, though, that at some point the state may cease to be hold all the shares of the company.

[5] Central Energy Fund Act 38 of 1977, section 1D(2).

Eskom Holdings Limited,[1] the Airports Company,[2] Telkom SA Limited and the SA Post Office Limited.[3] In the case of Transnet, the Airports Company, Telkom and the Post Office, the relevant ministers exercise the state's rights as member and shareholder of each company on behalf of the state.[4] Each minister is responsible for these functions and powers as shareholder, and is in terms of FC s 92(2) accountable to Parliament for their performance and exercise.[5]

Parliament may be able to hold national government business enterprises directly accountable in terms of FC s 55(2)(a). The section requires the National Assembly to provide for mechanisms to ensure that all 'executive organs of state in the national sphere of government are accountable to it'. Most of the entities referred to above fit the definitional requirements of organ of state set in FC s 239.[6] If these public entities are executive organs of state, rather than merely organs of state, they will be accountable to the National Assembly. What an executive organ of state is remains an open question. However, FC s 238 also refers to an 'executive organ of state' and grants executive organs of state the power to delegate executive authority and enter into agency agreements. This wording suggests that an 'executive organ of state' is an organ of state that exercises some executive authority, or forms part of 'the executive'. One possible reading of FC s 55(2)(a) is that it is the counterpart of FC 92: it confirms Parliament's obligation to oversee members of Cabinet who in terms of s 92 are accountable to it.[7] On this view, a member of Cabinet who exercises rights as a shareholder in a national government business enterprise that is wholly or mostly owned by the state would

[1] Eskom Conversion Act 13 of 2001, section 2. Section 4(2) does contemplate that, as with Transnet, the state may cease to be the sole or majority shareholder of the company.

[2] Airports Company Act 44 of 1993, section 3(3).

[3] Post Office Act 44 of 1958, sections 3(4)(d) and 5(1).

[4] See the relevant Acts of Parliament referred to above at sections 2(3); 3(3) and (4); and 3(6) respectively.

[5] One of these powers is the removal of directors. Section 220 of the Companies Act 61 of 1973 confers the power to remove directors before the expiry of their term on the general meeting of the members of a company. As the sole or majority shareholding member of a company, the executive, acting through the relevant Minister, is empowered to remove directors. In May 2007, the Minster of Communications dismissed the CEO of the SA Post Office Limited. See SAPA 'Post Office Boss Dismissal Confirmed' available at http://business.iafrica.com/news/903487.htm (accessed 6 June 2007)). In 2003 the Minister of Transport dismissed the chairman of the Airports Company. See J Sikhakhane 'Johncom's Mashudu Ramano Tries to Crack the BEE Nut' Business Report (5 July 2006) available at http://www.busrep.co.za/index.php?fSectionId=553&fArticleId=3323722 (accessed 6 June 2007)).

[6] See Transnet Ltd v Goodman Brothers (Pty) Ltd 2000 (1) SA 853 SCA; Transnet Ltd v Chirwa 2007 (2) SA 198 (SCA); Chirwa v Transnet Ltd CCT 78/06 (Decided 28 November 2007).

[7] Stuart Weir talks of 'executive quangos' in the UK, but uses the term to describe bodies which have been created or pressed into service to 'perform public functions or deliver public services.' s Weir 'Quangos: Questions of Democratic Accountability' (1995) 48 Parliamentary Affairs 306. This description is of no assistance in South Africa in defining executive organs of state, since all organs of state perform public functions or exercise public powers.

be accountable to Parliament for the operation of that entity.[1] Another view is that these entities are directly accountable to the National Assembly. But, it is unclear what direct accountability to Parliament would mean in such cases. Parliament may insist that the entity concerned itself accounts for its activities but has little power to act when things are amiss. Thus, the concomitant accountability of Cabinet is essential.

In this regard, Cabinet's response to the 2007 outcry concerning Eskom, a major public entity which is established as a company, is instructive. President Mbeki himself accepted the government's responsibility for Eskom's inability to maintain an adequate supply of power to the country.[2]

The situation is a great deal more complicated in the case of a substantial privatisation where the state ceases to be the sole or majority shareholder. Presumably Cabinet ceases to be fully accountable to Parliament for the exercise or performance of powers and functions as a shareholder. Similarly, directors of such a company cease to be directly accountable to Parliament as the company ceases to be an executive organ of state. The mechanisms of price and market and accountability to private shareholders take over. In such cases, the activities of private companies performing traditionally governmental functions and providing public services can be regulated effectively even in the absence of direct ministerial accountability. The National Assembly exercises oversight by holding regulating bodies to account. In terms of FC s 55(2)(b)(ii), however, the Assembly must establish mechanisms 'to maintain oversight' of any organ of state.[3]

(g) Votes of no confidence under FC s 102

FC 102 states:

> (1) If the National Assembly, by a vote supported by a majority of its members, passes a motion of no confidence in the Cabinet excluding the President, the President must reconstitute the Cabinet.

[1] See AAA Investments (Pty) Ltd v Micro Finance Regulatory Council and Another 2007 (1) SA 343 (CC), 2006 (11) BCLR 1255 (CC). The Constitutional Court held that a private not for profit organisation established to regulate the micro finance industry in terms of the now-repealed Usury Act 73 of 1968 was an organ of state within the meaning of FC s 239. Although not owned or operated by the executive, the Usury Act contemplated that the minister of Trade and Industry would exercise significant oversight of the Council. This oversight role would have constituted an executive function provided for in national legislation within the meaning of FC s 85(2)(e), and is a role for which the Minister would have been accountable to Parliament. The mechanisms in the Usury Act by which the Minister remained involved in and accountable for the affairs of the Council follow the reading of FC s 55(2)(a) as referring to Cabinet. On this view it is not clear the FC s 55(2)(a) contemplates direct accountability of executive organs of state to Parliament.

[2] 'Government to blame for South Africa blackouts: Mbeki' 11 December 2007 http://www.haaba.com/tags/electricity?q=node/65918 (accessed 19 February 2008) and 'State of the Nation Address of the President of South Africa, Thabo Mbeki: Joint Sitting of Parliament' 8 February 2008 http://www.info.gov.za/speeches/2008/08020811021001.htm (accessed 19 February 2008).

[3] Flinders points out that status as a non-departmental public body 'does not provide protection from forms of parliamentary scrutiny, such as parliamentary questions.' Flinders (supra) at 779. Cole suggests that the contribution to accountability of parliamentary questions put to ministers about public entities within their portfolios is relatively small. M Cole 'Accountability and Quasi-government: The Role of Parliamentary Questions' (1999) 5 The Journal of Legislative Studies 77.

(2) If the National Assembly, by a vote supported by a majority of its members, passes a motion of no confidence in the President, the President and the other members of the Cabinet and any Deputy Ministers must resign.

This provision constitutionalises the central element of a parliamentary democracy: the executive must retain the confidence of Parliament to remain in office. Successful votes of no confidence are likely to be rare. First, in all parliamentary systems, members of the legislature depend on the support of the party for their continued careers as politicians: members of the majority party rarely vote their leadership out of government. In an the electoral system of closed list proportional representation, the dependence of MPs on the party is even greater because bank-benchers are not subject to pressure from members of a constituency. Thus, for a vote of no-confidence to be carried by a majority of MPs requires a major political upheaval. Secondly, although a vote of no confidence does not require the dissolution of the National Assembly, unless another leader who carries the support of the majority is lined up, dissolution of the Assembly and a national election is a likely consequence. MPs will not readily embark on a process which threatens their seats and requires them to fight an election.

(h) Ethics

Cabinet members are expected to conduct themselves in an ethical way. FC s 96(2) outlines the basic principles that are applicable in this regard. It states that:

Members of the Cabinet and Deputy Ministers may not-
(a) undertake any other paid work;
(b) act in any way that is inconsistent with their office, or expose themselves to any situation involving the risk of a conflict between their official responsibilities and private interests; or
(c) use their position or any information entrusted to them, to enrich themselves or improperly benefit any other person.

This section is not intended to be comprehensive. FC s 96(1) anticipates a more extensive code of ethics for Cabinet members stating that '[m]embers of the Cabinet and Deputy Ministers must act in accordance with a code of ethics prescribed by national legislation'.

The national legislation envisaged in FC s 96(1) was passed in 1998 in the form of the Executive Members Ethics Act (Ethics Act).[1] Section 2 of the Ethics Act requires the President, in consultation with Parliament, to publish a code of ethics to govern the behaviour of all national Cabinet Ministers and deputy Ministers. The Executive Ethics Code was eventually published in July of 2000.[2] The standards outlined in the Code elaborate upon the provisions of FC s 96(2). The Code requires Cabinet members to submit a list of their financial interests to the Secretary of Cabinet. The Secretary then maintains a register of financial interests.

[1] Act 82 of 1998.
[2] GG No 21366 of 28 July 2000.

Breaches of the Ethics Code are to be investigated by the Public Protector,[1] who on receipt of a complaint,[2] must complete an investigation and submit a report within 30 days. If the complaint was laid against a Cabinet Member or Deputy Minister, the report must be submitted to the President. The President must, within 14 days of receipt, submit a copy of the report together with his or her comments to the National Assembly.[3] A 'Cabinet member' includes the President[4] and the same procedure applies to complaints against the President. In practice the President would receive the report on an investigation into his or her actions, have the opportunity to comment and then submit it to the National Assembly. The National Assembly could then avail itself of the power to impeach, to investigate or to question the President.

(i) The Minister of Finance

As in other parliamentary systems, the Minister of Finance has a distinct constitutional role and is central to the system of public finance that the Final Constitution established. Ross Kriel and Mona Monadjem discuss the constitutional and statutory framework in more detail in their chapter on Public Finance.[5] In the context of this chapter, however, it is important to note the exclusive power that the Minister of Finance has under FC s 73 to introduce money bills (which are defined in FC s 77). As the National Assembly currently believes (mistakenly) that it may not amend a money bill until the Act regulating the procedure for such amendments anticipated by FC s 77 is passed, the Minister now possesses absolute control over money bills — subject only to the principle of Cabinet solidarity and the remote threat of a vote of no confidence.

The responsibility that the Minister of Finance has for public expenditure necessarily means that he or she has an interest in the policies of all government departments. The combination of the definition of a money bill as any bill that raises a tax and the provision that bills raising taxes may contain no other matters ensure that the Minister of Finance is in control of all tax bills before Parliament.

---

[1] Section 3 of the Ethics Act.

[2] In terms of s 4(1) of the Ethics Act an investigation must be initiated if a complaint is lodged by:

(a) the President, a member of the National Assembly or a permanent delegate to the National Council of Provinces, if the complaint is against a Cabinet member or Deputy Minister; or

(b) the Premier or a member of the provincial legislature of a province, if the complaint is against an MEC of the province.

In terms of s 4(3) members of the public may also lodge complaints. However, such complaints must be lodged in terms of the relevant sections of the Public Protector Act 23 of 1994.

[3] Ethics Act s 3.

[4] Section 1 (ii) of the Ethics Act.

[5] See R Kriel and M Monadjem 'Public Finances' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 27.

This consolidation of responsibility (and power) is intended to ensure that the national Treasury can control the national tax burden and that other departments do not increase it by adding ad hoc tax measure to legislation that they initiate.[1]

(j) Executive control of the defence force[2]

The President is the Commander-in-Chief of the defence force.[3] In addition, a member of Cabinet must be politically responsible for defence.[4] While both the President and the Cabinet member responsible for defence are politically accountable to Parliament under FC 92(2), executive control of the defence force rests directly with the President.[5] Under FC s 201 only the President may authorise the employment of the defence force '(a) in co-operation with the police service; (b) in defence of the Republic; or (c) in fulfilment of an international obligation'.[6] The President must appoint the military command of the defence force[7] and command of the defence force 'must be exercised in accordance with the directions of the Cabinet member responsible for defence'. However, this direction occurs 'under the authority of the President'.[8] In addition, under FC s 203(1) the President may, as head of the national executive, declare a state of 'national defence'.[9]

Parliament has significant oversight powers in regard to any decision the President makes to employ the defence force. This is consistent with the statement in FC s 198*(d)* that national security is 'subject to the authority of Parliament and the national executive'. The strongest of these powers is the requirement that a state of national defence must be approved by Parliament.[10] The Final Constitution

[1] Here the troublesome distinction between taxes and user charges arises. 'User charges' are not taxes and can be imposed in ordinary bills. .

[2] See, further, O Ampofo-Anti, K Robinson & S Woolman 'Security Forces' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 23B.

[3] FC s 202(1).

[4] FC s 201(1). As the President is a member of Cabinet this position could presumably be assumed by the President.

[5] In terms of FC s 101, any exercise of these powers by the President would nevertheless need to be in writing and countersigned by the Cabinet member responsible for defence.

[6] FC s 201(2).

[7] FC s 202(1). This function is performed as head of the national executive.

[8] FC s 202(2).

[9] For a brief summary of the distinction between a 'state of emergency' and a 'state of national defense', see N Fritz 'States of Emergency' in in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 61. See also J Brickhill & A Friedman 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 59.

[10] FC s 203(3). Although the Constitution does not explicitly empower Parliament to conditionally approve a declaration of a state of national defence or attach terms to such approval, political reality as well as FC s 198*(d)* and the review powers of s 18(5) of the Defence Act suggest that Parliament can amend a declaration before approving it . See S Ellmann 'War Powers under the South African Constitution' (Unpublished paper on file with the authors) 9.

does not explain what a state of national defence is nor does it give the President any particular powers once a state of national defence is declared. But the fact that a state of defence lapses unless it is approved by Parliament suggests that it is in fact a state of armed conflict (or, to use the old fashioned word, war). This reading of the provision is adopted by the Defence Act: the declaration of a state of national defence allows the President to draft civilians into the Defence Force, impose certain limits on freedom of movement in the country and regulate the 'control and use of transport systems, air traffic and use of the territorial waters' inter alia.[1] In addition, the President must inform Parliament 'promptly and in appropriate detail' when the defence force is employed in terms of FC s 201(2).[2]

The Final Constitution does not require the declaration of a state of national defence whenever the President involves South Africa in military action. Although the Defence Act extends the requirement that the President inform Parliament of the use of the Defence Force beyond the list in FC s 201, neither the Final Constitution nor the Act expressly require the notification of Parliament when the Defence Force is used outside the borders of South Africa. One presumes, however, that activity by the defence force outside South Africa's borders would either be in defence of the country or be in terms of an international agreement and thus fall under FC s 201(2).[3] If it were not it would be construed as an act of aggression, and outlawed by FC s 198*(c)*.

However, s 18(5) of the Defence Act 42 of 2002 grants Parliament a review power over the President's exercise of military powers in terms of FC s 201(2). This provision allows Parliament, by resolution within seven days of receiving information from the President about the authorisation of the employment of the defence force, to confirm or order the amendment, substitution or termination of that authorisation. If Parliament takes no action in terms of s 18(5) of the Defence Act, a decision under FC s 201(2) stands.

The most difficult legal question that arises in relation to the deployment of the defence force is whether or not courts can review it and, if so, what the scope of [1] Act 42 of 2002 ss 90 and 91.

[2] FC s 201(3) which requires the president to provide details of '(a) the reasons for the employment…; (b) any place where the force is being employed; (c) the number of people involved; and (d) the period for which the force is expected to be employed'. FC s 201(4) provides that if Parliament does not sit within seven days after the employment of the defence force the President must provide the required information to the appropriate oversight committee.

[3] South Africa's decision to send troops into Lesotho in 1998 was a decision in terms of FC s 201(2), and thus although the Constitution required Parliament to be informed, the action did not need to be confirmed or approved by Parliament See s Ellmann 'War Powers under the South African Constitution' (supra) 4-5.

such review would be. Motala and Ramaphosa suggest that presidential decisions as Commander-in-Chief of the defence force are not justiciable.[1] They rely on the American political question doctrine for this submission, arguing that there are 'no manageable judicial standards' against which decisions on defence can be tested, and that the judiciary is consequently poorly-placed to 'second-guess' the political branch's use of military resources.[2] Judicial intervention could also embarrass the executive abroad where, for example, a commitment to employ the defence force in combat is overruled by the courts.[3] However, the constitutional insistence that all executive action is subject to the law, reiterated in FC s 198*(c)*, suggests that decisions taken by the President as Commander-in-Chief are reviewable.[4] Of course, as O'Regan J implies in Kaunda v President of the Republic, provided that the action is procedurally lawful, courts are likely to be deferential.[5] But courts can insist that the President acts in good faith when exercising these powers.[6] De Lille v Speaker of the National Assembly suggests that since Parliament too must act in good faith,[7] Parliament's oversight power of executive military powers is subject to review on the same ground.

(k) Foreign affairs

The conduct of foreign affairs or foreign relations and the formulation of foreign policy are matters falling within the domain of the executive and for which Cabinet is collectively responsible.[8] The clearest statement of this principle is to be

[1] Z Motala & C Ramaphosa Constitutional Law: Analysis and Cases (2002) 218.

[2] Ibid at 220.

[3] Ibid. See also Baker v Carr 369 US 186, 217 (1962) (Adumbrates factors American courts have considered relevant to determining whether a question before a court is a non-justiciable political question.)

[4] FC s 198*(d)* states that '[n]ational security is subject to the authority of Parliament and the national executive'. This section cannot be interpreted as ousting the jurisdiction of the courts.

[5] 2005(4) SA 235 (CC); 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) at paras 224 and 225.

[6] SARFU III (supra) para at 148.

[7] 1998 (3) SA 430, 445 (c). The decision was confirmed on appeal by the SCA, but on a quite different basis. See Speaker of the National Assembly v De Lille and Another 1999 (4) SA 863 (SCA).

[8] Kaunda and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) per Chaskalson CJ at 77, Ngcobo J at para 172 and O'Regan J at para 243; Rootman v The President of the Republic of South Africa [2006] SCA 80 RSA, [2006] JOL 17547 (SCA)(SCA referred to the President and the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development collectively as 'the State' in a mater concerning relations with a foreign state (see further below).) O'Regan J in Kaunda relied on the President's responsibilities under FC s 84(2)(b) and (i) to receive and recognise foreign diplomatic and consular representatives and to appoint ambassadors, plenipotentiaries and diplomatic an consular representatives, and the national executive's responsibility under FC s 231(1) to negotiate and to sign international agreements to conclude that foreign affairs is an executive function. It is worth noting, though, that the President's powers under FC s 84(2) are powers as Head of State, to be exercised alone without the concurrence of Cabinet. The responsibilities referred to in FC s 84(2)(b) and (i) are thus, not executive powers for which Cabinet is collectively responsible, but powers for which the President alone is responsible. See also J Dugard International Law: A South African Perspective (3rd Edition 2005) 70 ff.

found in FC s 231 which states that the 'negotiation and signing of international agreements is the responsibility of the national executive'. Currently agreements which must be ratified by Parliament under FC s 231 are first submitted to Cabinet for its consent. Once Parliament has ratified the agreement (by a resolution in both the National Assembly and NCOP), the Minister of Foreign Affairs signs an instrument of ratification and deposits it with the relevant body.[1] International agreements, for which parliamentary ratification is not required, are dealt with by President's Minutes (which require the signature of the President and the relevant Minister). As with other matters, the convention is that, if such an agreement is contentious in any way, which includes having an impact on domestic law, or has financial consequences, it must go to the Cabinet.[2]

The question that has arisen in a number of cases in the South African courts recently is whether the executive can be compelled to engage in foreign relations in order to achieve a particular objective.[3] The source of this stream of cases is the Constitutional Court's decision in Mohamed and Another v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others.[4] In that case a foreign national was extradited from South Africa to the United States to stand trial on charges relating to the bombing of a US embassy in Dar es Salaam.[5] The applicant's complaint was that the South African authorities had infringed his constitutional rights to human dignity (FC s 10), to life (FC s 11) and not to be treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way (FC s 12(1)(e)) by allowing the extradition to the United States to go ahead without first obtaining an assurance from the US authorities that the applicant would not face the death penalty if convicted of the crimes of which he was accused.[6] The applicant sought and was ultimately granted declaratory relief to this effect.[7] He also sought mandatory relief directing the South African Government to pursue diplomatic routes to securing an assurance from the United States authorities that the death penalty would not be imposed, or if imposed not carried out, should the applicant be convicted on the criminal charges.[8] The South African government opposed this relief, submitting that 'any such order would infringe the separation of powers between the Judiciary and the Executive'.[9]

[1] Manual of Executive Acts of the President (1999) 5.8-5.12.

[2] Manual of Executive Acts of the President (1999) 5.13-5.18. It is arguable that when an international agreement impinges on the responsibility of provinces, FC chapter 3 requires provincial governments to be consulted before it is signed (see C Murray & S Nakhjavani 'South Africa' in International Relations in Federal Countries ed H Michelmann (2008) forthcoming). However, the Manual of Executive Acts simply notes that provinces do not have the power to conclude international agreements.

[3] See Operation Dismantle Inc v Canada [1985] 1 SCR 441 (Offers for cautious support for the reviewability of executive decisions on foreign affairs.)

[4] Mohamed v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others (Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty in South Africa Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC).

[5] Ibid at paras 1-7.

[6] Ibid at paras 3-4.

[7] Ibid at para 73(3.1.1).

[8] Ibid at para 4.

[9] Ibid at para 69.

The Court did not agree. It indicated that such an order is, in principle, acceptable.[1] The Mohamed Court held that it would not > necessarily be out of place for there to be an appropriate order on the relevant organs of State in South Africa to do whatever may be within their power to remedy the wrong here done to Mohamed by their actions, or to ameliorate at best the consequential prejudice caused to him. To stigmatise such an order as a breach of the separation of State power as between the Executive and the Judiciary is to negate a foundational value of the Republic of South Africa, namely supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law. The Bill of Rights, which we find to have been infringed, is binding on all organs of State and it is our constitutional duty to ensure that appropriate relief is afforded to those who have suffered infringement of their constitutional rights.[2]

The kind of judicial intervention foreshadowed by Mohamed has not materialised in any of the matters where similar mandatory relied has been sought. Each of these matters can be distinguished from Mohamed on the facts, however, and they do not detract from the Court's stance in Mohamed.[3] Kaunda concerned 69 South African citizens who were arrested in Zimbabwe and held on a variety of charges including a charge of plotting a coup against the government of Equatorial Guinea.[4] They approached the South African courts seeking an order compelling the South African government to make diplomatic representations on their behalf to the governments of Zimbabwe and Equatorial Guinea, and to take steps to ensure that their rights to dignity, freedom and security of the person, and fair conditions of detention and trial were respected and protected in those countries.[5] Chaskalson CJ, writing for the majority, dismissed the applicants' reliance on Mohamed. Since the South African Bill of Rights has no application beyond the borders of South Africa and applies only to people in South Africa,[6] the South African authorities could not be said to have perpetrated any wrong against the applicants.[7] Whereas in Mohamed the Court held that it would not be inappropriate to order the South African executive to engage in diplomatic relations to remedy or ameliorate the effects of a breach of a constitutional right caused by its own actions, no constitutional rights could be said to have been

[1] S Peté & M du Plessis 'South African Nationals Abroad and their Right to Diplomatic Protection – Lessons from the "Mercenaries Case"' (2006) 22 SAJHR 439, 467.

[2] Ibid at para 71 (footnotes omitted). The Court did not grant the mandatory relief sought on the basis that proceedings in the United States were already at an advanced stage and was in the Court's view not the most effective means of vindicating the applicant's rights.

[3] For a critique of Mohamed for not being sufficiently forceful regarding extraterritorial application of the Bill of Rights, and for an indictment of the more conservative judgments that followed — eg, Kaunda — see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31. See also J Brickhill & A Friedman 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 59.

[4] Kaunda and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) at paras 1-2.

[5] Ibid at para 3.

[6] Ibid at paras 36-7.

[7] Ibid at paras 50-3 and at paras 98-100.

breached by the conduct of the South African authorities in Kaunda. The gloss that Kaunda puts on Mohamed in this respect is that where South African organs of state infringe the constitutional rights of any person (which can happen only in South Africa), an obligation rests on the executive to do everything in its power to remedy or ameliorate the prejudice that person suffers in another country as the result of that infringement. This obligation is justifiable.

Further, the majority said in Kaunda that although there is no right to diplomatic protection under the South African Constitution, South African citizens are 'entitled to request South Africa for protection under international law against wrongful acts of a foreign state'.[1] When a request is received in circumstances where South African citizens face gross abuses of international human rights, the majority went on, government bears a duty to protect its citizens.[2] A decision refusing such a request would be justifiable, and a court could order the government to take 'appropriate action'.[3] Appropriate action, however, admits of very wide interpretation indeed. It may be that the best the courts can require the executive to do in such circumstances is consider the request for diplomatic protection. It is the executive which must ultimately decide on the appropriate course of action — and that need not include diplomatic engagement:

> A decision as to whether protection should be given, and if so, what, is an aspect of foreign policy which is essentially the function of the Executive. The timing of representations if they are to be made, the language in which they should be couched, and the sanctions (if any) which should follow if such representations are rejected are matters with which courts are ill-equipped to deal. The best way to secure relief for the national in whose interest the action is taken may be to engage in delicate and sensitive negotiations in which diplomats are better placed to make decisions than Judges, and which could be harmed by court proceedings and the attendant publicity.[4]

Any decision taken by the executive in this regard is an exercise of public power, and is as such subject to constitutional control. Although the majority in Kaunda carved a very wide discretion for the executive in its powers of foreign affairs, requests for diplomatic protection must nevertheless be dealt with in accordance with the rule of law.[5] In terms of the rule of law doctrine, irrationality and bad faith are grounds upon which a court could review the executive's response to a request for diplomatic protection.[6]

---

1 Kaunda (supra) at para 60.

2 Ibid at para 69.

3 Ibid.

4 Ibid at para 77. See also F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 11.

5 See §§ 18.2*(b)* and 18.3 (j) supra.

6 Ibid at para 80. See also S Peté & M du Plessis 'South African Nationals Abroad' (supra) at 447-449. For a critical discussion of the tendency of courts to defer to the executive in such matters, in the context of the apartheid reparations case (In re South African Apartheid Litigation 346 F Supp 2nd 538 (SDNY 2002)), see M Osborne 'Apartheid and the Alien Torts Act: Global Justice meets Sovereign Equality' in M du Plessis and S Pete (eds) Repairing the Past? International Perspectives on Reparations for Gross Human Rights Abuses (2007) 231.

The minority judgments of Ngcobo J and O'Regan J take a different approach. But they do not lead to significantly different outcomes. Ngcobo J finds that there is a constitutional duty on the executive to ensure that all South African national abroad enjoy the benefits of diplomatic protection,[1] while O'Regan J finds that a constitutional duty rests on the executive to provide diplomatic protection to its citizens to prevent or repair 'egregious breaches of international human rights norms.'[2] Both judgments conclude that this duty finds its corollary in the right to citizenship in FC s 3(2)(a). This right encompasses the 'privilege' or 'benefit' of diplomatic protection.[3] O'Regan J fills in the important logical step when she contends that although the Final Constitution contains no express provision to gainsay Chaskalson CJ's conclusion that the Bill of Rights has no extraterritorial application, the executive remains bound by the Bill of Rights in all its action — including its actions in the international domain.[4] Despite these differences, the minority judgments offer little support for a more exacting standard of judicial control of executive diplomatic functions. O'Regan J proposed a declaratory order obliging the executive to take appropriate steps to provide diplomatic protection to the applicants.[5] Ngcobo J agreed with the majority that the government has a wide discretion in deciding whether to grant diplomatic protection and in what form to do so.[6] In addition to the rule of law requirements

[1] Kaunda and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC)(per Ngcobo J) at para 188.

[2] Ibid at para 238.

[3] Ibid at at paras 185-88 (Ncgobo J) and at paras 236-238 (O'Regan J). On whether diplomatic protection is a right that can be claimed by an individual or an international law right at the instance of states, see M E Olivier 'Diplomatic Protection: Right or Privilege? Kaunda v President of the RSA (2004) 10 BCLR 1009 (CC)' (2005) 30 South African Yearbook of International Law 238; G Erasmus & L Davidson 'Do South Africans have a Right to Diplomatic Protection?' (2000) 25 South African Yearbook of International Law 113; K Hopkins 'Diplomatic Protection and the South African Constitution: Does a South African Citizen have an Enforceable Constitutional Claim against the Government?' (2001) 16 South African Public Law 387.

[4] Kaunda (supra) at para 228. See also Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.6 (Contends that where Mohamed took a step toward extending the extraterritorial reach of the Bill of Rights, Kaunda took two steps back.) A similar argument was presented in Thatcher v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development and Others. 2005 (4) SA 543 (c). The matter arose from the same events as Kaunda. The government of Equatorial Guinea had requested the South African government to render it assistance by allowing it to question an individual whom it suspected of involvement in the alleged coup plot. The same individual, Thatcher, was however facing charges in South Africa relating to the same events, and he argued that allowing the authorities of Equatorial Guinea to question him before the conclusion of criminal proceedings against him in South Africa would violate constitutional rights to silence and protection against self incrimination contained in FC s 35(1) and (3). Ibid at para 85. He argued that the failure of the South African authorities to consider his constitutional rights rendered the decision to comply with Equatorial Guinea's request irrational and unconstitutional in light of the principles of the rule of law. The court held that South Africa's compliance with the request did not violate any of Thatcher's rights, and that failure to consider those rights could not have rendered the decision irrational. See also S Peté & M du Plessis 'South African Nationals Abroad' (supra) at 463.

[5] Kaunda (supra) at para 271.

[6] Ibid at para 191.

of rationality and good faith, however, Ngcobo J added that the government must follow a fair procedure in processing a request for diplomatic assistance and may be required to provide reasons for its decision.[1]

In Rootman v The President of the Republic of South Africa, the applicant sought the diplomatic assistance of the government of South Africa in executing a judgment debt against the government of the Democratic Republic of Congo (the 'DRC').[2] He argued that the evasion of the DRC of its commercial debt undermined the dignity and effectiveness of the courts and the rule of law, and interfered with rights to judicial resolution of disputes in terms of FC s 34. The applicant further contended that obligations on organs of state in terms of FC s 165(4) to take steps to ensure the effectiveness of the courts and in terms of FC s 7(2) to 'respect, protect, promote and fulfil' rights in the Bill of Rights, oblige the state to intercede on his behalf.[3] The SCA rejected this argument. It held that the DRC's conduct is no more damaging to the rule of law than that of any other commercial debtor who evades a judgment debt and in respect of whom the state has no obligation to intercede.[4] Furthermore, the SCA followed Kaunda in saying that while the South African government is free to negotiate with the DRC through diplomatic channels, it cannot be ordered to do so.[5]

(l) Assignment and delegation of executive powers under FC ss 99 and 238

FC s 99 deals with the assignment of responsibilities by Cabinet members to the provincial or local sphere of government. It states that:

> A Cabinet member may assign any power or function that is to be exercised or performed in terms of an Act of Parliament to a member of a provincial Executive Council or to a Municipal Council. An assignment -
> (a) must be in terms of an agreement between the relevant Cabinet member and the Executive Council member or Municipal Council;
> (b) must be consistent with the Act of Parliament in terms of which the relevant power or function is exercised or performed; and
> (c) takes effect upon proclamation by the President.'

[1] Kaunda (supra) at para 192. It is unclear whether Ngcobo J is of the view that such a decision must adhere to the requirements of administrative justice imposed by FC s 33. He states that '[t]he decision to extend diplomatic protection in a given case is the exercise of a public power and as such it must conform to the Constitution, in particular s 33 of the Constitution.' Ibid at para 193. The conduct of foreign affairs falls within the domain of the executive, however, and is therefore an executive function contemplated in FC s 85(2)(e). The Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 explicitly excludes such executive functions from the definition of 'administrative action', and it is thus difficult to see on what basis Ngcobo J would scrutinise decisions on whether to extend diplomatic protection against constitutional standards of administrative justice such as procedural fairness.

[2] [2006] SCA 80 RSA, [2006] JOL 17547 (SCA).

[3] Ibid at para 12.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Ibid at para 13. See also Van Zyl v Government of the RSA [2007] SCA 109 RSA (Follows Kaunda, emphasising the restraint that courts ought to show in reviewing acts of foreign states.)

It is common for constitutions in multilevel systems of government to attempt to establish clear boundaries between different levels of government. The norm is to avoid overlapping responsibilities and functions. The South African system is different. It is characterised by soft boundaries amongst the three spheres of government.[1] FC s 99 is an example of this as it anticipates powers originally allocated to the national sphere of government being exercised by the provincial or local sphere. In the absence of FC s 99, it would have been appropriate to conclude that it was not permissible for a provincial executive or a municipal council to perform functions allocated to the national executive by an Act of Parliament.

The meaning of 'assignment' under FC s 99 must be understood in context.[2] The Constitution makes a distinction between delegation, which is referred to in s 238, and assignment. Baxter provides an authoritative description of the distinction between delegation and assignment in South African public law: 'When powers are assigned the authority and duty to exercise them, and the responsibility for their exercise, is transferred in full. A less complete transfer of powers is delegation, in terms of which one public authority authorises another to act in its stead.'[3] Some writers add a further distinction between assignment and delegation and assert that assignments can be revoked only by an Act of Parliament. This view is based, in part, on a passage in Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature and others v President of the Republic of South Africa and others.[4] In Executive Council, Western Cape, the Constitutional Court dealt with the distinction between the assignment of executive authority under IC s 235(8) and the delegation of such authority under IC 144. It wrote:

> [IC s] 235(8) deals with assignment, ie the transfer to a province of the executive authority to which it is entitled in terms of the Constitution. It is not concerned with delegation. Delegation postulates revocable transmission of subsidiary authority. The assignment contemplated by [IC] s 235 relates to the formal vesting of authority derived from the Constitution.[5]

However, IC 235 deals with the initial transfer of functions to provinces: it sets out a process for implementing the system of government established by the Interim Constitution. In this context, an assignment under IC s 235(8) must be 'final'. There is no reason that assignments under FC s 99 should be similarly

[1] See C Murray & R Simeon 'Multi-level Government in South Africa: A Progress Report' (2001) 31 Publius: The Journal of Federalism 65-92. See also S Woolman, T Roux & B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 14.

[2] In other constitutional provisions the term 'assign' is used without the more technical sense of a transfer of obligations and responsibilities to mean 'allocate'. See FC ss 28(1)(h) and 35(2)(c). See also FC s 206(4). FC s 206(4) involves a tricky distinction between the assignment of responsibilities by law and the allocation of (apparently equally binding) responsibilities by policy.

[3] Delegation is also easier than assignment. FC s 238 does not require a proclamation for a delegation to take effect.

[4] 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 ('Executive Council, Western Cape').

[5] Ibid at para 173.

irrevocable. On the contrary, such an interpretation would permit the national executive to rewrite the constitutional division of powers and require the relatively onerous process of adopting an Act of Parliament to reverse it.

The practical effect of the distinction between assignment and delegation as set out by Baxter is that complete responsibility for a function is transferred through assignment whereas in the case of delegation the authority to ensure that the power is properly exercised remains with the delegating authority. FC s 238*(b)* captures this relationship when it states that delegation allows an organ of state to exercise a power 'for any other executive organ'.

FC s 99 constrains the power of a member of Cabinet to assign powers and functions in two ways. First, the assignee must agree. This is consistent with the principles of co-operative government which underpin the division of powers amongst the spheres of government in South Africa. To allow members of the national executive to impose functions unilaterally on their counterparts in provincial and local governments would infringe the principle of functional and institutional integrity enshrined in FC s 41(1)(g). Thus, one would expect the party to whom the assignment is to be made to take fiscal, capacity and political considerations into account in entering an agreement under FC s 99.

This understanding of assignment under FC s 99 suggests that all intergovernmental assignments should be subject to the agreement of the assignee. However, FC s 125(2), which lists the ways in which provincial executive councils exercise provincial executive authority, raises the possibility that there is a separate form of assignment that takes place in terms of an Act of Parliament: FC s 125(2)(c) states that executive authority may be exercised by 'administering in the province, national legislation outside the functional areas listed in Schedules 4 and 5, the administration of which has been assigned to the provincial executive in terms of an Act of Parliament'. FC s 125(2)(g) supplements this proviso by adding to the list of activities of an executive council 'performing any other function assigned to the provincial executive in terms of the Constitution or an Act of Parliament'. It is possible to read paragraph (g) to include assignments under FC s 99 and paragraph (c) to permit, in addition, assignments in terms of an Act of Parliament — unconstrained by the conditions set in FC s 99. However, as we have already indicated, allowing assignments without the concurrence of the provincial executive conflicts with the basic constitutional principle of co-operative government.[1] Thus, one must assume that assignment by an Act of Parliament must always be accompanied by the agreement of the governments that must assume the assigned responsibilities.[2]

[1] Because FC s 125(2)(c) covers national laws that fall outside Schedules 4 and 5 not even the diluted agreement of provinces through the NCOP is secured in the national legislative process.

[2] An alternative reading of FC s 125(2)(c) is to interpret it as qualifying FC s 99 by requiring, in addition to the agreement of the provincial executive, express statutory authorisation when full responsibility for administering a national Act is assigned to a province. On this reading, which is supported by FC s 125(2)(g), particular powers and functions may be assigned under FC s 99 without explicit statutory authorisation, but to assign the administration of an Act, express authorisation by Parliament is required.

The second constraint on the power to assign functions is that the assignment must 'be consistent with' the law in terms of which the power is exercised or the function performed. A similar constraint is placed on the power to delegate under FC s 238. The common law has always placed limits on the legitimate delegation of public power: but the language of 'consistency' in FC ss 99 and 238 is unfamiliar. At the very least, it must mean that assignment and delegation cannot take place against the wishes of Parliament. However, the best interpretation is that the phrase protects the common-law position in terms of which, in the absence of express authority to assign or to delegate in the Act under which the power is exercised or the function performed, the legitimacy of assignment or delegation will depend on the nature of the power, the extent to which it is transferred, the importance of the delegee and practical necessity.[1]

18.4 Multisphere Government[2]

The decision to create a system of multisphere government — with both provincial and local powers protected in the Constitution — was a central element of the constitutional settlement in 1993.[3] But, the Final Constitution's otherwise detailed chapter on the national executive barely mentions the responsibilities that the system of shared powers may place on the national executive.[4] The absence of any express reference to multilevel government in the constitutional description of the responsibilities of the national executive in FC s 85 is striking because so much of what the national executive does involves provinces and local governments.[5] Most significantly, the Final Constitution anticipates that provinces will implement national laws that fall under Schedule 4 of the Final Constitution.[6] These laws embrace laws relating to education, health and welfare services, housing and the environment. Thus, the national government effectively determines what provinces will do and depends on provinces to implement many national laws. It also funds, monitors, supervises, and regulates them. It can take few decisions without considering their impact on provinces.

The implementation role of provinces ties national policy closely to their capacity to perform. It also demands complex coordination between national departments

[1] See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 133-136.

[2] See C Murray 'South Africa' in C Saunders and K Le Roy (eds) Legislative, Executive and Judicial Governance in Federal Countries (2006) 258 — 288.

[3] N Steytler 'Federal Arrangements as a Peacemaking Device during South Africa's Transition to Democracy' (2001) 31 Publius: Journal of Federalism 93.

[4] Although section 100 does provide for intervention by the national executive in the affairs of a province if the province is failing to fulfil its responsibilities.

[5] See N Bamforth & P Leyland (eds) Public law in a Multi-layered Constitution (2003)(Discusses the implications of the distribution of power in the UK.)

[6] FC s 125 (2)(b). For further discussion, see S Woolman, T Roux & B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 14; C Murray & O Ampofo-Anti 'Provincial Executive Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 20.

responsible for national competences (such as justice and water) and both national and provincial departments working in related areas (such as social services and agriculture). For instance, policy relating to the detention of children awaiting trial by the national Department of Justice depends for its implementation on the provision of 'places of safety' by the nine provincial welfare departments. In theory, these programs should be coordinated by the national government through national norms and standards and properly assured intergovernmental coordination. Indeed, since the 1997 report of the Presidential Review Commission, much attention has been paid to making Cabinet more effective. Nevertheless, despite the fact that provinces are written into the plans, they remain junior partners, instructed on their responsibilities rather than consulted.

Since 1994 a special Cabinet portfolio and national department has existed to manage the relationships between the national, provincial, and local spheres of government and to build the capacity of provinces and municipalities. The role of the national Department of Provincial and Local Government is to ensure a 'capable and well integrated system of government working together to achieve sustainable development and enhanced service delivery in a developmental state'.[1]

(a) FC ss 100 and 139: Interventions in provinces and municipalities

FC s 100 concerns national interventions in provinces. FC s 139 concerns provincial interventions in municipalities. These intergovernmental relations powers are considered in Chapters 14, 20, 22 and 27 of this treatise.[2] Here it is important to note the responsibilities that FC s 100 and FC s 139 place on the national executive. Firstly, although the national government's power to intervene in a province that it not fulfilling its responsibilities is discretionary, FC s 139 (7) imposes an obligation on the national executive to intervene in municipalities which are in financial difficulty if the provincial executive does not. Moreover, if a province assumes responsibility for a municipal function or dissolves a Municipal Council under FC s 139(1), the Cabinet member responsible for local government affairs may 'disapprove' the provincial action, bringing it to an end.

[1] Department of Provincial and Local Government 'Vision', available at http://www.thedplg.gov.za/index.php?option=com_content&task=view&id=12&Itemid=29 accessed 17 February 2008.

[2] See S Woolman & Theunis Roux 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 14; C Murray & O Ampofo-Anti 'Provincial Executive Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 20; N Steytler and J de Visser 'Local Government'. See also M Chaskalson 'Transitional Provisions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 22; R Kriel & M Monadjem 'Public Finances' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson and M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 27. See also N Steytler and J de Visser Local Government Law of South Africa (2007) 15.5. For a discussion of the constitutionality of a national government programme to manage struggling municipalities outside the framework of FC 139, see C Murray and Y Hoffman-Wanderer 'The NCOP and Provincial Intervention in Local Government' 2007 Stellenbosch LR 7, 26ff.

(b) FC s 125

FC 125(3) places a responsibility on the national government to 'assist provinces to develop the administrative capacity required for the effective exercise of their powers and performance of their functions'.

19 Provincial Legislative Authority

Tshepo Madlingozi and Stuart Woolman

19.1 Composition, election and term of Provincial Legislatures 19–1
(a) Composition and electoral system 19–1
(b) Duration and dissolution 19–2
(c) Qualifications, defections and membership. 19–2
(d) Structures and procedures 19–4
(i) Committees 19–4
(ii) Office bearers 19–4
(iii) Organization of business 19–5
19.2 Provincial legislative process 19–5
(a) Decisions 19–5
(b) Ordinary bills and money bills 19–5
(i) Process for ordinary bills 19–6
(ii) Process for money bills 19–6
(c) Assent by the Premier 19–6
19.3 Substantive constraints on provincial legislative authority 19–7
(a) Conflicts and override 19–7
(i) Exclusive provincial legislative competence. 19-7
(ii) Concurrent national and provincial legislative competence. 19-8
(b) Provincial constitutions 19–10
(c) Co-operative government. 19–11
(d) Fundamental rights and the rule of law 19–12
19.4 Delegation 19–12
(a) Parliament to Provincial Legislature. 19–12
(b) Provincial Legislature to Provincial Executive. 19–13
19.5 Assignment to Local Government. 19–14
19.6 Abstract review of Bills and Acts 19–15

19.7 Powers and privileges of Provincial Legislature 19–16
(a) Control over internal proceedings 19–16
(b) Rules and orders 19–16
(c) Privilege 19–16
(d) Public participation and petitions 19–17
19.8 Provincial Legislatures and the National Council of Provinces 19–18

19.1 Composition, Election and Term of Provincial Legislature

(a) Composition and electoral system[1]

The Final Constitution provides for single-chamber provincial legislatures in which the legislative authority of a province vests.[2] Provincial legislatures may consist of between 30 and 80 members. The Electoral Commission determines the actual number of legislators in each provincial legislature based upon a very simple algorithm: One seat per one hundred thousand inhabitants.[3] The 30/80, min/max arrangement may, however, be altered by the provisions of a provincial constitution.[4]

Provincial elections must take place in terms of an electoral system prescribed by national legislation.[5] This system must produce, in general, proportional

*The authors would like to thank Christina Murray for her incisive comments and editorial 'oversight'. We would also like to thank Matthew Chaskalson and Jonathan Klaaren for permission to make liberal use of their work. See M Chaskalson & J Klaaren 'Provincial Goverment' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) Chapter 4. Because provincial legislative authority doctrine is often parasitic on national legislative authority doctrine, we rely quite heavily on Steven Budlender's analysis of that latter body of doctrine. See S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 17. All errors remain our responsibility alone.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC'), s 105 reads, in pertinent part:

> (1) A provincial legislature consists of women and men elected as members in terms of an electoral system that (a) is prescribed by national legislation; (b) is based on that province's segment of the national common voters roll; (c) provides for a minimum voting age of 18 years; and (d) results, in general, in proportional representation. (2) A provincial legislature consists of between 30 and 80 members. The number of members, which may differ among the provinces, must be determined in terms of a formula prescribed by national legislation.

[2] FC s 104(1) reads, in relevant part: 'The legislative authority of a province is vested in its provincial legislature.'

[3] See FC s 105(2). The Independent Electoral Commission determines the number of legislators of each province. See Electoral Act 73 of 1998, Item 2 of Schedule 3, as amended by Electoral Laws Amendment Act 34 of 2003. This Act's formula awards one seat per 100 000 inhabitants: with a minimum of 30 and a maximum of 80 members. It follows therefore, that the number of provincial legislators may differ from province to province depending on the size of a province's population. See also Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC')(IC s 127(1) allowed provincial legislatures to have between thirty and one hundred members. The number of MPL's in different legislatures range from 30 MPL's in the Free State, Mpumalanga and the Northern Cape to 73 and 80 MPLs in Gauteng and Kwazulu-Natal, respectively. See D Besdziek 'Provincial Government' in A Venter (ed*) Government and Politics in the New South Africa* (2001) 182; C Murray & L Nijzink Building Representative Democracy: South Africa's Legislatures and the Constitution (2002) 17. The number of members of a principal legislature ('MPLs') in the Western Cape is fixed at 42 — even though the population size of this province is just under four million See Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape s 13. The Northern Cape, with a population of just under 900 000, is still entitled to the minimum number of 30 seats fixed by the Final Constitution.

[4] For the extent to which a provincial constitution may alter the provincial legislative and the executive structures and procedures set out in the Final Constitution, see S Woolman 'Provincial Constitutions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 21.

[5] FC s 105(1)(d).

representation.[1] Attempts to alter the electoral system for the provincial legislature through provincial constitutions have thus far failed.[2]

(b) Duration and dissolution

The ordinary term of a provincial legislature is five years. According to FC s 108, however, the provincial legislature may adopt a resolution dissolving the legislature prior to the expiry of its term. The resolution must be passed by a majority of the provincial legislature's members and must take place no less than three years after the previous election.[3] According to FC s 109, the provincial legislature must be dissolved when there is a vacancy in the office of the Premier and the legislature fails to elect a new Premier within thirty days after the vacancy has occurred.[4]

(c) Qualifications, defections and membership

Membership qualifications in a provincial legislature are governed by FC s 106.[5] The only genuine controversy that has arisen with regard to membership qualifications concerns the ability of MPLs to receive remuneration for other state appointments.

The relationship between party defection and membership has been the subject of legislation and litigation that have altered significantly the political landscape in both Parliament and the provincial legislatures. In 2002, Parliament passed four acts, including two constitutional amendments, designed to permit defections by members of one political party to another at national, provincial and local government levels.[6] In United Democratic Movement & Others v President of the RSA & Others, the Constitutional Court rejected the challenges to the two constitutional amendments because both constitutional amendments satisfied the procedural

[1] See Electoral Law Act 73 of 1998, s 57A read together with Schedule 1A, as amended by Electoral Laws Amendment Act 34 of 2003.

[2] See Ex Parte Speaker of the Western Cape Provincial Legislature: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Western Cape, 1997. 1997 (4) SA 795 (CC), 1997 (9) BCLR 1167 (CC)('First Certification of Constitution of the Western Cape')(Court rejects attempt to create multi-member, geographically defined constituencies.)

[3] FC s 108 has not yet been invoked. However, between the end of 2002 and the beginning of 2003, the Inkatha Freedom Party, with the support of the Democratic Alliance and the United Democratic Movement, did threaten to dissolve the KwaZulu-Natal legislature. See 'IFP's Last-Gap Bid to Keep KwaZulu-Natal' Mail and Guardian (3 January 2003), available at http://www.archive.mg.co.za (accessed on 28 August 2003).

[4] FC s 109(2). Such a vacancy can occur if the provincial legislature adopts, with a majority vote, a motion of no confidence in the Premier. See FC s 141 (2).

[5] FC s 106.

[6] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Act 18 of 2002, Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Act 21 of 2002, Local Government: Municipal Structures Amendment Act 20 of 2002 and Loss or Retention of Membership of National and Provincial Legislatures Act 22 of 2002 ('Membership Act').

requirements of the Final Constitution.[1] The Constitutional Court also found that the piece of ordinary legislation that allowed defections in municipal councils passed constitutional muster.[2] The UDM Court did, however, uphold the challenge to the Loss or Retention of Membership of National and Provincial Legislatures Act ('Membership Act'). The Membership Act had been passed by the procedure for ordinary legislation, FC s 76(1), rather than by the procedure for constitutional amendments, FC s 74(3). While the Final Constitution granted Parliament the power to amend the transitional provisions governing membership by an ordinary Act of Parliament,[3] the UDM Court held that this power had to be exercised 'within a reasonable period after the new Constitution took effect' and that this reasonable period had lapsed.[4] Thus, the Membership Act was struck down on procedural, not substantive, grounds. Given the technical nature of the UDM Court's finding, Parliament was able to remedy the defect by passing a constitutional amendment to replace the Membership Act. The two original constitutional amendments, the Local Government: Municipal Structures Amendment Act and the new amendment effect an arrangement that permits defections that meet certain threshold criteria during specific periods of time.[5]

Resignations by MPs, MPLs or MCs that take place outside these defection periods are governed by the pre-existing legal regime. A member of the National Assembly, a provincial legislature or a municipal council who ceases to be a member of the party that nominated her must vacate her seat.[6] A claim of good faith error based upon an erroneous reading of the Final Constitution will not serve to rehabilitate the resignation.[7] Moreover, the resignation cannot be rehabilitated even if the member and his or her 'former' party reach a subsequent agreement on the matter.[8]

As Steven Budlender notes, changes in the composition of the provincial legislatures may affect the composition of provincial delegations to the National Council of Provinces ('NCOP'). FC s 61(2)(b) now creates a process that enables

[1] United Democratic Movement & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC)('United Democratic Movement' or 'UDM'). For a discussion of this case in terms of national legislative authority, see See S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 17. For an analysis of this case in the context of elections and constitutionally permissible electoral systems, see G Fick 'Elections' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 29. Moreover, neither amendment destroyed the 'basic structure' of the Final Constitution. United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 17.

[2] United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 84.

[3] See United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 104; Item 23A(3) of Annexure A to Schedule 6 of the Final Constitution.

[4] United Democratic Movement (supra) at para 105.

[5] The defection process, in so far as it governs the composition of provincial legislatures, is set out in FC s 106(3)(c) read with Items 2, 3 and 4 of Schedule 6A.

[6] Speaker of the National Assembly v Makwetu & Others 2001 (3) BCLR 302, 308 (C)('Makwetu')

[7] African National Congress v United Democratic Movement & Others 2003 (1) SA 533 (CC), 2003 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 24.

[8] Makwetu (supra) at 308.

the provincial legislature to alter the composition of the provincial delegations to the NCOP in light of any defections.

(d) Structures and procedures

(i) Committees

FC s 116(2)(a) obliges a provincial legislature to make rules providing for the establishment of committees. The committees contemplated by this section include portfolio committees, the provincial equivalent of parliamentary select committees. Portfolio committees are responsible for the detailed consideration and debate of Bills after their first reading. Portfolio committees also possess the power to summon any person to appear before them to give evidence or to produce documents, and to require organs of state to report to them.[1] In theory, these powers ought to transform committees into a species of political ombudsman. In theory, committees also execute the core functions of legislatures: law-making, oversight and public involvement. (When they do so execute these functions, committees earn their reputation for being the 'engine rooms' of legislatures.[2]) However, in many of the smaller provincial legislatures, some committees remain idle for extended periods of time.[3] In addition, although FC s 119 enables committees to initiate legislation, at the time of writing, no provincial committee had invoked this power.[4]

(ii) Office bearers

A provincial legislature is chaired by a Speaker. The Speaker, by convention, acts on behalf of the legislature as a whole.[5] The Leader of the House represents the interests of the executive in the legislature and thereby provides a link between the two branches of government. Chairs run the specific committees, which makes the Chair of Chairs the third most important member of the legislature (after the Speaker and the Deputy Speaker).

[1] FC s 115.

[2] See Murray & Nijzink (supra) at 63 ('[P]oliticians routinely say that their most important work is done in committee. Observers confirm this, pointing to the thorough and often non-partisan or less partisan discussion that occurs in committee meetings.') See also E Maloka 'The Gauteng Legislature: The First Five Years' in Y Muthien, M Khosa & B Mgubane (eds) Democracy and Governance Review: Mandela's Legacy 1994–1999 (2000) 112.

The number and structure of committees vary from legislature to legislature, but only loosely correlate with the size of the legislature. Mpumalanga has 13 committees, whereas KwaZulu-Natal features 24. While the Northern Cape, with 30 MPLs, has 18 committees, Gauteng, with 73 MPLs, has only 17 committees.

[3] See Murray & Nijzink (supra) at 69–70 ('Some of the small provincial legislatures still have too many committees for the number of members they have available. . . . Timetabling thus becomes very difficult and members have no opportunity to develop a proper understanding of the matters that come before their committees.')

[4] See Murray & Nijzink (supra) at 78 (MPL's complain of little assistance with respect to research and drafting.)

[5] See, eg, Kilian v Gauteng Provincial Legislature 1999 (2) BCLR 225 (T) at para 30.

Party whips are not officials of the legislature. However, they do organize the work of MPLs in the party caucuses and decide which MPL will represent a party on a given committee.[1]

(iii) Organization of business

The Leader of the House (sometimes referred to as the Leader of Government Business) together with the whips of various parties or the chief whip determine the schedule of the legislature.[2] Most of the legislature's work is conducted in committee or in party caucuses. (Unlike the committees, party caucuses are usually limited to party members and are not open to the public.) But while most of the legislature's work occurs in committee, legislative authority vests solely in the legislature's plenary. Plenaries also offer the opportunity for 'question time' and thus the discharge of the legislature's duty to engage in executive oversight.

19.2 Provincial Legislative Process

(a) Decisions[3]

Unlike Parliament, the rules for decision-making in provincial legislatures are quite straightforward. All votes on Bills — ordinary or money — demand the presence of a majority of the members. Passage of a Bill requires, in turn, a majority of the votes cast.[4]

The presence of one-third of the legislature's members satisfies the quorum criterion for decisions on other matters. Once again, a majority of the votes cast will suffice for passage of such a measure.

Only a provincial constitution requires a special majority. Two-thirds of the members must approve a provincial constitution before it can be signed by the Premier and then sent on to the Constitutional Court for certification.

(b) Ordinary bills and money bills[5]

Members of the legislature or members of the Executive Council can introduce ordinary Bills. Only the member of the Executive Council responsible for finance

[1] See, eg, KwaZulu-Natal Legislature's Rules of Procedure, Rule 29(1): 'The Whips and Party Representatives must ensure the attendance of members of their respective parties at committee meetings and must collectively ensure that a quorum is present, except under the circumstances when the party is exercising its right to boycott proceedings.'

[2] See Mpumalanga Provincial Legislature Agenda, available at www.mpuleg.gov.za/about (accessed on 1 March 2005). Western Cape Provincial Legislature Programme of Sittings, available at www.wcpp.gov.za/display.asp?id=45&linktyp=1 (accessed on 1 March 2005). See also Gauteng Legislature and NCOP Programme of Sittings, available at www.gautengleg.gov.za/Publish/Legislative%20Programme/Provincial%20Programme%20(Speakers%20Office)/Third%20Legislature 2005/2005-01–17%201st%20Term%20Programme%20(adopted%2002%20Dec%2004).doc (accessed on 1 March 2005)

[3] See FC s 112.

[4] See FC s 112(1)(b).

[5] See FC s 119.

can introduce a money Bill.[1] According to FC s 120(2), a provincial Act must create a procedure that enables the provincial legislature to amend a money Bill. The Final Constitution leaves most other details of the provincial legislative process to the legislatures themselves.[2] Ordinary Bills and money Bills take slightly different routes.

(i) Process for ordinary bills

The process for ordinary Bills is not uniform across the country. That said, the process followed in provincial legislatures share a family resemblance. Ordinary Bills are usually initiated by the relevant member of the executive, an ordinary member of the legislature or a particular committee. After being tabled on the Order Paper, the Speaker introduces the Bill to the House. Thereafter, the Bill is referred to the relevant committee and is published in the Provincial Gazette. Notices are then published in local newspapers. Thereafter the public enjoys fourteen to twenty-one days to comment on the Bill.

In committee, the responsible MEC generally defends the Bill. What makes the process followed by provincial legislatures highly unusual for a commonwealth jurisdiction is that committees often amend Bills. The committee sends this amended version to the House — and not the original submitted by the executive. Each party may voice their opinion on the Bill and request additional amendments. If the requisite majority votes in favor of the Bill, the Bill is sent to the Premier for his or her assent.[3] After the Premier's assent, the promulgated Act is published in the Provincial Government Gazette.

(ii) Process for money bills

The modus operandi for money Bills is somewhat more complicated, in large part because a money Bill will have a bearing on almost everything that the provincial legislature does. As a general matter, MECs for Finance introduce a Provincial Appropriation Bill by means of a budget speech. Thereafter, various committees interrogate the Bill. Only once all of the various committees have weighed in with their respective reports does the money Bill move out of committee and on to the floor for a vote. As with an ordinary Bill, a favourable majority vote in the legislature and the Premier's assent results in promulgation of the Act.

(c) Assent by the Premier[4]

The Premier's assent is largely pro forma. There are two exceptions. If the Premier has reservations about the Bill, she can send it back to the legislature for reconsideration. If the legislature accommodates the Premier's concerns, then she

[1] See FC s 120 ('A Bill that appropriates money or imposes taxes, levies or duties is a money Bill. A money Bill may not deal with any other matter except a subordinate matter incidental to the appropriation of money or the imposition of taxes, levies or duties. (2) A provincial Act must provide for a procedure by which the province's legislature may amend a money Bill.')

[2] FC s 116(1)(b).

[3] See § 19.2 (c) infra.

[4] FC s 121.

is obliged to sign the Bill in to law. However, if the revisited Bill does not accommodate the Premier's concerns, she has only two choices: (1) to assent; or (2) to refer the Bill to the Constitutional Court for a decision on its constitutionality.[1] Should the Constitutional Court determine that the Bill is constitutional, then the Premier has no alternative but to sign the Bill into law.

19.3 Substantive Constraints on Provincial Legislative Authority

(a) Exclusive competence, concurrent competence, conflicts and override[2]

(i) Exclusive provincial legislative competence

FC s 104(1)(b)(ii) grants the provinces exclusive original legislative authority over all matters listed in FC Schedule 5.[3] 'Exclusive' might suggest that only provincial legislatures are competent to pass legislation in those domains identified in Schedule 5.[4] However, FC s 44(2) permits Parliament 'to intervene' — that is, to legislate — with respect to functional areas of exclusive provincial legislative competence. This override authority may only be exercised in so far as national legislation is necessary to: (1) maintain national security; (2) maintain economic unity; (3) maintain essential national standards; (4) establish minimum standards required for the rendering of services; and (5) prevent unreasonable action taken by a province, which is prejudicial to the interests of another province or the country as a whole.[5]

[1] See In Re: The Constitutionality of the Mpumalanga Petitions Bill, 2000 2002 (1) SA 447 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1126 (CC)('Mpumalanga Petitions Bill').

[2] Issues of exclusive legislative competence, concurrent legislative competence, overrides and conflicts are dealt with exhaustively in V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 15 and V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, August 2004) Chapter 16.

[3] Where the Final Constitution contemplates the passage of provincial legislation — say a provincial name change, FC s 104(2) — Parliament may not pass legislation on the same subject matter. See also Executive Council, Western Cape v Minister of Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development & Another; Executive Council, Kwa-Zulu Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC) at paras 28–30 (Court held that the necessary implication of FC s 164 — '(a)ny matter concerning local government not dealt with in the [Final] Constitution may be prescribed by national legislation or by provincial legislation within the frame work of national legislation' — was that Parliament did not possess concurrent legislative authority with 'provincial governments in relation to the establishment and supervision of local governments.')

[4] On the relationships between functional areas of exclusive competence and concurrent competence, see Ex Parte the President of the Republic of South Africa: In re Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 61 (The Court pointed out that although the Final Constitution creates exclusive provincial legislative competences, the separation of the functional areas in Schedules 4 and 5 can never be absolute: 'Whenever a legislature's authority is limited some rule must be adopted to address the possibility that a [single] law may touch upon a subject matter [both] within and outside legislative competence.') See also V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 15.

[5] See Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In Re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 250 ('[T]his power of intervention is defined and limited. Outside that limit the exclusive provincial power remains intact and beyond the legislative competence of Parliament.')

(ii) Concurrent national and provincial legislative competence[1]

FC s 44(1)(a)(ii) and FC s 104 (1)(b)(i) confer upon Parliament and provincial legislatures, respectively, concurrent legislative powers over matters contained in FC Schedule 4.[2] Concurrency means that both Parliament and the various provincial legislatures possess the power to pass laws on the same matters.[3]

Concurrent legislative competence has several practical implications for the exercise of legislative authority by the national government. Parliament cannot: (1) prevent provincial legislatures from enacting legislation on any of the listed functional areas;[4] (2) veto provincial legislation; or (3) block provincial initiatives that deal effectively with matters over which they possess concurrent competence.[5]

The shared authority contemplated by FC s 44(1)(a)(ii) and FC s 104 (1)(b)(i) would seem to invite conflict. FC s 146 provides a rubric for the analysis and the resolution of such conflicts.[6] FC s 146(2) reads:

> National legislation that applies uniformly with regard to the country as a whole prevails over provincial legislation if any of the following conditions is met:
> (a) The national legislation deals with a matter that cannot be regulated effectively by legislation enacted by the respective provinces individually.[7]
> (b) The national legislation deals with a matter that, to be dealt with effectively, requires uniformity across the nation, and the national legislation provides that uniformity by establishing
> (i) norms and standards;
> (ii) frameworks; or
> (iii) national policies.
> (c) The national legislation is necessary for
> (i) the maintenance of national security;
> (ii) the maintenance of economic unity;
> (iii) the protection of the common market in respect of the mobility of goods, services, capital and labour;
> (iv) the promotion of economic activities across provincial boundaries;
> (v) the promotion of equal opportunity or equal access to government services; or the protection of the environment.

[1] See V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 15.

[2] IC s 126(1) delineated areas of concurrent legislative competence. Residual legislative powers, by implication, vested in Parliament. See D Brand 'Development of Concurrent Legislation - A New South African Perspective' (1999) 37, available at http://www.kas.de/db_files/dokumente/7_dokument_dok_pdf_5112_2.pdf (accessed on 5 December 2004) 37.

[3] See E Bray 'The Constitutional Concept of Co-operative Government and its Application in Education' (2002) 4 THRHR 514, 516.

[4] See Ex parte Speaker of the National Assembly: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the National Education Policy Bill no 83 of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC).

[5] See Bray (supra) at 522 (This 'sharing of powers' does not diminish a provincial legislature's ability 'to enact on its own legislation that is necessary for the effective exercise of school education.')

[6] For a detailed account of conflict resolution with respect to enactments that flow from concurrent competences, see V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, September 2005) Chapter 16.

[7] FC s 146(2)(a).

Despite a decade of such concurrent competence, only one case has required the Constitutional Court to determine whether a national law or a provincial law prevailed: Mashavha v The President of the Republic of South Africa.[1] Though of recent vintage, Mashavha does not engage FC s 146. The challenge to the assignment of administrative responsibility for a national act to provincial government engaged IC s 126(3) — the predecessor to FC s 146 — and IC s 235's transitional provisions regarding executive authority.[2]

That said, the Mashavha Court's analysis of IC s 126(3) adumbrates the general framework within which the courts will appraise conflicts that might arise in terms of FC s 146.[3] The Mashavha Court was asked to assess the constitutionality of a presidential proclamation that assigned the administration of the Social Assistance Act ('SAA') to provincial governments.[4] The SAA regulated, amongst other matters, the payment of grants. The High Court in Mashavha found that social assistance was not a matter that could be regulated effectively by provincial legislation. The Constitutional Court agreed. It reasoned as follows. First, South Africa's history of racial, ethnic and geographical discrimination compromised provincial administration of social assistance.[5] Second, because apartheid's radically inegalitarian system of distributive justice continued to be re-inscribed by differences in capacity between extant provincial governments, the provinces could not be trusted to deliver social assistance in a manner that did not offend the Interim Constitution's commitment to equality.[6] As a result, IC s 126(3) — and FC 146 — required a uniform framework for the distribution of social assistance across all nine provinces. Only national legislation administered by

[1] 2005 (2) SA 476 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (CC)('Mashavha') at para 51.

[2] For more on the transitional provisions in the Interim Constitution relating to executive authority, see M Chaskalson 'Transitional Provisions on Executive Authority, Assets and Liabilities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 28.

[3] See Mashavha (supra) at para 38 ('The purpose of section 126(3) is to determine the extent to which an Act of Parliament prevails over a provincial law inconsistent therewith, in the case of a functional area where Parliament as well as a provincial legislature have concurrent competence.')

[4] Act 59 of 1992.

[5] See Mashuvha (supra) at para 51.

[6] Ibid at para 53. The Constitutional Court rejected claims that the views of the provinces or the President on the capacity of the provinces to deliver equal and uniform access to social assistance could play a meaningful role in its assessment of the validity of the assignment. The test set out in IC s 126 and FC s 146 is objective and the assessment of competence and capacity is the sole province of the courts. It wrote:

> It is for this Court to give proper meaning to section 126(3) in context. Then the Court must apply the section to the facts of the case before it. It is clear that section 126(3) contemplates that there are matters which fall within the legislative competence of provinces which nevertheless may be regulated by national legislation. One of the criteria to determine whether the matter may be regulated by national legislation is whether it will be effective to do so; another is whether it is a matter which needs uniform norms and standards to be set; a third is whether it is necessary to set minimum standards for the delivery of public services. All three criteria recognize that there are times when uniformity is appropriate. The question that arises in this case is whether any or all of these criteria are present. It may be that reasonable people may legitimately differ in the application of these standards, but it is the standards set by the Constitution which must guide this Court's determination of the case, not the political philosophy of individual judges.

Ibid.

the national government could ensure uniform and equal treatment. The Mashavha Court confirmed the High Court's order declaring the proclamation's assignment unconstitutional.

Given that the concurrent legislative authority exercised by the national government and the provincial governments traverses such diverse terrain as agriculture and welfare, the lack of litigation may seem remarkable. The absence of conflict is largely a function of the current lay of the South African political landscape. ANC control of the national government and all nine provincial government — and the coordination of policy through party structures as well as MINMECs — eliminates the partisan politics and ideological differences that often animate such disputes.

It is also worth remembering that the Final Constitution attempts to minimize the need to resort to the courts to resolve disputes arising from the exercise of concurrent legislative authority both through a commitment to cooperative government and through express canons of statutory interpretation. With respect to such canons of interpretation, Victoria Bronstein notes that FC s 146's conflict provisions only become relevant when a conflict actually arises between national and provincial legislation on concurrent matters.[1] FC s 150 obliges courts to prefer an interpretation or a set of interpretations that reconciles the pieces of legislation under scrutiny to one that does not. FC s 148 states that where a court cannot resolve a dispute concerning a conflict between national legislation and provincial legislation, national legislation will prevail. FC s 148, like FC ss 41(3) and (4), actively discourages the use of courts to resolve political disputes. However, while FC s 41(3) and (4) require spheres of government and organs of state to exhaust non-judicial dispute resolution forums before turning to the courts, FC s 148 stands for the proposition that where no dispute resolution mechanism in FC Chapter 6 speaks to a dispute, a provincial law will fall before a national law. In such circumstances, a province will be forced to exploit political channels to achieve its ends.

(b) Provincial constitutions[2]

FC ss 142 and 143 grant each province a constitution-making legislative competence. This competence appears to extend the legislative competence conferred

[1] See V Bronstein 'Legislative Competence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 15. See also Ex Parte Speaker of the National Assembly: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the National Education Policy Bill no 83 of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC)('National Education Policy') at paras 14–16. This rule of statutory construction is similar to the 'express contradiction' doctrine in Canadian law. See Husky Oil Operations v Minister of National Revenue [1995] 3 SCR 453 at para 120 ('[T]he rationale behind this restrictive use of paramountcy is self-evident: governmental regulation in Canada operates through a complex web of federal and provincial legislation. The regimes structuring many areas of public policy, such as bankruptcy actively involve both levels of government. To this end, barring a situation where obeying the enactment of one level places a citizen in disobeyance of the legislation of the other level, an attempt must be made to read overlapping provincial and federal regulation in a complementary manner.')

[2] See S Woolman 'Provincial Constitutions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2004) Chapter 15. For reasons of economy the analysis found in that chapter is not repeated in any meaningful way here.

on a provincial legislature by FC s 104. However, the judgments of the Constitutional Court in provincial constitution certification cases suggest that this textually distinct competence may be only notionally different than the legislative competence conferred on the provinces by other sections of the Final Constitution.[1] Put pithily, FC ss 142 and 143 do not create a meaningfully independent basis for the exercise of power by the provinces. Unless the Constitutional Court alters fundamentally its reading of the apposite provisions of the Final Constitution or those provisions are amended, provincial constitutions will never amount to anything more than window-dressing.[2]

(c) Co-operative government[3]

The Constitutional Assembly — in FC ss 40 and 41 — laid out principles designed to promote co-operation and co-ordination, rather than competition, between the various tiers of government and organs of state. Indeed, to emphasize this shift in relations, ss 40 and 41 employ the term 'sphere' rather than 'level'. Sphere intimates different sets of responsibilities. (By implication, level denotes a hierarchy in structures of government). But that is as far as the break with the old order goes. Despite the emphasis on 'spheres' with particular, and sometimes exclusive, competencies, the Constitutional Assembly did not create a strong federal state. Provinces, and in particular provincial legislatures, generally remain subordinate to their national counterparts.[4]

[1] See Ex Parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Legislature: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal 1996 1996 (4) SA 1098 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1419 (CC)('Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal'); Ex Parte Speaker of the Provincial Legislature of the Western Cape: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Western Cape, 1997 1997 (4) SA 795 (CC), 1997 (9) BCLR 1167 (CC)('First Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape'); Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Western Cape 1997 1998 (1) SA 655 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1653 (CC)('Second Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape').

[2] The Constitutional Court gives the lie to its claim that provincial constitution-making power is 'significant' when it notes both that provinces need not enact a provincial constitution and that Chapter 6 of the Final Constitution — along with the rest of the Final Constitution — 'provides a complete blueprint for the regulation of government within provinces . . . [and] provides adequately for the establishment and functioning of provincial legislatures and executive.' First Certification of the Constitution of the Province of the Western Cape (supra) at paras 36 and 15.

[3] See S Woolman, T Roux & B Bekink 'Co-operative Government' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 14.

[4] The FC Chapter 3 jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court is governed by two basic principles. See Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa: In Re Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Liquor Bill') at para 40. First, one sphere of government or one organ of state may not use its powers in such a way as to undermine the effective functioning of another sphere or organ of state. Second, the actual integrity of each sphere and organ of state must be understood in light of the powers and purpose of that entity. In short, while the political framework created by the Final Constitution demands that mutual respect must be paid, there are circumstances in which the basic law clearly contemplates a hierarchy of political authority. Compare Western Cape Provincial Government: In re DVB Behuising (Pty) Ltd v North West Provincial Government 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347 (CC)('DVB Behuising')(Court held that the functional areas of concurrent legislative authority had to be interpreted in a manner which would enable the national parliament and the provincial legislatures to exercise their respective legislative powers fully and effectively) with Government of the Republic of South

(d) Fundamental rights and rule of law constraints

The exercise of provincial legislative authority is expressly constrained by the rights enshrined in FC Chapter 2.[1] The exercise of provincial legislative authority must also satisfy the legality principle. Although this doctrine imposes a rationality test that most pieces of provincial legislation will meet, the standard still has teeth.[2]

19.4 DELEGATION

(a) From Parliament to Provincial Legislature

FC s 44(1)(a)(iii) allows expressly the National Assembly to assign its legislative powers to a provincial legislature.[3] This power is known as legislative inter-delegation.

The assignment of legislative competence proceeds by an Act of Parliament.[4] An assignment extends legislative powers to the provincial legislature for as long as the Act of Parliament is in force. As Currie and De Waal note, however, '[o]nce the power to legislate is assigned to the province, Parliament is no longer

Africa v Grootboom 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1360 (CC)('Grootboom') at paras 39–40 ('[A] co-ordinated State housing program must be a comprehensive one determined by all three spheres of government in consultation with each other . . . [B]ut the national sphere of government must ensure responsibility for ensuring that laws, policies, programs and strategies are adequate to meet the State's s 26 obligations.') For a good example of national authority overreach, see Premier, Western Cape v President of the Republic of South Africa 1999 (3) SA 657 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 382 (CC)('Premier, WC v President')(Court found that a procedure requiring an agreement between the President and the Premier with respect to the legality of a proposed restructuring of the public service within a provincial administration was entirely consistent with our system of co-operative government. As a result, a section of the amended Public Service Act, which permitted the Minister to direct that the administration of provincial laws be transferred from a provincial department to a national department or other body, clearly infringed the executive authority of the province to administer its own laws.)

[1] For a detailed account of how fundamental rights curb the abuse of national legislative authority — an account that applies equally to provincial legislative authority — see S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 17. For an account of how the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights are to be reconciled with the exercise of powers in terms of other constitutional provisions — say, provincial legislative authority, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31.

[2] For a comprehensive restatement of how the rule or law and the legality principle set limits on the exercise of public power, see F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11.

[3] FC 44, reads, in relevant part: '(1) The national legislative authority as vested in Parliament . . . (a) confers on the National Assembly the power . . . (iii) to assign any of its legislative powers, except the power to amend the Constitution, to any legislative body in another sphere of government.'

[4] FC s 104(1)(b)(iii) provides that assignment must take place by 'national legislation'. FC s 44(1)(a)(iii) vests the power to assign legislative competence in the National Assembly. It seems reasonable to conclude, as Steven Budlender does, that since the Final Constitution vests no corresponding power of assignment in the President or any other functionary who makes proclamations, assignment may only take place in terms of national legislation. See S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 17.

competent to legislate in this area, until the assignment is repealed by national legislation.'[1]

If the Act is repealed, provincial laws already made under the now repealed Act continue to be valid. However, the province would no longer possess the power to make any further laws in respect of matters covered by the Act because it would no longer possess the requisite assigned legislative competence. But neither, as the Constitutional Court pointed out in Western Cape Provincial Government & Others: In re DVB Behuising (Pty) Ltd v North West Provincial Government & Another, would Parliament have the power to amend or to repeal extant provincial laws.[2]

Only by passing new national legislation would Parliament be able to overcome the existing provincial law enacted under the previously assigned competence. Given that the existing provincial law was enacted under the previously assigned competence, the new national legislation and the existing provincial legislation are not technically governed by FC s 147's conflict resolution regime. As Matthew Chaskalson and Jonathan Klaaren have argued, FC s 148 suggests that the absence of an express means of resolving this conflict results in the subordination of the provincial legislation to the new national legislation.[3] Such provincial legislation is not, technically, invalidated.[4] It remains dormant for so long as the conflict persists. In addition, Parliament does not have the legislative competence to repeal provincial laws — whether those laws are made under an original competence or an assigned competence.[5]

(b) From Provincial Legislature to Provincial Executive

The Final Constitution is silent on the question of whether a provincial legislature may delegate authority to the provincial executive. The Constitutional Court has, however, held that while the national legislature may delegate subordinate regulatory authority to the national executive, it may not assign plenary legislative power.[6] As Steven Budlender notes: 'This delegation doctrine has the virtue of [1] I Currie & J De Waal The New Constitutional and Administrative Law, Volume I (2001) 209. See also Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa &d Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC)('Executive Council 1995').

[2] 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347 (CC)('DVB Behuising').

[3] See FC s 148: 'If a dispute concerning a conflict cannot be resolved by a court, the national legislation prevails over the provincial legislation or provincial constitution.'

[4] FC s 149: 'A decision by a court that legislation prevails over other legislation does not invalidate that other legislation, but that other legislation becomes inoperative for as long as the conflict remains.' See National Education Policy (supra) at para 19 ('If the conflict is resolved in favour of either the provincial or the national law, the other is not invalidated; it is subordinated and to the extent of the conflict rendered inoperative.')

[5] See National Education Policy (supra) at paras 16–19.

[6] Executive Council 1995 (supra) at para 62 (Constitutional Court asserts that its 'delegation doctrine' was derived from the constitutional commitment to separation of powers. This commitment meant that law-making, as the proper domain of the legislature, could not be delegated excessively to the executive branch.) See also Executive Council, Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development balancing the need for efficiency in government against the need to avoid subverting the constitutional legislative framework.'[1] Although the Constitutional Court has yet to address the delegation of provincial legislative authority to a provincial executive, it seems reasonable to conclude that it will permit the provincial legislature to delegate some subordinate regulatory power to an MEC or to a provincial administrative agency.

19.5 Assignment to Local Government

FC s 104(1)(c) allows a provincial legislature to assign any of its legislative powers to a municipal council. The assignment proceeds by an Act of the provincial legislature. An assignment extends legislative powers to the municipal council for as long as the Act is in force. If the Act is repealed, local government by-laws which have already been made under it would continue to be valid. However, the municipal council would no longer be able to make any further laws in respect of matters covered by the Act: it would no longer possess the assigned legislative competence to do so.

Local government by-laws made under an assigned legislative competence from a provincial legislature may conflict with provincial legislation. In such circumstances, provincial legislation prevails. The local government by-law will be declared invalid and not merely inoperative.[2]

2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 136 (CC)('Executive Council 2000')(Holding that delegation doctrine developed in Executive Council 1995 remained good law under the Final Constitution.) See also Van Rooyen v The State 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 222 (CC) ('Van Rooyen') at paras 118–9 (Constitutional Court applied the holding in Executive Council 1995 in evaluating the constitutionality of a delegation of subordinate regulatory authority); Constitutional Principle XIX (Principle required inter-delegation in the Final Constitution: 'The powers and functions at the national and provincial levels of government shall include exclusive and concurrent powers as well as the power to perform functions for other levels of government'); Ynuico Ltd v Minister of Trade and Industry & Others 1996 (3) SA 989 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 798 (CC)(Delegation doctrine could not be used to challenge delegated legislation promulgated before Interim Constitution came into effect because doctrine drew its constitutional force from IC s 37, and IC s 37 could have no bearing on the validity of regulations made before the Interim Constitution came into existence. The same logic would extend to any challenges made to pre-Interim Constitution delegated legislation challenged under FC s 44.)

[1] See S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 17. See also National Education Policy (supra) at paras 16–19.

[2] FC s 156 (3) reads: 'Subject to section 151(4), a by-law that conflicts with national or provincial legislation is invalid.' FC s 151(4) reads: 'The national or a provincial government may not compromise or impede a municipality's ability or right to exercise its powers or perform its functions.' For more on such conflicts, see V Bronstein 'Conflicts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, September 2005) Chapter 16.

19.6 Abstract Review of Bills and Acts[1]

Unlike the Interim Constitution, the Final Constitution makes no provision for abstract judicial review of provincial bills at the instance of members of the provincial legislature. However, at the end of the legislative process, the Premier may refer a Bill to the Constitutional Court for a decision on its constitutionality. The Constitutional Court, in In Re: The Constitutionality of the Mpumalanga Petitions Bill, 2000, held that it does not possess jurisdiction to consider the constitutionality of any provision in a Bill raised by the premier, 'unless the Premier's reservation concerning such provision has been referred to the legislature as envisaged' by FC ss 121(1) and (2).[2] That is, she must first remit the Bill to the legislature for reconsideration, and the legislature must refuse to address her concerns. A Premier cannot raise reservations about a Bill that have not been raised by her with the legislature.

FC s 122 allows one-fifth of the members of a provincial legislature to apply to the Constitutional Court for abstract review of a provincial Act within thirty days of the Premier's assent and signature.[3] When it receives a FC s 122 application for abstract review, the Constitutional Court may grant an interim order suspending the operation of the Act, or those sections of it that are subject to review, until the main application has been decided. The discretion of the Constitutional Court with respect to interim orders is limited to cases where the application has a reasonable prospect of success and the interests of justice require the suspension of the operation of the legislation.[4]

[1] FC s 122, Application by members to Constitutional Court, reads:
