The Court suggested that it might be possible to distinguish between the budgeting and allocating of money for social grants, and the more practical matter of paying those grants. While the former clearly needed to be performed at the national level, the latter activity might be more efficiently performed at the provincial level.[3] However, since the Social Assistance Act of 1992 was not structured so as to distinguish between these two types of functions, the Court left the matter undecided. The new Social Assistance Act of 2004 places the administration primarily in the hands of national government, particularly the South African Social Security Agency.

In order to avoid unnecessary disruption, the Mashavha Court suspended the order for eighteen months, by which time it was envisaged that the new Social Assistance Act would be in force. However, on Saturday 4 March 2006, two days before the period of suspension was to expire, the Minister of Social Development approached the Court to request an urgent extension of the period of suspension. The new Social Assistance Act was due to come into force about a month later. The failure to extend the suspension order might threaten the ability of the government to pay social grants.

In Minister of Social Development, the Court refused the application because, by the time it heard the matter, the period had already expired.[4] Van der Westhuizen J held that it lacked the power to extend an order that had already expired.[5] In [1] Mashavha (supra) at para 1.

[2] Ibid at para 57.
[3] Ibid at para 59.
[4] Minister of Social Development (supra).
[5] Ibid at para 38. For a discussion of the Court's power to extend suspension orders, see Michael Bishop 'Remedies' in Stu Woolman, Michael Bishop & Jason Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) §9.4*(e)(i)(ee)*.

reaching that conclusion, the Court noted its concern for 'the plight of those in need of payments in terms of the [Social Assistance Act 2004].'[1] However, because its hands were tied by the late application, all the Court could do was remind the state that it was 'crucial for the relevant organs of government to fulfil their constitutional obligation and make every effort and to fully explore all legal possibilities to prevent the interruption of the payment of pensions and other social grants.'[2]

Law Society of South Africa concerned various challenges to an amendment to the Road Accident Fund Act that would limit the benefits that victims of motor vehicle accidents could claim, and prevent them from raising common-law claims against the wrongdoer. The state successfully defended a rationality challenge in part on the ground that it was an interim measure in moving to a comprehensive social security system that would offer 'life, disability and health insurance cover for all accidents and diseases.'[3] The Court accepted that the measure was part of a move towards a more 'equitable platform for delivery of social security services.'[4] It is implicit in the Court's judgment that equity is an important element of a social security system.

(ii) Eastern Cape social grant cases

The constitutional right to social security is meaningless without proper implementation and service delivery. The current social grant system is rife with corruption. The problems of corruption and maladministration of grants are particularly acute in the Eastern Cape, one of the poorest provinces in South Africa. In Kate Froneman J observed that for a number of years there has been a 'persistent and huge problem with the administration of social grants in the Eastern Cape'.[5] The Supreme Court of Appeal has lamented the 'conspicuous and endemic failure' of the Eastern Cape provincial government to effectively pay social grants.[6]

[1] Minister of Social Development (supra) at para 45.

[2] Ibid at para 46. See also ibid at para 59 (Ngcobo J concurring)('We are not unmindful of the plight of those individuals who are receiving the social welfare grants as well as those who are seeking such grants. They are entitled to be paid those grants as and when they are due. Similarly, those who are seeking such grants are entitled to have their applications considered and, if they meet the relevant criteria, to be awarded such grants. Regrettably, this application was brought ex parte and without any notice either to the applicants in the original application or to their attorneys. However, there is nothing in this judgment which prevents any person who might be adversely affected by the refusal to extend the period of suspension from approaching any court of competent jurisdiction to seek relief, if so advised.')

[3] Law Society of South Africa (supra) at para 45.

[4] Ibid at para 54.

[5] Kate v MEC for Welfare, Eastern Cape 2005 (1) SA 141 (SE), [2005] 1 All SA 745 (SE)('Kate'). For novel forms of constitutional relief designed to address both maladministration and the refusal to follow court orders see Mahambehlala v MEC for Welfare, Eastern Cape & Another 2002 (1) SA 342 (SE), 2001 (9) BCLR 890 (SE)('Mahambehlala') and Mbanga v MEC for Welfare, Eastern Cape 2002 (1) SA 359 (SE), 2001 (8) BCLR 821 (SE)('Mbanga').

[6] Kate SCA (supra) at para 3.

The result of the large-scale maladministration of social grants in the Eastern Cape has been 'a plethora of litigation in the High Court between the poor of that province and the provincial administration. In some cases the failure of the administration lies in not expeditiously considering applications for social grants. In other cases it lies in not paying what is due to beneficiaries once their applications have been approved. At times it lies even in disregard of court orders for the payment of moneys that are due.'[1] The history of the Eastern Cape government's failures and the consequent litigation as summarized by the Constitutional Court in Njongi.[2]

The Eastern Cape social grant cases can be divided into three categories. One category consists of cases which affirm the rights of litigants to relief when social security grants are cancelled without notice. Ngxuza is one such a case.[3] Ngxuza concerned a large class action on behalf of all people in the Eastern Cape whose grants had been improperly terminated during an overzealous attempt to root out fraudulent claimants. The High Court certified the class and the Supreme Court of Appeal upheld the decision.

A second category of cases concerns officials who fail to render timeous decisions regarding applications for social grants. In Vumazonke,[4] the High Court held that the delay by the provincial department in taking a decision on the applicants' application for social grants was unreasonable in terms of s 6(2)(g) read with s 6(3)(a) of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act.[5]

The third category consists of cases in which the state fails to pay out retrospectively grants plus interest for applications that were approved after long delays. In Kate, for example, Froneman J ordered the Eastern Cape Department of Welfare to pay interest and retrospectively grant disbursements.[6] In the case of large-scale state contempt for court orders, Froneman J stated that the courts were obliged to devise ways to ensure compliance with court order and suggested courts could summon recalcitrant welfare officials to explain their non-compliance with court orders.[7] Failure to heed both the original order and the order to appear could be followed with a finding of contempt.[8] The decision was confirmed by the Supreme Court of Appeal.[9]

Similarly, in Njongi, the applicant's disability grant had been inexplicably cancelled only to be re-instated nearly three years later. She brought a claim to set aside the original decision to cancel her payments and claim the outstanding

[1] Kate SCA (supra) at para 4.

[2] Njongi v Member of the Executive Council, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape 2008 (4) SA 237 (CC), 2008 (6) BCLR 571 (CC), [2008] ZACC 4 ('Njongi') at paras 8-26.

[3] Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape Provincial Government & Another v Ngxuza & Others 2001 (4) SA 1184 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1039 (SCA)('Ngxuza SCA').

[4] Vumazonke v MEC for Social Development, Eastern Cape, & Three Similar Cases 2005 (6) SA 229 (SE) ('Vumazonke').

[5] Act 3 of 2000.

[6] Kate (supra).

[7] Ibid at para 24.

[8] Ibid at para 11 ('[I]f nevertheless, the State failed to comply with the court order of payment, the possibility of contempt of court, or at least a declaration to that effect, could help individual public officials to pay heed to their constitutional public duties.')

[9] Kate SCA (supra).

arrear payments to which she was entitled. The High Court initially granted the claim, only to be overturned by a Full Bench on the ground that the claim had prescribed.

In the Constitutional Court Yacoob J held that the claim had not prescribed as Ms Njongi could only bring the claim once the initial decision had been set aside. More importantly, he questioned whether 'prescription could legitimately arise when the debt that is claimed is a social grant; where the obligation in respect of which performance is sought is one which the Government is obliged to perform in terms of the Constitution; and where the non-performance of the Government represents conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution.'[1] Justice Yacoob went on to hold that, even if prescription could technically be raised in a claim involving a social grant, '[t]here is an inevitable and, in my view, moral choice to be made in relation to whether a debtor should plead prescription'.[2] In this case, the decision to raise a defence of prescription to avoid paying social grants 'was unconscionable conduct on the part of the Provincial Government'.[3] The Court expressed its displeasure through a costs order against the state on an attorney-and client scale.[4]

Despite this long litany of government incompetence and obstruction there was, for a time, some doubt about the remedies that were available to enforce compliance. In Jayiya, the Supreme Court of Appeal questioned whether courts had the power to order retrospective disbursements — plus interest — as a remedy for unreasonable delays and as a form of constitutional damages.[5] Jayiya also created doubt about the ability of courts to hold recalcitrant officials in contempt of court.[6] Any doubt was put to rest by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Kate. Nugent JA awarded the applicant constitutional damages in the form of retrospective damages. He also explicitly held that there was nothing in Jayiya that prevented courts from holding officials who failed to implement court orders in contempt.[7] Njongi also specifically raised the possibility of a de bonis propriis costs order against the relevant officials, although the Court ultimately decided it was inappropriate.[8] Moreover, since the Constitutional Court's decision in Nyathi it is also possible to execute against state property.[9] Courts should not hesitate to employ the full arsenal of remedies at their disposal to ensure the payment of social grants.

The biggest challenge facing the Department of Social Development in the Eastern Cape has been internal corruption. In the Ciskei and other areas corrupt

[1] Njongi (supra) at para 42.
[2] Ibid at para 78.
[3] Ibid at para 85.
[4] For more on costs in constitutional matters, see Michael Bishop 'Costs' in Stu Woolman, Michael Bishop & Jason Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, October 2010) Chapter 6.
[5] Jayiya v MEC for Welfare, Eastern Cape & Another 2004 (2) SA 611 (SCA) at paras 8-11.
[6] Ibid at para 19.
[7] Kate SCA (supra) at para 30.
[8] Njongi (supra) at paras 61-63.
[9] Nyathi v Member of the Executive Council for the Department of Health Gauteng & Another 2008 (5) SA 94 (CC), 2008 (9) BCLR 865 (CC), [2008] ZACC 8.

officials registered ghost beneficiaries and paid themselves on a monthly basis.[1] Officials from the Department also collected monies from beneficiaries who did not collect their vouchers.[2] To combat these forms of corruption, the payment system was privatized. It introduced a system of verification by way of fingerprints.[3] Similar initiatives have also been taken on the national level. In Vumazonke, the court attempted to address the maladministration of grants in the Eastern Cape by directing that the judgment be served on the chairperson of the South African Human Rights Commission. The chairperson was asked to consider 'whether to institute an investigation into the conduct of the respondent's department.'[4]

It is, however, not only officials working directly with social assistance that are responsible for such corruption. Some citizens of the new Eastern Cape province exploited the fact that one could legally use identity documents of the former Transkei and Ciskei to secure more than one social grant. Others have tried to obtain social grants by applying under false identities. Some applicants applied several times until they were successful. (The success was made possible by the deficiencies of a manually driven system.[5]) The implementation of a right to social security will only be progressively realized when government has successfully addressed these problems.

56D.4 Administration of Social Grants — The Treatment by the South African Courts

A survey of recent South African social security cases show that very few cases involve constitutional issues (or rights issues) such as non-discrimination. Most of the litigation on social security involves the non-payment of social grants and the inadequate administration of social grants. They are, at heart, administrative law matters. Most recent cases on social security can be grouped into the following four categories:

(a) Protection of Procedural Interests

Beneficiaries must be given an opportunity to state their case before a grant may be suspended,[6] and the government must furnish written reasons when the decision is made to cancel a grant.[7] The affected person should, finally, be informed of his or her right to appeal.[8]

---

[1] See Magidimisi v The Premier of the Province of the Eastern Cape Case No 2180/2004 (Unreported decision of the Eastern Cape High Court)('Magidimisi') at para 16, n 63.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Ibid at para 17.

[4] Vumazonke (supra) at para 18.

[5] Since the system was manually driven, it was difficult to determine whether a person applied more than once.

[6] Rangani v Superintendent-General, Department of Health and Welfare 1999 (4) SA 385 (T)('Rangani').

[7] Bushula & Others v Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape Provincial Government & Another 2000 (2) SA 728 (E).

[8] Njongi v Member of the Executive Council for Social Development, Eastern Cape Province 2005 JDR 0718 (SE).

In Sikutshwa v The Member of The Executive Council For Social Development, Eastern Cape Province[1] the court considered the applicant's rights to receive reasons for the rejection of his application for a disability grant in terms of s 5(2) of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act ('PAJA').[2] According to PAJA, the Department of Welfare was required to furnish 'adequate reasons' for refusal within 90 days of being requested to do so. Instead, the Department took eight months to process the request. The court indicated that the applicant was entitled to be treated with dignity and respect,[3] which required that he be given reasons on request for why his application had failed.

(b) Application of Administrative Justice Rules

South African courts have widely applied administrative justice rules in social assistance matters.[4] Administrative justice principles play a crucial role in protecting the rights of those dependent on the support of the courts against arbitrary and unlawful state action.

Courts have often dealt with unreasonable delays in the payment of social grants and have routinely held that such unreasonable delays may amount to unlawful administrative action.[5] Courts emphasized that the unilateral withdrawal or suspension of grants without adherence to the principles of natural justice is unlawful and invalid.[6]

Irrational decisions made by social security officials will not meet the standard of administrative law. In Rangani v Superintendent-General, Department of Health and Welfare[7] the state's policy that a medical officer must find an applicant to be 60% disabled in order to qualify for a permanent disability grant was found to be irrational.[8]

Social assistance grants may only be suspended for reasons and on the grounds provided for in the relevant legislation and regulations. In Maluleke v MEC for Health, Northern Province[9] the provincial government decided to cancel almost 92 000 grants of those it deemed to be suspect beneficiaries. The court held that the suspension was unlawful.[10]

---

[1] 2009 (3) SA 47 (TkH), [2005] ZAECHC 18 ('Sikutshwa').

[2] Act 3 of 2000.

[3] Sikutshwa (supra) at para 81

[4] For more on the right to administrative justice, see Jonathan Klaaren & Glenn Penfold 'Just Administrative Action' in Stu Woolman, Michael Bishop & Jason Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 63; Cora Hoexter Administrative Law (2nd Edition, 2012).

[5] See Mpanga v MEC for Welfare 2002 (1) SA 359 (SE). See also Mahambehlala v MEC for Welfare (Eastern Cape) 1998 (1) SA 342 (SE)(held that more than three months to process an application for welfare amounted to an unreasonable delay.)

[6] See Bacela v MEC for Welfare (Eastern Cape Provincial Government) [1998] 1 All SA 525 (E).

[7] Rangani (supra).

[8] Court held that the degree of severity of the medical condition was not rationally linked to the duration of the disability.

[9] 1999 (4) SA 367 (T).

[10] Ibid.

The High Court has also attempted to tackle the ongoing problems with the payment of social grants in a more systemic fashion. In Cele v South African Social Security Agency[1] Wallis AJ held that in terms of FC s 27(2) and the right to just administrative action South African Social Security Agency ('SASSA') has an obligation to overcome the administrative problems that beset the social security system.[2] The court held that the congestion of the Durban and Natal High Courts' rolls[3] with SASSA's inability to properly process and pay social grants was untenable.[4] It appeared that the system was being driven by a small group of attorneys and advocates who had created a very profitable cottage industry. To address the scourge of unnecessary and costly litigation, Wallis AJ issued a new practice directive that required litigants to first approach both SASSA and the state attorney before approaching the High Court.

(c) Class Actions

Access to social assistance is enhanced by the availability of the class action. Class actions allow a large group of claimants who would be unable to act individually to act collectively to enforce their rights.[5] In Ngxuza[6] the Legal Resources Centre applied to certify a class of all people whose disability grants had been improperly suspended. This included some 37 000 people with disabilities. The High Court permitted the litigation on behalf of the class, and the Supreme Court of Appeal upheld the decision.[7] It identified the following requisites for a class action:

> (1) the class is so numerous that joinder of all its members is impracticable; (2) there are questions of law and fact common to the class; (3) the claims of the applicants representing the class are typical of the claims of the rest; and (4) the applicants through their legal representatives, … will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class.[8]

Class actions are a particularly appropriate litigation vehicle in social security cases where the potential litigants may not have the means to act individually. It also avoids the problem of excessive litigation identified in Cele.

---

[1] 2009 (5) SA 105 (D).

[2] Ibid at para 26.

[3] The court in Cele stated that there were approximately 300 such matters on the motion rolls in Durban during a calendar year which resulted in legal expenses of R12 million to R15 million a year.

[4] The matters on the role included: (a) the suspension of social grants without the provision of reasons; (b) matters where applicants apply for social grants but receive no response; and (c) matters where the refusal of a grant has been appealed but no arrangements were made for the hearing of the appeal. Ibid at para 3.

[5] For more on class actions, see Cheryl Loots 'Standing, Ripeness and Mootness' in Stu Woolman, Michael Bishop Jason Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) § 7.2*(c)*(iii).

[6] Ngxuza & Others v Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape 2001 (2) SA 609 (E).

[7] Ngxuza SCA (supra).

[8] Ibid at para 16.

(d) Extending social security benefits to non citizens:

In the spirit of Khosa, the High Court in Centre for Child Law and Another v Minister of Home Affairs[1] (also referred to as the Lindela case after the holding camp for refugees in Gauteng) dealt with the rights of child refugees. Specifically, the case concerned whether unaccompanied foreign children should be treated as children in need of care through the formal child protections system, or whether they could be processed through the immigration system. The Court acknowledged that there is a duty on the state to ensure basic socio-economic provision for children who lack family care, including unaccompanied foreign children. The court ordered government departments within the 'social cluster of departments' to address the problem collectively.

56D.5 POLICY

Social security under the apartheid governments was described as 'fragmented, inequitable and fraud-ridden'.[2] Social security was administered by 14 different departments for different population groups and homelands.[3] From 1992 until 2006, the position was regulated by the Social Assistance Act, 1992. That entire regime has been replaced by the Social Assistance Act, 2004, which came into force on 1 April 2006.[4] The 2004 Act provides for a regime that is non discriminatory and applies throughout the whole of South Africa.

Together with the Constitution, the source of this reform was the White Paper for Social Welfare ('the White Paper'). In line with government's new focus on development, the White Paper focuses on developmental social assistance which aims to make people self-sufficient. As a result of the White Paper's interventions, South Africa now has 'one of the most extensive welfare systems in the developing world'.[5]

One of the most important changes in the system has been the centralisation of social assistance administration. Previously social grants were administered through the provinces. This decentralized approach was found unconstitutional in Mashavha.[6] The restructuring of the system involved transferring the social

[1] 2005 (6) SA 50 (T).

[2] S Liebenberg 'Human Rights and Social Security' (1998) 1(2) ESR Review 1. Liebenberg writes that the history of social assistance in South Africa is one of pervasive racial discrimination. Even though South Africans were eligible for the State Maintenance Grant, African women, for example, were effectively excluded from the process. See Sandra Liebenberg 'The Right to Social Assistance: The Implications of Grootboom for Policy Reform in South Africa' (2001) 12 SAJHR 234, 242 (Liebenberg 'Social Assistance'). According to de Villiers, however, the current practices and standards of provinces vary significantly; and the worst of these provincial administrations perpetuate the pre-1994 apartheid social policy. Nick de Villiers 'Social Grants and the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act' (2002) 12 SAJHR 320, 321.

[3] Liebenberg 'Social Assistance' (supra) at 243.

[4] Act 13 of 2004. Chapter 4 of this Act is not yet in effect. Chapter 4 creates an Inspectorate for Social Assistance. The Inspectorate is meant to operate independently from the Minister or the Department of Social Development.

[5] Beth Goldblatt 'Gender and Social Assistance in the First Decade of Democracy: A Case Study of South Africa's Child Support Grant' (2005) 32(2) Politikon 239.

[6] Mashavha v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2005 (2) SA 476 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (CC), [2004] ZACC 6.

assistance function to the national government where it is now being administered through the South African Social Security Agency ('SASSA'), an organ of the state. The purpose of the South African Social Security Agency Act is to ensure that national standards are set for the efficient and effective use of the limited resources available to the State for social security.[1] Provincial social development departments were relieved of the responsibility to finance social security from 1 April 2005. Today, the eligibility criteria, means testing and size of grants are all specified in national welfare regulations.[2]

This section discusses the various policy and legislative instruments that enabled the transition to the current system and that constitute the current legal framework for the provision of social grants.

(a) Statutory Framework: White Paper and SASSA

The starting point for understanding the social assistance legislative framework is the White Paper, which identified the following key restructuring priorities:

(a) Building consensus around a national restructuring of the social policy framework;
(b) Creating a single national welfare department as well as provincial welfare departments;
(c) The phasing out of all disparities in social welfare;
(d) Developing a financially sustainable welfare system[3]

The purpose of the Social Assistance Agency Act is to effect to these priorities and ensure that national standards are set for the effective use of the limited resources available to the state to give content to social security.

The framework created by the Social Assistance Act can be described as a centralized institution with limited autonomy. It makes provision for extensive Ministerial direction and involvement. No provision is made for a Board or supervisory and advisory structure or institution of a representative nature that could assist the Minister of Social Development or supervise or scrutinize the Minister's decisions.

The system is administered by SASSA.[4] A creature of statute, SASSA is a juristic person and is intended to be the sole agent that ensures the management, administration and payment of social assistance. It serves as an agent for the payment of social security. Its functions are described in Chapter 3 of the Social Assistance Act and include collecting, collating, maintaining and administering the information necessary for the payment of social security in a national database. The 2008 Social Assistance Amendment Bill enables applicants for social grants to appeal the decisions of SASSA. SASSA is also tasked with establishing a compliance and fraud mechanism to ensure the integrity of the social security system[5]

[1] Act 9 of 2004. The date of commencement for this Act was 15 November 2004.
[2] GN R 1233 in Government Gazette 22852 (23 November 2002) 1.
[3] Elize Strydom (ed) Essential Social Security Law (2nd Edition 2006) ('Essential') 22.
[4] SASSA was established pursuant to a recommendation by the Committee of Inquiry into a Comprehensive System of Social Security for South Africa of 2002.
[5] Social Assistance Act, 2004 s 4.

As a general rule, social grants are paid subject to a means test. Means testing implies the evaluation, by the responsible agency, of the income and assets of the person applying for the social grant so as to establish whether the person's means are below a stipulated amount. The applicable means test varies from one social grant to another. The separate urban and rural income thresholds that existed previously have been removed.[1]

(b) Basic Income Grant (BIG)

In 2000, Cabinet established a Committee of Inquiry to investigate social security in South Africa. The committee was chaired by Prof Vivienne Taylor and is commonly known as the 'Taylor Commission'. The Taylor Commission came to the conclusion that South Africa's social security system is neither 'comprehensive nor adequate.'[2] For this reason, the Taylor Commission concluded that the existing social security system cannot adequately address the problem of poverty.[3] One of the most pressing problems the Commission identified was the position of people excluded from the present formal social security classification.[4]

The Taylor Commission, the Committee of Inquiry into a Comprehensive Social Security System and the South African Human Rights Commission have recommended the implementation of a Basic Income Grant (BIG) to help the poorest of the poor.[5] Such a grant is to be financed by tax revenue. The introduction of the BIG will assist those persons previously excluded from social security to escape conditions of extreme deprivation.[6] It is proposed that R100 should be paid per month to everyone in South Africa who does not receive social assistance and who falls through the social safety net.[7] Children who do not, for example, receive another grant such as a Child Care Grant will receive a BIG.[8] Sandy Liebenberg has argued that the BIG is the most effective and appropriate measure for fulfilling the right to social security because it fulfills all the requirements of the Grootboom reasonableness test.[9] Others have argued that the introduction of BIG will go a long way in alleviating desperate poverty

[1] National Treasury National Budget Review: 2009 (2009) 89 available at http://www.treasury.gov.za/documents/national%20budget/2009/review/ (accessed on 26 February 2012).

[2] Committee of Inquiry into a Comprehensive System of Social Security for South Africa Transforming the Present — Protecting the Future (2002) 154, available at www.cdhaarmann.com/Publication/Taylor%20report.pdf (accessed on 26 February 2012).

[3] It has however been claimed that social grants have played a critical role in reducing poverty. See Michael Appel 'Poverty in South Africa is "Declining"' (2 October 2008) available at www.southafrica.info/about/social/poverty-021008.htm (accessed on 26 February 2012).

[4] Rene Liffman, Ben Mlalazi, Valerie Moore, Sunday Ogunronbi & Marius Olivier 'Those Who Have and Those Who Don't: An Investigation into the Limited Scope of Application of Social Security in South Africa' (2000) 4(1) Law, Democracy and Development 15.

[5] See Sandra Liebenberg 'The Judicial Enforcement of Social Security Rights in South Africa: Enhancing Accountability for the Basic Needs of the Poor' in Eibe Riedel (ed) Social Security as a Human Right (2007) at 5.

[6] See South African Human Rights Commission 4th Annual Economic and Social Rights Report (2000-2002) 229.

[7] See Avinash Govindjee Social Assistance as a Framework for Social Policy in South Africa (2009) 132.

[8] Ibid.

[9] S Liebenberg 'Universal Access to Social Security Rights: Can a Basic Income Grant Meet the Challenge?' (2002) 3(2) ESR Review 10.

because social grants alleviate poverty more effectively than public works.[1] The Taylor Report indicated that the BIG 'has the potential, more than any other possible social protection intervention, to reduce poverty and promote human development and sustainable livelihoods.' The feeling is that a BIG will at least 'put food on the table.' [2]

The South African government has, however, largely ignored the recommendations of the Taylor Commission.[3] President Mbeki was quoted as saying that a single intervention will make no difference to the poor.[4] Instead, he advocated for a comprehensive social security system. There is however still strong lobbying for the introduction of the BIG.

The fact that the South African social security system excludes millions of destitute people from its ambit could found a constitutional challenge based on the right to social security. The Social Assistance Act, 2004 has a limited scope and millions of South Africans fall through the net. Combined with the high rate of unemployment, this makes a constitutional challenge to compel the government to adopt the BIG — or something similar — feasible. The government's continued unwillingness to institute the BIG, despite numerous recommendations and studies indicating how it could be funded, demonstrate that it has acted unreasonably.

(c) Social grants

This section will focus on the most prominent social grants: old-age grants, disability grants and child care grants. There are two common forms of 'social insurance' that I do not address in this section: social security measures for employees who are injured at work as a result of an accident;[5] and social assistance paid to relieve the results of unemployment and the result of sickness during employment.[6]

The South African government also pays compensation to individuals who have suffered hardship as the result of having the status of victims of war[7] and persons who have sacrificed their jobs and education in the process of overturning oppressive governments and establishing a democratic government.[8] Since this form of compensation more accurately falls under 'social compensation' than social assistance and since far fewer individuals benefit from these forms of [1] C Meth 'Finding BIG Political Will' Mail & Guardian (August 13 2004) 29.

[2] Ibid.

[3] See the rejection of the BIG by the Finance Minister in the 2004 Budget Speech (18 February 2004) available at http://www.info.gov.za/speeches/2004/04021815161001.htm (accessed on 27 February 2012)('[T]here were submissions on the idea of a basic income grant. I have sympathy with the underlying intent. Government's approach, however, is to extend social security and income support through targeted measures, and to contribute also to creating work opportunities and investing further in education, training and health services. This is the more balanced strategy for social progress and sustainable development.')

[4] Cited in Meth (supra) at 29.

[5] For more on compensation for occupational injuries see AA Landman 'Employment Injuries' in Strydom (ed) Essential (supra) 39.

[6] For more on compensation as a result of unemployment, see AA Landman 'Unemployment' in Strydom (ed) Essential (supra) 83.

[7] This type of compensation is paid under the Military Pensions Act 84 of 1976.

[8] This compensation is paid in terms of the Special Pensions Act 69 of 1996.

grants than from child care grants or old-age grants, I will not discuss these forms of compensation any further.[1]

(i) Old-age grants

Old-age grants form the largest portion of the social security budget. From 1 April 2011 the old-age grant is R1140 per month.[2]

Old-age grants have become increasingly important as a measure to relieve poverty. Social change and growth in the number of poor has reduced the ability of traditional support networks and the extended family to provide a safety net for the elderly. Old-age pensions play a critical role in relieving poverty, in part because pension money circulates widely in many poor communities and helps to sustain not only the elderly themselves, but also their relatives. Grandparents, for example, often carry the responsibility of taking care of children orphaned as a result of AIDS.

Unlike its predecessor, s 10 of the Social Assistance Act, 2004 expressly provides for social grants for the aged. Originally, s 10 drew a sex-based distinction with regard to age of eligibility. Women were eligible for an older person's grant at the age of 60 years, while men had to wait until they turned 65. This age discrepancy was challenged in Roberts v Minister of Social Development.[3] In a somewhat confusing judgment, Mavundla J upheld this gender based distinction. He recalled that women (especially African, Coloured and Indian women) had been particularly disadvantaged by Apartheid. It was, therefore, not unfair discrimination to privilege them by allowing them to claim their old-age grants before men. He also held that it would be inappropriate for a court to interfere by forcing the government to provide benefits to both men and women at the age of 65. He held:

> I am of the view that it is the prerogative of the State, to determine its financial resources and the deployment thereof. Outside agencies, and the so called experts, may give an opinion, when requested by the government, as to how to allocate and expend its resources. To elevate such opinions given outside governmental brief, to an authoritative level would be encroaching in the domain of government, and this should not be countenanced by the courts, and I decline to do so.[4]

This reasoning ignores the Constitutional Court's willingness in Khosa to extend social grants to permanent residents despite government's protestations of a lack of funds. More recently, the Court has held as follows:

> This Court's determination of the reasonableness of measures within available resources cannot be restricted by budgetary and other decisions that may well have resulted from a mistaken understanding of constitutional or statutory obligations. In other words, it is not

[1] For more on this form of compensation see the chapter by Piet Myburgh 'Hardship Caused by the State' in Strydom (ed) Essential (supra) at 185.

[2] Increase in Respect of Social Grants GN R285 in Government Gazette 34169 (13 March 2011).

[3] Roberts & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others TPD Case No 32838/05 ('Roberts') available at http://www.communitylawcentre.org.za/court-interventions/equalisation-case-of-pensionable-age (accessed on 10 February 2012).

[4] Ibid at para 40.

> good enough for the City to state that it has not budgeted for something, if it should indeed have planned and budgeted for it in the fulfilment of its obligations.[1]

If Mavundla J had concluded that it was unconstitutional to distinguish between men and women in the allocation of old-age grants, the government's lack of resources should not have been a bar to abolishing that distinction. In any event, in 2008 the Social Assistance Act of 2004 was amended to allow South African men to receive grants at the age of 60.[2]

Old-age pensions are subject to a means test. The value of a grant is reduced on a sliding scale basis if a beneficiary receives additional income above a certain amount. People with incomes over R44 880 per year similarly do not qualify for a state pension.[3] The means test also has an asset component: Those persons with assets worth more than R252 000 (in case of a single person) do not qualify for old-age grants.

Van der Berg describes the operation of the means test as follows:

> In order to prove eligibility for the receipt of the means test elderly persons who wish to apply for social pensions have to provide a detailed account of all their sources of private income and their assets, and this needs to be confirmed by a person familiar with the applicant. If such income and assets fall below the exclusion level such persons qualify to receive a pension.[4]

Determining the income of older persons who are no longer formally employed is, of course, very difficult. Many such older persons are adequately supported by family members or by subsistence farming.[5] Because of these difficulties, the means test is inconsistently applied and is, at times, even unenforceable. As a result, the old-age grant system, as currently conceived, does not effectively target the poorest of the poor.

(ii) Disability grants

The disabled are one of the most vulnerable groups in society.[6] The government's policy for the disabled must do more than recognize their vulnerability and increase their access to grants. It must embrace the disabled as part of mainstream

---

[1] City of Johannesburg Metropolitan Municipality v Blue Moonlight Properties 39 (Pty) Ltd & Another [2011] ZACC 33 at para 74.

[2] Social Assistance Amendment Act 6 of 2008.

[3] Regulations Relating to the Application for and Payment of Social Assistance and the Requirements or Conditions in Respect of Eligibility for Social Assistance GN R898 in Government Gazette 31356 (22 August 2008)('Social Assistance Regulations') regulations 2 and 19 read with Annexure A.

[4] Servaas Van den Berg Issues in South African Social Security (1994) 35.

[5] Ibid at 249.

[6] The Constitutional Court makes clear that vulnerability is a critical consideration in determining whether an individual or group has been discriminated against. See Harksen v Lane 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 49; Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 20; National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at para 126; Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC).

society. The state currently advocates a 'social model of disability'.[1] This model characterizes disability as a 'human rights and development issue' and not merely a welfare issue.[2] The key difference is the recognition of the equal worth of people with disabilities as contributing members of society, rather than recipients of social largesse.

Like old-age grants, eligibility for disability grants is related to gender. Section 9 of the Social Assistance Act provides that a man is eligible for a disability grant if he is between 18 to 59 years old, but women are eligible if they are between 18 and 62 years old. Although this discrepancy in ages for men and women appears to be discriminatory, it could be argued on the authority of Roberts v Minister of Social Development that the discrimination is not unfair. However, even assuming that Roberts was rightly decided, it would seem that different considerations apply to disability grants. Disability is itself a ground of historical discrimination. To deprive some people with disabilities access to grants in order to privilege other people with disabilities, would seem difficult to justify.

A person is only eligible to receive a disability grant if he or she does not receive any other social grant in respect of him or herself. This principle seems mistaken. Although the principle that an individual should not benefit from more than one social grant is generally salient, those who suffer from 'double vulnerability' because of old age and disability should be compensated more generously because they have greater needs. This failure to appreciate the particular needs of people with disabilities may be open to constitutional challenge.

A distinction has to be made between those who receive long-term disability grants — as required by permanently and severely disabled persons living in poverty — and short-term disability grants — as required by persons receiving medical treatment and unable to work during such time.[3]

To be eligible for a disability grant[4] one needs to provide proof that the degree of disability is such that it makes the person unable to earn a living and that he or

[1] See M Olivier, N Smit, ER Kalula & GCZ Mhone Introduction to Social Security (2004) 255. This is the model advocated by Office of the Deputy President White Paper on an Integrated National Disability Strategy (1997) available at www.disabilitygauteng.org/National%20Disability%20Strategy.pdf (accessed on 14 February 2012)('Disability White Paper').

[2] See Disability White Paper (supra) at 9 ('An understanding of disability as a human rights and development issue leads to a recognition and acknowledgement that people with disabilities are equal citizens and should therefore enjoy equal rights and responsibilities. This implies that the needs of every individual are of equal importance, and that needs must be made the basis for planning. It further implies that resources must be employed in such a way as to ensure that every individual has equal opportunities for participation in society. In addition to rights, people with disabilities should have equal obligations within society and should be given the support necessary to enable them to exercise their responsibilities. This means that society must raise its expectations of people with disabilities. A human rights and development approach to disability focuses on the removal of barriers to equal participation and the elimination of discrimination based on disability.')

[3] The latter should take the form of relief available under other regulations such as illness benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act 63 of 2001.

[4] See Social Assistance Act, 2004 s 9, read with Social Assistance Regulations regulation 3.

she does not refuse employment within his or her ability.[1] Nick de Villiers writes that the vague and abstract criteria used to determine disability often invite 'unfair misapplication'.[2] So, for example, a 100 per cent blind man was categorized as temporarily disabled because there 'might' be employment for him in a year's time.[3]

A discrepancy exists between those who are entitled to disability grants and those who actually receive them. Given this discrepancy, the state may well be in breach of its FC s 27 duty to ensure the accessibility of grants and other social services to the disabled.[4] There is, as yet, no legislation specifically designed to protect the rights of persons with disabilities.

The spread of HIV/aids poses further challenges to government in allocating resources for the disabled.[5] Efforts are currently being made to introduce a chronic illness grant for people with HIV and diseases such as tuberculosis. This move will massively expand the pool of people eligible for disability grants. It would also seem that it would engender the use of disability grants as an imperfect proxy for poverty alleviation.

(iii) Child Care Grants

Since 1998 provincial governments have been financing and delivering three social assistance programmes for children:[6] the child support grant; the foster care grant; and the care dependency grant.[7]

(aa) Child Support Grant ('CSG')

The CSG is an important poverty-alleviating grant. The primary purpose of the CSG is to provide a regular source of income to caregivers of children living in poverty to assist them to meet the needs of children in their care. The CSG is

[1] Elsabe Klinck 'People with Disabilities' in M Olivier, N Smit & E Kalula (eds) Social Security: A Legal Analysis (2004) at 327. (Klinck points out that the gross misconceptions with regard to the nature and the extent of many types of disabilities might mean that a person can be objectively fit to find employment but may be unsuccessful in doing so owing to factors unrelated to the stated criterion.) See also Nick de Villiers 'Social Grants and the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act' (2002) 12 SAJHR 320, 348 n 23 (De Villiers writes of the 'misconceived forms, misinterpreted tests, misapplied lapses and mass discontinuations' in the context of the entire disability grant system.)

[2] De Villiers (supra) at 330.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Klinck (supra) at 329. General legislation applies to persons with different disabilities with respect to education, employment, the right to marriage, the right to parenthood/family, political rights, access to court-of-law, the right to privacy and property rights. The following benefits are guaranteed by law to persons with disabilities: health and medical care, training, rehabilitation and counselling, financial security, employment and independent living.

[5] The Department of Social Development has commissioned a study by M Schneider, G Boyce, C Desmond & J Goudge Developing a Policy Response to Provide Social Security Benefits to People with Chronic Diseases (2007).

[6] Judith Streak 'What Benefits will Centralisation of Social Assistance Budgeting and Delivery bring Vulnerable Children?' (2005) IDASA Budget Brief No. 159, available at www.idasa.org/media/uploads/outputs/files/Budget%20Brief%20159.pdf (accessed on 26 February 2012).

[7] The government introduced the CSG in 1998 as a measure to replace the State Maintenance Grants. The other two grants already existed in 1998. Under apartheid, it had benefited primarily white children. Ibid.

currently the state's most extensive and largest social assistance programme in terms of the number of beneficiaries reached.[1]

Since 1 January 2011 the amount of the grant is R270 per month for every child who qualifies. Over the years, the age for eligibility has been raised. In 1998 the cut-off age for eligibility was 6. In 2003/2004, the age of eligibility was raised to 14. On 1 January 2011 the age of eligibility was raised to 17 and on 1 January 2012 the grant was further extended to primary caregivers with children under the age of 18.[2] Despite these welcome extensions, the amount of R270 remains insufficient to meet 'even the minimum needs of a child'.[3] Grants are often used to finance other household needs, which should be provided by the state, such as school fees, water and electricity.[4]

To receive a CSG, two requirements have to be met. First, a person must be the primary caregiver of a child under 18. The caregiver need not be the biological parent of the child — it is sufficient that he or she is the primary person providing for the needs of the child.[5] Second, the applicant must pass the means test based upon personal income. A single caregiver is entitled to a CSG if she earns R2600 or less per month whereas a married couple will be entitled to the grant if the earn R5 200 or less per month. Presently the means test does not take into account the number of people in the household or the number of children being supported by the primary caregiver's income. Interestingly, almost all of the primary caregivers applying for the CSG are women.[6]

Liebenberg criticises the especially burdensome conditions imposed on those seeking childcare grants. In her view, conditions such as requiring the applicant to prove that he or she has not 'without good reason' refused employment are unnecessarily onerous.[7] While Liebenberg argues that the Department of Social Development should concentrate on the progressive improvement of the Basic Income Grant, in the interim she notes that the CSG ought to be increased in order to make a genuinely meaningful impact on the lives of impoverished children.[8]

Children living separately from their parents should be able to claim social security.[9] This was confirmed in Centre for Child Law v Minister of Home Affairs where the court found that unaccompanied foreign children are entitled to social

[1] Aislinn Delany, Zenobia Ismail, Lauren Graham & Yuri Ramkissoon Review of the Child Support Grant, Uses Implementation and Obstacles (June 2008) available at www.unicef.org/southafrica/SAF_resources_childsupport.pdf (accessed on 27 February 2012)('Review of Child Support Grant') 1.

[2] Increase in Respect of Social Grants GN R285 in Government Gazette 34169 (31 March 2011).

[3] See Beth Goldblatt 'Gender and Social Assistance in the First Decade of Democracy: A Case Study of South Africa's Child Support Grant' (2005) 32(2) Politikon 239, 241 (Goldblatt 'Gender') (Goldblatt states that R180 per month (the previous amount of the grant) was not sufficient. It can be argued that in light of the current rate of inflation R270 is also not sufficient).

[4] Ibid at 241.

[5] A primary caregiver may apply for a CSG for any number of his or her biological children. The maximum number of non-biological children for whom a primary caregiver can apply is six.

[6] Review of Child Support Grant (supra) at 1.

[7] Sandra Liebenberg 'The Right to Social Assistance: The Implications of Grootboom for Policy Reform in South Africa' (2001) 12 SAJHR 234, 246 n 75.

[8] Sandra Liebenberg 'Children's Right to Social Security, South Africa's International and Constitutional Obligations' (2001) Socio-Economic Rights Project, UWC 1, 2 n 4.

[9] See Anne Skelton 'Girl's Socio-Economic Rights in South Africa' (2010) 26 SAJHR 141.

services and to accommodation in a place of safety.[1] In a subsequent case, Centre for Child Law and Others v MEC for Education, Gauteng and Others,[2] the High Court dealt with the position of children who had been removed from their families due to abuse or neglect, and placed in a school of industry. Unfortunately, the children found themselves in equally bad or worse conditions when they were placed in the care of the state. The Court ordered both short-term relief in the form of sleeping bags for the children as well as medium-term relief in the form of the appointment of therapeutic services personnel and a process of quality-assurance process.[3] It maintained supervision of the case to ensure the state complied with the order. According to Skelton the state should render similar services to needy children who still live with their parents.[4]

Beth Goldblatt highlights the predicament of women collecting childcare grants as the primary caregivers. In order to collect these grants, women have to pass a means test. This test means that poor unemployed women, who are often not in a position to feed themselves, have less incentive to seek employment if they are to collect the grant they need to support their children.[5] Even more troubling is the exclusion of children living in child-headed households from the child support grant programme. Goldblatt rightly contends that the exclusion is unconstitutional because it breaches the rights to equality, social security and children's socio-economic rights.[6]

The profound effect of the AIDS epidemic on family life in South Africa cannot be ignored in the debate on child care grants. The Children's Institute has cautioned that 'idealising particular care arrangements or rejecting others outright, inappropriately stereotypes the nature of household forms'.[7] The social security system should be sensitive to the realities of South African family arrangements.

(bb) Foster care grant[8]

Foster children are children who are 'in need of care' due to either neglect or abuse.[9] Foster care grants are paid to foster parents in respect of a child who has been removed from parental care due to unfavourable home circumstances.[10] In 2011 the foster care grant was R740 per month. The amount is adjusted almost every

[1] 2005 (6) SA 50 (T).

[2] 2008 (1) SA 223 (T).

[3] For more on this and similar remedies, see Michael Bishop 'Remedies' in Stu Woolman, Michael Bishop & Jason Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) § 9.6.

[4] Skelton (supra) at 158.

[5] Golblatt 'Gender' (supra) at 242 n65.

[6] B Goldblatt & S Liebenberg 'Giving Money to Children: The State's Constitutional Obligation to Provide Child Support Grants to Child Headed Households' (2004) 20 SAJHR 151.

[7] S Giese, H Meintjes, R Croke & R Chamberlain Health and Social Services to Address the Needs of Orphans and Other Vulnerable Children in the context of HIV/AIDS in South Africa (2003) xiv.

[8] The Constitutional Court recently considered the procedure for removing children from their parents in order to place them in foster care. C & Others v Department of Health and Social Development, Gauteng & Others [2012] ZACC 1 at para 75 ('It can never be in the interests of children for their safety or well-being to be endangered. The removal provisions are aimed precisely at preventing this and ensuring that the interests of the children are positively catered for.') year. Significantly, the foster care grant is R470 per month more than the CSG.[1] This higher amount makes the grant the object of greater abuse. Strictly speaking, the foster care grant is not a means-tested grant: in other words the grant does not depend on the foster parent's income. To be eligible to foster a child a person must be a South African citizen, permanent residents or documented refugees over the age of 18.[2] Interestingly, the Social Assistance Act, 2004 makes provision for temporary assistance for those who are in desperate need of support but who have not yet received their foster grant, in the form of the Social Relief of Distress ('SRD').[3] SRD can take the form of a food parcel, a voucher or cash.

[9] Elize Strydom (ed) Essential Social Security Law (2006)('Essential') 171.

[10] Ibid.

(cc) Care dependency grant

A care dependency grant puts the responsibility on government to provide social assistance to children whose parents or primary caregivers are unable to support them financially. Care-dependent children need full-time care at home due to severe mental or psychological disability.[4] A grant is paid to the parent or foster parents of a care-dependent child between the ages of one and eighteen years in their care.[5]

In the case of this grant, a means test is applied to parents or primary caregivers but not to foster parents. Foster parents may therefore access the grant regardless of how much they earn. From 1 April 2011 the Care Dependency Grant is R1140 per month. To qualify for the grant a single parent or caregiver must earn R11 400 or less per month whereas a married couple may only jointly earn R22 800 or less per month.[6] SRD is also available for those whose grants have been approved and are in desperate need of temporary assistance.

56D.6 International Social Security Standards

There are many reasons why international law must be considered in the context of the right to social security. The Final Constitution recognizes the importance of international law and the place of international law.[7] FC s 232 grants customary international law the force of law in the Republic, unless it is inconsistent with the Final Constitution or an Act of Parliament. FC s 233 states that 'when interpreting any legislation, every court must prefer any reasonable interpretation of the legislation that is consistent with international law over any alternative interpretation that is inconsistent with international law.' And, in terms of FC s 39(1)(b), courts 'must consider international law' when interpreting the Bill of Rights.

---

[1] Increase in Social Grants Regulations (supra).
[2] Social Assistance Regulations Regulation 7*(c)*.
[3] Social Assistance Act, 2004 s 13.
[4] Strydom Essential (supra) at 172.
[5] Ibid.
[6] Social Assistance Regulations Annexure D.
[7] For more on international law, see Hennie Strydom & Kevin Hopkins 'International Law' in Stu Woolman, Michael Bishop & Jason Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 30.

As the Grootboom Court noted, international law, including non-binding international instruments, is an important guide to interpreting the rights in the Final Constitution.[1] A treaty can be used as an aid to interpretation even if South Africa has not ratified the relevant treaty, as can official interpretations of the treaty. The Constitutional Court has, for example, regularly relied on General Comments to the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights ('ICESCR') even though it is only a signatory to the document.[2]

Although many international instruments can and should assist in interpreting the right to social security,[3] this chapter will focus on the ILO Conventions, the ICESCR and the European Convention on Human Rights. Since the bulk of social grants are paid to children, I also consider the International Convention on the Rights of the Child.

(a) ILO Conventions

The International Labour Organsiation ('ILO'), has, since its establishment in 1919, played an important role in developing standards for social security. It has done so through both Conventions and Recommendations.[4] The ILO Conventions contain the minimum conditions that should be reflected in a country's law once the country has ratified the instrument.[5]

The Social Security (Minimum Standards) Convention No 102 ('Convention 102') sets the most comprehensive standard with regard to social security. Convention 102 covers nine social risks. Each part of the Convention provides specific standards aimed at guaranteeing the benefits of social security. An ILO Member State can only ratify Convention 102 after complying with the standards relating to at least three of the nine risks: medical care,[6] sickness benefits,[7]

[1] Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC), [2000] ZACC 19 at para 26 (The Grootboom Court, however, indicated that the weight to be attached to a particular principle would vary. The Court stated that 'where a relevant principle of international law binds South Africa, it may be directly applicable.')

[2] See, for example, Grootboom (supra) at paras 29-30; Minister of Health and Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (No 2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC), [2002] ZACC 15 at para 26; and Jaftha v Schoeman & Others, Van Rooyen v Stoltz & Others 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC), [2004] ZACC 25 at para 24.

[3] The Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948), for example, which was adopted 'as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations' also recognizes the right to social security and assistance (arts 22-25).

[4] Whereas Conventions are binding on ratifying states, recommendations are non-binding instruments which provide guidelines for national policy and action. See L Jansen van Rensburg & MP Olivier 'International and Supra-National Law' in M Olivier, N Smit & E Kalula (eds) Social Security: A Legal Analysis (2004) 646.

[5] Elize Strydom 'The Role of the International Labour Organisation in Social Security' in Strydom Essential (supra). See also L Lamarche 'Social Security as Human Right' in D Brand & R Sage (eds) Exploring the Core Content of Socio-Economic Rights: South African and International Perspectives (2003) 109.

[6] Part II arts 7–12.

[7] Part III arts 13–18.

unemployment benefits,[1] old-age benefits,[2] workers' compensation,[3] family,[4] maternity,[5] invalidity,[6] and survivor's benefits.[7] One of the three schemes chosen must be either an old-age benefit, unemployment benefit, invalidity or survivor's benefit. Convention 102 provided an initial framework and was supplemented by subsequent conventions on specific risks.[8]

Convention 102 was designed to accommodate, and to provide flexibility for, less developed countries.[9] Article 3 of Convention 102 allows a state, in the case of insufficient medical or financial capacity, to ratify the Convention and avail itself temporarily of less stringent conditions concerning the duration of benefits and categories of protected persons.[10] Although South Africa has not signed or ratified Convention 102, it remains a vital source to determine the minimum social security obligations imposed by international law.

(b) The International Convention on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights ('ICESCR')

South Africa signed the ICESCR on 3 October 1994. It has not yet ratified the Convention. As a result, the ICESCR is not yet binding on South Africa under international law and does not have any direct legal effect under South African domestic law. The act of signing is however not without consequence; under the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, South Africa may not undertake steps designed to flout provisions of the ICESCR, and to refrain from 'acts which would defeat the object and purpose of the treaty.'[11]

The wording of many of the provisions in the Bill of Rights closely resembles the provisions of the ICESCR. It is therefore only natural to have recourse to the interpretation offered in respect of the Covenant when interpreting Chapter 2 of the Final Constitution.

Article 9 of the ICESCR 'recognize[s] the right of everyone to social security, including social insurance.' The Covenant also makes explicit provision for social

[1] Part IV arts 19-24.
[2] Part V arts 25-30.
[3] Part VI arts 31-38.
[4] Part VII arts 39-45.
[5] Part VIII arts 46-52.
[6] Part IX arts 53-58.
[7] Part X arts 59-64
[8] See Lamarche (supra) at 113. Convention 102 was subsequently amended by the adoption of a few specific social security conventions including Convention 128 on Invalidity, Old Age and Survivors' Benefit (1967) and Convention 130 on Medical Care and Sickness Benefits (1969).
[9] See also article 19(2) of the ILO Constitution which provides that the General Conference of the ILO must have due regard to those countries in which climactic conditions, the imperfect development of industrial organization, or other special circumstances make industrial conditions substantially different. The General Conference will then suggest the modifications which it considers necessary to meet the need of such countries.
[10] Ibid.
[11] Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties (1969) 8 ILM 679, art 18. See also Limburg Principles on the Implementation of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, reprinted in (1987) 9 Human Rights Quarterly 122 ('Limburg Principles'); General Comment 3 'The Nature of State Parties Obligations' (Article 2 of the Covenant) (5th Session 1990) UN Doc E/1991/23 ('GC 3'); Jansen van Rensburg & Olivier (supra).

security for mothers.[1] The Committee on Economic Social and Cultural Rights ('the Committee') provided its interpretation of the right to social security in General Comment 19, adopted in 2007.[2] The General Comment recognizes the central importance of social security as a means to the realization of other socio-economic rights: 'The right to social security is of central importance in guaranteeing human dignity for all persons when they are faced with circumstances that deprive them of their capacity to fully realize their Covenant rights.'[3]

The Committee identified four core elements of the right: (a) the social security system must be available;[4] (b) it must cover the nine social risks and contingencies identified in Convention 102;[5] (c) the system must be adequate in amount and duration;[6] and (d) the system must be accessible in terms of coverage, eligibility, affordability participation and physical accessibility.[7] This closely tracks the content that the Committee has given to other rights, such as the right to education.[8]

The general principles of the ICESCR are also useful in interpreting the scope of the state's obligations under FC s 27(1)(c). However, they need to be read in light of the growing South African case law on the FC ss 26(2) and 27(2).[9] Article 2 of the ICESCR provides:

> Each State Party to the Present Convention undertakes to take steps, individually and through international assistance and co-operation, especially economic and technical, to the maximum of its available resources, with a view to achieving progressively the full realization of the rights recognized in the present Convention by all appropriate means, including particularly the adoption of legislative measures.

This article can assist in interpreting the concept of 'progressive realisation'. Like the ILO Convention, the ICESCR also makes provision for the particular circumstances of developing countries. However, this clause should not be interpreted as allowing states to defer indefinitely efforts to ensure the enjoyment of Covenant rights.

Article 3 has particular significance for South Africa:

> Developing countries, with due regard to human rights and their national economy, may determine to what extent they would guarantee the economic rights recognized in the present Covenant to non-nationals.

---

[1] ICESCR art 10(2) reads: 'Special protection should be accorded to mothers during a reasonable period before and after childbirth. During such period working mothers should be accorded paid leave or leave with adequate social security benefits.'

[2] General Comment 19 'The Right to Social Security' (Article 9 of the Convention) (39th Session, 2007) UN Doc E/C.12/GC/19 ('GC 19').

[3] GC 19 (supra) at para 1.

[4] Ibid at para 11.

[5] Ibid at paras 12-21.

[6] Ibid at para 22.

[7] Ibid at paras 23-27.

[8] See Stu Woolman & Michael Bishop 'Education' in Stu Woolman, Michael Bishop & Jason Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 57.

[9] See Grootboom (supra); TAC (supra); Mazibuko & Others v City of Johannesburg & Others 2010 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2010 (3) BCLR 239 (CC), [2009] ZACC 28. Sandra Liebenberg Socio-economic Rights: Adjudication under a Transformative Constitution (2010).

Notwithstanding their level of national wealth, State Parties have to move immediately and quickly as possible towards the realization of economic, social and cultural rights. The speed at which rights will be implemented will depend on the nature of the right. The non-discrimination provisions of the ICESCR, for example, were meant to be implemented immediately. Socio-economic rights may also not be subject to 'deliberate retrogressive measures.'[1]

With respect to the proviso — 'to the maximum of its available resources' — the Limburg Principles state that this requirement obliges State Parties to ensure minimum subsistence rights for everyone, regardless of the level of economic development in a given country.[2] That is, when it comes to the use of available resources, the state should give priority to the realization of rights recognized in the Covenant: to do this, the state must assure everyone the satisfaction of subsistence requirements, as well as the provision of essential services.[3]

(c) UN Convention on the Rights of the Child

Children's rights are guaranteed through the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child ('CRC') and in the African region through the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child ('ACRWC').[4] South Africa ratified the CRC on 16 June 1995. According to article 6 of the CRC, State Parties are under an obligation to ensure the survival and development of children to the maximum extent possible. This article gives rise to numerous derivative social security rights, including the right to health care and a standard of living that meets the need for clothing, shelter and education. The fundamental principle of the Convention, captured in art 3, is that all actions concerning children must be in the best interest of the child. In that respect, the CRC is in harmony with FC s 28.[5]

For the purposes of social security, the following provisions of the CRC are particularly relevant:

(i) Article 18 provides that the state should provide appropriate assistance to parents and legal guardians in the performance of their child-rearing duties.[6]
(ii) Article 23 affords disabled children the right to special care and assistance.[7]

---

[1] GC 3 (supra) at para. 9. The General Comments to the ICESCR have an important impact on the interpretation of the right to social security. Particularly important are General Comments No 1 (1989), No 3 (1990), No 4 (1991), No 5 (1994) and No 6 (1995).

[2] The Limburg Principles of 1987 are a commentary on the duties of State Parties to the ICESCR and constitute an example of soft law for the purpose of social security.

[3] GC 3 (supra) at para. 13.

[4] The ACRWC does not, however, contain a right to social security for children. The only provision relating to maintenance is art 18(3) which states that no child is to be deprived of maintenance due to the marital circumstances of the parent.

[5] For more on the relationship between the CRC and FC s 28, see Adrian Friedman, Angelo Pantazis & Ann Skelton 'Children's Rights' in Stu Woolman, Michael Bishop & Jason Brickhill (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2009) Chapter 47.

[6] CRC art 18(3) reads: 'States Parties shall take all appropriate measures to ensure that children of working parents have the right to benefit from child-care services and facilities for which they are eligible.'

[7] CRC art 23(1) reads: 'States Parties recognize that a mentally or physically disabled child should enjoy a full and decent life, in conditions which ensure dignity, promote self-reliance and facilitate the child's active participation in the community.'

(iii) Article 26 provides children with a the right to benefit from social security.[1]

(iv) Article 27 provides that every child have the right to a standard of living which is adequate to cater for the child's physical, mental, spiritual, moral and social development. Although the primary responsibility lies with the parents it is the duty of the state to assist parents.

As a party to the Convention, South Africa must submit reports to the Committee on the Rights of the Child ('the Child Committee') describing the measures it has adopted to give effect to the rights of the child. South Africa submitted its first report in 1997. In its response, the Child Committee expressed pressing concerns about a number of social welfare issues.[2] However, much has changed since 1997, so the analysis of the Child Committee will have to be re-evaluated against the current law and facts.

(d) Africa

The African Charter on Human and People's Rights ('African Charter') only directly recognizes a limited right to social security.[3] However, the African Commission on Human and People's Rights ('African Commission') has held that the right 'can be derived from a joint reading of a number of rights guaranteed under the Charter including (but not limited to) the rights to life, dignity, liberty, work, health, food, protection of the family and the right to the protection of the aged and the disabled.'[4] The African Commission defined the minimum content of this implied right as follows:

> Ensure access to a social security scheme that provides a minimum essential level of benefits to all individuals and families that will enable them to acquire at least essential health care, basic shelter and housing, water and sanitation, foodstuffs, and the most basic forms of education consistent with human life, security and dignity.[5]

[1] CRC art 26 reads:

'(1) States Parties shall recognize for every child the right to benefit from social security, including social insurance, and shall take the necessary measures to achieve the full realization of this right in accordance with their national law.'

(2) The benefits should, where appropriate, be granted, taking into account the resources and the circumstances of the child and persons having responsibility for the maintenance of the child, as well as any other consideration relevant to an application for benefits made by or on behalf of the child.'

[2] Committee on the Rights of the Child Consideration of Reports Submitted by States Parties under Article 44 of the Convention: Addendum: South Africa (1999) CRC/C/51/Add.2 (The most pressing concerns articulated in the response were the inadequate prioritisation of budgetary resources to ensure the rights of children, the phasing out of the state maintenance grant, the high incidence of child mortality and the high incidence of drug and substance abuse among youth. The Committee also stressed the importance of South Africa's ratification of the ICESCR. The ratification of the ICESCR and the ILO Convention 102 of 1952 might well assist South Africa in bringing its current social security policies into line with the international standards ratified in these instruments.)

[3] African Charter art 18(4) provides that: 'The aged and the disabled shall also have the right to special measures of protection in keeping with their physical or moral needs.'

[4] African Commission Principles and Guidelines on the Implementation of Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (2010) at para 81.

[5] Ibid at para 82*(i)*.

(e) SADC

On a Southern African level, there has been significant interest in the development and promotion of social security. Many countries in the region must confront deep levels of poverty, the impact of HIV and AIDS, weak economic conditions and the absence of appropriate institutional frameworks.[1] These problems naturally have an impact on social security.

In recent years, the question of social security has been high on the agenda of the Southern African Development Community ('SADC').[2] Three important SADC documents deal with social security: (a) the Founding Treaty of SADC;[3] (b) the Charter of Fundamental Social Rights in SADC of 2003 (the 'SADC Charter');[4] and (c) the 2007 Code on Social Security ('Code on Social Security').[5]

Of these instruments, the Founding Treaty of SADC forms the main regional basis for the development of social security in SADC countries. The objectives as stipulated in the Treaty include the promotion of both economic and social development and the establishment of common ideals and institutions. Importantly, article 5 of the SADC treaty states that it is an objective of SADC to 'alleviate poverty, enhance the quality of life of the peoples of Southern Africa and support the socially disadvantaged through regional integration'.

One of the objectives of the SADC Charter is to 'promote the establishment and harmonisation of social security schemes'.[6] To meet this objective it contains specific provisions for rights to social security for both workers,[7] and non-workers.[8]

The Code on Social Security contains aims to further promote social security in the region. It specifically recognizes a right to social security[9] and refers back to both the SADC Charter[10] and the ILO Convention 102.[11] It provides a set of principles and standards and a monitoring framework.[12] An innovative feature of the Code is that instead of enforcing standards by following the normal route of international monitoring, the Code introduces a promotional independent

---

[1] B Jordaan, E Kalula & E Strydom (eds) Understanding Social Security (2009)('Understanding') 45. The Southern African Development Community was formed in 1980. It consists of a loose alliance of nine Southern African states: Angola, Botswana, Democratic Republic of Congo, Lesotho, Malawi, Mauritius, Mozambique, Namibia, Seychelles, South Africa, Swaziland, Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe.

[2] Jordaan, Kalula & Strydom (ed) Understanding (supra) at 45.

[3] Available at www.chr.up.ac.za/undp/subregional/docs/sadc8.pdf (accessed on 21 February 2012*)*.

[4] Available at http://www.sadc.int/index/browse/page/171 (accessed on 21 February 2012).

[5] Available at http://www.ilo.org/gimi/gess/RessFileDownload.do?ressourceId=10371 (accessed on 24 February 2012).

[6] SADC Charter art 1*(e)*.

[7] SADC Charter art 10(1) reads: 'Member States shall create an enabling environment so that every worker in the Region shall have a right to adequate social protection and shall, regardless of status and the type of employment, enjoy adequate social security benefits.'

[8] SADC Charter art 10(2) reads: 'Persons who have been unable to either enter or re-enter the labour market and have no means of subsistence shall be entitled to receive sufficient resources and social assistance.'

[9] Code on Social Security arts 4-6.

[10] Code on Social Security art 4.2.

[11] Code on Social Security art 4.3.

[12] Jordaan, Kalula & Strydom (ed) Understanding (supra) at 51.

committee of experts.[1] The Committee is tasked with monitoring compliance with the Code and making recommendations within the relevant SADC structures. The Code emphasizes the importance of solidarity and redistribution[2] as key components of a social security system aimed at achieving greater equality between rich and poor. Intriguingly, the Code recognizes that the State is not able, on its own, to fully provide for the social security needs of the SADC populations. It emphasizes the importance of a multi-actor approach[3] and specifically mentions special contingencies relevant in the SADC region such as political conflict and natural disasters.[4]

In spite of the laudable objectives of the SADC system, many questions remain with regard to implementation and enforcement. The virtual suspension of the activities of the SADC Tribunal during the SADC 2010 summit casts serious doubt on the effectiveness of the SADC system.[5]

56D.7 Non-Discrimination

It is essential that all those in need should have equal access to social security. In line with international trends, South Africa should develop progressively towards a wider and deeper sense of social obligation.[6]

At present, social security in South Africa is not all-inclusive[7] and shows insufficient respect for the principles of equality and non-discrimination.

In the remainder of this section, I consider a few prominent examples of discrimination in the social security system:

First, many of the relevant statutes[8] extend social security to those who qualify as an 'employee'. This means that formal employment becomes a requirement for access to social security benefits.[9] As a result, a vast proportion of the economically active population is excluded from eligibility for social security. Those who are

[1] Code on Social Security art 21.3.

[2] Code on Social Security art 2.2*(a)*.

[3] Code on Social Security art 2.2*(c)*.

[4] Code on Social Security art 18.

[5] Currently only four (of ten) judges have been appointed and the Tribunal does not currently hear cases. Brigitte Weidlich 'SADC Tribunal in limbo' The Namibian (11 November 2010).

[6] See Helen Bolderson & Deborah Mabbet 'Non-Discriminating Social Policy?' Policy Scenarios for Meeting Needs without Categorization' in Jochen Clasen (ed) What Future for Social Security? Debates and Reforms in National and Cross-National Perspective (2001) 53.

[7] This is consistent with the objective of 'comprehensive' social security as recommended by Committee of Inquiry into a Comprehensive System of Social Security for South Africa Transforming the Present — Protecting the Future (2002) 41 available at www.cdhaarmann.com/Publications/Taylor%20 report.pdf (accessed on 26 February 2012)(The Committee explained comprehensive social security as follows: 'Comprehensive social protection for South Africa seeks to provide the basic means for all people living in the country to effectively participate and advance in social and economic life, and in turn to contribute to social and economic development, Comprehensive social protection is broader than the traditional concept of social security, and incorporates developmental strategies and programmes designed to ensure, collectively, at least a minimum acceptable living standard for all citizens.') unemployed, self-employed, independent contractors or informally employed are excluded from receiving certain classes of social security benefits.

[8] See, for example, Compensation for Occupational Injuries and Diseases Act 130 of 1993; Unemployment Insurance Act 63 of 2001.

[9] Elize Strydom (ed) Essential Social Security Law (2006)('Essential') 262

Basson has argued that excluding certain categories of workers from the social security legislation amounts to indirect discrimination on the basis of race or sex.[1] She points out that black women overwhelmingly dominate the domestic worker sector. Excluding domestic workers from certain forms of social security coverage therefore impacts on them disproportionately and could amount to unfair discrimination in terms of FC s 9(3). The position of migrant workers is similarly precarious.[2] Since migrant workers are exposed to the same risks as any other worker in South Africa (such as the risk of large scale retrenchments), it can be argued that they should benefit equally from the South African social security system. The portability of social security has thus far received no attention in our constitutional jurisprudence.[3]

Second, Goldblatt writes that women's access to social security in South Africa requires significant improvement.[4] She argues that the social security system should better reflect a feminist vision in determining the content of grants affecting women.[5] A truly inclusive social security framework should, Goldblatt writes, consider the needs of female non-citizens.[6]

Third, in the realm of retirement funds, discrimination on the basis of race is still rife. This was vividly illustrated in Leonard Dingler Employee Representative Council v Leonard Dingler (Pty) Ltd.[7] In Leonard Dingler black employees were treated differently from white employees. All black employees were paid on a weekly basis while white employees were paid monthly. The company insisted that only monthly-paid employees were permitted to join the staff benefit fund.[8] This was a clear example of direct discrimination on the basis of race.

I discussed the former disparity in eligibility of men and women for old-age grants earlier.[9] In spite of the fact that men and women can now both claim pensions at the age of 60, research has shown that the take up rate is lower for women than for men.[10] Commentators have speculated that this is caused by government officials' discriminatory attitudes towards women.

Fourth, those individuals living with HIV should, arguably, be entitled to a disability grant. According to the current state of the law, however, those HIV

[1] Anneli Basson 'Discrimination in Social Security Legislation' in Strydom (ed) Essential (supra) at 264.

[2] See Redson Kapindu 'Social Protection for Malawian Migrants in Johannesburg: Access, Exclusion and Survival Strategies' (2011) 11 African Human Rights Law Journal 93.

[3] Daleen Millard 'Migration and the Possibility of Social Security Benefits: The Position of Non-citizens in the Southern African Development Community' (2008) 8 African Human Rights Law Journal 37.

[4] Beth Goldblatt 'The Right To Social Security — Addressing Women's Poverty and Disadvantage' (2009) 25 SAJHR 442.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid.

[7] (1998) 19 ILJ 285 (LC).

[8] The court concluded that by treating black employees differently from white employees, the company directly discriminated on the basis of race.

[9] §56D.4*(c)*(i) above.

[10] Basson (supra) at 268.

positive individuals who are unemployed but still fit for work are not eligible for a disability grant.[1] The policy of the Department of Social Development is that a person with HIV is only eligible for benefits if he or she has a CD4 count of below 50 or a major opportunistic infection. Although this seems to reflect the Constitutional Court's approach in Hoffmann,[2] this policy can be said to be discriminatory because it creates a perverse incentive. It could encourage HIV-positive people deliberately not to take their Aids medication in order to stay 'ill enough' to qualify for a disability grant. There is a plausible argument that an unemployed HIV-positive person should be deemed to be unable to support him or herself and should, therefore, receive a disability grant. On this reasoning, the policy will not meet the Grootboom reasonableness test since it does not priorities the needs of the poorest of the poor.

[1] See Aids Law Project HIV/AIDS and the Law: A Resource Manual (2nd Edition, 2001).

[2] Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC), [2000] 12 BLLR 1365 (CC), [2000] ZACC 17.

57 Education

Stu Woolman & Michael Bishop

57.1 Introduction: Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité. 57–1
57.2 FC 29(1) 57–6
(a) Section 29(1)(a): Basic Education 57–6
(i) Nature of the right 57–6
(aa) Education as empowerment 57–6
(bb) Negative dimension and positive dimension 57–8
(x) Negative dimension 57–8
(y) Positive dimension 57–9
(ii) Content of the positive right. 57–15
(aa) Defining 'Basic Education' 57–15
(x) Goals and years 57–15
(y) Criteria for assessment 57–18
(aaa) Availability/Adequacy 57–19
(bbb) Accessibility 57–21
(xx) Non-discrimination. 57–21
(yy) Financial accessibility 57–24
(zz) Physical accesibility 57–30
(ccc) Acceptability. 57–30
(ddd) Adaptability 57–32
(iii) Adult Basic Education 57–33
(iv) Looking in the wrong place for 'Free and equal' public schools 57–35
(b) FC s 29(1)(b): Further Education 57–36
(i) Nature of the right 57–36
(ii) Content of the right. 57–37
(aa) Defining 'Further Education'. 57–37
(bb) Negative dimension of the right 57–38
(cc) Positive dimension of the right 57–41

57.3 FC s 29(2): Language rights in public schools. 57–42
(a) Historical background 57–42
(b) Drafting history of the language provisions in the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution 57–48
(c) Legal framework for admissions policies and language policies in public schools 57–55
(i) Language rights and the Final Constitution. 57–55
(ii) FC s 29(2) and the right to receive education in the official language of choice. 57–59
(iii) FC s 29(2) and the right to receive education in the official language of choice, where that education is reasonably practicable. 57–59
(iv) State's obligation to ensure effective access to and implementation of the right to instruction in an official language and its relationship to single medium public schools. 57–60
(v) Statutory and regulatory framework for linguistic rights 57–61
(vi) Case law on single medium public schools: Matukane; Middelburg; Mikro; Seodin; Ermelo 57–63
(vii) Current status of single medium public schools . . 57–73
57.4 FC s 29(3): Language rights in independant schools 57–76
(a) Community rights and language rights in a liberal constitutional order 57–76
(b) State attempt's to control independent schools. 57–77
(c) Legal framework for admissions policies in independent schools 57–78
(i) The Final Constitution 57–79
(ii) Statutory framework and statutory interpretation. . 57–80
(aa) SASA and PEPUDA 57–80
(bb) PEPUDA and admissions policies at independent schools. 57–83
(cc) PEPUDA's test for admissions at independent schools 57–86
(i) Constitutional constraints on PEPUDA in the context of independent school admissions 57–90
(aa) Rule-following as a condition of membership 57–90

(bb) Expulsion, rule-following and fair hearings 57–91
(cc) Capture 57–92
(dd) Constitutive attachments 57–93
(ee) Associational rights, self-governance and pluralism 57–94
(ii) Common law norms and the proper construction of PEPUDA in the context of the admissions policies of independent schools 57–94
(iii) Conclusions about constitutional and common law constraints on the PEPUDA test for admissions policies of independent schools 57–95
57.5 FC s 29(4): State subsidies for independent educational institutions 57–95

29 Education

(1) Everyone has the right—

(a) to a basic education, including adult basic education; and

(b) to further education, which the state, through reasonable measures, must make progressively available and accessible.

(2) Everyone has the right to receive education in the official language or languages of their choice in public educational institutions where that education is reasonably practicable. In order to ensure the effective access to, and implementation of, this right, the state must consider all reasonable educational alternatives, including single medium institutions, taking into account—

(a) equity;

(b) practicability; and

(c) the need to redress the results of past racially discriminatory laws and practices.

(3) Everyone has the right to establish and maintain, at their own expense, independent educational institutions that—

(a) do not discriminate on the basis of race;

(b) are registered with the state; and

(c) maintain standards that are not inferior to standards at comparable public educational institutions.

(4) Subsection (3) does not preclude state subsidies for independent educational institutions.

> It would not be a sign of health if such an important social interest as education were not also an arena of struggles, practical and theoretical. . . . [However,] [i]t is the business of an intelligent theory of education to ascertain the causes for the conflicts that exist and then, instead of taking one side or the other, to indicate a plan of operations proceeding from a level deeper and more inclusive than is represented by the practices and ideas of the contending parties.
>
> John Dewey Education and Experience (1938)

57.1 INTRODUCTION: LIBERTÉ, EGALITÉ, FRATERNITÉ

This brief introduction traces the historical, economic and political antecedents that led to the current constitutional and statutory framework for education. It begins with the widely accepted — but radically incomplete — account of how the National Party's belated attempts to decentralize control over public school education, and subsequent concerns about Afrikaner succession, resulted in the current, and significant, degree of constitutional and statutory control exercised by provincial governments, unions, principals, parents, learners and school governing bodies (SGBs). Or to put it more pointedly, the standard account emphasizes how the weakness of the ANC-led government in 1994 required it to cede authority to multiple groups in order to avoid concentrating power in a group that might contest the government's new agenda.

* The authors would like to thank Ross Kriel and Faranaaz Veriava for their contributions to this chapter. However, the positions we stake out in this chapter are substantially different than those of our colleagues, and we bear sole responsibility for the conclusions reached and the manner in which we arrived at them. We would also like to thank the editors of the South African Journal of Human Rights, Perspectives in Education, the Stellenbosch Law Review, and the Journal on Education and the Law for permission to use material from articles published by Stu Woolman and Brahm Fleisch in those journals.

Our historical account, culled from the travaux préparatoires of both the Interim Constitution[1] and Final Constitution[2], as well as extant education framework legislation (The South African Schools Act, The National Education Policy Act and The Educators Employment Act), demonstrates that appeasing the privileged or the provincial bureaucracy or the unions is but a small part of this story. School Governing Body autonomy, for example, was driven to a very large extent by the fundamentally democratic — not autocratic — commitment of African National Congress to grassroots politics.[3]

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').

[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Act 108 of 1996) ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[3] See S Woolman & B Fleisch 'Democracy, Social Cohesion and School Governing Bodies' (forthcoming 2008). Extant SGB autonomy has its roots in the very history of liberation movements — and in particular, the ANC. Many of the State's early education initiatives were predicated on the assumption that sustained school improvements must develop organically out of community participation and that community participation is contingent upon stronger (read autonomous) school governance structures. See Gauteng Department of Education 'Gatueng School Renovation Programme Implementation Plan' (1994)('Physical reconstruction and visible improvement in conditions at schools are tied to an incentive for strengthened school governance structures.') See also Gauteng Department of Education 'Circular No. 2' (1995)('The key to successful school development lies in the capacity of communities at all levels to guide and manage their own development. . . . In the short term, a priority is on the revitalization of participatory structure [sic] at the school governance level, and creating the space for their development and empowerment'); Gauteng Department of Public Works 'Evaluation of the Gauteng Schools Toilet Building Project' (1997) 10–11 ('It was envisaged that community participation would prompt greater civil society participation in school governance, and stimulate emerging builders. . . . It was believed that the toilet project would help to transfer power from the state to school governing bodies.') See, generally, African National Congress 'The Reconstruction and Development Programme' (1994)('[T]he people affected must participate in decision-making. . . . Democracy is not confined to periodic elections. It is, rather, an active process enabling everyone to contribute to reconstruction and development'); ANC National Education Co-ordinating Committee National Education Policy Initiative (1992)(Calls for dual structures of power: the state, on the one hand, community stakeholders on the other.) It is, amongst other things, a testament to the ANC's commitment to democracy that a party without a real opposition would divest itself of decision-making power based upon its belief that local schools and local communities would be best served by local political structures — in this case the SGB. However, the ANC's belief in the need of a strong central government to effect transformation may have militated against giving too much power to the community. See Y Sayed 'Discourses of the Policy of Educational Decentralisation in South Africa since 1994: An Examination of the South African Schools Act' (1999) 29 (2) Compare 141, 143 (Sayed notes that community representatives — unlike parents — do not have voting status on SGBs in terms of SASA. But it seems reasonable to ask why community representatives, who have no direct tie to the school, should have such status?) But see R Mahlerbe 'Centralization of Power in Education: Have Provinces Become National Agents?' (2006) 2 TSAR 237 (Contends that the ANC believed that 'political power should centralized as far as possible.')

The drafting history discloses how the multiple constituencies with whom the State had to contend and the conflicting imperatives within the State's own agenda led to greater decentralization of decision-making. Three points need to be made about this commitment to decentralization. First, the partial decentralization of decision-making may have had less to do with a belief that local is always lekker, and more to do with the State's need to ensure that no one interest group would be able to use the law as a means of organizing in opposition to the State. Secondly, the partial decentralization of decision-making flows from inevitable conflicts between deontological, utilitarian and communitarian commitments that manifest in the ANC's political agenda (as it would in any well-developed, non-reductionist political theory.) Thirdly, while the de facto policy of choice that arose out of this conscious attempt to dismantle the old bureaucracy and to distribute power throughout the new educational system was not actually anticipated by the ANC, the new government did realize that this particular aspect of its agenda might

Our specific views, about FC s 29(1), FC s 29(2), FC s 29(3) and FC s 29(4), as developed in Parts 2, 3, 4 and 5 of this chapter, are premised on three general assumptions. First, the legal space we describe is a variable space.[1] That space expands and contracts as a result of the political exigencies of a given historical moment. Second, the legal history of education in South Africa follows a discernible narrative arc. The South African system of public education is no longer the product of a parlous, fragile State: it is the product of a government with a firm have such unintended consequences. The drafting history is, as a result, replete with references to the provisional nature of the structures being created by the State and the State's commitment to revisiting and to revamping those structures as it consolidated its power and it shifted its policy imperatives. Indeed, the state also appeared to put on notice those parties who might conclude that the political vicissitudes experienced by the State in such variable space lay beyond the government's control. In the Department of Education's second white paper, then Minister of Education Bengu wrote:

> Policies are stated in general terms and cannot provide for all situations. Our legacy of injustice and mistrust continuously throws up problems which need the wisdom of Solomon to settle. In this protracted transitional period, in which new policies for a democratic society are being developed and implemented, the chances are that we shall collectively make many mistakes, either in conception or execution. They must be recognised and corrected. The possibility of damage will be reduced if new policies are based on knowledge of our charter of fundamental rights and on sufficient consultation with those who are affected by them, if conflicts are negotiated, and if principled compromises are sought.

See Department of Education White Paper 2: The Organisation, Governance and Funding of Schools General Notice 1229 (November 1995) 6 ('White Paper II' or 'WP II'). The preceding paragraph suggests that the new government's understanding was not limited to the proposition that its imperatives pulled in numerous directions and that no amount of analysis could anticipate the manner in which a complex set of policy initiatives would interact with a dynamic social environment. Minister Bengu seems to being saying that the State understood that it would have an opportunity to revisit these experiments in education at some later date and to revise them as circumstances required. And so it has.

[1] Why characterize FC s 29 and South African education law as a variable legal space? Every legal regime is a variable space in which general legal norms — the axes — interact with a range of variables — political exigencies and economic conditions — to generate a range of possible outcomes. The universe of South African education law that came into being in 1994 with the Interim Constitution was determined by an unusual concatenation of reconciliation politics and liberation politics. The ANC's liberation movement turned government possessed an ideological commitment to, and a well-founded faith in, the power of the people to effect real change. As a result, the ANC crafted a legal regime for education that sought to tap the transformative potential of local communities and was designed to rebuild a decimated school system from the ground up. At the same time, the new State, though highly centralized in terms of actual political power and policy determination, relied heavily on provincial government for the execution of its directives — and for the parents of learners in privileged communities to run their own schools. By choice, and by necessity, the South African government created a legal regime for education that permitted a broad array of disparate groups to determine outcomes and that produced results that few in government could have contemplated and even fewer would have desired. This tension between liberation and reconciliation dominated the early documents produced by the Department of Education. See, for example, Department of Education White Paper 2: The Organisation, Governance and Funding of Schools General Notice 1229 (November 1995) 5 ('The Review Committee proposes that the new structure of school organisation should create the conditions for developing a coherent, integrated, flexible national system which advances redress, the equitable use of public resources, an improvement in educational quality across the system, and democratic governance. The new structure must be brought about through a well- managed process of negotiated change, based on the understanding that each public school should embody a partnership between the state and a local community.') See also Sayed (supra) at 142 ('Both the previous ruling National Party and the opposition anti-apartheid movement shared a commitment to some form of educational decentralization albeit for very different political and ideological reasons.') grip on the levers of power.[1] This narrative arc correlates with the state's attempt — with varying degrees of success – to use the variable space of the law to effect changes in education policy that more closely approximate the ANC's current political agenda. Third, and most importantly perhaps, that complex political agenda embraces egalitarian, utilitarian, democratic and communitarian commitments. The ANC as a governing party in the 21st century, and no longer a liberation movement in the 20th, pursues: (a) an egalitarian agenda that aims to provide a formally equal start for all its denizens; (b) a utilitarian agenda designed to create the greatest good for the greatest number of its learners; (c) and a communitarian agenda that privileges, in some respects, the face-to-face relationships found in kin, clan and commune over the more abstract relationships that bind us as citizens. How do these competing political claims — evident in any social democratic state — play themselves out in our Final Constitution, the enabling legislation and the case law?[2]

[1] The politics of education in South Africa, circa 1994, is the politics of a fragile state. The ANC government in 1994 inherited a system of education that ill-served the needs of the vast majority of South Africans. The dimensions of this fragility are well-documented: a lack of managerial legitimacy; inequitable funding; poor physical plants; inadequate teacher training; insufficient provision of and access to necessary social services in the related domains of housing, health care, nutrition, and transportation. Our secondary interest, in this chapter, is to document the manner in which the state has attempted to use the Final Constitution and other forms of law to move education from this parlous state to one that effectively delivers equal access to an adequate education to all learners. Take the subject matter of school fees: which we discuss at greater length below. See also B Fleisch & S Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of School Fees: A Reply to Roithmayr' (2004) 22 (1) Perspectives in Education 111; D Roithmayr 'Access, Adequacy and Equality: The Constitutionality of School Fee Financing in Public Education' (2003) 19 SAJHR 382. Shortly after ascending to power in 1994, the ANC promulgated several statutes — and a host of regulations — that permitted school fees. Although it ceded authority to SGBs to make significant decisions about such things as fees, policy-makers underestimated the ability of parents to organize. They believed that few SGBs would secure the statutorily required 50% approval rate of parents for fees if they attempted to charge excessive amounts. This initial miscalculation meant that the state did not anticipate the lengths to which the poor would go to fund the education of their children in fee-expensive schools and the concomitant interest some schools would have in excluding learners who would not or could not pay fees. It is also underestimated the extent to which information asymmetries would skew the distribution of educational goods. Ten years later, the state has a much better conception of the interests that shape and distort the market. The national DoE has promulgated amendments to the South African Schools Act designed to correct various market distortions. It divests SGBs of some of their current authority to hire teachers. It eliminates fees for the poorest 40% of schools and pushes for tighter enforcement of exemptions. It requires the reissuance of circulars that inform learners and their parents of their rights with regard to such exemptions. All of these initiatives are designed to minimize information asymmetries and to promote greater access to existing educational resources. The fragile State that governed from the mid-nineties through the fin de siecle did not possess the requisite power to effect such changes. An ever-strengthening state has announced its intention to reshape the environment in a manner that moves beyond reconciliation to redress.

[2] For a demonstration of how egalitarian, democratic, communitarian and libertarian commitments in our basic law and in our enabling education have produced a de facto (as opposed to a de jure) commitment to school choice, see S Woolman & B Fleisch 'South Africa's Unintended Experiment in School Choice: How the National Education Policy Act, the 'South Africa Schools Act and the Employment of Educators Act Create the Enabling Conditions for Quasi-Markets in Schools' (2006) Journal of Education and the Law 31; S Woolman & B Fleisch 'Creating Quasi-Markets in Public Schools' (2006) Perspectives in Education 1. Woolman and Fleisch focus on three pieces of enabling legislation — the National Education Policy Act (NEPA), the South African Schools Act (SASA) and the Employment of

Take the right to basic education, and to adult basic education, granted in FC s 29(1). They are unequivocally granted to all. And they are granted in a manner unqualified by standard socio-economic tropes such as 'available resources', 'progressive realization' or 'reasonable legislative measures'. Thus, the commitment to basic education looks to be unswervingly egalitarian. Look again. Nowhere does FC s 29(1) indicate that 'basic education' means 'free education'. It doesn't. Basic education may mean charging fees — under the current statutory framework — in the top three quintiles of schools. These poor, working class, middle class and upper middle class schools are manifestly unequal, and are generally better than their poorer brethren in the lowest two quintiles. And the Final Constitution permits such inequality (at least for the moment). The drafters of the Final Constitution also undertook a utilitarian approach to basic education premised upon the view that allowing school fees and school choice would allow for meaningful cross-subsidization of poor learners by wealthy learners. The complex political agenda does not end there. 'Basic education' and the devolution of powers to local school governing bodies was born from a deep-seated ANC belief in the democratic power of local communities to liberate themselves.

Basic education — and FC s 29(1) — is but one example of the egalitarian, libertarian and democratic convictions made manifest in the Final Constitution. Take FC s 29(2). On its face, it promises all learners education in any of the 11 official languages of their choice — thus displacing the hegemony of English and Afrikaans. But effective delivery — let alone the overall welfare of the polity — could hardly be served by education in all 11 official languages. So the drafters, good rule-utilitarians too, qualified this right with the phrase 'reasonably practicable'. However, FC s 29(2) was also forged at a time when Afrikaner nationalists worried — with good reason — about having all their socio-political institutions taken over by a majority of South Africans who preferred their children to learn English rather than Afrikaans. So Educators Act (EEA). They show how the enabling legislation and a raft of regulations produce a market of schools from which learners can choose: for example, NEPA regulations manifest an express intent to 'co-ordinate parental preferences'; SASA enables SGBs to charge fees and thereby create an incentive to admit as many full fee-paying students as the school can accommodate; EEA — and Education Labour Relations Council (ERLC) resolutions — create additional incentives for principals to compete for bums in seats by tying promotion posts to the number of learners who attend the school. The authors then look at the concurrent constitutional competency for education exercised by national government and provincial government and show how co-operative government functions as an additional enabling condition for the creation of markets. Viewed collectively, the provisions of NEPA, SASA and EEA — as well as the Final Constitution — create the conditions for a conventional, if not the most efficient, market in education. Woolman and Fleisch then assess the available data on how schools and parents respond to the variable spaces created by the law and suggest why markets are established in some South African communities and not in others. Although statistics demonstrate that the majority of learners do not exercise meaningful school choice, a surprisingly large cohort do. The authors then track the State's responses to the de facto policy of school choice. They note how the State ensures greater access to existing quasi-markets, even as it asserts increasing control over the parties whose 'legal', and thus legitimate, practices conspire to form markets in the first place.

FC s 29(2) contains a tiny bit of wiggle room — not a right, exactly, more an entitlement to reasons — for those Afrikaans-speakers who wish to maintain the linguistic and cultural homogeneity of their single medium public schools. As we shall see, this nod to communitarianism — to fraternity — in the face of both egalitarian and libertarian interests, has been the source of most of the litigation surrounding educational rights.

FC s 29(3) takes these communitarian concerns seriously. To the extent that FC s 29(2) allows the right of each public school learner to tuition in their preferred official language to trump a local majority's preference for single medium public school instruction — in the name of equity, historical redress and practicability — egalité and liberté will trump fraternité. However, FC s 29(3) enables linguistic, cultural and religious communities to create independent educational institutions that advance a particular way of being in the world. Thus, where the state declines to support such a communitarian good as a single medium public school, FC s 29(3) promises that space for single medium institutions will continue to exist — to the extent that parents and learners are willing to pay for their preferred form of instruction.

FC s 29(4) goes FC s 29(3) one half-step better. To the extent that the needs and the concerns of South Africa's historically disadvantaged learners displace the desires of smaller communities — read Afrikaans-speaking communities — to keep public institutions as they are, FC s 29(4) announces that independent educational institutions may still be entitled to state subsidies. Thus, even on their surface, with no further explication by enabling legislation, national departmental regulations or provincial school circulars, FC s 29(1), FC s 29(2), FC s 29(3) and FC s 29(4) demonstrate the egalitarian, libertarian, communitarian and democratic tensions repeatedly reflected in our founding document. If one wishes to understand our basic law's favourite catch-phrase — an 'open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom' — there may be no better place to start one's journey than FC s 29.

57.2 FC 29(1)

(a) Section 29(1)(a): Basic Education

(i) Nature of the right

(aa) Education as empowerment

The purpose of the right to a basic education is perhaps most evident in the opening lines of the Committee on Social, Economic and Cultural Rights' General Comment on the Right to Education:

> Education is both a human right in itself and an indispensable means of realizing other human rights. As an empowerment right, education is the primary vehicle by which economically and socially marginalized adults and children can lift themselves out of poverty and obtain the means to participate fully in their communities. Education has a vital role in empowering women, safeguarding children from exploitative and hazardous labour and sexual exploitation, promoting human rights and democracy, protecting the environment, and controlling population growth. Increasingly, education is recognized as one of the best financial investments States can make. But the importance of education is not just practical: a well-educated, enlightened and active mind, able to wander freely and widely, is one of the joys and rewards of human existence.[1]

Empowerment rights, such as education, serve two purposes that are not fulfilled by the majority of other rights found in Chapter 2.[2] First, they ensure that citizens are able 'to set the rules of the game, and not merely be assured that the rules are applied as written'.[3] Secondly, 'they allow the individual to determine the shape and direction of his or her life.' Empowerment rights also facilitate the enjoyment of other constitutional rights.[4]

Beiter identifies four ways in which the right to education serves as an empowerment right.[5] First, education possesses the potential to liberate people from

[1] General Comment 13 (21st Session, 1999) 'The Right to Education (art 13)' UN Doc E/C.12/1999/10 at para 1. See also Brown v Board of Education of Topeka 347 US 483, 493 (1954):

> Today, education is perhaps the most important function of state and local governments. Compulsory school attendance laws and the great expenditures for education both demonstrate our recognition of the importance of education to our democratic society. It is required in the performance of our most basic public responsibilities, even service in the armed forces. It is the very foundation of good citizenship. Today it is a principal instrument in awakening the child to cultural values, in preparing him for later professional training, and in helping him to adjust normally to his environment. In these days, it is doubtful that any child may reasonably be expected to succeed in life if he is denied the opportunity of an education. Such an opportunity, where the state has undertaken to provide it, is a right which must be made available to all on equal terms.

Article 1(4) of the World Declaration on Education for All recognises that 'Basic education is more than an end in itself. It is the foundation for lifelong learning and human development on which countries may build, systematically, further levels and types of education and training.'

[2] J Donnelly & R Howard 'Assessing National Human Rights Performance: A Theoretical Framework' (1988) 10 Human Rights Quarterly 214 (The pair identify four categories of rights and ten essential rights which can effectively represent all human rights: 'survival rights' (life, food and healthcare); 'membership rights' (family rights and equality); 'protection rights' (habeas corpus and an independent judiciary) and 'empowerment rights' (education, expression and association). While one may quibble with the content of their categories, the mere identification of a category of empowerment rights proves both analytically sound and rhetorically useful.)

[3] Ibid at 234.

[4] F Coomans 'In Search of the Core Content of the Right to Education' in D Brand & S Russel (eds) Exploring the Core Content of Socio-Economic Rights: South African and International Perspectives (2002) 160-161; K Tomasevski Education Denied (2003) 1 (Tomasevski, a former special Rapporteur for Education of the UN Human Rights Commission, writes: 'Leaving seven-year-olds to fend for themselves routinely drives them into child labour, child marriage or child soldiering. The right to education operates as a multiplier. It enhances all other human rights when guaranteed and forecloses most, if not all, when denied.') oppression. An educated populace is, allegedly, more willing to oppose political domination than an uneducated citizenry. Second, education permits people to participate in political life. Meaningful political participation requires both an understanding of the structures of a given polity and the capacity to exploit what one knows about the world in order to effect political change. Third, education is deemed essential for 'socio-economic development': only educated individuals possess the ability to secure both the basic necessities for survival and the other material goods required for flourishing. Finally, education enhances a person's ability to participate in the life of a given linguistic, cultural or religious community — and that ability, in turn, enables the community to maintain its preferred way of being in the world.

[5] K Bieter The Protection of the Right to Education by International Law (2006) 28-30. See also Coomans (supra) at 160-161.

Education's status as an empowerment right might well explain why it receives, on its face, greater protection than other socio-economic rights: housing, healthcare, food, water and social security. The Constitutional Assembly apparently believed that an adequate education provides the quickest route to a polity of a creative, productive and self-sufficient population of citizens — and not a country in which the majority of decisions relied on some form of state largesse.

(bb) Negative dimension and positive dimension

FC ss 26 and 27 – the rights to housing, healthcare, food, water and social security – contain separate positive rights and negative rights. FC s 29(1)(a) and (b) do not draw a specific distinction between positive entitlements and negative entitlements. However, in Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995, the Constitutional Court held that IC s 32*(a),[1] the precursor of FC s 29(1)(a), created 'a positive right that basic education be provided for every person and not merely a negative right that such a person should not be obstructed in pursuing his or her basic education.'[2] Given the virtually identical wording of the two sections, the Constitutional Court would likely find that FC s 29(1)(a)* confers both positive entitlements and negative entitlements.

(x) Negative dimension

By ensuring that people are not prevented from accessing existing educational resources, FC s 29 operates like an ordinary civil and political right. Any interference with the legitimate exercise of the right can be justified only in terms

[1] IC s 32*(a)* read: 'Every person shall have the right — (a) to basic education and to equal access to educational institutions.'

[2] 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC) at para 9. The Constitutional Court has identified a similar negative dimension in FC s 26(1)'s right to access to adequate housing. See Jaftha v Schoeman & Others; van Rooyen v Stoltz & Others 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC) at para 34.

that meet the test set out in FC s 36(1).[1] Schools may not refuse to admit learners of a particular race,[2] or expel learners for trivial non-compliance with dress codes.[3]

This negative dimension may well have horizontal application. Private or independent schools will, in terms of FC s 8(2), be bound by a right 'to the extent that it is applicable, taking into account the nature of the right and the nature of any duty imposed by the right.'[4] FC s 29(3), when read with FC s 9(4) (the right to equality as applied to private parties), and statutory provisions governing both independent schools and the promotion of equality, narrows dramatically the space for the denial of access to 'private' educational goods.[5]

(y) Positive dimension

The positive right to basic education and to adult basic education must be regarded as a socio-economic right. However, not all socio-economic rights function in the same manner. Some commentators speak of 'strong' and 'weak' positive rights.[6] Others refer to 'qualified' and 'unqualified' rights.[7] Whatever the nomenclature, the phrasing of FC s 29(1)(a) reflects a 'strong' right, 'unqualified' by any of the 'promises' or 'aspirational language' found in FC ss 26 and 27.[8] The

[1] See, further, S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 34.8.

[2] See Matukane & Others v Laerskool Potgietersrus 1996 (2) SA 223 (T)('Matukane').

[3] See Antonie v Governing Body, Settlers High School & Others 2002 (4) SA 738 (C); KwaZulu-Natal MEC for Education & Others v Pillay [2007] ZACC 21 (CC).

[4] For a detailed discussion of FC s 8(2), see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2005) § 31.4*(c)*.

[5] See § 57.4 infra; S Woolman 'Defending Discrimination: On the Constitutionality of Independent Schools that Promote a Particular, If Not Comprehensive, Vision of the Good Life' (2007) 18 Stellenbosch Law Review 31; B Fleisch & S Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of Single Medium Public Schools' (2007) 23 SAJHR 34.

[6] R Kriel 'Education' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 5, 1999) 38-1–38-3.

[7] Sandra Liebenberg distinguishes between three categories of socio-economic rights in the Final Constitution. First, some rights are qualified by: (a) 'access' to the thing; (b) reasonable measures; (c) progressive realization; and (d) available resources. These rights are found in FC ss 26(1) and 27(1) and are qualified by FC ss 26(2) and 27(2). They are housing, health, food, water and social security. Second, unqualified positive rights encompass basic education (FC s 29(1)(a)), rights of children (FC s 28(1)(c)) and rights of prisoners (FC s 35(3)(e)). Third, other rights afford solely negative protection: FC ss 26(3) and 27(3). S Liebenberg 'Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) 33-5—33-6.

[8] Berger asks whether the qualification in the second part of FC s 29(1)(b) is meant to apply to FC s 29(1)(a) as well. E Berger 'The Right to Education Under the South African Constitution' (2003) 103 Columbia Law Review 614, 638-639 n 139. This argument is, as Berger notes, entirely unconvincing. The grammar of FC s 29(1) separates the qualification in FC s 29(1)(b) from FC s 29(1)(a) with both an 'and' and a semicolon. This formal distinction clearly suggests that the qualifications are not meant to apply to FC s 29(1)(a). In addition, FC ss 26 and 27, which include similar limitation clauses in their respective subsection (2)'s, contain specific references back to the rights in FC ss 26 and 27 (1). That the Constitutional Assembly chose such a palpably different structure for FC s 29(1) clearly suggests that the drafters did not intend FC s 29(1)(b)'s internal limitations to apply to FC s 29(1)(a).

strong, unqualified character of FC s 29(1)(a) is reflected in four distinct linguistic tropes.

Firstly, everyone has the right to basic education itself, not, as might be the case in FC s 26 or FC s 27, to 'access' to basic education. Recall that in Grootboom the Constitutional Court interpreted the inclusion of the word 'access' in the FC s 26 right to housing to mean that the State could fulfil its constitutional obligations by 'enabling' people to provide their own housing.[1] The corollary must be that the absence of 'access' in FC s 29(1)(a) means that the State itself must provide a basic education to everybody.[2]

Second, the right to education is not subject to a standard socio-economic rights limitation such as 'reasonable legislative measures'. This internal limitation lies at the core of the Constitutional Court's textual argument for adopting a 'reasonableness' standard for the socio-economic rights to housing and to health in Grootboom and TAC. Accordingly, FC s 29(1)(a) cannot be satisfied unless everyone receives a basic education. The State's 'reasonable' measures to meet its obligation cannot justify a failure to provide this good. FC s 29(1)(a)'s obligations can only be fulfilled by the provision of classrooms, teachers and textbooks.

Third, FC s 29(1)(a) is not contingent on the availability of resources.[3] As Seloane notes, whether the State has enough resources to fulfil its constitutional obligations does not release the State from the duty FC s 29 imposes.[4] We argue below that the most effective manner to deal with a lack of resources in the domain of educational rights is by constructing creative remedies to meet the State's constitutional obligations: it makes little sense, as an interpretative matter, to read in an internal limitation in FC s 29(1) that simply is not there.

Finally, the right is not subject to progressive realization. In Grootboom Yacoob J described progressive realization in the following terms:

> It means that accessibility should be progressively facilitated: legal, administrative, operational and financial hurdles should be examined and, where possible, lowered over time. Housing must be made more accessible not only to a larger number of people but to a wider range of people as time progresses.[5]

Basic education is not a good that can be made gradually available to more people 'over time'.

In sum, the text of FC s 29(1)(a) indicates that, unlike the 'traditional' socio-economic rights, the right to basic education and adult basic education is: (a) not

[1] Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC) at paras 35-36 ('A right of access to adequate housing also suggests that it is not only the State who is responsible for the provision of houses, but that other agents within our society, including individuals themselves, must be enabled by legislative and other measures to provide housing. The State must create the conditions for access to adequate housing for people at all economic levels of our society. State policy dealing with housing must therefore take account of different economic levels in our society.')

[2] See M Seleoane 'The Right to Education: Lessons from Grootboom' (2003) 7(1) Law, Democracy and Development 137, 140-142.

[3] Ibid at 140-141.

[4] Ibid at 140.

[5] Grootboom (supra) at para 45.

subject to a reasonableness standard; (b) not dependent on the availability of resources; and (c) the source of a direct, immediate and specific entitlement.

However, despite these clear textual indications that FC s 29(1)(a) imposes a fairly onerous burden on the State, the Constitutional Court's existing socio-economic rights jurisprudence suggests that the Court will be inclined to limit the impact of FC s 29(1)(a)'s unqualified wording. The TAC Court, in rejecting the minimum core approach to socio-economic rights, held that > [i]t is impossible to give everyone access even to a 'core' service immediately. All that is possible, and all that can be expected of the State, is that it act reasonably to provide access to the socio-economic rights identified in sections 26 and 27 on a progressive basis.[1]

Thus, despite the difference in the texts of FC ss 26 and 27, on the one hand, and FC s 29(1)(a), on the other, the alleged 'impossibility' of providing basic education immediately may well push the Court to limit the scope of FC s 29(1)(a). Berger identifies the source of this tension in FC 29(1)(a) — the tension between the unqualified right and the qualified right — as follows:

> [t]o announce standards that cannot be met would ultimately cheapen the Constitution; the Court can preach whatever message it wants, but that message — and the Constitution itself — will ring hollow once people begin to realize that its rulings do not improve their everyday lives. A narrow constitution, goes the argument, is better than an empty one.[2]

The manner in which the Court has approached both qualified rights and unqualified rights also suggests that it will be hesitant to read FC s 29(1)(a) in a full and unqualified manner. In Grootboom, the Court adopted the following contextual approach to interpreting socio-economic rights:

> Interpreting a right in its context requires the consideration of two types of context. On the one hand, rights must be understood in their textual setting. This will require a consideration of Chapter 2 and the Constitution as a whole. On the other hand, rights must also be understood in their social and historical context.[3]

---

[1] Minister of Health & Others v Treatment Action Campaign & Others (No 2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC)('TAC') at para 35.

[2] Berger (supra) at 642. This danger was specifically recognised by the Constitutional Court in Soobramoney:

> We live in a society in which there are great disparities in wealth. Millions of people are living in deplorable conditions and in great poverty. There is a high level of unemployment, inadequate social security, and many do not have access to clean water or to adequate health services. These conditions already existed when the Constitution was adopted and a commitment to address them, and to transform our society into one in which there will be human dignity, freedom and equality, lies at the heart of our new constitutional order. For as long as these conditions continue to exist that aspiration will have a hollow ring.

Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC) at para 8. The flip side of this argument, as Berger notes, is that the Final Constitution is, quite self-consciously, a transformative and aspirational document that proclaims the ideals upon which the new South Africa must be founded. In his words: 'if championing these rights without realizing them risks emptying the Constitution, then abandoning than altogether would surely drain out even more of its content.' Berger (supra) at 643. The Court will, some time in the future, have to tread a fine line between placing a gloss on FC s 29(1)(a) that promises too much and a reading of this unqualified right that offers far too little.

[3] Grootboom (supra) at para 22.

In interpreting FC s 26, the Constitutional Court held that '[s]ocio-economic rights must all be read together in the setting of the Constitution as a whole.'[1] No matter how important one views the right to education, it is difficult to argue that it should trump rights to housing, food, water, healthcare and social security. Housing, food, water, healthcare and social security provide, after all, the basic conditions of existence — without them, the right to education, however lavishly realized, will be of little worth.

In addition, the post-apartheid State inherited an education system that purposefully tried to ensure that the majority of the population could not be anything more than hewers of wood and drawers of water. This historical gloss on FC s 29(1)(a) emphasizes the restitutional character of the right of education. However, it also indicates the size of the problem facing the State and why the Court might be inclined to soften the budgetary impact of an unqualified FC s 29(1)(a).

But how would the Court craft a softer right? Grootboom, interestingly, offers an example. Although the applicants' primary complaint was based on FC s 26, the right to housing, they also claimed relief under the seemingly unqualified FC s 28(1)(c) right to shelter for children (and their families). Davis J, in the High Court, accepted FC s 28(1)(c)'s unqualified content and granted the children and families the specific remedy requested.[2] The Constitutional Court reversed the High Court. It held that FC s 28(1)(b) required that a child's needs be provided primarily by his or her family. The obligation to provide shelter under FC s 28(1)(c) rests 'primarily on the parents or family' and, therefore, 'only alternatively on the State.'[3] That primary obligation would only shift to the State if children were removed from their families. However, under normal circumstances, the State would only bear a minimal enabling duty.[4] Although education is not

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 24 (The Court continued: 'The State is obliged to take positive action to meet the needs of those living in extreme conditions of poverty, homelessness or intolerable housing. Their interconnectedness needs to be taken into account in interpreting the socio-economic rights, and, in particular, in determining whether the State has met its obligations in terms of them.')

[2] Grootboom v Oostenberg Municipality & Others 2000 (3) BCLR 277 (C).

[3] Grootboom (supra) at para 77.

[4] The TAC Court also appears to subject the FC s 28(1)(c) right to healthcare to 'progressive realization'. See TAC (supra) at para 77. For a criticism of the Constitutional Court's approach to FC s 28(1)(c), see A Friedman & A Pantazis 'Children's Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2004) 47-9–47-11 (The authors note that 'if the sections are read literally, the grounds for rejecting the [High Court's] order are shaky at best.' While they acknowledge the gravity of the Court's concerns, they argue that '[r]ather than claiming that the overlap of the rights is inconsistent with the notion that separate rights are created, the Court should have made it clear that a purposive, rather than a literal, interpretation of the section made it compatible with a scheme for progressive realization of housing.') See also M Pieterse 'Reconstructing the Private/Public Dichotomy? The Enforcement of Children's Constitutional Social Rights and Care Entitlements' (2003) TSAR 1, 11 ('While the court's concerns with the overlap of parental interests with section 28(1)(c) right and the possible abuse of such rights by indigent parents are perhaps understandable . . . [v]iewing section 28(1)(c) as subject to the resource and other constraints in sections 26 and 27 would seem completely unsupported by the text of the Constitution. . .. If the court's interpretation is to be preferred, the separate inclusion of section 28(1)(c) in the bill of rights would be rendered almost entirely without purpose.')

mentioned in FC s 28(1)(c), the Court might be open to a set of similar arguments — and that train of propositions would begin with a Grootboom-like contention that parents bear a primary duty to educate their children. Or the Court could rely on its reasoning in Grootboom that 'the carefully constructed constitutional scheme for progressive realisation of socio-economic rights would make little sense if it could be trumped'[1] by the right to education and that the right to education must therefore be read in conformity with that scheme.[2]

The High Courts have sent mixed messages regarding unqualified socio-economic rights. In B & Others v Minister of Correctional Services & Others, Brand J held that the FC s 35(2)(e) right of prisoners to be provided with adequate medical care required that the State provide prisoners with anti-viral medication — if they had a legitimate expectation of receiving such treatment (namely previous treatment by the State and a doctor's assessment that such treatment was necessary).[3] However, prisoners who had no legitimate expectation of such treatment were not entitled to such treatment — even if they met the criteria (a particular CD4 count) for treatment.[4] When the issue of HIV medication for prisoners arose again in EN & Others v Government of RSA & Others,[5] Pillay J adopted a reasonableness standard for his evaluation of the applicants' FC s 27 and FC s 35(2)(e) claims.[6]

The Witwatersrand Local Division has upheld a right to electricity for maximum security prisoners sourced, largely, in FC s 35(2)(e).[7] However, Schwartzman J's judgment in Strydom appears to fudge the justification for the outcome: he does not clearly state that the right was independent of state resources; and he appears to grant the relief solely because he remained unconvinced by the State's arguments about budgetary deficiencies.[8]

[1] Grootboom (supra) at para 71.

[2] On reading constitutional provisions in conformity with one another, see United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (African Christian Democratic Party & Others Intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Another as Amici Curiae) (No 2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC)('UDM'); South African Broadcasting Corp Ltd v National Director Of Public Prosecutions & Others 2007 (1) SA 523 (CC), 2007 (2) BCLR 167 (CC).

[3] 1997 (6) BCLR 789 (C).

[4] Ibid at paras 58 and 60 ('If a proper case were to be made out by respondents that, due to the constraints of its own budget, the Department of Correctional Services could not afford the medical treatment claimed by applicants, I might have . . . found that "adequate medical treatment" for applicants is dictated by such budgetary constraints. From what I have already stated, it is apparent, however, that on the facts of this case it is not necessary for me to make a definite finding on these difficult issues.' (our emphasis)) On legitimate expectations and socio-economic rights, see Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2005) at § 34.2.

[5] 2007 (1) BCLR 84 (D).

[6] Ibid at paras 30-31.

[7] Strydom v Minister of Correctional Services 1999 (3) BCLR 342 (W) at para 15.

[8] Ibid at para 17.

Woolman and Fleisch offer a reading of FC s 29(1)(a) that would explain the unqualified nature of the right in a manner that does not make a hash of the budgetary constraints faced by the post-apartheid State:

> The absence of an internal limitation for the right to a basic education makes sense when viewed through the lens of Apartheid-era funding inequalities. The drafters wanted to reaffirm the primacy of education in a social democracy and to undermine any attempt to perpetuate unequal levels of state funding. The historical context and aspirational content of the South African Constitution requires a more nuanced reading of the absence of the internal limitation in [FC s] 29(1)(a). In short, the section should be read as a reminder that the state may never again use education as a vehicle for the reproduction of — and must make every effort possible to eliminate all vestiges of — apartheid-era patterns of inequality.[1]

As Woolman and Fleisch note, the absence of an internal modifier does not make it impossible for the State — or another social actor — to justify a limitation of the right. Any person can, in terms of FC s 29, demonstrate that they do not currently have access to a school that would enable them to secure a basic education. That showing, if accepted, would establish a limitation of FC s 29(1)(a).[2] Then, assuming the right to a basic education had been impaired by a law of general application, the justificatory burden would shift to the State to justify the limitation under FC s 36(1).[3] (If the source of the limitation is mere government policy, or obstruction by particular schools, it will not be possible to justify the limitation.) The State will be able to raise resource constraints and the need to fulfil other constitutional obligations in showing that the limitation is 'reasonable and justifiable'.

The other way to limit the unqualified character of FC s 29(1)(a) is through the remedy. While a person who establishes that the government has failed to provide her with a basic education is entitled to relief, that relief need not necessarily be an order that the government immediately provide a basic education. A court must give an order that is just and equitable. Such an order could encompass a simple declaratory order, a suspended order or a structural interdict that would give the government an opportunity to offer a bona fide plan to realize the right to a basic

[1] B Fleisch & S Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of School Fees: A Reply to Roithmayr' (2004) 22(1) Perspectives in Education 111 n 10.

[2] It is necessary to stress that, prior to any judicial gloss on its meaning, FC s 29(1)(a) ought to be given the full, unqualified reading that the text suggests.

[3] For more on the meaning of 'law of general application', and the distinction between 'law' and 'conduct', see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 34.7 ('Law that fails to meet the 'law' requirement of law of general application falls into roughly two categories. Those categories are: (aa) grant of power to government officials not constrained by identifiable legal standards; and (bb) commissions and omissions. Commissions and omissions that fail to meet the desiderata for 'law of general application' fall into two related categories: (x) conduct carried out under colour of law but beyond the scope of actual legal authority; (y) the failure to discharge constitutional duties.') education. The benefit of the remedial approach is that a court can simultaneously affirm the right to education, and still leave the government sufficient room to manoeuvre. The remedial approach avoids compromising rights by tying their interpretation to a restrictive vision of available remedies. As Justice Kriegler noted in Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape, remedies must be designed to give maximum effect to the rights enshrined in Chapter 2: 'our flexibility in providing remedies may affect our understanding of the right'.[1] Because our courts have broad discretion to fashion an 'appropriate' constitutional remedy, they are less likely to be deterred from finding a violation of the right than would be the case if they had a rather narrow menu of remedies from which to choose. The Constitutional Court has repeatedly emphasized flexibility in the provision of remedies and has held that courts must 'forge new tools' and 'shape innovative remedies' to ensure effective relief.[2] As Mokgoro and Sachs J succinctly put it in Bel Porto: 'It is the remedy that must adapt itself to the right, not the right to the remedy.'[3]

(ii) Content of the positive right

(aa) Defining 'Basic Education'

(x) Goals and years

The courts have yet to interpret the meaning of the term 'basic education'. Two possible constructions appear plausible. 'Basic education' could refer to a specific period of schooling, ie primary school. 'Basic education' could refer to a standard

[1] Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1998 (1) SACR 227 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC) at para 27.

[2] Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC) at para 69 quoted with approval in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC)('NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs') at para 65. See also Bel Porto School Governing Body v Premier, Western Cape & Another 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC)('Bel Porto')(Mokgoro and Sachs JJ) at paras 181 and 186 ('The flexibility in the provision of constitutional remedies means that there is no constitutional straightjacket'. . . . 'It would indeed be most unsatisfactory and have negative consequences for constitutionality to fail to provide a remedy where there has been an infringement of a constitutional right. While courts should exhibit significant deference towards the administration and recognise the practical difficulties which the administration faces, it could create a misleading impression that in instances where there is an infringement of a constitutional right, and there are significant practical difficulties in remedying the injustice caused, a decision-maker will not be held to account.') of education: its quality or its adequacy. As Berger bluntly puts it: 'Does section 29 promise merely a place to go to school, or does it provide for an "adequate" education?'[1]

[3] Bel Porto (supra) at para 186. Although the Constitutional Court has as yet been hesitant to employ structural interdicts, the Justices in two recent hearings seemed to express considerable dissatisfaction with the State's continued non-compliance with court orders and hinted that structural interdicts might be appropriate in certain circumstances. Occupiers of 51 Olivia Road Berea Township and 197 Main Street Johannesburg v City of Johannesburg & Others CCT 24/07 (Heard on 28 August 2007); Nyathi v Member of the Executive Council for the Department of Health Gauteng & Another CCT 19/07 (Heard on 30 August 2007). At the time of writing, these cases had not yet been decided.

The term 'basic' does have determinate content at international law.[2] The World Declaration on Education for All de-emphasizes the completion of specific formal programs or certification requirements.[3] Instead it stresses the acquisition of that level of learning necessary for an individual to realize his or her full potential. The World Declaration states:

> Every person-child, youth and adult - shall be able to benefit from educational opportunities designed to meet their basic learning needs. These needs comprise both essential learning tools (such as literacy, oral expression, numeracy, and problem solving) and basic learning content (such as knowledge, skills, values, and attitudes) required by human beings to survive, to develop to their full capacities, to live and work in dignity, to participate fully in development, to improve the quality of their lives, to make informed decisions, and to continue learning.[4]

The Education Department's White Paper on Education and Training initially appears to endorse this reading of 'basic education'.[5] However, the White Paper then immediately goes on to undermine this construction by stating that meeting the certification requirements of the General Education Certificate (GEC) satisfies the constitutional entitlement to a 'basic education'.[6] The GEC thus shies away from an express commitment to meeting the Declaration's goals.

[1] E Berger 'The Right to Education Under the South African Constitution' (2003) 103 Columbia Law Review 614, 625.

[2] South African courts are required to look to international law when interpreting the Bill of Rights. See FC s 39(1)(b).

[3] See Article 4: the 'focus of basic education must, therefore, be on actual learning acquisition and outcome rather than exclusively upon enrolment, continued participation in organised programmes and completion of certification requirements'.

[4] See Article 1. American courts have adopted a similar approach in their understanding of a state's educational obligations. See, eg, Brown v Board of Education 347 US 483, 493 (1954); San Antonio Independent School District v Rodriguez 411 US 1, 112 (1973) (Marshall J dissenting); Serrano v Priest 487 P2d 1241, 1258 (1971); Abbott v Burke 575 A2d 359, 397 (1990). The German jurisprudence has taken a similar tack. See D Kommers Constitutional Jurisprudence of the Federal Republic of Germany (1997) 294-304.

[5] White Paper on Education and Training (March 1995) at paras 13-15.

[6] Ibid at para 15: 'basic education' is 'appropriately designed programmes to the level of the proposed General Education Certificate (GEC), whether offered in school to children, or through other forms of delivery to young people and adults.' The GEC is awarded after completion of the one-year reception class (pre-school) plus Grades One through Grade nine. In terms of Section 3(1) of the Schools Act 84 of 1994, it is compulsory for a learner to attend school from the age of seven until the age of fifteen or the ninth grade which ever comes first. This phase of education is also prioritised in terms of actual allocation of resources. See also Norms and Standard for School Funding General Notice 2362 Government Gazette 19347 (October 1998) at para 95 (Requires that in the building and extension of schools this phase of education take precedence.)

That these two connotations of 'basic' reflect a distinction with a difference is illustrated in Campaign for Fiscal Equity Inc v The State of New York.[1] The applicant had argued that the standard of education in New York City schools did not meet the requirement of a 'sound basic education' found in the State of New York's Constitution.[2] The New York State Court of Appeal (the State's highest court) had, in a preliminary judgment, defined 'sound basic education' as 'the basic literacy, calculating, and verbal skills necessary to enable children to eventually function productively as civic participants capable of voting and serving on a jury'.[3] The definition therefore embraced the ability to (a) find employment and (b) participate in political life. The Appellate Division, on remand, then found that an 8th grade education was sufficient to meet the Court of Appeal's standard: such an education would enable a person to obtain employment so as 'not to be a charge on the public fiscus' and to read the newspapers and the jury instructions necessary to fulfil their civic obligations. On appeal, the Court of Appeal disagreed. It held that an education had to enable people to obtain competitive employment and that the requirement of civic participation 'means more than just being qualified to vote or serve as a juror, but to do so capably and knowledgeably'.[4] It concluded that 'a sound basic education should not be pegged to the eighth or ninth grade, or indeed to any particular grade level.'[5] Thus while an 8th or 9th grade education might have served in 1894 when New York State's Fourth Constitution was drafted, only a full and an adequate high school education would now meet the twin goals that the right to a basic education was designed to serve. The Court of Appeal's decision suggests that the right to a 'basic education' requires the state to meet a substantive — measurable — goal and not merely a formal goal that any student marking time and any school pushing through students could satisfy.

The Campaign for Fiscal Equity Court focused on active political participation and competent jury service as the ultimate measures of basic education. By contrast, the West Virginia Supreme Court articulated a detailed list of knowledge that learners would be required to possess in order to meet West Virginia's constitutional requirement of a 'thorough and efficient' education system:

> '(1) literacy; (2) ability to add, subtract, multiply and divide numbers; (3) knowledge of government to the extent that the child will be equipped as a citizen to make informed choices among persons and issues that affect his own governance; (4) self-knowledge and knowledge of his or her total environment to allow the child to intelligently choose life work — to know his or her options; (5) work training and advanced academic training as the child may intelligently choose; (6) recreational pursuits; (7) interests in all creative arts, such as music, theatre, literature, and the visual arts; (8) social ethics, both behavioural and abstract, to facilitate compatibility with others in this society.'[6]

[1] 100 NY 2d 893 ('CFE II').
[2] Article XXII, paragraph 1.
[3] 86 NY 2d 316.
[4] CFE II (supra) at 906.
[5] Ibid.
[6] Pauley v Kelly 255 SE2d 859, 877 (1979).

A South African court would find itself hard pressed to enforce either the New York or the West Virginia definition of basic education. Brahm Fleisch's scathing analysis of our primary school system — a function of our two parallel economies, of our two separate nations — causes him to arrive at the following conclusions:

> After the end of apartheid – South Africa has not one, but two education 'systems'. The first 'system' is well resourced, consisting mainly of former white and Indian schools, and a small but growing independent sector. The first 'system' produces the majority of university entrants and graduates, the vast majority of students graduating with higher-grade mathematics and science. Enrolling the children of the elite, white-middle and new black middle-classes, the first system does a good job in ensuring that most children in its charge acquire literacy and mathematics competences that are comparable to those of middle-class children anywhere in the world. [NB: As tertiary educators know, Flesich is being far too generous in this assessment.] The second school 'system' enrolls the vast majority of working-class and poor children. Because they bring their health, family and community difficulties with them into the classroom, the second primary school 'system' struggles to ameliorate young people's deficits in institutions that are themselves less than adequate. In seven years of schooling, children in the second system do learn, but acquire a much more restricted set of knowledge and skills than children in the first system. They 'read', but mostly at a very limited, functional level; they 'write', but not with fluency or confidence. They can perform basic numeric operations but use inappropriately concrete techniques that limit application.[1]

Thus, the accepted criteria for a basic education in New York or West Virginia — literacy, numeracy skills, problem-solving skills and the basic knowledge necessary to function in society — is, unequivocally, beyond the current reach of the South African educational system. The massive current deficits — much of it inherited from apartheid — must not, however, be used as an excuse or a justification by the State for failing to provide a 'basic education'. However South Africa goes about achieving the constitutionally-mandated goal of a basic education, it ought to keep in mind Amy Gutmann's description of the philosophical bases for the right: (a) the participation in and the promotion of government; (b) the ability to function in the economic community; (c) the inherent dignity of the individual.[2]

(y) Criteria for assessment

The International Committee for Economic, Social and Cultural rights has accepted the so-called 'Four A's' as an appropriate standard by which to measure a state's compliance with its obligation to provide a basic education: (a) availability/adequacy; (b) accessibility; (c) adaptability; and (d) acceptability.[3] While there may be more to a basic education than is captured by these terms, they do provide a valuable departure point for thinking about what, practically-speaking, a basic education requires.

[1] B Fleisch Primary Education in Crisis (2007) 1–2. Fleisch explains, from soup to nuts — from the absence of food, to the presence of parasites, to the lack of adequately trained teachers, especially in maths and sciences — why South Africa will not, for the foreseeable future, provide their students with a basic, let alone, adequate education.

[2] A Gutmann Democratic Education (1987); John Dewey Democracy and Education (1916).

[3] General Comment 13 'The Right to Education (art 13)' UN Doc E/C12/1999/10 (21st Session, 1999)('GC 13').

(aaa) Availability/Adequacy

General Comment 13 states that 'availability' means that > functioning educational institutions and programmes have to be available in sufficient quantity within the jurisdiction of the State party. What they require to function depends upon numerous factors, including the developmental context within which they operate; for example, all institutions and programmes are likely to require buildings or other protection from the elements, sanitation facilities for both sexes, safe drinking water, trained teachers receiving domestically competitive salaries, teaching materials, and so on; while some will also require facilities such as a library, computer facilities and information technology.[1]

This passage suggests that 'availability' is a slight misnomer. What the General Comment appears to envisage is the availability and the adequacy of educational infrastructure. The quality of education depends not only on the content of the curriculum, but on the material circumstances in which learners receive their education.

The New York State Court of Appeal has identified three categories of 'inputs' to determine the adequacy of a school system: (a) teaching; (b) school facilities and classrooms; and (c) instrumentalities of learning.[2] 'Teaching' encompasses the quality of teaching staff and the number of teachers per learner. 'School facilities and classrooms' require structures that protect learners from the elements. This category also requires desks, chairs, water, electricity and sanitation. As for the 'instrumentalities of learning', they embrace textbooks, blackboards, stationery and possibly computers.[3]

[1] GC 13 (supra) at para 6*(a)*.

[2] CFE II (supra) at 908.

[3] The American learning in this area is both deceptive and instructive. As Danie Brand notes, the United States case-law indicates a willingness on the part of 'United States courts to strike down school funding systems that rely on an unequal revenue-raising basis.' D Brand 'Community Participation and User Fees' (2003) 2 (Unpublished manuscript on file with authors). These US cases, however, engage disparities 'in state funding of schools generated on an unequal tax basis.' Ibid at 3. They do not engage a system of progressive redistribution of state funds married to a policy that permits 'additional private funding of state schools.' Ibid. Thus, the form of institutional arrangement challenged in South Africa is quite distinct from its American counterpart.

Difference of form aside, the attempts to establish standards of adequacy through both litigation under US federal and state constitutions has proved decidedly difficult. See F Michelman 'The Supreme Court, 1968 Term - Foreword: On Protecting the Poor through the Fourteenth Amendment' (1969) 83 Harvard Law Review 7. As Morgan, Cohen and Herskoff argue, the primary problem with tying together minimum adequacy requirements to minimum funding requirements is that the two variables do not permit a sufficiently close fit. See S Herskoff 'Positive rights and State Constitutions: The Limits of Federal Rationality Review' (1999) 112 Harvard Law Review 1132; J Morgan, T Cohen & S Herskoff 'Establishing Education Program Inadequacy: The Alabama Example' (1995) 28 University of Michigan Journal of Legal Reform 559.

According to relatively recent statistics, our Department of Education has acknowledged that significant numbers of schools lack the most basic resources: water, sanitation and electricity.[1] Large numbers of schools face serious problems with class size, the quality of educators and the availability of learning materials.[2] It is, of course, extremely difficult to set a precise standard for when an absence of resources will limit FC s 29(1)(a). Is it possible to learn with electricity but no water, with small classes but no textbooks, or qualified teachers but no blackboards?

Two possible solutions exist for this doctrinal difficulty. The first solution sets a very high standard — based on international norms and expert evidence — so that even a small deviation would constitute a limitation of the right. So, for example, if maximum class sizes are set at 30 learners, then any school that has classes with more than 30 learners has limited the right. This approach saves courts from having to make difficult assessments of the educational impact of various kinds of deficiencies. The disadvantage of this approach is that an extremely high percentage of our schools would fail to meet these international standards. Moreover, such criteria would unduly focus educators on meeting specific numerical targets rather than finding innovative ways to improve education.

The second approach would eschew discrete standards — teacher/student ratios, presence of running water, qualification level of the teaching staff, quality of the physical infrastructure – and allow a court to make an ad hoc inquiry as to whether the school provides a 'basic education'. In reaching its conclusion, a court could look beyond the provision of facilities, and consider exam results and drop out rates.

The second approach suffers from two primary disabilities. First, the most obvious downside of this standardless approach is that courts are more likely to defer to executive or to administrative claims of practical difficulties in fulfilling

Even where minimum funding requirements have been put in place and minimum adequacy guidelines have been established, historically disadvantaged schools struggle to improve performance. These difficulties have not prevented a couple of courts in the US from requiring that the state provide equal funding and — in some instances — an adequate education. See, eg, Rose v Council for a Better Education 790 SW2d 186 (Ky 1989). However, the majority of courts have concentrated on removing disparities in public school funding created by unequal municipal property taxes. See, eg, Abbott v Burke 575 A2D 359 (NJ 1990); Edgewood Independent School District v Kirby SW2d 391 (Tex 1991).

Improved performance at historically disadvantaged schools turns out to be a function of a number of factors: not the least of which is the management model employed at the school district level and by the principal. The difficulty in disaggregating the causes of improved performance is no argument against parity in funding. It serves, however, as a cautionary note when various NGOs and other actors attempt to determine school policy through the prism of very narrowly focused litigation.

[1] The 2000 statistics reflect that 36% of schools did not have telephones, 29% lacked water; 45% were without electricity and 9% had no toilets. Department of Education Education for All — 2005 Country Status Report: South Africa (2005) 9.

[2] Ibid (40% of students reported classroom shortages. In 2002, there were 12 000 under-qualified teachers. By 2004, that number of unqualified teachers had dropped to 5000.)

their mandates.[1] Second, as any student of constitutional property law now knows, the employment of a reasonableness standard employed outside the context of socio-economic rights faces the prospect of what Theunis Roux has described as a 'arbitrariness vortex'.[2] All conceivably relevant factors will be considered under FC s 29(1)(a). Having considered those factors, the court is then free to generate an outcome that it believes does justice to the parties before the court. The problem with this reasonableness vortex in the context of FC s 29(1)(a) is that it provides little or no discernible criteria as to what will or will not fail FC s 29(1)(a)'s test for availability and adequacy.

(bbb) Accessibility

Accessibility requires that once the schools have been built and stocked with teachers and textbooks, learners are able to make use of them. Accessibility takes account of three discrete factors: Non-discrimination; financial accessibility; physical accessibility. Accessibility engages both negative dimensions and positive dimensions of the right to basic education. Accessibility requires: (1) that people are not (unjustifiably) turned away; and (2) that appropriate steps are taken to make access easier for persons from groups that were either consigned to inferior institutions or excluded from certain educational institutions altogether.

(xx) Non-discrimination

The cases that have engaged in discrimination in education can usefully be divided into two general categories: direct discrimination and indirect discrimination. Direct discrimination occurs when a rule or a practice specifically prohibits members from a certain group from having access to education.

Minister of Home Affairs v Wathenuka & Another remains the only discrimination case to be decided specifically under FC s 29(1). In Wathenuka, the Supreme Court of Appeal struck down regulations which prohibited asylum seekers from studying in South Africa.[3] The court held that it could never be reasonable or justifiable to deny education to a child lawfully in the country to seek asylum.[4] The general prohibition on study by asylum-seekers was therefore an unjustifiable limitation of FC s 29(1).[5]

[1] See, for example, D Brand 'The Proceduralisation of South African Socio-economic Rights Jurisprudence, or 'What are Socio-economic Rights For?' in H Botha, A van der Walt & J van der Walt (eds) Rights and Democracy in a Transformative Constitution (2003) 33.

[2] See T Roux 'Property' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 46. Cf A van der Walt Constitutional Property Law (2006).

[3] 2004 (4) SA 326 (SCA).

[4] Ibid at para 36.

[5] As the prohibition applied to all form of study, the regulation in question would limit both FC s 29(1)(a)'s guarantee of basic education, and FC s 29(1)(b)'s right to higher education. Nugent JA did not uphold the principle that asylum-seekers would always be entitled to study at an institution of their choice. He sent the matter back to the administrative body for reconsideration in light of his reconstruction of the regulation and the body's newly limited ability to exercise its discretion. Ibid at para 37.

Watchenuka stands for two further propositions. First, it reinforces the notion that 'everyone' in FC s 29(1)(a) means precisely that: FC s 29(1)(a)'s guarantees are not limited citizens or even permanent residents.[1] Secondly, while total bans on certain classes will generally be unacceptable, a requirement that certain classes of person seek permission to study may conform to the dictates of FC s 36(1). Both of these findings are to be welcomed. However, it is important to re-iterate that there will seldom, if ever, be a reason to refuse a child access to education, even if she is only in the country temporarily.

The second non-discrimination matter to arise in South African courts, Harris v Minister of Education, concerned age limits for entry into primary school.[2] In 2000, the Minister of Education published a notice that stated that from 2001 learners would not be permitted to enrol at independent primary schools before the year in which they would turn seven. Mrs Harris, the mother of a child who would turn six in 2001, argued that the notice violated her daughter's rights to equality and to have her best interests protected. Mrs Harris, along with expert witnesses, contended that her daughter was academically ready for primary schooling and that delaying her education would have a negative effect on her development. The Pretoria High Court agreed. It held that the measure was discriminatory on the basis of age and, because it was likely to impair the child's development, was both presumptively and ultimately unfair.[3] Coetzee J also held that the measure limited the child's FC s 28(2) right to have her best interests be considered paramount.[4] The Minister attempted to justify the limitation on three grounds: (a) younger learners tend to fail and create backlogs in the education system; (b) the state possessed no educationally sound manner to grant exemptions; and (c) the age requirement was based on sound educational principles.[5] Coetzee J first noted that the notice only applied to independent schools. He then ended the matter by finding that the Minister had failed to provide any evidence in support of his arguments.[6] The notice was therefore declared invalid.[7]

[1] See Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC).

[2] 2001 (8) BCLR 796 (T).

[3] Ibid at 800J-804D.

[4] Ibid at 804E-805B.

[5] Ibid at 805C-E.

[6] Ibid at 805E-806D.

[7] The Minister took the matter on appeal to the Constitutional Court. The Court dismissed the matter on the grounds that the Minister lacked the power under NEPA to issue such a notice. It did not, as a result, have to consider the issue of age discrimination. Minister of Education v Harris 2001 (4) SA 1297 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1157 (CC). The South African Schools Act makes identical provision for public schools. This section has not yet been challenged. It appears from Harris that different set of concerns may apply to public schools. For example, a child's continued failure in a public school places a strain on the public purse — the costs of the failure of a child in an independent school is borne primarily by individual parents.

An earlier case, Matukane & Others v Laerskool Potgietersrus, straddles the boundary between direct and indirect discrimination. Laerskool Potgietersrus – a parallel-medium Afrikaans and English school – was a traditionally white school that catered primarily for Afrikaans learners and that had refused to admit black learners.[1] The disgruntled black parents took Laerskool Potgietersrus to court. The school denied that it had discriminated on the basis of race. It argued, firstly, that the school was full and, secondly, that it was striving to maintain the school's Afrikaans ethos. IC s 32 ostensibly protected a certain degree of cultural homogeneaity in public schools. The High Court was unimpressed. It held that, despite the respondent's protestations to the contrary, the evidence showed that the school could accommodate more learners and that black learners had been refused access while white students had been admitted. While ducking a finding that the discrimination had occurred on purely racial grounds — as opposed to potentially legitimate grounds of culture, language or ethnic social origin — Spoelstra J rejected the respondent's argument that the school would be unable to maintain its predominantly Afrikaans character by admitting a small number of English-speaking black students. At a minimum, Matukane must be read as standing for the proposition that cultural exclusion cannot be used as a proxy for racial discrimination.

A third form of exclusion arises where a school's code of conduct, although seemingly neutral, excludes or punishes members of particular communities. In Antonie v Governing Body, Settlers High School & Others, a learner had been found guilty of 'serious misconduct' for attending school with dreadlocks and a cap — essential parts of the practice of her Rastafarian religion.[2] In the High Court, Van Zyl J held that codes of conduct should not be assessed in a rigid manner, but rather in 'a spirit of mutual respect, reconciliation and tolerance. The mutual respect, in turn, must be directed at understanding and protecting, rather than rejecting and infringing, the inherent dignity, convictions and traditions of the offender.'[3] Van Zyl J also emphasized the need to read any code of conduct in light of a learner's FC s 16 rights to freedom of expression. The conduct was held to fall well short of the definition of 'serious misconduct', and the High Court set aside the School Governing Body's decision.[4]

In KwaZulu-Natal MEC for Education v Pillay, the Constitutional Court had to consider whether a Hindu learner should be entitled to wear a nose stud to school as an expression of her South Indian, Tamil and Hindu culture and as a a part of the practice her Hindu religion.[5] The school had refused to permit her to wear the stud on the grounds that the wearing of the stud was not a religious obligation. Ms Pillay instituted the action as a discrimination claim under the Promotion

[1] Matukane & Others v Laerskool Potgietersrus 1996 (2) SA 223 (T)('Matukane').
[2] 2002 (4) SA 738 (C).
[3] Ibid at para 17.
[4] Ibid at paras 18-20.
[5] [2007] ZACC 21 ('Pillay').

of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act.[1] The Constitutional Court found that the 'norm embodied by the Code is not neutral, but enforces mainstream and historically privileged forms of adornment, such as ear studs which also involve the piercing of a body part, at the expense of minority and historically excluded forms.'[2] Chief Justice Langa also found that both religious and cultural practices should be protected and that voluntary practices could be entitled to the same protection as obligatory practices. He emphasized the importance of 'reasonable accommodation': such accommodation meant that schools would have to take positive steps to accommodate learners whose cultural practices might not easily comply with a school's existing rules. While recognizing the importance of codes of conduct and the need to ensure discipline, Chief Justice Langa held that a mere appeal to uniformity would not be sufficient to refuse an exemption from a code. Instead, a school would have to show that a particular exemption was likely to cause a real disruption to school activities.[3] In this case, no such evidence was presented and the Court found that Sunali should have been granted an exemption.

(yy) Financial accessibility

No person should be denied a basic education because they or their parents cannot afford school fees. That much is uncontroversial.[4] Whether FC s 29(1)(a) demands that a basic education be free to all has generated heated debate.

At international law, some support exists for the proposition that primary education (which is not necessarily equivalent to 'basic education') must be free for all. Indeed, South Africa is bound by the Convention on the Rights of the Child ('CRC') to progressively '[m]ake primary education compulsory and available free to all'.[5] However, the fact that the drafters of FC s 29(1)(a) chose the words 'basic education' and not 'free primary education' in the Final Constitution suggests that they did not intend to limit the manner in which the government could go about ensuring a basic education for all.[6] While the Bill of Rights must

[1] Act 4 of 2000.

[2] Pillay (supra) at para 44.

[3] Ibid at para 114.

[4] See D Roithmayr 'Access, Adequacy and Equality: The Constitutionality of School Fee Financing in Public Education' (2003) 19 SAJHR 382, 394-395 (Roithmayr refers to Grootboom (supra) at para 36 and TAC (supra) at paras 70-71 as supporting the proposition that socio-economic rights must take account of differing financial circumstances and that the state has an obligation to provide housing and HIV drugs to those who cannot afford them. That seems to us to be an errant reading of Grootboom and TAC.)

[5] Ratified by South Africa on 16 June 1995.

[6] See B Fleisch & S Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of School Fees: A Reply to Roithmayr' (2004) 22(1) Perspectives in Education 111, n 10; Roithmayr (supra) at 396.

be interpreted in light of international law,[1] the Final Constitution's purposeful departure from a widely used international law formulation must be respected.[2] In sum, we would argue that while South Africa has an obligation under international law to gradually make primary education free for all, that international obligation does not automatically translate into a constitutional obligation to provide immediately free basic education.[3]

However, some commentators have argued that the current system for financing basic education violates both FC s 29(1)(a) and FC s 9. The basic structure of the system is as follows: South African public schools are separated into five quintiles based upon the economic wealth of the surrounding community. The top quintile receives the least funding from government while the bottom quintile receives the most. Schools are then entitled to charge fees agreed to by 51% or more of the learner's parents in order to make up for any shortfall and to provide for additional services. In order to avoid the exclusion of some poorer learners that necessarily follows from a fee scheme, the South African Schools Act[4] creates a fee exemption system. Schools that charge fees must grant full or partial exemptions to parents for whom the fees are more than a set percentage of their income. In theory, this system should comply with the obligation that education must be financially accessible to all: those who can afford to pay fees will pay and those who cannot will receive free, subsidised education.

Daria Roithmayr correctly notes that schools have not been granting exemptions to parents who cannot afford to pay, have discriminated against learners who do not pay fees and that many people are unwilling to apply for exemptions because of the embarrassment that accompanies an admission of poverty.[5] These flaws in implementation, she argues, mean that the fee-exemption system does not meet the government's obligation to provide a basic education for everyone.

Similar challenges have been brought in state courts in the United States to so-called 'fee waiver' systems. The argument is that such schemes constitute a violation of that state's guarantee of free education. For example, in Hartzell v Connell, parents were not required to pay fees for a basic education but were required to pay fees for their children's extra-curricular activities.[6] A fee waiver policy was instituted to ensure that the fees would not deny children the opportunity of participating in extra-curricular programmes. A parent challenged the 'fee waiver'

[1] FC s 39(1). For more on FC s 39(1) see H Strydom & K Hopkins 'International Law and International Agreements' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) §30.3.

[2] FC s 29(1)(a)'s obligation is immediate. The CRC obligation is progressively realisable. This difference suggests that the Final Constitution prefers that a basic education be made immediately available to all, by whatever means necessary, and that basic education ought not to be postponed in order to realise a free education for all.

[3] See §57.2*(a)*(ii)(bb) infra for further discussion of why 'basic education' in FC s 29(1) does not mean free or equal, and why solace might better be found in the commitment to equity and to historical redress in FC s 29(2).

[4] Act 84 of 1996.

[5] Roithmayr (supra).

[6] 679 P2d 35 (Cal 1984)('Hartzell').

scheme on the grounds that it violated the state's constitutional guarantee to free basic education. The court first held that extra-curricular activities did form part of the California State Constitution's free education guarantee.[1] Next, the court concluded that the imposition of fees for educational activities, even with a waiver policy, violated the free education guarantee:

> The free school guarantee reflects the people's judgement that a child's public education is too important to be left to the budgetary circumstances and decisions of individual families. It makes no distinction between needy and non-needy families. Individual families needy or not, may value education more or less depending upon conflicting budget priorities.[2]

Bird CJ further noted that the stigmatization that flows from categorising students as fee-paying and non-fee-paying and characterized both the waiver procedure and its outcomes as a 'degrading experience'.[3]

Hartzell's 'fee waiver schemes' are analogous to the South African fee exemption system in two significant ways. First, they both aim to assist 'needy' families who are unable to pay the required fees. Second, the decision to charge fees, and the amount of fees charged, are determined by school governing bodies made up of both parents and educators from the communities.

No one wants a second-class, a third-class or a no-class education. Roithmayr has argued, persuasively, that just such an inferior education is what many, perhaps the majority, of South African primary and secondary school students receive. The problem with Roithmayr's analysis — as Fleisch and Woolman point out — is that she attempts to redress ongoing problems of adequacy, access and equality through the elimination of school fees.[4] Fleisch and Woolman explain why, as an empirical matter, as well as a matter of policy and law, the

[1] Hartzell (supra) at 42 (The Court held: 'Such activities are 'generally recognized as a fundamental ingredient of the educational process.' They are [no] less fitted for the ultimate purpose of our public schools, to wit, the making of good citizens physically, mentally, and morally, than the study of algebra and Latin.')

[2] Ibid at 43.

[3] Ibid at 44. But see Chandler v South Bend Community Corp (1974) 312 NE 2d 915 (A child challenged the charging of rental for textbooks on the basis that it violated the state constitutional guarantee to free education. The Court however took the view the texts books did not fall within the ambit of the guarantee and accordingly did not have to deal with whether the waiver scheme was unconstitutional.)

[4] Let us assume, for the sake of argument, that Roithmayr's comparison of Pretoria Boys High School to a tree school in Limpopo demonstrates to the Justices that some impairment of human dignity, and perforce, equality, has taken place. In many equality cases, eliminating the apparent source of the offense would enhance human dignity. However, in this particular case, the elimination of the school fees would not improve the per capita spending on the tree school (indeed, given the dependency of the state on fees for cross-subsidisation it might well diminish it) and thus not improve the human dignity of the those learners. At the same time, the elimination of school fees and caps on spending could well result in the impairment of the dignity of all school-going children. All children would be funded at the same non-fee supplemented rate. Only the most cynical view of human nature would hold that one's dignity is repaired by witnessing the suffering of others. Whatever the apt description of this response, schadenfreude perhaps, it can hardly be equated with according a class of invidiously differentiated learners greater dignity. And yet, the equality argument intended to dismantle the school fee system entails just such a result.

elimination of the current fee scheme will not create the conditions for an adequate basic education or a meaningfully equal education. So while we must acknowledge the validity of some of the concerns raised by Roithmayr, as well as by the California Supreme Court in Hartzell, we remain unconvinced that these problems (of implementation) warrant a finding that a fee-exemption system is necessarily unconstitutional.[1]

First, the empirical evidence strongly suggests that school fees are in fact not the primary financial obstacle to education. Rather, other education-related costs – transport, uniforms, food, books and stationary — constitute far more serious barriers to access.[2] As a result, while school fees are an easily identifiable barrier

[1] Roithmayr and Fleish/Woolman's respective positions would, at first blush, seem entirely antithetical. However, the self-conscious irony of Roithmayr's article flows from her recognition that a system of user fees may well be necessary to ensure the progressive realisation of equality, quality and accessibility in our public schools. Fleisch and Woolman note this convergence in their respective positions and the extent to which these shared beliefs require retention of and modification to the existing user fee system in public schools. See Fleisch & Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of School Fees' (supra) at 119-120.

[2] See Fleisch & Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of School Fees' (supra) at 113-114. Fleisch and Woolman note that the Vuk'nyithate Research Consortium (VRC) findings relied on by Rothmayr actually support their claims. First, the VRC study of out-of-school children demonstrates that the reasons for a family's decision not to enrol children in school was not primarily related to fees, but was the result of a combination of factors including deep poverty, lack of family structure, stability and support, residential mobility, illness, learning barriers and temperament, and community violence. Second, school fees do not even rate a mention in the executive summary's discussion of the various barriers to school access and the various causes of absenteeism. Third, the study notes that even when fees are discussed by interviewees, fees as a barrier to access are invariably mentioned in conjunction with school uniforms. Fourth, the study identifies abject poverty as the primary cause of absenteeism. However, abject poverty takes a variety of forms and has a number of pernicious effects on school attendance. In short, while the study supports the conclusion that poverty impedes some children's access to a basic education, it clearly does not support the conflation of poverty, failure to pay school fees and restricted educational access. K Porteus, G Clacherty & L Mdiya 'Understanding Out-of-School Children and Out-of-Age Learners in the Context of Urban Poverty in South Africa' (2000) Vuk'uyithathe Research Consortium. The VRC study takes great care to unpack and rank the range of economic pressures attendant to school-going under conditions of abject poverty. For example, according to the Consortium study, if a child is not within walking distance of her school, transport costs are the highest cost of attending school borne by the household.' Ibid at 36. This statistic is especially significant given that out-of-school children in this urban area are far more likely than the in-school control group to live out of walking distance from a language appropriate school. The study then establishes that uniforms (including shoes) are the 'largest initial investment required for school entry.' For poor families with children out-of-school, the purchase of the school uniforms becomes the primary barrier to entry. Ibid at 36-43. And where do school fees rank as a barrier to entry? The VRC report concludes that 'in reality, (school fees) were less of a practical barrier than the school uniform. . . . They represent the 'last straw' when combined with other costs.' School fees for the children in the poorest quintile averaged R50 per year. The VRC study estimates that the annual cost of attending an out-of-walking distance school without a feeding programme is approximately R950. Even with respect to within-walking-distance schools, the lion share of school attendance costs takes the form of uniforms, shoes, stationery, books, school 'donations' and pressure to provide 'pocket money'. Thus, the VRC study strongly suggests that while abject poverty is a barrier to a basic education for 2% to 3% of the population, school fees do not appear to be a meaningful factor for access or attendance. Ibid at 43-44. According to Perry, the most current statistics available suggest that 92% of children in the age range 7 to 13 years are enrolled in age appropriate grades. However, a large number of 13 year olds remain in Grade 8. When the statistics are adjusted to account for this state of affairs, the actual proportion of children between 7 and 13 years attending school stands at 97%. See H Perry & F Arends 'Public Schooling between 1975-2000' in A Kraak (ed) A Directory of Human Resource Development in South Africa (2003).

to access to a small cohort of schools, it does not follow that school fees, rather than uniform costs or the scarcity of schools in rural areas, are to blame for the exclusion of many learners from many, if not most, public schools. Second, eliminating school fees will remove several billion rand from the public fiscus and diminish the capacity for multiple forms of cross-subsidization between privileged and impoverished communities.[1] Learners from poor and working class families can secure access to more privileged institutions through effective fee exemption. Fees enable the State to direct money away from schools in the top quintiles to schools in the bottom quintiles. Fees keep middle class parents from leaving the public school system: by remaining within the system, good school stock is preserved (through private funding) and learners from more privileged backgrounds remain committed, as citizens in training, to such democratic institutions as public schools.[2] Finally, the arguments against school fees are based

[1] Elimination of school fees would not only eliminate R3.5 billion from the public purse for public school education. It would mean that all schools would be entitled to the same minimum per learner expenditure — and whatever level of inadequacy that may entail. State expenditure on education will increase slightly over the next few years. Department of Finance Review of the Financing, Resourcing and Costs of Education in Public Schools (2003) 52. However, such growth will not offset the loss associated with the discontinuation of fees (8%). Department of Education Intergovernmental Fiscal Review (2003) 79.

Arguments about equality are invariably complicated by disputes about whether equality should be measured in terms of opportunity or outcome. Should equality in education be measured in money spent per learner or achievements per learner? Should equality in education be measured in terms of public monies spent per learner or in terms of public and private monies spent per learner? However, even analysts who make such distinctions — and acknowledge room for debate — offer problematic examples of equality and inequality. For example, Fiske and Ladd argue that 'if an educational system were reformed in such a way that more resources were provided for learners at the bottom, making those students better off in absolute terms, but at the same time even more resources were made available to schools at the top, the new system would be deemed even more inequitable than the old.' E Fiske & H Ladd 'Financing Schools in Post-apartheid South Africa: Initial Steps toward Fiscal Equity' Paper prepared for the International Conference on Education and Decentralisation: African Experiences and Comparative Analysis, Johannesburg, (10-14 June 2002)(On file with authors) 4. But this argument suggests that if the new system offered a meaningful education in terms of opportunity and outcome for the least well-off, but the old system offered none, the old system is to be preferred. That may fit some definition of equality, but one might reasonably ask whether one would want it. It seams clear that what strikes Fiske and Ladd as objectionable is that the new system reproduces basic patterns of inequality: that is, the wealthy remain wealthy and remain proportionally better off than the less well off. However, if equality is to be a meaningful concept, then it must take cognizance of improvements in opportunity and outcome which realise palpable differences in the lives of the less well off. The primary issue for those concerned with inegalitarian distributions should be whether citizens of unequal economic standing in a democracy will remain equals in so far as they engage one another as citizens. Fleisch & Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of School Fees' (supra) at 119.

[2] Two further policy considerations suggest the intrinsic value of a user fee system. Both are grounded in a commitment to participatory democracy. The first argument based on democracy focuses primarily on the integrity of the polity and the creation of a common set of referents. Public schools, through both curriculum and status, make South Africa their students' primary reference point for identity formation, and not, as with many private schools, England, Europe, North America or the Antipodes. The argument about needing to maintain white and/or wealthy families within the system in order to keep politically influential persons happy is a red herring. Public schools with fees may well make middle class black and white parents happy. However, the ultimate aim of user fees is not to reinscribe existing patterns of class disparity. Rather the current system, or a modified system, ensures that the vast majority of South African children continue to participate in public institutions and see themselves as part of the almost entirely on problems of implementation and abuse by schools. In our view, the answer to these problems is, and has always been, the proper enforcement of the regulations and the elimination of fees for the poorest schools.

In 2005, government, while keeping the basic fee exemption system intact, made a few important changes. Under the new system, the government classifies each school as either a 'fee school' or a 'no-fee' school.[1] No-fee schools must be schools in the bottom two quintiles of schools. Fee schools are still entitled to charge fees. However, the schools must grant total exemptions to parents for whom the annual fee is 10% or more of their annual income. Partial exemptions are available to parents for whom the fee forms between 2% and 10% of the learner family's income.[2]

Despite these improvements, Faranaaz Veriava has charged that the new system still falls short of FC s 29(1)(a)'s obligations.[3] Indeed, it is possible that a proper evidentiary platform could be laid for a challenge to the fee exemption system. However, the evidentiary basis necessary to support a finding of unconstitutionality will have to show that such abuse is pervasive, that fees themselves (and not other education-related costs) are the actual barriers to access and that universal free education would result in improved access to a better education by a significant cohort of learners. Moreover, we think that any Brandeis brief challenging fees in toto must overcome the presupposition of SASA's drafters — and ourselves — that a well-calibrated fee system can be used to improve the education of learners from historically disadvantaged backgrounds.

larger political community. The second argument, as suggested to us by Danie Brand, advances the claim that the user fee system — in concert with a commitment to greater government funding — may 'further important principles of community engagement and interdependence'. D Brand 'Community Participation and User Fees' (Unpublished manuscript on file with authors). By promoting community engagement and parental responsibility, even a modified fee system may foster the kinds of changes in institutional culture that, as much as increased resources per learner, affect the quality of education. Indeed, Brand suggests that values critical to a democracy — participation, citizenship, cooperation, self-governance — can 'potentially be advanced by the user fee system not only within specific schools, but also across racial and class lines . . . if creative forms of cross-subsidisation can be implemented.' Ibid at 4. See also Fleisch & Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of School Fees' (supra) at 121.

[1] For a useful summary of both the old and new regulatory schemes, see F Veriava 'The Amended Legal Framework for School Fees and School Funding: A Boon or a Barrier?' (2007) 23 SAJHR 180.

[2] The new norms include other changes to improve the fee-exemption system to make it easier for poor learners to get exemption and more difficult for schools to discriminate against learners who do not pay fees: (a) schools are prohibited from charging anything other than a basic school fee subject to strict exemption criteria; (b) clear terms prohibit the more pernicious forms of discrimination such as denial of access to school, sport or cultural activities, refusing to provide reports, suspension and verbal or non-verbal abuse; (c) an onus is placed upon the School to prove it has implemented the regulations before instituting legal action against a parent; and (d) automatic exemptions are extended to parents who receive child care grants (whereas in the past the government encouraged parents to use the grants to pay school fees.) Veriava (supra) at 187.

[3] Veriava contends that the manner in which the schools are put into the appropriate quintile fails to take account of the fact that many poorer students travel to school in richer areas with fee-charging schools. Ibid at 188-189.

(zz) Physical accessibility

Physical accessibility requires that learners are in fact able to travel from their homes to schools. A 2000 study suggests that 'if a child is not within walking distance of her school, transport costs are the highest cost of attending school borne by the household.'[1]

(ccc) Acceptability

We often presume that education, no matter what its content, is an unalloyed good.[2] But that is not so. Education can just as easily be manipulated to perpetuate human rights abuses as it can to end them.[3] International law requires that education be 'directed to the full development of the human personality and to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms.'[4] The Constitutional Court has reinforced the view that teaching children the value of human rights — and in particular the values of equality and diversity — is essential if they to become adults who fully participate in the governance of our society.[5]

While our courts will likely be loath to interfere with the judgment of educators who design school curricula, FC s 29(1)(a) could support a claim that what our children are being taught is either biased or blatantly wrong. For example, in the United States there has been significant debate over the teaching of intelligent design or evolution in public schools. In Epperson v Arkansas, the US Supreme Court overturned a state law that prohibited the teaching of evolution.[6] In Edwards v Aguillard, the US Supreme Court hewed to an even stricter

[1] Porteus, Clacherty & Mdiya (supra) at 44 as quoted in Fleisch & Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of School Fees' (supra) at 114.

[2] K Beiter The Protection of the Right to Education by International Law (2006) 493.

[3] Ibid at 493 (The author quotes an example of the Special Rapporteur of how schools in Rwanda were used to enforce theories of ethnic differences between Hutus and Tutsis and thus to promote mutual Hutu-Tutsi prejudices.) See also K Tomasevski Education Denied (2003) 17 (She gives the following historical examples of how education has been abused. In Nazi Germany a mathematics textbook contained the following example: 'The construction of a lunatic asylum costs 6 million DM. How many houses at 15,000 DM each could have been built for that amount?' During the USSR's invasion of Afghanistan, the US printed maths books for Afghani refugees. They included this question: 'If you have two dead Communists, and kill three more, how many dead Communists do you have?' Finally, in Tanzania during the 1970's, children were required to solve this problem: 'A freedom fighter fires a bullet into an enemy group consisting of 12 soldiers and 3 civilians and all equally exposed to the bullet. Assuming one person is hit by the bullet, find the probability that the person is (a) a soldier, (b) a civilian.')

[4] Art 26(2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. See also Art 13(1) of the ICESCR; art 29(1)(b) of the Convention on the Rights of the Child; art 11(2)(b) of the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child.

[5] Pillay (supra) at para 104 ('Teaching the constitutional values of equality and diversity forms an important part of education.')

[6] 397 US 97 (1968).

line in finding unconstitutional a law that permitted evolution to be taught only in conjunction with creationism.[1] In Edwards, Brennan J stressed the > Families entrust public schools with the education of their children, but condition their trust on the understanding that the classroom will not purposely be used to advance religious views that may conflict with the private beliefs of the student and his or her family. Students in such institutions are impressionable and their attendance is involuntary.[2]

A similar situation occurred in post-World War II Japan. Textbooks often removed or softened confirmed reports of Japanese atrocities. A textbook author, Mr Saburo Ienaga, challenged the government's screening of text books and the censoring of some of his own works. The Japanese Supreme Court upheld the screening process, and thus the censorship, but stated that textbooks had to be accurate, neutral and fair as 'students do not have enough capability to criticise the content of class education and they can hardly choose a school or a teacher.'[3] In 1997, the Supreme Court partially upheld another claim by Mr Ienaga. Ienaga took issue with the state's deletion from a textbook of a description of Japan's biological experiments on 3000 people in northern China. The Court found that reliable evidence existed to substantiate the claim.[4]

The manner in which students are taught may also be contested in terms of 'acceptability'. Teachers must conduct themselves in a manner that respects the rights of their students. In Ross v New Brunswick School District No 15, a teacher who had published anti-Semitic pamphlets in his capacity as a private citizen, had, as a result, been given a non-teaching position.[5] The Canadian Supreme Court held that the decision to move the man to a non-teaching position was a justifiable limitation of his right to freedom of expression:

> Young children are especially vulnerable to the messages conveyed by their teachers. They are less likely to make an intellectual distinction between comments a teacher makes in the school and those the teacher makes outside the school. They are, therefore, more likely to feel threatened and isolated by a teacher who makes comments that denigrate personal characteristics of a group to which they belong. Furthermore, they are unlikely to distinguish between falsehoods and truth and more likely to accept derogatory views espoused by a teacher. The importance of ensuring an equal and discrimination free educational environment, and the perception of fairness and tolerance in the classroom are paramount in the education of young children. This helps foster self-respect and acceptance by others.[6]

'Acceptability' also requires that learners are not treated in a manner that violates their dignity. In South Africa, corporal punishment and initiation practices are

[1] 482 US 578 (1987).
[2] Ibid at 584.
[3] Ienaga v Japan No 1428 of 1986 (16 March 1993).
[4] Ienaga v Japan No 1119 of 1994 (29 August 1997).
[5] [1996] 1 SCR 825, 133 DLR (4th) 1.
[6] Ibid at para 82.

banned in all schools.[1] The ban on corporal punishment was the subject of a constitutional challenge in Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education.[2] The applicants contended that the ban violated their FC s 15 and FC 31 rights to religious belief and religious practice because corporal punishment constituted a core tenet of their belief system. The Christian Education Court rejected the challenge in terms of the rights to dignity and to security of the person:

> The outlawing of physical punishment in the school . . . represented more than a pragmatic attempt to deal with disciplinary problems in a new way. It had a principled and symbolic function, manifestly intended to promote respect for the dignity and physical and emotional integrity of all children.[3]

(ddd) Adaptability

Education must be 'flexible so that it can adapt to the needs of changing societies and communities and respond to the needs of students within their diverse social and cultural settings.'[4] Adaptation, like accessibility, speaks to the content of the curriculum and the means of deploying that content. The advent, and ubiquity, of computer technology probably requires that learners leave school properly equipped for the modern social and work environment.

Adaptation also means that a curriculum and a school environment must adapt to accommodate diverse people. This obligation dovetails with the right to non-discrimination. The accommodation of disabled learners is a paradigmatic example of the requirement of adaptability.[5] The constitutional obligation to ensure that that differently abled individuals receive comparable education was specifically recognised by Chief Justice Langa in Pillay:

> Disabled people are often unable to access or participate in public or private life because the means to do so are designed for able-bodied people. The result is that disabled people can, without any positive action, easily be pushed to the margins of society.[6]

Although some South African schools cater for disabled learners, they are in the minority and are unevenly spread across the provinces.[7]

[1] SSA s 10; SSA s 10A.
[2] 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC).
[3] Ibid at para 50.
[4] General Comment 13 'The Right to Education (art 13)' UN Doc E/C.12/1999/10 (21st Session, 1999) at para 6*(d)*.
[5] See Beiter (supra) at 507.
[6] Pillay (supra) at para 74.
[7] B Bekink & M Bekink 'Children with Disabilities and the Right to Education: A Call for Action' (2005) Stellenbosch Law Review 125, 138-139, 144 (Bekink and Bekink argue that it is both inadequate legislation and implementation that led to this state of affairs, but that recent changes in policy should improve the situation if properly implemented.) See also Department of Education White Paper: Special Needs Education: Building an Inclusive Education and Training System (July 2001) 16 (280 000 disabled learners were out of school in 2001.)

(iii) Adult Basic Education ('ABE')

The right to an adult basic education receives the same degree and the same kind of constitutional solicitude afforded all learners in terms of the right to basic education. Thus, while the right to ABE might not, as a technical or a textual matter have been necessary,[1] the express inclusion of ABE in the Final Constitution emphasizes the importance of redressing the past inequalities of South African education under apartheid. Indeed, a delay in the realization of the right will undermine one of the main reasons the drafters specifically mentioned it in the Final Constitution.

The right to ABE is not solely reactive. Rule identifies three further purposes: (a) to improve personal and community development; (b) to foster democracy; and (c) to develop sustainable livelihoods.[2] Rule criticizes current efforts because they appear to view ABE as an instrumental good designed solely to achieve economic growth.[3] From a constitutional perspective, the instrumental good is only of passing concern. ABE must be provided because it promotes dignity, equality, community, and democracy: in other words, ABE, like all forms of education, is intended to realize ensure the basic law's commitment to a society based upon liberty, equality and fraternity.

The Adult Basic Education and Training Act ('ABETA')[4] defines ABE[5] as all learning or training programmes for people over 16 up to the qualitative equivalent end of compulsory schooling.[6] As noted in the above discussion

[1] R Kriel 'Education' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 5, 1999) 38-4 (Kriel points out, firstly, that the World Declaration on Education for All simply states that all people, including adults, are entitled to a basic education without mentioning ABE separately. Secondly, ABE was not included in the Interim Constitution, but was still government policy.)

[2] P Rule '"The Time is Burning": The Right of Adults to Basic Education in South Africa' (2006) 39 Journal of Education 113, 122-123.

[3] Ibid at 120.

[4] Act 52 of 2000.

[5] The Act refers to 'adult basic education and training'. FC s 29(1)(b) refers only to adult basic education. Rule notes that this change reflects 'an official preoccupation with linking Education and Training'. Rule (supra) at 115. For the purposes of the constitutional right, there does not seem to be any meaningful difference between training and education. ABETA itself does not draw a distinction between the two. For the purposes of this chapter, we do not attempt to distinguish between 'education' and 'training'.

[6] The Act refers to 'framework level 1 as contemplated in the South African Qualifications Authority Act, 1995'. Level 1 is defined as:

> A learning programme leading to the award of a qualification or unit standards at NQF level 1 shall develop learners who demonstrate with regard to:
>
> (a) applied competence—
>
> (i) a general knowledge of one or more areas or fields of study, in addition to the fundamental areas of study;
>
> (ii) an understanding of the context within which the learner operates;
>
> (iii) an ability to use key common tools and instruments;
>
> (iv) sound listening, speaking, reading and writing skills;
>
> (v) basic numeracy skills including an understanding of the symbolic systems;
>
> (vi) an ability to recognise and solve problems within a familiar, well-defined context;

of basic education, these terms should be defined by substantive outcomes and not by formal criteria. Properly understood, ABE is basic education for adults and the definition of ABE simply uses the expected substantive outcome of compulsory schooling as a readily identifiable benchmark.[1] Indeed, it is only a benchmark: no reason exists to deny ABE to adults who received nine years of schooling under apartheid when the quality of that education likely failed to meet the currently accepted criteria for a basic education.[2]

The nature of the right to ABE is much the same as the right to a basic education: it is immediate, direct and does not depend on the availability of resources. The unqualified nature of the right raises innumerable questions about delivery in a country where, according to the most recent census, 8.6 million people over the age of 20 (34.9%) are functionally illiterate.[3] The difficulties in realizing the right must not dilute its content: genuine difficulties in delivery must be addressed — as a constitutional matter – through a combination of limitations analysis under FC s 36 and the crafting of innovative remedies in terms of FC s 38 and FC s 172.

In an attempt to meet these challenges, the legislature enacted ABETA. ABETA establishes a scheme of both public and private centres for ABE. Public centres are funded by the government and may, if other facilities cannot be found, make reasonable use of school facilities. The Act, however, contains three troublesome features. First, s 18, while requiring that centres do not discriminate in their admissions procedures, permits the Head of Department to refuse an application without the provision of reasons for refusal. Secondly, s 23 mentions that centres may raise funding through monies 'payable by learners for adult basic education and training provided by the centre'. However, the Act provides no regulation with regard to those fees or any possibility for an exemption. The legislative framework would seem to contemplate financial exclusions

(vii) an ability to recall, collect and organise given information clearly and accurately; and (viii) an ability to report information clearly and accurately in spoken and written form;

(b) autonomy of learning—

(i) a capacity to apply themselves to a well-defined task under direct supervision;
(ii) an ability to sequence and schedule learning tasks;
(iii) an ability to access and use a range of learning resources; and
(iv) an ability to work as part of a group.

[1] On increasing the breadth of adult education, see S Walters 'Adult Learning Within Lifelong Learning: A Different Lens, A Different Light' (2006) 39 Journal of Education 7 (Walters contends that the focus on adult education improperly limits the scope of life-long adult learning. She may be correct that, as a matter of policy, we should not focus unduly on basic education but concentrate equally on lifelong learning. However, as a matter of constitutional interpretation, it seems that 'adult basic education' should be given the same meaning as 'basic education'.)

[2] Rule (supra) at 115.

[3] Statistics South Africa Census 2001: Primary Tables South Africa: Census '96 and 2001 Compared (2004) 37. The definition of functionally illiterate is the combination of those who have no schooling and those who did not complete primary schooling. See J Aitchison & A Harley 'South African Illiteracy Statistics and the Case of the Magically Growing Number of Literacy and ABET Learners' (2006) 39 Journal of Education 89, 90.

— and thus an obvious prima facie limitation on the right to an adult basic education. Finally, ABETA criminalizes the offering of non-ABETA sanctioned ABE.[1] While these penalties may serve as a guarantee of quality, they have the potential (1) to discourage the provision of ABE, and (2) by requiring supervision by a state bureaucracy, to make ABE more expensive to provide.[2]

The Act faces serious barriers to effective implementation. ABE is primarily funded by provincial education departments. In 2002, provincial departments allocated a mere 0.8% of their budgets to ABE. In 2004/5 that figure dropped to 0.5%.[3] In addition, the number of Public Adult Learning Centres and the number of NGO's offering ABE has actually decreased over recent years.[4]

A further statistic indicates that the political support for ABE is more a matter of rhetoric than reality. South Africa has ratified the Dakar Framework of Action. The Framework would require South Africans to decrease levels of adult illiteracy by 50% by 2015. That commitment would require the education of some 7 million South African adults. At present, only 260 000 adults are enrolled in ABE programmes. The government would have to more than double that figure to 575 000 to have any hope of meeting that target.[5]

ABE is further undermined by its conflation of basic education with skills training for the workplace.[6] Firstly, skills-training does not necessarily provide the same outcomes as a basic education. Secondly, skills-training tends to focus on the employed. It thereby fails to connect adult illiteracy with large-scale structural unemployment (and abject poverty).[7]

(iv) Looking in the wrong place for 'free and equal' public schools

FC s 29(1)'s 'basic education' requires adequate, accessible, acceptable and adaptable public schools. Contrary to what many commentators would like to believe, 'basic' does not mean 'free', nor does it even mean 'equal'. Had the drafters intended basic education to carry such a burden, the text would surely reflect that choice. However, an explanation exists for the absence of such language in FC s 29(1). First, FC s 29(2) commits the state to the provision of public school education in the language of the learner's choice (where reasonably practicable) in an environment committed to equity and to historical redress. Second, FC s 9(2) and FC s 9(3) commits the state to the eradication of inequality on a host of listed (and unlisted) grounds.

[1] ABETA s 38.
[2] See J Aitchison 'Struggle and Compromise: A History of South African Adult Education from 1960-2001' (2003) 29 Journal of Education 125, 161-162.
[3] RA Wildeman Reviewing Provincial Education Budgets 2002 (2002) 16.
[4] Rule (supra) at 117 and 121.
[5] Ibid at 124.
[6] Ibid at 121.
[7] Ibid at 117-118.

(b) FC s 29(1)(b): Further Education

The Department of Education has identified the following three roles of further education in 'a knowledge-driven world':

> Human resource development: the mobilisation of human talent and potential through lifelong learning to contribute to the social, economic, cultural and intellectual life of a rapidly changing society.
>
> High-level skills training: the training and provision of personpower to strengthen this country's enterprises, services and infrastructure. This requires the development of professionals and knowledge workers with globally equivalent skills, but who are socially responsible and conscious of their role in contributing to the national development effort and social transformation.
>
> Production, acquisition and application of new knowledge: national growth and competitiveness is dependent on continuous technological improvement and innovation, driven by a well-organised, vibrant research and development system which integrates the research and training capacity of higher education with the needs of industry and of social reconstruction.[1]

The differences in purpose between a basic education and a higher education should be kept in mind as we consider the constitutional obligations that a right to further education imposes upon the State.

(i) Nature of the right

Unlike the strong positive right enshrined in FC s 29(1)(a), FC s 29(1)(b) provides only a 'weak' or 'qualified' positive right. It reads:

> Everyone has the right … to further education, which the state, through reasonable measures, must make progressively available and accessible.

The right to further education is quite clearly qualified by the terms 'reasonable measures'[2] and 'progressively available and accessible'. The Constitutional Court has, for better or worse,[3] made 'reasonableness' the bedrock of its socio-economic rights jurisprudence and has begun to give significant content to the term. Generally, the Court requires a comprehensive and coordinated plan, and that the plan be genuinely capable of implementation.[1] 'Progressive realisation' requires the state to 'move as expeditiously and effectively as possible towards [fulfilment of the right]. Moreover, any deliberately retrogressive measures … would require the most careful consideration and would need to be fully justified'.[2] The State is thus obliged to ensure that access to further education does not decrease and that it is improved with all deliberate speed. Finally, although it is not specifically phrased as an 'access right', the qualification that the State need only make the right 'progressively available and accessible' suggests that it should be interpreted much like the access rights found in FC s 26 and FC s 27.

[1] Department of Education Education White Paper 3: A Programme for the Transformation of Higher Education (1997) 12.

[2] FC s 29's wording is slightly different from that of FC ss 26 and 27. FC ss 26 and 27 employ the phrase 'reasonable legislative and other measures'. However, the catch-all 'other' in FC ss 26 and 27 seems to eliminate any meaningful difference between the two formulations.

[3] For a sustained critique of the reasonableness approach, see D Bilchitz Poverty and Fundamental Rights: The Justification and Enforcement of Socio-Economic Rights (2007). See also S Liebenberg 'Socio-Economic Rights: Evaluating Reasonableness Review and Minimum Core Obligations' in S Woolman & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Conversations: Proceedings of the Constitutional Law of South Africa Conference and Public Lecture Series (forthcoming 2008).

However, FC s 29(1)(b) does not, unlike the rights in FC ss 26 and 27, include the phrase 'available resources'. While some commentators have argued that the absence of this phrase should be largely ignored,[3] we prefer a reading that gives the difference in wording some real bite. Veriava and Coomans contend that a lack of resources alone will not justify a failure to make further education 'available and accessible' and that the state must make the necessary funds available. At the very least, Veriava and Coomans argue, it would entail that > where a state policy or programme is challenged in terms of this right, the criteria for assessing the reasonableness of the programme, could, in addition to those set out in Grootboom, also entail an evaluation of the sufficiency of funding available for the policy or programme's implementation.[4]

(ii) Content of the right

(aa) Defining 'Further Education'

The term 'further education' is not used in international law. International law refers instead to 'secondary education' and 'higher education'.[5] In South Africa,

[1] Sandra Liebenberg identifies five basic elements of a reasonable programme mentioned by the Court in Grootboom:
(a) it must be comprehensive and co-ordinated;
(b) it must be capable of realising the right;
(c) both the conception and implementation must be reasonable;
(d) it must be balanced and flexible and cater for the short, medium and long terms;
(e) it must be capable of responding to urgent needs.
S Liebenberg 'Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) 33-34.

[2] Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights General Comment 3 'The Nature of States Parties Obligations (art 2)' U.N. Doc. E/1991/23 (5th Session, 1990) at para 9. The Constitutional Court accepted the meaning assigned to the phrase by the General Comment in Grootboom (supra) at para 45. For more on 'progressive realisation', see Liebenberg 'Interpretation' (supra) at §33.5*(g)*.

[3] D Davis 'Education' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law (2nd Edition, 2005) 24-5–24-6.

[4] F Veriava & F Coomans 'The Right to Education' in D Brand (ed) Socio-economic Rights in South Africa (2003) 74.

[5] See, for example, ICESCR art 13(2); San Salvador Protocol to the Inter-American Convention for Human Rights art 13(3); Convention on the Rights of the Child art 28(1); African Convention on the Rights and Welfare of the Child art 11(3).

the Further Education and Training Colleges Act distinguishes between 'general education' (compulsory schooling), 'further education' (everything up to matriculation) and 'higher education' (everything after matriculation). However, that distinction does not make sense in the context of FC s 29(1). FC s 29(1) makes mention only of 'basic' and 'further' education. The only sensible interpretation of 'further education' in terms of FC s 29(1) is that it denotes all education after basic education.[1] It seems unnecessary and unwise to provide any further — or more restrictive — definition of the term. It should cover any and all forms of education that do not fall under 'basic education' or 'adult basic education'. Such education would encompass technical and vocational training as well as traditional tertiary education. It should embrace secondary education and pre-primary education if such schooling is not captured by the extension of the term 'basic education'.[2]

(bb) Negative dimension of the right

Only two cases directly address FC s 29(1)(b).

In Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Watchenuka, the Supreme Court of Appeal held that an absolute ban on study by asylum seekers, including further education, constituted an unjustifiable limitation of FC s 29(1)(b).[3] However, the Supreme Court of Appeal did endorse a procedure that would require asylum-seekers to apply for permission to study.

In Thukwane v Minister of Correctional Services, the applicant was a prisoner attempting to complete his law degree from prison.[4] He argued that he needed access to a computer and the internet to complete his studies. Van Loggerenberg AJ recognized that even this slight interference with the applicant's studies limited his FC s 29(1)(b) right.[5] However, the High Court held that the 'prison is a place of incarceration, not an internet café, private training institution, university campus, university hostel or the like'.[6] The potential security risks of permitting the applicant to access the internet combined with the fact that the ban would last only as long as the applicant was incarcerated — and only precluded him from courses that required internet access — easily justified the limitation.[7]

Thukwane stands for two important propositions. First, prisoners have the right to further education. Second, any interference with access to further education, no matter how slight, limits FC s 29(1)(b). The Constitutional Court has made it clear

[1] Veriava & Coomans (supra) at 74-75.

[2] While the term 'further' would seem to apply only to education that is more advanced than a basic education, that need not be so. 'Further' can also be read, as suggested here, as simply meaning any education that is not 'basic'. The advantage of this reading is that it would require the state to gradually introduce early childhood learning. The alternative interpretation would mean that, despite its proven benefits, early childhood education would not raise any constitutional obligations.

[3] 2004 (4) SA 326 (SCA).

[4] 2003 (1) SA 51 (T).

[5] Ibid at para 44 read with para 24.

[6] Ibid at para 39.

[7] Ibid at para 44.

that prisoners do not lose their rights at the prison door.[1] With regard to the second proposition, any limitation of this 'negative right' must take place in terms of FC s 36(1). In Jaftha v Schoeman and Others; Van Rooyen v Stoltz and Others, the Constiutional Court reached a similar conclusion regarding the limitation of the negative right found in FC s 26(1). Mokgoro J held that 'any measure which permits a person to be deprived of existing access to adequate housing limits the rights protected in s 26(1)'.[2] Limitations of negative rights can, therefore, only be justified in terms of FC s 36(1).

One of the more interesting issues to arise under FC s 29(1)(b)'s 'right to further education' involves affirmative action admission policies. In Motala & Another v University of Natal, the applicant challenged the admission procedures of the University's medical school on the basis that it treated Black applicants better than Indian applicants.[3] She argued both that the measure constituted unfair discrimination and that that it impaired her right under IC s 32*(a)* to 'equal access to educational institutions'. Hurt J dismissed both claims. He held that although both groups had been mistreated under apartheid, black South Africans had suffered considerably greater disadvantage than Indian South Africans. Granting black South Africans preferential treatment did not, therefore, fall afoul of the prohibition on unfair discrimination.[4] More importantly, for present purposes, Hurt J held that although IC s 32*(a)* applied to institutions of higher learning, IC s 32*(a)* had to be read — in the instant matter — with IC s 8(3)'s promotion and protection of measures designed to rectify historical wrongs.[5]

Questions of affirmative action policies in universities have not generated the same degree of heated debate in South Africa as they have in the United States. However, the continued existence of ethnic tensions in South Africa and the competition for limited university spots will likely lead to a challenge similar to Motala. In our view, the basic claim was correctly disposed of by Hurt J. A similar analysis should flow from the provisions of the Final Constitution. A policy which denies a person access to further education because of their race or their ethnicity would undoubtedly limit FC s 29(1)(b). However, that limitation could be justified in terms of FC s 36(1) if it was properly designed to redress past discrimination. And that is the acid test. The question is not whether affirmative admissions policies are acceptable. FC s 9(2) disposes of that question.[6] The question is, and will continue to be, what types of policies are constitutionally permissible? Can a university have a strict quota system? Can it make race a decisive factor? Or must race be only one of many factors?

[1] August & Another v Electoral Commission & Others 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC) at paras 18-19.

[2] Jaftha v Schoeman & Others; van Rooyen v Stoltz & Others 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC) at para 34.

[3] 1995 (3) BCLR 374 (D).

[4] Ibid at 383B-D.

[5] Ibid at 383E-F.

[6] See Minister of Finance & Another v Van Heerden 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC), 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC).

The US Supreme Court has adopted the requirement that an affirmative action policy must be 'narrowly tailored' to achieve the outcome of redress and must grant only the minimum necessary preference to disadvantaged candidates. The Court famously rejected strict quotas in Bakke.[1] In two recent cases decided together, Gratz v Bollinger[2] and Grutter v Bollinger,[3] the Court gave further content to what would and would not be permissible. Both cases concerned affirmative action policies at the University of Michigan. In Gratz, the Court invalidated the School's undergraduate admission program. The program assigned up to 150 points to each student: 20 points were awarded if the applicant was Black, Latino or Native American. The Gratz Court found that the system gave dispositive weight to an individual's race and did not permit individualized review. By contrast, the law school's admissions policy at issue in Grutter made race a relevant factor. However, rather than adopt a mechanical algorithm, the policy required that each applicant to be evaluated individually. The Court upheld that program.

The different history and constitutional framework of the United States suggests caution when using their precedents to understand uniquely South African concerns. However, a respectful engagement with US jurisprudence does serve to highlight a range of possible responses to affirmative action or restitutionary programmes. That said, FC s 9(2)'s explicit constitutional endorsement of measures to address past inequalities should lead to far greater leniency from our courts when evaluating affirmative action admissions policies. The political,[4] legislative[5] and constitutional demand for transformation will mean that Motala-like programmes, which would undoubtedly have been rejected in the US, will survive constitutional scrutiny under the Final Constitution.[6]

[1] Regents of the University of California v Bakke 438 US 265 (1978).

[2] 539 US 244 (2003).

[3] 539 US 306 (2003).

[4] See Department of Education White Paper 3 (supra) at 18 ('The principle of equity requires fair opportunities both to enter higher education programmes and to succeed in them. Applying the principle of equity implies, on the one hand, a critical identification of existing inequalities which are the product of policies, structures and practices based on racial, gender, disability and other forms of discrimination or disadvantage, and on the other a programme of transformation with a view to redress. Such transformation involves not only abolishing all existing forms of unjust differentiation, but also measures of empowerment, including financial support to bring about equal opportunity for individuals and institutions.' (our emphasis).)

[5] See the preambles of the National Student Financial Aid Scheme Act 56 of 1999 and the Higher Education Act 101 of 1997 ('it is desirable to redress past discrimination and ensure representivity and equal access') and s 39(1) of the Higher Education Act ('The Minister must, after consulting the CHE and with the concurrence of the Minister of Finance, determine the policy on the funding of public higher education, which must include appropriate measures for the redress of past inequalities, and publish such policy by notice in the Gazette.' (our emphasis))

[6] See C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 35.

(cc) Positive dimension of the right

The positive dimension of the right to a further education does not mean that everybody may study whatever course wherever they please. Indeed, at international law, the right is limited by the phrase 'equally accessible on the basis of capacity'. And it is worth taking note of the international community's construction of this phrase, before we turn back to our own. As Beiter notes, 'capacity' possesses two distinct denotations.[1] First, it denotes an individual applicant's intellectual capacity.[2] Second, it denotes the quantitative ability of educational institutions to accommodate students.[3] While the text of FC s 29(1)(b) does not mention capacity, we believe that the drafters would have assumed both forms of capacity — as internal demarcations of the right — before granting this positive entitlement.

Institutions of further learning need not admit (grant access to) students who lack the requisite intellectual capacity to complete a course of study. To require institutions to do so will prevent them from producing the kind of graduate who would serve the three ends of further education described above. At the same time, selection criteria based solely on previous school results would have the undesirable consequence of barring access to a large segment of the population who have historically received and continue to receive inferior schooling. And thus schools, and especially universities, in South Africa must take into account — in some instances — the limited capacity of some of its matriculants during the admissions process. Universities could, and do, base entrance on tests that 'assess the potential of students whose schooling results do not necessarily qualify them for university entrance but who nevertheless through these tests demonstrate an ability to succeed at university.'[4] They could also admit students for a probation period or create bridging courses to help disadvantaged students reach levels necessary for the meaningful use of further education.

Institutional capacity creates a related set of problems. No authority exists for the proposition that further education should be free. It should, rather, be affordable for all those who wish to pursue it.[5] That may not be immediately possible, but the State must make reasonable steps to ensure that further education becomes gradually more accessible. One example of government action to achieve that goal is the establishment of the National Student Financial Aid

[1] K Beiter The Protection of the Right to Education by International Law (2006) 524-525.

[2] According to Gerbert, the following methods would be acceptable methods to ascertain a student's capacity: (a) successful completion of prior education; (b) entrance exams; (c) occupational experience; (d) an interview; (e) a period of probation; (f) or a combination of the above. P Gerbert Das Recht auf Bildung nach Art. 13 des UNO-Paktes über wirtschaftliche, soziale und kulturelle Rechte und seine Auswrkungen aus das schweizerische Bildungswesen (1996) 461 cited in Beiter (supra) at 524.

[3] Beiter notes that the state may only restrict student numbers for acceptable reasons. It may not, for example, pander to the needs of the labour market. Beiter (supra) at 524.

[4] Veriava & Coomans (supra) at 75.

[5] Ibid at 76.

Scheme (NSFAS). The scheme provides loans and bursaries to students.[1] The NSFAS is funded primarily by government and the repayment of previous loans.[2] The criteria for eligibility for a loan are simply academic potential and financial need.[3] In 2005, it assisted 106 852 students,[4] 92.7% of whom were Black.[5] The total value of the awards was R1.2 billion.[6] Today's totals reflect a marked increase from 1994: only R70 million was awarded to just 25 574 students.[7] Of course, the NSFAS is not the only way that government funds further education. Government funds public universities and technikons directly,[8] provides money for research and research facilities[9] and facilitates further skills training in the workplace.[10] However, the greatest benefit of the student aid scheme is that, like the fee-exemption policy, it reserves benefits for the students most in need of aid, and through loan repayments provides an additional source of revenue.

57.3 LANGUAGE RIGHTS IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS[11]

> Everyone has the right to receive education in the official language or languages of their choice in public educational institutions where that education is reasonably practicable. In order to ensure the effective access to, and implementation of, this right, the state must consider all reasonable educational alternatives, including single medium institutions, taking into account: (a) equity; (b) practicability; and (c) the need to redress the results of past racially discriminatory laws and practices.

(a) Historical background

Conflict around the issue of language informs just about every stage of this Republic's history.[12] According to Giliomee, the language issue began to smoulder

[1] Act 56 of 1999.

[2] NSFAS Where Does the Money Come From? available at https://www.nsfas.org.za/web/view/donors/Donor/home (accessed on 22 October 2007)(74.42% came from Government and 18.25% from loan repayments.)

[3] NSFAS Student Guide to Funding available at https://www.nsfas.org.za/resources/109/NSFAS_universityBrochure011.pdf (accessed on 22 October 2007) 2.

[4] NSFAS 2006 Annual Report (2006) available at https://www.nsfas.org.za/resources/169/NSFASAnnualReport2006.pdf (accessed on 22 October 2007) 10 (fig 2).

[5] Ibid at 11 (fig 3).

[6] Ibid at 11.

[7] NSFAS NSFAS Fact Sheet available at https://www.nsfas.org.za/web/view/general/statistics/loanstatistics (accessed on 22 October 2007).

[8] Higher Education Act 101 of 1997 s 38G(1).

[9] National Research Foundation Act 23 of 1998.

[10] Skills Development Act 97 of 1998.

[11] Much of this section is drawn from B Fleisch and S Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of Single Medium Public Schools' (2007) 23 SAJHR 34.

[12] For the general contours of this history, see LM Thompson A History of South Africa (2001); W Beinart Twentieth Century South Africa. (2001). For an understanding of the links between culture, language and racism, see S Dubow Scientific Racism in Modern South Africa (1995).

in the ashes of the South African War when Britain introduced English as the sole official language in the ex-republics. While the principle of linguistic equality between English and Dutch was enshrined in the Union Constitution, the prevailing assumption amongst English speakers was that English would, ultimately, prevail. Indeed, in the 1920s, big business and the civil service were dominated by English speakers. While new appointments to the civil service were required to be bilingual, Afrikaners were vastly underrepresented. The reason: few Afrikaner children finished the seventh year of school required for state employment.[1]

The political pressure for single medium education surfaced during the rise of Afrikaner nationalism in the late 1920s and early 1930s. The demands began when the Dutch Reformed Church made the connection between white poverty and education, and particularly the failure of poor Afrikaner children to master the dual mediums of instruction: English and Dutch. The Church and other members of civil society placed increasing pressure on provincial governments to make Afrikaans, rather than Dutch, the medium of instruction for Afrikaans-speaking children. At the same time as they sought to supplant Dutch with Afrikaans, they pressed for single medium Afrikaans-speaking institutions. Between 1932 and 1958, single medium Afrikaans schools rose, as a proportion of all white schools, from 28 percent to 62 percent.[2] Over time, Afrikaner nationalist teachers, committed to a very particular cultural, linguistic, religious and political project, came to form the core of single medium Afrikaans school staffs.

Prior to the Second World War, South Africa possessed a complex network of language practices and an equally complex arrangement of single medium, dual medium and parallel medium institutions.[3] This surface complexity masked the increasingly strong shift, amongst the Afrikaner majority, towards a preference for the 'purity' of single medium schools. After the outbreak of the Second World War, the gloves on education policy came off.[4] The United Party articulated a vision of a unified white South Africa that could be achieved through a policy of compulsory bilingual education. The National Party hit the stumps on a campaign that emphasized a comprehensive, and exclusive, vision of Afrikaner cultural, linguistic, religious and political life. For the National Party, however, this ostensibly 'authentic' vision was primarily a vehicle for achieving political hegemony. Malherbe observes:

[1] See H Giliomee 'The Rise and Possible Demise of Afrikaans as Public Language' (2004) 10(1) Nationalism and Ethnic Politics 25.

[2] See EG Malherbe Education in South Africa: Volume 2 (1977).

[3] The diversity of language medium types and the various effects of these language practices was the pretext for EG Malherbe's famous study: The Bilingual School: A Study of Bilingualism in South Africa (1946).

[4] For an account of the conflict over bilingual schooling, see B Fleisch 'Social Scientists as Policy Makers: EG Malherbe and the National Bureau for Social and Educational Research, 1929-1943' (1995) 21 (3) Journal of Southern African Studies 349.

> The United Party maintained that in a bilingual country like South Africa it was wrong to segregate Afrikaans and English-speaking children living in the same community. By keeping the children together in the same school they would learn to appreciate each other as persons by playing on the same school teams, and thus lay the foundation for a common loyalty as South Africans. . . . Against this the National Party contended that bilingualism was not the aim of education . . . [T]he nationalists had no scruples about artificially segregating Afrikaans-speaking children in order to foster exclusive Afrikaner nationalism . . . Both parties wanted to use the education system to achieve their political ends — the one to unite, the other to divide.[1]

Despite the fact that both political parties clearly understood that language policy was a powerful mechanism for both galvanizing their political bases and an effective instrument for social engineering, one essential difference between the two parties remained. The National Party, and Afrikaner nationalists generally, experienced a recurring anxiety that 'one culture would be swamped by the other.'[2] The National Party exploited this anxiety — and the related fantasy that single medium public schools would eliminate the source of the anxiety — to win the 1948 elections.

Apartheid ushered in a new set of linguistic, cultural and political imperatives. No objective was more important, perhaps, than the use of the state machinery to privilege Afrikaans in Afrikaner communities and to place Afrikaans on an equal footing with its historical rival, English.

The logic of apartheid led, almost inexorably, to the Eiselen Commission Report on Native Education.[3] The Eiselen Report made a strong case for compulsory African language instruction — for African students — up to and through high school. While facially consistent with UNESCO's best linguistic practices, the policy was opposed by missionaries and local African 'pro-English' elites. The National Party presupposed that African 'language' communities had a vision of themselves similar to the comprehensive vision of the good life offered by the Afrikaner, Christian, nationalist community.[4] The foundation for such a [1] EG Malherbe Education in South Africa (supra) at 39.

[2] While originally articulated in the 1930s, the theme has retained its currency. Rassie Malherbe has expressed this anxiety as follows:

> Although in principle, dual and parallel medium institutions or instruction may, under suitable circumstances, be the appropriate option to fulfill the right to education in one's preferred language, it has the shortcoming that diminishing numbers of a particular language group puts tremendous pressure on that language and may in practice lead to an institution eventually becoming single medium. . . . [I]n parallel and dual medium schools the English component is numerically becoming progressively larger and that in relation, the other language component of such schools is becoming smaller and marginalized. Many parallel medium schools will eventually become completely English medium.

R Malherbe Submission to President Nelson Mandela on Behalf of a Group of Afrikaans Organizations (15 May 1996).

[3] Republic of South Africa 'Report of the Commission on Native Education: Chair: WNN Eiselen' (1951). See also LE Meyer 'A Report on South Africa's Black Universities' (1959) 4(3) Issue: A Journal of Opinion of the African Studies Association 12.

[4] For a fuller account of the issues of language in Bantu Education, particularly the work of WNN Eiselen as one of the key architects of apartheid, see C Kros Economic, Poltical and Intellectual Origins of Bantu Education, 1926-1951 (Unpublished PhD thesis, 1996, University of the Witwatersrand).

community for true believers and politicians alike was the 'single language school'.

To impose this vision of the good life and its requirement of single medium schools upon a largely resistant populace required social engineering on an unprecedented scale.[1] Despite the logistical and political hurdles, the National Party had, by the 1970s, achieved its aim. Most primary school learners were initially educated in their mother tongue. Few children were schooled in the 'wrong' language. Although African learners switched to English, and in some instances Afrikaans, at the end of primary school, these learners were still confined, as far as possible, to 'ethnic' schools in the townships and the homelands.[2]

In 1976, apartheid in education began to fall apart. The resistance did not flow from the rejection of single medium schooling. What African learners rejected was the imposition of both English and Afrikaans. The engineers of apartheid and Christian National Education had overplayed their hand.[3]

And yet the belief that single medium schooling would serve as the glue that bound the unique linguistic, cultural and religious features of the Afrikaner people together remained very much alive. It survived the Multi-Party Negotiating Forum ('MPNF') at Kempton Park. Interim Constitution s 32 continued to allow communities 'to establish, where practicable, educational institutions based on a common culture, language or religion, provided that there shall be no discrimination on the ground of race.'[4] Negotiations in the Constitutional Assembly around the issue of single medium schools under the Final Constitution were rather protracted and led to a deadlock between the ANC and the NP.[5]

[1] See M Horrell, A Decade of Bantu Education (1964); P Kallaway (ed) Apartheid and Education (1984). See also K Hartshorne Crisis and Challenge: Black Education 1910-1990. (1992) 186-217; J Hyslop The Classroom Struggle; Policy and Resistance in South Africa: 1940-1990 (1999).

[2] See Hartshorne (supra) at 203-207.

[3] For a contemporary account, see J Kane-Berman Soweto: Black Revolt, White Reaction (1979). See also C MacDonald Crossing the Threshold to Standard 3 (1991)(Macdonald notes that within African schools, from 1977 onward, the debate shifted away from Afrikaans as a medium of instruction, and focused on English as the medium of instruction. By the mid 1980s, most schools in the Department of Education and Training used mother-tongue instruction up until the end of Standard 2 (now Grade 4) and then switched to English as a medium of instruction. This practice became the focus of the HSRC Threshold Project in the late 1980s. This project identified the source of the high failure rate and subsequent drop-out problem as the abrupt shift from mother-tongue to English between Standards 2 and 3. Initially in some homelands, and then later on in some township schools in the 1990s, this shift to English started earlier and earlier. Within Afrikanerdom, the period was marked by a shift, in some quarters, from using the State as a means for preserving cultural identify to a set of policies that linked the community's survival to a new, and not necessarily, conducive discourse of minority rights.)

[4] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').

[5] On the history of the negotiations for the Interim Constitution, see LM Du Plessis 'A Background to Drafting the Chapter on Fundamental Rights' in B de Villiers (ed) Birth of a Constitution (1994) 89; H Corder 'Towards a South African Constitution' (1994) 57 Modern Law Review 491; H Corder & L Du Plessis Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights (1995). On the history of the negotiations for the Final Constitution, see G Heald Learning Amongst Enemies: A Phenomenological Study of the South African Constitution Negotiations from 1985 to 1998 (Unpublished PhD thesis, 2007, on file with authors); I Currie & J De Waal (eds) The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 1, 23; H Klug, J Swanepoel & S Woolman 'Constitutional History' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2008) Chapter 2.

The ANC, which viewed single medium Afrikaans schools as vehicles for continued racial exclusion and the perpetuation of minority privilege, refused to sanction any reference to single medium schools in the Final Constitution.[1] The NP, which viewed single medium schools as the last vestige of public power in the new dispensation, repeatedly pushed for their inclusion. The ANC, though assured of the passage of a national referendum on its version of the Final Constitution should constitutional negotiations fail, believed that the good will derived from some compromise on this issue, and a Final Constitution supported by all the major parties, outweighed the benefits to be secured from an outright victory on single medium schools. The NP knew that it could not win either in the Constitutional Assembly or at the polls. It therefore engaged in the kind of political brinkmanship that would satisfy its constituents, but ultimately capitulated when the ANC agreed to make some mention of single medium schools in the Final Constitution. Here – again – is the result of that compromise — FC s 29(2):

> Everyone has the right to receive education in the official language or languages of their choice in public educational institutions where that education is reasonably practicable. In order to ensure the effective access to, and implementation of, this right, the state must consider all reasonable educational alternatives, including single medium institutions, taking into account — (a) equity; (b) practicability; and (c) the need to redress the results of past racially discriminatory laws and practices.

Does this passage secure — as some authors argue — continued state support for all single medium public schools, and, in particular, single medium Afrikaans public schools? Or does it — as other authors contend — eliminate any express entitlement for single medium public schools except where such schools offer redress for communities whose mother tongues were repressed under English and Afrikaner rule? FC s 29(2) does not support either of these two readings. It rather raises the question of the extent to which the particularist demands of linguistic communities can be accommodated in our public schools.[2] FC s 29(2) also draws

[1] Then ANC spokesperson on education, Blade Nzimande wrote: 'The issue of single medium institutions is a mere red herring. What the NP wants the constitution to guarantee is the right to have exclusive white Afrikaner schools, not single medium institutions.' B Nzimande 'Address to the Constitutional Assembly — 7 May 1996', available at www.polity.co.za, (accessed on 1 December 2006). Evidence to support this supposition has emerged in recent work on school financing. Motala has recently shown that Afrikaans single medium schools continue to be financially advantaged in terms of state expenditure even after the end of apartheid. S Motala Education Transformation in South Africa: Finance Equity Reform in Schooling after 1998. (Unpublished PhD thesis, 2005, University of the Witwatersrand).

[2] For more on the history of Afrikaans as a medium of instruction in our public schools, see P Plüddemann, D Braam, M October & Z Wababa 'Dual-Medium and Parallel-Medium Schooling in the Western Cape: From Default to Design' PRAESA — Occasional Papers No. 17 (2004); W Visser 'Coming to Terms with the Past and the Present: Afrikaner Experience of and Reaction to the "New" South Africa' Seminar Lecture presented at The Centre of African Studies, University of Copenhagen (30 September 2004).

our attention, in the form of its sister clause FC s 29(3), to the space that the Final Constitution creates for the expression of the particularist claims of linguistic, cultural and religious communities and the ability of those claims to be (better) accommodated in independent schools.[1]

There exists, after some twelve years of constitutional jurisprudence, a sizeable body of case law that engages issues of language, culture and religion and their place in public schools and independent schools. The primary driver of this body of education litigation is the State's and the Afrikaans-speaking community's concern about the continued existence of single medium Afrikaans public schools. Put another way, both the State and the Afrikaans-speaking community want to know the extent to which the Final Constitution vouchsafes the right of school governing bodies to determine and to retain their language policies in the face of opposition from provincial government and/or small groups of learners and their parents who wish to change the language policies in these institutions.

This section of the chapter attempts to answer the following question: does South Africa's legal regime guarantee existing public single medium Afrikaans institutions — or any single medium school — the right to retain their language policies? It grounds the answer to that question in a particular reading of the history and the language of those constitutional provisions designed to promote and to protect religious, linguistic and cultural communities. This reading demonstrates that our constitutional democratic order affords religious, linguistic and cultural communities significant latitude when it comes to the establishment and the maintenance of private or independent schools designed to further particular comprehensive visions of the good life and offers such communities far less solace when it come to the establishment and the maintenance of single medium public schools.

However, this section takes a fairly hard-nosed view of the law that governs admissions policies and language policies in public schools. After mapping the most critical bodies of law — the Final Constitution, the South African Schools Act ('SASA'), the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act ('PEPUDA') and our courts' nascent jurisprudence — on to the admissions policies and language policies of public schools, this section arrives at the following conclusions. First, some real constitutional space remains for single medium public schools – and, therefore, for single medium Afrikaans public schools. Second, the hard truth is this: the constitutional and statutory entitlement to such schools — under current historical conditions — is relatively weak. A recent line of cases in the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal suggests that 'language and culture' will not be so readily permitted to determine the admissions policies of a public school and that single-medium Afrikaans schools are fighting a rear-guard, and potentially losing, battle with the State over transformation.[1] Third, the upshot of this legal analysis is that communities which wish to preserve their linguistic, cultural and religious ways of being in the world will find themselves on much more solid legal ground when they create independent schools — in terms of FC s 29(3) — designed to further their comprehensive visions of the good. Afrikaans-speaking communities, like any other linguistic, cultural or religious community, have no special status in our liberal democratic order and must be able to create independent schools if they wish to be assured of retaining their cultural and linguistic integrity.

[1] S Woolman 'Defending Discrimination: On the Constitutionality of Independent Schools that Promote a Particular, If Not Comprehensive, Vision of the Good Life' (2007) 18 Stellenbosch Law Review 31.

(b) Drafting history of the language provisions in the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution

In this section, we examine the drafting history of the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution and some of the jurisprudence generated during the brief period between these two founding documents. This history goes some distance towards explaining why political group rights — and rights to public institutions such as single medium Afrikaans primary and secondary schools — were never enshrined in our basic law.

For starters, before the velvet revolution of 1994, most political claims based on culture, language, ethnicity and religion were greeted with suspicion, and, sometimes, outright hostility by the majority of South Africans.[2] From the passive resistance of Ghandi, through worker movements of the early 20th century to the Freedom Charter, the preferred language of liberation was that of human rights discourse. The liberation movement's utilization of rights discourse reflected a considered rhetorical response to romantic assertions of white, Christian, English and Afrikaner supremacy.

The African National Congress ('ANC') universalist orientation provides a partial explanation for the failure of most group-based claims during CODESA and the MPNF. The ANC rejected every attempt to entrench what it termed

[1] This battle is not only being lost in the courts. Students themselves are choosing English medium (or at least parallel-medium public) schools over single-medium Afrikaans public schools. Given that each secondary school draws on one or two primary schools, the fact that there are approximately 300 single medium Afrikaans secondary schools means that the number of single medium Afrikaans schools (primary, secondary and combined) falls somewhere between 600 and 850. Even the higher figure means that single medium Afrikaans public schools constitute only 2% of the estimated 30 000 public schools in the country. A colourable claim can be made that such a low figure warrants some degree of judicial solicitude. On the other hand, no number, large or small, can be used to justify overt discrimination or radical inequity in the distribution of such an important public good as education.

[2] See A Sachs 'Opening Remarks' KAS Multiculturalism Seminar (1999) available at www.kas.org.za/Publications/SeminarReports/Multiculturalism/SACHS1.pdf (accessed on 1 April 2005) 1; H Giliomee 'The Majority, Minorities and Ex-nationalities in South Africa and the Proposed Cultural Commission' KAS Multiculturalism Seminar (1999) available at www.kas.org.za/Publications/Seminar Reports/Multiculturalism/GILIOMEE (accessed on 6 January 2005) 37.

'racial group rights'.[1] For Afrikaner nationalists, political power would have to be traded for a negotiated settlement. That peace, and the retention of economic privilege by the white minority, would be vouchsafed by a firm ANC commitment to a justiciable Bill of Rights.[2] However, the Interim Constitution's and Final Constitution's rejection of group political rights was at least partially compensated by the 'notable levels of constitutional significance' to which cultural, linguistic and religious matters were elevated. The Final Constitution contains six different provisions concerned with culture, eight with language and four with religion.[3] The Final Constitution, as a liberal political document, carves out the 'private' space within which self-supporting cultural, linguistic and religious formations might flourish.[4]

[1] See S Woolman 'Community Rights: Religion, Language and Culture' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 58; S Woolman & J Soweto-Aullo 'Commission for the Promotion and the Protection of the Rights of Religious, Linguistic and Cultural Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24F.

[2] The problem of accommodating, and protecting, ethnic, religious and linguistic communities in a democratic state dominated the political debates and the lengthy constitutional negotiations that preceded the enactment of the Interim Constitution. Between 1986 and 1991, the South Africa Law Commission investigated various mechanisms for the protection of group rights. See South Africa Law Commission Group and Human Rights, Working Paper 25, Project 58 (1989). To this end, it solicited submissions from white right-wing intellectuals on the right of minorities to seek recognition as distinct societies and to resist assimilation into a common national culture. See South Africa Law Commission Group and Human Rights, Interim Report (1991). Notwithstanding the contentiousness of white minority concerns, the language and cultural rights provision of the Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights secured virtually universal consent from Multi-Party Negotiating Forum participants. See LM Du Plessis 'A Background to Drafting the Chapter on Fundamental Rights' in B de Villiers (ed) Birth of a Constitution (1994) 89, 93. IC s 31 attracted near universal assent because, though it echoed art 27 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, it avoided art 27's protection of discrete sets of rights-holders. Both the ANC and the NP eschewed more substantial minority rights protection.

However, community rights were not entirely anathema to the ANC or to the NP. The NP believed that white minority interests would be better protected at the level of distribution of governmental power, rather than by judicial mechanisms. The National Party proposed only non-discrimination guarantees and individual rights to speak a language or to participate in 'cultural life'. See Government of the Republic of South Africa Proposals on a Charter of Fundamental Rights (2 February 1993) arts 6 and 34. We have already noted the degree to which the ANC was ill-disposed towards recognition of community, minority, collective or group rights. The most the ANC would concede were rights to form 'cultural bodies', to religious freedom, and, perhaps, to require that the State act positively to further the development of the eleven South African languages to be treated as official languages. See African National Congress A Bill of Rights for a New South Africa: Preliminary Revised Version (1992) arts 5(3)-(7). The ANC insisted that minority rights qua static, non-demographically representative levels of political representation were unacceptable. The Bill of Rights constitutes the ANC's compromise between unfettered majority rule on the one hand, and structural guarantees for privileged, but now 'vulnerable', political minorities.

[3] Provisions of the Final Constitution dealing with culture, language and religion include, but are not limited to: (a) FC ss 9, 30, 31, 235 (culture); (b) FC ss 6, 29, 30, 31, 35, 235 (language); and (c) FC ss 9, 15, 30, 31 (religion).

[4] We can offer a three-fold, and relatively uncontroversial, explanation of the basic law's protection of such private space. First, every liberal democratic constitution is committed to zones of privacy, autonomy, self-governance and self-actualization that lie somewhere beyond the reach of the State. Second, the fragility of the new South African government married to a deeply religious South African citizenry obliged the government to cede authority over the manner in which 'private' or 'independent'

Justice Kriegler, in Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In Re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 ('Gauteng School Education Bill')(1996), offers a succinct account of the basis for and the extent of the basic law's protection of this private space in the educational domain.[1] IC s 32 (c), (soon thereafter, FC s 29(3)), and then extant national and provincial education legislation and subordinate legislation, collectively constitute > a bulwark against the swamping of any minority's common culture, language or religion. For as long as a minority actually guards its common heritage, for so long will it be its inalienable right to establish educational institutions for the preservation of its culture, language or religion . . . . There are, however, two important qualifications. Firstly, . . . there must be no discrimination on the ground of race . . . . A common culture, language or religion having racism as an essential element has no constitutional claim to the establishment of separate educational institutions. The Constitution protects diversity, not racial discrimination. Secondly, . . . [the Constitution] . . . keeps the door open for those for whom the State's educational institutions are considered inadequate as far as common culture, language or religion is concerned. They are at liberty harmoniously to preserve the heritage of their fathers for their children. But there is a price, namely that such a population group will have to dig into its own pocket.[2]

Justice Kriegler offers no comment on, and certainly no support for, the contention that communities bound by common culture, language or religion have some entitlement to state support. Quite the opposite. While sympathetic to the belief that communities bound by common culture, language or religion are an important source of meaning for many South Africans, Justice Kriegler seems to suggest that the post-apartheid State will no longer support public institutions that privilege one way of being in the world over another.

schools were permitted to serve rather narrow sectarian interests — even where the State could predict that privileged communities would use religion as a proxy for class so as to re-inscribe existing patterns of privilege. Third, the long history of school autonomy produced a reality, on the ground, that was simply impossible to ignore. The politically expedient motivations behind Afrikaner nationalism had ultimately created a genuine community — with a particular religious, cultural and linguistic vision of the good — that sought to further the ends of the community through single medium schools. But this last conclusion is, of course, where the rubber meets the road. The extent to which the Final Constitution protects 'public' space and provides 'public' goods in the service of particularist ends is the question at issue. Liberal constitutional theory, with its dual commitments to 'equality of respect' (individual dignity) and 'equality of recognition' (pluralism), is invariably at odds with itself over claims made on state resources for the particular ends of a specific cultural, linguistic or religious community. See S Woolman 'Community Rights: Language, Culture and Religion' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa: Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 58. See also C Taylor The Ethics of Authenticity (1991).

[1] Ex parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC)('Gauteng School Education Bill').

[2] Ibid at paras 39-42.

But the truth about the existence of continued public support within public institutions for particularistic, comprehensive visions of the good in our post-apartheid constitutional order is more complex, and more nuanced than one quote from a single judgment allows. Here, at least, is one place where the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence is not so radically under-theorized that it leaves us with no useful guidance as to how the State ought to engage the religious, cultural and linguistic communities that make the State up and how those communities ought to engage one another.

For example, in Fourie, the Constitutional Court found that the State could not continue to enforce common-law rules and statutory provisions that prevented same-sex life partners from entering civilly-sanctioned marriages and that denied same-sex life partners the status, the responsibilities and the duties enjoyed by opposite-sex life partners.[1] State-sponsored discrimination would not be tolerated. The Fourie Court did not make the same demands of religious denominations or religious officials. It held that the Final Constitution had nothing to say about religious prohibitions on gay and lesbian marriage and could not be read to require religious officials to consecrate a marriage between members of a same-sex life partnership. So long as religious communities do not distribute public goods — or are not the sole distributors of such goods — the State, on the Fourie Court's account, cannot justifiably coerce a religious community into altering its basic beliefs and practices.[2] But therein lies the rub for advocates of single

[1] Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie (Doctors For Life International & Others, Amici Curiae*)*; Lesbian & Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 354(CC)('Fourie'). See also Fourie v Minister of Home Affairs 2005 (3) SA 429 (SCA), 2005 (3) BCLR 241 (SCA).

[2] The Fourie Court wrote:

> [The amici's] arguments raise important issues concerning the relationship foreshadowed by the Constitution between the sacred and the secular. For many believers, their relationship with God or creation is central to all their activities. It concerns their capacity to relate in an intensely meaningful fashion to their sense of themselves, their community and their universe. For millions in all walks of life, religion provides support and nurture and a framework for individual and social stability and growth. . . . They are part of the fabric of public life, and constitute active elements of the diverse and pluralistic nation contemplated by the Constitution. Religion is not just a question of belief or doctrine. It is part of a people's temper and culture, and for many believers a significant part of their way of life. . . . In the open and democratic society contemplated by the Constitution there must be mutually respectful co-existence between the secular and the sacred. . . . The test, whether majoritarian or minoritarian positions are involved, must always be whether the measure under scrutiny promotes or retards the achievement of human dignity, equality and freedom. . . . The objective of the Constitution is to allow different concepts about the nature of human existence to inhabit the same public realm, and to do so in a manner that is not mutually destructive and that at the same time enables government to function in a way that shows equal concern and respect for all.

Fourie (supra) at paras 90-96. The Fourie Court commits itself to five propositions that are fundamental for associational rights generally, and for religious, cultural and linguistic community rights in particular. First, religious, cultural and linguistic communities are a critical source of meaning for the majority of South Africans. Second, religious, cultural and linguistic communities create institutions that support the material, intellectual, ethical and spiritual well-being of many South Africans. Third, religious, cultural and linguistic associations, as part of civil society, play an essential role in mediating the relationship between the State and its citizens. Fourth, while religious, cultural and linguistic associations are entitled to articulate — and make manifest through action — their 'intensely held world views', they may not do so medium public schools. Public schools are public, not private, entities, and the state has an overriding obligation to ensure equal treatment of all of its citizens by all of its state officials (including teachers and principals). Single medium public schools that engage in exclusive and discriminatory linguistic admissions practices would appear to constitute, on their face, a departure from the requirements of the rights to equality and to dignity.[1]

Is there space within our liberal constitutional framework for public institutions that service the (exclusive and discriminatory) ends of religious, cultural and linguistic communities with relatively comprehensive visions of the good? A significant number of constitutional structures and justiciable rights in the Final Constitution, as well as our Constitutional Court's gloss on the basic law, support the proposition that such space exists.

For example, the Commission for the Promotion and the Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities ('CRLC') does not merely regulate disputes between the state and various communities or resolve conflicts between communities themselves. The CRLC is charged with the active promotion of such communities though the creation of cultural councils. Moreover, it possesses a clear mandate to build a constitutional democracy predicated on ethnic diversity and value pluralism.[2]

FC s 15(2) offers another clear example of state accommodation of comprehensive visions of the good within existing state structures. FC s 15(2) reads: 'Religious observances may be conducted at state or state aided institutions provided that (a) those observances follow rules made by the appropriate public authorities; (b) they are conducted on an equitable basis; and (c) attendance at them is free and voluntary.' Assume one religion represents all learners in a public school: the public school is well within its rights to hold religious observances. Assume learners from several different religions attend a given public school: the public school may legitimately observe multiple religious rituals for its different in a manner that unfairly discriminates against other members of South African society. Fifth, although the 'intensely held world views' and practices of various religious, cultural and linguistic associations must, by necessity, exclude other members of South African society from some forms of membership and of participation, such exclusion does necessarily constitute unfair discrimination. Indeed, the Fourie Court's decision makes it patently clear that to the extent that exclusionary practices are designed to further the legitimate constitutional ends of religious, cultural and linguistic associations, and do not have as their aim the denial of access to essential primary goods, then our constitution's express recognition of religious, cultural and linguistic pluralism commits us to a range of practices that the Constitutional Court will deem fair discrimination. The refusal of some religious officials to consecrate same-sex life partnerships as marriages under religious law is but one form of fair discrimination.

[1] See S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36. See also N Haysom 'Dignity' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 123.

[2] Woolman & Soweto-Aullo 'CRLC' (supra).

constituencies. In either case, public space is being used to advance the ends of specific religious communities.[1]

The same must be said of the extent to which our constitutional order takes customary law and traditional leaders seriously. Traditional leaders have an entire chapter of the Final Constitution and a significant amount of normal legislation devoted to the exercise of their customary authority within a constitutional democracy. And here, it is not a matter of two systems operating in parallel or the traditional within the constitutional.[2] Traditional leaders often exercise direct political authority over their constituents — and it is often the case that constituents turn to such leaders when municipal or provincial authorities fail to deliver services or resolve disputes. The traditional leaders exercise public power in public spaces.

The Final Constitution also places customary law on an equal footing with legislation, subordinate legislation, regulation and common law. FC s 39(2) reads: 'When interpreting any legislation, and when developing the common law or customary, every court, tribunal or forum must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.' FC s 39(2) says nothing about two bodies of law — one public and one private. Indeed, as the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Court famously put it: 'There is only one system of law. It is shaped by the Constitution which is the supreme law, and all law, including the common law, derives its force from the Constitution and is subject to constitutional control.'[3] The Constitutional Court has mediated conflicts between individual traditional interests and community traditional interests governed by both traditional bodies of law and statutory bodies of law as if there is but one system of law shared by multiple groups, associations and social formations. In Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others, the Constitutional Court found that the customary law rule of male primogeniture — and several statutory provisions that reinforced the rule — impaired the dignity of and unfairly discriminated against the deceased's two female children because the rule and the other impugned provisions prevented the children from inheriting the deceased's estate.[4] However, it is the manner in which the Bhe Court negotiates two different kinds of claim for equal respect — from within the traditional community and from the perspective of western constitutional norms — that is most instructive for our current purposes. The Bhe Court characterizes the customary law of succession in terms that validate its spirit without necessitating that the Court be beholden to its letter. By having

[1] See P Farlam 'Freedom of Religion, Conscience, Thought & Belief' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service, December 2003) Chapter 41. See also I Currie & J De Waal (eds) The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 336.

[2] See TW Bennett & C Murray 'Traditional Leaders' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 26.

[3] Ex parte President of the Republic of South Africa: In re Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) at para 44.

[4] Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe').

shown that the spirit of succession lies in its commitment to family cohesion, that the traditional family no longer coheres as it once did, and that the 'distorted' rules of customary law as frozen in statute and case law that 'emphasizes … patriarchal features and minimises its communitarian ones,' the Bhe Court closes the gap between constitutional imperative and customary obligation.[1] Had customary law been permitted to develop in an 'active and dynamic manner,' — and not manipulated or perverted by apartheid — it would have already reflected the Bhe Court's conclusion that 'the exclusion of women from inheritance on the grounds of gender is a clear violation of … [FC s] 9(3).'[2] Had customary law not been allowed to ossify, traditional communities would have noted how male primogeniture entrenched 'past patterns of disadvantage among a vulnerable group' and endorsed the Bhe Court's re-working of customary understandings of the competence 'to own and administer property' in a manner that vindicates a woman's right to dignity under FC s 10.[3] The Bhe Court is able, therefore, to assert that traditional communities have conceptions of dignity worth protecting without being obliged to endorse a rule that quite clearly offends the dignity interests of many women and female children within those communities.[4] And so, again, there are not two bodies of law — one public, one private. The force of all law flows from one body of law: the basic, the constitutional.

This brief constitutional history of community rights — and especially the rights of linguistic communities — captures the terrain upon which schools — public and private — based upon a particular comprehensive vision of the good can operate. No iron wall exists between the public and the private, the sacred and the profane, in South African politics. That said, the Final Constitution's active encouragement of diversity and pluralism in the public realm does not diminish its equally aggressive commitment to the rooting out of discriminatory practices. As a result, the ability of communities to maintain institutions that rely upon exclusionary admissions or membership practices, and still receive state support, is, as a constitutional matter, quite limited. The egalitarian commitments of our basic law also suggest that community-based institutions that rely upon exclusionary practices, but which do not receive a penny of state support, must likewise ensure that they do not offend constitutional and statutory norms designed to promote the dignity of all South Africans.

[1] Bhe (supra) at para 89.
[2] Ibid at para 83.
[3] Ibid at para 84.
[4] Judge Hlophe employs a similar disabling strategy in Mabuza. Mabuza v Mbatha 2003 (4) SA 218 (C), 2003 (7) BCLR 743 (C). He recognizes the supremacy of the Final Constitution at the same time as he asserts that the protean nature of customary law should enable it to conform, as necessary, to the dictates of the Bill of Rights. His nuanced assessment of the role of ukumekeza reconfigures siSwati marriage conventions in a manner that (a) refuses to allow ukumekeza to be used by the groom's family as a means of control over the bride and (b) consciously places the husband and wife on an equal footing with respect to subsequent determinations of whether a valid marriage under siSwati customary law has taken place. See S Woolman & M Bishop 'Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 64.

(c) Legal framework for admissions policies and language policies in public schools

As we noted at the conclusion of the last section, the public space afforded for the advancement of sectarian interests — be they religious, linguistic or cultural — is quite limited. The importance of education as a public good in the modern nation state — for instrumental reasons associated with the future success of learners in the market or for intrinsic reasons that turn on every republic's need for citizens capable of making informed and just political decisions — means that the use of public school space for sectarian ends is even more tightly circumscribed. Thus, while independent schools benefit from FC s 29(3)'s clear commitment to the creation of schools that further the ends of particular linguistic, cultural or religious communities — and permit exclusionary practices intended to further those ends — no public school is granted such autonomy.[1]

(i) Language rights and the Final Constitution

Earlier on, we noted that the Constitutional Court's (and other commentators') gloss on IC s 32*(c)* was quite generous. Recall that IC s 32*(c)* reads, in relevant part: 'educational institutions based on a common culture, language or religion' can be established, 'provided that there shall be no discrimination on the ground of race.' Justice Kriegler, writing for the Court in Gauteng School Education Bill, characterized IC s 32's entitlements as follows:

> [the Constitution] keeps the door open for those for whom the State's educational institutions are considered inadequate as far as common culture, language or religion is concerned. They are at liberty harmoniously to preserve the heritage of their fathers for their children. But there is a price, namely that such a population group will have to dig into its own pocket.[2]

Again our liberal democratic Constitution permits communities to establish institutions — such as schools — designed to further their preferred way of being in the world. However, there is no concomitant commitment made by the Interim Constitution to state funding for such 'parochial' schools. As Matthew Chaskalson points out

> The placing of a positive obligation on the state to fund cultural and religious schools is not commonplace in comparative constitutional and public international law. Had this been the purpose of IC s 32*(c)*, one might have expected it to have been expressed in unambiguous language. This is certainly what one finds in the rew constitutions which do oblige the state to funds school based upon a common culture. Thus s 23 of the Canadian Constitution confers under subsection (1) a right on English and French speaking minority populations of any province to receive primary and secondary school instruction in their own language and then states categorically:

[1] See S Woolman 'Defending Discrimination: On the Constitutionality of Independent Schools that Promote a Particular, If Not Comprehensive, Vision of the Good Life' (2007) 18 Stellenbosch Law Review 31.

[2] Gauteng School Education Bill (supra) at para 42.

> "(3) The rights of citizens of Canada under subsections (1) and (2) to have their children receive primary and secondary school instruction in the language of the English or the French minority population of a province . . . (b) includes, where the number of those children so warrants, the right to have them receive that instruction in minority educational facilities provided out of public funds.
>
> . . .The absence in [IC] s 32*(c)* of any explicit provision for state funding of schools based upon a common language, religion, or culture therefore suggests that there is no constitutional obligation on the state to provide such funding.[1]

Chaskalson does note, however, that his findings are limited to the text of IC s 32*(c)*.

FC s 29 is both more and less expansive with respect to the latitude afforded parents of learners in both independent schools and private schools. FC s 29(3) reads: 'Everyone has the right to establish and maintain, at their own expense, independent educational institutions that a. do not discriminate on the basis of race; b. are registered with the state; and c. maintain standards that are not inferior to standards at comparable public educational institutions.' FC s 29(3) is on all fours, it would seem, with the gloss placed upon IC 32*(c)* by Justice Kriegler in Gauteng Education Bill and Advocate Chaskalson in his memorandum.

The real action, in so far as public schools are concerned, revolves around FC s 29(2). FC s 29(2) is a complex provision. It reads:

> Everyone has the right to receive education in the official language or languages of their choice in public educational institutions where that education is reasonably practicable. In order to ensure the effective access to, and implementation of, this right, the state must consider all reasonable educational alternatives, including single medium institutions, taking into account: a. equity; b. practicability; and c. the need to redress the results of past racially discriminatory laws and practices.

It is possible to identify two interpretive poles for this passage. At one end of the spectrum, some commentators contend that FC s 29(2) eliminates any express entitlement for single medium public schools except where such schools offer redress for communities whose mother tongues were repressed under English and Afrikaner rule. At the other end of the spectrum, other commentators contend that FC s 29(2) vouchsafes continued state support for all single medium public schools, and, in particular, single medium Afrikaans schools.

FC s 29(2) does not support either of these two readings.

Let's begin with the uncompromisingly egalitarian position defended by Blade Nzimande.[2] Nzimande construes FC s 29(2)'s second sentence requirements as matters of administration and policy, and not constitutional law. Though FC s 29(2)'s second sentence may provide a rather weak test for justification, it does not turn the choice of medium of instruction into a matter of mere policy preference. Moreover, FC s 29(2) does not, as Advocate Chaskalson suggested of IC 32, possess the structure of an affirmative action provision. FC s 9(2) provides the perfect example of a constitutional norm whose aim is restitutionary justice.[1] Whereas FC s 9(2) differentiates between groups that have been historically disadvantaged and those that have not, FC s 29(2) does not do so. Single medium public schools could be approved for any preferred language of instruction so long as instruction in a preferred language is reasonably practicable and the single medium public school, as the best means of accommodating such instruction, satisfies the three criteria of equity, practicability and redress. As we have consistently been at pains to point out, the Final Constitution, as a liberal political document, does not view all social, legal and economic arrangements through the prism of equality and reparations.

[1] M Chaskalson 'Constitutional Issues Relevant to School Ownership, Governance and Finance' Durban Education Conference Paper (1995, on file with authors).

[2] See B Nzimande 'Address to the Constitutional Assembly — 7 May 1996' available at www.polity.co.za (accessed on 1 December 2006).

Commentators such as Rassie Malherbe, occupying the opposite end of the ideological spectrum, contend that FC s 29(2) provides a strong guarantee — a rebuttable presumption — that linguistic communities can create and maintain publicly funded single medium schools.[2] With respect, Mahlerbe misreads FC s 29(2). He collapses, repeatedly, the distinction between the individual right to instruction in a mother tongue or preferred language (where practicable) and the obligation imposed upon the state to consider a range of options as to how to offer such instruction. Malherbe privileges single medium schools.[3] FC s 29(2) does not. It mentions single medium public schools as only one in a range of alternatives that the state has an obligation to consider. Moreover, any option considered by the State for delivering mother-tongue instruction — one of which is single medium schooling — must satisfy, to some degree, the three criteria of equity, practicablity and historical redress. Malherbe characterizes the three FC s 29(2)(a)-(c) criteria as mere factors to be considered in some global proportionality assessment. This characterization of the three criteria is far too weak. For a single medium public school to be preferred to another reasonably practicable institutional arrangement — say dual medium instruction or parallel medium instruction — its advocates must demonstrate that a single medium public school is more likely to advance or to satisfy the three criteria. Malherbe further claims that because the Final Constitution specifically refers to 'single medium institutions' that 'whenever they [single medium institutions] are found to be the most effective way to fulfill the right to education in one's preferred language,

[1] See, for example, Minister of Finance v Van Heerden 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC), 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC).

[2] See R Malherbe 'The Constitutional Framework for Pursuing Equal Opportunities in Education'. (2004) 22(3) Perspectives in Education 9 ('Constitutional Framework'); R Malherbe 'A Fresh Start I: Education Rights in South Africa' (2000) 4(1) European Journal for Education Law and Policy 49. Malherbe's positions on FC s 29(2) are not new. He articulates virtually the same point of view in R Malherbe 'Reflections on the Background and Contents of the Education Clause in the South African Bill of Rights' (1997) 1 TSAR 85.

[3] Malherbe 'Constitutional Framework' (supra) at 21.

single medium institutions should be the first option'.[1] Once again, because Malherbe collapses the distinction between a right to mother-tongue instruction and a state duty to consider single medium public schools, he fails to recognize that the right to the former — mother-tongue instruction — is subject to 'practicability', and that the derivative or secondary 'privilege' with respect to the latter — a single medium public school — can only be a 'first option' for mother-tongue instruction if it meets the three threshold criteria of equity, practicability and redress. Finally, that Malherbe's obvious interest in protecting single medium public schools leads him to misread FC s 29(2) — virtually in its entirety — is made patently clear from his final claim that the 'right to education in one's preferred language is guaranteed unequivocally in the South African Bill of Rights'.[2] This statement is false. As the above language of FC s 29(2) indicates, the right to receive education in the official language or languages of [one's] choice in public educational institutions' is subject to a powerful internal modifier — namely, the right exists only where the provision of 'that education is reasonably practicable'.[3]

Given the above analysis, we believe FC s 29(2) should be parsed as follows.

[1] Malherbe 'Constitutional Framework' (supra) at 22.

[2] Ibid (Our emphasis).

[3] FC s 29(2)(Our emphasis). For another reading of FC s 29(2) that falls somewhere between the Nzimande position and the Malherbe position, see G Bekker 'The Right to Education in the South African Constitution' Centre for Human Rights Occasional Papers, available at http://www.chr.up.ac.za/centre_projects/socio/compilation2part1.html. Bekker writes:

> The Constitution does not guarantee mother-tongue education for minorities, as does for example section 23 the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The Constitution, however, guarantees the right in public institutions to education in the language of one's choice. This is limited to education in an official language or languages and is further limited by the proviso — "where reasonably practicable"... . With regard to what would be "reasonably practicable", the Department of Education's Language in Education Policy provides that: it is reasonably practicable to provide education in a particular language of learning and teaching if at least 40 in Grades 1 to 6 or 35 in Grades 7 to 12 learners in a particular grade request it in a particular school. . . . This is in keeping with the internationally practised sliding scale formula: the larger the number of speakers of a language in a particular area, the greater the obligation to provide mother-tongue education in that area. . . . Furthermore, the Language in Education Policy provides that where there are fewer than the requisite number of learners that request to be taught in a particular language not already offered by a school in a particular school district, the head of the provincial department of education will determine how the needs of those learners will be met, taking into consideration the duty of the state and the right of the learners as spelled out in the Constitution. . . . The second part of section 29(2) provides that the state has to ensure effective access to and implementation of the right to education. In this regard, the State must consider all reasonable alternatives including single medium education, taking into account equity, practicability, and the need to redress the imbalances of the past. This would mean that where, for example, there are equal numbers of students seeking education in two different languages, a dual medium school might be the most equitable. Conversely, the most equitable solution might be a single medium school in cases where the majority of students wish to be educated in one particular language. However, equitability is not the only deciding factor — practicability will also have to be a taken into account. Here factors such as resources and numbers of teachers will play a role. Finally, the need to redress the imbalances of the past is emphasised. Thus, anything that will have the effect of denying or impeding the right to education of previously disadvantaged communities will also have to be taken into account. (Emphasis added).

(ii) FC s 29(2) and the right to receive education in the official language of choice

FC s 29(2) grants all learners 'the right to receive education in the official language or languages of their choice in public educational institutions where that education is reasonably practicable.' First note that the right to receive education in the official language or languages of one's choice is not, as the Supreme Court of Appeal in Mikro noted, an unqualified right.[1] The right is subject to a standard of reasonable practicability. How should this internal limitation of the right be read?[2] We suggest that where sufficient numbers of learners request instruction in a preferred language — and, as we shall see below, we do possess regulations, as well as standards and norms, that make clear what those numbers are — and no adequate alternative school exists to provide such instruction, then a public school is under an obligation — with assistance from the State — to provide instruction in the language of choice.[3]

(iii) FC s 29(2) and the right to receive education in the official language of choice, where that education is reasonably practicable

Before we proceed to the second sentence in FC s 29(2), it is worth taking another look at the meaning of 'reasonably practicable'. As an evidentiary matter, the learner or the learners or the State must be able to show that instruction in the language of choice is 'reasonably practicable' at the institution where the learners have applied for admission. So, for example, a single learner who requests instruction in Sepedi in a single medium IsiZulu school may be hard pressed to demonstrate that it is reasonably practicable to accommodate her at a single medium IsiZulu school. An inability to establish reasonable practicability would be even more pronounced where the learner, who preferred instruction in Sepedi, possessed access to an adequate school that offered Sepedi instruction. The failure to demonstrate that a request for instruction is 'reasonably practicable' ends, as the Mikro Court found, the FC s 29(2) inquiry.

It is not clear why, on Bekker's account, a majority of learners ought to be able to determine that a single-medium school remains a single-medium school. That position is not consistent with the DoE's language policy, international practice or the text of FC s 29(2). A single-medium public school is simply one available means to ensure preferred language instruction: it is not a right possessed by all official language speakers. For a critique of Bekker and Mahlerbe's positions on linguistic rights, see J Jansen 'Race and Restitution in Education Law and Policy in South Africa and the United States' in C Russo, J Beckmann & J Jansen (eds) Equal Education Opportunities: Comparative Perspectives in Educational Law (2006) 284-285.

[1] Western Cape Minister of Education & Others v The Governing Body of Mikro Primary School 2006 (1) SA 1 (SCA), 2005 (10) BCLR 973 (SCA).

[2] For more on how internal limitations clauses function in various substantive provisions in the Bill of Rights, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[3] See High School Ermelo & Another v Head of Department Mpumalanga Department of Education & Others [2007] ZAGPHC 232 (17 October 2007).

(iv) The State's obligation to ensure effective access to and implementation of the right to instruction in an official language and its relationship to single medium public schools

Assume that a learner has shown that instruction in the language of choice is reasonably practicable at the institution where she has applied for admission. Only then do we consider the import of the second sentence of FC s 29(2).[1]

The second sentence of FC s 29(2) states that '[i]n order to ensure the effective access to, and implementation of, this right, the state must consider all reasonable educational alternatives, including single medium institutions, taking into account: 'a. equity; b. practicability; and c. the need to redress the results of past racially discriminatory laws and practices.' The second sentence of FC s 29(2) makes it patently clear that single medium institutions are but one way of accommodating the right of a learner to instruction in the language of choice. Moreover, the mere mention of single medium schools in no way privileges such institutions over dual medium schools, parallel medium schools, or schools that accommodate the multilingualism of the student body in some other way. All that this portion of FC s 29(2) requires is that the state consider 'all reasonable educational alternatives' that would make mother tongue or preferred language instruction possible.

However, even if single medium public schools are found to be one of the reasonable alternatives for preferred language instruction, the single school medium school must be able to satisfy a three factor test. That is, for a single medium school to be preferred to another reasonably practicable institutional arrangement — say dual medium instruction or parallel medium instruction — it must demonstrate that it is more likely to advance or to satisfy the three listed criteria of equity, of practicability and of historical redress.

FC s 29(2)'s concession to single medium schools is quite weak indeed. It is, in fact, not really a right at all. It is, perhaps, best described as a right to have reasons or an entitlement to justification for the State's refusal to sanction a single medium public school. That said, this entitlement is not without value for proponents of single medium public schools. What the second sentence of FC s 29(2) ultimately requires is that the State be able to justify its preference for one form of school instruction over another. Given the Final Constitution's recognition of single medium public schools as a legitimate means of providing preferred language education, the State will find itself under an obligation to demonstrate why another form of instruction — dual medium, parallel medium, special tutoring — will better serve the learners in question. Moreover, the Final Constitution's recognition of community rights, associational rights, religious rights, cultural rights and linguistic rights creates a set of background conditions against which claims for single medium schools must be taken seriously. For where preferred language instruction is reasonably practicable, and where single medium schools satisfy the desiderata of equity, practicability and historical redress, the State cannot simply invoke an overriding commitment to 'equality' or 'transformation' in order to dismantle single medium institutions. The Final Constitution is, ultimately, a post-apartheid constitution. Thus, at the same time as it sets its face against exclusion and discrimination, it rejects the totalizing view of the apartheid state. Space remains — within both the private realm and the public realm — for the accommodation of multiple ways of being in the world. That public space, as we have seen, is extremely narrow for single medium public schools.[1] But however narrow it may be, it cannot be entirely wished away.

[1] It is worth drawing attention, here, to the basic structure of FC s 29(2). FC s 29(2)'s first sentence bestows upon individual learners a right to instruction in a language of their choice. FC s 29(2)'s second sentence sets out what the State's obligations are vis-à-vis the decision-making process for determining whether schools ought to be single-medium, parallel-medium, dual-medium or something else entirely. Neither sentence in FC s 29(2) affords individual schools any rights with respect to determining the school's medium of instruction.

Where does this analysis leave us? Contrary to Mahlerbe and others, FC s 29(2) provides no right to single medium public schools. At best, FC s 29(2) recognizes such schools as one option to be considered amongst a range of other institutional arrangements designed to further the instruction of learners. At best, FC s 29(2) places an obligation on the State to justify any refusal to recognize and to support single medium public schools. Advocates of single medium Afrikaans public schools must recognize that, when it comes to equity and to historical redress, they are batting on a sticky wicket.

(v) Statutory and regulatory framework for linguistic rights

The apposite legislation governing this area seem of a piece. They suggest that few exceptions to the egalitarian commitments of these documents will be countenanced. The South African Schools Act ('SASA')[2] rejects unfair discrimination on any grounds. The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act ('PEPUDA)[3] and regulations passed under the Gauteng School Education Act[4] subject admissions requirements at public schools to even stricter scrutiny than the enabling legislation.[5] While these regulations expand — in line with FC s 9 — the grounds for a finding of unfair discrimination with respect to admission policies, they do not make it absolutely impossible for a school governing body to run a public school with a particular comprehensive vision of the good life in mind. That said, FC s 29(2), when read with PEPUDA, SASA, and [1] One reader asked, given our reading of FC s 29(2), under what circumstances the State would be justified in creating a separate single-medium public school rather than a parallel-medium school or a dual-medium school. Presumably, one could argue that a Khoi-San medium public school is necessary because of the historical disadvantage experienced by the Khoi-San people. FC s 29(2) expressly recognizes equity and historical redress as appropriate grounds for the creation of single-medium public schools — as well as parallel-medium or dual-medium schools. The irony, of course, is that FC s 29(2) arguments are being deployed by communities that, over the past 50 years at least, have been historically privileged.

[2] Act 84 of 1996.

[3] Act 4 of 2000.

[4] Act 6 of 1995.

[5] Regulations passed under the GSEA s 11(1) and the Gauteng Education Policy Act 12 of 1998 ('GEPA'), s 4*(a)(i)*, entitled 'Admission of Learners to Public Schools' General Notice 4138 of 2001 (PG 129 of 13 July 2001).

GSEA, dramatically restricts the conditions under which single medium public schools can claim the right to exclude learners who are 'non-speakers' of the single medium of instruction.

A raft of other statutory provisions, regulations and policies work to further restrict the space within which single medium institutions can operate. For example, SASA s 5(3), states that 'no learner may be refused admission to a public school on the grounds that his or her parent … (b) does not subscribe to the mission statement of the school.' One can't over-emphasize the importance of this provision. Some school governing bodies have, under existing law, arrogated to themselves sweeping powers of control over the governance and the management of public schools. One mechanism of governance that such SGBs have employed in order to exclude unwanted learners is the school mission statement: such statements about a school's ethos cause many learners and their parents to self-select out of applying to given schools. This not-so-subtle form of exclusion occurs despite the fact that, according to SASA s 5(3)(b), a mission statement which proclaims that the school environment and curriculum must advance the interests of the Zulu nation cannot be used to exclude learners who are not Zulu or committed to the furtherance of Zulu tradition, language and culture.

Another source of support for the argument that single medium public schools, and their SGBs, cannot dictate school language policy in a manner that inhibits multilingualism can be found in the Norms and Standards for Language Policy in Public Schools promulgated in terms of SASA and the National Education Policy Act.[1] These norms and standards place significant constraints on the ability of single medium public schools to turn away learners who prefer, and will benefit from, instruction in another language. The Norms and Standards for Language Policy in Public Schools, promulgated in terms of SASA s 6(1) read, in relevant part:

> C. The rights and duties of the school
> (1) Subject to any law dealing with language in education and the Constitutional rights of learners, in determining the language policy of the school, the governing body must stipulate how the school will promote multilingualism through using more than one language of learning and teaching, and/or by offering additional languages as full-fledged subjects . . . or through other means approved by the head of the provincial education department. (Emphasis added.)
> (2) Where there are less than 40 requests in Grades 1 to 6, or even less than 35 requests in Grades 7 to 12 for instruction in a language in a given grade not already offered in a particular school district, the head of the provincial department will determine how the needs of those learners will be met, taking into account: (a) the duty of the state and the rights of learners in terms of the Constitution; (b) the need to achieve equity; (c) the need to redress the results of past racially discriminatory laws and practices; (d) practicability; (e) the advice of the governing bodies and principals of the public schools concerned.
> D. The rights and duties of the Provincial Education Departments
> (3) It is reasonably practicable to provide education in a particular language of learning and teaching if at least 40 in Grades 1 to 6 or 35 in Grade 7 to 12 learners in a particular grade request it in a particular school.
> (4) The provincial head of department must explore ways and means of sharing scare

[1] Act 27 of 1996.

> human resources … and providing alternative language maintenance programmes in schools … that cannot be provided with … additional languages of teaching.[2]

These norms and standards contain a number of notable features. The norms make it clear that a group of 40 learners (grades 1 to 6) or a group of 35 learners (grades 7 to 12) constitute a sufficiently large cohort to demand instruction in a preferred language. A bar for linguistic accommodation has been set against which all schools may be measured. That said, these threshold requirements are not obligatory. They remain guidelines. What these norms tell us, again, is that the new South African State is not, unlike the apartheid state, a totalizing entity. It will not subordinate the plural, comprehensive visions of the good held by its citizenry to an ideological commitment to equality. So, while the State will apply pressure — through the law — on single medium public schools to accept learners who prefer instruction in another language, it cannot use the mechanisms of a totalizing state to achieve such ends. The somewhat ironic result of the norms and standards' commitment to linguistic pluralism and the status of the norms and standards as mere guidelines is that single medium public schools — especially single medium Afrikaans public schools — are 'encouraged' to maintain their current cramped sense of identity.

(vi) Case law on single medium public schools: Matukane; Middelburg; Mikro; Seodin; Ermelo

Given the argument that has proceeded, advocates of single medium public schools may find our contention that single medium public schools are actually 'encouraged' by the Final Constitution to maintain their identity and to retain their integrity difficult to believe. After all, when viewed through the prism of single medium public school advocacy, the statutes, the regulations and the policy circulars that articulate equity requirements at public schools and the body of case law built up over the past ten years appear to evince nothing more than the State's desire to rid itself of single medium Afrikaans-speaking public schools.[3] What is beyond doubt, however, is that the case law demonstrates that the primary fault line in public school admissions policy litigation occurs around the use of Afrikaans as the sole medium of instruction.

[1] These policy statements are drawn from the language in education policy in terms of NEPA s 3(4)(m) and the Norms and Standards Regarding Language Policy Published in Terms of Section 6(1) of the South African Schools Act, 1996 Government Notice No 383, Vol 17997 (9 May 1997).

[2] See Address by Naledi Pandor, MP, Minister of Education, Introducing the Debate on the Education Budget Vote 15, National Assembly (17 May 2005) available at http://www.pmg.org.za/briefings/briefings.php?id=208:

> On Sunday I read reports in the press that English was to be made optional in schools. The report suggested that children will no longer learn English. That is not the intention of the policy. It opens up the possibility of developing the other official languages into languages of learning and teaching. Clearly while we work to achieve this noble objective, the current choice of English and Afrikaans as the languages of learning and teaching will remain. In the past, before 1998, pupils were locked into a system that privileged Afrikaans and English for those in search of a matric endorsement. That is now no longer true and all languages will now be equally available as subject choices.

Two features of this body of case law are worth noting at the outset. First, the courts have charted a course largely consistent with the analysis offered above — even if the cases themselves do not offer especially close readings of FC s 29(2) or other applicable laws.[1] The cases discussed below reflect the extent of the State's power in determining public school admissions requirements. They also reflect the sectarian interests that secure continued judicial solicitude — even in the face of the State's pursuit of increasingly egalitarian arrangements. Second, this quick survey of the cases litigated over language policy in public schools allows us to contrast, meaningfully, the space that various forms of community life — religion, language, culture — are afforded in the public realm with the space afforded various forms of community life in the private realm. It should come as no surprise that the Final Constitution and our courts refuse to endorse any arrangement of public institutions that distribute public goods in a manner that perpetuates the systemic discrimination, exclusion and oppression associated with apartheid. However, the Constitutional Court has made it patently clear that it recognizes that the majority of South Africans draw the better part of the meaning in their lives from the religious, linguistic and cultural communities of which they are a part.[2] Thus, while the State may be entitled to set limits on the extent to which state resources can be used to advance sectarian ends, the Final Constitution vouchsafes significant amounts of private space within which various comprehensive visions of the good can be pursued.

[1] We would like to emphasize that the grounds for deciding these five cases do not generally 'fit' within the analytical rubric supplied by FC s 29(2) and the gloss we place on FC s 29(2). As most readers of South African case law and jurisprudence know, South African courts prefer technical textual solutions over answers to vexed questions about the content of fundamental rights. See United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (African Christian Democratic Party & Others Intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Another as Amici Curiae) (No 2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1164 (CC)('UDM')(Court strikes down legislation because the government failed to pass the Act in the timeframe required by the Final Constitution rather than finding the legislation invalid in terms of FC s 19 or a more basic commitment to a principle of democracy.) See, especially, I Currie 'Judicious Avoidance' (1999) 15 SAJHR 138 (Endorses the proposition, first articulated in Mhlungu, that courts ought to avoid deciding the issues before them in terms of constitutional dictates.) See, further, C Sunstein One Case at a Time (1996). It seems reasonable to conclude, given this disposition of our courts, that our courts have avoided addressing the extent to which FC s 29(2) vouchsafes single medium public schools because the matter is so politically charged. As we shall see, the Mikro court opts to resolve the dispute over single-medium public schools in terms of SASA and the Laerskool Middleburg court ultimately turns to FC s 28(2) and the ostensibly unassailable proposition that the rights of the child are always paramount. However, all close and meaningful readings of legal texts go beyond the express language of a decision and concentrate their attention on the internal logic of a judgment or set of judgments. The internal logic of the five judgments speak pretty directly to the appropriate contours of FC s 29(2).

[2] See Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie (Doctors For Life International & Others, Amici Curiae); Lesbian & Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 354(CC)('Fourie'); KwaZulu-Natal MEC for Education & Others v Pillay [2007] ZACC 21.

MATUKANE[1]

As one might have predicted, the State has weighed in on the side of black students who wish to receive instruction in English, but found themselves excluded from Afrikaans medium, or predominantly Afrikaans medium, schools. At issue in Matukane & Others v Laerskool Potgietersrus was the attempt by the parent of three learners, Mr Matukane, to enroll his three children (13, 13 and 8) at the Laerskool Potgietersrus. The Laerskool Potgietersrus was then, and remains still, a state-aided parallel-medium primary school.

Mr Matukane, a black resident of Potgietersrus spoke to the principal on 11 January 1996. The principal informed Mr Matukane that Mr Matukane would have to wait until 25 January 1996 for a determination as whether there was space available at the school. Mr Matukane was not convinced that any such delay was warranted. He approached the provincial Department of Education ('DoE'). DoE informed Mr Matukane that his children could be enrolled in the school. Mr Matukane arrived at the school on 22 January 1996, completed the necessary application forms and bought the school uniforms as directed. The application form included a section requiring that parents and children agree to adhere to the rules and the objectives of the school. The stated objective on the application form read: 'the provision of excellent and relevant education with a Christian national character in mother-tongue medium Afrikaans or English.' Mr Matukane returned the next day with his children for their first day at school. The entrance of the school was blocked by a group of white parents who refused to allow Mr Matukane or his children to enter the school. Mr Matukane returned to the school again the following day. A standoff between a group of black parents and students and white parents and students ensued. Once again the Matukane children were denied access to the school. After being rebuffed this second time, Mr Matukane managed to secure a temporary place for his children at the already overcrowded Akasia School, the only other English medium school in the town.

Other black parents had experienced less dramatic rejections by the school. They were told that their children could not be accommodated because the school was full: at least 55 black children had been refused admission to the school in this manner. No black child had ever been admitted to the school. No black children appeared on the current waiting list. On top of these indignities, the school bussed in white children from Zebediela, a neighboring town — despite the fact that a school catering to Afrikaans-speaking students in Zebediela had space available. After Mr Matukane's experience of overt racial discrimination, a group of black parents decided to approach the High Court for an order requiring the Laerskool Potgietersrus to accept their children.

[1] Matukane & Others v Laerskool Potgietersrus 1996 (3) SA 223 (T).

In the High Court, Laerskool Potgietersrus argued that it was unable to accommodate more children and that it had not rejected the children on racial grounds. At the time of the hearing, Laerskool Potgietersrus had 580 Afrikaans-speaking students and 89 English-speaking students. The Laerskool Potgietersrus expressed concern that if it admitted these children, it would be swamped by English-speaking children who would destroy the Afrikaans ethos of the school. The school contended that IC Section 32*(c)* vouchsafed the right 'to establish, where practicable, educational institutions based on a common culture, language or religion, provided that there shall be no discrimination on the ground of race' and entitled the school to adopt admissions requirements designed to maintain the existing 'culture' and 'ethos' of the school. The Laerskool Potgietersrus also asserted that a DoE directive gave the school governing body the sole power to determine its criteria for admission.

Despite the school's assertion that the refusals were based on overcrowding, not race, the facts clearly painted a different picture. No black children had been admitted to the school. There were no black children on the waiting list. White English speaking learners had already been admitted. Afrikaans-speaking students were being bussed in. Room existed to accommodate more English-speaking children. Little danger existed of the school's Afrikaans culture and ethos being destroyed even if every black English-speaking learner were to be accepted. The ratio of Afrikaans-speaking students to English-speaking students would remain 5:1. Given these facts, the Matukane court held that it could draw no other inference as to actual intent of the school's admissions policy other than that it discriminated directly on the basis of race, ethnic and social origin, culture and language. Given that the discrimination took place one or more of IC s 8's listed grounds, unfairness was presumed. The burden shifted to the school to show that the discrimination was fair.

As Gauteng Education Bill clearly holds, the respondents had the right, under IC s 32*(c)*, to establish an independent educational institution designed to promote Afrikaans language and culture so long as they did not discriminate on the basis of race.[1] The school had no right to exclude learners from a public institution based upon culture, and it certainly had no right to exclude any learner from a public institution or a private institution based upon race. (Moreover, while the Laerskool Potgietersrus might have been justified in its desire to privilege Afrikaans over English, the school failed to demonstrate why a modest increase in black English-speaking students would deleteriously affect the school's promotion of Afrikaans language and culture.) The Matukane Court concluded that 'language and culture' were operating as surrogates for 'race', that the school had discriminated intentionally against the Matukane children and other black learners on the grounds of race, and that the respondent could not, therefore, discharge its burden of proving the fairness of its (racist) admissions policies.

[1] Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC).

MIDDELBURG[1]

Laerskool Middelburg & 'n ander v Departementshoof, Mpumalanga Departement van Onderwys, & andere extends the holding in Matukane from parallel-medium to single-medium schools. However, in Laerskool Middelburg, the High Court was clearly more troubled by the conflict between the right to a single-medium school and the right to be educated in the official language of one's choice.

At the level of rhetoric, the Laerskool Middelburg court initially rebuffed the provincial Department of Education's attempt to turn the single medium school into a parallel medium school. It held that neither SASA, nor the regulations issued under them, authorised the provincial Head of the Department to instruct a school to change from single-medium instruction to parallel-medium instruction and declared that the Head's administrative conduct was prima facie unfair.[2] The Laerskool Middelburg court then rejected the Department's argument that the applicant school's admission policy discriminated unfairly against English learners. The High Court held that in circumstances in which the English learners could be accommodated elsewhere, the Department's actions simultaneously violated the FC s 29(2) right of Afrikaans-speaking students to single medium schools and the FC s 29(2) right of English-speaking students to an education in the official language of their choice in public educational institutions.[3]

Having notified the State that it had failed to take cognizance of FC s 29's commitment to linguistic diversity, the Laerskool Middelburg court conceded that any entitlement to a single-medium school was subordinate to the right of every South African to a basic education, the right to be educated in a language of choice and the palpable need of all South Africans to share education facilities with other linguistic and cultural communities. The Laerskool Middelburg court was unwilling to allow the needs of 40 English-speaking — and largely black — learners to be prejudiced by the State's failure to play by the rules and by the school's intransigence on the issue of parallel-medium education. FC s 28(2)'s guarantee that 'the best interests of the child' are always of 'paramount importance' was held by Laerskool Middelburg court to trump the language and cultural rights of the school's Afrikaans learners.[4] So while the State's actions had, in fact, been mala fide, it was still able to secure a victory for educational equity by getting the proper parties — namely the children — before the court.

[1] 2003 (4) SA 160 (T) ('Laerskool Middelburg').
[2] Ibid at 171-172, 176.
[3] Ibid at 173 and 175.
[4] In deciding that the 'minority' students must be accommodated, the Laerskool Middelburg court correctly concluded that the right to a single-medium public educational institution was clearly subordinate to the right which every South African had to education in a similar institution and to a clearly proven need to share education facilities with other cultural communities. The Laerskool Middelburg court seems to be on far shakier grounds when it suggested that it was an open question as to whether the exercise of own language and culture was better furthered where provision was made in a school for the exclusion of other languages or cultures. Moreover, the court's claim that a single-medium institution was probably best defined as a claim to emotional, cultural, religious and social-psychological security

Although the outcome was certainly correct, the Laerskool Middelburg court's route in arriving at its conclusion cannot pass without comment. If our reading of FC s 29(2) offered above is correct, then the Laerskool Middelburg court should never had had to rely on FC s 28(2). In terms of FC s 29(2), the court should have first determined whether it was 'reasonably practicable' to accommodate English-speaking students in Laerskool Middelburg. The court's conclusion — that the only public school in the area had to take in 20 local learners — suggests that it was 'reasonably practicable'. That should, or could, have been enough. But further support for the court's conclusion can be found in the second sentence of FC s 29(2): 'In order to ensure the effective access to, and implementation of, this right, the state must consider all reasonable educational alternatives, including single-medium institutions, taking into account: a. equity; b. practicability; and c. the need to redress the results of past racially discriminatory laws and practices.' The court's conclusion that a single medium school must, in order to accommodate these 20 learners, become a parallel-medium school is consistent with a reading of FC s 29(2) that makes it patently clear that single-medium institutions are but one way of accommodating the right of a learner to instruction in the language of choice and that the mere mention of single medium schools in no way privileges such institutions over parallel medium schools or dual medium schools. The second sentence of FC s 29(2) — and its commitment to equity, practicability and historical redress — provides further justification for the Laerskool Middelburg court's conclusion that a single-medium institution was obliged, under the circumstances, to become a parallel-medium institution.

MIKRO[1]

At issue in The Western Cape Minister of Education & Others v The Governing Body of Mikro Primary School was the refusal of an Afrikaans medium public school to accede to a request by the Western Cape Department of Education ('WCDoE') to change the language policy of the school so as to convert it into a parallel-medium school. Acting on behalf of 21 learners, the WCDoE had directed the primary school to offer instruction in their preferred medium: English. The WCDoE had interpreted the Norms and Standards issued by the National Department of Education under SASA as requiring all primary schools with 40 learners who preferred a particular language of learning and teaching to offer instruction in that language.

trivializes the desire to maintain basic, constitutive attachments. The desire to sustain a given culture — especially a minority culture, as Afrikaner culture now is — is best served by single-medium institutions that reinforce implicitly and expressly the importance of sustaining the integrity of that community. As a result, the Laerskool Middelburg court must also be wrong when it claims that the conversion of a single-medium public institution to a dual-medium school cannot per se diminish the force of each ethnic, cultural and linguistic communities claim to a school organized around its language and culture. Ibid at 173. That is, with respect, exactly what the conversion per se does.

[1] Western Cape Minister of Education & Others v The Governing Body of Mikro Primary School 2006 (1) SA 1 (SCA), 2005 (10) BCLR 973 (SCA)('Mikro').

The Supreme Court of Appeal summarily rejected both the WCDoE's reading of the Norms and Standards and its gloss on FC s 29(2). It did so on three primary grounds.

First, the Supreme Court of Appeal overturned Bertelsmann J's finding in Laerskool Middelburg that the Norms and Standards provided a mechanism for the alteration of the language policy of a public school. At best, the Supreme Court of Appeal said, the Norms and Standards constitute a guideline for members of the department and those parties responsible for the governance of public schools. Second, the Supreme Court of Appeal held that SASA s 6(1) grants neither the national Minister of Education nor the provincial MEC or HoD the authority to determine the 'language policy of a particular school, nor does it authorize him or her to authorize any other person or body to do so.' The power to determine language policy vests solely with the SGB of a given public school and is subject only to the Final Constitution, SASA and any applicable provincial law. Third, the Supreme Court of Appeal rejected the applicant's contention that FC s 29(2) could be 'interpreted to mean that everyone had the right to receive education in the official language of his or her choice at each and every public educational institution where this was reasonably practicable.'[1] Such a reading, the Mikro Court held, would mean that any significant cohort of learners could demand instruction in their preferred language if it was conceivably possible to do so. The Mikro Court noted that such a reading would lead to the absurd consequence that 'a group of Afrikaans learners would be entitled to claim [a right] to be taught in Afrikaans at an English medium school immediately adjacent to an Afrikaans medium school which has vacant capacity provided they can prove that it would be reasonably practicable to provide education in Afrikaans at that school.'[2] The Supreme Court of Appeal held that the correct reading of FC s 29(2) affords the State significant latitude in deciding how best to implement this right and that FC s 29(2) grants everyone a right to be educated in an official language of his or her choice at a public educational institution if, in the totality of circumstances, it is reasonably practicable to do so. That means, of course, that the right is only to language instruction, generally, and, thus to instruction at some school within an accessible geographical domain, and not, as the applicants had claimed, to language instruction at each and every public educational institution and thus to any school the applicants wished to attend.

The decision is notable in two important respects. First, it curbs the State's power to determine — exclusively — public school admissions policies and language policies. Such power continues to be shared — to some degree — with each existing SGB. Second, while affirming the rights of learners to instruction in a preferred language, it simultaneously confirmed that some individual schools were entitled to offer instruction in a single medium.

[1] Mikro (supra) at para 30.
[2] Ibid.

The effect of the Supreme Court of Appeal's decision in Mikro is to reverse, partially, the spin of Laerskool Middelburg. Neither parallel-medium instruction nor dual-medium instruction are automatic default positions for public school language policy. The Mikro Court takes the language of FC s 29(2) seriously. It places the State under an obligation to show that its language policy — designed to give learners instruction in their preferred language — is reasonably practicable. Where, as in Mikro, it is not reasonably practicable to give English speaking students instruction at a single medium Afrikaans speaking institution, because other adequate alternatives exist, then the State cannot force a single medium Afrikaans speaking institution to offer parallel instruction. Although the Mikro Court does not engage the second sentence of FC s 29(2), one can easily draw the inference that the State would have failed to discharge the burden of showing that it had considered all reasonable alternatives for accommodating the English speaking learners in question and that it had also failed to demonstrate that maintaining a single medium Afrikaans-speaking school — in circumstances where adequate English medium instruction was available elsewhere — offended the constitutional commitment to equity and to historical redress. It is impossible to read Mikro and not come away with the impression that a community's interest in maintaining its linguistic and cultural integrity may — under a very narrow set of conditions — legitimately trump purely ideological commitments to equity.

SEODIN[1]

Seodin reinforces the holdings in Matukane and in Laerskool Middelburg and appears to confirm the impression that Mikro only protects single medium public schools under a relatively narrow set of circumstances. In Seodin Primary School v MEC Education, Northern Cape, the High Court held that the SGBs of three Afrikaans medium public schools could not use language preference alone to exclude black, English speaking learners from admittance where the provision of English language instruction was 'reasonably practicable'. In addition, in all three cases heard in Seodin, the single medium Afrikaans schools were undersubscribed. Finally, the High Court found that public pronouncements by the MEC for Education on the need for greater integration in the public school system could not be interpreted as an ultra vires act aimed at the elimination of single-medium — read Afrikaans — public schools. Where public schools are concerned, Seodin makes it clear that the Final Constitution will not tolerate racist and discriminatory admissions policies masquerading as policies that claim to be about the need to maintain the language and the culture of a given community. As Northern Cape Judge President Frans Kgomo noted in his judgment:

[1] Seodin Primary School v MEC Education, Northern Cape 2006 (4) BCLR 542 (NC), [2006] 1 All SA 154 (NC)('Seodin').

> It would be a sad day in the South African historical annals that hundreds of children remained illiterate or dropped out of school because they were excluded from under-utilised schools purportedly to protect and preserve the status of certain schools as single-medium Afrikaans schools.[1]

ERMELO[2]

Hoërskool Ermelo offers perhaps the best set of circumstances under which to assess — in terms of FC s 29(2) — the respective rights of learners to choose their preferred language of instruction, the ability of SGBs to determine public school language policy and the power of the State to alter language policy where the needs of learners so warrant.

In Hoërskool Ermelo I, Judge Prinsloo, of the Pretoria High Court, suspended a decision of the Mpumalanga Department of Education to dissolve the school's governing body and to replace it with a departmentally appointed committee. The dissolution would have enabled the Mpumalanga Department of Education to alter the school's language policy and would have allowed 113 English-speaking pupils to receive instruction in English.[3]

On appeal, Transvaal Judge President Ngoepe, and Judges Seriti and Ranchod set aside the High Court ruling in Hoërskool Ermelo I. The Hoërskool Ermelo II court found that the single medium Afrikaans public school must admit English-speaking pupils.[4] Of particular moment for the Hoërskool Ermelo II court was the under-subscription of Hoërskool Ermelo. Given that Hoërskool Ermelo was operating at only half-capacity, the Full Bench found that it was 'reasonably practicable' — as contemplated by FC s 29(2) — for the high school to accommodate the 113 grade eight learners.[5] The mere fact that all classrooms were being employed and that the existing curriculum turned on the current availability of classrooms

[1] Seodin (supra) at para 56.

[2] Hoërskool Ermelo & 'n Ander v Departement van Onderwys & Andere [2007] ZAGPHC 4 (2 February 2007)

[3] Judge Bill Prinsloo's interim order froze Mpumalanga education MEC Siphosezwe Masango's instruction that Ermelo High School enrol 113 children that the provincial government claimed could not be placed in the other schools in the area. Prinsloo J ruled that his interim order should stand until a full hearing on the matter was held. The Department of Education decided not to wait for the full hearing. In their papers, the DoE and the parents of the learners claimed that right to education in the language of choice was impaired by the school's language policy and its refusal to admit children who were not prepared to be taught in Afrikaans. In addition, the Mpumalanga DoE claimed that its position was underwritten by the under-subscription at Ermelo and the oversubscription at adjacent high schools. These facts were not disputed by the parties. Ermelo was built for 1200 students and carried a mere 589 in some 30 classrooms at the time of litigation.

[4] High School Ermelo & Another v Head of Department Mpumalanga Department of Education & Others [2007] ZAGPHC 232 (17 October 2007)('Ermelo II').

[5] It is also important to note that much of the Emerlo II court's decision turned on the power of the provincial government to withdraw the powers of the School Governing Body to determine language policy and to determine that language policy itself.

did not constitute sufficient grounds for excluding English learners and maintaining Hoërskool Ermelo as a single medium Afrikaans public school. Equity, practicability and historical redress — the three express grounds for assessment of existing language policy in terms of FC s 29(2) — justified the transformation of Hoërskool Ermelo from a single medium public school into a parallel medium public school.

The numbers of the other primarily black schools in the immediate vicinity are worth noting. Ligbron Academy of Technology possesses 20 classrooms and accommodates 917 learners; Ermelo Combined School has 14 classrooms and accommodates 463 learners; Lindile School possesses 29 classrooms and accommodates 1799 learners; Cebisa School has 19 classrooms and accommodates 926 learners; Ithafa School posseses 36 classrooms and accommodates 1677 learners; Reggie Masuku School has 21 classrooms and 804 learners. Hoërskool Ermelo, the applicant, had 32 classrooms for 589 learners.[1] Judge President Ngoepe and his fellow judges believed that the numbers — schools such as Lindile and Ithafa teach three times as many learners as Hoërskool Ermelo in a comparable space — spoke for themselves.

While the conclusions of the Hoërskool Ermelo II court are hard to gainsay, the court's inability to undertake basic fundamental rights analysis is troubling — and does little to advance our understanding of the structure of FC s 29(2). The first paragraph the Ermelo II court devotes to FC s 29(2) analysis reads as follows:

> Counsel for the applicants submitted that the admission of English speaking learners would prejudice the rights of the Afrikaans speaking learners. Section 33 provides that the rights contained in the Bill of Rights may be limited to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom. From the above provisions it is clear that, firstly, a learner has a right to basic education; secondly, that no right is unlimited. In case of competing rights, it becomes necessary to balance them. In the present case, the rights of the current learners of Ermelo High School to enjoy an extended curriculum which is offered at their school must be balanced against the right to basic education of the learners who would otherwise not gain admission to any school. Assuming for a moment that there is such an encroachment of the rights of the current students, that, in our view, would constitute a reasonable and justified limitation insofar as it limits the enjoyment of an extended curriculum which offers far more than the basic government curriculum. But, as already mentioned, the real difficulty for the applicants is that they have not placed before the courts the facts showing precisely in which way the current students would be prejudiced. They are also vague on the nature of the prejudice to be suffered.[2]

[1] Ermelo II (supra) at 26.
[2] Ibid at para 62.

First, general limitations analysis occurs under FC s 36 — not FC s 33. Second, FC s 29(2) is clear about the State's obligations with regard to the right to education in an official language and its duty to investigate the manner in which that right would be best accommodated. Third, since FC s 29(2) does not grant a right to single medium public schools, there cannot be a conflict of rights. An appellate court would do well to reconsider the Ermelo II court's mode of analysis and frame the discussion largely, if not entirely, in terms of FC s 29(2).

A second paragraph — quoting the judgment of Olivier J in Hoërskool Victoria-Wes en Andere v Die Departementshoof, Departement van Onderwys, Noord-Kaapse Provinsiale Regering — makes somewhat better sense of the matter:

> To my understanding, actions such as these (introducing dual medium of instruction) by the respondent would not in any way unreasonably affect the integrity of the applicants or their collective components. Mr Colditz suggests in this regard that the respondent's decision regarding dual medium instruction infringes the rights of the Afrikaans learners in terms of Section 29(2) of the Constitution. I fail to understand this argument. Section 29(2) guarantees the right to education 'in an official language or language of choice. . .' This however does not include the situation where dual-medium instruction is implemented. In such a situation, the Afrikaans learners will in predetermined times receive their lessons in Afrikaans, which ultimately is their language of choice, and then they will receive the same lesson again, in the same period, but in English this time. I cannot imagine how such a system could infringe any rights of the learners in terms of Section 29(2).[1]

Olivier J, and by extension Ngoepe JP, recognize that FC s 29(2) only entitles a learner — be they Afrikaans or not — to instruction in the official language of their choice (where practicable). It does not entitle a learner to any particular arrangement — single-medium, dual-medium, parallel-medium or special education. Both Olivier J in Hoërskool Victoria-Wes and Ngoepe JP in Hoërskool Ermelo II reach the right conclusion: FC s 29(2) does not guarantee the right of any learner to a single medium public school.

(vii) Current status of single medium public schools

The foregoing account supports a number of relatively uncontroversial conclusions. The Final Constitution — and a broad array of statutes — recognize that for religious, cultural and linguistic communities to survive and to flourish in South Africa, these communities must be able to establish educational institutions that cater for their specific 'ethos'. Such institutions must, by their very nature, enforce admissions policies that discriminate between learners who wish to participate in the affairs of a given religious, linguistic and cultural community, and those learners who do not wish to participate in or advance the ways of being of a given community. The Final Constitution, PEPUDA, SASA, NEPA and a raft of regulations certainly allow independent schools or private schools to employ admissions policies that discriminate between learners in a manner carefully designed to advance legitimate constitutional ends.[1] However, when it comes to public schools, the State's tolerance for discrimination of any kind — even via means narrowly tailored to realize otherwise legitimate constitutional objectives — ought to be tightly circumscribed and rightly inclines in favour of learners from historically disadvantaged communities. As we have seen in our analysis of FC s 29(2), where sufficient resources exist to ensure that all South African learners receive an adequate, and for all intents equal, education in their preferred language of instruction, then the state ought to do everything it can to accommodate linguistic and cultural diversity and operate in a manner that enables single-medium schools to continue to exist. However, the Final Constitution's commitment to meaningful transformation means that the right of all learners to a basic education in their preferred language of instruction at public schools generally trumps more particularistic claims on public resources. The Final Constitution's answer to those parents who wish to school their children in the language, culture or religion of their choice is straightforward: you may 'dig into your own pocket' and build an independent school on your own time.

[1] Case No 357/2004 (Northern Cape Division, Unreported) 17 at para 42 (translation Natasha Sott).

Thus, when we ask whether a public school that wishes to provide an education in Afrikaans for Afrikaans children can employ an admissions policy that discriminates between applicants on the basis of their willingness to adhere to a curriculum that requires that all classes be taken in Afrikaans, the answer must be 'that depends'. The Final Constitution, SASA, PEPUDA and cases such as Matukane, Laerskool Middelburg, Seodin and Ermelo all buttress the rather unassailable proposition that discrimination on the basis of language or culture cannot be used as a proxy for discrimination on the basis of race. A proper analysis of FC s 29(2) reinforces the proposition — at least implicitly accepted by the Matukane, Laerskool Middelburg, Mikro, Ermelo and Seodin courts — that where learners do not have ready access to a public school that offers them adequate instruction in their preferred medium of instruction, neither a School Governing Body nor a principal can exclude learners in terms of an admissions policy that seeks to privilege a particular language. The lesson of the Supreme Court of Appeal's decision in Mikro is that the window for exclusion on the basis of language and culture is rather small indeed: only where the learners in question already have easy access to a school that offers them adequate instruction in their preferred medium of instruction, can the single medium school in question claim, with some force, that neither the learners nor the State has any business forcing a single-medium institution into becoming a parallel-medium institution.[1]

[1] See S Woolman 'Defending Discrimination: On the Constitutionality of Independent Schools that Promote a Particular, If Not Comprehensive, Vision of the Good Life' (2007) 18 Stellenbosch Law Review 31. See also Taylor v Kurtstag [2004] 4 All SA 317 (W)(FC s 18 — freedom of association — 'guarantees an individual the right to choose his or her associates and a group of individuals the right to choose their associates.' The right of a group to choose their associates of necessity means the right to require those who wish to join the group to conform their behaviour to certain dictates, and the right to exclude those who refuse to conform); Wittmann v Deutsche Schulverein, Pretoria 1998 (4) SA 423, 451 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T)('Does this mean that private parochial schools which do not receive State aid may not prescribe obligatory attendance at their morning prayers and confessional religious instruction classes? The answer is negative. Section 17 of the [I]nterim Constitution and s 18 of the [Final] Constitution recognise the freedom of association. [IC] Section 14(1) and [FC] s 15(1) respectively recognise the freedom of religion which includes the right to join others in worship, propagation of the faith etc. Freedom of association entails the right with others to exclude non-conformists. It also includes the right to require those who join the association to conform with its principles and rules.')

Let us be clear. The Final Constitution neither provides a guaranteed right to single-medium public schools nor does it prohibit the existence of such institutions. The Final Constitution sets its face against the kind of cultural and linguistic hegemony that marked apartheid and, at the same time, recognises the necessity of a multiplicity of patterns of school language policy. The principle constitutional norms that bracket language policy do not entail some ideological pre-commitment to any particular language practice: say English over Afrikaans, or IsiZulu over IsiXhosa. Instead these norms require that any language policy meet such fixed, yet fluid, desiderata as equity, practicability and historical redress. In some instances, this set of constitutional desiderata will allow for the continued existence of single medium Afrikaans public institutions. In other instances, circumstances will dictate that such schools change their language policy. In either case, the State must be in a position to offer a compelling evidentiary basis for its conclusion regarding the change or the maintenance of a single medium schools' language policy. In the absence of such reasons, our courts will view state-sponsored changes in policy as arbitrary exercises of state authority and violations of the apposite constitutional and statutory provisions.

For many, the constitutional obligation placed upon the State to justify its actions may not provide sufficient solace. For those learners and their parents for whom the window provided by FC s 29(2) is too small and for whom a single medium school designed to further a particular linguistic, cultural or religious vision of the world is an absolute necessity, the Final Constitution again has an

[1] The wilful misconstruction of the constitutional space that exists for single-medium schools is evident from the following press release:

> The Federation of Afrikaans Cultural Associations, the FAK, welcomes the Supreme Court of Appeal's rejection of an appeal by the Western Cape MEC for Education to try and force Laerskool Mikro to change its language policy. This judgment is a victory for the autonomy of communities and in fact represents a small step closer to the application of the National Department's policy of mother-tongue instruction for all South African children. The FAK hopes that the continuing pressure by provincial education departments on Afrikaans schools to anglicize in the name of greater access will cease. Currently several Afrikaans schools countrywide are subject to such pressure, with possible court action involved. The FAK appeals to provincial education departments to stop playing off the right to access against mother-tongue instruction, and to alleviate the crisis of access to quality education for all by applying themselves to make mother-tongue instruction a reality for all South African children.

Federation of Afrikaans Cultural Associations 'FAK welcomes the Mikro Judgment" (June 27, 2005) available at http://vryeafrikaan.co.za/lees.php?id=272 (accessed on 24 January 2007).

answer. Under FC s 29(3), they may 'dig into their own pocket' and build the school on their own time and in their own fashion.[1]

57.4 Language rights in independent schools[2]

(a) Community rights and language rights in a liberal constitutional order

This section answers the following question: to what extent may independent schools discriminate fairly between learners in order to advance the legitimate constitutional objectives of various religious, cultural and linguistic communities? A close reading of the Final Constitution tells us that while our basic law does not guarantee a right to single medium public schools, faith-based public schools or culturally homogenous public schools, FC s 29(3) grants learners and their parents the right to 'dig into their own pocket' in order to build an independent school that offers their preferred medium of instruction, that reinforces a specific cultural ethos, or that promotes a comprehensive religious vision of the good. The answer regarding the extent to which these FC s 29(3) schools may discriminate lies in a close analysis of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act. Rightly construed, PEPUDA contemplates the ability of independent schools to advance linguistic, cultural and religious understandings of the good in a manner that may, on its face, look discriminatory. The admissions policies or expulsion procedures employed by independent schools may discriminate between learners so long as the discrimination (a) advances the legitimate linguistic, cultural or religious objectives of the independent school; (b) does so in terms of means narrowly tailored to meet those objectives; and (c) does not impair the dignity of the learner.

This space is not insignificant. For as we have just seen, when it comes to public schools, the State's tolerance for discriminatory religious, cultural and linguistic admissions policies or expulsion procedures is extremely limited and rightly inclines in favour of learners from historically disadvantaged communities. As one of the authors has argued elsewhere,[3] the Final Constitution does not guarantee a right to single-medium public schools, faith-based public schools or culturally homogenous public schools.

[1] See Ex parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC) at para 42.

[2] Much of this section is drawn from S Woolman 'Defending Discrimination: On the Constitutionality of Independent Schools that Promote a Particular, if not Comprehensive Vision of the Good Life' (2007) 18 Stellenbosch Law Review 31.

[3] See S Woolman 'Community Rights: Religion, Culture and Language' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 58; B Fleisch & S Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of Single-Medium Public Schools' (2007) 23 SAJHR 34.

However, it bears repeating that for those learners and their parents who want to know whether they are entitled to create and to maintain a school that furthers a particular linguistic, cultural or religious way of being in the world, the Final Constitution has a much more sanguine response. Under FC s 29(3), learners and their parents may, using their own resources, build an independent school that offers their preferred medium of instruction, that reinforces a specific cultural ethos, or that promotes a comprehensive religious vision of the good. The justification for the drafter's choice lies in the recognition that it would be foolish to dismantle such institutions solely on the grounds that either some form of exclusion takes place or that some re-inscription of privilege occurs. Human beings work, and make meaning in the world, through social networks of various kinds. Taking a sledgehammer to social institutions that create and maintain large stores of real and figurative capital is a recipe for a terribly impoverished State. The hard question, so far as independent schools that further a particular way of being in the world are concerned, is the extent to which religious, cultural and linguistic communities can engage in justifiable forms of discrimination in the furtherance of constitutionally legitimate ends and the extent to which the State and other social actors can make equally legitimate claims on the kinds of goods that are made available in these communal formations and that cannot be easily accessed elsewhere.

(b) State attempt's to control independent schools

Over the past several years, the ANC government, emboldened by ten years of democracy and majority rule, has started to flex its muscle. Concerns about consolidating power through reconciliation have receded. The State is now in a better position to consolidate its power through policy initiatives closer to its heart and to challenge existing patterns of privilege. The open textured character of the law in this area (of admissions policy, language policy and equity requirements) creates the necessary terrain for political contestation.

As one of the authors has argued elsewhere with respect to school fees, school choice and single medium public schools, the lacuna in the law must, at some level, be viewed as intentional.[1] Whether the issue was school choice, school fees, the medium of instruction, teacher-hiring, or language policies, the fragile post-apartheid State of the mid-1990's crafted legislation and regulation that divided management, governance and policy-making responsibilities between national government, provincial government, provincial Heads of Department, teachers, principals, unions, SGBs, parents and learners without establishing clear hierarchies of authority. The result was that private actors in the mid-1990s were able to assert their interests through legal channels without having to worry about being rebuffed by the State. The price the State paid for such assertions of private power was small by comparison to the compensatory legitimation that it secured through de jure and de facto decentralisation.

[1] See B Fleisch & S Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of School Fees: A Reply to Roithmayr' (2004) 22(1) Perspectives in Education 111; S Woolman & B Fleisch 'South Africa's Education Legislation, Quasi-markets and School Choice' (2006) 24(2) Perspectives in Education 1; B Fleisch & S Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of Single-Medium Public Schools' (2007) 23 SAJHR 34; S Woolman & B Fleisch 'South Africa's Unintended Experiment in School Choice: How the National Education Policy Act, the South Africa Schools Act and the Employment of Educators Act Create the Enabling Conditions for Quasi-Markets in Schools' (2006) Journal of Education & The Law 31.

By the fin de siecle, however, the State's concerns had shifted from anxiety about its quiescence to apprehension about the speed of transformation. A good example of this shift is on display in the State's efforts to bring independent schools to heel by attempting to control their age of admittance. This contrivance benefitted from the fact that age — unlike religion, culture or language — appears to be a neutral identifier. The State believed that it could go after independent schools in this manner without having to worry about alienating a particular constituency — a constituency that would mobilise around such ascriptive identifiers as language, religion or culture. What the State failed to take sufficiently seriously was the ability of individual parents to mobilise around the interests of their own children.

In Harris v Minister of Education, the High Court found that the State's age restrictions on admission to Grade 1 constituted an unjustifiable impairment of Talya Harris' right to equality.[1] While the Harris court did not doubt that the State had the authority to pass such regulations with regard to independent schools, it found that the State had failed to tender any adequate justification for its policy.[2] Harris stands for two propositions. It reinforces this chapter's basic contention that the Final Constitution creates significant space within which independent schools may flourish. It also underwrites the argument that the State will have to meet a fairly high evidentiary threshold should it wish to alter the admissions policies of independent schools.

(c) Legal framework for admissions policies in independent schools

As we noted at the outset, one purpose of this section is to assess the extent to which the laws governing admissions policies (and expulsion procedures) at independent schools permit such schools to discriminate in the pursuit of legitimate

[1] 2001 (8) BCLR 796 (T)(The King David School refused to admit Talya to Grade 1 in 2001 — even though her parents believed she was ready. The refusal to admit Talya was based upon a notice issued by the Minister of Education stating that independent schools could only admit learners to Grade 1 at the age of seven. Unwilling to take the risk that Talya might experience a developmental deficit after being held back a year, Talya's parents decided to challenge the constitutionality of the notice so that their daughter could be admitted to Grade 1 in 2001.)

[2] The Minister was naturally afforded an opportunity to rebut the presumption of unfair discrimination. First, the Minister argued that six-year old children were more likely to fail than seven-year old children and such failure rates had serious financial consequences for the State. Secondly, the Minister argued that the diversity of cultures and languages within South Africa produced insuperable difficulties for the creation of a school readiness test. Thirdly, the Minister argued that there are sound pedagogical reasons for starting formal education at age 7.

constitutional and statutory objectives: namely the furtherance of particular religious, cultural and linguistic ways of being in the world. This section's exercise in constitutional and statutory interpretation attempts to set out the correct legal framework for understanding the limits of exclusionary admissions policies designed to promote particular or comprehensive visions of the good in independent schools. With respect to the admissions policies of independent schools, this section pays particular attention to the circumstances in which associational interests, or community rights, trump considerations of equality. In short, those exclusionary admissions policies in independent schools that can be closely tied to the furtherance of constitutional legitimate objectives — say an academic curriculum that makes religious instruction mandatory in order to instill a deeper sense of faith within the broader religious community or a syllabus that makes language instruction in a particular tongue obligatory in order to sustain its use within a given cultural community — will likely pass constitutional muster.

(i) The Final Constitution

The language of FC s 29(3) reflects both the initial fragility of the post-apartheid State and the basic law's commitment to carving our 'private' space for the establishment of institutions designed to further the legitimate constitutional objectives of religious, cultural and linguistic communities:

> Everyone has the right to establish and maintain, at their own expense, independent educational institutions that (a) do not discriminate on the basis of race; (b) are registered with the State; and (c) maintain standards that are not inferior to standards at comparable public educational institutions.[1]

The language of FC s 29(3) suggests that independent schools possess substantially more latitude than public schools with respect to their admissions requirements (and their expulsion procedures).

The Court rejected all three arguments tendered by the Minister because the State had failed to adduce any evidence. As a result, the State failed to rebut the presumption that unfair discrimination on the grounds of age had taken place. More importantly, the result thwarted State efforts, on apparently neutral grounds, to control private power as exercised through private institutions. Harris stands for the proposition that the State may not assert control over independent schools simply because they are privileged. Associational rights in independent schools trump State interests in equality where the equality interest asserted cannot be backed up by any compelling pedagogical reason.

The Constitutional Court added insult to injury in Minister of Education v Harris. 2001 (4) SA 1297 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1157 (CC). It decided the matter without reaching the substance of the equality challenge. The Constitutional Court found that the Minister lacked the requisite authority under NEPA s 3(4) to create a rule that obliged independent schools to admit learners to Grade 1 only after they turned seven. Ibid at paras 11-13. NEPA s 3(4) empowered the Minister to create non-binding policy, but not law, with respect to the provinces and the independent schools found therein.

[1] IC s 32*(c)* read, in pertinent part: '*(e)*very person shall have the right . . . to establish, where practicable, educational institutions based on a common culture, language or religion, provided that there shall be no discrimination on the ground of race'.

(ii) Statutory framework and statutory interpretation

(aa) SASA and PEPUDA

Statutory interpretation may appear to be a rather dry, academic exercise. However, in historical circumstances such as ours, the stakes can be quite high. A State that is cognizant of the canons of statutory interpretation can use them to great advantage without actually announcing to the general public what advantage it seeks. In the case of admissions policies in independent schools, we want to suggest that a South African State growing in confidence, and moving from a reconciliatory politics to a politics of redress, has been able to use accepted canons of statutory interpretation to narrow the space within which privileged communities can continue to exclude persons from historically disadvantaged communities from independent, and often exclusive, educational institutions.

The statutory language around admissions policies at independent schools is quite permissive. Section 46(3)(b) of the South African Schools Act[1] ('SASA'), engages independent school admissions policies as follows:

> [A provincial] Head of Department must register an independent school if he or she is satisfied that — . . . the admission policy of the school does not discriminate on the grounds of race.[2]

To understand just how permissive the constitutional, statutory and regulatory framework for admissions at independent schools appears to be, one need only look at how admissions policies at public schools are treated in SASA. The SASA test for unfair discrimination with respect to admissions requirements at public schools tracks the test for unfair discrimination found in FC s 9.[3] Indeed, it would appear to encompass just about any imaginable ground for unfair discrimination. According to section 5(1) of SASA:

[1] Act 84 of 1996.

[2] While no mention of admissions policies is made in these regulations, the enabling provision for these regulations in SASA, s 46(3)(b), states that a provincial 'Head of Department must register an independent school if he or she is satisfied that — . . . the admission policy of the school does not discriminate on the grounds of race'. The language of the Gauteng School Education Act 6 of 1995 ('GSEA') and the regulations issued pursuant to the Act, appear equally permissive. See GSEA Chapter 8 Discrimination at Private Schools, s 68: 'Admissions requirements for private schools shall not directly or indirectly discriminate unfairly on grounds of race.' Regulations passed by Gauteng under SASA, entitled 'Notice Regarding the Registration and Withdrawal of Registration of Independent Schools', do not make the registration — and the continued accreditation — of independent schools contingent upon the conformation of admissions policies with specific equity requirements.

[3] PEPUDA analysis largely tracks FC s 9. According to FC s 9(4), 'no person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3)'. Private persons and juristic persons are clearly bound by FC s 9. FC s 9(3) establishes the prohibited grounds for discrimination: 'The State may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.' FC s 9(5) establishes a rebuttable presumption of unfair discrimination where discrimination on a prohibited ground occurs: 'Discrimination on one or more of the grounds listed in subsection (3) is unfair unless it is established that the discrimination is fair.' See, for example, Harksen v Lane 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 53.

> A public school must admit learners and serve their educational requirements without unfairly discriminating in any way.

Sections 5(2) and 5(3) of SASA also bars the use of tests, fees, mission statements or a refusal to sign a waiver for damages as grounds for refusing admission to any learner.[1]

These statutory provisions suggest that a significant gap exists between the equity requirements for admissions at independent schools and public schools. Permitting such a significant disjunction to occur between the law governing public institutions and the law governing private institutions might appear consistent with the imperatives of both a fragile and a liberal state.[2] Indeed, were one to read — today — only those constitutional and statutory provisions that engage educational institutions directly, the change in the legal landscape, of which we shall now speak, might pass unnoticed.

The enactment of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act[3] ('PEPUDA') — in 2000 — demonstrates both the increased power of the State and its willingness to use the law to challenge privilege and to further redress. For starters, PEPUDA applies to private parties.[4] An independent school, as a juristic person, is thus bound by PEPUDA.

More importantly, the tests for unfair discrimination set out in PEPUDA and SASA that engage expressly admissions policies at independent schools, are not identical. The tests set out in the sectoral legislation governing admissions policies at independent schools limit the grounds for a finding of unfair discrimination to race. The tests set out in PEPUDA are demonstrably broader in scope. Resort

[1] According to GSEA Chapter 3, s 11: 'Admission requirements for public schools shall not unfairly discriminate on grounds of race, ethnic or social origin, colour, gender, sex, disability, sexual orientation, religion, conscience, belief, culture or language.' Regulations passed under GSEA, entitled 'Admission of Learners to Public Schools', subject admissions requirements at public schools to even stricter scrutiny than the enabling legislation. See Regulations passed under GSEA s 11(1) and the Gauteng Education Policy Act 12 of 1998 ('GEPA') s 4*(a)(i)*, entitled 'Admission of Learners to Public Schools', GN 4138 of 2001 (PG 129 of 13 July 2001). The regulations expand — in line with s 9 of the Constitution — the grounds for a finding of unfair discrimination with respect to admissions policies. Express grounds now embrace ethnic or social origin, pregnancy, HIV/AIDS status, or any other illness. Indeed, the regulations — in line with FC s 9 and SASA — leave the list of grounds open-ended so as to encompass 'unfair discrimination against a learner in any way'. They likewise bar the use of admissions tests or fees to exclude a learner. The regulations' one open window for disparate treatment enables a gender specific school to refuse admission on the grounds of gender.

[2] That we have good reasons for treating 'public' social formations differently from 'private' social formations is a matter that lies beyond the scope of this article. A strong commitment to associational freedom is determined elsewhere in this work. See S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44.

[3] Act 4 of 2000.

[4] See PEPUDA s 5(1): 'The State and all persons are bound by the Act.' See also PEPUDA s 6: 'Neither the State nor any person may unfairly discriminate against any person.'

must be had to standard canons of statutory interpretation in order to determine which law applies to admissions policies at independent schools.[1]

Accepted canons of statutory interpretation tell us to look first to the language of the apposite pieces of legislation when attempting to determine which law has primacy of place.[2] PEPUDA makes it clear that its provisions prevail over all other law — save where an Act expressly amends PEPUDA or the Employment Equity Act[3] applies. Section 5 of PEPUDA reads, in relevant part:

> Application of Act: . . . (2) If any conflict relating to a matter dealt with in this Act arises between this Act and the provisions of any other law, other than the Constitution or an Act of Parliament expressly amending this Act, the provisions of this Act must prevail. (3) This Act does not apply to any person to whom and to the extent to which the Employment Equity Act, 1998 (Act 55 of 1998), applies.

A second canon of statutory interpretation tells us that more recent legislation ought to prevail. PEPUDA postdates SASA. Finally, although canons of statutory interpretation state that, ceteris paribus, more specific sectoral legislation or subordinate legislation ought to trump more general legislation, SASA does not contain any language that would suggest that in the event of a conflict between those pieces of legislation and another piece of legislation, SASA ought to prevail.[4] PEPUDA, both as a piece of ordinary legislation, and as a piece of super-ordinate legislation that gives effect to the equality provision of the Final Constitution,[5] would appear to prevail over all other pieces of legislation that engage equality considerations in independent schools.

[1] The supremacy clause of the Final Constitution requires that all law be consistent with its provisions. However, where no inconsistency exists, and where provisions of a statute or subordinate legislation or a rule of common law afford an applicant an adequate remedy and enable a court to decide the case before it, it is now trite law that the courts ought not to analyse the matter in terms of the provisions of the Final Constitution. See S v Mhlungu 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) at para 59 ('[W]here it is possible to decide any case, civil or criminal, without reaching a constitutional issue, that is the course which should be followed.') See also Zantsi v Council of State, Ciskei 1995 (4) SA 615 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1424 (CC) at para 8. For the purposes of this chapter, we assume that the apposite provisions of PEPUDA and SASA — and all subordinate legislation — are consistent with any and all provisions of the Constitution. That does not mean that provisions of PEPUDA or SASA cannot be found to be constitutionally infirm. It only means that an analysis of their susceptibility to a constitutional challenge is not germane to this chapter. A court is also apt to take into account the fact that PEPUDA is the piece of super-ordinate legislation contemplated by FC s 9(4) '[t]o promote the achievement of equality, . . . [and] to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination . . . .' At a minimum, a court will attempt to read down the provisions of PEPUDA in order to save them from a finding of invalidity. See, for example, Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC).

[2] See, generally, LM Du Plessis The Re-interpretation of Statutes (5th Edition, 2002); C Botha Statutory Interpretation (4th Edition, 2005).

[3] Act 55 of 1998.

[4] SASA s 2 reads, in relevant part: '(1) This Act applies to school education in the Republic of South Africa. . . .(3) Nothing in this Act prevents a provincial legislature from enacting legislation for school education in a province in accordance with the Constitution and this Act.'

[5] FC s 9(4).

This result might come as a bit of a surprise to those persons au fait with the regulation of school admissions by sector specific education legislation. Certainly, nothing in the express wording of PEPUDA would tell a reader that this legislation displaces SASA. No amendments have been made to various pieces of education specific legislation that would suggest a sea-change in the State's approach to the admissions policies of independent schools. And yet the law is clear. The State has quietly shifted the goal-posts.

(bb) PEPUDA and admissions policies at independent schools

Neither the application provisions of PEPUDA nor the date of its passage tell us how the provisions of that statute — or at least the test for unfair discrimination — ought to be applied to admissions policies in independent schools.[1] How then should PEPUDA be construed in this context?

Although neither SASA nor apposite provincial legislation dictates how the general terms of PEPUDA ought to be applied to the sectoral specific context of admissions policies in independent schools, a court will, generally, take into account the distinctions made in such sectoral specific education legislation.[2]

Of course, it is also possible that both the national government and various provincial governments believe that the admissions policies of public schools and independent schools ought to be treated differently. The content of that differential treatment is that, in the furtherance of legitimate constitutional objectives, an independent school may adopt admissions policies that have a discriminatory effect so long as there is no intent to discriminate on the basis of race. The rationale for this differential treatment is found in the Final Constitution itself. Independent schools may be set up in order to further a particular religious or cultural vision of the good life so long as the policies of the independent school pursuit 'do not discriminate on the basis of race'. What explains the permissive attitude of our basic law with respect to the admissions, membership and expulsion practices of private religious or cultural or linguistic associations? As Van Dijkhorst J wrote

[1] The only mention of education in PEPUDA occurs in the 'Illustrative List of Unfair Practices in Certain Sectors' that appears as a Schedule to the Act. Section 2 of the Schedule reads, in relevant part: 'Education – (a) Unfairly excluding learners from educational institutions, including learners with special needs. (b) Unfairly withholding scholarships, bursaries, or any other form of assistance from learners of particular groups identified by the prohibited grounds.' The list does not purport to distinguish between public, State-aided independent schools and non-State-aided independent schools.

[2] As we have already seen, the national government and the Gauteng provincial government subject the admissions policies at public schools and independent schools to fundamentally different tests for unfair discrimination. The prohibited grounds for unfair discrimination in GSEA and in the regulations for admissions in public schools passed under GSEA and GEPA track closely the prohibited grounds found in PEPUDA. The prohibited grounds for unfair discrimination in GSEA and SASA for independent schools are limited to race. In addition, the Gauteng provincial government has not seen fit to pass regulations governing admissions policies at independent schools. At least one implication of these distinctions is inescapable. If the Gauteng provincial government is aware of the shift in the legal landscape wrought by PEPUDA, then it has decided not to announce its awareness of that shift.

in Wittmann v Deutsche Schulverein, Pretoria, the right to create and to maintain these independent schools must, to be meaningful, embrace 'the right … to exclude non-users of that language and non-adherents of that culture or religion, or to require from them conformity'.[1]

How then should we read the provisions of PEPUDA — and the apposite provisions of SASA, the Final Constitution, as well as our extant body of common law — when attempting to determine when, or even whether, independent schools may exclude learners? The following account delineates the appropriate form of legal analysis for educators, schools and courts faced with such a question.

(cc) PEPUDA's test for admissions at independent schools

According to PEPUDA, no person — public or private — may discriminate in a manner that imposes, directly or indirectly, burdens upon and withholds, directly or indirectly, benefits from any person on prohibited grounds.[2] According to PEPUDA, prima facie demonstration of discrimination on a prohibited ground shifts the burden to the respondent to show that the discriminatory law, rule or conduct is fair.[3] In the case of independent schools that discriminate against — or exclude — learners on the basis of religion, culture or language, the burden of proof shifts to them to show that the discrimination manifest in their admissions policies is fair, given the purpose or the nature of the school.

An Equality Court hearing a PEPUDA challenge to admissions policies at an independent school will likely find a school's rejection of a learner, because she refused to take religion, language or culture classes, to constitute 'discrimination'. That initial finding does not, of course, mean that the Equality Court is obliged to find that the practice constitutes unfair discrimination. PEPUDA anticipates expressly the requisite grounds for justification of discrimination. Section 14(3) of PEPUDA states that fair discrimination may occur where the respondent can demonstrate that: '(f) … the discrimination has a legitimate purpose; [and] (g) … the … discrimination achieves its purpose'.

An independent school will first have to show that the set of religious, linguistic or cultural practices that form the basis for its restrictive admissions policies offer a coherent account of the religion, language or culture ostensibly being advanced. Most independent schools that have the furtherance of religion, culture or language as an end should be able to meet this test for 'legitimate purpose'.

[1] 1998 (4) SA 423, 454 (T).

[2] See PEPUDA s 1. 'Discrimination' means 'any act or omission, including a policy, law, rule, practice, condition or situation which directly or indirectly imposes burdens, obligations or disadvantage on; or (b) withholds benefits, opportunities or advantages from, any person on one or more of the prohibited grounds.' 'Prohibited grounds' are 'race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth' (emphasis added).

[3] See PEPUDA s 13: 'If the discrimination did take place on a ground in paragraph (a) of the definition of 'prohibited grounds', then it is unfair, unless the respondent proves that the discrimination is fair.'

The next leg of the test is somewhat more onerous. Once a legitimate purpose is established, the question becomes whether the discriminatory admissions policy is necessary to achieve the school's purpose of offering an education grounded in a particular faith, language or culture. One argument — consistent with our discussion of voice, entrance and exit below — is that an independent school committed to the furtherance of a particular religion, language or culture needs to be able to control its message and that such control requires it to have relatively unfettered control over admissions practices. How strict can such exclusionary admissions policies be?

At a minimum, any learner must agree to adhere to the curriculum of the school — at least in so far as it requires specific forms of religious, linguistic or cultural instruction. After all, if the purpose of the school is to further a given religion, language or culture, then the curriculum must be designed to advance that religion, language or culture. If the curriculum is essential for the achievement of the school's legitimate purpose, then the exclusionary rule based upon a learner's refusal to follow the curriculum must be viewed as a measure that — while discriminatory — is narrowly tailored to meet the legitimate purpose.

Can a school adopt exclusionary criteria (and expulsion procedures) that go beyond adherence to the school's curriculum? That depends. The school would be obliged to show that something more than the education itself is necessary to sustain a religion, a language or a culture. The fluidity of language and the permeability of culture suggest that pre-existing membership in the linguistic or cultural community ought not to be, as a general matter, a basis for exclusion.[1] Anyone can speak Afrikaans; anyone, over time, can become a South African.

[1] As one of the authors, Stu Woolman, contends elsewhere, one cannot speak of religious, linguistic and cultural communities as if they all took the same form and were therefore subject to identical treatment under the Final Constitution. See S Woolman 'Community Rights: Religion, Culture and Language' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 58. At a gut level, some readers of the constitutional text would like to be able to say that there is a sliding scale of judicial solicitude for these communities: a scale that runs from fairly weak in so far as linguistic communities are concerned, to medium strength with respect to cultural communities, to very strong with regard to religious communities. This intuition is driven primarily by the varying degrees of permeability of linguistic communities, cultural communities and religious communities. Anyone can learn to speak a language and thereby join a community of fellow conversants. Religious communities, on the other hand, can make admission almost impossible. Cultural communities possess an 'I know it, when I see it' character, and thus make any talk about ease of entrance (and potential membership) rather elusive: is it easier to become American or French? Is it easier to become Zulu or Sotho? The text of the Final Constitution and the decisions handed down by our Courts tend to confirm this admittedly limp set of intuitions. See Fourie (supra) at paras 90-98 (In Fourie, the Constitutional Court goes out of its way to note that no religious order and no religious officer will be required to consecrate same-sex life partnerships as marriages under religious law.) The Constitutional Court has, however, shown demonstrably less hesitancy in altering customary law arrangements enforced by traditional leaders, common law and statute. See, for example, Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)(Court declared the customary law rule of male primogeniture invalid.)

The primary difficulty with trying to squeeze any further analytical precision out of the terms 'religious community', 'linguistic community' and 'cultural community' flows from the lack of consensus as to how terms like 'cultural community', 'religious community' or 'linguistic community' are to be used. With respect to this difficulty, Amy Gutmann notes:

When the term culture is loosely used, cultural identity subsumes the entire universe of identity groups, and every social marker around which people identify with one another is called cultural. Culture, so considered, is the universal glue that unites people into identity groups, and the category becomes so broad as to be rather useless for understanding differences.

Identity in Democracy (2003) 38. See also IM Young Justice and the Politics of Difference (1990) 22-23, 152-155.

Other theorists take a tougher line. For Raz and Margalit, the only legitimate candidates for treatment as cultural communities are those communities which provide an 'all-encompassing' or a 'comprehensive' way of being in the world. J Raz & M Margalit 'National Self-determination' in J Raz (ed) Ethics in the Public Domain: Essays in the Morality of Law and Politics (1994) 119. See also S Benhabib The Claims of Culture: Equality and Diversity in the Global Era (2002); A Shachar Multicultural Jurisdictions: Cultural Differences and Women's Rights (2001); S Macedo (ed) Deliberative Politics: Essays on Democracy and Disagreement (1999); A Gutmann & D Thompson Democracy and Disagreement (1996); W Kymlicka Multicultural Citizenship: A Liberal Theory of Minority Rights (1995). In addition, Raz and Margalit write that such communities provide both an 'anchor for self-determination and the safety of effortless, secure belonging'. Raz & Margalit (supra) at 118. Belonging, in turn, is a function of membership: 'Although accomplishments play their role in people's sense of their own identity, it would seem that at the most fundamental level our sense of our own identity depends upon criteria of belonging rather than on those of accomplishment. Secure identification at that level is particularly important to one's well-being.' Ibid at 117. What Raz and Margalit fail to make fully explicit is the connection between a community that provides a comprehensive way of being in the world and a community that provides a secure sense of belonging. A community that provides a comprehensive way of being in the world generally provides a host of rules that govern most aspects of daily life. The benefits of belonging — of membership — flow to those who follow the rules. Follow the rules and one belongs. Flout the rules and one can find oneself on the outside of the community looking in. (Comprehensiveness then is a feature of communities with very strict codes of behaviour and harsh penalties — shunning or ex-communication — for rule non-compliance.) Although Raz and Margalit's definition of 'cultural community' — properly understood — certainly provides greater traction than looser definitions, it would seem to exclude too many social formations that we would intuitively describe as cultural communities. Amish Americans constitute a community that fits the rule-following, comprehensive vision of the good life model that Raz and Margalit's definition is meant to capture. The strict dictates of the Amish's version of Christianity married to a pastoral existence that eschews almost all forms of modern technology sets the Amish apart. Moreover, continued membership in the community is contingent upon adherence to religious dictates and other non-religious norms. Such communities would, if they could, withdraw entirely from the largely secular polity within which their community exists. As it stands, they simply draw invisible lines between us and them. But the Amish community in America does not fit commonplace understandings of cultural communities. Most individuals experience a sense of belonging to communities in which no penalties can be exacted for rule non-compliance and 'membership' can never be threatened. Thus, Raz and Margalit's definition of 'cultural community' confirms the foremost difficulty: locating precise definitions for the entities protected by FC ss 15, 29, 30 and 31. However, what matters, for the purposes of the constitutional analysis of community rights are, in fact, membership and rule-following. For an extended analysis of the relationship between membership and rule-following, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 44.1*(c)*. Since community-appropriate rule-following behaviour determines continued membership within the community, then the conflict that confronts the court will often be whether a person's behaviour (or State action) conforms to the community's accepted canons of rules.

Problems with community identification are not limited to internal debates about who belongs and who does not. As the recent judgment in Pillay reflects, community identification will arise, as a constitutional problem, far more often in the context of exclusion and discrimination, and in terms of PEPUDA and FC s 9. Pillay accepts Guttmann's and Woolman's warning that, even in the realm of discrimination, 'culture' must have meaningful boundaries; at the same time, Pillay declines to describe the contours of those boundaries. Ibid at para 49. However, once the individual's identification with a 'culture' is established, the discrimination inquiry shifts to the centrality of that cultural identification to the individual. Chief Justice Langa notes, in support of this position, that cultures cannot be described from outside as uniform bodies of rules and practices but are instead 'living and contested formations'. Ibid at para 54. A cultural practice may have meaning for one member of a culture but not another. Pillay therefore requires that people receive protection from external sources of discrimination in a manner that turns on how the individual value cultural norms. Ibid at para 88. We agree with this approach in the

But what of smaller cultural groups and linguistic communities? Could a colourable claim be made that because the Khoi community in South Africa is small and has such limited resources, an independent school must be able to direct its limited funds to the education of children of Khoi descent? In the abstract, that claim seems plausible enough. Moreover, the argument from equity might support measures designed to advance a previously disadvantaged group — even if such measures come at the expense of another previously disadvantaged group. This argument secures somewhat greater support in the context of schools designed to advance religion. It seems credible, if perhaps disturbing to non-adherents, to suggest that a religious education requires a religious environment. But the effective promotion of a faith may require that a learner be educated in an environment where others take their faith seriously and do not merely put up with curriculum requirements because of other instrumental educational advantages afforded by the institution. Whether this claim about the need for a homogeneous religious environment supports a strict policy of exclusion — or only the more lenient curriculum-based policy — is a very close question.

What is interesting about this 'close' question is that the State — through PEPUDA — is able to force a private actor to look to the Final Constitution to support its position. Given that the Final Constitution is always the last port of call, and that its generally stated precepts admit to any number of different constructions, the State, through PEPUDA, has succeeded in putting independent schools on their back foot.

But being on one's back foot is not the same as being underfoot. In crafting their justifications for exclusionary admissions policies and expulsion procedures, independent schools can rely upon various general provisions in the Final Constitution — FC ss 15, 18, 29, 30 and 31 — that protect religious belief, practice, tradition, association and community, as well as the express right in FC s 29(3) to create independent educational institutions. Independent schools can therefore argue that they exist in order to advance the basic law's general commitment to the protection a variety of religious, cultural or linguistic ways of life. Moreover, as Van Dijkhorst J noted in Deutsche Schulverein, the right to education guarantees that members of a religious, linguistic or cultural community may 'establish their own [private] educational institutions based on their own values'.[1] It was held that the right to create these independent schools is parasitic upon 'the right … to exclude non-users of that language and non-adherents of that culture or religion, or to require from them conformity.'[2] In sum, the constitutional right to run an context of discrimination or equality analysis. But Pillay does not resolve the difficult problems of group membership for individuals who wish to participate in the practices of community life, and whose views on the meaning of those practices differ from those persons within a community who determine how and whether those practices have been correctly interpreted. The notion that the South African State will displace the Pope as the ultimate interpreter of Catholic dogma has no place in our jurisprudence.

[1] Wittmann v Deutsche Schulverein, Pretoria 1998 (4) SA 423, 454 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T)('Deutsche Schulverein').

[2] Ibid at 454.

independent school grounded in culture, language or religion inevitably entails a concomitant right to exclude students who do not wish to adhere to curriculum requirements grounded in a given language, culture or religion. The only thing an independent school may not do — under PEPUDA or SASA — is exclude a learner on the grounds of race.[1]

The last point we want to make in this section is that while the State — through PEPUDA — has narrowed the space within which independent educational institutions can exercise their discretion over admissions policies, our State remains a constitutional democracy that must work within a framework of basic rights and freedoms. That means that an ever more powerful State cannot assume that 'redress' legitimates each and every policy initiative it undertakes. So while the burden of justification for the discriminatory admissions policies may fall on independent schools, the factors in s 14(3) of PEPUDA place genuine responsibility on the complainant (and the State) to demonstrate that the exclusionary admissions policies or expulsion procedures in question do, in fact, deleteriously affect the complainant.[2]

(i) Constitutional constraints on PEPUDA in the context of independent school admissions

(aa) Rule-following as a condition of membership

Recent constitutional case law supports the contention that independent religious associations and independent culture-specific schools have the right to expel members who agree to follow the rules or decisions of the association's governing body and subsequently refuse to do so. In Taylor v Kurtstag, the Witwatersrand High Court upheld the right of the Beth Din to issue a cherem — an excommunication edict — against a member of the Jewish community who had agreed to follow its ruling with regard to an order for child maintenance.[3] In Wittmann v Deutsche Schulverein, Pretoria, the Pretoria High Court upheld the right of a school

[1] The apposite language of SASA mirrors that of FC s 29(3). SASA s 46(3)(b) reads: 'The admission policy of the school may not discriminate on the grounds of race.'

[2] PEPUDA s 14(3)(b) states that the trier of fact must take into account 'the impact or likely impact of the discrimination on the complainant'. Assume that an independent Jewish secondary school in Johannesburg requires all matriculants to consent to a curriculum that includes Hebrew and Talmudic study. One can safely assume that that most, if not all, non-Jewish students will experience the most minimal impairment of their dignity if they are turned away from the school based upon their refusal to accept the curriculum. The reason the impairment is minimal is that a non-Jewish student (or even a Jewish student) who does not wish to follow such a curriculum has a significant amount of choice with respect to school matriculation in an urban area such as Johannesburg. Moreover, any child in a position to afford private school fees has an even greater array of options. The contention that the educational opportunities of a non-Jewish student with such resources will be significantly diminished by being denied admission to an independent Jewish school in an urban or a peri-urban area lacks purchase.

[3] 2004 (4) All SA 317 (W)('Kurtstag') at para 38 (FC s 18 — freedom of association — 'guarantees an individual the right to choose his or her associates and a group of individuals the right to choose their associates'. The right of a group to choose their associates of necessity means the right to require those who wish to join the group to conform their behaviour to certain dictates, and the right to exclude those who refuse to conform.)

governing body to expel a student who knew that she was obliged to attend language and religious instruction classes and who subsequently refused to attend these classes.[1] Both cases underwrite the proposition that in order for a religious association or cultural association to remain committed to the practice of certain beliefs, it must control the voice of, the entrance to and the exit from the association. Thus, to the extent that a learner has agreed to abide by school curriculum policy in order to secure entrance to an independent school, such an independent school would be well within its constitutional rights to expel that pupil for failure to adhere to those requirements.

(bb) Expulsion, rule-following and fair hearings

An independent school's right to expel a student who fails to adhere to the rules is subject to two provisos. The first proviso is that the independent primary and secondary school must make clear what curriculum requirements are to be followed by the learner prior to her admission. The second proviso is that a learner (or family) facing expulsion must receive a fair hearing from the independent school in question.[2]

[1] 1998 (4) SA 423, 451 (T)('Does this mean that private parochial schools which do not receive State aid may not prescribe obligatory attendance at their morning prayers and confessional religious instruction classes? The answer is negative. Section 17 of the interim Constitution and s 18 of the Constitution recognise the freedom of association. Section 14(1) [of the interim Constitution] and s 15(1) [of the Constitution] respectively recognise the freedom of religion which includes the right to join others in worship, propagation of the faith etc. Freedom of association entails the right with others to exclude non-conformists. It also includes the right to require those who join the association to conform with its principles and rules.')

[2] South African Courts have engaged associational rights and fair hearings in four relatively recent cases. See Kurtstag (supra); Cronje v United Cricket Board of South Africa 2001 (4) SA 1361 (T); Ward v Cape Peninsula Ice Skating Club 1998 (2) SA 487 (C); Deutscher Schulverein (supra). The Courts have upheld the rights of associations to control the grounds for expulsion so long as they met basic standards of procedural fairness. In the Cronje case, the High Court deferred to the United Cricket Board when it came to deciding how and whether to deal with Hansie Cronje once he had been expelled from the association. In Kurtstag, the Court deferred to the Beth Din with respect to the excommunication of a member of the Jewish community who had voluntarily submitted himself to the jurisdiction of the Beth Din and had subsequently violated the edicts of the Beth Din. The High Court found that the Beth Din's procedures met the requirements of a fair hearing for a member of the community who had agreed expressly to follow the Beth Din's recommendations and that the grounds for the expulsion were consistent with the parties' agreement to enter into arbitration with regard to a maintenance order. In the Ward and Wittmann cases, the High Court reversed the expulsion. But they did not do so on the ground that the expulsion occurred for some politically or morally reprehensible reason. Indeed, to the extent that the Court in the Wittmann case weighs in on the power of an association to terminate membership when the member acts in a manner contrary to the decisions of the association's board and engages in expressive conduct that leads to criticism of the association, the Court decides that the association does possess such power. All four cases can be read as standing for the proposition that a member has vested interests in the association that, at a minimum, require a fair termination hearing. A non-member, on the other hand, possesses no such rights. Read this way, the Kurtstag, Wittmann, Ward and Cronje cases are of a piece. What ties them together at a theoretical level is the notion that once a person has been granted entry into an association, he or she accepts the basic principles upon which the association operates and thus the principles that may lead to his or her exclusion. The potential for exclusion is part of the consideration the member offers in return for admittance. As the Court in the Kurtstag case notes: 'The potential for exclusion is part of the consideration the member offers in return for admittance.' Kurtstag (supra) at para 37.

(cc) Capture

The existing case law begs some important questions. In general, however, they reduce to a single query: why should we allow any association — including an independent school — to exclude anyone who wishes to join? One answer is 'capture'.

The argument from capture, broadly speaking, runs as follows. Capture is a function of — one might even say a necessary and logical consequence of — the very structure of associational or community life. In short, capture justifies the ability of associations and communities to control their association or community through selective membership policies, the manner in which they order their internal affairs and the discharge of members or users. Without the capacity to police their membership and expulsion policies, as well as their internal affairs, associations would face two related threats. First, an association would be at risk of having its aims substantially altered. To the extent the original or the current raison d'être of the association matters to the extant members of the association, the association must possess ability to regulate the entrance, voice and exit of members. Without built-in limitations on the process of determining the ends of the association, new members, existing members and even outside parties could easily distort the purpose, character and function of the association. Secondly, and for similar reasons, an association's very existence could be at risk. Individuals, other groups, or a State inimical to the values of a given association, could use ease of entrance into an association to put that same association out of business.

In a world without high transaction costs for the creation of associations, the risk of such penetration and alteration might be a tolerable state of affairs. But in the real world, the costs of creating and of maintaining associations are quite high. Just starting an association — be it religious, cultural, economic, political or intimate — takes enormous effort. To fail to take such efforts seriously, by failing to give individuals 'ownership' over the fruits of their continued labour, is to risk creating significant disincentives to form, build and maintain their relationships. To fail to permit an independent school, a marriage, a corporation, a church, a golf club or a law society to govern its boundaries and its members in appropriate ways, would make these arrangements impossible to maintain. It would, in some respects, be equivalent to saying that anyone and everyone owns these associations — which is, of course, tantamount to saying that no one owns them. It is the purpose of freedom of association, freedom of religion, community rights and the right to create independent schools to ensure that both literal forms and figurative forms of property are protected from capture by those who would use them for ends at a variance with the objectives of the existing, and rightful members, of the association.[1]

(dd) Constitutive attachments

Associational freedom is often justified on the ground that it enables individuals to exercise relatively unfettered control over the various relationships and practices deemed critical to their self-understanding. But individual autonomy as the basis for associational freedom overemphasizes dramatically the actual space for self-defining choices.

As one of the authors has maintained elsewhere, each self is best understood as a centre of narrative gravity that unifies a set of dispositional states that are determined by the practices of the various communities — religious, cultural, linguistic, national, familial, ethnic, economic, sexual, racial, social (and so on) — into which that self is born.[2] This determined, conditioned theory of the self supports some pretty straightforward conclusions about associational freedom and community rights in the context of independent schools.[3]

Freedom of association, freedom of religion and community rights, correctly understood, force us to attend to the arationality of our most basic attachments and to think twice before we accord our arational attachments preferred status to [1] How much control do we cede to the existing members of an association to determine who is entitled to membership? It depends. We tend to cede a great deal of control over entrance to marriages and over membership in religious institutions. However, when we move on to more public institutions such as trade unions or universities or law societies, then we may want such institutions to bear some sort of burden for demonstrating that the grounds for exclusion are reasonably or even inextricably linked with the purposes of the institution. The basis for the distinction between the two groups of associations should be obvious. It is not clear what, if anything, a State would gain through interference in entrance criteria for marriages and religions. It is, however, clear that issues of power, participation and opportunity in a liberal democratic society may require that institutions designed to deliver such goods — trade unions, political parties, universities — must do so in a fair manner — a manner that is in some sense congruent with the values of a liberal democratic society. See N Rosenblum 'Compelled Association, Public Standing, Self-respect and the Dynamic of Exclusion' in A Gutmann (ed) Freedom of Association (1998) 75.

[2] See S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 44.1(b); S Woolman The Selfless Constitution: Experimentation and Flourishing as the Foundations of South Africa's Basic Law (forthcoming 2008).

[3] At the same time this account of the self demonstrates the extent to which associations and communities are constitutive of the self. It dispels the notion that individuals are best understood as 'rational choosers' of the ends they seek. The self should be seen as the inheritor and the executor of a rather heterogenous set of practices — of ways of responding to or acting in the world. The centrality of inherited practices or social endowments for both the creation and the maintenance of identity introduces an ineradicable element of arationality into the domain of individual decision-making. That is, despite the dominance of the enlightenment vision of the self as a rational agent, the truth of the matter is that the majority of our responses to the world are arational.

the arational attachments of others.[1] These observations regarding constitutive attachments buttress our contention that independent educational institutions that pursue a particular way of being in the world ought to be able to exclude from the institution those learners who do not derive meaning from that way of being in the world, and whose presence, in significant numbers, would make the institution, qua religious, linguistic or cultural school, impossible to sustain.

(ee) Associational rights, self-governance and pluralism

If we accept that the practice of religion, the use of a language and the participation in cultural life are legitimate, constitutionally-sanctioned objectives, then discrimination narrowly tailored to meet those objectives must be able to pass constitutional muster. The alternative proposition — that no educational institution may discriminate on the basis of religion, language and culture — makes the possibility of sustaining, in South Africa, a diverse array of religious, linguistic and cultural communities an empirical impossibility.

(ii) Common law norms and the proper construction of PEPUDA in the context of the admissions policies of independent schools

The extant common law on association reinforces more general jurisprudential considerations in support of the proposition that independent schools intended to support a religion, a culture or a language, possess a significant degree of latitude with respect to admissions policies that differentiate between adherents and non-adherents. One old and venerable strand of the common law on association tolerates little internal or external interference with the critical purposes — or voice — of an association.[2] Another equally important line of cases is designed to prevent insiders and outsiders from altering the fundamental purposes of an association.[1] Although both lines of case law might have to yield to constitutional and statutory dictates, the courts ought to consider the learning in these cases as they attempt to strike the appropriate balance between equality, on the one hand, and community rights, on the other.

[1] The constitutive nature of our attachments also forces us to attend to another often overlooked feature of associations. We often speak of the associations that make up our lives as if we were largely free to choose them or make them up as we go along. We have suggested, in these pages, why such a notion of choice is not true of us as individual selves. It is also largely not true of associational life generally. As Walzer has convincingly argued, there is a 'radical givenness to our associational life'. M Walzer 'On Involuntary Association' in A Gutmann (ed) Freedom of Association (1998) 64, 67. What he means, in short, is that most of the associations that make up our associational life are involuntary associations. We don't choose our family. We generally don't choose our race or religion or ethnicity or nationality or class or citizenship. They choose us. Moreover, to the extent that these involuntary associations provide our life with meaning, we must draw the conclusion that over a very large domain of our lives 'meaning makes us' — we, as individuals, do not make that meaning. A reasonably equal and democratic society must mediate the givenness of our associational life and the aspirations of all of us to have the ability to discriminate (and sometimes choose) between those associational forms which still fit and those which do not. It is often the case that not choosing to leave an association, but choosing to stay, is what we truly cherish as freedom. As Walzer suggests, we ought to call such decisions to reaffirm our commitments 'freedom simply, without qualification'. Ibid at 73.

[2] See Mitchell's Plain Town Centre Merchants Association v McLeod 1996 (4) SA 159 166 (A) citing Total South Africa (Pty) Ltd v Bekker 1992 (1) SA 617 624 (A)(emphasis added).

(iii) Conclusions about constitutional and common law constraints on the PEPUDA test for admissions policies of independent schools

This brief foray into constitutional law and common law services the following set of conclusions. While the ends pursued by PEPUDA are largely egalitarian, a panoply of rights in the Final Constitution vouchsafes objectives that cannot be reduced to equality without doing substantial violence to the meaning of those objectives or to the heterogeneous society in which we live. Indeed, to put the matter more bluntly, the Final Constitution does not commit us to a society solely based upon equality. It commits us to 'an open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom'. The Final Constitution recognizes that great stores of social capital (that can be used for transformative ends) will be lost unless we leave many 'conservative' institutions just as they are.

The foregoing account allows us to reach at least one simple conclusion: the fact that PEPUDA applies to admissions policies at independent schools does not undermine the ability of independent schools to advance linguistic, cultural and religious understandings of the good life. The reason PEPUDA does not, necessarily, undermine the ability of independent schools to advance linguistic, cultural and religious understandings of the good life is that although discrimination in the admissions process may occur, any discrimination that advances the legitimate linguistic, cultural or religious objectives of the independent school and does so in terms of means narrowly tailored to meet those objectives, ought to survive PEPUDA analysis.

[1] A well-established body of common law precedent supports the contention that any proposed alteration of the fundamental objectives of an association requires the unanimous support of the association's members. This body of case law also underwrites the general proposition that courts ought to be loath to disturb associational relations on the basis of general assertions of equity or fairness. See, generally, B Bamford The Law of Partnership and Voluntary Association in South Africa (3rd Edition, 1982); Murray v SA Tattersall's Subscription Rooms 1910 TH 35, 41 (Curlewis J: 'If I be right in the view which I have taken of the object and purpose of the association, then the applicant cannot be compelled by a majority of the members — no matter how great — to become a member of an association or a club having a different object; he joined a betting club and cannot now be forced by a majority to become a member of a social club.') At the same time as this line of cases applies to the internal affairs of associations, it also offers insight into the extent to which parties outside an association ought to be allowed to transform that association. A very recent, and perhaps even more apposite, judgment is Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk in Afrika (OVS) v Verenigende Gereformeerde Kerk in Suider-Afrika 1999 (2) SA 156 (SCA). The Dutch Reformed Church in Africa ('NGKA') attempted to merge with the Dutch Reformed Mission Church in South Africa ('NGSK'). However, several individual churches and regional synods of the NGKA refused to accept the general synod's decisions. They asserted that the manner in which the NGKA general synod altered the constitution was ultra vires. They sought to have the amendments to the NGKA constitution and the consequent merger with the NGSK declared invalid. The Supreme Court of Appeal agreed. It held that the decision of the general synod of the NGKA to merge with the NGSK and the intermediate steps leading up to the merger conflicted with the clear and unambiguous wording of the constitution and vitiated, without the requisite authority (unanimity of the regional synods), the fundamental objectives of the association; all of the alterations to the NGKA constitution without the requisite authority were therefore ultra vires and invalid. Ibid at 168-175. The Supreme Court of Appeal's decision in Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk in Afrika provides exceptionally strong support for the proposition that independent schools designed to promote a particular religion, language or culture cannot be changed from an association acting to further those interests into an association that simply furthers the educational interests of any South African learner.

Furthermore, the Final Constitution's undeniable commitment to transformation does not mean that every egalitarian claim will trump a more particularistic claim. The Final Constitution's answer to those parents who wish to school their children in the language, culture or religion of their choice is unequivocal. Parents and learners may create and maintain privately funded independent schools that advance linguistic, cultural and religious understandings of the good life provided that they do not employ admissions policies or expulsion procedures that serve as proxies for discrimination based upon race.

57.5 STATE SUBSIDIES FOR INDEPENDENT EDUCATIONAL INSTITUTIONS

We lay significant emphasis on the distinction between state-aided independent schools and non-state-aided independent schools because the former are subject to constitutional constraints to which the latter are not. The best example of this distinction engages the exercise of religious practices in a school environment.

FC s 15(2) requires that attendance at religious observances be free and voluntary. FC s 15(2) states that:

> Religious observances may be conducted at state or state-aided institutions, provided that (a) those observances follow rules made by the appropriate public authorities; (b) they are conducted on an equitable basis; and (c) attendance at them is free and voluntary. (Emphasis added).

Thus, FC s 15(2) introduces a level of equity at state-aided independent schools that makes the religious character of such an institution difficult, if not impossible, to maintain. However, by forsaking state aid, an independent school seeking to advance the tenets of a given faith can do so without having to concern itself with FC s 15(2)'s requirements of equity and voluntariness. Non-state-aided independent schools that seek to advance a culture or a language need not worry about finessing FC s 15(2)'s dictates. They simply do not apply. However, while such independent schools devoted to the promotion of a language or a culture are not subject to any state aid-related constraints, FC s 30 and FC s 31 make plain that the right to form 'cultural … and linguistic associations' … may not be exercised in a manner inconsistent with any provision of the Bill of Rights.' The implication of this proviso in both FC s 30 and FC s 31 is that the rights of such associations are more likely to fall before other constitutional imperatives, say the right to equality.[1]

In any event, while the distinction we make between state-aided independent schools and non-state-aided independent schools is real, our reliance on it here is largely rhetorical. It is simply easier to contrast how constitutional and statutory equity requirements for admissions policies play out in two contexts, rather than three. It is also easier to contrast how FC s 9 and PEPUDA operate differently in the private domain than in the public domain. State-aided independent institutions must — by the very nature of their state support — occupy a somewhat murky middle ground between the private and the public.

[1] But see S Woolman 'Community Rights: Culture, Language and Religion' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 58. Of course, as one of the authors has argued elsewhere, the internal limitations clauses of FC s 30 and FC s 31 merely beg the question of whether the other rights in Chapter 2 trump FC s 30 and FC s 31. One can, in many instances, argue that community rights are both consistent with and reinforce others rights — eg, to dignity, to equality, to expression, to association, and to various socio-economic rights. The strength of FC s 30 and FC s 31 turn, to a significant degree, on the extent to which the Constitutional Court recognizes the associational rights of various religious, cultural and linguistic communities. The Constitutional Court's recent judgments in Fourie and Pillay suggest a growing appreciation for South Africa's diverse communities and a well-deserved recognition of the deep reservoir of meaning that those communities provide their members (as well as South Africans generally).

58 Community Rights: Language, Culture & Religion

Stu Woolman

58.1 Introduction 58–1
(a) Exclusion, unfair discrimination and mere differentiation 58–4
(b) Inclusion, unfair discrimination and mere differentiation 58–10
(c) Distinctions between religious, linguistic and cultural communities 58–13
58.2 Historical background: Negotiating community rights 58–17
(a) Interim Constitution 58–18
(b) Final Constitution 58–21
58.3 Community rights in international law 58–23
(a) Minority rights and community rights 58–24
(b) Structure of international minority rights and community rights 58–26
(i) International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 58–27
(ii) UN Declaration on Minorities 58–28
(iii) African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights . . 58–29
58.4 FC s 31 58–31
(a) Content of FC s 31 58–31
(i) Individual right exercised communally 58–31
(ii) Membership in and belonging to a 'cultural, religious or linguistic community' 58–36
(iii) May not be denied the right 58–37
(iv) Right to enjoyment of culture in community with others 58–38
(v) Right to practise a religion in community with others 58–40

(vi) Right to use a language of choice 58–44
(vii) Right to form, join and maintain cultural, religious and linguistic associations 58–45
(b) Internal limitations of FC s 31 58–00
58.5 FC s 30 58–48
(a) Content of FC s 30. 58–48
(b) Internal limitations of FC s 30 58–50
58.6 Relationship between the internal limitations clauses in FC s 30 and FC s 31 and the general limitations clause in FC s 36 58–50
58.7 FC s 29 58–51
(a) FC s 29(3): Right to maintain independent schools that advance the ends of cultural, religious and linguistic communities 58–52
(b) FC s 29(2): Right to maintain public schools that further the ends of cultural, religious and linguistic communities 58–57
58.8 Self-determination 58–66
(a) Self-determination in International Law 58–66
(b) Self-determination and the Final Constitution. 58–67
(i) Interim Constitution, Constitutional Principles and Certification 58–67
(ii) Volkstaat Council 58–69
(iii) FC s 235 58–71
(iv) Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities ('CRLC'). 58–73
(aa) Purpose of the CRLC 58–73
(bb) Weakness of the CRLC 58–74

30 Language and culture
Everyone has the right to use the language and to participate in the cultural life of their choice, but no one exercising these rights may do so in a manner inconsistent with any provision of the Bill of Rights.

31 Cultural, religious and linguistic communities
(1) Persons belonging to a cultural, religious or linguistic community may not be denied the right, with other members of that community —
(a) to enjoy their culture, practise their religion and use their language; and
(b) to form, join and maintain cultural, religious and linguistic associations and other organs of civil society.
(2) The rights in subsection (1) may not be exercised in a manner inconsistent with any provision of the Bill of Rights.

235 Self-determination
The right of the South African people as a whole to self-determination, as manifested in this Constitution, does not preclude, within the framework of this right, recognition of the notion of the right of self-determination of any community sharing a common cultural and language heritage, within a territorial entity in the Republic or in any other way, determined by national legislation.

29 Education
(2) Everyone has the right to receive education in the official language or languages of their choice in public educational institutions where that education is reasonably practicable. In order to ensure the effective access to, and implementation of, this right, the state must consider all reasonable educational alternatives, including single medium institutions, taking into account — (a) equity; (b) practicability; and (c) the need to redress the results of past racially discriminatory laws and practices.
(3) Everyone has the right to establish and maintain, at their own expense, independent educational institutions that (a) do not discriminate on the basis of race; (b) are registered with the state; and (c) maintain standards that are not inferior to standards at comparable public educational institutions.*

58.1 INTRODUCTION

In the heady days following the fall of the Berlin Wall in 1989, it seemed possible that we might be able to have our cake and eat it too. Velvet revolutions in Eastern Europe and South Africa offered evidence that we were all 'social democrats' now. More amazing still, separatist claims were resolved either through partition — as occurred with the neat cleavage of Czechoslovakia into the Czech Republic and Slovakia — or through public referenda in which minority communities concluded that it would be best if they did not withdraw from the polity of which they were currently members — as occurred in French-speaking Quebec in Canada and in white South Africa. The two great strains of enlightenment thought — the individualism of Locke and the American Revolution and the romanticism of Rousseau and the French Revolution — seemed to have

* I would like to thank Iain Currie for allowing me to make generous use of his previously published material on the international law on minority rights. I am also indebted to Theunis Roux and Solomon Dersso for their editorial interventions.

finally played themselves out with the end of the Cold War. We suddenly found our selves free to be 'me' and 'we'. That is, each individual could freely be her many selves (in an order of priority largely left to the citizen herself), maintain her affiliations with the associations that made such selves possible, and not have to worry that the state would force her to choose one of her identities over all others.

But within five years, from 1989 to 1994, the cheery, non-postmodernist, optimism with which we (global citizens) greeted placards in Prague and Pretoria bearing the words 'Freedom', 'Truth' and 'Justice' morphed into something decidedly more modest.[1] Yugoslavia disintegrated into a war of all against all. In Rwanda, Hutus only agreed to beat their machetes into ploughshares after they had already beaten a million Tutsis to death. Something had changed. Or more accurately, we had missed something — in this brief epoch — along the way. Today, too many nations still seemed inclined to use the machinery of the state to eliminate alternative and non-dominant ways of being in the world.

Three hundred and fifty years ago, Locke's Letter on Toleration suggested that we could end such civil wars by denying the state the right to dictate that its citizens conform their behaviour to a comprehensive (and totalizing) vision of the good life and by ensuring that the state accorded religious, cultural and linguistic groups sufficient autonomy to pursue their own preferred way of being in the world. Was he wrong? Again, what had we missed? What he missed is the difference between a politics of respect that issues from claims grounded in human dignity and a politics of difference that issues from claims grounded in equal recognition. And that, I suggest below, is exactly the difference between a politics that can accommodate both the right to be 'me' and the right to be 'we' — and one that fails to do both.

It may well be that, in many societies, individual liberty, multicultural recognition and nation building are incompatible. Indeed, for a society in transition, multicultural recognition and national identity formation appear to pull in opposite directions. For even if individual identities are formed in open dialogue, these identities are largely shaped and limited by a pre-determined set of scripts. Collective recognition becomes important, in large part, because the body politic has denied the members of some group the ability to form — on an individual basis — a positive identity. In a perfect world, the elimination of group-based barriers to social goods would free individuals to be whatever they wanted to be. But even in a perfect world, claims for group recognition do not dissipate so readily.

[1] For more on the non-relativist, shared (if necessarily narrow), understanding of such basic political terms as freedom, justice and truth in substantially different contexts, see M Walzer Thick and Thin: Moral Argument at Home and Abroad (2002). As a steadfast defender of the politics of difference, Walzer does not suggest that we all share a maximalist account of what morality, justice and truth entail. (We are not all adherents of Rawls' difference principle in politics, nor we do we all subscribe to a correspondence theory in epistemology.) Walzer does, correctly, claim that we (global citizens) share a minimalist account of justice with those persons marching and revolting in Prague and Pretoria. And what is that? Walzer writes: 'What they meant by . . . justice . . . was simple enough: an end to arbitrary arrests, equal and impartial law enforcement; the abolition of the privileges and prerogatives of the party elite common, garden variety justice.' Ibid at 2.

What is the basis for the demand for group recognition? In any multicultural society, two different kinds of claims for equal respect and two different senses of identity sit uncomfortably alongside one another. The first emerges from what Charles Taylor calls a politics of equal dignity.[1] It is based on the idea that each individual human being is equally worthy of respect. The second issues from a politics of difference. This form of politics tends to revolve primarily around the claim that every group of people ought to have the right to form and to maintain its own — equally respected — community. The important distinction between the two is this. The first focuses on what is the same in all of us — that we all have lives and hopes and dreams and that we should all be allowed to pursue these dreams in an equal manner. The second focuses on a specific aspect of our identity — our membership of a group — and says that the purpose of our politics ought to be, ultimately, the nurturing or the fostering of that particularity. The power of this second form of liberal politics springs largely from its involuntary character — the sense that we have no capacity to choose this aspect of our identity. It chooses us.[2] One of the problems South Africa faces is that it is difficult, if not impossible, to accommodate both kinds of claim. As Taylor himself notes, while 'it makes sense to demand as a matter of right that we approach … certain cultures with a presumption of their value … it can't make sense to demand as a matter of right that we come up with a final concluding judgment that their value is great or equal to others.'[3] But the demand for political recognition of distinct religious, cultural and linguistic communities often amounts to that second demand. Moreover, such recognition often reinforces a narcissism of minor difference that, in turn, provokes anxiety about the extent to which members of other groups secure access to the most important goods in a polity. Such anxiety about a just distribution of goods — and the manner in which group affiliation distorts that distribution — necessarily interferes with national identity formation. The African National Congress (ANC) has, for both historical reasons and for reasons associated with its vision of transformation, refused to lend significant support to group politics. The Constitutional Court is also predisposed towards claims of equal respect (for individuals and, occasionally, groups) grounded in a politics of equal dignity.[4]

[1] See C Taylor 'The Politics of Recognition' in A Gutmann (ed) Multiculturalism (1996) 1.

[2] See M Walzer 'On Involuntary Association' in A Gutmann (ed) Freedom of Association (1998) 64, 67.

[3] Taylor (supra) at 16.

[4] See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at paras 28–30 ('[I]t is clear that the constitutional protection of dignity requires us to acknowledge the value and the worth of all individuals as members of society.') See also President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 41 ('[D]ignity is at the heart of individual rights in a free and democratic society… [E]quality means nothing if it does not represent a commitment to each person's equal worth as a human being, regardless of their differences. Equality means that our society cannot tolerate legislative distinctions that treat certain people as second class citizens.') See also S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36.

(a) Exclusion, unfair discrimination and mere differentiation

Should we, like the ANC, the Constitutional Court, and Amartya Sen, be group identity sceptics? Sen contends that:

> Our shared humanity gets savagely challenged when the manifold divisions in the world are unified into one allegedly dominant system of classification — in terms of religion, or community, or culture, or nation, or civilization (treating each as uniquely powerful in the context of that particular approach to war and peace.) The uniquely partitioned world is much more divisive than the universe of plural and diverse categories that shape the world in which we live. It goes not only against the old-fashioned belief that 'we human beings are all much the same' … but also against the less discussed but much more plausible understanding that we are diversely different. The hope of harmony in the contemporary world lies to a great extent in a clearer understanding of the pluralities of human identity, and in the appreciation that they cut across each other and work against a sharp separation along one single hardened line of impenetrable division.[1]

That much seems incontestable. Totalizing views of identity (with their ostensibly comprehensive visions of the good life) have led to a hardening of boundaries between groups. The hardening of boundaries has led, in turn, to a hardening of hearts that enables many nations (and many communities or groups with claims to nationhood) to pillage, bomb and plunder with increasingly greater abandon. The more difficult question for group identity sceptics in South Africa is how to draw down on our constitutive attachments in a manner that both protects the social capital we require to build the many institutions that make us human and prevents specific religious, cultural, and linguistic communities from using that social capital to undermine our 'more perfect union'. Here Sen knows he — or we — are in trouble, but can only state the problem thus:

> The sense of identity can make an important contribution to the strength and the warmth of our relations with others, such as our neighbours, or members of the same community, or fellow citizens, or followers of the same religion. Our focus on particular identities can enrich our bonds and make us do things for each other and can help us to take us beyond our self-centred lives … [But] [t]he well-integrated community in which residents do absolutely wonderful things for each other with great immediacy and solidarity can be the very same community in which bricks are thrown through the windows of immigrants who move into the region from elsewhere. The adversity of exclusion can be made to go hand in hand with the gifts of inclusion.[2]

Sen's last sentence is telling — 'can be made to go hand in hand'. Not must, not inevitably, and certainly not ought. But again, Sen's invocation of diverse difference (within individuals, as within nations) and his ringing defence of the freedom to think critically about our multiple identities does not do the hard work — the line-drawing and the rule-making — that constitutional law requires.[1]

[1] A Sen Identity and Violence: The Illusion of Destiny (2006) xiv.
[2] Ibid at 2-3.

Here, at least, is one place where the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence offers us useful guidance as to how the state ought to engage the religious, cultural and linguistic communities that make up the state and how those communities ought to engage one another. In Fourie, the Constitutional Court found that while the state could not continue to enforce common-law rules and statutory provisions that prevented same-sex life partners from entering civilly-sanctioned marriages, the Final Constitution had nothing immediate to say about religious prohibitions on gay and lesbian marriage and could not be read to require religious officials to consecrate a marriage between members of a same-sex life partnership.[2] The Fourie Court wrote:

> [The amici's] arguments raise important issues concerning the relationship foreshadowed by the Constitution between the sacred and the secular. They underline the fact that in the open and democratic society contemplated by the Constitution, although the rights of non-believers and minority faiths must be fully respected, the religious beliefs held by the great majority of South Africans must be taken seriously. As this Court pointed out in Christian Education, freedom of religion goes beyond protecting the inviolability of the individual conscience. For many believers, their relationship with God or creation is central to all their activities. It concerns their capacity to relate in an intensely meaningful fashion to their sense of themselves, their community and their universe. For millions in all walks of life, religion provides support and nurture and a framework for individual and social stability and growth. Religious belief has the capacity to awaken concepts of self-worth and human dignity that form the cornerstone of human rights. Such belief affects the believer's view of society and founds a distinction between right and wrong. It expresses itself in the affirmation and continuity of powerful traditions that frequently have an ancient character transcending historical epochs and national boundaries. For believers, then, what is at stake is not merely a question of convenience or comfort, but an intensely held sense about what constitutes the good and proper life and their place in creation. . . . Religious bodies play a large and important part in public life, through schools, hospitals and poverty relief programmes. They command ethical behaviour from their members and bear witness to the

[1] For a substantially more optimistic view about our capacity to recognize diverse difference, and our ability to sustain political institutions, in heterogeneous societies, through rational discourse, see KA Appiah Cosmopolitanism: Ethics in a World of Strangers (2006) 113, 144 ('We do not need, have never needed, settled community, a homogenous system of values. The odds are that, culturally speaking, you already live a cosmopolitan life, enriched by literature, art, and film that comes from many places, and that contains influences from many more. And the marks of cosmopolitanism in [my] Asante village soccer, Muhammed Ali, hip-hop entered [our] lives, as they entered yours, not as work, but as pleasure. . . . One distinctly cosmopolitan commitment is to pluralism. Cosmopolitans [therefore] think that there are many values worth living by and that you cannot live by all of them. So we hope and expect that different people and different societies will embody different values. But they have to be values worth living by.') > exercise of power by State and private agencies; they promote music, art and theatre; they provide halls for community activities, and conduct a great variety of social activities for their members and the general public. They are part of the fabric of public life, and constitute active elements of the diverse and pluralistic nation contemplated by the Constitution. Religion is not just a question of belief or doctrine. It is part of a people's temper and culture, and for many believers a significant part of their way of life. . . . In the open and democratic society contemplated by the Constitution there must be mutually respectful co-existence between the secular and the sacred. The function of the Court is to recognise the sphere which each inhabits, not to force the one into the sphere of the other. Provided there is no prejudice to the fundamental rights of any person or group, the law will legitimately acknowledge a diversity of strongly-held opinions on matters of great public controversy. I stress the qualification that there must be no prejudice to basic rights. Majoritarian opinion can often be harsh to minorities that exist outside the mainstream. It is precisely the function of the Constitution and the law to step in and counteract rather than reinforce unfair discrimination against a minority. The test, whether majoritarian or minoritarian positions are involved, must always be whether the measure under scrutiny promotes or retards the achievement of human dignity, equality and freedom. The hallmark of an open and democratic society is its capacity to accommodate and manage difference of intensely-held world views and lifestyles in a reasonable and fair manner. The objective of the Constitution is to allow different concepts about the nature of human existence to inhabit the same public realm, and to do so in a manner that is not mutually destructive and that at the same time enables government to function in a way that shows equal concern and respect for all.[1]

[2] Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie (Doctors For Life International & Others, Amici Curiae); Lesbian & Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)('Fourie') at paras 90–98. See also Fourie v Minister of Home Affairs 2005 (3) SA 429 (SCA), 2005 (3) BCLR 241 (SCA) at paras 36–37 (No religious denomination would be compelled to marry gay or lesbian couples.)

The Fourie Court commits itself to five propositions that are fundamental for associational rights, generally, and for religious, cultural and linguistic community rights, in particular. First, religious, cultural and linguistic communities are a critical source of meaning for the majority of South Africans. Second, religious, cultural and linguistic communities create institutions that support the material, intellectual, ethical and spiritual well-being of many South Africans. Third, religious, cultural and linguistic associations, as part of civil society, play an essential role in mediating the relationship between the state and its citizens. Fourth, while religious, cultural and linguistic associations are entitled to articulate — and make manifest through action — their 'intensely held world views', they may not do so in a manner that unfairly discriminates against other members of South African society. Fifth, although the 'intensely held world views' and practices of various religious, cultural and linguistic associations must, by necessity, exclude other members of South African society from some forms of membership and of participation, such exclusion does necessarily constitute unfair discrimination. Indeed, the Fourie Court's decision makes it patently clear that, to the extent that exclusionary practices are designed to further the legitimate constitutional ends of religious, cultural and linguistic associations, and do not have as their aim the denial of access to essential goods, the Final Constitution's express recognition of religious, cultural and linguistic pluralism commits us to a range of practices that the Constitutional Court will deem fair discrimination. The refusal of some religious officials to consecrate same-sex life partnerships as marriages under religious law is but one form of fair discrimination.

[1] Fourie (supra) at paras 90-98.

If we accept the Fourie Court's fifth proposition — which goes to the heart of the matter in conflicts between egalitarian concerns and associational rights — then South Africans, as members of a socially democractic, but still liberal constitutional, state, are obliged to ask a number of other questions about the 'effects' of exclusionary practices. The easy question is whether communities possess the power to exclude members who initially agree to follow the rules of the community, but then subsequently refuse to do so. Of course, they do. The hard question is whether South African society as a whole would be better off if it eliminated those exclusionary practices that not only remove non-compliant individuals but prevent other individuals — who begin as outsiders — from gaining entrance into the community?

The answer to this hard question turns primarily on access to those goods which individuals require in order to flourish. In 21st-century social democratic, but liberal constitutional, states – such as South Africa – there are no hard and fast lines between the public sphere and the private sphere (and the various goods they provide to individuals.) The result is that the Final Constitution affords no easy answers about what remains in the private domain and thus subject to some constitutional pre-commitment to non-interference. (Even questions of sexual intimacy, as the Jordan Court made clear, are matters of public interest.) Instead, the Final Constitution — and super-ordinate legislation such as the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act[1] — is primarily concerned with questions about individual and group access to the kind of goods that enable us to lead lives worth living.

Sen, for his part, is sceptical of the value of many forms of exclusionary and discriminatory behaviour practised by some religious, cultural and linguistic communities. It is the virulence of these practices that leads Sartre to conclude, somewhat rhetorically, that the anti-Semitism of European Christianity and Nazi Germany 'makes the Jew'.[2] (By this, Sartre meant that the dominant and the discriminatory script of Christian Europe denied the Jew the most basic features

[1] Act 4 of 2000.

[2] See Jean-Paul Sartre Portrait of the Anti-Semite (trans E de Mauny 1968) 57 ('The Jew is a man whom other men look upon as a Jew; . . . it is the anti-Semite who makes the Jew.') of humanity.[1]) But this critical stance toward the exclusionary practices of many communities does not commit us to the proposition that all of these exclusionary practices are constitutionally infirm. (Nor does it commit us to the proposition, implicit in Sartre's brief against anti-Semitism, that there is nothing of value left in Judaism once one dispenses with the discriminatory script of Christian Europe.[2]) As I have argued at length elsewhere[3] — and as Sen recognizes[4] — no form of meaningful human association — marriages, nuclear families, extended families, friendships, burial societies, trade unions, neighbours, neighbourhood security watches, political parties, bowling clubs, political action groups, stokvels,

[1] Edward Said voices similar sentiments about double consciousness and its dependency on a dominant power's hypocrisy, when he writes:

> The moment one became a student at VC [Victoria College in Cairo, a public school in effect created to educate those ruling-class Arabs and Levantines who were going to take over after the British left] one was given the school handbook, a series of regulations governing every aspect of school life the kind of uniform we were to wear, what equipment was needed for sports, the dates of school holidays, bus schedules and so on. But the schools first rule, emblazoned on the opening page of the handbook, read: English is the language of the school; students caught speaking any other language will be punished. Yet there were no native English-speakers among the students. Whereas the masters were all British, we were a motley crew of Arabs of various kinds, Armenians, Greeks, Italians, Jews and Turks, each of whom had a native language that the school had explicitly outlawed. Yet all, or nearly all, of us spoke Arabic many spoke Arabic and French and so we were able to take refuge in a common language in defiance of what we perceived as an unjust colonial stricture. British imperial power was nearing its end immediately after World War Two, and this fact was not lost on us, although I cannot recall any student of my generation who would have been able to put anything as definite as that into words.

'Between Worlds' (1999) 9 London Review of Books 20.

[2] While Sartre's views on sincerity and his negative assessment of religion might lead him to this conclusion, few non-practising cultural Jews would endorse this position. Shakespeare offers the fuller account of the Jew as a person with friends, family, community, and employment, and not just the possessor of an identity that constitutes a negative place holder, when he has Shylock say:

> He hath disgraced me, and hindered me half a million; laughed at my losses, mocked at my gains, scorned my nation, thwarted my bargains, cooled my friends, heated mine enemies; and whats his reason? I am a Jew. Hath not a Jew eyes? Hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? Fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapons, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same summer and winter, as a Christian is? If you prick us do we not bleed? If you tickle us do we not laugh? If you poison us, do we not die? And if you wrong us, shall we not seek revenge? If we are like you in the rest, we will resemble you in that. If a Jew wrong a Christian, what is humility? Revenge. If a Christian wrong a Jew, what should his sufferance be by Christian example? Why, revenge. The villany you teach me, I shall execute and it shall go hard but I will better the instruction.

W Shakespeare The Merchant of Venice, Act III, Scene 1.

[3] See S Woolman The Selfless Constitution: Experimentalism & Flourishing as the Foundations of South Africa's Basic Law (2007); S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44; S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36. See also P Lenta 'Religious Liberty and Cultural Accommodation' (2005) 122 SALJ 352 (For more on how to resolve the tension between associational and egalitarian imperatives.)

[4] Sen (supra) at 151 ('[S]ometimes a classification that is hard to justify may nevertheless be made important by social arrangements. That is what competitive examinations do (the 300th candidate is still something, the 301st is nothing). In other words, the social world constitutes differences by the mere fact of designating them.') corporations, non-governmental organizations, professional regulatory bodies, charities, guilds, churches, synagogues, mosques, temples, schools, parent-teacher committees, school governing bodies, co-op boards, landless people's movements, internet forums, foundations, trusts — is possible without some form of discrimination.[1]

The critical question — as the Fourie Court notes — is whether such discrimination rises to the level of an unjustifiable impairment of the dignity of some of our fellow South Africans.[2] Again, this question turns on access to the kinds of goods that enable us to lead lives that allow us to flourish. It is easy to conclude that golf clubs that have been the bastion of white male Christian privilege must open their doors to persons of all colours, all sexes and all religions. But what of the large stores of social (and hard) capital that have been invested in such institutions, and what of that capital which continues to offer the possibility of significant returns to the original members (and future members)? What of stokvels that provide access to capital to members of a community — but not to outsiders? What of religious secondary schools that discriminate on the basis of an applicant's willingness to accept a prescribed religious curriculum and, at the same time, offer a better education than that generally available in our public schools? It would be foolish to dismantle such institutions solely on the grounds that either some form of exclusion takes place or that some re-inscription of privilege occurs. Almost all meaningful human labour occurs within the context of self-perpetuating social networks of various kinds. Taking a sledgehammer to social institutions that create and maintain large stores of real and figurative capital is a recipe for a very impoverished polity. The hard question thus turns on the extent to which religious, cultural and linguistic communities can engage in justifiable forms of discrimination in the furtherance of constitutionally legitimate ends and the extent to which the state and other social actors can make equally legitimate claims on the kinds of goods made available in these communal formations that cannot be accessed elsewhere.

[1] Why defend the parochial, the partial, the provincial? Why defend any community that excludes others by virtue of genealogy, rules, beliefs, traditions or practices? Edmund Burke wrote: '[T]o love the little platoon we belong to is the first principle, (the germ as it were) of public affections. It is the first link in the series by which we proceed towards love of country and to mankind.' E Burke Reflections on the Revolution in France (JCD Clark (ed), 2001) 202. Burke thereby connects the parochial with the universal. K Anthony Appiah comes at the problem from a slightly different direction. K Anthony Appiah defends cosmopolitionism — what he calls universality plus difference — on the grounds that cosmopolitanism is committed to (a) pluralism the notion that there are different values worth living by and (b) fallibilism the notion that our knowledge and our values are imperfect, provisional, subject to revision in the face of new evidence. Appiah (supra) at 144. So, for Appiah, religious, cultural and linguistic communities retain their value when they provide us with values worth living by, (as they almost all do to one extent or another), and when the members of those communities do not insist that there is one right way for human beings to live and do not then insist on imposing that one right way on others so as to truly set them free. Ibid. The members of religious, cultural and linguistic communities must commit themselves as citizens or a republic, or citizens of the world to some significant degree of value laissez-faire.

[2] See, further, G Pienaar 'The Effect of Equality and Human Dignity on the Right to Religious Freedom' 2003 (66) THRHR 579.

(b) Inclusion, unfair discrimination and mere differentiation

This concern about the inegalitarian arrangements found within various religious, cultural and linguistic communities is not limited to exclusionary practices. Quite often, or often enough, members of religious or cultural communities will complain that their own community's 'traditional practices', when married to a constitutionally-recognized claim of group autonomy, perpetuate systemic discrimination and structural disadvantage.[1]

Take, for example, the experience of women within the federally and legally autonomous Pueblo tribe in the United States. Under Pueblo law,

> Pueblo women — but not Pueblo men — are denied membership if they intermarry; only women [who intermarry] lose residency rights (for themselves and their children), voting rights, and rights to pass their tribal membership on to their children, along with related welfare benefits that are tied to tribal membership.[2]

Julia Martinez and other women within the Santa Clara Pueblo community challenged these tribal laws as violations of both the federal equal protection clause and the Indian Civil Rights Act. The latter reads as follows: 'No Indian tribe in exercising powers of self government shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.'[3] What is remarkable about the US Supreme Court's judgment in Santa Clara Pueblo v Martinez is that although the Court refused to grant tribal authorities absolute sovereignty over affairs within their jurisdiction, the Martinez Court was still willing to grant them sufficient autonomy to deny half of their members the equal protection of the law.[4]

The South African Constitutional Court has had somewhat greater 'success' in mediating conflicts that pit the interests of the individual against the interests of the religious, cultural or linguistic community. In Christian Education South Africa, the Court had to assess the relative virtues of arguments that (a) justified corporal punishment of children in terms of the tenets of a specific religious faith, and that (b) called for bans on such punishment because it turned the children of religious parents into mere instruments for the articulation of a community's beliefs. While the Court skirted the highly charged question of whether a child's dignity was impaired by corporal punishment meted out by religious parents in religious

[1] See S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44; S Woolman & M Bishop 'Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 64.

[2] A Gutmann Identity in Democracy (2003) 45.

[3] Martinez v Santa Clara Pueblo 540 F2d 1039, 1042 (10th Cir 1976).

[4] 436 US 49 (1978). But see Santa Clara Pueblo v Martinez 436 US 49, 83 (1978)(Justice White, in dissent, writes: 'The extension of constitutional rights to citizens is intended to intrude upon the authority of government.') homes, it had no difficulty determining that the dignity of children was impaired by corporal punishment meted out by teachers in private religious schools.[1]

The Constitutional Court has had even greater success in mediating the individual interests and the community interests at stake in a number of recent challenges to rules of customary law. In Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others, the Court found that the customary law rule of male primogeniture — and several statutory provisions that reinforced the rule — impaired the dignity of, and unfairly discriminated against, the deceased's two female children because the rule and the other impugned provisions prevented the children from inheriting part of the deceased's estate.[2] However, it is the manner in which the Bhe Court negotiates two different kinds of claims for equal respect that is most instructive for our current purposes.

The Bhe Court begins with the following bromide. While customary law may provide a comprehensive vision of the good life for many South African communities that warrants some level of constitutional solicitude,[3] the new-found constitutional respect for traditional practices does not immunize them from constitutional review.[4] Everyone — whether traditional leader or Constitutional Court judge — must locate any putatively valid justification of extant customary law in the provisions of the Final Constitution.

The Bhe Court then characterizes the customary law of succession in terms that validate its spirit without necessitating that the Court be beholden to its letter. The customary law of succession is, according to the Bhe Court, a set of rules

[1] Christian Education of South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 51 (CC)('Christian Education') at para 25 ('It might well be that in the envisaged pluralistic society members of large groups can more easily rely on the legislative process than can those belonging to smaller ones, so that the latter might be specially reliant on constitutional protection, particularly if they express their beliefs in a way that the majority regard as unusual, bizarre or even threatening. Nevertheless, the interest protected by section 31 is not a statistical one dependent on a counter-balancing of numbers, but a qualitative one based on respect for diversity.') For criticism of Christian Education, see S Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) at § 36.4*(c)*(iii). See also S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 44.3*(c)*(viii); P Lenta 'Religious Liberty and Cultural Accommodation' (2005) 122 SALJ 352.

[2] Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe').

[3] See, eg, FC s 39(3): The Bill of Rights does not deny the existence of any other rights or freedoms that are recognised or conferred by common law, customary law or legislation, to the extent that they are consistent with the Bill.

[4] See Bhe (supra) at paras 42-46 ('At the level of constitutional validity, the question in this case is not whether a rule or provision of customary law offers similar remedies to the Intestate Succession Act. The issue is whether such rules or provisions are consistent with the Constitution. This status of customary law has been acknowledged and endorsed by this Court.') See also Alexkor Ltd & Another v Richtersveld Community & Others 2004 (5) SA 460 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1301 (CC)(Richtersveld) at para 51 ('While in the past indigenous law was seen through the common law lens, it must now be seen as an integral part of our law. Like all law it depends for its ultimate force and validity on the Constitution. Its validity must now be determined by reference not to common-law, but to the Constitution'); Mabuza v Mbatha 2003 (4) SA 218 (C), 2003 (7) BCLR 743 (C)(Mabuza) at para 32 ('It bears repeating, however, that as with all law, the constitutional validity of rules and principles of customary law depend on their consistency with the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.')

> . . . designed to preserve the cohesion and stability of the extended family unit and ultimately the entire community. . . . The heir did not merely succeed to the assets of the deceased; succession was not primarily concerned with the distribution of the estate of the deceased, but with the preservation and perpetuation of the family unit. Property was collectively owned and the family head, who was the nominal owner of the property, administered it for the benefit of the family unit as a whole. The heir stepped into the shoes of the family head and acquired all the rights and became subject to all the obligations of the family head. He inherited the property of the deceased only in the sense that he assumed control and administration of the property subject to his rights and obligations as head of the family unit. The rules of the customary law of succession were consequently mainly concerned with succession to the position and status of the deceased family head rather than the distribution of his personal assets.[1]

Customary law has not, the Bhe Court ruefully observes, evolved to meet the changing needs of the community. It fails African widows because: '(a) . . . social conditions frequently do not make living with the heir a realistic or even a tolerable proposition; (b) . . . the African woman does not have a right of ownership; and (c) the prerequisite of a good working relationship with the heir for the effectiveness of the widow's right to maintenance', as a general matter, no longer exists.[2] Again the Court takes care to note that the fault for this arrested development lies outside traditional communities. Ruptures within traditional ways of life — caused by apartheid, the hegemony of western culture, and capitalism — have prevented the law's evolution.[3] This aside sets the stage for the delivery of the Bhe Court's coup de grâce: that 'the official rules of customary law of succession are no longer universally observed.'[4] The trend within traditional communities is toward new norms that 'sustain the surviving family unit' rather than those norms that re-inscribe male primogeniture.

By showing that the spirit of succession lies in its commitment to family cohesion, that the traditional family no longer coheres as it once did, and that the 'distorted' rules of customary law are frozen in apartheid-era statute and case law that 'emphasises . . . patriarchal features and minimises its communitarian ones,' the Bhe Court closes the gap between constitutional imperative and customary obligation.[5] Had customary law been permitted to develop in an 'active and dynamic manner,' it would have already reflected the Bhe Court's conclusion that 'the exclusion of women from inheritance on the grounds of gender is a clear violation of . . . [FC s] 9(3).'[6] Had customary law not been allowed to ossify, traditional communities would have noted how male primogeniture entrenched

[1] Bhe (supra) at para 75.

[2] See South African Law Reform Commission *The Harmonisation of the Common Law and the Indigenous Law: Succession in Customary La*w Issue Paper 12, Project 90 (April 1998) 6-9. See also TW Bennett Human Rights and African Customary Law under the South African Constitution (1997) 126-127.

[3] See, eg, Richtersveld Community & Others v Alexkor Ltd & Another 2003 (6) SA 104 (SCA), 2003 (6) BCLR 583 (SCA) at paras 85-105.

[4] Bhe (supra) at para 84.

[5] Ibid at para 89.

[6] Ibid at para 83.

'past patterns of disadvantage among a vulnerable group' and endorsed the Bhe Court's re-working of customary understandings of the competence 'to own and administer property' in a manner that vindicates a woman's right to dignity under FC s 10.[1] In this way, the Bhe Court is able to assert that traditional communities have conceptions of dignity worth protecting without being obliged to endorse a rule that quite clearly offends the dignity interests of many women and female children within those communities.[2]

These inquiries into both the physical coercion and the non-physical coercion of children and adults by the practices of traditional religious and cultural communities are united by considerations of exit.[3] The Constitutional Court has proved itself quite adept at distinguishing circumstances in which neither child nor adult can meaningfully vote with their feet, from those instances in which adults willingly remain members of traditional communities in which their rights and privileges may well be subordinate to the rights and the privileges of other members of the community. The Court's ability to distinguish the objective conditions of second-class citizenship from the subjective decisions of equal citizens has blunted critics of religious and cultural communities who attribute 'false consciousness' to any individual or group of individuals who remain within their community's traditional confines.

(c) Distinctions between religious, linguistic and cultural communities

One cannot speak of religious, linguistic and cultural communities as if they all took the same form and were therefore subject to identical treatment under the Final Constitution. At a gut level, however, one would like to be able to say that there is a sliding scale of judicial solicitude for these communities: a scale that runs from fairly weak protection in so far as linguistic communities are concerned, to medium strength with respect to cultural communities, to very strong protection with regard to religious communities. This intuition is driven primarily by the varying degrees of permeability of linguistic communities, cultural communities and religious communities. Anyone can learn a language and thereby join a community of fellow speakers. Religious communities, on the other hand, can make admission almost impossible. Cultural communities possess an 'I know it,

[1] Bhe (supra) at para 84.

[2] Judge Hlophe employs a similar disabling strategy in Mabuza. Mabuza v Mbatha 2003 (4) SA 218 (C), 2003 (7) BCLR 743 (C). He recognizes the supremacy of the Final Constitution at the same time as he asserts that the protean nature of customary law should enable it to conform, as necessary, to the dictates of the Bill of Rights. His nuanced assessment of the role of ukumekeza reconfigures siSwati marriage conventions in a manner that (a) refuses to allow ukumekeza to be used by the grooms family as a means of control over the bride and (b) consciously places the husband and wife on an equal footing with respect to subsequent determinations of whether a valid marriage under siSwati customary law has taken place. See, further, S Woolman & M Bishop 'Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 64.

[3] See S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44.

when I see it' character, and thus make any talk about ease of entrance (and potential membership) rather elusive: Is it easier to become American or French? Is it easier to become Zulu or Sotho? The text of the Final Constitution and the decisions handed down by the courts tend to confirm this admittedly limp set of intuitions.[1]

There are two primary difficulties with trying to squeeze any further analytical precision out of the text of FC ss 30 and 31. The first difficulty flows from the lack of consensus as to how terms like 'cultural community' or 'religious community' or 'linguistic community' are to be used. The second, related, difficulty stems from the fact that many of the specific social formations or entities that fall within the protective ambit of FC ss 30 and 31 can often be described in all three terms — religion, language, culture. This descriptive over-determination could complicate our analysis of the constitutional claim being made. Is a Jewish independent school promoting a religion, a culture, a people, a nation, or just the language of Hebrew? Is a single-medium Afrikaans public school promoting a culture, a people, a nation, a language, or a religion?

With respect to the first difficulty, Amy Gutmann notes

> When the term culture is loosely used, cultural identity subsumes the entire universe of identity groups, and every social marker around which people identify with one another is called cultural. Culture, so considered, is the universal glue that unites people into identity groups, and the category becomes so broad as to be rather useless for understanding differences.[2]

Other theorists take a tougher line. For Raz and Margalit, the only legitimate candidates for treatment as cultural communities are those communities which provide an 'all-encompassing' or a 'comprehensive' way of being in the world.[3] In

[1] As I argue below, FC s 15, when read with FC s 31, would appear to afford religious practices, and thus religious communities, greater protection than linguistic practices and cultural practices, and thus linguistic communities and cultural communities. FC s 15 protects religious belief, and per force religious practice, since the protection of belief alone is utterly empty (until such a time as mind control is literally possible.) FC s 15 protects religious practices, and thus the religious communities that engage in them, without subjecting them, as occurs in FC s 30 and FC s 31, to an internal limitation that requires the latter set of practices to be consistent with the rest of the substantive provisions found in Chapter 2. In Fourie, for example, the Constitutional Court goes out of its way to note that no religious order and no religious official will, as a result of the Court's finding that the state must treat the marriage of same-sex life partners in the same manner as it treats opposite-sex life partners, be required to consecrate same-sex life partnerships as marriages under religious law. See Fourie (supra) at paras 90-98. The Constitutional Court has, however, shown demonstrably less hesitancy in altering customary law arrangements enforced by traditional leaders, common law and statute. See, eg, Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe')(Court declares customary law rule of male primogeniture invalid.)

[2] A Gutmann Identity in Democracy (2003) 38. See also IM Young Justice and the Politics of Difference (1990) 22-23, 152-155.

[3] J Raz & A Margalit 'National Self-determination' in J Raz (ed) Ethics in the Public Domain: Essays in the Morality of Law and Politics (1994) 119. See also S Benhabib The Claims of Culture: Equality and Diversity in the Global Era (2002); A Shachar Multicultural Jurisdictions: Cultural Differences and Womens Rights (2001); S Macedo (ed) Deliberative Politics: Essays on Democracy and Disagreement (1999); A Gutmann & D Thompson Democracy and Disagreement (1996); W Kymlicka Multicultural Citizenship: A Liberal Theory of Minority Rights (1995).

addition, they write, such communities provide both an 'anchor for self-determination and the safety of effortless, secure belonging.'[1] Belonging, in turn, is a function of membership:

> Although accomplishments play their role in people's sense of their own identity, it would seem that at the most fundamental level our sense of our own identity depends upon criteria of belonging rather than on those of accomplishment. Secure identification at that level is particularly important to one's well-being.[2]

What Raz and Margalit fail to make fully explicit is the connection between a community that provides a comprehensive way of being in the world and a community that provides a secure sense of belonging. A community that provides a comprehensive way of being in the world generally provides a host of rules that govern most aspects of daily life. The benefits of belonging — of membership — flow to those who follow the rules. Follow the rules and one belongs. Flout the rules and one can find oneself on the outside of the community looking in. (Comprehensiveness then is a feature of communities with very strict codes of behaviour and harsh penalties — shunning or ex-communication — for rule non-compliance.)

Although Raz and Margalit's definition of 'cultural community' — properly understood — certainly provides greater traction than looser definitions, it would seem to exclude too many social formations that we would intuitively describe as cultural communities. Amish Americans constitute a community that fits the rule-following, comprehensive vision of the good life model that Raz and Margalit's definition is meant to capture. The strict dictates of the Amish's version of Christianity married to a pastoral existence that eschews almost all forms of modern technology sets the Amish apart. Moreover, continued membership in the community is contingent upon adherence to religious dictates and other non-religious norms. Such communities would, if they could, withdraw entirely from the larger polity within which their community exists. As it stands, they simply draw invisible lines between us and them.

But the Amish community in America, or the Ultra-Orthodox Jewish community in Johannesburg, do not fit commonplace understandings of cultural communities. For example, I would, at one point in my life, have certainly identified myself as part of the Jewish community of the greater New York metropolitan area. But there were no rules to follow — and I followed none. So while I certainly felt a sense of belonging, no penalties could be exacted for non-compliance and my 'membership' could never be threatened.

Thus, Raz and Margalit's definition of 'cultural community' confirms our first difficulty: developing precise definitions for the entities protected by FC ss 30 and 31. But they also tell us something important about our second difficulty — that of descriptive over-determination. ('Descriptive over-determination' means the ability to describe the same community in terms of two or more of the following characteristics: religion, culture and/or language.) It would seem that descriptive over-determination — though a fact about many communities — is not a constitutional problem. What matters, for the purposes of constitutional analysis under FC ss 30 and 31, is membership and rule-following.[1] And that holds for linguistic communities, cultural communities and religious communities alike.

[1] Raz & Margalit (supra) at 118.
[2] Ibid at 117.

In sum, our attention is drawn to FC ss 30 and 31 when we are confronted by questions of membership in the community and the willingness (or the refusal) of individuals both within and without the community to follow those rules that both define membership in the community and determine the ability to participate fully in community life. Issues of membership and rule-following come up much more frequently in religious communities than in cultural communities or linguistic communities because many religious communities offer quite comprehensive visions of the good life. Most religions are defined by reams of ecclesiastical doctrine: a refusal to follow established doctrine can lead to excommunication. Languages, on the other hand, are defined by their grammar and their syntax. People are rarely excommunicated from communities for bad grammar (though they may be shunned in Paris). And so, my initial intuitions about a sliding scale of judicial solicitude are borne out by the comprehensiveness of the tenets and practices of religious communities, and the necessary, but hardly comprehensive, role that language plays in linguistic communities.

What then are we to do in cases of descriptive over-determination — where religion, language and culture all serve to define a particular community and the institutions upon which members have built the community? Since community-appropriate rule-following behaviour determines continued membership within the community, the conflict that confronts the court will often be whether a person's behaviour (or state action) conforms to the community's accepted canon of rules. The primary kind of community practice — religious, linguistic, cultural — at issue will reveal itself in the very terms of the dispute: Is a cherem — an act of excommunication – about a refusal of a member of the Orthodox Jewish community to follow an edict of the community's ecclesiastical authority, the Beth Din? Is the rejection of an admission application to a single-medium Afrikaans public school about the applicant's refusal to accept instruction in Afrikaans? Is the refusal by a traditional leader to consecrate a marriage based upon a couple's rejection of the ritual of lobolo? Thus, while members of the Orthodox Jewish religious community may well speak Hebrew, the conflict at issue is clearly over religious doctrine (and not language). When it comes to lobolo, the constitutionality of this cultural community's custom is at issue (not language or religion.[1]) When it comes to making Afrikaans the language of public school instruction, the issue is linguistic — less cultural, certainly not religious — and turns on whether the state has the resources necessary to maintain a single-medium public school and whether non-Afrikaans speaking individuals have educational opportunities at other institutions.[2]

[1] For an extended analysis of the relationship between membership and rule-following, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 44.1*(c)*.

58.2 Historical Background: Negotiating Community Rights

The Final Constitution, as a liberal political document, certainly carves out the space within which self-supporting cultural, linguistic and religious formations may flourish. Some commentators take solace in the fact that the Final Constitution contains six different provisions concerned with culture, eight with language and four with religion.[3] However, as we shall see, the drafting histories of IC ss 31 and 184 and FC ss 30, 31 and 185 give the lie to the claim that the basic law sets great store in the vindication of specific group claims based upon language, culture and religion.[4]

[1] Distinctions between religious and cultural practices are not always so easy to make in our context. A person may practice Christianity and still view the animist practise of honouring her ancestors as a form of religious conviction rather than a traditional ritual. Religion and culture constitute a potent mix in many South African communities and are often impossible to disaggregate in the minds of community members.

[2] That members of the Afrikaans-speaking community may view the issue through the prism of culture and nationality does not for constitutional purposes make it so. Of course, members of the Afrikaans-speaking community are largely free to create private institutions intended to preserve not only Afrikaans, but very particular views of Afrikaner culture and religion. See Ex parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: in re Dispute Concerning the Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill. 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC)(Interim Constitution and now the Final Constitution provide the requisite space for linguistic communities and cultural communities to create and to sustain institutions private schools that serve the sectarian interests of those communities); Western Cape Minister of Education v The Governing Body of Mikro Primary School 2006 (1) SA 1 (SCA), 2005 (10) BCLR 973 (SCA)(Mikro)(Single medium public schools that might emphasize Afrikaans culture and history in addition to language have right to exist to exist so long as other learners have meaningful access to public schools that offer instruction in another medium.) See also S Woolman 'Defending Discrimination: On the Constitutionality of Independent Schools that Promote a Particular, if not Comprehensive, Vision of the Good Life' (2007) 22 Stellenbosch Law Review 31.

[3] See also F Venter The Protection of Cultural, Linguistic and Religious Rights: The Framework provided by the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996, Konrad Adenauer Stiftung Seminar on Multiculturalism (1999) 19, available at http://www.kas.org.za/publications/seminarreports/multiculturalism/VENTER.pdf (accessed on 1 April 2004). Provisions of the Final Constitution dealing with culture, language and religion include, but are not limited to: (a) ss 9, 30, 31, 235 (culture); ss 6, 29, 30, 31, 235 (language); and (c) ss 9, 15, 30, 31 (religion). These various provisions were driven by three constitutional principles enshrined in the Interim Constitution. Adherence to these principles as part of the negotiated settlement was the price of peace. Two of the principles required recognition of minority rights and another required the inclusion in the Final Constitution of a provision ensuring a right of self-determination for any community sharing a common cultural and linguistic heritage.

[4] The one notable exception with respect to constitutionally mandated group claims would be land. The Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal have recognised the legitimacy of such claims against both the state and other private parties. Alexkor Ltd & Another v Richtersveld Community & Others 2004 (5) SA 460 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1301 (CC); Abrams v Allie 2004 (4) SA 534 (SCA). However, these claims are grounded largely in dispossession of title based upon racially discriminatory classifications.

(a) The Interim Constitution

The problem of accommodating and protecting, ethnic, religious and linguistic communities in a democratic state dominated the political debates and the lengthy constitutional negotiations that preceded the enactment of the Interim Constitution. Between 1986 and 1991, the South African Law Commission investigated various mechanisms for the protection of group rights.[1] To this end, it solicited submissions from white right-wing intellectuals on the right of minorities to seek recognition as distinct societies and to resist assimilation into a common national culture.[2] Conservative Party, Afrikaner Volkswag and Boere-Vryheidsbeweging testimony before the Commission reflected deep dissatisfaction with mere 'minority group protection'. These parties favoured 'national group protection'. National group protection meant self-determination 'in its widest form'. This widest of forms was understood by most Afrikaner nationalists to mean a right to secession.[3]

Notwithstanding the contentiousness of white minority concerns, the language and cultural rights provisions of the Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights secured virtually universal consent from Multi-Party Negotiating Forum participants.[4] IC s 31 attracted near universal assent because, though it echoed art 27 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, it avoided art 27's protection of discrete sets of rights-holders. Both the ANC and the National Party eschewed more substantial minority rights protection. However, each party found collective rights for linguistic, religious and cultural minorities politically unpalatable for different reasons.

As noted above, the National Party government had asked the South African Law Commission to investigate mechanisms for the recognition and protection of 'group rights'.[5] The Commission accepted the existence of what it termed 'numerous groups or communities' and 'strong inter-group conflict and rivalry' in South African society.[6] Nevertheless, such internecine conflict did not constitute a legitimate ground for recognizing the existence of 'statutorily definable groups with statutorily definable 'rights'.[7] According to the Commission, South

[1] South Africa Law Commission Group and Human Rights, Working Paper 25, Project 58 (1989).
[2] South Africa Law Commission Group and Human Rights, Interim Report (1991).
[3] Ibid at 39-80.
[4] LM Du Plessis 'A Background to Drafting the Chapter on Fundamental Rights' in B de Villiers (ed) Birth of a Constitution (1994) 89, 93. By contrast, the economic activity, fair labour practices and property rights provisions of the Chapter were the subject of vociferous debate. See H Corder 'Towards a South African Constitution' (1994) 57 Modern Law Review 491, 513.
[5] South African Law Commission Group and Human Rights, Working Paper 25, Project 58 (1989) 1.
[6] South African Law Commission Group and Human Rights, Interim Report (1991). The Conservative Party, Afrikaner Volkswag and Boere-Vryheidsbeweging testimony before the Commission expressed its dissatisfaction with mere minority group protection. Instead, these parties favoured national group protection, which they understood as a right to Afrikaner self-determination in its widest form, including the right to secession. Ibid at 39-80.
[7] Ibid at 35.

Africa would be better served if the 'needs of individuals who are members of different linguistic, cultural and religious groups' were adequately protected by 'individual rights in a bill of rights'.[1]

The Commission's suspicion of community rights — and the concomitant 'special status' they accord to groups — was not surprising considering the National Party's and the Commission's determination to create a 'colour-blind' constitutional order.[2] The Commission — and the National Party — recognized that community rights or group rights would, inevitably, be tainted by their conceptual correspondence to apartheid 'group' discourse. 'Community', 'minority' or 'group' had worked as code for apartheid's racially defined and racially discriminatory politics.[3] The Commission therefore recommended that a future Bill of Rights contain individual rights to practise a culture or religion, to use a language and to be protected from religious, cultural or linguistic discrimination.

However, community rights were not entirely anathema to the Commission or the National Party. The Commission concluded that minority populations could find protection in the form of such constitutional arrangements as federalism or minority representation in an upper house of Parliament or the Cabinet.[4] These conclusions were largely shared by the National Party. The National Party believed that white minority interests would be better protected at the level of distribution of governmental power, rather than by judicial mechanisms.[5] The National Party — like the Commission — proposed only non-discrimination guarantees and individual rights to speak a language or to participate in 'cultural life'.[6]

The ANC was similarly ill-disposed towards community, minority, collective or group rights. And for good reason. Before the velvet revolution of 1994, most [1] Interim Report (supra) at 679-680.

[2] Ibid at 647 ('What is certain is that the vast majority of this country's total population is opposed to further discrimination or exclusion or favouring on the ground of race or colour. We are striving for a system of equality before the law, and therefore justice, for all.')

[3] After reviewing international legal mechanisms for the protection of minorities, the Commission deliberately steers away from a solution grounded in the recognition of group rights. It cites the perception that community or minority protection is undemocratic or anti-democratic, and that it is advocated merely to perpetuate white domination under another name. Ibid at 112. According to the Commission, community and minority protection which is aimed at furthering domination by minority groups or granting them undue preference would not be accepted by the majority and would ultimately be rejected. However, if a minority perceives itself to be dominated and its needs are treated with contempt, it will strive constantly to rid itself of the regime. Ibid at 113. The sensible solution, the Commission concludes, would therefore be to steer a course between these two dangers. Ibid. The Commission's solution can be found in FC s 9's protection from unfair discrimination, FC s 29's right to mother tongue education, and FC s 31's right to be a member of the religious, cultural or linguistic community of one's choice.

[4] These mechanisms were the subject of a separate investigation by the Commission. See South African Law Commission Project 77: Constitutional Models (1991).

[5] P Olivier 'Constitutionalism and the New South African Constitution' in Bertus de Villiers (ed) Birth of a New Constitution (1994) 50, 73-74.

[6] See Government of the Republic of South Africa Proposals on a Charter of Fundamental Rights (2 February 1993) Articles 6 and 34.

political claims based on culture, language, ethnicity and religion were greeted with suspicion, and, sometimes, outright hostility.[1] From the passive resistance of Gandhi, through worker movements of the early 20th century, to the Freedom Charter, the preferred language of liberation was that of human rights. The liberation movement's utilization of rights discourse reflected a considered rhetorical response to romantic assertions of white, Christian, English and Afrikaner supremacy.

The liberation movement's universalist turn provides a partial explanation for the failure of group-based rights to secure a foothold within the Interim Constitution.[2] Much of the white minority political posturing in the 1980s and the early 1990s over alternatives to apartheid focused on the need for a 'broad-based, multi-racial government to contain possibly explosive ethnic or cultural demands'.[3] While representatives of the white minority may have forsaken justiciable 'group' rights, they continued to insist on various forms of constitutional protection of existing privilege in exchange for relinquishing political power.[4] The ANC rejected every attempt to entrench what it termed 'racial group rights'.[5] Political power would have to be traded for peace. That peace, and the retention of economic privilege by the white minority, would be vouchsafed by a firm ANC commitment to a justiciable Bill of Rights.[6] And the most the ANC would concede in such a Bill were rights to form 'cultural bodies', to religious freedom,[7]

[1] A Sachs Opening Remarks Konrad Adenauer Stiftung Seminar on Multiculturalism (1999) 9 available at http://www.kas.org.za/Publications/SeminarReports/Multiculturalism/SACHS1.pdf, (accessed on 1 April 2004); H Giliomee The Majority, Minorities and Ex-Nationalities in South Africa and the Proposed Cultural Commission Konrad Adenauer Stiftung Seminar on Multiculturalism (1999) 37, available at http://www.kas.org.za/Publications/SeminarReports/Multiculturalism/GILIOMEE.pdf, (accessed on 6 January 2005).

[2] Human rights discourse demands democratic majority rule. Majority rule as manifest in free and fair elections is the generally accepted departure point for most transitions from authoritarian rule to a more just political order. In South Africa, democratic majority rule meant black majority rule. Neither the rhetoric of universal human rights nor the actual demographics of South Africa supported the Swiss-like cantonal arrangements that the more sophisticated apologists for the white right offered up.

[3] See J de Waal, I Currie & G Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (4th Edition, 2001) 470. See also Giliomee (supra) at 37.

[4] De Waal et al (supra) at 470.

[5] See I Currie 'Minority Rights' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) Chapter 35.

[6] See Giliomee (supra) at 40. The ANC insisted that minority rights qua static, non-demographically representative levels of political representation were unacceptable. The ANC proposed a compromise between two political positions: the demand for unfettered majority rule on the one hand, and the insistence of some whites for structural guarantees that majority rule will not mean domination by blacks on the other. The Bill of Rights is, in large part, the content of that compromise. See, eg, A Sachs Protecting Human Rights in a New South Africa (1990) 150 ('There just cannot be co-existence between racial group rights and non-racial democracy. It would be like saying that just a little bit of slavery would be allowed, not too much, or that the former colonial power would exercise just a small amount of sovereignty, not a lot. While the phased replacement of race rule by non-racial democracy can be contemplated, the constitutional co-existence of the two is philosophically, legally and practically impossible.')

[7] African National Congress A Bill of Rights for a New South Africa: Preliminary Revised Version (1992) Articles 5(3)-(5)('ANC Bill of Rights')

and, perhaps, to require that the state act positively to further the development of the eleven South African languages to be treated as official languages.[1]

Political parties that could have been expected to press hard for the inclusion of community rights in the Bill of Rights chose instead to focus on other constitutional strategies. The Inkatha Freedom Party (IFP), which during the negotiations had beaten the drum of ethnic nationalism, sought to shore up minority interests through federal mechanisms. The goal of the white right-wing parties was nothing less than self-determination in a wholly separate constitutional entity.

The result of these different strategies was that the Interim Constitution possessed little by way of specific community rights. Individual members of religious, linguistic and cultural communities were protected by rights to equality, to religious freedom, to association and to the establishment of private schools designed to maintain the integrity of a given community. Only in the provisions for the recognition of official languages did the Interim Constitution go beyond the bare minimum: it required positive action by the state to ensure the maintenance and the development of minority languages.[2]

(b) The Final Constitution

Despite the relative ease of agreement over justiciable community rights in the Interim Constitution, the three Constitutional Principles ('CPs') that engaged community rights meant that the previous accord could be revisited and recast. The National Party entered the Constitutional Assembly ('CA') drafting process with the express aim of deepening community rights.[3] The Freedom Front, though still wedded to CP XXXIV and the ideal of a Volkstaat, also sought 'a way to ensure that there is no oppression over the minority.'[4] The other ethnically-based political party — the IFP — chose to further the ends of the 'Zulu' kingdom through constitutional mechanisms that would increase the devolution of power to the provincial level of government.[5] The ANC, habitually suspicious of claims to minority rights, was set to resist any attempt to constitutionalize measures which might be used to favour particular ethnic groups.

The Final Constitution's Bill of Rights contains three provisions with a direct bearing on community interests — FC ss 29, 30 and 31. Only FC s 30 had a smooth passage through the drafting process. The right made an early appearance in the 19 October 1995 draft. The committee with responsibility for the Bill of Rights reported that 'there is consensus among the parties as to the inclusion of this right in the final Bill of Rights.' Apart from occasional stylistic amendments,

[1] ANC Bill of Rights (supra) at arts 5(6)-(7).

[2] See I Currie 'Official Languages' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & Michael Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 65.

[3] 'Minority Rights Must be Protected NP' (1995) 1 Constitutional Talk (13-26 January 1995).

[4] 'Volkstaat High on FFs Agenda' (1995) 1 Constitutional Talk (13-26 January 1995).

[5] 'IFP Seeks Strong Provincial Government' (1995) 1 Constitutional Talk (13-26 January 1995). The IFP was later to boycott the Constitutional Assembly in protest over the refusal of the ANC and the NP to enter international mediation over constitutional recognition of the Zulu monarchy. It played no significant role in the drafting of the Final Constitution.

the right remained unchanged in all succeeding drafts. As was the case with its predecessor — IC s 31 — the individualistic phrasing of FC s 30 and its careful avoidance of any mention of 'minority' or 'community' ensured that its inclusion occasioned no controversy.

FC s 31 contains what FC s 30 so delicately avoids. It provides a set of non-discrimination and non-interference guarantees and secures these rights for 'persons belonging to a cultural, religious or linguistic community'. FC s 31 does not appear in any of the five working drafts of the Final Constitution, nor, it must be noted, in the Constitution Bill of 23 April 1996 — less than two weeks before the new text had to be adopted. FC s 31 appears for the first time in the second Constitution Bill of 6 May 1996 — the result of intense, last-minute bargaining.[1] The eleventh-hour inclusion of FC s 31 appears to have been the result of an ANC desire to placate the Freedom Front.[2] The inclusion of FC s 31 may also have been motivated by fears that FC s 30 and the Bill of Right's non-discrimination guarantees alone might be insufficient to comply with the requirements of CP XII.[3]

The earliest draft of the education clause — FC s 29 — reveals little that would lead one to anticipate the controversy that it was to evoke in the last weeks of the drafting process. Early iterations of FC s 29 guarantee a right to instruction in any language in state institutions where such instruction could be reasonably provided and a right to establish private schools — subject to duties related to non-discrimination and to the maintenance of educational standards.[4] In the working

[1] 'The Night the Constitution was Settled' (1996) 3 Constitutional Talk (22 April-18 May 1996).

[2] 'NP, ANC Strive for a Package Deal' Weekly Mail and Guardian (19 April 1996).

[3] Without FC s 31, the draft text would probably not have complied with CP XII (collective rights of self-determination to be recognised and protected in a Final Constitution). According to the Constitutional Court, the Principle required certain collective rights of self-determination to be recognised and protected in the [new Constitution]. Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: in re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 220. FC s 31 achieved these objectives by providing protection for cultural, religious and language communities. The First Certification Judgment made no mention of FC s 30. This structured silence suggests that the individualistic framing of the right prevented it from providing the collective protection required by CP XII. The KwaZulu/Natal government raised a more substantial argument that the amended draft failed to comply with CP XII in Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Second Certification Judgment'). The Second Certification Judgment Court once again relied upon the presence of FC s 31 to secure compliance with the CP XII Principle:

> The requirements of CP XII are therefore met by the provisions of . . . [AT s] 31, the institutional structures provided by the . . . [Constitution] and the express protection of rights of association in . . . ch 2 together with the procedural provisions governing their enforcement.

Ibid at para 27.

[4] Clause 23 of the draft Bill of Rights of 9 October 1995 read: (1) Everyone has the right to - (a) a basic education, including adult basic education, in a state or state-aided institution; (b) further education, which the state must take reasonable and progressive measures to make generally available and accessible; and (c) choose instruction in any language where instruction in that language can be reasonably provided at state or state-aided institutions. (2) Everyone has the right to establish and maintain, at their own expense, private educational institutions that - (a) do not discriminate on the basis of race; (b) are registered with the state; and (c) maintain standards that are not inferior to standards at comparable state-aided educational institutions.

draft of 19 October 1995, however, an additional right was proposed by the National Party (NP). The NP contended that FC s 29 must embrace a right 'to educational institutions based on a common culture, language, or religion, provided that there shall be no discrimination on the ground of race and, provided further that the state shall not, in granting aid to educational institutions, discriminate against any educational institution on the ground that it has been established on the basis of a common language, culture, or religion'. According to the NP, this right would ensure the continued existence of state-funded schools with a distinctive linguistic, cultural or religious character (or all three). The ANC viewed this formulation as a neo-Verwoerdian attempt to entrench educational apartheid. It responded by stating that state-aided Afrikaans-only schools were well beyond the political pale.[1]

The NP proposal remained a flashpoint throughout the remainder of the drafting process. By the fifth Working Draft of 15 April 1996, an 'agreement' had been reached by the parties to 'seek ways of accommodating the sentiments embodied' in the NP proposal elsewhere in FC s 29 without adopting the NP's preferred formulation of the right. As a result, the first Constitution Bill of 23 April 1996 contained no mention of the NP clause. In the second Constitution Bill of 6 May 1996, the right to state-funded education in any language was changed to a right to state-funded education in any official language. The text bore no sign of the NP's commitment to single-medium public schools. Single-medium public schools — together with the lockout right and the property clause — was one of the three Bill of Rights issues on which the NP dug in its heels. The ANC likewise refused further compromise: 'to compromise would be a betrayal of victims of apartheid.'[2]

The NP — confronted with the spectre of a public referendum to approve the constitutional draft in the event of the requisite majority not being obtained in the Constitutional Assembly — was obliged to capitulate. However, true to the spirit of reconciliation that had made both the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution possible, FC s 29 contains a diluted version of the original NP proposal. The right to state-sponsored education in an official language, where reasonably practicable, is reinforced by the requirement that the state must consider 'all reasonable educational alternatives' in seeking to implement the right. These alternatives allow for the possibility of 'single-medium' public schools where such institutions are equitable, practicable and in accordance with the need to redress past discrimination.[3]

58.3 Community Rights in International Law

The Final Constitution has been carefully crafted to avoid, in most instances, the language of minority rights. Two primary reasons exist for this textual choice.

[1] 'Trio of Trouble' Weekly Mail and Guardian (1 May 1996).
[2] 'High Drama in Constitutional Danger Zone' Weekly Mail & Guardian (1 May 1996).
[3] For more on the history and the meaning of FC s 29(3), see B Fleisch & S Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of Single-Medium Public Schools' (2007) 23 South African Journal on Human Rights (forthcoming).

First, minority — in the context of the negotiations over the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution — meant 'white'. The ANC, as we have seen, was steadfastly opposed to rights that would entrench expressly any form of 'white' privilege. Second, the ANC's use of individual rights reflects a considered response to the use of terms like 'group' or 'people' that worked as code for any number of discriminatory policies under apartheid.

That said, at international law, the term 'minority', and not 'community', describes the social units that can claim entitlement to rights to religious freedom and linguistic and cultural autonomy. Indeed, protecting the rights of ethnic, religious and linguistic minorities has become one of the most pressing concerns of international law over the past decade. Yugoslavia, Rwanda, Chechnya, Sri Lanka, Congo, Lebanon, Iraq, Israel, Somalia and Sudan each summon up the spectre of ethnic nationalism and intractable civil war that haunt the contemporary political order. Each reminds us that struggles for self-determination can often lead to the collapse of the nation state.[1] Where, as in the Middle East, attempts have been made by a dominant population to suppress minority aspirations, the resultant violence has led to the displacement of thousands of people and massive human rights violations.[2] We tend to think of religion and ethnicity as the primary drivers of internecine strife — but it can also be fuelled by linguistic nationalism. Although the threat has now largely abated, a perception of discrimination against the French-speaking people of Quebec sparked a 'legal' secessionist movement in the century-old Canadian federation. International law attempts to shield minorities from abuses of state power in the hope that the struggles of minorities against persecution, marginalization or assimilation will not degenerate into a baleful cycle of violent resistance and new forms of oppression.

(a) Minority rights and community rights

Despite the existence of a vast body of literature on the subject, and the efforts of two subsidiary organs of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights,[3] no

[1] A list of countries home to the most visible current ethnic conflagrations would encompass the former Soviet Union, India, Sri Lanka, Northern Ireland, the former Yugoslavia, Sudan, Congo, Somalia, Myanmar, Indonesia, Iraq, Cyprus, Nigeria, Lebanon, Israel, Guyana, Trinidad, Liberia, Uganda, Rwanda and Burundi. See N Lerner 'The Evolution of Minority Rights in International Law' in C Brölman (ed) Peoples and Minorities in International Law (1993) 77, 78n.

[2] A Anghie 'Human Rights and Cultural Identity: New Hope for Ethnic Peace?' (1992) 33 Harvard International Law Journal 341. Researchers in 1990 identified 261 groups of non-sovereign peoples regarded as being at risk of future human rights violations because of their differential status and aspirations. See TR Gurr & JR Scarritt 'Minorities Rights at Risk: a Global Survey' (1989) 11 Human Rights Quarterly 375, 392-3. Unfortunately, the following decade made Gurr and Scaritt look extraordinarily prescient.

[3] The protection of the rights of minorities has been the subject of the work of the United Nations Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities. See P Thornberry International Law and the Rights of Minorities (1991) 124-132. The Working Group on Indigenous Populations, a subsidiary organ of the Sub-Commission, expanded the field of study to consider the particular needs of indigenous peoples. See H Hannum 'New Developments in Indigenous Rights' (1988) 28 Virginia Journal of International Law 649, 657-662.

settled definition of 'minority' or 'community' exists at international law.[1] Of all the definitions bandied about, that proposed by Francesco Capotorti, the Special Rapporteur of the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities, has proved the most influential. According to Capotorti, a minority is:

> [a] group numerically inferior to the rest of the population of a state, in a non-dominant position, whose members — being nationals of the state — possess ethnic, religious or linguistic characteristics differing from those of the rest of the population and show, if only implicitly, a sense of solidarity, directed towards preserving their culture, traditions, religion or language.[2]

[1] See MN Shaw 'The Definition of Minorities in International Law' in Y Dinstein & M Tabory (eds) The Protection of Minorities and Human Rights (1992) 1; P Thornberry International Law and the Rights of Minorities (1991) 164-172. As I have already noted, FC s 31 studiously avoids the term minority employed in ICCPR article 27 and instead uses the term community. The choice of terminology is primarily political. Community rights simply do not carry the baggage of minority rights in South African political discourse. In my view, the meaning of minority rights at international law services this chapters understanding of community rights under the Final Constitution. The substitution might also be thought a clever trope designed to finesse controversies over the definition of a minority that have bedevilled the analysis of ICCPR article 27. However, defining a community proves no less difficult. Employed at its highest level of most general, community can mean simply an aggregation of people (similar to state or society). However, in contemporary parlance the word denotes an aggregation of people held together by a particular kind of relationship or bond. See R Williams Keywords: A Vocabulary of Culture and Society (1976) 75-76. See also A Cohen The Symbolic Construction of Community (1985) 15 ('Community is that entity to which one belongs, greater than kinship but more immediately than the abstraction we call society. It is the arena in which people acquire their most fundamental and most substantial experience of social life outside the confines of the home. In it they learn the meaning of kinship through being able to perceive its boundaries that is by juxtaposing it to non-kinship; they learn friendship; they acquire the sentiments of close social association and the capacity to express or otherwise manage these in their social relationships. Community, therefore, is where one learns and continues to practice how to be social. At the risk of substituting one indefinable category for another, we could say it is where one acquires culture.') This common bond, this kinship, this dense latticework of relationships determines our willingness to identify a group of persons, that would otherwise be a mere aggregation of individuals, as a community. For example, one would not tend to describe left-handed people as forming a community, although they undoubtedly share something in common. Nor would one think of the shareholders of a large, listed public company as a community, although, unlike left-handed people, they have something in common that is a matter of their own choosing and not simply an arbitrary characteristic. The employees of that same company, on the other hand, might well constitute a community: they might share a culture and even a language (broadly construed). See R Thornton & M Ramphele The Quest for Community in E Boonzaaier & J Sharp (eds) South African Keywords (1988) 29. What of the speakers of the Afrikaans language? At a minimum, they share an important characteristic: language. But they share more than that. They share a common history, a common culture, and, quite often, a common politics. See J Sharp Introduction: Constructing Social Reality in E Boonzaaier & J Sharp (eds) South African Keywords (1988) 1, 14-5. While Afrikaans speakers may be divided in any number of significant ways, such as race and class, it seems clear that most speakers of the language would feel aggrieved if a legal measure impacted deleteriously on the use of the Afrikaans language even if the measure had little or no effect on them personally.

[2] F Capotorti Study on the Rights of Persons belonging to Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities (1991) UN Sales no E.91.XIV.2, 7. While the Capotorti definition cannot claim to be the settled orthodoxy in the field, a slight reformulation of Capotorti's definition is accepted as authoritative by Sachs J in Ex parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: in re Dispute Concerning the Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill. 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC) at para 61.

Three elements of this definition warrant emphasis. First, the definition requires an objective demonstration: to constitute a minority, a community must exist as a separate and distinct entity within a state. An ascriptive characteristic — such as race, religion or language — will set the group apart from other groups within the state. Second, a subjective element must be established: the minority must manifest a sense of community and a desire to preserve the identity of that community. The definition tends to exclude groups inclined toward assimilation within the rest of the population.[1] The third element is of particular moment in South Africa: the community that seeks recognition should be in a position of non-dominance. Political, economic and social non-dominance — and the discrimination that often attends non-dominance and insularity — makes necessary the guarantee of community rights. Put slightly differently, a minority community often lacks the ability to participate politically in a manner that enables it to retain a coherent identity and to secure defensible boundaries.[2] Community rights carve out space beyond the hurly burly of majoritarian political institutions in a manner that permits the furtherance of community-specific ways of being in the world.

(b) Structure of international community rights

The work of the UN Sub-Commission on Minorities suggests that the effective protection of minorities requires two kinds of legal guarantee: measures aimed at securing equal treatment for minorities and measures aimed at the protection of minority identity. Both categories require the disaggregation of minority communities from the polity as a whole.

The goal of equality of treatment is furthered by measures that protect individual members of minority groups against discrimination. However, the absence of discrimination will do little more than create the conditions for formal equality. Special treatment of minorities — restitutionary measures or affirmative action — may be required to create conditions of substantive equality.[3]

However, for most minority communities, the goal is not so much equal participation in the affairs of the larger community, but self-governance — in a non-political sense — with respect to the manner in which the community is organized. As a result, the communities for whom minority rights really matter are

[1] The rights of such groups, termed involuntary minorities, need be protected only by a guarantee of non-discrimination. See Thornberry (supra) at 10.

[2] The inclusion of the non-dominance requirement in the Capotorti definition was intended to distinguish those minorities requiring the protection of international human rights guarantees from the situation of the white minority in apartheid South Africa. See P Thornberry International Law and the Rights of Minorities (1991) 8-9, J Dugard 'The Influence of Apartheid on the Development of UN Law Governing the Protection of Minorities' (1989, manuscript on file with author).

[3] See Minority Schools in Albania 1935 PCIJ (ser A/B) No 64, 20 ('To apply the same legal regime to a majority as to a minority, whose needs are quite different, would create only a formal equality. Rather, measures for the protection of minorities are designed to ensure a genuine and effective equality.') See also C Albertyn and B Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 35 (Describes the nature of FC s 9(2), the restitutionary justice clause in FC s 9's right to equality.)

often not interested in mere assimilation into the dominant national culture.[1] International law recognizes the legitimacy of the desire of many minority communities to preserve their traditions and to resist the loss of their identity.[2]

This commitment to both 'equality of recognition' and 'equality of respect' means that international law offers two different sets of community rights. First, universal non-discrimination provisions attempt to ensure equality of treatment for all individuals. These guarantees ensure the protection of individual members of minority communities. Second, 'special' guarantees are designed to ensure the continued existence of minority communities. The UN Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities explains the difference between the two kinds of guarantee as follows:

> 1. Prevention of discrimination is the prevention of any action which denies to individuals or groups of people equality of treatment which they may wish.
> 2. Protection of minorities is the protection of non-dominant groups which, while wishing in general for equality of treatment with the majority, wish for a measure of differential treatment in order to preserve basic characteristics which they possess and which distinguish them from the majority of the population... If a minority wishes for assimilation and is debarred, the question is one of discrimination.[3]

(i) International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights

The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights ('ICCPR') is the primary instrument for the protection of the rights of persons belonging to minority communities. Indeed, ICCPR art 27 remains the only expression of a universal entitlement to community identity in modern human rights conventions.[4] It reads, in relevant part:

> In those states in which ethnic, religious or linguistic minorities exist, persons belonging to such minorities shall not be denied the right, in community with the other members of their group, to enjoy their own culture, to profess and practice their own religion, or to use their own language.

When combined with the ICCPR's non-discrimination provision, art 27 ought to enable minorities to preserve their separate identity without turning that separateness into a badge of inferiority.[5] However, the limitations of the article should not

[1] F Capotorti Study on the Rights of Persons belonging to Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities (1991) UN Sales no E.91.XIV.2 at para 98.

[2] Ibid at para 97.

[3] UN Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities E/CN.4/52, Sect V, quoted in P Thornberry 'The Rights of Minorities' in DJ Harris & S Joseph (eds) The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and United Kingdom Law (1995) 597, 605.

[4] P Thornberry International Law and the Rights of Minorities (1991)(Thornberry International Law) 142.

[5] Article 26 requires that, at national level, the law shall prohibit any discrimination and guarantee to all persons equal and effective protection against discrimination on any ground such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

be overlooked. Article 27 does not recognize minorities as collective entities that possess legal rights. The individual remains the principal juridical unit of the Covenant.[1] Thus, while the ICCPR embraces minority rights, it does so in a manner that denies communities the legal subjectivity necessary for their protection.[2]

Article 27 has been the subject of a general comment by the UN Human Rights Committee ('UNHRC'). General Comment 23 attempts to answer some of the criticisms levelled above.[3] According to the UNHRC, art 27 was intended to ensure the survival and the continued development of the cultural, religious and social identity of minority communities. As a result, the Committee contends that the right granted by art 27 must be distinguished from other personal rights conferred on individuals by the ICCPR.[4] While the UNHRC has emphasized that the right is a right of individuals (held by 'persons belonging to such minorities'), and should not be confused with the collective right of peoples to self-determination,[5] the UNHRC recognizes that any meaningful enjoyment of culture, practice of religion and use of language presupposes a community of individuals with similar rights.[6] This recognition, according to the UNHRC, means that art 27 may require positive measures by states to protect the identity of a minority and to promote the ability of its members to enjoy their culture, religion or language in community.[7] As long as these measures are aimed solely at correcting conditions that impair the enjoyment of these community rights, these measures will constitute a legitimate ground for differentiation and will comply with the non-discrimination requirements of the ICCPR.[8]

(ii) UN Declaration on Minorities

The Declaration on the Rights of Persons Belonging to National or Ethnic, Religious or Linguistic Minorities was the product of fourteen years of work by

[1] Anghie (supra) at 343 ('The exception to the individualistic orientation of the Covenant is Article 1 which confers the right of self-determination on all peoples.')

[2] Ibid at 346.

[3] General Comment 23, Adopted by the Human Rights Committee under Article 40, Paragraph 4, of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights UN Doc CCPR/C/21/Rev 1/add 5 (26 April 1994)('GC 23'). On the nature and authoritativeness of general comments of the Committee, see D McGoldrick The Human Rights Committee: Its Role in the Development of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1991) 92-96 (General comments are potentially very important as an expression of the accumulated and unparalleled experience of an independent expert human rights body of a universal character in its consideration of the implementation of the ICCPR.)

[4] Section 27 can thus be contrasted with the non-discrimination guarantees under Articles 2 and 26. The latter two articles apply to all individuals within the territory or under the jurisdiction of a state whether or not those persons belong to a minority. See GC 23 (supra) at paras 4 and 9.

[5] Ibid at para 2.

[6] Thornberry International Law (supra) at 173.

[7] See GC 23 (supra) at para 6.2. This position contrasts with the view of commentators that the negative phrasing of the Article (shall not be denied) prevents the inference of positive state obligations to affirmative action. See M Nowak 'The Evolution of Minority Rights in International Law' in Brölman (supra) at 109.

[8] See GC 23 (supra) at para 6.2.

a Working Group of the Commission on Human Rights.[1] This document goes beyond the articulation of individual rights of persons belonging to minority communities and addresses squarely the content of state obligations to respect, to protect and to promote minority communities.

The Declaration sets global minimum standards.[2] First, it contains a principle of non-discrimination of minorities.[3] Second, it protects community identity through two discrete mechanisms: (a) one set of mechanisms protect minority 'existence'; and (b) another set of mechanisms promote the 'conditions' under which minority communities might flourish.[4] The right to existence embraces background rights against genocide and forced assimilation.[5] With respect to the manner in which states encourage the flourishing of minority communities, the Declaration obliges the state: (a) to remove legal obstacles to cultural development; (b) to facilitate the growth of institutions that underpin a vibrant linguistic, religious or cultural community; (c) to respect the distinctive characteristics of minority communities; and (d) to protect the territorial claims of aboriginal groups and to permit aboriginal groups to associate within their traditional territories.[6]

(iii) African Charter on Human and People's Rights

The African Charter, also known as the Banjul Charter, entered into force in 1986 and was ratified and acceded to by South Africa in 1996. It contains a large number of provisions that speak to the rights of religious, linguistic and cultural communities.

Article 2 enshrines the general principle of non-discrimination. It reads: 'Every individual shall be entitled to the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms recognized and guaranteed in the present Charter without distinction of any kind such as race, ethnic group, colour sex, language, religion, political or any other opinion, national and social origin, fortune, birth or other status.' Articles 8 and 11 contain standard rights to freedom of religion and freedom of association.

With Article 12, the African Charter begins to look like something more than a plain vanilla convention. Article 12(5) states: 'The mass expulsion of non-nationals shall be prohibited. Mass expulsion shall be that which is aimed at national, racial, ethnic or religious groups.'

[1] General Assembly Resolution 47/135 (18 December 1992).

[2] P Thornberry 'The UN Declaration on the Rights of Persons Belonging to National or Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities: Background, Analysis, Observations and an Update' in A Philips & A Rosas (eds) Universal Minority Rights (1995)('Rights of Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities') 30.

[3] See Articles 2(1), 2(5), 3(1), 3(2), 4(1).

[4] Article 1(1) reads: States shall protect the existence and the national or ethnic, cultural, religious identity of minorities within their respective territories, and shall encourage conditions for the promotion of that identity.

[5] Thornberry 'Rights of Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities' (supra) at 40.

[6] Ibid at 41.

Article 19 contemplates somewhat less dire circumstances, but nevertheless recognizes the recent penchant for internecine strife. It reads: 'All peoples shall be equal; they shall enjoy the same respect and shall have the same rights. Nothing shall justify the domination of a people by another.'

Article 20 offers an even greater challenge to state sovereignty. It commits Charter members to the recognition of some form of self-determination of the various peoples who inhabit a political realm. Article 20 reads, in relevant part:

(1) All peoples have the right to existence. They shall have the unquestionable and inalienable right to self-determination. They shall freely determine their political status and shall pursue their economic and social development according to the policy they have freely chosen.
(2) Colonised or oppressed people shall have the right to free themselves from the bonds of domination by resorting to any means recognized by the international community.

Article 17 takes us out of the domain of negative duties into the realm of positive obligations. Article 17(2) and (3) read as follows:

(2) Every individual may freely take part in the cultural life of his community.
(3) The promotion and protection of morals and traditional values recognized by the community shall be the duty of the state.

Article 22 amplifies the content of the positive obligations found in Article 17. It reads:

(1) All people have the right to their economic, social and cultural development with due regard to their freedom and identity and in the equal enjoyment of the common heritage of mankind.
(2) States shall have the duty, individually and collectively, to ensure the exercise of the right to development.

Article 17(3), read together with Article 22(1), would, finally, appear to make communities themselves the bearers of justiciable rights.

Although the strength of the Charter has yet to be adequately tested by effective enforcement of the African Commission on Human and People' Rights' decisions, a significant body of jurisprudence has developed around the community rights set out above.[1] The Commission has, over the past decade, issued judgments that speak directly to the meaning of self-determination,[2] religious

[1] For more on the how the African Charter and the African Commission work, see C Heyns 'The African Regional Human Rights System: The African Charter' (2004) 108 Penn State LR 679; F Viljoen 'A Human Rights Court for Africa, and Africans' (2004) 1 Brooklyn Journal of International Law 30; C Heyns & M Killander (eds) Compendium of Key Human Rights Documents of the African Union (2nd Edition, 2006).

[2] Katangese Peoples Congress v Zaire (2000) African Human Rights Law Reports 72 (ACHPR 1995) at para 4 (The Commission believes that 'self-determination may be exercised in any of the following ways: independence, self-government, local government, federalism, confederalism, unitarism, or any other form of relations that accords with the wishes of the people, but is fully cognizant of other recognised principles such as sovereignty and territorial integrity.') freedom,[1] and minority community rights.[2]

58.4 FC s 31

(a) Content of FC s 31

(i) Individual right exercised communally

FC s 31 accords rights of participation to members of cultural, linguistic and religious communities 'with other members of that community'. FC s 31 thus echoes ICCPR art 27's phrase 'in community with other members of their group'.

The UNHRC has observed that this phrase turns art 27 into a hybrid individual/collective right. In General Comment 23, the Human Rights Committee notes that '[a]lthough the rights protected under art 27 are individual rights, they depend in turn on the ability of the minority group to maintain its culture, language or religion.'[3] In other words, the right of a member of a cultural or linguistic or religious community cannot meaningfully be exercised alone and presupposes the existence of a community of individuals with similar rights.[4]

The same reasoning applies to FC s 31. An individual right of enjoyment of culture, language or religion assumes the existence of a community that sustains a particular culture, language or religion. Accordingly, FC s 31 right protects both individual and group interests in a community's cultural, linguistic or religious integrity.[5] The hybrid scope of the right complicates its application. Individual and group interests in cultural integrity frequently coincide. Where an individual member of a linguistic community challenges, for example, legislation or executive action that restricts the public use of his or her language, the individual interest and the communal interest in the preservation of that language converge. However, they may, just as frequently, diverge.

[1] Amnesty International & Others v Sudan (2000) African Human Rights Law Reports 72 (ACHPR 1995) at paras 73-76 ('Another matter is application of Sharia law. . . . [I]t is fundamentally unjust that religious law should be applied against non-adherents of the religion. . . . It is alleged that non-Muslims were persecuted in order to cause their conversion to Islam. . . . Christians are subjected to arbitrary arrest, expulsions and denial of access to work and food aid. . . . Accordingly, the Commission holds a violation of Article 8.')

[2] Prince v South Africa ACHPR Communication 255/2002 (Commission finds that while the general prohibition of the use of cannabis limits the Rastafarian sacramental use of cannabis, the states prohibition serves a legitimate purpose, is rationally related to that purpose (the health, safety and welfare of the commonweal) and is therefore a justifiable limitation of complainants right to freedom of religion. However, the Commission then made the entirely risible claim that since the prohibition applied to all South Africans, 'it cannot be said [to be] so discriminatory as to curtail the complainants free exercise of his religious rights.' Were that true then all facially neutral laws crafted to suppress the religious, linguistic or cultural practices of any minority community on the continent would be consistent with the Charter. The Charters drafters could not have intended such an outcome.)

[3] GC 23 (supra) at para 5.2.

[4] Thornberry International Law (supra) at 173; GC 23 (supra) at para 6.2.

[5] SJ Anaya Indigenous Peoples in International Law (1996) 101 (Commenting on the hybrid nature of Article 27.)

The Constitutional Court in Gauteng School Education Bill granted communities the right to create independent schools based upon a common culture, language or religion — and expressly recognized the importance of such constituitive attachments for individual dignity and group identity.[1] The Supreme Court of Appeal in Mikro gave this finding teeth by holding that FC s 29(2) — the right to receive education in an official language of choice at a public educational institution, where practicable — did not grant learners the right to receive instruction in their preferred language at each and every public educational institution.[2] Mikro thereby resists majoritarion pressures that would dilute the integrity of a 'minority' linguistic community that wishes to maintain a single medium public school. In Gauteng School Education Bill and Mikro, individual rights and group rights dovetail and reinforce one another.

In Prince v President, Cape Law Society, a sharply divided Constitutional Court held that although a Rastafarian's right to freedom of religion in terms of FC ss 15 and 31 permitted him to engage in Rastafarian rituals, the state was justified in proscribing the sacramental use of cannabis.[3] What is essential for our immediate purposes is the manner in which the case for a religious exemption presented itself to the Court. Prince was concerned with his right*(s)* to practise professionally as an attorney and to practise religiously as a Rastafarian. So although the Court spills quite a significant amount of ink on the religious practices of the Rastafarian community, the matter ultimately pits Prince's individual interests against the state's interests in effective law enforcement, in domestic narcotics trafficking and in keeping faith with its international obligations. Had the matter been brought to court on behalf of the Rastafari community as a whole — or at least in concert with Mr Prince — dicta in the majority judgment and the strongly worded dissents suggest that the Court might have interrogated more closely the possibility of creating a meaningful exemption to existing laws proscribing dagga use.[4] Prince suggests that individuals pressing religious rights claims would do well to have the backing of the community of which they are a part.

[1] Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In Re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC)(Court held that IC s 32*(c)* permitted communities to create independent schools based upon common culture, language and religion. It further held that IC 32*(c)* provided a defensive right to persons who sought to establish such educational institutions and that it protected that right from invasion by the State. It did not, however, impose upon the State an obligation to establish such educational institutions.)

[2] Western Cape Minister of Education v The Governing Body of Mikro Primary School 2006 (1) SA 1 (SCA), 2005 (10) BCLR 973 (SCA)('Mikro').

[3] 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC)('Prince').

[4] Justice Ncgobo's judgment offers some solace for those inclined to treat religious belief with greater dignity:

> Apart from this, as a general matter, the Court should not be concerned with questions whether, as a matter of religious doctrine, a particular practice is central to the religion. Religion is a matter of faith and belief. The beliefs that believers hold sacred and thus central to their religious faith may strike non-believers as bizarre, illogical or irrational. Human beings may freely believe in what they cannot prove. Yet that their beliefs are bizarre, illogical or irrational to others, or are incapable of scientific proof, does not detract from the fact that these are religious beliefs for the purposes of enjoying the protection guaranteed by the right to freedom of religion. The believers should not be put to the proof of their beliefs or faith. For this reason, it is undesirable for courts to enter into the debate whether a particular practice is central to a religion unless there is a genuine dispute as to the centrality of the practice.

The Constitutional Court's decision in Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education reverses the spin in Prince on the relationship between individual rights and community rights. The judgment assumes, without argument, that s 10 of the South African Schools Act[1] limits FC ss 15 and 31. The Court then explains why the state is justified in barring corporal punishment in all schools and why it need not consider an exemption for such punishment when religious doctrine so dictates.

The manifold problems with the judgment are canvassed at length elsewhere in this work.[2] As I have previously argued, it is perfectly reasonable to override religious dictates and to bar corporal punishment that impairs the dignity of children. The problem is with the distinction between the practice of religion in schools and the practice of religion elsewhere (eg, the home.) If children lack the capacity to decide for themselves whether religious practices will prove deleterious to their health — and it therefore becomes incumbent upon the state to intervene on their behalf to protect their dignity — then it would seem reasonable to conclude that barring religion-sanctioned corporal punishment at home should be no different than barring religion-sanctioned corporal punishment at school. But that is not what the Court concludes. Rather, it argues that the parents 'were not being obliged to make an absolute and strenuous choice between obeying a law of the land or following their conscience. They could do both simultaneously.'[3]

That is, parents could follow their conscience and religion at home — and beat their children — but still obey the law of the land by having their children attend school free from corporal punishment. The Court cannot have it both ways. Either a child's right to dignity is of such paramount importance that it precludes corporal punishment at home and at school, or the dignity interests of a religious community in practising its faith justify corporal punishment in school and at home. To say, as the Court does, that the crux of the matter is the use of a Ibid at 813. Justice Ncgobo recognizes: (1) how associations are constitutive of the beliefs and practices of individuals; and (2) how the fact of their being constitutive entitles them to constitutional protection. The judgment is remarkable in that it does not rely upon a model of rational moral agency to distinguish those beliefs that are entitled to judicial solicitude from those beliefs that are not. For a further discussion of the Constitutional Court's analysis in Prince, Christian Education and other religion cases, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44; P Farlam 'Freedom of Religion, Conscience, Thought and Belief' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 41. For a further discussion of the Constitutional Court's analysis in Prince, and Sachs J's dissent in particular, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[1] Act 84 of 1996.

[2] See S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36; S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44.

[3] Christian Education (supra) at para 51.

teacher as the instrument of religious discipline is pure sophistry. If the teacher was the parent or the school was at home, then the court's basis for enabling the parents 'to do both simultaneously' would evaporate. In any event, the Christian Education Court takes a quintessentially collective right — FC s 31 — and turns it into a predominantly individual right. But, given the presence of FC s 15, FC s 31 is, on the facts of Christian Education, largely redundant.

If Christian Education and Prince represent low-water marks with respect to the Court's treatment of community rights, then the Court's recent ruling in Fourie might be judged a marked improvement. In finding that the equality and the dignity interests of same-sex life partners were unjustifiably limited by rules of common law and statutory provisions that prevented them from entering civilly-sanctioned marriages, the Fourie Court went out of its way to note that religious prohibitions on gay and lesbian marriage did not constitute unjustifiable infringements of the rights to dignity and to equality and that religious officials could legitimately refuse to consecrate a marriage between same-sex life partners.[1] In other words, the Court recognized community rights that had nothing to do with, and which might even be viewed as inimical to, egalitarian concerns.

The inevitable divergence between the individual interests in FC s 31 and the collective interests in FC s 31 are evident in two High Court judgments: Taylor v Kurtstag[2] and Wittmann v Deutscher Schulverein, Pretoria, & Others.[3] In Taylor v Kurtstag, the Witwatersrand High Court upheld the right of the Beth Din to issue a cherem — an excommunication edict — against a member of the Jewish community who had agreed to follow its ruling with regard to an order for child maintenance. Taylor had contended that the cherem violated his right to participate in the affairs and the practices of the Jewish community. The High Court rightly rejected this claim on the ground that the group's right to choose its associates by necessity means the right to require those who wish to join the group to conform their behaviour to certain dictates, and the right to exclude those who refuse to conform.[4] Taylor's refusal to follow the dictates of

[1] Fourie (supra) at paras 90-98. See also Fourie v Minister of Home Affairs 2005 (3) SA 429 (SCA), 2005 (3) BCLR 241 (SCA) at paras 36-37 (No religious denomination would be compelled to marry gay or lesbian couples.)

[2] 2005 (1) SA 362) (W), 2005 (7) BCLR 705 (W), [2004] 4 All SA 317 (W)('Taylor').

[3] 1998 (4) SA 423, 451 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T)('Does this mean that private parochial schools which do not receive State aid may not prescribe obligatory attendance at their morning prayers and confessional religious instruction classes? The answer is negative. Section 17 of the [I]nterim Constitution and s 18 of the [Final] Constitution recognise the freedom of association. [IC] Section 14(1) and [FC] s 15(1) respectively recognise the freedom of religion which includes the right to join others in worship, propagation of the faith etc. Freedom of association entails the right with others to exclude non-conformists. It also includes the right to require those who join the association to conform with its principles and rules.')

[4] Taylor (supra) at para 38 (FC s 18 freedom of association guarantees an individual the right to choose his or her associates and a group of individuals the right to choose their associates citing with approval Woolman 'Association' (supra) at § 44.3 as authority for the proposition that the right to choose entails a right to exclude.) See also AWG Rath & SA de Freitas 'Church Tribunals, Doctrine Sanction and the South African Constitution' 43 (1 & 2) Deel (2002) 276 (Doctrinal sanctioning by ecclesiastical courts enjoys protection of FC s 15 and that protection has been recognized by civil courts.)

the Beth Din effectively meant that he had forsaken his rights to participate in the affairs of the community. In Wittmann v Deutsche Schulverein, Pretoria, the Pretoria High Court upheld the right of a school governing body to expel a student who knew that she was obliged to attend language and religious instruction classes and who subsequently refused to attend these classes. The learner's views on what constituted a 'religious' or 'cultural' education clearly conflicted with the views of the school's broader community. Both cases underscore the relatively unassailable proposition that in order for a religious association or a cultural association to remain committed to specific practices, it must control the voice of, the entrance to and the exit from the association.[1]

Not every conflict between the individual's right to participate in the affairs of the community will fall before the community's interest in determining the rules for such participation. In Lovelace v Canada, the UN Human Rights Committee took the view that the withdrawal by a Canadian statute of a Maliseet Indian woman's right to reside on the Tobique Reserve in Canada reserve because of her marriage to a non-Indian violated her ICCPR art 27 right.[2] According to the UNHRC, 'the right of Sandra Lovelace to access to her native culture and language, in community with other members of her group, has in fact been, and continues to be interfered with, because there is no place outside the Tobique Reserve where such a community exists.'[3]

In Lovelace, the community's interest in preserving a distinct ethnic identity through legal mechanisms discouraging inter-ethnic marriages clashed with the individual's right of participation in the life of her community.[4] Although the

[1] See also Mohamed & Another v Jassiem 1996 (1) SA 673 (A)(Members of the Ahmadiya movement, treated as apostates by orthodox Muslims, may not enter mosques, may not marry a Muslim, may not be buried in Muslim cemeteries or have any association with Muslims.)

[2] Lovelace v Canada Communication No R.6/24, U.N. Doc. Supp. No. 40 (A/36/40) (1981). Section 14 of the Indian Act (1970) provided that [an Indian] woman who is a member of a band ceases to be a member of that band if she marries a person who is not a member of that band. The loss of membership status entailed the loss of the right to the common use and benefits of the reserve land allotted to the band. Should the woman marry a member of another band, she would acquire membership of her husbands band and associated land rights. Lovelace married a non-Indian, thereby losing her Indian status in terms of the Act and all rights of residence on reserve land. Lovelaces principal complaint in her communication to the Committee was that the Act was discriminatory. For jurisdictional reasons, the Committee sidestepped the discrimination issue, deciding the matter instead on the basis of Lovelace's claim that '[t]he major loss to a person ceasing to be an Indian is the loss of the cultural benefits of living in an Indian community, the emotional ties to home, family, friends and neighbours, and the loss of identity.' Ibid at para 13.1.

[3] Ibid at para 15.

[4] According to the Canadian government, the Indian Act was > an instrument designed to protect the Indian minority in accordance with art 27 of the Covenant. A definition of the Indian was inevitable in view of the special privileges granted to the Indian communities, in particular their right to occupy reserve lands. Traditionally, patrilineal family relationship were taken into account for determining legal claims. Since, additionally, in the farming societies of the nineteenth century, reserve land was felt to be more threatened by non-Indian men than by non-Indian women, legal enactments as from 1869 provided that an Indian woman who married a non-Indian man would lose her status as an Indian. These reasons were still valid.

Ibid at para 5. See also GC 23 (supra) at para 5.

UNHRC interpreted art 27 in favour of the individual's rights of participation, it stressed that not every interference with an individual's right of enjoyment of cultural and community life could be considered a denial of rights under art 27. National legislation might legitimately define rights of residence on communal land to protect resources and preserve the identity of a people. However, such restrictions on rights of residence must be reasonable, justifiable and consistent with the other provisions of the Covenant.[1]

(ii) Membership in and belonging to a 'cultural, religious or linguistic community'

FC s 31's use of the word 'belong' — as in 'belonging to a cultural, religious or linguistic community' — echoes ICCPR art 27's phrase 'persons belonging to … [ethnic, religious or linguistic] minorities.' The UN Human Rights Committee has stated that 'belonging' indicates that the right is designed to protect 'those who belong to a group and who share in common a culture, a religion and/or a language' and is not, therefore, a right to which everyone is necessarily entitled.[2] In Lovelace v Canada, the UN Human Rights Committee had this to say about Sandra Lovelace's membership in the Maliseet community:

> The rights under art 27 of the Covenant have to be secured to 'persons belonging' to the minority. … Persons who are born and brought up on a reserve, who keep ties with their community and wish to maintain those ties must normally be considered as belonging to that minority within the meaning of the Covenant. Since Sandra Lovelace is ethnically a Maliseet Indian and has only been absent from her home reserve for a few years during the existence of her marriage, she is, in the opinion of the Committee, entitled to be regarded as 'belonging' to this minority and to claim the benefits of art 27 of the Covenant.[3]

The Committee recognized that 'belonging' occurs in a number of different but often overlapping ways. For example, birth or ethnic origin determined, in part, that Lovelace was a Maliseet. However, birth alone would not necessarily be a sufficient condition to tie Lovelace to the Maliseet community. Courts may look for additional evidence of continued affinity with an ethnic group. Indeed, South African courts are likely to consider continued residence or formal identification with the community to be more important than birth. Culture, language and religion are more a matter of shared experience than genetics.

With respect to language, courts may want some proof that the language in question is the individual's mother tongue and that the language constitutes an essential part of the personal, family and communal experience.[4] With respect to [1] But see Kitok v Sweden Communication No 197/1985 (1985) 96 ILR 637. Kitok demonstrates that the UNHRC recognizes that article 27 may protect the interests of the community at the expense of individual interests. In Kitok, the Committee found statutory restrictions on individual membership of a Sami village had, as their raison d'être, the preservation of the Sami minority. Such objectives were considered to be reasonable, justifiable and consistent with the purpose of article 27.

[2] GC 23 (supra) at para 5.1.

[3] Ibid at para 14.

[4] F de Varennes Language, Minorities and Human Rights (1996) 149.

religion, a claimant will be obliged to show that they practice a religion and she is actively involved in the religious life of her community. In all cases, the requirement of membership or belonging demands that the individual claimant demonstrates a history of shared experience and continued identification with the community in question.

(iii) May not be denied the right

Some of the phrasing of FC s 31 — 'may not be denied the right' — suggests that FC s 31 is primarily a negative liberty. That is, members of communities may freely engage in the practice of culture, language and religion without interference by the state or from any other source.

However, one might argue that FC s 31 requires more than mere sufferance. The inclusion of FC s 31 indicates a commitment to the maintenance of cultural pluralism. Such a commitment might well require that the state take positive measures to ensure the survival and the development of a variety of non-dominant communities. A state genuinely committed to pluralism cannot simply remain neutral in the face of larger social, political and economic currents that threaten its religious, linguistic and cultural heterogeneity. One need not be committed to pluralism for pluralism's sake to recognize that the centripetal forces of modernity augur an increasingly dull uniformity.

As for FC s 31's avatar, ICCPR art 27, opinion remains divided as to whether the right requires positive measures in support of minority cultures. For some academics, the purpose of the right is 'laisser vivre, of allowing members of those minorities the right to maintain their language or religion freely without any assistance from the state, but also without any hindrance or oppression that has been the all too frequent burden of minorities throughout human history'.[1] However, the contrary opinion — that the right necessarily requires positive measures — enjoys the support of UN Human Rights Committee. The Committee writes:

> Although the rights protected under art 27 are individual rights, they depend in turn on the ability of the minority group to maintain its culture, language or religion. Accordingly, positive measures by States may also be necessary to protect the identity of a minority and the rights of its members to enjoy and develop their culture and language and to practice their religion, in community with other members of their group.[2]

Sachs J has offered a similar gloss on community rights — and thus FC s 31 — in Gauteng School Education Bill, Fourie, Prince and Volks. In Gauteng School Education Bill, Sachs suggests that the minority rights provisions of the Interim Constitution bar the state from interfering with initiatives undertaken by a non-dominant community to preserve its culture, and might, in addition, require the state to provide material assistance to particularly vulnerable, threatened or disadvantaged cultures.[1] In Fourie, Sachs J's opinion — which attracts a majority of the Court — articulates an even more emphatic defence of community rights:

[1] Varennes (supra) at 151.
[2] GC 23 (supra) at para 6.2.

> Equality … does not presuppose … suppression of difference … Equality … does not imply … homogenisation of behaviour …. [T]here are a number of constitutional provisions that underline the constitutional value of acknowledging diversity and pluralism in our society, and give a particular texture to the broadly phrased right to freedom of association contained in section 18. Taken together, they affirm the right of people to self-expression without being forced to subordinate themselves to the cultural and religious norms of others, and highlight the importance of individuals and communities being able to enjoy what has been called the 'right to be different'. In each case, space has been found for members of communities to depart from a majoritarian norm.[2]

(iv) Right to enjoyment of culture in community with others

The Final Constitution uses the terms 'culture' or 'cultural' in two distinct senses. FC Schedule 4 indicates that concurrent national and provincial legislative competence is exercised on the subject of 'cultural matters'. The adjective is used here to mean the practice of intellectual and artistic activity and the works that issue from this activity.[3] Put simply, 'culture' in Schedule 4 embraces literature, music, painting, sculpture and theatre.[4] As TS Eliot noted, this is culture 'in the reduced sense of the word, … everything that is picturesque, harmless and separable from politics'.[5]

[1] Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In Re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC) at paras 70 and 90.

[2] Fourie (supra) at paras 60-61. See Prince v Law Society 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC)('Prince')(Sachs J dissenting at para 149 ('[W]here there are [religious] practices that might fall within a general legal prohibition, but that do not involve any violation of the Bill of Rights, the Constitution obliges the State to walk the extra mile and to find adequate means perhaps a carefully constructed exemption of accommodating the practice at issue.') See also Volks v Robinson 2005 (5) BCLR 466 (CC)('Volks')(Sachs J dissenting) at paras 154 and 156 (Sachs J rejects the majority's finding that 'the appellant, having chosen cohabitation rather than marriage, … must bear the consequences and thus could not avail herself of the benefits of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act.' He contends that: 'Respecting autonomy means giving legal credence not only to a decision to marry but to choices that people make about alternative lifestyles. Such choices may be freely undertaken, either expressly or tacitly. Alternatively, they might be imposed by the unwillingness of one of the parties to marry the other. Yet if the resulting relationships involve clearly acknowledged commitments to provide mutual support and to promote respect for stable family life, then the law should not … penalise or ignore them because they are unconventional. It should certainly not refuse them recognition because of any moral prejudice, whether open or unconscious, against them.')

[3] See R Williams Keywords: A Vocabulary of Culture and Society (1983) 90.

[4] An example of the type of legislation envisaged by Schedule 6 is the Culture Promotion Act 35 of 1983. Section 3 of the Act empowers the Minister of National Education to establish regional councils for cultural affairs. Section 3(5) provides that the functions of such a council are the preservation and the development of culture in the fields of the visual, musical and literary arts, the natural and human sciences, and of leisure and recreational activities.

[5] TS Eliot Notes Towards the Definition of Culture (1962) 93 as quoted in C Kukuthas 'Are There Any Cultural Rights?' in W Kymlicka (ed) The Rights of Minority Cultures (1995) 228.

FC s 31 and FC s 30 deploy a different connotation of the word. In these two sections, culture means a particular way of life for an identifiable group of people: FC s 31 does not refer to 'culture' in general, but to 'their culture'. Culture does the work of a range of synonymous terms: tradition, customs, civilisation, race, nation, way of being in the world, and even comprehensive vision of the good life.[1] Understood in this way, 'culture' functions as a source of identity and draws distinctions between groups of people based upon such characteristics as belief-sets, practices, mores, language, rules of kinship, modes of education or forms of social relations.[2] FC s 31's use of the term 'culture' is, of course, broad enough to encompass all that falls within the FC Schedule 4 definition. It goes without saying that the activities of writers, artists and musicians all contribute to the cultural life of a community. But they do not exhaust that community's culture.

What constitutes 'culture' for the purposes of FC s 31? One might begin with the specific practices, customs and traditions of the community and, by logical extension, those institutions responsible for the preservation and the transmission of culture — schools, publications, libraries, publishing houses, museums and religious institutions.[3] (The list may then be extended to the conservation of historical objects and the commemoration of significant dates or events.[4]) The right grants communities the freedom to establish and to maintain such institutions without interference from any source in order to ensure their survival as a cultural entity. Certain institutional aspects of 'cultural life' are accorded specific protection elsewhere in the Bill of Rights — language use at official and unofficial levels,[5] local control by a cultural, linguistic or religious community of the education of its members,[6] and state support for religious practices.[7] These different forms of protection are dealt with at greater length elsewhere in this work.

[1] See R Thornton 'Culture: A Contemporary Definition' in E Boonzaaier & J Sharp (eds) South African Keywords (1988) 17, 26. As I have noted above, we should take great care before we suggest that all cultures provide comprehensive visions of the good life. Most cultures, properly understood, fall far short of doing so.

[2] M Leiris Race and Culture (1958) 20-21.

[3] P Thornberry International Law and the Rights of Minorities (1991) 188.

[4] F Capotorti Study on the Rights of Persons belonging to Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities (1991) UN Sales no E.91.XIV.263-68.

[5] FC s 6 and FC s 30. FC s 35 guarantees accused persons the right to be informed of their rights and to use a language they understand in criminal proceedings. For more on official languages and the right to use the language of one's choice, see I Currie 'Official Languages' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein , M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 65.

[6] FC s 29(3). For more on the right to create and to maintain independent educational institutions, see S Woolman, F Verrieva & M Bishop 'Education' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein , M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 57.

[7] FC s 15. For more on the freedom of religion, see P Farlam 'Freedom of Religion' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 41. See also G Van Der Schyff 'Freedom of Religious Autonomy as an Element of the Right to the Freedom of Expression' (2003) 3 TSAR 512 (Describes five distinct elements of freedom of religion autonomy, choice, observance, reaching and propagation.)

(v) Right to practice a religion in community with others

FC s 31 must be read together with FC s 15, the freedom of religion, and FC s 18, the freedom of association. The Constitutional Court has been quite clear about what lies at the core of FC s 15's protection of freedom of religion. In Prince, Ngcobo J writes:

> This Court has on two occasions considered the contents of the right to freedom of religion. On each occasion, it has accepted that the right to freedom of religion at least comprehends: (a) the right to entertain the religious beliefs that one chooses to entertain; (b) the right to announce one's religious beliefs publicly and without fear of reprisal; and (c) the right to manifest such beliefs by worship and practice, teaching and dissemination. Implicit in the right to freedom of religion is the 'absence of coercion or restraint'. Thus 'freedom of religion may be impaired by measures that force people to act or refrain from acting in a manner contrary to their religious beliefs'.[1]

What then does FC s 31(1) do that FC s 15(1) does not? According to Ngcobo J:

> Section 31(1)(a) emphasises and protects the associational nature of cultural, religious and language rights. In the context of religion, it emphasises the protection to be given to members of communities united by religion to practise their religion.[2]

In sum, the protection of a right to religious practice in community with others in FC s 31 and the right to freedom of religion in FC s 15 do not so much differ as they do 'complement' one another.[3]

FC s 31, alone, clearly allows for the establishment and the maintenance of those institutions that make possible the practice of a religion: the creation of houses of worship, schools, seminaries and burial sites, the publication of religious texts and the production of objects required for religious rites.[4] FC s 31, when read with FC s 15 and FC s 18, does substantially more: it grants religious associations the ability to control the entrance into, the voice of, and the expulsion from a community.

Recent constitutional case law supports the contention that religious associations have the right to expel members who agree to follow the rules or the decisions of the association's governing body and subsequently refuse to do so.

[1] Prince v President, Cape Law Society & Others 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC)('Prince') at para 38 quoting S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg 1997 (4) SA 1176 (CC), 1997 (2) SACR 540 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC) at para 92 and citing, in support, Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC). The Prince Court also quoted with approval the following dictum by Dickson J in R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd 18 DLR (4th) 321, 353, [1985] 1 SCR 295, 311: 'The essence of the concept of freedom of religion is the right to entertain such religious beliefs as a person chooses, the right to declare religious beliefs openly and without fear of hindrance or reprisal, and the right to manifest belief by worship and practice or by teaching and dissemination.' See also Y Dinstein Freedom of Religion and Religious Minorities in Y Dinstein & M Tabory (eds) The Protection of Minorities and Human Rights (1992) 145, 147.

[2] Prince (supra) at para 39.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Dinstein (supra) at 158.

In Taylor v Kurstag, the Witwatersrand High Court upheld the right of the Beth Din to issue a cherem — an excommunication edict — against a member of the Jewish community who had agreed to follow its ruling with regard to an order for child maintenance.[1] In Wittmann v Deutsche Schulverein, Pretoria, the Pretoria High Court upheld the right of a school governing body to expel a student who knew that she was obliged to attend language and religious instruction classes and who subsequently refused to attend these classes.[2] Both cases underscore the relatively unassailable proposition that in order for a religious association to remain committed to the practice of certain beliefs in a given environment, it must control the voice of, the entrance to and the exit from the association.

The Constitutional Court's recent judgment in Fourie further reinforces this conclusion. In finding that the equality rights and the dignity interests of same-sex life partners were unjustifiably limited by rules of common law and statutory provisions that prevented them from entering civilly-sanctioned marriages, the Fourie Court went out of its way to note that religious officials could legitimately refuse to consecrate a marriage between members of a same-sex life partnership. It wrote:

> In the open and democratic society contemplated by the Constitution there must be mutually respectful co-existence between the secular and the sacred. The function of the Court is to recognise the sphere which each inhabits, not to force the one into the sphere of the other. . . . The hallmark of an open and democratic society is its capacity to accommodate and manage difference of intensely-held world views and lifestyles in a reasonable and fair manner. The objective of the Constitution is to allow different concepts about the nature of human existence to inhabit the same public realm, and to do so in a manner that is not mutually destructive and that at the same time enables government to function in a way that shows equal concern and respect for all. . . . It is clear from the above that acknowledgment by the State of the right of same-sex couples to enjoy the same status, entitlements and responsibilities as marriage law accords to heterosexual couples is in no way inconsistent with the rights of religious organisations to continue to refuse to celebrate same-sex marriages. The constitutional claims of same-sex couples can accordingly not be negated by

[1] 2005 (1) SA 362) (W), 2005 (7) BCLR 705 (W), [2004] 4 All SA 317 (W) at para 38 ('The right of a group to choose their associates of necessity means the right to require those who wish to join the group to conform their behaviour to certain dictates, and the right to exclude those who refuse to conform.')

[2] 1998 (4) SA 423, 451 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T)('Freedom of association entails the right with others to exclude non-conformists. It also includes the right to require those who join the association to conform with its principles and rules.') > invoking the rights of believers to have their religious freedom respected. The two sets of interests involved do not collide; they co-exist in a constitutional realm based on accommodation of diversity.[1]

In short, religious groups are still free to exclude gay and lesbian life partners — individually and jointly — from participating in the practices and the rituals of a given community.

Why would the Final Constitution grant religious associations the power to control their own membership requirements, their own internal affairs and their own expulsion procedures at the risk of limiting another person's desire to belong? As I have argued elsewhere, an appropriate appreciation of freedom of association — of which the right to practice a religion in community with others is a subset — turns on the recognition of two arguments. First, freedom of association, rightly understood, forces us to attend to the arationality of our most basic attachments and to think twice before we accord our arational attachments preferred status to the arational attachments of others.[2] This observation regarding our constitutive religious attachments buttresses the contention that religious associations that pursue a particular way of being in the world ought to be able to exclude from a religious association or a religious institution those persons who do not derive meaning from that way of being in the world, and whose presence, in significant numbers, would make the religious association or institution impossible to sustain. Second, religious associations must have the capacity to protect themselves from capture. Without the capacity to police their membership and to enforce expulsion policies, associations would face two related threats. For starters, an association would be at risk of having its aims substantially altered. To the extent that the original raison d'être of the religious association matters to the extant members of the association, the association must possess ability to regulate the entrance, voice and exit of members. Without built-in limitations on the process of determining the ends of the religious community, the entrance of new members, and the continued membership of existing members, outside parties could easily distort the purpose, the character and the function of the association. Moreover, a religious association's very existence could be at risk. Individuals, other groups, or a state inimical to the values of a given association could use ease of entrance into an association to put that same association out of business.

[1] Fourie (supra) at paras 94-98.

[2] The constitutive nature of our attachments also forces us to attend to another often overlooked feature of associations. We often speak of the associations that make up our lives as if we were largely free to choose them or make them up as we go along. I have suggested why such a notion of choice is not true of us as individual selves. It is also largely not true of associational life generally. As Michael Walzer has convincingly argued, there is also a 'radical givenness' to our associational life. M Walzer 'On Involuntary Association' in A Gutmann (ed) 'Freedom of Association' (1998) 64, 67. What he means, in short, is that most of the associations that make up our associational life are involuntary associations. A reasonably equal and democratic society must mediate the givenness of our associational life and the aspirations of all of us to have the ability to discriminate (and sometimes choose) between those associational forms which still fit and those which do not. It is often the case that not choosing to leave an association, but to stay, is what we truly cherish as freedom. As Walzer suggests, we ought to call such decisions to reaffirm our commitments 'freedom simply, without qualification'. Ibid at 73.

The extant common law on association reinforces more general constitutional jurisprudential considerations in support of the proposition that religious communities possess a significant degree of latitude with respect to policies that differentiate between adherents and non-adherents. One old and venerable strand of the common law on association tolerates little internal or external interference with the critical purposes — or voice — of a community or an association.[1] Another, equally important line of cases is designed to prevent insiders and outsiders from altering the fundamental purposes of a religious community. In Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk in Afrika, the Supreme Court of Appeal held that the attempt of the Dutch Reformed Church in Africa ('NGKA') to merge with the Dutch Reformed Mission Church in South Africa ('NGSK') could not proceed without the unanimous consent of regional synods.[2] The Supreme Court of Appeal's decision in Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk in Afrika provides exceptionally strong support for the proposition that associations designed to promote a particular religious denomination cannot be changed into another form or denomination of religious community without securing unanimity or special majorities designed to secure near unanimous approval.

What then does FC s 31(1) do that FC s 15(1) does not? The case law suggests that FC s 31(1) protects the religious community from interference — from both public and private sources — with the practice of its rituals and traditions. It is not clear, however, that such protection would not exist in the singular presence of FC s 15 and the total absence of FC s 31. Perhaps, it is safest to say that FC s 31 eliminates any doubt about what kind of protection FC s 15 should be understood to afford South Africans.

[1] A well-established body of common law precedent supports the contention that any proposed alteration of the fundamental objectives of an association requires the unanimous support of the associations members. This body of case law also underwrites the general proposition that courts ought to be loath to disturb associational relations on the basis of general assertions of equity or fairness. See, generally, B Bamford The Law of Partnership and Voluntary Association in South Africa (3rd Edition, 1982). Murray v SA Tattersalls Subscription Rooms provides support for my thesis that a majority of the members of an association formed for a given purpose cannot simply alter the constitution of that association in order to pursue an entirely unrelated set of ends and still expect the other, dissenting, minority members of the association to accept the change. 1910 TH 35. See also Mitchell's Plain Town Centre Merchants Association v Mcleod & Another 1996 (4) SA 159, 166 (A) citing Total South Africa (Pty) Ltd v Bekker 1992 (1) SA 617, 624 (A).

[2] Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk in Afrika (OVS) en 'n Ander v Verenigende Gereformeerde Kerk in Suider-Afrika 1999 (2) SA 156, 168-175 (SCA).

(vi) Right to use a language of choice

Specific protection of an individual right to speak a language is unnecessary — since the individual protection of a right to speak a language is meaningless without express protection for, and the existence of, a community of same-language speakers. And yet, such individual protection is exactly what both FC s 30 and FC s 31 appear to provide.[1]

But assume then, as a logical matter, that the protection afforded by FC s 31 must be communal in nature to have any purchase. One would then conclude that FC s 31 was intended to prevent interference with the use of a particular language in various public fora,[2] in schools or universities,[3] in daily commerce, or in the press or broadcasting media.[4] The same should hold true of similar restrictions imposed by natural or juristic persons. So, for example, FC s 31 could be applied horizontally to an employer who sought to restrict the use of a language by its employees while at work.[5]

It is also logical to conclude that FC s 31's silence with regard to any positive state duties with respect to the use of a language is intentional. The Final Constitution already contains a number of provisions designed to promote greater linguistic parity.[6]

[1] A right to use a language, along with a prohibition of discrimination on grounds of language, appears in all the principal international minority protection clauses. S Roth 'Toward a Minority Convention: Its Need and Content' in Y Dinstein & M Tabory (eds) The Protection of Minorities and Human Rights (1992) 83, 113. FC s 31 thus accords a right similar to that guaranteed in more detailed terms in a number of post-World War I Minorities Treaties. For example, Article 7 of the Treaty between the Allied Powers and Poland (1919) provided that '. . . [n]o restriction shall be imposed on the free use by any Polish national of any language in private intercourse, in commerce, in religion, in the press or in publications of any kind, or at public meetings.' See H Hannum (ed) Documents on Autonomy and Minority Rights (1993) 682.

[2] In some cases, a state has prohibited the use of a minority language in public places. For example, the Turkish Anti-Terrorist Act 3713 of 1991 prohibited the use of the Kurdish language in public places. Similarly, Algerian legislation made it an offence to hold public meetings or conferences or to put up signs or posters in any language other than Arabic. The prohibition effectively prevented the Berber minority from using its mother tongue. See F de Varennes Language, Minorities and Human Rights (1996) 164-165.

[3] See Meyer v Nebraska 262 US 390 (1923)(Statute prohibiting the teaching of any language other than English to students who had not passed the eighth grade violates due process.)

[4] While governmental restrictions on the language of private media (eg by banning publications in a particular language) would violate FC s 31, FC s 31 does not oblige the state to grant unrestricted access to the airwaves to linguistic minorities. FC s 9 would only require that it exercise control over such access in a non-discriminatory manner. See de Varennes (supra) at 164.

[5] See Gutierrez v Municipal Court 838 F2d 1031 (9th Cir 1988)(Rules prohibiting employees from speaking any language other than English while at work discriminatory against minorities because the cultural identity of certain minority groups is tied to their use of their own language.)

[6] See, eg, FC ss 6, 29(2), 35(3)(k) and 35(4). See also I Currie 'Official Languages' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 65.

(vii) Right to form, join and maintain cultural, religious and linguistic associations

FC s 31(1)(b) borrows some of the language of CP XII: 'Collective rights of self-determination in forming, joining and maintaining organs of civil society, including linguistic, cultural and religious associations, shall, on the basis of non-discrimination and free association, be recognised and protected.' Given that the subsection adds little to the guarantees contained in FC s 31(1)(a), it seems reasonable to conclude that it was included to ensure compliance with CP XII. The Constitutional Court offers some support for this conclusion when its writes, in the Second Certification Judgment, that the '[c]ollective rights of self-determination' in CP XII were 'associational individual rights, namely, those rights which cannot be fully or properly exercised by individuals otherwise than in association with others of like disposition.'[1]

Whatever the intention of the drafters of FC s 31 may have been, the right to form, to join and to maintain cultural, religious and linguistic associations must be understood to be a subset of the right to freedom of association, FC s 18. As I have written elsewhere in this work, FC s 18 has a four-fold purpose. First, associational rights are correlative: they make good the promise of other rights and freedoms. Second, associational rights take our constitutive attachments seriously: they recognize the centrality of associations for the formation and the maintenance of individual identity. Third, associational rights enable us to determine an association's membership policies, internal affairs and expulsion procedures: they thereby prevent the capture — the hostile takeover — of those associations that we deem central to our identity. Fourth, associational rights justify disassociation: compelled or forced association is incompatible with the dictates of an open and democratic society.

The golden thread running through all four justifications for associational freedom is social capital. Social capital is a necessary consequence of our collective efforts to build and to fortify the things that matter to us. It is our collective grit and elbow grease, our relationships and their constantly re-affirmed vows. Social capital consists both of the instrumental networks that flow from collective efforts, and of the intrinsic ethical goods — trust, respect, loyalty, care, empathy and commitment — that also flow from such collective efforts.

Social capital links up the four justifications for the protection of associational life in the following manner. Social capital — qua correlative associational rights — is what keeps our intimate, economic, political, cultural, traditional, linguistic, union and religious associations going. Without it, nothing works. Social capital — qua constitutive attachments — recognizes that we store the better part of our meaning in involuntary associations. Squander that social capital, and nothing that matters is. Social capital — qua capture — recognizes that the dominant rationale for ceding control over membership, internal affairs and expulsion to associations is the only way to protect the real property and the figurative property that associations create. For if anyone can claim ownership in and of an association, then no one owns it and no one will take care of it. Finally, social capital takes seriously the threat of various kinds of compelled association. Trust, respect, empathy, care and loyalty — the essence of social capital — have no meaning where association is coerced.[1]

[1] Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 23-27.

The Constitutional Court captures much of what is at stake in associational matters — be they intimate, religious, cultural or linguistic — when it writes:

> A democratic, universalistic, caring and aspirationally egalitarian society embraces everyone and accepts people for who they are. To penalise people for being who and what they are is profoundly disrespectful of the human personality and violatory of equality. Equality means equal concern and respect across difference. It does not presuppose the elimination or suppression of difference. Respect for human rights requires the affirmation of self, not the denial of self. Equality therefore does not imply a levelling or homogenisation of behaviour or extolling one form as supreme, and another as inferior, but an acknowledgment and acceptance of difference. At the very least, it affirms that difference should not be the basis for exclusion, marginalisation and stigma. At best, it celebrates the vitality that difference brings to any society. The issue goes well beyond assumptions of heterosexual exclusivity, a source of contention in the present case. The acknowledgment and acceptance of difference is particularly important in our country where for centuries group membership based on supposed biological characteristics such as skin colour has been the express basis of advantage and disadvantage. South Africans come in all shapes and sizes. The development of an active rather than a purely formal sense of enjoying a common citizenship depends on recognising and accepting people with all their differences, as they are. The Constitution thus acknowledges the variability of human beings (genetic and socio-cultural), affirms the right to be different, and celebrates the diversity of the nation. Accordingly, what is at stake is not simply a question of removing an injustice experienced by a particular section of the community. At issue is a need to affirm the very character of our society as one based on tolerance and mutual respect. The test of tolerance is not how one finds space for people with whom, and practices with which, one feels comfortable, but how one accommodates the expression of what is discomfiting. As was said by this Court in Christian Education, there are a number of constitutional provisions that underline the constitutional value of acknowledging diversity and pluralism in our society, and give a particular texture to the broadly phrased right to freedom of association contained in s 18. Taken together, they affirm the right of people to self-expression without being forced to subordinate themselves to the cultural and religious norms of others, and highlight the importance of individuals and communities being able to enjoy what has been called the 'right to be different'. In each case, space has been found for members of communities to depart from a majoritarian norm. The point was made in Christian Education that these provisions collectively and separately acknowledge the rich tapestry constituted by civil society, indicating in particular that language, culture and religion constitute a strong weave in the overall pattern. For > present purposes it needs to be added that acknowledgment of the diversity that flows from different forms of sexual orientation will provide an extra and distinctive thread to the national tapestry. The strength of the nation envisaged by the Constitution comes from its capacity to embrace all its members with dignity and respect.[1]

[1] See S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 44.1*(c)*. For more on social capital, see R Putnam Bowling Alone: The Collapse and Revival of American Community (2000); R Putnam Making Democracy Work: Civic Traditions in Modern Italy (1993); P Bordieu 'Forms of Capital' in JC Richards (ed) Handbook of Theory and Research for the Sociology of Education (1986) 241.

The holding in Fourie is equally critical for our understanding of the rights that religious communities possess with respect to the exclusion of non-members or the expulsion of non-rule following members. The Fourie Court found that while the state may not enforce laws that patently discriminate against homosexual life partners who wish to marry, religious communities are entitled to refuse to consecrate homosexual unions where homosexual marriage is proscribed by religious law. The holding signals a significant victory for religious communities whose mores might not be on all fours with the values articulated in the Final Constitution.

As I note in greater detail below, the Supreme Court of Appeal recognized that a linguistic community — Afrikaans-speakers — could, under very narrow circumstance, legitimately exclude non-Afrikaans speakers from a public primary school.[2] In Western Cape Minister of Education & Others v Governing Body of Mikro Primary School, the Supreme Court of Appeal held that FC s 29(2) could not be 'interpreted to mean that everyone had the right to receive education in the official language of his or her choice at each and every public educational institution where this was reasonably practicable.'[3] As a result, the school governing body had the right to exclude non-Afrikaans-speaking learners where another public school in close proximity could cater for the preferred language of instruction of the non-Afrikaans-speaking students.

But Mikro and Fourie, as important as they may be, do not reflect the extent to which our basic law will favour egalitarian concerns over associational rights. Where an applicant's challenge has been grounded in FC s 31(1)(b), FC s 31(1)(a), FC s 15, FC s 18 or FC s 29, the courts have not, on balance, demonstrated significant solicitude for cultural, religious and linguistic associations. In Prince, Rastafarians found that the state's general commitment to the safety of the commonweal trumped their sacramental use of cannabis.[4] In Christian Education, parents found that the state's interest in eliminating corporal punishment trumped the right to punish learners in a manner consistent with religious dictates.[5] Both

[1] Fourie (supra) at paras 60-61.

[2] The Western Cape Minister of Education & Others v The Governing Body of Mikro Primary School 2006 (1) SA 1 (SCA), 2005 (10) BCLR 973 (SCA)('Mikro'). See also Governing Body of Mikro Primary School v Western Cape Minister of Education [2005] 2 All SA 37 (C).

[3] Mikro (supra) at para 30.

[4] See also Prince v President of the Law Society of the Cape of Good Hope 2001 (2) SA 388 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 133 (CC)('Prince').

[5] 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 1051 (CC)('Christian Education').

cases suggest that religious, cultural or linguistic difference will only be tolerated where such differences are not deemed to be a threat to the basic law's commitments to equality, to dignity and to the promotion of the common good.

58.5 FC s 30

(a) Content of FC s 30

IC s 31 represented the Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights sole attempt to engage vexed questions of language and culture. It read as follows: 'Every person shall have the right to use the language and to participate in the cultural life of his or her choice.'

IC s 31's grant of an individual right to non-interference in aspects of culture and language accomplished two things. First, it guaranteed a right to participation in cultural life even where that participation might be against the wishes of the particular community practising that culture.[1] Second, it protected individual interests in the maintenance of cultural life.[2]

The phrasing of IC s 31 left it unclear as to whether the right could ground claims for the protection of cultural communities and linguistic communities in toto. FC s 31 constitutes a full-blown right of cultural, linguistic and religious communities to a significant degree of tolerance for the practices of those communities. It has thereby made disputes about the ambit of IC s 31 — and its successor FC s 30 — largely academic.

Indeed, given the work FC s 31 now does with respect to the protection and the promotion of communal interests in culture, religion and language, one might well ask what, if anything, remains for FC s 30 to do. The individual right to maintain membership within a particular cultural community or to use a language of one's choice has been made superfluous by FC s 31's rights to form cultural associations and to use a language in community with others.

However, it is possible (rather easy, in fact) to conceive of an individual interest in using a language or belonging to a cultural community that is not, at the same time, an interest shared by other speakers of the language or other members of a cultural community. Bhe pits the individual interests of the female members of the Bhe family (and other similarly situated women) in securing an equal share of the deceased's estate against the (alleged) communal interest in maintaining the rule of male primogeniture.[1] Taylor pits the individual's right to continued participation in community life against the right of the community to determine the rules which govern the community and thus the rules which membership within the community.[2] Both Martinez[3] and Lovelace[4] pit the rights of female members of a traditional community to equal treatment against the right of a traditional community to maintain customs that discriminate against particular classes of person within the community. Courts here and abroad have recognized the competing claims and split down the middle as to whose claim should be afforded primacy of place.

[1] FC s 30 looks to be the equivalent of article 15 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (1966). Article 15 provides that 'The States Parties to the present Covenant recognize the right of everyone: (a) to take part in cultural life.'

[2] Christian Education (supra) at para 23 ('[L]anguage rights and rights of belief are first spelt out fully as individual rights in ss 15 and 30, even though they have a community dimension and are frequently exercised in a community setting.') See also Mhlekwa v Head of The Western Tembuland Regional Authority & Another; Feni v Head of The Western Tembuland Regional Authority And Another 2001 (1) SA 574 (Tk)(Court found that the right to language and culture in terms of FC s 30 gives individual the right to choose to be part of a culture, and persons could choose to forfeit another entrenched right in the Bill of Rights in exercising that right to culture.)

FC s 30 provides a partial answer to the question as to whether individuals may be excluded, entirely or partially, from participation within the linguistic and the cultural communities of which they are a part. As I have argued above, continued individual membership in a religious denomination, a linguistic group or cultural association is parasitic upon the continued existence of the particular faith, language or culture in question. The converse is not true. The continued existence of a particular faith, language or culture in question is not — as a general matter — contingent upon the continued membership of any given individual. As a result, while FC s 31 protects the interests of the community, FC s 30 ensures that individuals retain the right to participate within the cultural and the linguistic communities to which they belong. So although FC s 30 may look, at first blush, like a free exercise clause for language and culture, the robust role played by FC s 31 makes such an additional guarantee redundant. What is unique about FC s 30 — and what may distinguish it from all other rights in Chapter 2 — is that its primary purpose is to regulate the horizontal relationships between individuals and other members of linguistic and cultural communities. It is, in other words, concerned less with 'state' action, than it is with 'private' action.

In order for religious, cultural and linguistic communities to be able to create and to maintain the institutions that enable them to flourish, they must be able to control the conditions and the rules that govern entrance, membership, voice and exit within the community.[5] However, such rules must, as the courts have been quick to note, conform, to basic conditions of fairness. That is, just as FC s 18 and FC s 31 afford religious, cultural and linguistic communities the right to establish the conditions for inclusion and exclusion, FC s 30 vouchsafes an individual's right to some degree of procedural fairness when a community enforces its membership and expulsion rules.

A significant body of High Court decisions supports the proposition that the right of an association — cultural, linguistic, religious or otherwise — to expel a member who fails to adhere to the rules of the association is subject to two

[1] Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).
[2] Taylor v Kurtstag 2005 (1) SA 362 (W), 2005 (7) BCLR 705 (W), [2004] 4 All SA 317 (W)('Taylor').
[3] Santa Clara Pueblo v Martinez 436 US 49, 83 (1978) and Martinez v Santa Clara Pueblo 540 F2d 1039, 1042 (10th Cir 1976).
[4] Lovelace v Canada Communication No R.6/24, U.N. Doc. Supp. No. 40 (A/36/40)(1981).
[5] See Woolman 'Association' (supra) at § 44.1*(c)*.

provisos. The first proviso is that the community or association in question must make clear what requirements are to be followed by the community member prior to, or sometime during, her admission into the community. The second proviso is that a member of the community facing expulsion must receive a fair hearing from the community in question.[1] Again, FC s 30's emphasis on the right of a member to participate in the affairs of her community is not made redundant by FC s 31 if FC s 30 is understood to stand for the proposition that a person retains a rebuttable presumption of membership within the linguistic or the cultural community to which she has, historically, belonged.

(b) Internal limitations on FC s 30

The Courts have not, as yet, had an opportunity to consider the purpose of the internal limitation found within FC s 30. However, given that the structure of this internal limitation clause is virtually identical to that found in FC s 31(2), there is no reason to believe that the analysis ought to be different. As noted above, the Final Constitution makes it clear that an individual's cultural or linguistic practices enjoy constitutional protection only where they do not limit the exercise of other fundamental rights. However, this proposition does not mean that the other substantive rights in Chapter 2 cannot be read in a manner that actually supports cultural and linguistic concerns.[2] That is, rights to equality, dignity, life, privacy, expression, association and assembly, properly understood, may, in fact, buttress FC s 30 claims rather than undermine them.

58.6 Relationship Between Internal Limitations Clauses in FC ss 30 and 31 and the General Limitations Clause in FC s 36

Two things must be said about the Constitutional Court's general failure to recognize the purpose of the internal limitation clauses found in FC s 30 and FC s 31(2). First, it could simply be attributable to a lack of analytic precision. Second, it really does pay to understand how the internal limitations clauses in FC s 30 and FC s 31 and the general limitations clause in FC s 36 relate to one another should the Court ever decide to engage this troika.

The three clauses relate to one another in the following fashion. A right to community religious, linguistic and cultural practice (and thus the practice itself) could (a) be deemed consistent with the other rights in Chapter 2 and (b) still be impaired by the law in question. (The existing case law suggests — correctly — that the most likely grounds for a finding that a community practice is inconsistent and subordinate to another substantive provision in the Bill of Rights are to be found in FC s 9 — equality[1] — and FC s 10 — dignity.[2]) If the practice is protected by FC s 30 or FC s 31 and impaired by law of general application, then the analysis would proceed to FC s 36. The party relying upon the law challenged in terms of FC s 30 or FC s 31 would have the opportunity to demonstrate that another set of interests or values — not expressly manifest in the specific substantive rights and freedoms of Chapter 2 — justified the infringement of FC s 30 and FC s 31. (Remember: it would have to be 'another set of interests or values' because the cultural, linguistic or religious practice in question has already been deemed consistent with the entire body of substantive rights found in Chapter 2.) In terms of this restricted FC s 36 analysis, the grounds most likely to result in a finding by a court that a limitation of FC s 30 or FC s 31 is warranted are: (a) the protection of the general welfare (and the protection of public order, health or morals);[3] (b) the rights of other religious, cultural and linguistic groups to form robust associations and communities;[4] and (c) the promotion of national unity and greater social cohesion.[5]

[1] See Taylor (supra); Cronje v United Cricket Board of South Africa 2001 (4) SA 1361 (T)('Cronje'); Ward v Cape Peninsula Ice Skating Club 1998 (2) SA 487 (C)('Ward'); Wittmann v Deutscher Schulverein, Pretoria, & Others 1998 (4) SA 423 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T)('Wittmann'). As the Taylor court notes, the potential for exclusion is part of the consideration that the member offers in return for admittance. See Taylor (supra) at para 37 quoting S Woolman 'Association' (supra) at § 44.3*(c)*(viii).

[2] For more on the internal limitations clause found in FC 31(2), see § 58.4*(b)* supra.

57.7 FC s 29

It should come as no surprise that a good amount of the constitutional litigation surrounding cultural, religious and linguistic communities has taken place in terms

[1] Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).

[2] Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC).

[3] Prince v President, Cape Law Society, & Others 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC); S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg 1997 (4) SA 1176 (CC), 1997 (2) SACR 540 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC). Article 18(3) of the ICCPR provides that '. . .[f]reedom to manifest ones religion or beliefs may be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary to protect public safety, order, health, or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others.' For example, the practice known as female circumcision, widespread in parts of Africa, is often opposed on the grounds that it constitutes a serious threat to the health of those subjected to it. See K Engle 'Female Subjects of Public International Law: Human Rights and the Exotic Other Female' (1992) 26 New England LR 1509, 1513-1515 (Offers an outline and critique of this argument.)

[4] Many international documents recognize that community rights may conflict and that the resolution of such conflicts is an essential factor for peace, justice, stability and democracy. See, eg, The Document of the Copenhagen Meeting of the Conference on the Human Dimension of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE)(June 29 1990) at para 30 reprinted in (1990) 29 ILM 1305; The Preamble to the UN Declaration on the Rights of Persons Belonging to National or Ethnic, Religious or Linguistic Minorities, GA Res 47/135 (18 December 1992)('[T]he promotion and protection of the rights of persons belonging to minorities contributes to the political and social stability of the States in which they live. The UN Human Rights Committee has found that limitations on an individuals right of enjoyment of her culture FC s 30 for our purposes may be permissible where they are designed to protect the existence or identity of a a minority population FC s 31 for our purposes.') of the autonomy that the basic law grants to independent schools and public schools. Communities of every kind place the greatest emphasis on such autonomy because schools are, outside of the home, one of the primary places where cultural, religious and linguistic communities can consciously replicate themselves. The basic law takes cognizance of the central role that independent schools and public schools play in advancing the ends of cultural, religious and linguistic communities by expressly describing the degree of autonomy that cultural, religious and linguistic communities will receive with respect to each kind of school: independent schools in FC s 29(3) and public schools in FC s 29(2).

[5] Given the depredations of apartheid, the obvious need for the state to pass laws and other measures designed to repair the divisions of the past may ground FC s 36 arguments that justify the limitation of community rights.

(a) FC s 29(3) and independent schools that further the ends of cultural, religious and linguistic communities

The Final Constitution and apposite statutes ensure that independent schools — along with their learners, parents, educators and school governing bodies (SGBs) — enjoy a substantial degree of autonomy.[1] In Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In Re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995, Kriegler J wrote, on behalf of a unanimous Constitutional Court, that IC s 32*(c)*[2] and then extant national and provincial education legislation and subordinate legislation collectively constituted > a bulwark against the swamping of any minority's common culture, language or religion. For as long as a minority actually guards its common heritage, for so long will it be its inalienable right to establish educational institutions for the preservation of its culture, language or religion … There are, however, two important qualifications. Firstly, … there must be no discrimination on the ground of race … A common culture, language or religion having racism as an essential element has no constitutional claim to the establishment of separate educational institutions. The Constitution protects diversity, not racial discrimination. Secondly, [the Constitution] keeps the door open for those for whom the State's educational institutions are considered inadequate as far as common culture, language or religion is concerned. They are at liberty harmoniously to preserve the heritage of their fathers for their children. But there is a price, namely that such a population group will have to dig into its own pocket.[3]

[1] See S Woolman 'Defending Discrimination: On the Constitutionality of Independent Schools that Promote a Particular, if not Comprehensive, Vision of the Good Life' (2007) 22 Stellenbosch Law Review 31; B Fleisch & S Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of School Fees: A Reply to Roithmayr' (2004) 22 (1) Perspectives in Education 111; S Woolman & B Fleisch 'South Africa's Education Legislation, Quasi-Markets and School Choice' (2006) 24 (2) Perspectives in Education 1.

[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').

[3] Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC)('Gauteng School Education Bill') at paras 39-42. Section 23 of the Constitution of the Netherlands guarantees the right of all people to establish schools with their own funds and, in practice, has been understood to secure the support of the state for such private initiatives. See C Bakker & I Ter Averst 'School Ethos and its Religious Dimension' (2005) 89 Sciptura 350.

Kriegler J's gloss on the constitutional protection afforded independent schools grounded in a common culture, language or religion was certainly correct in 1996. Other laws, of more recent vintage, buttress Kriegler J's claims. FC s 29(3) reads:

> Everyone has the right to establish and maintain, at their own expense, independent educational institutions that (a) do not discriminate on the basis of race; (b) are registered with the state; and (c) maintain standards that are not inferior to standards at comparable public educational institutions.

The language of FC s 29(3) suggests that independent schools possess substantially more latitude than public schools with respect to their admissions requirements and the manner in which they order their internal affairs. FC s 29(3)'s only noteworthy intervention is to bar independent schools from discriminating on the basis of race. Similarly, the South African Schools Act ('SASA') does not make the registration — and the continued accreditation — of independent schools contingent upon the conformation of admissions policies or of curriculum with specific equity requirements. It, too, only bars independent schools from discriminating on the basis of race.[1]

That said, the statutory framework that governs admissions to or expulsions from independent schools has quietly shifted in the last ten years. The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act applies to private institutions: it expands the prohibited grounds for discrimination and develops a test for unfair discrimination that appears, at least at first blush, to be stricter than the test developed by the Constitutional Court under FC s 9.

According to PEPUDA, no person — public or private — may discriminate in a manner that imposes, directly or indirectly, burdens upon, and withholds, directly or indirectly, benefits from any person on prohibited grounds.[2] According to PEPUDA, a prima facie demonstration of discrimination on a prohibited ground shifts the burden to the respondent to show that the discriminatory law, rule or conduct is fair.[3]

[1] While no mention of admissions policies is made in these regulations, the enabling provision for these regulations in SASA states that 'a provincial Head of Department must register an independent school if he or she is satisfied that . . . the admission policy of the school does not discriminate on the grounds of race'. SASA s 46(3)(b).

[2] See PEPUDA, s 1, 'discrimination' means 'any act or omission, including a policy, law, rule, practice, condition or situation which directly or indirectly imposes burdens, obligations or disadvantage on; or (b) withholds benefits, opportunities or advantages from, any person on one or more of the prohibited grounds. Prohibited grounds are race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth'. (Emphasis added).

[3] See PEPUDA, s 13, 'if the discrimination did take place on a ground in paragraph (a) of the definition of prohibited grounds, then it is unfair, unless the respondent proves that the discrimination is fair.'

An Equality Court hearing a PEPUDA challenge to admissions policies at an independent school will likely find a school's rejection of a learner, because she refuses to take religion, language or culture classes, to constitute 'discrimination'. That initial finding does not, of course, mean that the Equality Court is obliged to find that the practice constitutes unfair discrimination. PEPUDA anticipates expressly the requisite grounds for justification of discrimination. PEPUDA, s 14(3), states that fair discrimination may occur where the respondent can demonstrate that: '(f) … the discrimination has a legitimate purpose; [and] (g) … the … discrimination achieves its purpose'.

An independent school will first have to show that the set of religious, linguistic or cultural practices that form the basis for its narrow admission's policies offer a coherent account of the religion, language or culture ostensibly being advanced. Most independent schools that have the furtherance of religion, culture or language as an end should be able to meet this test for 'legitimate purpose'.

The next leg of the test is somewhat more onerous. Once a legitimate purpose is established, the question becomes whether the discriminatory admissions policy is necessary to achieve the school's purpose of offering an education grounded in a particular, faith, language or culture. One argument is that an independent school committed to the furtherance of a particular religion, language or culture needs to be able to control its message and that such control requires it to have relatively unfettered control over admissions practices and the management of their internal affairs. How strict can such exclusionary admissions policies or internal policing of curriculum requirements be?

At a minimum, any learner must agree to adhere to the curriculum of the school — at least in so far as it requires specific forms of religious, linguistic or cultural instruction. After all, if the purpose of the school is to further a given religion, language or culture, then the curriculum must be designed to advance that religion, language or culture. If the curriculum is essential for the achievement of the school's legitimate purpose, then the exclusionary rule that justifies a learner's expulsion (or non-admittance) should she refuse to accede to the curriculum's requirements must be viewed as a measure that — while discriminatory — is narrowly tailored to meet the legitimate purpose.[1]

In making their PEPUDA arguments, independent schools can draw down on a diverse array of constitutional provisions, constitutional doctrine and common law rules. For starters, FC ss 15, 18, 29, 30 and 31 — read together — underscore the prima facie justifiability of exclusionary admissions policies or of expulsion policies for curriculum non-compliance. As Van Dijkhorst J noted in Wittmann v Deutsche Schulverein, Pretoria, the right to education guarantees that members of a religious, linguistic or cultural community may 'establish their own [private or independent] educational institutions based on their own values.'[1] He then held that the right to create these independent schools is parasitic upon 'the right … to exclude non-users of that language and non-adherents of that culture or religion, or to require from them conformity.'[2] In sum, recent constitutional case law supports the contention that independent religious, cultural and language specific schools have the right both to expel learners who agree to follow the rules or decisions of the association's governing body and subsequently refuse to do so. More general or communitarian considerations — arguments from capture,[3] constitutive attachment,[4] and pluralism[5] — support the argument that members of a given community have an obligation to 'follow

[1] Fourie (supra) at paras 90-98.

[1] 1998 4 SA 423, 454 (T).

[2] Ibid at 454. See also Taylor(supra) at para 38. (The right of a group to choose their associates of necessity means the right to require those who wish to join the group to conform their behaviour to certain dictates, and the right to exclude those who refuse to conform.)

[3] Capture is a function of one might even say a necessary and logical consequence of the very structure of associational and community life. In short, capture justifies the ability of associations and communities to control their association or community through selective membership policies, the manner in which they order their internal affairs and the discharge of members or users. Without the capacity to police their membership and expulsion policies, as well as their internal affairs, associations would face two related threats. First, an association would be at risk of having its aims substantially altered. Without built-in limitations on the process of determining the ends of the community or the association, new members, existing members and even outside parties could easily distort the purpose, the character and the function of the association. Second, an associations or a community's very existence could be at risk. Individuals, other groups, or a state inimical to the values of an association or a community could use ease of entrance to put that same association or community out of business. See Woolman 'Association' (supra) at 44.1*(c)*.

[4] Associational freedom is often justified on the ground that it enables individuals to exercise relatively unfettered control over the various relationships and practices deemed critical to their self-understanding. But individual autonomy as the basis for associational freedom overemphasizes dramatically the actual space for self-defining choices. As I have maintained elsewhere, each self is best understood as just a centre of narrative gravity that unifies a set of dispositional states that draw down on the practices of the various communities — religious, cultural, linguistic, national, familial, ethnic, economic, sexual, racial, social (and so on) – into which that self is born. This view of the self supports some pretty straightforward conclusions about community rights in the context of independent schools. Freedom of association, freedom of religion and community rights, correctly understood, force us to attend to the arationality of our most basic attachments and to think twice before we accord our arational attachments preferred status to the arational attachments of others. These observations regarding constitutive attachments buttress my contention that independent educational institutions that pursue a particular way of being in the world ought to be able to exclude from the institution those learners who do not derive meaning from that way of being in the world, and whose presence, in significant numbers, would make the institution, qua religious, linguistic or cultural school, impossible to sustain. See Woolman 'Association' (supra) at § 44.1*(b)*.

[5] If we accept that the practice of religion, the use of a language, the participation in cultural life are legitimate, constitutionally-sanctioned objectives, then discrimination narrowly tailored to meet those objectives must be able to pass constitutional muster. The alternative proposition that no educational institution may discriminate on the basis of religion, language and culture makes the possibility of sustaining, in South Africa, a diverse array of religious, linguistic and cultural communities an empirical impossibility.

the rules' should they wish to remain members of the community.[1] As I noted above, the extant common law on associational rights supports the proposition that independent schools designed to support a religion, a culture or a language possess a significant degree of latitude with respect to admissions policies that differentiate between adherents and non-adherents.[2] And finally, a decade after Gauteng School Education Bill, we have seen the Constitutional Court re-confirm its commitment to the autonomy of religious, linguistic and cultural communities in Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project v Minister of Home Affairs.

These various strands of our law support a couple of fairly straightforward conclusions about the degree of constitutional and statutory autonomy granted independent schools that advance the ends of particular religious, cultural and linguistic communities. Say, for example, that an independent school wishes to provide a Jewish education for Jewish children and employs an admissions policy that discriminates between applicants on the basis of their willingness to adhere to a curriculum that requires both Hebrew and Talmudic instruction. The first reason we can easily defend such discrimination is that it furthers the legitimate religious objectives of the independent school and does so by way of means narrowly tailored to meet those objectives.[3] The second reason we can easily

[1] South African courts have engaged associational rights, communitarian rights and fair hearings in four relatively recent cases. See Taylor v Kurtstag [2004] 4 All SA 317 (W)('Taylor'), Cronje v United Cricket Board of South Africa 2001 (4) SA 1361 (T)('Cronje'), Ward v Cape Peninsula Ice Skating Club 1998 (2) SA 487 (C)('Ward'), Wittmann v Deutscher Schulverein, Pretoria, & Others 1998 (4) SA 423 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T) ('Wittmann'). All four cases can be read as standing for the proposition that a member has vested interests in the association that, at a minimum, require a fair termination hearing. A non-member, on the other hand, possesses no such rights.

[2] For more on the common law right of an association to protect its critical purposes from both internal and external interference, see *Mitchell's Plain Town Centre Merchants Association v Mcleod and Another*1996 4 SA 159, 166 (A) citing Total South Africa (Pty) Ltd v Bekker 1992 1 SA 617, 624 (A)(Emphasis added.) For more on the common law right of an association to protect its critical purposes from alteration by internal and external forces, see Murray v SA Tattersalls Subscription Rooms 1910 TH 35, 41; Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk in Afrika (Ovs) En 'n Ander v Verenigende Gereformeerde Kerk in Suider-Afrika. 1999 2 SA 156 (SCA)(Supreme Court of Appeal held that the decision of the general synod of the NGKA to merge with the NGSK, and the intermediate steps leading up to the merger, conflicted with the clear and unambiguous wording of the constitution and vitiated, without the requisite authority (unanimity of the regional synods), the fundamental objectives of the association.)

[3] For a reading of FC s 29 in which religious, linguistic and cultural communities are entitled to significant degrees of autonomy in the context of maintaining independent primary and secondary schools, see S Woolman 'Defending Discrimination: On the Constitutionalality of Independent Schools that Promote a Partial, if not Comprehensive, Vision of the Good Life' (2007) 22 Stellenbosch Law Review 31. See also R Malherbe 'The Constitutional Framework for Pursuing Equal Opportunities in Education' (2004) 22 (3) Perspectives in Education 9. For more on the challenges that other ethnically diverse societies face in accommodating religious, cultural and linguistic difference, see J De Groof & G Lauwers 'Education Policy and Law: The Politics of Multiculturalism in Education' (2001) 19(4) Perspectives in Education 47.

defend such discrimination is that neither the school's curriculum nor any exclusion based upon a refusal of the learner to follow the school's curriculum constitutes an impairment of the learner's dignity. Why? The learner can secure access to an adequate independent school education elsewhere. Because most learners in a position to pay for an independent school can receive an adequate independent school education elsewhere, it is difficult to construe the refusal of admission — based upon the learner's own refusal to accept the curriculum as an essential part of her matriculation at the school — as a diminution of the learner's dignity.[1]

(b) FC s 29(2) and the right to maintain public schools that further the ends of cultural, religious and linguistic communities

The real action, in so far as religious, linguistic and cultural communities are concerned, revolves around FC s 29(2). FC s 29(2) asks and answers the following question of moment: Does a public school that wishes to provide a single medium education in Afrikaans possess a constitutional right to employ an admissions policy that discriminates between applicants on the basis of their willingness to adhere to a curriculum that requires that all classes be taken in Afrikaans? The answer to that question is, generally, no. As we shall see, however, both the text of the Final Constitution and the case law recognize a very narrow set of conditions within which an entitlement to such a school may be legitimately asserted.

FC s 29(2) is a complex provision. It reads:

> Everyone has the right to receive education in the official language or languages of their choice in public educational institutions where that education is reasonably practicable. In order to ensure the effective access to, and implementation of, this right, the state must consider all reasonable educational alternatives, including single medium institutions, taking into account:
> (a) equity;
> (b) practicability; and
> (c) the need to redress the results of past racially discriminatory laws and practices.

It is possible to identify two interpretive poles for this passage. At one end of the spectrum, some commentators contend that FC s 29(2) eliminates any express entitlement for single-medium public schools except where such schools offer redress for communities whose mother tongues were repressed under English and Afrikaaner rule. At the other end of the spectrum, several commentators contend that FC s 29(2) vouchsafes continued state support for all single-medium public schools, and, in particular, single-medium Afrikaans schools.

FC s 29(2) does not support either of these two readings.

[1] But see Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC)(Court found that while provisions in SASA that barred the use of corporal punishment constituted prima facie infringements of an independent school's FC s 15 and FC s 31 rights, the learners' right to dignity trumped the school's right to freedom of religion and its communal right to practice its religion.)

Let's begin with the uncompromisingly egalitarian position defended by Blade Nzimande.[1] Nzimande construes FC s 29(2)'s second sentence requirements as matters of administration and policy, and not constitutional law. Though FC s 29(2)'s second sentence may provide a rather weak test for justification, it does not turn the choice of medium of instruction into a matter of mere policy preference. Moreover, FC s 29(2) does not, as Matthew Chaskalson has suggested of IC 32, possess the structure of an affirmative action provision.[2] FC s 9(2) provides the perfect example of a constitutional norm whose aim is restitutionary justice.[3] Whereas FC s 9(2) differentiates between groups that have been historically disadvantaged and those that have not, FC s 29(2) does not do so. Single-medium public schools could be approved for any preferred language of instruction so long as instruction in a preferred language is reasonably practicable, and the single-medium public school, as the best means of accommodating such instruction, satisfied the three threshold criteria of equity, practicability and redress. The Final Constitution, as a liberal political document, does not view all social, legal and economic arrangements through the prism of equality and reparations.

Commentators such as Rassie Malherbe, occupying the opposite end of the ideological and interpretative spectrum, contend that FC s 29(2) provides a strong guarantee — a rebuttable presumption — that linguistic communities can create and maintain publicly funded single-medium public schools.[4] Malherbe misreads FC s 29(2). In particular, he repeatedly collapses the distinction between the right to instruction in a mother tongue or preferred language (where practicable) with the obligation imposed upon the state to consider a range of options as to how to offer such instruction. Malherbe privileges single-medium public schools.[5] FC s 29(2) does not. It mentions single-medium schools as only one in a range of alternatives that the state has an obligation to consider. Moreover, any option considered by the state for delivering mother-tongue instruction — one of which is single-medium schooling — must satisfy, to some degree, the three criteria of equity, practicability and historical redress. Malherbe characterizes the three FC s 29(2) criteria as mere factors to be considered in some global proportionality assessment. This characterization of the three criteria seems far too weak. For a single-medium public school to be preferred to another reasonably practicable

[1] B Nzimande 'Address to the Constitutional Assembly' 7 May 1996 (1996), available at www.polity.co.za (accessed on 1 December 2006).

[2] M Chaskalson 'Constitutional Issues Relevant to School Ownership, Governance and Finance Paper Presented at the Durban Education Conference' (1995) 8-9 (Manuscript on file with author).

[3] Minister of Finance v Van Heerden 2004 (6) SA 121(CC), 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC).

[4] See R Mahlerbe 'The Constitutional Framework for Pursuing Equal Opportunities in Education' (2004) 22(3) Perspectives in Education 9 ('Constitutional Framework'); R Malherbe 'A Fresh Start: Education Rights in South Africa' (2000) 4 European Journal for Education Law and Policy 49; R Malherbe 'Submission to President Nelson Mandela on Behalf of a Group of Afrikaans Organizations' (15 May 1996).

[5] Malherbe 'Constitutional Framework' (supra) at 21.

institutional arrangement — say dual medium instruction or parallel medium instruction — it must demonstrate that it is more likely to advance or to satisfy the three criteria. Malherbe further claims that because the Final Constitution specifically refers to 'single medium institutions' then 'whenever they [single medium institutions] are found to be the most effective way to fulfill the right to education in one's preferred language, single medium institutions should be the first option.'[1] Once again, because Malherbe collapses the distinction between mother-tongue instruction and single medium public schools, he fails to recognize that the right to the former — mother-tongue instruction — is subject to 'practicability' and the derivative or secondary 'privilege' of the latter — a single medium public school — can only be a 'first option' for mother-tongue instruction if it meets the three threshold criteria of equity, practicality and redress. Finally, that Malherbe's interest in protecting single medium public schools leads him to misread FC s 29(2) in its entirety is made patently clear from his final claim that the 'right to education in one's preferred language is guaranteed unequivocally in the South African Bill of Rights.'[2] This statement is clearly false. As the above language of FC s 29(2) indicates, the right to receive education in the official language or languages of [one's] choice in public educational institutions' is subject to a powerful internal modifier — namely, the right exists only where the provision of 'that education is reasonably practicable.'[3]

[1] Malherbe 'Constitutional Framework' (supra) at 22.

[2] Ibid.

[3] For another reading of FC s 29(2) that falls somewhere between the Nzimande position and the Malherbe position, see G Bekker 'The Right to Education in the South African Constitution' Centre for Human Rights Socio-Economic Rights Papers, available at http://www.chr.up.ac.za/centre_projects/socio/compilation2part1.html (accessed 12 December 2006.) Bekker writes:

> The Constitution does not guarantee mother-tongue education for minorities, as does for example section 23 the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The Constitution, however, guarantees the right in public institutions to education in the language of ones choice. This is limited to education in an official language or languages and is further limited by the proviso - where reasonably practicable. . . . With regard to what would be reasonably practicable, the Department of Education's Language in Education Policy provides that: it is reasonably practicable to provide education in a particular language of learning and teaching if at least 40 in Grades 1 to 6 or 35 in Grades 7 to 12 learners in a particular grade request it in a particular school. . . . This is in keeping with the internationally practised sliding scale formula: the larger the number of speakers of a language in a particular area, the greater the obligation to provide mother-tongue education in that area. . . . Furthermore, the Language in Education Policy provides that where there are fewer than the requisite number of learners that request to be taught in a particular language not already offered by a school in a particular school district, the head of the provincial department of education will determine how the needs of those learners will be met, taking into consideration the duty of the state and the right of the learners as spelled out in the Constitution. . . . The second part of section 29(2) provides that the state has to ensure effective access to and implementation of the right to education. In this regard, the State must consider all reasonable alternatives including single medium education, taking into account equity, practicability, and the need to redress the imbalances of the past. This would mean that where, for example, there are equal numbers of students seeking education in two different languages, a dual medium school might be the most equitable. Conversely, the most equitable solution might be a single medium school in cases where the majority of students wish to be educated in one particular language. However, equitability is not the only deciding factor - practicability will also have to be a taken into account. Here factors such as resources and numbers of teachers will play a role. Finally, the need to

Given this trenchant analysis, how should FC s 29(2) be parsed? FC s 29(2) should be interpreted as follows.[1]

First, FC s 29(2) grants all learners 'the right to receive education in the official language or languages of their choice in public educational institutions where that education is reasonably practicable.' Note that the right to receive education in the official language or languages of one's choice is not, as the Supreme Court of redress the imbalances of the past is emphasised. Thus, anything that will have the effect of denying or impeding the right to education of previously disadvantaged communities will also have to be taken into account.

It is not clear why, on Bekker's account, a majority of learners ought to be able to determine that a single-medium public school remains a single-medium public school. That position is not consistent with the DoEs language policy, international practice or the actual text of FC s 29(2). A single-medium public school is simply one available means to ensure preferred language instruction: it is not a right possessed by all official language speakers.

[1] For further analysis of FC s 29(2), see B Fleisch & S Woolman 'On the Constitutionality of Single-Medium Public Schools' (2007) 23 SAJHR (forthcoming).

Appeal in Mikro noted, an unqualified right. The right is subject to a standard of reasonable practicability. How should this internal limitation of the right be read?[1] It is suggested that where sufficient numbers of learners request instruction in a preferred language — and South Africa does possess regulations, as well as standards and norms, that make clear what those numbers are — and no adequate alternative school exists to provide such instruction, then a public school is under an obligation — with assistance from the state — to provide instruction in the language of choice.[2]

[1] For more on how internal limitations clauses function in various substantive provisions in the Bill of Rights, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[2] The lesson of the Supreme Court of Appeal's decision in Mikro is that where learners already have easy access to a school that offers them instruction in their preferred medium, then neither the learners nor the state has any business in forcing a single medium Afrikaans public school into becoming a dual medium or a parallel medium institution. But Mikro must also be read as creating the very narrowest of spaces for the assertion of sectarian interests in our public schools.

At issue in The Western Cape Minister of Education & Others v The Governing Body of Mikro Primary School was the refusal of an Afrikaans medium public school to accede to a request by the Western Cape Department of Education (WCDoE) to change the language policy of the school so as to convert it into a parallel medium school. Acting on behalf of 21 learners, the WCDoE had directed the primary school to offer instruction in their preferred medium: English. The WCDoE had interpreted the Norms and Standards issued by the National Department of Education under SASA as requiring all primary schools with 40 learners who preferred a particular language of learning and teaching to offer instruction in that language.

The Supreme Court of Appeal summarily rejected both the WCDoE's reading of the Norms and Standards and its gloss on FC s 29(2). It did so on three primary grounds. First, the Supreme Court of Appeal overturned Bertelsmann J's finding in Laerskool Middelburg that the Norms and Standards provided a mechanism for the alteration of the language policy of a public school. At best, the Supreme Court of Appeal said, the Norms and Standards constituted a guideline for members of the department and those parties responsible for the governance of public schools. Second, the Supreme Court of Appeal held that SASA s 6(1) granted neither the national Minister of Education nor the provincial MEC or HoD the authority to determine the language policy of a particular school, nor does SASA authorize any other person or body to do so. The power to determine language policy vests solely with the SGB of a given public school and is subject only to the Final Constitution, SASA and any applicable provincial law. Third, the Supreme Court of Appeal rejected the applicants contention that FC s 29(2) could be interpreted to mean that everyone had the right to receive education in the official language of his or her choice at each and every public educational institution where this was reasonably practicable. Mikro (supra) at para 30. Such a reading, the Mikro Court held, would mean that any significant cohort of learners could demand instruction in their preferred language if it was conceivably possible to do so. The Mikro Court noted that such a reading 'would lead to the absurd consequence that a group of Afrikaans learners would be entitled to claim [a right] to be taught in Afrikaans at an English medium school immediately adjacent to an Afrikaans medium school which has vacant capacity provided they can prove that it would be reasonably practicable to provide education in Afrikaans at that school'. Ibid. The Supreme Court of Appeal held that the correct reading of FC s 29(2) affords the state significant latitude in deciding how best to implement this right and that FC s 29(2) grants everyone a right to be educated in an official language of his or her choice at a public educational institution if, in the totality of circumstances, it is reasonably practicable to do so. That means, of course, that the right is only to language instruction, generally, and, thus to instruction at some school within an accessible geographical domain, and not, as the applicants had claimed, to language instruction at each and every public educational institution and thus to any school the applicants wished to attend.

The decision is notable in two important respects. First, it diminishes, under current law, the ability of the state to determine admissions policy with regard to language. Such power continues to vest in the Second, before proceeding to the second sentence in FC s 29(2), it is worth taking another look at the meaning of 'reasonably practicable'. As an evidentiary matter, the learner or the learners or the state must be able to show that instruction in the language of choice is 'reasonably practicable' at the institution where the learners have applied for admission. So, for example, a single learner who requests instruction in Sepedi in a single-medium isiZulu school may be hard pressed to demonstrate that it is reasonably practicable to accommodate her at a single-medium isiZulu school. An inability to establish reasonable practicability would be even more pronounced where the learner who preferred instruction in Sepedi had access to an adequate school that offered Sepedi instruction. The failure to demonstrate that a request for instruction is 'reasonably practicable' ends, as the Mikro Court found, the FC s 29(2) inquiry.

Third, assume that the learner has shown that instruction in the language of choice is reasonably practicable at the institution where she has applied for admission. Only then do we consider the import of the second sentence of FC s 29(2).

Fourth, the second sentence of FC s 29(2) states that '[i]n order to ensure the effective access to, and implementation of, this right, the state must consider all reasonable educational alternatives, including single medium institutions, taking into account: a. equity; b. practicability; and c. the need to redress the results of past racially discriminatory laws and practices.'

Fifth, the second sentence of FC s 29(2) makes it patently clear that single-medium institutions are but one way of accommodating the right of a learner to instruction in the language of choice. Moreover, the mere mention of single-medium schools in no way privileges such institutions over dual-medium schools, parallel-medium schools, or schools that accommodate the multilingualism of the student body in some other way. All that this portion of FC s 29(2) requires is that the state consider 'all reasonable educational alternatives' that would make mother tongue or preferred language instruction possible.

Sixth, even if single-medium schools are found to be one of the reasonable alternatives for preferred language instruction, the single-medium school must be able to satisfy a three factor test. That is, for a single-medium school to be preferred to another reasonably practicable institutional arrangement — say dual-medium instruction or parallel-medium instruction — it must demonstrate that it is more likely to advance or to satisfy the three listed criteria of equity, practicability and historical redress.

Seventh, FC s 29(2)'s concession to single-medium public schools constitutes a very weak right indeed. (It is, perhaps, best described as a right to have reasons or an entitlement to justification.) That said, it is not without value for proponents of single-medium public schools. What the second sentence of FC s 29(2) ultimately requires is that the state be able to justify its preference for one form of school over another. Given the Final Constitution's recognition of single-medium schools as a legitimate means of providing preferred language education, the state will find itself under an obligation to demonstrate why another form of instruction — dual-medium, parallel-medium, special tutoring — will better serve the learners in question. Moreover, the Final Constitution's recognition of community rights, associational rights, religious rights, cultural rights and linguistic rights creates a set of background conditions against which claims for single-medium schools must be taken seriously. For where preferred language instruction is reasonably practicable, and where single medium schools satisfy the desiderata of equity, practicability and historical redress, the state cannot simply invoke an overriding commitment to 'equality' or 'transformation' in order to dismantle single medium institutions. The Final Constitution is, ultimately, a post-apartheid constitution. Thus, at the same time as it sets its face against exclusion and discrimination, it also rejects apartheid's totalizing view of the state. Space remains — within both the private realm and the public realm — for the accommodation of multiple ways of being in the world. That public space, as we have seen, is extremely narrow with respect to single medium public schools. But however narrow it may be, it cannot be entirely wished away.

SGB. Second, while affirming the rights of learners to instruction in a preferred language, it simultaneously confirmed the power of individual schools to continue to offer instruction in a single medium. The effect of the Supreme Court of Appeals decision in Mikro is to reverse the spin of Laerskool Middelburg. Not only is parallel medium instruction not the default position, the current language preferences of a single medium public school may trump the policy preferences of national and provincial DoEs. It is impossible to read Mikro and not come away with the impression that linguistic associational interests may, on rare occasion trump, equity concerns, and that they may even do so in public schools.

Where does this analysis leave us? Pace Mahlerbe, FC s 29(2) provides no right to single medium public schools. At best, FC s 29(2) recognizes such schools as one option to be considered amongst a range of other institutional arrangements designed to further the instruction of learners. At best, FC s 29(2) places an obligation on the state to justify any refusal to recognize and to support single-medium public schools. Given FC s 29(2)'s commitment to equity and to historical redress, advocates of single-medium Afrikaans public schools are clearly batting on a sticky wicket.

[1] Matukane & Others v Laerskool Potgietersrus 1996 (3) SA 223 (T). At issue in Matukane & Others v Laerskool Potgietersrus was the attempt by the parent of three learners, Mr Matukane, to enroll his three children (13, 13 and 8) at the Laerskool Potgietersrus. The Laerskool Potgietersrus was then, and remains still, a state-aided parallel medium primary school.

Mr Matukane, a black resident of Potgietersrus spoke to the principal on 11 January 1996. The principal informed Mr Matukane that Mr Matukane would have to wait until 25 January 1996 for a determination as whether there was space available at the school. Mr Matukane was not convinced that any such delay was warranted. He approached the provincial Department of Education (DoE). DoE informed Mr Matukane that his children could be enrolled in the school. Mr Matukane arrived at the school on 22 January 1996, completed the necessary application forms and bought the school uniforms as directed. Mr Matukane returned the next day with his children for their first day at school. The entrance of the school was blocked by a group of white parents who refused to allow Mr Matukane or his children to enter the school. Other black parents were similarly rebuffed. On top of these indignities, the school bussed in white children from Zebidiela, a neighboring town, despite the fact that a school catering to Afrikaans-speaking students in Zebidiela had space available.

Extant case law confirms this reading of FC s 29(2). Matukane,[1] Laerskool Middelburg,[2] Seodin[3] and Ermelo[4] also confirm a number of additional critical propositions. First, discrimination on the basis of language cannot be used as a proxy for discrimination on the basis of race. Second, where learners do not have

In the High Court, Laerskool Potgietersrus argued that it was unable to accommodate more children and that it had not rejected the children on racial grounds. At the time of the hearing, Laerskool Potgietersrus had 580 Afrikaans students and 89 English students. The Laerskool Potgietersrus expressed concern that if it admitted these children, it would be swamped by English-speaking children who would destroy the Afrikaans nature of the school. The school contended that IC s 32*(c)* entitled the school to adopt admissions requirements designed to maintain the existing culture and ethos of the school.

Despite the school's assertion that the refusals were based on overcrowding, not race, the facts clearly painted a different picture. No black children had been admitted to the school. There were no black children on the waiting list. Room existed to accommodate more English-speaking children. Little danger existed of the schools Afrikaans culture and ethos being destroyed even if every black applicant were to be accepted. The ratio of Afrikaans-speaking students to English-speaking students would remain 5:1. The Matukane Court was driven to conclude that language and culture were operating as surrogates for race and that that the respondent had failed to discharge its burden of proving the fairness of its (racist) admissions policies.

[1] 2003 (4) SA 160 (T). Laerskool Middelburg en 'n ander v Departementshoof, Mpumalanga Departement van Onderwys, en andere, litigated in 2003, extends the holding in Matukane from parallel — medium to single-medium schools. However, in Laerskool Middelburg, the High Court was clearly more troubled by the conflict between the right to a single-medium school and the right to be educated in the official language of ones choice. The Laerskool Middelburg court initially rebuffed the provincial Department of Education's power-play. It held that neither SASA, nor the regulations issued under them, authorised the Head of the Department to instruct a school to change from single-medium to dual-medium tuition and declared that the Head's administrative conduct was prima facie unfair. Ibid at 171-172, 176. The Laerskool Middelburg court then rejected the Department's argument that the applicant school's admission policy discriminated unfairly against English learners. The High Court held that in circumstances in which the English learners could be accommodated elsewhere, the Department's actions simultaneously violated the FC s 29(2) entitlement of Afrikaans-speaking students to single medium public schools and the FC s 29(2) right of English-speaking students to an education in the official language of their choice in public institutions. Ibid at 173 and 175. That said, the Laerskool Middelburg court noted that the FC s 29(2) entitlement to a single — medium public educational institution was subordinate to the FC s 29(2) right of every South African to a basic education and the proven need to share education facilities with other linguistic and cultural communities. As a result, the Laerskool Middelburg court was unwilling to allow the needs of 40 English-speaking learners to be prejudiced by the state's failure to play by the rules and the schools intransigence on the issue of parallel — medium education. The Laerskool Middelburg court relied upon FC s 28(2)'s guarantee that the best interest of the child are always of paramount importance to trump the language and cultural rights of the school's Afrikaans learners. So while the state's actions had been mala fide, it was still able to secure a victory for educational equity by getting the proper parties before the court.

In deciding that the minority students must be accommodated, the Laerskool Middelburg court correctly concluded that the right to a single medium public educational institution is clearly subordinate to the right every South African has to education in a similar institution and to a clearly proven need to share education facilities with other cultural communities. The *Laerskool Middelbur*g court seems to be on far shakier grounds when it suggests that a claim to a single-medium institution is probably best defined as a claim to emotional security. This trivializes the desire to maintain basic, constitutive attachments. It seems clear that the desire to sustain a given culture especially a minority culture, as Afrikaaner culture now is, is best served by single medium institutions that reinforce implicitly and expressly the importance of sustaining the integrity of that community. The Laerskool Middelburg court must be wrong — as an empirical matter – when it claims that the conversion of a single-medium school to a parallel — medium school cannot per se diminish the force of each ethnic, cultural and linguistic communitys claim to a school organized around its language and culture. Ibid at 173. That is, with respect, exactly what conversion per se does.

ready access to a public school that offers them adequate instruction in their preferred medium of instruction, then neither a School Governing Body nor a principal can exclude learners in terms of an admissions policy that seeks to privilege a particular language. One lesson of the Supreme Court of Appeal's decision in Mikro is that the window for exclusion on the basis of language and culture is rather small indeed: only where the learners in question already have easy access to a school that offers them adequate instruction in their preferred medium of instruction, can the single-public medium school in question claim, with some force, that neither the learners nor the state has any business forcing a single-medium public school into becoming a parallel-medium or a dual-medium public school.[1] Third, and most importantly, the Final Constitution neither provides a

[2] Seodin Primary School v MEC Education, Northern Cape 2006 (1) All SA 154 (NC). While Mikro might have brought some relief to the SGBs of single-medium Afrikaans-speaking schools, there is every reason to believe that such a respite will be brief. Seodin reinforces the holdings in Matukane and in Laerskool Middelburg. In Seodin Primary School v MEC Education, Northern Cape, the High Court held that the SGBs of three Afrikaans medium public schools could not use language preference to exclude black English-speaking students from admittance.

[3] Hoërskool Ermelo I and Hoërskool Ermelo II offer perhaps the best set of circumstances under which to assess, in terms of FC s 29(2), the respective rights of learners to choose their preferred language of instruction, the ability of SGBs to determine public school language policy and the power of the state to alter language policy where the needs of learners so warrant. In Hoërskool Ermelo I, Judge Prinsloo, of the Pretoria High Court, suspended a decision of the Mpumalanga education department to dissolve the school's governing body to replace it with a departmentally appointed committee. Hoërskool Ermelo & Others v Departmentshoof van die Mpumalanga Case Number 3062/07, Pretoria High Court (Unreported, 2 February 2007). The dissolution would have enabled the Mpumalanga education department to alter the schools language policy and allowed 113 English-speaking pupils to receive instruction in English. On appeal, Transvaal Judge President Ngoepe, and Judges Seriti and Ranchod set aside the High Court ruling in Hoërskool Ermelo I. The Hoërskool Ermelo II court found that the Afrikaans-medium school must admit English-speaking pupils. Of particular moment for the Hoërskool Ermelo II court was the under-subscription of Hoërskool Ermelo. Given that Hoërskool Ermelo was operating at only half-capacity, the Full Bench found that it was reasonably practicable, as contemplated by FC s 29(2), for the high school to accommodate the 113 eighth grade learners. The mere fact that all classrooms were being employed and that the existing curriculum turned on the current availability of classrooms did not constitute sufficient grounds for excluding English learners and maintaining Hoërskool Ermelo as a single-medium Afrikaans public school. Equity, practicability and historical redress justified the transformation of Hoërskool Ermelo from a single-medium public school into a parallel-medium public school.

[1] The wilful misconstruction of the constitutional space that exists for single medium public schools is evident from the following press release by the Federation of Afrikaans Cultural Associations:

> The Federation of Afrikaans Cultural Associations, the FAK, welcomes the Supreme Court of Appeals rejection of an appeal by the Western Cape MEC for Education to try and force Laerskool Mikro to change its language policy. This judgment is a victory for the autonomy of communities and in fact represents a small step closer to the application of the National Departments policy of mother-tongue instruction for all South African children. The FAK hopes that the continuing pressure by provincial education departments on Afrikaans schools to anglicize in the name of greater access will cease. Currently several Afrikaans schools countrywide are subject to such pressure, with possible court action involved. The FAK appeals to provincial education departments to stop playing off the right to access against mother-tongue instruction, and to alleviate the crisis of access to quality education for all by applying themselves to make mother-tongue instruction a reality for all South African children.

Federation of Afrikaans Cultural Associations FAK Welcomes Mikro Judgment (June 27, 2005) http://vryeafrikaan.co.za/lees.php?id=272 (accessed on 24 January 2007).

guaranteed right to single-medium public schools nor does it prohibit the existence of such institutions. The Final Constitution sets its face against the kind of cultural and linguistic hegemony that marked apartheid and, at the same time, recognises the necessity of a multiplicity of patterns of school language policy. The principal constitutional norms that bracket language policy do not entail some ideological pre-commitment to any particular language practice: say English over Afrikaans, or isiZulu over isiXhosa. Instead these norms require that any language policy meet such fixed, yet fluid, desiderata as equity, practicability and historical redress. In some instances, this set of constitutional desiderata will allow for the continued existence of single-medium Afrikaans institutions. In other instances, circumstances will dictate that such schools change their language policy. In either case, the state must be in a position to offer a compelling evidentiary basis for its conclusion regarding the change or the maintenance of a single medium schools' language policy. In the absence of such reasons, our courts should view state-sponsored changes in policy as arbitrary exercises of state authority.

For many, the constitutional obligation placed upon the state to justify its actions may not provide sufficient solace. For those learners and their parents for whom the window provided by FC s 29(2) is too small and for whom a single-medium school designed to further a particular linguistic, cultural or religious vision of the world is an absolute necessity, the Final Constitution again has an answer. Under FC s 29(3), they may 'dig into their own pocket' and build the school on their own time and in their own fashion.

58.8 SELF-DETERMINATION

(a) Self-determination in international law

At international law, self-determination is a right of 'all peoples … freely to determine, without external interference, their political status and to pursue their economic, social and cultural development'.[1] Competing understandings of self-determination indicate differences of emphasis rather than fundamental divergence over the basic content of the right.

[1] Declaration on Principles of International Law Concerning Friendly Relations and Co-Operation among States in Accordance with the Charter of the United Nations (Friendly Relations Declaration) GA Res 2625 (1970) reprinted in H Hannum (ed) Documents on Autonomy and Minority Rights (1993) 36. For formulations of the right in treaty law, see Article 1 of the ICCPR, Article 1 of the International Covenant on Social, Economic and Cultural Rights (1966), and Article 20 of the African Charter of Human and Peoples Rights (1982). For a ringing defence of economic, social and cultural rights on the African continent, see SC Agbakwa 'Reclaiming Humanity: Economic, Social and Cultural Rights as the Cornerstone of African Human Rights' (2002) 5 Yale Human Rights & Development Law Journal 177, 177 (Argues that the rights of peoples to economic, social and cultural self-determination is often the only means of self-defense for millions of impoverished and marginalized groups all over the world.) For more on self-determination in Africa, see, generally, C Heyns & K Stefizyn (eds) Human Rights, Peace and Justice in Africa (2006).

On the one hand, the term is used to underpin the claims of a group of people who have a strong sense of national consciousness and the desire to form their own state and to govern themselves. In the recent past, self-determination often formed part of a process of decolonization. With the end of the direct colonial period, self-determination has often taken placed through secession from an existing independent state. This first connotation of self-determination may be termed 'external' self-determination, since the exercise of the right entails changes to the international personality of a state.

On the other hand, self-determination may also be understood as having an 'internal' dimension. Internal self-determination concerns the relationship between a people and the government of the state in which that people lives. This right of 'internal' self-determination is a right of groups within an existing sovereign state to a degree of political autonomy and to their own economic, social and cultural development. 'Internal' self-determination does not imply a right of any such group to a sovereign state of its own.[1] Understood in this way, the right of self-determination closely tracks such modern principles as popular participation and representation in government and respect for fundamental human rights and the rule of law.[2]

(b) Self-determination and the Final Constitution

(i) Interim Constitution, constitutional principles and certification

Given South Africa's long history of ethnic division and political orchestration of minority fears, it could be expected that self-determination claims would find a receptive constituency. During the transitional negotiations, political groupings claiming to represent the interests of ethnic minorities saw little purpose in entrenching minority rights in a Bill of Rights. In the view of these parties, a better refuge from majority rule could be found in the elaboration of the right of external self-determination.

Self-determination claims came to dominate the MPNF negotiations. Two major political groupings insistently pressed the issue, backing their demands with dire threats of violent secession and civil war. White right-wing parties, grouped in a succession of loose alliances, mobilized around the issue of an independent Afrikaner state, a Volkstaat.[1] As the Inkatha Freedom party ('IFP') increasingly felt its federalist ambitions frustrated in the course of the negotiations, the language of self-determination and secession became more and more attractive. The party unveiled a 'Constitution of the State of KwaZulu/Natal' in December 1992. While this 'KwaZulu/Natal Constitution' ostensibly set out the IFP's vision of a federal system, and what it termed 'internal regionalisation', commentators observed that the document looked more like a charter for an independent state.[2] This secessionist strain in IFP politics grew louder as the party became more estranged from the Kempton Park process. It culminated in declarations of a sovereign kingdom of KwaZulu-Natal.

[1] Authority for a right of internal self-determination of peoples living within independent states can be found in the penultimate paragraph on 'rights of peoples in existing states' in the Friendly Relations Declaration. The paragraph reads: 'Nothing in the foregoing paragraphs shall be construed as authorizing or encouraging any action which would dismember or impair, totally or in part, the territorial integrity or political unity of sovereign and independent States conducting themselves in compliance with the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples as described above and thus possessed of a government representing the whole people belonging to the territory without distinction as to race, creed or colour.' See P Thornberry 'The Democratic or Internal Aspect of Self-determination with Some Remarks on Federalism' in C Tomuschat (ed) Modern Law of Self-Determination (1993) 101, 114.

[2] A Rosas 'Internal Self-determination' in C Tomuschat (ed) Modern Law of Self-Determination (1993) 225, 230.

While attempts were made by the negotiators to accommodate IFP demands by increasing the political power of provincial governments, right-wing fears were addressed by two constitutional principles dealing with self-determination: CPs XII and XXXIV. The first principle emerged from consideration of submissions made by right-wing parties shortly after the recommencement of negotiations in 1993. These submissions argued for a right of external self-determination: secession of an independent Afrikaner Volkstaat from the remainder of South Africa. The Technical Committee on Constitutional Issues, however, addressed the right of self-determination through a package of guarantees that corresponded to internal 'self-determination'. This package encompassed guarantees of non-discrimination, provisions ensuring meaningful participation in the political process by minority parties, rights of linguistic and cultural diversity, and collective or community rights of linguistic, cultural and religious association.[3]

CP XXXIV was inserted as a last-minute attempt to entice the right-wing — which had abandoned negotiations and declared its intention to boycott the election — to participate in the transitional process.[4] This principle, read together

[1] Once considered the preserve of intellectuals and eccentrics, the Volkstaat strategy entered the mainstream of right wing politics in the late 1980s. Until then, the right wing had put its faith in parliamentary politics to deliver it from the prospect of majority rule. It was thought that an election victory would enable a right-wing majority in the white parliament to set about repairing the damage wrought to the Verwoerdian state by two decades of sporadic reform. But stark defeats in the 1989 general election, the 1992 constitutional referendum and the steady attrition of parliamentary power after February 1990 necessitated the abandonment of this strategy in favour of secessionist politics. See J Grobbelaar 'Bittereinders: Dilemmas and Dynamics on the Far Right' in G Moss & I Obery (eds) South African Review 6 (1992) 103.

[2] S Friedman The Long Journey: South Africa's Quest for a Negotiated Settlement (1993) 164; S Ellmann 'Federalism Awry: the Structure of Government in the KwaZulu/Natal Constitution' (1993) 9 SAJHR 165. On the litigation over the KZN Constitutition and recent failed efforts to revive it, see S Woolman 'Provincial Constitutions' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 21.

[3] Technical Committee on Constitutional Issues 'Fourth Supplementary Report on Constitutional Principles' (26 July 1993) 7.

[4] The Principle was inserted by the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Act 2 of 1994. See, generally, R Humphries, T Rapoo & S Friedman 'The Shape of the Country: Negotiating Local Government' in S Friedman & D Atkinson (eds) (1994) 7 South African Review 148, 170.

with Chapter 11A of the Interim Constitution,[1] gives qualified recognition to a right of external self-determination. The principle provided:

> 1. This Schedule and the recognition therein of the right of the South African people as a whole to self-determination, shall not be construed as precluding, within the framework of the said right, constitutional provision for a notion of the right to self-determination by any community sharing a common cultural and language heritage, whether in a territorial entity within the Republic or in any other recognised way.
>
> 2. The Constitution may give expression to any particular form of self-determination provided there is substantial proven support within the community concerned for such a form of self-determination.
>
> 3. If a territorial entity referred to in paragraph 1 is established in terms of this Constitution before the new constitutional text is adopted, the new Constitution shall entrench the continuation of such territorial entity, including its structures, powers and functions.

(ii) Volkstaat Council

As I noted above, the problem of accommodating, and protecting, ethnic, religious and linguistic minorities in a democratic state dominated the political debates and the lengthy constitutional negotiations that preceded the enactment of the Interim Constitution. One substantive outcome of these 'debates' was the establishment of a 'Volkstaat Council' under the Interim Constitution.[2] IC ss 184A and 184B gave effect to an informal agreement between the National Party government, the ANC and those Afrikaner groups who wished to pursue the creation of a Volkstaat.[3] Talk of a Volkstaat represented the ambitions of [1] Chapter 11A of the Interim Constitution provided for the establishment of a Volkstaat Council. It was intended to enable proponents of the idea of a Volkstaat to constitutionally pursue the establishment of such a Volkstaat. IC s 184B(1). The now defunct Council was an advisory body, with powers to gather information and make representations on the Volkstaat issue to the Constitutional Assembly. See IC s 184B(1)(a).

[2] See Constitution Amendment Act 2 of 1994, s 9 (Inserts Chapter 11A into Interim Constitution).

[3] The exact nature of the bargain is found in the Accord on Afrikaner Self-Determination Between the Freedom Front, the African National Congress and the South African Government/National Party (23 April 1994). This document was signed by General Constand Viljoen, Leader, Freedom Front; Mr Thabo Mbeki, National Chairman, African National Congress; Mr Roelf Meyer, Minister of Constitutional Development and of Communication, Government of the Republic of South Africa and the National Party. The Accord took note of the IC ss 184A and 184B, Constitutional Principle 34 and a previously unsigned memorandum between the ANC, the AVF and the South African government. The Accord read, in relevant part, as follows:

> 1. The parties agree to address, through a process of negotiations, the idea of Afrikaner self-determination, including the concept of a Volkstaat. The parties further agree that in the consideration of these matters, they shall not exclude the possibility of local and/or regional and other forms of expression of such self-determination. 3. They agree that their negotiations shall be guided by the need to be consistent with and shall be governed by the requirement to pay due consideration to Constitutional Principle XXXIV, other provisions of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, Act 200 of 1993 as amended, and that the parties take note of the Memorandum of Agreement, as referred to above. 3.1 Such consideration shall therefore include matters such as: 3.1.1 substantial proven support for the idea of self-determination including the concept of a Volkstaat; 3.1.2 the principles of democracy, non-racialism and fundamental rights; and 3.1.3 the promotion of peace and national reconciliation. 4. The parties further agree that in pursuit of 3.1.1 above, the support for the some white Afrikaans-speaking South Africans — and the willingness of the ANC to accede to those demands necessary to secure a peaceful election.[1] The Council was charged with gathering the requisite data necessary to make an informed decision about the contours, the powers and the political structures of a Volkstaat. The amendment that created the Council also introduced CP XXXIV. This principle required that the Final Constitution make some provision for the exercise of the right to self-determination by any community 'sharing a common cultural and language heritage, whether in a territorial entity within the Republic or in any other recognised way'.[2]

The Volkstaat Council was created by an Act of Parliament in November 1994.[3] In March 1999, the Volkstaat Council concluded its activities with a presentation to the State President of its 'Final Report' on the logistics required for the creation of an autonomous Afrikaner state.[4] That report went nowhere.

Express provision for a Volkstaat died with the advent of the Final Constitution.[5] The desire to protect the cultural, religious and linguistic interests of Afrikaners did not. After discussing the meaning of FC s 235 — and the limits its idea of self-determination in a Volkstaat will be indicated by the electoral support which parties with a specific mandate to pursue the realisation of a Volkstaat will gain in the forthcoming election. 4.1 The parties also agree that, to facilitate the consideration of the idea of a Volkstaat after the elections, such electoral support should be measured not only nationally, but also by counting the provincial votes at the level of: 4.1.1 the electoral district; and 4.1.2 wherever practical the polling stations as indicated by the parties to, and agreed to, by the Independent Electoral Commission. 5. The parties agree that the task of the Volkstaatraad shall be to investigate and report to the Constitutional Assembly and the Commission on the Provincial Government on measures which can give effect to the idea of Afrikaner self-determination, including the concept of the Volkstaat. 6. The parties further agree that the Volkstaatraad shall form such advisory bodies as it may determine. 7. In addition to the issue of self-determination, the parties also undertake to discuss among themselves and reach agreement on matters relating to matters affecting stability in the agricultural sector and the impact of the process of transition on this sector, and also matters of stability including the issue of indemnity inasmuch as the matter has not been resolved. 8. The parties further agree that they will address all matters of concern to them through negotiations and that this shall not exclude the possibility of international mediation to help resolve such matters as may be in dispute and/or difficult to conclude. 8.1 The parties also agree that paragraph 8.0 shall not be read to mean that any of the deliberations of the Constitutional Assembly are subject to international mediation, unless the Constitutional Assembly duly amends the Constitution to enable this to happen. 8.2 The parties also affirm that, where this Accord refers to the South African Government, it refers to the South African Government which rules South Africa until the April 1994 elections.

[1] D Basson South Africa's Interim Constitution: Text and Notes (1994) 237.

[2] See Constitution Amendment Act 2 of 1994, s 13*(b)*(Inserts Constitutional Principle 34 into Interim Constitution.)

[3] The Volkstaat Council Act 30 of 1994. The 20 members of the council provided for in the Interim Constitution were elected from among members of the Freedom Front by a joint session of the National Assembly and the Senate.

[4] Volkstaat Council Final Report: Findings and Recommendations (31 March 1999).

[5] While a Volkstaat is not mentioned by name in the Final Constitution, FC s 235 still holds out the possibility for self-determination for any community sharing a common cultural and language heritage, within a territorial entity in the Republic. The constitutional basis for the Volkstaat Council disappeared with the certification of the Final Constitution. The Council, as a statutory body, limped on for another two years. The Volkstaat Council Act itself has not been repealed.

language places on any identification of 'secession' with 'self-determination' — the final subsection of this chapter discusses the Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities ('CRLC'). The CRLC was understood by many of the principals in the Constitutional Assembly negotiations to have been the compensation extracted by representatives of white minority parties for the elimination of any textual support in the Final Constitution for a Volkstaat Council or a Volkstaat.[1] The volume of complaints lodged thus far with the CRLC on issues of concern to members of various Afrikaans-speaking communities underwrites this conclusion.

(iii) FC s 235

Agreement on the interpretation and the implementation of CP XXXIV proved elusive during the Constitutional Assembly's two-year effort to draft a Final Constitution. The Freedom Front interpreted the principle as supporting constitutional recognition of its demand for a territorial Volkstaat. The ANC justified its resistance by pointing to the failure of the Volkstaat Council to produce a viable blueprint for an independent Volkstaat. In the end, the Constitutional Assembly did not promulgate a constitutional provision for external self-determination. However, CP XXXIV lived on in FC s 235.[2]

When considering objections that the Constitutional Assembly had failed to comply with CP XXXIV, the Constitutional Court, in First Certification Judgment, held that the constitutional provision guaranteeing the right to self-determination ensured some degree of political autonomy for any community sharing a common cultural and language heritage within — as CP I required — a unitary sovereign state. CP XXXIV was regarded by the Court as a permissive rather than an obligatory provision.[3] The only mandatory provision in CP XXXIV was that if a territorial entity was established in terms of the Interim Constitution before the adoption of the Final Constitution, then such an entity must be

[1] Dr Mulder claims that the Freedom Front engaged the ANC leadership in a vigorous debate about a Volkstaat. The Freedom Front's aspirations for Afrikaner territorial and political self-determination were rebuffed. The ANC would only go so far as to recognise the Freedom Charters commitment to internal cultural and religious self-determination. Both parties seemed to accept the CRLC as an institution that could satisfy the requirements of internal cultural and religious self-determination. Phone Interview between Dr C Mulder and Dr C Landman, Spokesman of the Freedom Front (5 January 2005). Interview with Dr C Landman, Commissioner, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (5 January 2005). Confirmation of this assessment comes in the form of then Minister of Provincial and Local Government FS Mufamadi's statement that the Volkstaat Council would be phased out and its responsibilities handed over to the CRLC. Interview with Dr C Landman, Commissioner, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (5 January 2005). The brinkmanship of white minority politicians also meant that agreement on official language policy and state-funded education in minority languages eluded the Constitutional Assembly until the very end.

[2] The section appeared for the first time in the second Constitution Bill of 6 May 1996.

[3] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: in re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment').

entrenched in the Final Constitution. Since no such entity had in fact been established, no obligatory entrenchment had to be made.[1]

What then is the import of FC s 235? We have seen that self-determination possesses both a narrow internal dimension and a broader external dimension. Internal self-determination affects only the relationship between an autonomous group and the state. It implies neither a right of secession, nor political rights aimed at entrenching specific levels of representation and participation. But FC s 235 would seem to require that the term 'self-determination' should not be understood to exclude the possibility of external self-determination.

According to FC s 235, a 'community sharing a common cultural and language heritage' (a euphemism for an ethnic minority) may assert the right to self-determination 'in a territorial entity within the Republic or in any other recognised way'. While the phrasing of FC s 235 appears to favour self-determination by internal means, it does not exclude the possibility that secession may be another 'recognised way' of achieving self-determination. The criteria for recognition of a legitimate demand for secession or for internal self-determination are not set out.

When reading FC s 235, it might seem reasonable to conclude that a 'recognised way' is a form of self-determination sanctioned by international law. But no right of secession exists in international law. Moreover, the recognition of the right of self-determination in international law must confront, and overcome, the predisposition to recognize the territorial integrity of states.[2] An act of secession that disrupts existing territorial arrangements — without the approval of the sovereign state from which the new 'nation' secedes — would likely be treated with disfavour at international law. FC s 235 read in light of international law puts something of a damper on claims for external self-determination.[3]

International law would appear to be less hostile to strong forms of internal self-determination. So while secession may meet with disapproval, a considerable body of literature supports the proposition that the right of self-determination may require a state to adopt a federal structure of government.[4]

[1] First Certification Judgment (supra) at para 218.

[2] See Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action of the United Nations World Conference on Human Rights (adopted by acclamation, 25 June 1993) (1993) 32 ILM 1661, 1665:

> All peoples have the right of self-determination. By virtue of this right they freely determine their political status, and freely pursue their economic, social and cultural development. . . . In accordance with . . . [the Friendly Relations Declaration (n)], this shall not be construed as authorizing or encouraging any action which would dismember or impair, totally or in part, the territorial integrity or political unity of sovereign and independent states conducting themselves in compliance with the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples and thus possessed of a Government representing the whole people belonging to the territory without distinction of any kind.

As to the practice of African states, see J Dugard 'Secession: Is the Case of Yugoslavia a Precedent for Africa?' (1993) 5 African Journal of International and Comparative Law 163, 164 ('[T]he principle of territorial integrity and the rejection of secession are firmly entrenched as part of African international law.')

[3] R McCorquodale 'Self-determination: A Human Rights Approach' 10 SAHJR 4 (1994) 21, 23.

[4] See P Thornberry 'The Democratic or Internal Aspect of Self-Determination with Some Remarks on Federalism' in C Tomuschat (ed) Modern Law of Self-Determination (1993) 133-137; Y Dinstein 'The Degree of Self-rule of Minorities in Unitarian and Federal States' in C Brölman (supra) at 221; B de Villiers 'Federalism in South Africa: Implications for Individual and Minority Protection' (1993) 9 SAJHR 373.

(iv) Commission for the Promotion and the Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities ('CRLC')[1]

If one is inclined to link the secessionist aspirations that lay behind the promulgation of IC s 184 and the creation of the Volkstaat Council to the subsequent inclusion in the Final Constitution of FC s 185 and FC s 186 and the creation of the Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities ('CRLC'), then it is easy to see why the CRLC was the last of the Chapter 9 Institutions to be launched and why it remains something of a white elephant.

(aa) Purpose of the CRLC

The Final Constitution is committed to 'healing the divisions of the past', 'establishing a society based on democratic values, social justice and fundamental human rights', and building a South Africa 'united in [its] diversity'.[2] The CRLC is similarly tasked. It is responsible for deepening our appreciation for the wide array of distinct and unique South African cultures, languages and religions.[3] At the same time, it is obliged to build bridges between communities in a country riven by racial, ethnic, cultural and linguistic strife.[4] The CRLC has used its bridge-building mandate to arrogate to itself a third mandate — national identity formation. At a high enough level of abstraction, multicultural recognition and national identity formation appear compatible. But as the debate at the compulsory launch of the CRLC in November 2004 suggests, persons and groups silenced by years of oppression have a greater interest in being heard than they do in pledging allegiance to a nation still in the early stages of gestation. Whether such a broad brief as national identity formation is coherent — or if coherent, even plausible given the current political environment and the CRLC's fiscal constraints — is discussed at length in my chapter on the CRLC.[5]

[1] For a general overview of the CRLC and its work, see S Woolman & J Soweto-Aullo 'Commission for the Promotion and the Protection of Cultural, Linguistic and Religious Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24F.

[2] See FC Preamble.

[3] See CRLC Act s 4. Section 4 reads, in relevant part:

(a) to promote respect for and further the protection of the rights of cultural, religious and linguistic communities;

(b) to promote and develop peace, friendship, humanity, tolerance and national unity among and within cultural, religious and linguistic communities on the basis of equality, non-discrimination and free association;

(c) to foster mutual respect among cultural, religious and linguistic communities;

(d) to promote the right of communities to develop their historically diminished heritage; and

(e) to recommend the establishment or recognition of community councils

[4] See CRLC Act Preamble.

[5] See S Woolman & J Soweto-Aullo (supra) at Chapter 24F.

(bb) The Weakness of the CRLC

Efforts to establish the CRLC did not begin until August 1998 — almost two years after certification of the Final Constitution. Another three years past before Parliament undertook deliberation regarding the CRLC Act.[1] During parliamentary debate, some members of the Provincial and Local Government Select Committees expressed concern over whether the CRLC should, in fact, possess the power to protect the cultural, religious and linguistic rights of communities.[2] In the end, the majority of parliamentarians ultimately preferred to see the CRLC as a mediator between communities.[3] This role as mediator, rather than litigator, meant that the CRLC was only granted the power to bring matters of concern to the attention of 'appropriate authorities' and to request an appropriate response.[4]

[1] Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities Act 19 of 2002 ('CRLC Act'). The Department of Provincial and Local Government (DPLG), which possessed ministerial authority over the CRLC, solicited submissions on the functions and structures of the CRLC. The first pre-commission National Consultative Conference ('NCC') engaged solicited submissions, research by the Human Sciences Research Council ('HSRC'), white papers from government and policy statements from key civil society stakeholders. This process was repeated again, a year later, in September 1999. See Human Sciences Research Council Final Report: Second National Consultative Conference (November 1999)(Report of the 2nd NCC). The two most hotly debated issues were the role of the cultural councils and representation on the CRLC itself. The councils are intended to elicit, to amplify and to mediate local, geographically bounded concerns of religious, linguistic and cultural communities. They are tools for mobilisation and dispute resolution. Stakeholders articulated strong differences about (a) how such councils would be recognised; and (b) the extent of state support they should receive. Conditions of fiscal austerity have largely resolved the latter problem. Financial support will be limited. The issue of how councils will be recognised and thus who speaks for a particular community still vexes the CRLC. Interview with T Thitanyana, Corporate Affairs Officer, Commission for the Promotion and Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities (11 January 2005). The Second NCC was more decisive with respect to representation. Legitimacy is conferred on the CRLC through an open nomination process for its full-time chairperson and some 17 part-time commissioners.

[2] Bill (B62-2002), Government Gazette No 22573 (17 August 2001). Debate on the Bill by the Provincial and Local Government Portfolio and Select Committees: Joint Sitting ('PLGP Committee') (commenced on 25 September 2001).

[3] Minutes of the PLGP Committee hearings of 24 October 2001, Appendix 1, available at www.pmg.org.za/docs/2001, (accessed on 04 April 2004).

[4] Minutes of the PLGP Committee hearings of 02 October 2001, available at www.pmg.org.za/docs/2001 (accessed on 04 March 2004). The prevailing consensus is made manifest in the CRLC Act. The powers of the Commission enable it to:

(g) facilitate the resolution of friction between and within cultural, religious and linguistic communities or between any such community and an organ of state, and where the cultural, religious or linguistic rights of a community are affected;

(h) receive and deal with requests related to the rights of cultural and linguistic communities;

(i) make recommendations to the appropriate organ of state regarding legislation that impacts, or may impact, on the rights of cultural, religious and linguistic communities.

CRLC Act, ss 5(1)(g)–(i). Passage of the Act did not end debate about its content. Barely a year after the Act came into force, and prior to the actual establishment of the CRLC, a Bill was introduced in Parliament to amend the powers of the Commission under the Act. A van Niekerk (MP), Private Members Legislative Proposal on Enforcement Powers for the Section 185 Commission (12 September 2003) available at www.pmg.org.za/docs/2003 (accessed on 4 March 2004).

The apparent weakness of the CRLC also reflects concern about its redundancy — and the ANC government's hostility towards 'independent' institutions not designed to advance its political agenda. The Pan South African Language Board, the Youth Commission, the Commission for Gender Equality, the South African Human Rights Commission, the Public Protector, the Judicial Inspectorate, the National House of Traditional Leaders and the Free State Centre for Citizenship, Education and Conflict Resolution have briefs that overlap with that of the CRLC.[1] Many MPs have expressed anxiety about the expenditure of limited public funds on an entity that duplicates the briefs of existing institutions.[2] However, Parliament's stonewalling with respect to budget requests and its refusal to provide little more than token funding in the CRLC's first two years suggests that the motivations for creating a toothless institution lie elsewhere.[3] Without putting too fine a point on it, the CRLC's questionable provenance, its lack of meaningful constituencies, and its nominal independence give the government little motivation to take the CRLC seriously.

[1] For example, the CRLC is given the power, under FC s 185(3), to investigate any matter that falls within the purview of the South African Human Rights Commission. FC s 185(3) was amended by Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Amendment Act 65 of 1998, s 4.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Under-funding of the Chapter 9 Institutions is a common problem. Parliament has been put on notice that low levels of funding and overweening executive oversight make effective operation of these institutions difficult, if not impossible. The Corder Report is absolutely scathing in this regard. See H Corder, S Jagwanth & F Soltau 'Report on Parliamentary Oversight and Accountability Report to the Speaker of the National Assembly' (1999), available at www.pmg.org.za/docs/2001/viewminute.php?id=811, (accessed 10 January 2005)('Corder Report') at paras 7.2 and 7.2.1 ('In their submissions to us, many constitutional institutions have also pointed out that the present arrangement may result in a very low priority being given to constitutional institutions as government departments may be slow in recognising the interests of an institution which does not form part of the core business of the department. The very direct control by the executive of constitutional institutions can have a devastating effect on the independence and credibility of these offices. . . . In the first place, to make institutions dependent on budget allocations received through the very departments that they are required to monitor is not desirable. Secondly, these institutions must be seen by the public to be independent and free of the possibility of influence or pressure by the executive branch of the government. Approval by the executive of budgets, or other issues such as staffing, is thus inconsistent with independence, as well as the need to be perceived as independent by the public when dealing with their cases. This executive power could render impotent state institutions supporting constitutional democracy through the potential denial of both financial and human resources. Furthermore, the special constitutional features of these institutions are not recognised as executive priorities are set.') On the specific problems of under-funding faced by each of the Chapter 9 Institutions, see M Bishop & S Woolman 'Public Protector' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & Michael Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24B; S Woolman & Y Schutte 'Auditor-General' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24B; J Klaaren 'South African Human Rights Commission' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 24C; C Albertyn 'Commission on Gender Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 24D; J White 'ICASA' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24E; S Woolman & J Soweto-Aullo 'Commission for the Promotion and the Protection of Cultural, Linguistic and Religious Communities' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24F.

59 Access to Courts

Jason Brickhill & Adrian Friedman

59.1 Introduction 59–1
59.2 Interpreting FC s 34 59–1
(a) Historical context 59–1
(b) Related constitutional provisions 59–3
(c) International law 59–6
(d) Foreign law 59–8
59.3 The nature and application of the right 59–9
(a) Application 59–9
(i) The bearer of the rights: Juristic persons 59–10
(ii) The bearer of the obligations: Horizontality 59–12
(iii) Application to criminal law 59–13
(iv) Application to appeals 59–14
(v) Disputes that can be resolved by the application of law 59–18
(b) The nature of the state's obligations / nature of the right 59–23
59.4 The content of the right 59–26
(a) Access to court 59–26
(i) Ouster clauses 59–27
(ii) Prescription 59–37
(iii) Res judicata 59–48
(iv) Procedural rules 59–49
(v) Refusing leave to appeal without reasons 59–57
(vi) Vexatious litigants 59–58
(vii) Costs 59–59
(viii) Security for costs 59–61
(ix) Champertous agreements 59–66
(b) Fair public hearing before a court 59–67
(i) Legal representation 59–68

(ii) Equality of arms 59–73
(iii) Independence and impartiality. 59–76
(iv) Notice and hearing requirements. 59–79
(v) Public hearing. 59–83
(c) Another independent and impartial tribunal or forum . . 59–86
(i) Extradition hearings. 59–86
(ii) Arbitration 59–88
(iii) Parliamentary disciplinary proceedings 59–92
(iv) The status of refugees and immigrants. 59–93
(v) Commissions of inquiry 59–94
(vi) Specialist complaints tribunals. 59–95
(d) Right to enforcement of an effective remedy 59–98
59.5 Reasonable limitations of the right 59–102

Access to courts

34. Everyone has the right to have any dispute that can be resolved by the application of law decided in a fair public hearing before a court or, where appropriate, another independent and impartial tribunal or forum.[1]

59.1 Introduction[2]

The right of access to courts is a pre-requisite to the enjoyment of other constitutional rights. Without it, the extensive protections and guarantees provided in our Bill of Rights would be meaningless. In this chapter, we attempt to give meaning to the rights enshrined in FC s 34 and to emphasize how this provision of the Final Constitution gives effect to the founding value of the rule of law.

To do so, we begin in §59.2 by considering the tools necessary to offer a proper construction of FC s 34. Without a basic understanding of the appropriate modes of interpreting FC s 34, the analysis that follows lacks context. Having discussed these modes of interpretation, and before considering the content of the right in detail, we consider, in §59.3, the nature and the application of the right of access to courts. Once the applicability of FC s 34 has been considered, we engage in §59.4, in depth, with the different elements of the right. We have found it appropriate to focus on four discreet aspects of the right: (a) the right of access to courts; (b) the right to a fair public hearing before such courts; (c) the right, where appropriate, to have one's dispute resolved in another independent and impartial tribunal and forum; and (d) the right to enforcement of an effective remedy. The first three components are expressed in the text of FC s 34 itself. The last arises from the interpretation of FC s 34 by the Constitutional Court. We conclude in §59.5 with an analysis of reasonable limitations of the right.

59.2 Interpreting FC s 34

When interpreting FC s 34, it is important to consider, first, the historical background underlying access to courts; second, the (constitutional) textual context of the right; third, relevant international law; and, finally, significant foreign law.

(a) Historical context

The right of access to courts must be interpreted in the light of South Africa's history of deliberate state denial of access by various means.

One of the key legal tools in implementing apartheid was the use of 'ouster clauses'. Ouster clauses deny courts the jurisdiction to review conduct of the executive. These clauses were used, in particular, to prevent review of executive decisions to detain political activists and decisions regarding immigration.[1] Although certain decisions mitigated the impact of these clauses,[2] ouster clauses were largely successful in immunizing the worst of apartheid executive conduct from judicial scrutiny.[3] In the pre-constitutional era, parliamentary supremacy limited the power of the courts to review legislation to non-compliance with procedural limitations that had been imposed by Parliament itself. However, even the exercise of these partial review powers invited the ire of the government.

[1] The Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[2] We are greatly indebted to Kate Hofmeyr: Her input has been indispensable and has assisted in moulding certain critical components the chapter. We would also like to thank Michael Bishop, whose editorial interventions have benefited us greatly.

One of the most blatant instances of apartheid-state interference with judicial authority occurred after the famous Appellate Division decision in Harris I.[4] In Harris I, the Appellate Division struck down the Separate Representation of Voters Act:[5] the Act provided for 'the separate representation of European and non-European voters in the Province of the Cape of Good Hope'.[6] The government sought to circumvent the judgment by passing the High Court of Parliament Act, which purported to turn Parliament itself into the highest court in constitutional matters, with the power to review and set aside, by simple majority vote, any Appellate Division decision declaring an Act of Parliament invalid. The 'High Court of Parliament' proceeded to declare Harris I wrongly decided. Thus followed Harris II,[7] in which a unanimous Appellate Division struck down the High Court of Parliament Act.

As apartheid intensified, South Africa saw increasing interference with the independence of the judiciary. Such blatant interference included the practices of 'packing' courts and making political appointments of judges: the most notorious appointment was that of LC Steyn, the senior state law advisor, to the Transvaal Provincial Division and ultimately to Chief Justice.[8] In addition, the state appointed executive-minded judges to decide political cases.[9]

[1] For example, s 29(6) of the notorious Internal Security Act 74 of 1982 provided that '[n]o court of law shall have jurisdiction to pronounce on any action taken in terms of this section, or to order the release of any person detained in terms of this section.'

[2] See Minister of Law and Order v Hurley 1986 (3) SA 568 (A)(The Appellate Division endorsed reasoning that a decision that was ultra vires had not been taken 'in terms of' s 29 of the Internal Security Act, and accordingly was not hit by the ouster clause excluding judicial review of decisions taken in terms of the section.)

[3] On ouster clauses, see C Hoexter Administrative Law in South Africa (2007) 522–525.

[4] Harris v Minister of the Interior 1952 (2) SA 428 (A).

[5] Act 46 of 1951.

[6] The basis of the decision was that the Act was not passed in conformity with the provisions of the South Africa Act of 1909. It required more than a two-thirds parliamentary majority, and special procedures to disqualify any person as a voter on the ground of race. See 'Constitutional History' Heinz Klug, Jonathan Swanepoel & Stu Woolman in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2008) Chapter 2.

[7] Minister of the Interior v Harris 1952 (4) SA 769 (A).

[8] A debate took place during the early 1980s regarding whether judges should resign for moral reasons. Professor Raymond Wacks argued that they should, while John Dugard contended that judges should rather use what power they retained to oppose apartheid. See R Wacks 'Judges and Injustice' (1984) 101 SALJ 267; J Dugard 'Should Judges Resign? A Reply to Professor Wacks' (1984) 101 SALJ 286; R Wacks 'Judging Judges: A Brief Rejoinder to Professor Dugard' (1984) 101 SALJ 295. The role of judges in apartheid has attracted much criticism. See, for example, E Cameron 'Nude Monarchy: The Case of the South African Judges' (1987) 3 SAJHR 338.

[9] See S Ellmann In a Time of Trouble (1992)(Ellmann considered the record of the Appellate Division in cases concerning the exercise of emergency powers).

Another relevant slice of historical perspective is found in the bifurcated judicial system established in 1927 with the creation of chiefs' and headmen's courts, Commissioners' Courts and Black Appeal Courts to decide disputes between black people.[1] This bifurcation brought with it a set of overtly racist choice of law rules that determined whether a black person ought to be governed by the common law or customary law.[2]

The proper interpretation of FC s 34 must take into account that the provision aims to immunize everyone (and, indirectly, the courts) against a recurrence of these historical ills.

(b) Related constitutional provisions

It is appropriate to view FC s 34 within the matrix of related constitutional provisions, both within the Bill of Rights and outside it.[3] At the level of underlying constitutional values, FC s 34 is most closely related to the provisions of FC s 1*(c). FC s 1(c)* recognizes the founding values of supremacy of the Final Constitution and the rule of law. FC s 34 concretizes the higher-level value of the rule of law.[4]

At the outset, FC s 34 forms part of a three-piece cluster of rights with FC s 32 (the right of access to information) and FC s 33 (the right to just administrative action). Access to courts is a 'leverage' right: it allows litigants to leverage their other (substantive) rights. Accordingly, depending on the nature of the underlying substantive dispute in any case, FC s 34 is the constitutional tool that allows a person to vindicate the particular substantive rights in issue. In this sense, FC s 34 is related to all the rights in Chapter 2. FC ss 32 and 33 are also leverage rights. Access to information is obviously often required to determine whether one in fact has rights to vindicate. The right to reasons which forms part of FC s 33, is also a substantive rights-determining tool. The primary FC s 33 right to fair administrative action may also be regarded as a leverage right. It ensures that a fair process must be followed in taking administrative decisions that invariably affect other substantive rights, such as environmental and property rights. As leverage rights, FC ss 32 to 34 consist mainly of procedural guarantees, rather than rights to specific entitlements. All presuppose the existence of another, independent, substantive right. However, this largely procedural nature should not be overemphasized: an element of meaningful access (to courts, information or reasons for administrative action) is the remedy that lies at the end of the road.

[1] Black Administration Act 38 of 1927.

[2] See, eg, Ramothatha v Makhothe 1934 NAC (N&T) 74 (The plaintiff lived a 'European lifestyle' and so the common law applied); Mbuli v Mehlomakulu 1961 NAC 68.

[3] See Beinash v Ernst & Young 1999 (2) SA 116 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 125 (CC) at para 17 (Mokgoro J linked FC s 34 to other particular constitutional provisions: she noted in her limitations analysis that FC ss 7(2), 34, 35 and 165 are rights that require the protection of 'bona fide litigants, the processes of the courts and the administration of justice against vexatious litigants'.)

[4] See Zondi v MEC for Traditional and Local Government Affairs 2005 (3) SA 589 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 347 (CC) at para 61; Barkhuizen v Napier 2007 (5) SA 323 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 691 (CC) at para 32.

FC s 34 bears an intricate relationship, in particular, to FC s 33, the right to just administrative action. In the first place, Currie and de Waal argue that FC s 34 applies to disputes that may be resolved by the application of the law, which include disputes in respect of administrative action; but only after the relevant administrative decision is taken, because only then does a legal dispute arise.[1] By contrast, the requirements of FC s 33 apply to administrative action at the time of the decision. In our view, at least some decisions will constitute both administrative action in terms of FC s 33 and give rise to a dispute capable of resolution by the application of law such as to engage FC s 34. For example, as Hoexter notes, administrative action of a judicial nature, such as decisions of a valuation court, would give rise to a 'dispute' of the sort contemplated in FC s 34.[2] The majority of the Constitutional Court in Sidumo v Rustenburg Platinum Mines has recently endorsed this view in relation to arbitrations of the Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration. The Court held that the CCMA's decisions constitute administrative action under FC s 33 but are also an instance of another independent and impartial tribunal or forum performing a function under FC s 34.[3] Therefore, although the distinction between FC s 33 and FC s 34 causes of action is a useful one, it is not absolute or impermeable. One of the consequences of the relationship between the two rights, however, is that if administrative review to another independent and impartial forum is available to litigants in respect of a legal dispute, procedures that exclude the ordinary courts' jurisdiction may not infringe FC s 34.[4] Another dimension to their relationship is that FC s 33 envisages a judicial-review power in respect of all administrative action: as embodied in the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act ('PAJA').[5] In this respect, therefore, FC s 33 bolsters FC s 34 and guarantees a limited right of access to courts in respect of review of administrative action.[6]

FC s 34 is also, in a sense, the twin of FC s 35. FC s 35 is concerned with criminal matters and provides for the right to a fair trial. FC s 35 is far more detailed than FC s 34 in fleshing out the content of the right to a fair (criminal) trial. FC s 34 does not apply to criminal matters.[7] As a result, the two provisions

[1] See I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 705. See also Baramoto v Minister of Home Affairs 1998 (5) BCLR 562 (W)(The court accepted that the decision of an administrative body to grant or refuse refugee status did not implicate the FC s 34 right.)

[2] Hoexter (supra) at 524.

[3] [2007] ZACC 22 ('Sidumo'). We discuss Sidumo in more detail at § 59.4*(c)*(ii) infra, when we consider arbitration proceedings.

[4] Metcash Trading Ltd v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service 2001 (1) SA 1109 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 1 (CC). However, it should be noted that FC s 169 provides that a High Court may decide 'any matter not assigned to another court by an Act of Parliament.' This potentially precludes the ousting of the jurisdiction of the High Court unless another court, as opposed to tribunal, has been given jurisdiction. See Fredericks v MEC for Education and Training, Eastern Cape, and Others 2002 (2) SA 693 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 113 (CC) at para 31.

[5] Act 3 of 2000.

[6] See J Klaaren & G Penfold 'Administrative Justice' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2002) 63–22.

[7] See § 59.3*(a)*(iii) infra.

do not overlap or regulate the same area of law. Still, given this textual proximity and relationship, is it possible that FC s 34 confers, albeit tacitly, any of the specific sub-rights contained in FC s 35? Some of the content of FC s 35 is clearly inapplicable in the civil context: the rights to be presumed innocent and to remain silent. However, much of the content of the criminal fair trial right in FC s 35(3) may form part of its civil counterpart in FC s 34. In particular, the right to receive adequate notice,[1] the right to have proceedings begin and conclude without unreasonable delay,[2] to adduce and challenge evidence,[3] and, as we argue below, the right to free legal representation[4] should form part of the content of a 'fair hearing' in terms of FC s 34.[5]

FC s 34 must also be interpreted with due regard to the provisions that recognize and endorse the application of customary law, and the jurisdiction of traditional authorities. The constitutional rights to culture in FC ss 30 and 31, read with FC s 39(3) and FC s 211, which recognize the customary law, require the legislature and the courts to give effect to the customary law and the dispute-resolution roles of traditional leaders. However, these powers must be exercised in a manner consistent with the other rights in the Bill of Rights.[6] FC s 166*(e)* recognizes that the courts include 'any other court established or recognized in terms of an Act of Parliament': eg, the chiefs' and headmen's courts recognized in terms of the Black Administration Act.[7] The recognition of customary law, and the chiefs' and headmen's courts that apply it, is significant for FC s 34 in a number of ways. It may indicate that the notion of 'fairness' contained in FC s 34 must be read to apply in a context-sensitive way to customary law dispute resolution. For example, traditional authorities do not observe the doctrine of separation of powers: legislative, executive and judicial powers reside in the same persons.[8] This appears to be a limitation of the right in FC s 34. However,

[1] The equivalent rights are described in criminal terms in FC ss 35(3)(a) and (b) as the 'right to be informed of the charge with sufficient detail to answer it' and 'to have adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence'.

[2] FC s 35(3)(d).

[3] FC s 35(3)(i).

[4] FC s 35(3)(g).

[5] See § 59.3*(a)*(iv) infra.

[6] On the internal limitations, or consistency requirements, found in FC s 30 and FC s 31, see S Woolman 'Community Rights: Language, Culture & Religion' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 58.

[7] Act 38 of 1927.

[8] See Bangindawo v Head of the Nyanda Regional Authority 1998 (4) SA 631 (Tk), 1998 (3) BCLR 314 (Tk)(The High Court rejected a challenge to the independence and impartiality of traditional courts established under old-order Transkei legislation. The challenge was premised on the fact that the king or chief exercises judicial functions in addition to law-making and law-enforcing functions. The court held (at 327D) that there was no room for 'the Western conception of the notions of judicial impartiality and independence in the African customary law setting'.) See also I Currie & J de Waal The New Constitutional and Administrative Law: Volume One, Constitutional Law (2001) 311.

it may be that this is a limitation of a right by another provision of the Constitution, as envisaged by FC s 36(2).

The decision of the Constitutional Court in Modderklip has revealed the relationship between FC s 34 and the entitlement in terms of FC s 38 to approach a court for 'appropriate relief' when a right in the Bill of Rights has been threatened or infringed.[1] It would seem that, in the light of Modderklip, FC s 38 entrenches the right to a remedy for a breach of a substantive right, while FC s 34 entrenches the right to have that remedy enforced.

Finally, FC s 34 must be read with the provisions of Chapter 8 of the Constitution, which governs the courts and the administration of justice. The means and level of access to courts contemplated by FC s 34 must be consistent with the court machinery contemplated in FC s 166, with the powers and regulated as set out in the other provisions of Chapter 8.

(c) International law

In terms of FC s 39(1)(c), when interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court must consider international law. It is incumbent on courts, therefore, to have regard to analogous rights of access to courts (or their equivalent, regardless of differences in nomenclature) in international law when interpreting FC s 34. FC s 233 also requires courts interpreting legislation to prefer an interpretation that is consistent with international law over any inconsistent interpretation. Therefore, when legislation is tested against FC s 34, the legislation must first be interpreted, if possible, so that it accords with relevant international law.

South Africa is a party to the United Nations Charter, the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights of 1981, and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights of 1966 (ICCPR), to which South Africa is accordingly bound. Other treaties to which South Africa is not a party, such as regional instruments outside Africa, together with decisions interpreting their provisions, could nevertheless assist courts interpreting the Bill of Rights. As held by Chaskalson P in S v Makwanyane, both binding and non-binding international law have a role to play in interpreting provisions of the Bill of Rights.[2] Binding norms of international law are likely to come to bear far more heavily in the interpretation of rights in the Bill of Rights. Non-binding norms are likely to serve as no more than a guide.[3]

[1] President of the RSA v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC)('Modderklip').

[2] S v Makwanyane and Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC)('Makwanyane') at para 35.

[3] H Strydom & K Hopkins 'International Law' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) 30-11 — 30-14. See also Makwanyane (supra) at paras 34, 35 and 39 (Chaskalson P); Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others v Grootboom 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC) at para 26.

Article 14(1) of the ICCPR provides that all persons shall be equal before the courts and tribunals. The article goes on to guarantee a 'fair and public hearing by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal established by law … in the determination of any criminal charge against a person, or of a person's rights and obligations in a suit at law'. Article 14(1), at least, is therefore a guarantee applicable to both criminal and civil matters.[1] The remainder of art 14 is concerned with criminal fair trial rights. In its General Comment on art 14(1), the United Nations Human Rights Committee discussed the requirements of the fair trial right in art 14(1) and identified the following elements: 'equality before the courts, including equal access to courts, fair and public hearings and competence, impartiality and independence of the judiciary [must be] established by law and guaranteed in practice'.[2] The Committee discussed the obligation of states parties to enact laws which provide for the establishment of the courts and to ensure that they are independent, impartial and competent. In this regard, the Committee emphasized the regulation of the appointment and tenure of judges, their promotion, transfer and removal, and the independence of the judiciary from the executive and legislative branches. Article 14(1) of the ICCPR permits the exclusion of the press and the public from a trial 'for reasons of morals, public order (ordre public) or national security in a democratic society, or when the interest of the private lives of the parties so requires, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice'. However, art 14(1) requires that any judgment rendered in a criminal case or in a suit at law shall be made public except where otherwise required in the interest of juvenile persons or the proceedings concern matrimonial disputes or the guardianship of children.

Like art 14 of the ICCPR, art 7 of the African Charter[3] establishes a general fair-trial guarantee that applies to civil and criminal matters. It then provides a number of more specific rights applicable only in the criminal context. The umbrella right in art 7, which applies to civil and criminal matters, is the right of 'every individual … to have his cause heard'. This right encompasses a number of constituent rights, one of which is 'the right to an appeal to competent national [1] United Nations Human Rights Committee 'General Comment No. 13: Equality Before The Courts and the Right to a Fair and Public Hearing by an Independent Court Established by Law (Art. 14)' (Twenty-first session, 1984) UN Doc. HRI/GEN/1/Rev.1 ('GC 13') at para 2.

[2] Ibid at para 3.

[3] Article 7 of the African Charter provides:

1. Every individual shall have the right to have his cause heard. This comprises:
   (a) the right to an appeal to competent national organs against acts of violating his fundamental rights as recognized and guaranteed by conventions, laws, regulations and customs in force;
   (b) the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty by a competent court or tribunal;
   (c) the right to defence, including the right to be defended by counsel of his choice;
   (d) the right to be tried within a reasonable time by an impartial court or tribunal.

2. No one may be condemned for an act or omission which did not constitute a legally punishable offence at the time it was committed. No penalty may be inflicted for an offence for which no provision was made at the time it was committed. Punishment is personal and can be imposed only on the offender.

organs against acts of violating his fundamental rights as recognised and guaranteed by conventions, laws, regulations and customs in force'. A rich, although non-binding, jurisprudence on art 7 is already emerging out of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights, which has fleshed out the fairly general terms of the provision. The decisions of the Commission do not formally have the binding force of a ruling of a court but constitute persuasive authority similar to the opinions of the UN Human Rights Committee.[1]

Evans and Murray criticize the vagueness of art 7, which leaves much to the interpretive imagination, for failing to provide expressly for rights such as the right to a public hearing, the right to have proceedings interpreted, the right against self-incrimination and the right against double jeopardy.[2] However, the Commission has interpreted art 7 to include a number of these elements, some of which are relevant to the interpretation of FC s 34. In particular, the Commission has concluded that the decree of a military government ousting the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts violates art 7;[3] that the nullification by executive decree of ongoing suits at law violated the article;[4] that the dismissal of judges opposed to the establishment of special courts and their replacement by military tribunals was a violation of the right;[5] and that art 7 prohibits the determination of a dispute by a court with the appearance of partiality.[6] It should be noted that the word 'appeal' in art 7 refers not to an appeal in the sense of challenging a decision of a lower court in a higher court. Rather it denotes the general right to seek a judicial remedy, and is therefore the African Charter equivalent to 'access' in FC s 34.[7]

(d) Foreign law

In terms of FC s 39(1)(c), when interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court may consider foreign law. It is permissible and may be appropriate, therefore, to have regard to the constitutional rights of access to courts in other constitutional

[1] M Evans & R Murray The African Charter on Human and People's Rights: The System in Practice, 1986–2000 (2002) 10.

[2] Ibid at 155.

[3] Civil Liberties Organisation v Nigeria Communication 129/94, 9th Activity Report 1995–1996, Annex VIII, referred to in Evans & Murray (supra) at 156.

[4] Constitutional Rights Project, Civil Liberties Organisation and Media Rights Agenda v Nigeria Communications 140/94, 141/94 and 145/95, 13th Activity Report 1999–2000, Annex V at para 33, referred to in Evans & Murray (supra) at 157.

[5] Amnesty International, Comité Loosli Bachelard, Lawyers Committee for Human Right, Association of Members of the Episcopal Conference of East Africa v Sudan Communications 48/90, 50/91, 52/91 and 89/93, 13th Activity Report 1999–2000, Annex V at paras 68–69, discussed in Evans & Murray (supra) at 162.

[6] International Pen, Constitutional Rights Project, Interights on behalf of Ken Saro-Wiwa Jr and Civil Liberties Organisation v Nigeria Communications 137/94, 139/94, 154/96 and 161/97, 12th Activity Report 1998–1999, Annex V at para 95.

[7] Evans & Murray (supra) at 156.

regimes, and the approach of foreign courts to such provisions. Below we consider the constitutional position on access to courts in Germany and Canada. We have selected these jurisdictions because they have similar constitutional schemes to our own.

Article 19(4) of the German Basic Law (Grundgesetz) provides:

> Should any person's rights be violated by public authority, recourse to the court is open to him. Insofar as no other jurisdiction has been established, recourse is available to the courts of ordinary jurisdiction. . . .

This right is regarded as a core aspect of the German Rechsstaat. It reflects a particular concern, with strong German historical resonance, for the need for judicial review of actions of 'public authority', that is, executive and administrative action. In addition, art 101(1) of the Basic Law prohibits 'extraordinary courts' and the removal of persons from the jurisdiction of their lawful judge, while art 103 states the perhaps axiomatic principle that, in the courts, everyone is entitled to a hearing in accordance with the law. Article 97(1) provides for judicial independence. Strong rule of law and separation of powers themes are prominent in the Basic Law.

In Canada, the Charter contains no fundamental right of access to courts. However, s 24(1) does provide that '[a]nyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by th[e] Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.' This is only a partial right of access to courts: it applies only to Charter rights and freedoms. It is perhaps more accurately described as a provision confirming the justiciability of Charter rights and freedoms and the entitlement to relief for their infringement. Section 24(1) is narrower than FC s 34 in another sense: it only applies to the ordinary courts, and not to other fora. Accordingly, s 24(1) of the Charter is possibly more akin to FC s 38, which similarly provides for a right to approach a competent court when a right in Chapter 2 has been infringed or threatened, and to obtain appropriate relief. This similarity between s 24(1) and FC s 38 highlights, in our view, the relationship between FC ss 34 and 38 and reinforces our view — set out in §59.4*(d)* — that access includes an entitlement to the enforcement of the relief guaranteed by FC s 38.

59.3 THE NATURE AND THE APPLICATION OF THE RIGHT

(a) Application

In respect of all rights in the Bill of Rights, it is necessary to ask who benefits from the rights that they confer, and who bears the obligations that they impose. In particular, one must usually ask two questions: whether the right applies to juristic persons; and whether the right applies horizontally, that is, whether it imposes obligations on private persons. In this section, we consider these two questions in relation to FC s 34. We then consider three further questions of relevance to the application of the rights contained in FC s 34. First, we consider whether FC s 34 has any application to criminal matters. Next, we consider whether FC s 34 applies to appeals. Lastly, we consider the fact that FC s 34 applies only to disputes capable of resolution by the application of law.

(i) The Bearer of the Rights: Juristic Persons

FC s 8(4) provides that a 'juristic person is entitled to the rights in the Bill of Rights to the extent required by the nature of the rights and the nature of that juristic person.' This entails an enquiry specific to each right in the Bill of Rights, in which a court must consider the nature of the right and the nature of the juristic person seeking to invoke it.[1]

In Hallowes v The Yacht 'Sweet Waters', Hurt J considered the application of s 22 of the Interim Constitution,[2] the predecessor to FC s 34, to juristic persons.[3] An employee of the defendant close corporation which was the owner of the arrested vessel in issue in the case purported to appear for the defendant. The employee was not admitted to practise in the Supreme Court. It was contended that an aspect of the right in IC s 22 was the right to present one's own case in court, and that the procedural requirement that a company must be represented in court by an admitted legal representative limits the right in IC s 22 of juristic persons that lack the financial means to secure legal representation.[4] The court was urged to develop a rule of procedure permitting such a party to be represented by an 'agent'. The court noted that IC s 7(3) provided that juristic persons are entitled to the rights enshrined in the Bill of Rights where, and to the extent that, the nature of the rights permits.[5]

The court held that IC s 22 includes within its ambit the right of the 'person' to stand up in court and argue his own case, but that a juristic person is incapable of doing so.[6] Therefore, the court held that the right to present one's own case is a right which cannot vest in a juristic person, since it is a right which, by its nature, a juristic person cannot exercise.[7] The court therefore dismissed the constitutional challenge to the rule requiring juristic persons to be represented by an admitted legal representative. So, while Hurt J appeared to accept as a starting point that the express constituent rights in IC s 22 apply to juristic persons to the extent that

[1] On the beneficiaries of constitutional rights, and the benefits that flow to juristic persons, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) § 31.3.

[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or IC'). IC s 22 provides that '[e]very person shall have the right to have justiciable disputes settled by a court of law or, where appropriate, another independent and impartial forum.'

[3] 1995 (2) SA 270 (D)('Hallowes').

[4] Hallowes (supra) at 272I–273F and 276B.

[5] Ibid at 272I.

[6] Ibid at 272B–C.

[7] Ibid at 278B–C.

the nature of the specific rights in the provision permit, Hallowes is ultimately authority for the proposition that at least some aspects of the right of access to courts are not applicable to juristic persons.

In Lees Import and Export (Pvt) Ltd v Zimbabwe Banking Corporation Ltd,[1] the Zimbabwean Supreme Court considered the same question that had arisen in Hallowes. It reached the opposite conclusion. Subsection (1) of s 18 of the Constitution provides that every person is 'entitled to the protection of the law'; and ss (9) provides that every person is 'entitled to be afforded a fair hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial court or other adjudicating authority established by law in the determination of the existence or extent of his civil rights or obligations' (our emphasis).

Gubbay CJ, on behalf of a unanimous court, declined to follow the decision in Hallowes, holding:

> True, a juristic person, being a purely legal concept, is incapable of being physically present at any place and must always act through an agent. This is what the corporation Hallowes sought to do through Mr Labuschagne. It would seem, however, that Hurt J regarded a juristic person as lacking the capacity to exercise the right to present its own case before him, even if it were to do so through an organ or alter ego. This, I think, was to confuse the content of the right with the manner of its exercise.[2]

Gubbay CJ concluded that the common-law rule offends against s 18(9) of the Constitution of Zimbabwe to the extent that it prohibits the duly authorized organ or alter ego of a company from appearing in the person of the company before the High Court or the Supreme Court of Zimbabwe.[3] The court held that the right given to 'every person' under this constitutional mandate includes within its reach a corporate body appearing through its alter ego. He held that this view does not undermine the general rule of practice requiring juristic persons to obtain legal representation, but merely provides an exception to it. It does not permit a company to appear before the Superior Courts through someone who is a mere director, officer, servant or agent. Companies that are not embodied by any natural person, will not qualify under s 18(9), because 'no human being personifies the company 'in person'.[4] In general, however, the court envisaged that small companies should be able to avail themselves of the exception.[5]

Gubbay CJ made an order directing that, provided that the applicant's managing director, Mr Phiri, was able to satisfy the High Court that he was the alter ego of the applicant with the requisite authority to appear, 'the applicant through him must be permitted to argue the application for rescission of the default

[1] 1999 (4) SA 1119 (ZSC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1181 (ZSC)('Lees Import and Export').
[2] Ibid at 1128I–1129A.
[3] Ibid at 1130G.
[4] Ibid at 1130H–I.
[5] Ibid at 1131A.

judgment granted against it, since a denial of appearance would amount to a violation of the applicant's entitlement to the protection of the law and to be afforded a fair hearing as guaranteed by sub-ss (1) and (9) of s 18 of the Constitution'.[1]

In our view, the approach of the Zimbabwean Supreme Court in Lees Import and Export is to be preferred to that of Hurt J in the High Court in Hallowes. Both cases are consistent with the proposition that, in general, the right of access to courts applies to juristic persons. However, Lees Import and Export adopts a more generous approach, in terms of which the common law 'alter ego' doctrine is employed to enable small companies to enjoy access rights that are, by their nature, rights that can only be exercised by natural persons. This approach is consistent with the Constitutional Court's dicta to the effect that the failure to accord constitutional rights to juristic persons would 'undermine the very fabric of our democratic state'[2] and the Court's statements that, in general, rights in the Bill of Rights should be given the most generous interpretation.[3] In respect of FC s 34, a generous interpretation is one that extends the application of the right to juristic persons as far as possible within the language of the provision and the nature of the rights that it confers.

(ii) The Bearer of the obligations: Horizontality

The second question to consider in respect of the application of FC s 34 is whether the right applies horizontally and imposes obligations on private persons.[4] In our view, the positive obligations to protect, promote and fulfill the right of access to courts imposed by FC s 34 fall on the state. It fulfils them primarily by establishing the judicial system with all its necessary trappings. In §59.4*(b)(i), we consider whether these positive obligations extend to an obligation to provide free legal assistance to indigent civil litigants. In addition, in §59.4(d)* we note that Modderklip has extended the state's obligations beyond merely providing for dispute-resolution mechanisms: it must provide effective enforcement of remedies. FC s 34 imposes negative obligations upon the state: the obligations not to interfere with the independence of the judiciary and not to oust impermissibly, by legislation, the jurisdiction of the courts.

[1] Lees Import and Export (supra) at 1131B–C.

[2] Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC) at para 18 (Discussion of the right to privacy in FC s 14), cited with approval in First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service and Another; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) at para 42.

[3] S v Zuma 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) at para 14; S v Mhlungu 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 8; Laugh It Off Promotions CC v SAB International (Finance) BV t/a SabMark International (Freedom of Expression Institute as Amicus Curiae*)* 2006 (1) SA 144 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 743 (CC) at para 47.

[4] On the horizontal application of rights generally, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) § 31.4.

However, FC s 34 must also impose at least some negative obligations on private persons to respect the right of access to courts and not to interfere with the fairness of judicial proceedings. For example, the conduct of an employer who unlawfully forbids an employee from instituting court proceedings against the employer, or a civil litigant who attempts unlawfully to influence a judicial officer, may infringe FC s 34. In addition, the obligation to provide notice of court proceedings,[1] which is necessary to ensure a 'fair' hearing, falls on private litigants themselves. In Barkhuizen v Napier, the Constitutional Court established that FC s 34 is applicable to private contractual relations, in particular in relation to time-bar clauses in contracts.[2] However, Ngcobo J (for the majority) held that FC s 34 should be applied to such clauses indirectly, through the medium of the common-law principle of 'public policy', of which the right of access to courts now forms a part.[3] (We discuss this aspect in Barkhuizen in more detail in §59.4*(a)*(ii) in the context of prescription.) To this extent, at least, FC s 34 may apply horizontally.[4]

(iii) Application to criminal law

Two decisions of the Constitutional Court have helped to set out the limits of the applicability of FC s 34 to criminal matters. In S v Pennington, the Court held that FC s 34 does not apply to criminal appeals.[5] The Court held that the phrase 'any dispute' may be wide enough to cover criminal proceedings but that criminal proceedings were not normally described in this way. In any case, FC s 35 deals in detail with the way in which criminal proceedings must be conducted and this degree of detail led the court to the conclusion that FC s 34 has no application to criminal matters.[6]

When it comes to extradition proceedings, on the other hand, it is FC s 34 and not FC s 35 that is applicable. In Geuking v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others, the Court pointed out that a person facing extradition is not an accused person: the enquiry into extradition does not result in conviction or sentence.[7]

The Final Constitution provides a scheme in which both criminal and civil matters are engaged. Since there is an inevitable overlap between FC s 34 and FC s 35, it is convenient to demarcate the reach of the two sections. The line drawn by the Constitutional Court is that only in matters directly concerning

[1] See § 59.4*(b)*(iv) infra.
[2] 2007 (5) SA 323 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 691 (CC)('Barkhuizen').
[3] Ibid at para 33.
[4] For a criticism of Barkhuizen's indirect application of the Bill of Rights, as opposed to the direct application of FC s 34, see S Woolman 'The Amazing Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007) 624 SALJ 742. The views expressed in this article are not necessarily those of the authors.
[5] 1997 (4) SA 1076 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1413 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 329 (CC) at para 46.
[6] Ibid.
[7] 2003 (3) SA 34 (CC), 2004 (9) BCLR 895 (CC) at para 47.

arrest, detention, conviction or sentence of an accused person does FC s 35 apply.[1] In other matters that may properly be characterized as 'any dispute', of which extradition cases must clearly be examples, FC s 34 applies.

(iv) Application to appeals

The leading case of the Constitutional Court on the question whether the right of access to court includes the right to an appeal is Besserglik v Minister of Trade, Industry and Tourism and Others (Minister of Justice intervening).[2] In that case, the applicant challenged the constitutionality of s 20(4)(b) of the Supreme Court Act 59 of 1959.[3] The applicant argued that the precondition to prosecute an appeal provided by this section — that leave to appeal be granted — violated his right to equality and his right of access to court. The matter was resolved in terms of IC s 22, the equivalent of FC s 34.[4]

In a very brief judgment, resolved without oral argument, the Constitutional Court rejected the applicant's IC s 22 argument:

> The applicant's argument was that the purpose of section 22 was to ensure that persons have the right to have their disputes determined fairly by a court of law until final determination, which includes a right of appeal. In Bernstein v Bester[5] considerable doubts were expressed about the correctness of such an approach to section 22, although it was unnecessary for any firm decision to be made on that point. In my view, whatever the purpose and scope of section 22, it cannot be that the considerations relied upon by Madala J in S v Rens[6] would not equally be applicable to civil appeals. Even were the applicant correct in his characterisation of the scope of section 22, therefore, a matter about which there is some doubt, he would still have to persuade this court that the leave to appeal procedure, coupled with the petition procedure as provided for in section 20(4)(b), fails to provide potential appellants with an adequate right of appeal. The applicant has failed on that score.

[1] FC s 35(1) applies to arrested persons, FC s 35(2) applies to detained persons and FC s 35(3) applies to accused persons. In the case of the latter, appeals and sentencing are dealt with in the same subsection (see FC s 35(3)(n) and (o)). For more on FC s 35, see F Snyckers & J le Roux 'Criminal Procedure: Rights of Arrested, Detained and Accused Persons' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006).

[2] 1996 (4) SA 331 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 745 (CC)('Besserglik').

[3] Section 20(4)(b) of the Supreme Court Act reads as follows:

No appeal shall lie against a judgment or order of the court of a provincial or local division in any civil proceedings or against any judgment or order of that court given on appeal to it except—

(a) in the case of a judgment or order given in any civil proceedings by the full court of such a division on appeal to it in terms of subsection (3), with the special leave of the Appellate Division;

(b) in any other case, with the leave of the court against whose judgment or order the appeal is to be made or, where such leave has been refused, with the leave of the Appellate Division.

[4] IC s 22 reads: 'Every person shall have the right to have justiciable disputes settled by a court of law or, where appropriate, another independent and impartial forum.'

[5] 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC)('Bernstein') at paras 102–106.

[6] 1996 (1) SA 1218 (CC), 1996 (2) BCLR 155 (CC)('Rens').

> Whatever the scope of section 22, it cannot be said that a screening procedure which excludes unmeritorious appeals is a denial of a right of access to a court. As long as the screening procedure enables a higher court to make an informed decision as to the prospects of success upon appeal it cannot be said to be in breach of section 22.[1]

Madala J's apposite remarks in S v Rens are as follows:

> In my view the petition procedure which is available to every accused whose application for leave to appeal has been refused by the supreme court in which he or she was convicted, allows such accused recourse to a higher court to review, in a broad and not a technical sense, the judgment of the trial court. The procedure involves a re-assessment of the disputed issues by two judges of the higher court, and provides a framework for that reassessment, which ensures that an informed decision is made by them as to the prospects of success.[2]

The procedure applicable to appeals from decisions of the High Court in civil matters is substantially similar to that applicable to appeals from the High Court in criminal matters. A litigant seeking leave to appeal against a decision of a High Court applies for leave to appeal first to the judge or judges that heard the matter.[3] If leave to appeal is refused, the litigant may petition the Supreme Court of Appeal for leave to appeal. Just as in the case of criminal appeals, two judges of the Supreme Court of Appeal consider, in chambers, petitions in civil matters.[4] The Constitutional Court in Besserglik did not decide the question whether the right of access to courts includes the right to an appeal because it held that, even if it did, the right would not be violated by the leave to appeal process provided in the Supreme Court Act. As in the case of criminal appeals, the fact that two judges of the Supreme Court of Appeal are required to consider a petition before leave to appeal is refused was considered to constitute a sufficient safeguard to the interests of litigants in a fair process.

The question, however, is whether FC s 34 does include a right to an appeal. In expressing doubt that the right of access to courts includes a right to an appeal, O'Regan J referred to Bernstein v Bester. The relevant part of Bernstein was concerned, however, with a slightly different question. Section 22 of the IC differed from FC s 34 in one material respect, it did not guarantee, expressly, the fairness of civil proceedings. The question dealt with in Bernstein concerned the contention that the right to fair civil proceedings was implicit in IC s 22. The Constitutional Court was not concerned, in those paragraphs, with the question whether IC s 22

[1] Besserglik (supra) at para 10.

[2] Rens (supra) at para 26.

[3] The only exception, which is dealt with in s 20(4)(a) of the Supreme Court Act, is where the full bench of the High Court hears an appeal. If such a decision is to be appealed, special leave is required from the Supreme Court of Appeal.

[4] Supreme Court Act s 21(3)(b).

includes the right to an appeal. Furthermore, there are clear textual differences between IC s 22 and FC s 34. Whereas the latter provides for a 'fair public hearing', the former merely provides for the right to have 'justiciable disputes settled by a court of law'. So, while O'Regan J expressed doubt that IC s 22 includes a right to an appeal, the question has not been resolved conclusively in regard to FC s 34, and remains open to argument. As noted above,[1] art 14 of the ICCPR and Art 7 of the African Charter do not confer a right to an appeal.[2]

In 1999, a single judge in a provincial division, without referring to the Constitutional Court's decision in Besserglik, struck down a rule of the Uniform Rules that required security to be provided by an appellant for costs on appeal.[3] Although the respondent argued that the right to access to courts does not extend to appeals, the court upheld the applicant's access to court argument without directly responding to the respondent's contention. This judgment was reached by a single judge in a provincial division. However, because his decision was not appealed, the Uniform Rules of Court were amended to give effect to his judgment.

This decision notwithstanding, it would seem that the question whether FC s 34 extends to appeals remains open. This is particularly so because the Supreme Court of Appeal has twice recently referred to the debate surrounding a civil right to appeal without deciding the question. Furthermore, in the latter of the two cases, it expressed grave doubt about a right to appeal.

First, Harms JA pointed out in New Clicks that FC s 34 does not provide an explicit right to appeal and felt it unnecessary to decide whether a right to appeal is implicit.[4] He held, however, that the general right to a fair hearing provided by FC s 34 applied to a hearing envisaged by the Supreme Court Act. According to this approach, regardless of whether there is a right to appeal in civil proceedings, once the legislature provides for an appeal process, this process must be fair.

Secondly, in National Union of Metalworkers of SA and Others v Fry's Metals (Pty) Ltd, the issue before the Supreme Court of Appeal was whether a litigant may appeal a decision of the Labour Appeal Court to the Supreme Court of Appeal. The court held that a litigant may indeed appeal from the LAC to the SCA.[5] Part of the reasoning of the court rested on the proposition that legislation may not undermine the structure of the courts as established in the Final Constitution. Since the Final Constitution provides that the SCA is the final appellate court in all matters other than constitutional matters, legislation could not oust this power

[1] See § 59.2*(c)* supra.

[2] Although art 7 refers to an 'appeal', it does so in the sense of access at instance.

[3] Shepherd v O'Niell and Others 1999 (11) BCLR 1304 (N). See § 59.4*(a)*(viii) 'Security for Costs' infra.

[4] Pharmaceutical Society of South Africa and Others v Tshabalala-Msimang and Another NNO; New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Health and Another 2005 (3) SA 238 (SCA), 2005 (6) BCLR 576 (SCA) at para 30 n27.

[5] 2005 (5) SA 433 (SCA), 2005 (9) BCLR 879 (SCA)('Fry's Metals').

and render another tribunal the final appellate court. In reaching this conclusion, the court confronted the following argument raised by the parties: if legislation may not validly preclude appeals from the LAC to the SCA, legislation may not preclude appeals in any matter. In other words, provisions of statutes such as the Small Claims Court Act 61 of 1984 or the Arbitration Act 42 of 1965 – which provide that proceedings envisaged there are final – would be problematic. In rejecting this argument, the SCA pointed out that this line of reasoning was 'to confuse the existence of appellate jurisdiction with the question whether a right of appeal exists at all. The scope of institutional authority is one thing; the question whether and under what conditions it can be invoked is quite another'.[1] Therefore, FC s 168(3), which provides that the SCA is the highest court other than in constitutional matters, deals only with the scope of the SCA's institutional authority. The question whether one has a right of access to that court and, if so, the circumstances in which it may be invoked, are to be answered with reference to other provisions of the Final Constitution, such as FC s 34. As to whether there was a general right to appeal in all civil proceedings, one of the parties argued that the right of access envisaged in FC s 34 includes a right of access to all courts of appeal. In response, the SCA held:

> We do not agree. The provision does not explicitly include a right of appeal. In this it stands in pronounced contrast to s 35(3)(o), which expressly entrenches within an accused person's right of fair trial a right of appeal or review to a higher Court. We do not consider that s 34 by necessary implication entails the same right; and even if it did, it would be capable of reasonable and justifiable limitation: all such decisions are in any event subject to the principle of legality, and thus to constitutional review. The suggestion that the assertion by this Court of a general appellate jurisdiction entails the appealability of all justiciable rights can therefore not be maintained.[2]

The SCA concluded its reasoning on this issue as follows:

> The question before us is in any event not whether all constitutionally recognised rights are intrinsically appealable, but whether a provision that purports to restrict a litigant's right of appeal to a hierarchy of specialised Courts, to the exclusion of this Court, complies with the Constitution. We find only that once appellate jurisdiction falls to be exercised, this Court is empowered to exercise it finally (apart from the CC), since final appellate tribunals with authority similar to this Court are not envisaged in the Constitution. We add only the obvious corollary: that the conferral on this Court of general appellate power does not render all judgments and orders immediately appealable.[3]

It is apparent that the SCA's remarks on the right to an appeal in FC s 34 were obiter. The ratio of this part of the judgment is that the appellate structure envisaged by the Final Constitution gives the SCA appellate jurisdiction in all matters, including matters within the jurisdiction of the Labour Appeal Court.

[1] Fry's Metals (supra) at para 29.
[2] Ibid at para 31.
[3] Ibid at para 32.

Also part of the ratio is that this conclusion has no bearing on the question whether there is a right to appeal in the first place. However, the SCA clearly felt sufficiently strongly about the interpretation of FC s 34 to make relatively emphatic remarks against the existence of a civil right to appeal.

What is one to make of the comparison to FC s 35(3), which entrenches the fair-trial rights of an accused person? On the one hand, it is true that FC s 35 explicitly provides a right to an appeal, and that FC s 34 does not. However, if one compares the two provisions it is apparent that there are many more detailed guarantees provided by FC s 35 than by FC s 34. Arguably, the explicit mention by FC s 35(3) of certain rights could mean that those same rights are not guaranteed by FC s 34. Such a line of argument, as apparently offered by the SCA, cannot be supported. FC s 35(3) explicitly guarantees, amongst others, the following rights: the right to have a trial begin and conclude without unreasonable delay; the right to choose, and be represented, by a legal practitioner (this is distinct from the right to legal representation at state expense); and the right to adduce and challenge evidence. As we argued above, each of these rights arguably forms part of the understanding of fairness envisaged by FC s 34.[1] The logical end-point of the SCA's reasoning is that none of these rights is protected by FC s 34, since they are explicitly mentioned in FC s 35 but not in FC s 34. The differences in structure of FC s 34 and FC s 35 make it dangerous, in our view, to draw inferences with regard to the content of the former by reference to the latter.[2]

(v) Disputes that can be resolved by the application of law

The text of FC s 34 makes clear that one only has the right of access to court to resolve a dispute that can be resolved by the application of law. There is not much case law on this topic and there is no decided case of which we are aware in which a claim based on FC s 34 failed on the basis that the dispute was not capable of being resolved by the application of law. One can surmise, however, from the reluctance of the Constitutional Court in Prince and Christian Education to make rulings on the objective legitimacy of certain religious practices, that certain religious disputes would not be capable of being resolved by the application of law.[3] On the other hand, it has been held that where a party seeks to review a decision of an administrator in the High Court, the review proceedings

[1] See G Budlender 'Access to Courts' (2004) 121 SALJ 339, 342. See further §59.2*(b)* supra.

[2] We have benefited greatly from a helpful discussion with Mark Wesley, of the Johannesburg Bar, on this aspect of the chapter.

[3] See Currie & De Waal (supra) 707. See also Prince v President, Cape Law Society, and Others 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC) at para 42. But see Taylor v Kurtstag [2004] 4 All SA 317 (W)(The High Court upholds the right of Bet Din to excommunicate member of community who failed to follow its judgments.)

constitute a 'dispute' within the ambit of FC s 34.[1] This conclusion was unsurprising.

Another possible interpretation of this aspect of FC s 34 is that it refers to certain non-justiciable political questions that are not to be determined by the courts. The Constitutional Court, especially in high-profile, highly-charged cases involving an intersection between law and politics, has had occasion to state that the question of the merits of government policy is a political question upon which courts should not pronounce.[2] It could be argued that the text of FC s 34 makes clear that litigants do not have a right to have such disputes resolved by a court.

The complex question that arises from the term 'dispute' used in FC s 34 is the applicability of FC s 34 to more substantive questions. Is it merely a procedural right that protects the right to have disputes resolved by a court but says nothing about the content of the dispute? Or, does FC s 34 say something about the substantive content of disputes?

Jooste v Score Supermarket Trading (Pty) Ltd is authority for the proposition that FC s 34 does not apply to the removal of common-law rights.[3] The case concerned the constitutionality of s 35(1) of the Compensation for Occupational Injuries and Diseases Act.[4] The effect of s 35(1) of the Compensation Act is to remove the common-law right of employees to sue their employers for injuries arising from their employers' negligence and to replace it with a right to claim compensation in terms of the Act. In short, this precludes employees from obtaining general damages[5] for injuries suffered and restricts them to damages for pecuniary loss, but relieves them of the burden of proving negligence and provides a cheaper and easier procedure. The applicant argued that the denial of the right to claim general damages violated her right of access to court. Yacoob J held, for a unanimous Court, that the right of access to court in the Constitution 'does not call for the retention of all common law rights of action which existed at any stage.'[6]

[1] National & Overseas Modular Construction (Pty) Ltd v Tender Board, Free State Provincial Government and Another 1999 (1) SA 701, 703J (O). See also SAD Holdings Ltd and Another v SA Raisins Pty (Ltd) and Others 2000 (3) SA 766, 775 (T)(Ngoepe JP held that the right to have justiciable disputes determined, in terms of FC s 34, meant that, until the Competition Appeal Court was established (it had at the time of the judgment not yet been), litigants had the right to approach the High Court to review or appeal against decisions of the Competition Tribunal.)

[2] See, for example, United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others (African Christian Democratic Party and Others Intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa and Another as Amici Curiae*) (No 2)* 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC) at para 11 (The Court said: 'This case is not about the merits or demerits of the provisions of the disputed legislation. That is a political question and is of no concern to this Court. What has to be decided is not whether the disputed provisions are appropriate or inappropriate, but whether they are constitutional or unconstitutional.')

[3] 1999 (2) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 139 (CC)('Jooste').

[4] Act 130 of 1993 ('Compensation Act').

[5] This would include damages for pain and suffering, loss of amenities of life, future loss of earnings and future medical expenses.

[6] Jooste (supra) at para 21.

This conclusion is logical. The removal of a common-law right may often constitute a violation of a right protected by the Bill of Rights. If that is the case, the removal will be unconstitutional unless justified by FC s 36. However, if the removal of a common-law right is not a violation of a substantive right, it seems logically problematic to treat it as a violation of the right of access to courts. Although the right of access to courts has substantive components it is, in the end, a largely procedural right. Its purpose is to ensure that all disputes are resolved in fair proceedings and there is nothing in its text or purpose to suggest that it has a bearing on the existence of substantive legal rights. The rest of the Bill of Rights, in addition to the common law and statute, must determine whether a person has a particular right. FC s 34 guarantees to litigants that any proceedings to determine whether a particular right exists will be fair. It guarantees further that litigants cannot be barred (without justification) from having such disputes resolved by a court or alternative forum, and it entitles them to the enforcement of remedies, where such remedies have been provided by a court.[1] It does not, however, seek to resolve the substantive content of such disputes.[2]

However, it is not always possible to draw a neat line between questions of substantive rights (to which other provisions of the Bill of Rights apply but which cannot be resolved by recourse to FC s 34) and the right to have those questions resolved (which is provided by FC s 34). The facts of Jaftha v Schoeman and Others; Van Rooyen v Stoltz and Others[3] demonstrate the potential overlap between questions regarding the applicability of FC s 34 and questions concerning substantive rights. The case concerned the constitutionality of s 66(1)(a) of the Magistrates' Courts Act.[4] In short, this provision facilitated the summary execution against immovable property of a debtor against whom judgment had been taken. The nub of the complaint was that, while the debtor would have recourse to court to contest his indebtedness, the debtor would have no recourse to court in regard to the question whether his immovable property ought to be executed against.[5]

[1] See § 59.4*(d)* infra, for a discussion of Modderklip.

[2] See Currie & De Waal (supra) at 718. The authors describe the conclusion of the court as 'somewhat odd' in that it reduces FC s 34 to no more than a procedural fairness guarantee. However, as this chapter and the authors' own chapter make clear, there is more to FC s 34 than mere procedural fairness. All that Jooste implicitly establishes is that FC s 34 does not say anything about the substantive content of justiciable disputes. There is nothing in the text or purpose of FC s 34 that suggests otherwise.

[3] 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC)('Jaftha').

[4] Act 32 of 1944.

[5] If, having had judgment taken against him, the debtor was unable to pay the debt, the sheriff was to visit his home and seek to attach his movable property. If the debtor had insufficient movable property to cover his debt, the sheriff was to issue a nulla bona return indicating this status and the creditor was then entitled to execute against the debtor's immovable property. This execution was authorized by the clerk of the court and not by the court itself. So, in the case of a default judgment, the only court supervision from beginning to end was the initial proceedings in which judgment was given, which of course did not involve input from the debtor. In the case of a debtor who entered an appearance to defend, the court would determine the dispute in regard to the debt. However, from that moment onwards, the process of execution would also take place without court supervision.

The case was brought as a right to housing case. In particular, the case engaged the negative aspect of the right to housing in FC s 26(1). The appellants argued that they had access to housing and that the measures permitted by s 66(1)(a) of the Magistrates' Courts Act interfered with this existing access. In this sense, the provision violated the duty of the State to respect existing access to housing. The Constitutional Court agreed. Mokgoro J held that the measure limited existing access to housing and so limited the right to access to housing in FC s 26(1).[1] She held further that the measure did not pass limitation analysis to the extent that it allowed a debtor to lose his immovable property in unjustified circumstances. In other words, the measure was overbroad — there might be some circumstances in which it would be justified for a debtor to lose his immovable property to discharge his obligations to a creditor but there would be other circumstances in which the prejudice to the debtor in execution outweighed the benefit to the creditor and it would therefore be unjustified to permit execution.[2] By allowing execution in all cases, the measure went too far.

The Court's approach to remedy in Jaftha is of interest to us here. The court held that the best way to solve the overbreadth of the measure was to require court supervision over the execution process. Such supervision would enable the court to determine each case on its merits and to decide whether, on the facts of the case, it was justified to allow execution.[3] The premise of this relief is that there are many factors to be taken into account when determining whether the creditor's right to payment outweighs the debtor's interest in keeping his home. Rather than attempting to set out all of these factors in a reading-in exercise or sending the matter back to the legislature to seek to establish such factors, the Court in Jaftha felt it appropriate to instruct courts to supervise the process and make sure that justice is done in each case.

Courts are constrained by the way in which cases are argued. This case was argued in terms of FC s 26(1) and that was how it was resolved by the Constitutional Court. The question is whether this case also engaged FC s 34.

In Chief Lesapo v North West Agricultural Bank & Another, the Constitutional Court considered the validity of an ouster clause that allowed the respondent bank to attach and sell its debtors' property in execution without an order of court.[4] The right of the bank to execute in this manner arose where the debtor was in default to repay a loan. Before the Constitutional Court, the bank argued that the execution procedure only applied where there was no dispute between the parties about the underlying indebtedness and, as such, FC s 34 could have no application: there was no dispute between the parties capable of resolution by the application of law. In rejecting this argument, Mokgoro J held as follows:

[1] Jaftha (supra) at para 34.
[2] Ibid at paras 43–44.
[3] Ibid at paras 53–55.
[4] 2000 (1) SA 409 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1420 (CC)('Chief Lesapo').

> The judicial process, guaranteed by section 34, also protects the attachment and sale of a debtor's property, even where there is no dispute concerning the underlying obligation of the debtor on the strength of which the attachment and execution takes place. That protection extends to the circumstances in which property may be seized and sold in execution, and includes the control that is exercised over sales in execution.
>
> On this analysis, section 34 and the access to courts it guarantees for the adjudication of disputes are a manifestation of a deeper principle; one that underlies our democratic order. The effect of this underlying principle on the provisions of section 34 is that any constraint upon a person or property shall be exercised by another only after recourse to a court recognised in terms of the law of the land.[1]

It would seem that, on this reasoning, Jaftha did indeed engage FC s 34 and that, had the appellants relied on FC s 34, the Court would have reached a similar result. In fact, it seems as if the remedy adopted by the Court in Jaftha, although appropriate in the context of FC s 26(1), fits more neatly into the paradigm of FC s 34. The execution against immovable property involves, clearly, a constraint upon a person's property. Under the test as enunciated in Chief Lesapo, s 66(1)(a) of the Magistrates' Court Act would clearly limit FC s 34 by permitting such a constraint to be exercised without recourse to a court of law. Of course, it could be argued that the constraint was not exercised without recourse to court because the initial question whether the debtor was indeed indebted to the creditor, and hence deserved judgment to be granted against him, was determined by a court. However, Chief Lesapo and Jaftha stand for the proposition that the question of indebtedness and the question whether it is justifiable to lose one's property in respect of that indebtedness are separate enquiries and that court supervision is necessary in respect of both.

A cumulative reading of the cases discussed in this section yields the following conclusions. FC s 34 does not apply to the question whether the legislature is entitled to remove a common-law or statutory right. That is an anterior question which must be determined with reference to other substantive rights. Once it is established that a person has a common-law or statutory right, that person has a right to have disputes in respect of that right resolved by a court. Furthermore, whenever a person is entitled to impose a constraint on the person or property of another without recourse to a court (or other tribunal), FC s 34 will be limited and the constitutionality of this entitlement will need to be tested with reference to FC s 36. Lastly, a litigant is entitled to the enforcement of an appropriate remedy.[2] This reading of FC s 34 demonstrates that, although the word 'dispute' in FC s 34 is not wide enough to embrace any removal of rights, a narrow understanding of the term 'dispute' is also inappropriate. Chief Lesapo establishes the proposition that whenever a constraint on a person or her property is sought to be exercised, a dispute exists: the dispute is about the extent of the constraint and the manner in which the constraint is to be imposed.

[1] Chief Lesapo (supra) at paras 5–16 (our emphasis).
[2] For more on appropriate relief and FC s 34, see the discussion of Modderklip at § 59.4*(d)* infra.

(b) Nature of the state's obligations/nature of the right

FC s 34 imposes a range of positive and negative obligations on the state, and limited negative obligations on private persons. The state's negative obligations encompass the obligation not to restrict access to courts. Beinash v Ernst & Young,[1] is a good example of a case that implicates the negative obligations of the state. In Beinash, the court's enquiry into whether s 2(1)(b) of the Vexatious Proceedings Act[2] infringes FC s 34 was extremely brief:

> The effect of s 2(1)(b) of the Act is to impose a procedural barrier to litigation on persons who are found to be vexatious litigants. This serves to restrict the access of such persons to courts. That is its very purpose. In so doing, it is inconsistent with s 34 of the Constitution, which protects the right of access for everyone and does not contain any internal limitation of the right. The barrier which may be imposed under s 2(1)(b) therefore does limit the right of access to court protected in s 34 of the Constitution.

Section 2(1)(b), which is discussed more fully below,[3] imposes a limitation on the pre-existing, largely unfettered, right of access to courts of litigants. The section may be read as an impairment of the state's negative obligation not to inhibit access to courts. The fact that the limitation was ultimately found to be reasonable and justifiable does not alter the fact that a negative obligation was found to have been breached.[4] However, not every apparent obstacle to access constitutes an infringement of the negative obligations of the state. For example,[5] in Besserglik, the Constitutional Court held that '[w]hatever the scope of section 22 (the predecessor to FC s 34), it cannot be said that a screening procedure which excludes unmeritorious appeals is a denial of the right of access to a court.'[6] It is accordingly necessary, in the first place, to interpret the negative component of FC s 34 before determining whether state action has infringed the right.

The nature of the state's positive obligations has been clarified in Modderklip. In Modderklip, the Constitutional Court identified two broad obligations. First, the state has an obligation to provide the necessary mechanisms for citizens to resolve disputes that arise between them:[7] a legislative framework, institutions such as the courts, and an infrastructure designed to facilitate the execution of court orders.[8] This obligation must be read with FC s 165(4). FC s 165(4)

[1] 1999 (2) SA 116 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 125 (CC)('Beinash').
[2] Act 3 of 1956.
[3] See § 59.4*(a)*(vi) infra.
[4] For a critical discussion of the case, see S Woolman 'The Right Consistency: Beinash v Ernst & Young 1999 (2) SA 116 (CC)' (1999) 15 SAJHR 166, 170–175. The views expressed in that article do not necessarily reflect those of the authors.
[5] See further § 59.3*(a)*(iii) supra.
[6] Besserglik v Minister of Trade, Industry and Tourism and Others (Minister of Justice intervening) 1996 (4) SA 331 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 745 (CC) at para 10.
[7] Modderklip (supra) at para 39.
[8] Ibid at para 41.

provides that organs of state, through legislative and other measures, must assist and protect the courts to ensure their independence, impartiality, dignity, accessibility and effectiveness.

Secondly, the Court in Modderklip held that the state is obliged to take 'reasonable steps, where possible, to ensure that large-scale disruptions in the social fabric do not occur in the wake of the execution of court orders, thus undermining the rule of law'.[1] The Court added that the precise nature of the state's obligation will depend on what is reasonable, having regard to the nature of the right or interest that is at risk, as well as the circumstances of each case.[2] In Modderklip, the Court applied this test to the facts of the case as follows:

> The question that needs to be answered is whether the State was, in the circumstances, obliged to do more than it has done to satisfy the requirements of the rule of law and fulfil the section 34 rights of Modderklip. I find that it was unreasonable of the State to stand by and do nothing in circumstances where it was impossible for Modderklip to evict the occupiers because of the sheer magnitude of the invasion and the particular circumstances of the occupiers.[3]

Modderklip was an extraordinary case, and the Court explained that the execution of an eviction order would not normally raise problems that cannot be accommodated through the existing mechanisms established by the state.[4] Therefore, this second obligation to take 'reasonable steps, where possible, to ensure that large-scale disruptions in the social fabric do not occur in the wake of the execution of court orders, thus undermining the rule of law' applies only in exceptional circumstances. It is implicated only when the mechanisms established by the state in the discharge of its primary FC s 34 obligation would, if applied in the normal way, result in 'large-scale disruptions in the social fabric' and undermine the rule of law. The Court found that the state should have anticipated such consequences if the eviction order in Modderklip were executed.[5] Modderklip demonstrates that the discharge of this extraordinary, second obligation to take reasonable steps to ensure that large-scale disruptions in the social fabric do not take place may require extraordinary remedies. The Court ultimately awarded what must be regarded as constitutional damages. (However, the Court chose not to use this term.[6])

[1] Modderklip (supra) at para 43.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid at para 48.
[4] Ibid at para 47.
[5] Ibid.
[6] Ibid at paras 59–66.

When does the extraordinary obligation of the state established in Modderklip arise? It appears to arise where normal judicial and enforcement mechanisms cannot operate, and, as a result, a polycentric conflict occurs which is likely to cause a 'large-scale disruption in the social fabric'. What are disruptions in the social fabric? The Court also used the language of 'order in society', 'societal disruptions' and 'social upheaval'.[1] This poetic, but vague, reference to the 'social fabric', in our view, should be taken to refer, not to the anticipated public reaction to the execution of an unpopular court order, but rather to whether it is possible to execute the order in the light of the exceptional consequences of execution. In Modderklip, the Court referred, albeit tangentially, to the obligation of the state 'progressively to ensure access to housing or land for the homeless' and by implication for the specific occupiers in that case.[2] Eviction in this case would have been inconsistent with the rights of occupiers and the obligations of the state under FC s 26. In our view, that fact constituted the threat of 'disruption in the social fabric'. The judgment should not be read as imposing an obligation on the state to find alternatives to the execution of every order likely to be met with a hostile public reaction.

Later in its judgment, the Court expresses the obligation of the state under the rule of law and FC s 34 in the language of 'relief' and 'remedy':

> The obligation resting on the State in terms of section 34 of the Constitution was, in the circumstances, to take reasonable steps to ensure that Modderklip was, in the final analysis, provided with effective relief. The State could have expropriated the property in question or provided other land, a course that would have relieved Modderklip from continuing to bear the burden of providing the occupiers with accommodation. The State failed to do anything and accordingly breached Modderklip's constitutional rights to an effective remedy as required by the rule of law and entrenched in section 34 of the Constitution.[3] (our emphasis)

This obligation to take reasonable steps to ensure that a litigant is provided with effective relief is, in our view, something different from the extraordinary obligation to take reasonable steps to ensure that, in executing a court order, large-scale disruptions in the social fabric do not occur. The focus lies in two different places: in the 'relief' formulation, the focus is on the right-holder's entitlement to relief; whereas in the earlier 'social fabric' formulation, the focus is on society and the impact of execution on other persons. The answer to this apparent conundrum lies in the proposition that the rights conferred on individuals and the obligations of the state under FC s 34 and the rule of law in FC s 1*(c)* are neither corollaries nor contradictions. As concerns an individual who has obtained a court order, FC s 34 confers a right and imposes a concomitant obligation on the state to enforce remedies that provide 'effective relief'. However, FC s 34 read with the rule of law value in FC s 1*(c)* also imposes constitutional obligations on the state to prevent disruption in the social fabric that might result from the execution of court orders by the state machinery. This obligation is owed not to the holder of such a court order, whose right is a right to enforcement of an 'effective remedy', but to other persons (perhaps the public as a whole) whose constitutional rights would be threatened or infringed by execution. In §59.4*(d)* below, we discuss the right to enforcement of an 'effective remedy' or 'effective relief' established by the Court in Modderklip.

[1] Modderklip (supra) at para 46.
[2] Ibid at para 49.
[3] Ibid at para 51.

The primary obligation identified in Modderklip — the obligation of the state to put in place mechanisms to facilitate the resolution of disputes — also contemplates the establishment, where appropriate, of alternative dispute resolution mechanisms to the ordinary courts. Furthermore, the state is obliged to ensure the 'appropriateness' and 'independence' of any tribunal or forum established to fulfil functions instead of a court and to ensure the fairness of such proceedings.[1]

59.4 THE CONTENT OF THE RIGHT

The issues considered in the previous section are relevant to the question whether FC s 34 applies in the first place, and, if so, what its nature and character are. It is now appropriate to turn to consider the content of the right of access to courts in detail. Given the text of the right, it is convenient to identify three topics to consider: first, the provision confers a right for disputes to be 'decided before a court'; this is the component of the right that directly confers the right of access to court and, in the context of this aspect of the right, it is necessary to consider provisions that limit somehow the access to court of particular litigants or litigants in general. Secondly, the text of FC s 34 suggests that a component of the right is the right to a fair public hearing. Thirdly, FC s 34 makes clear that, where appropriate, the right to a fair public hearing may be exercised not in a court, but in an independent and impartial alternative tribunal or forum. In this section, we consider each of these three topics in turn. Since the decision of the Constitutional Court in Modderklip, it is now necessary to add a fourth component of the right: the right to enforcement of a remedy. The Constitutional Court has now made it clear that a component of the right of access to court is the right to enforce the right to appropriate relief.

(a) Access to court

Perhaps the most prominent component of FC s 34 is the guarantee that litigants may bring their case before a court. A clear example of a provision that would violate this section is one that prohibits the bringing of legal proceedings against the state. Under apartheid, a decree applicable in the former homeland of [1] See De Lange v Smuts NO 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC).

Ciskei provided that '[n]o legal proceedings may be brought against the state in respect of any claim arising from any procedural irregularity, abuse of power, maladministration, nepotism, corruption or act of negative discrimination on the part of any member or servant of the Government of the Republic of Ciskei which was overthrown on 4 March 1990.'[1] Such a provision does not seek to extinguish the underlying claim but rather attempts to prevent the claim from being brought before a court. Unsurprisingly, this provision was held to conflict with the Ciskeian equivalent of FC s 34.[2] In the section that follows, we consider various provisions that, far less blatantly, have the effect of limiting, or potentially limiting, access to court.

(i) Ouster clauses

Ouster clauses were common during apartheid and were primarily used to prevent judicial review of executive conduct.[3] One of the reasons for entrenching FC s 34 in the Bill of Rights is to prevent such clauses from being used again.

The Constitutional Court has had a number of opportunities to consider the validity of provisions that permit disputes to be resolved without recourse to courts. These provisions differ from traditional ouster clauses because they do not concern attempts by the state to remove judicial supervision of its conduct. However, what these provisions do have in common with traditional ouster clauses is that, in both cases, the aggrieved party is denied recourse to a court in order to obtain relief. In this sense, these clauses may be considered 'implied ousters'. They have the effect of ousting the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts by establishing a parallel dispute-resolution process that lacks the protections afforded by the courts. So, although they do not expressly oust the jurisdiction of the courts, the effect is much the same.

The provision considered in Chief Lesapo allowed the first respondent bank to recall loans paid to debtors and, if the debtors were in default, to order the messenger of the court to attach and to sell in execution the debtors' property.[4] The direction given by the respondent bank to the messenger of the court was given without recourse to court.

In striking down the section, which allowed the Bank to bypass completely the scrutiny of the courts, Mokgoro J said the following:

[1] Definition of State Liability Decree 34 of 1990 (Ck) s 2(1).

[2] See Ntenteni v Chairman, Ciskei Council of State and Another 1993 (4) SA 546 (Ck), 1994 (1) BCLR 168, 182 (Ck).

[3] See C Hoexter with R Lyster The New Constitutional and Administrative Law II — Administrative Law (2002) 305. See § 59.2*(a)* supra.

[4] North West Agricultural Bank Act 14 of 1981 s 38(2).

> A trial or hearing before a court or tribunal is not an end in itself. It is a means of determining whether a legal obligation exists and whether the coercive power of the state can be invoked to enforce an obligation, or prevent an unlawful act being committed. It serves other purposes as well, including that of institutionalising the resolution of disputes, and preventing remedies being sought through self help. No one is entitled to take the law into her or his own hands. Self help, in this sense, is inimical to a society in which the rule of law prevails.[1]

The Court rejected the notion that the provision would only be offensive if there was a dispute about the underlying indebtedness. The right to protection against self-help extended to supervision by the court over the execution process.[2]

The Court's attitude to the resort to self-help facilitated by the section was expressed as follows:

> Section 38(2) authorizes the Bank, an adversary of the debtor, to decide the outcome of the dispute. The Bank thus becomes a judge in its own cause. The authority to adjudicate over justiciable disputes and to order appropriate relief and the enforcement of the order by attachment and sale of the debtor's goods in a civil matter, vests in the courts of the land. Section 38(2), however, limits the debtor's rights in section 34 by vesting that authority in the Bank. The Bank itself decides whether it has an enforceable claim against the debtor; the Bank itself decides the outcome of the dispute and the subsequent relief; and the Bank itself enforces its own decision, thereby usurping the powers and functions of the courts. The fact that the debtor may have recourse to a court of law after the attachment takes place does not cure the limitation of the right; it merely restricts its duration. For the period of limitation, the debtor has been deprived of possession of the assets in question without the intervention of a court of law and in a manner inconsistent with section 34.[3]

As part of its limitation analysis, the Court emphasized the importance of the right of access to courts. In particular, the Court described the right as 'a bulwark against vigilantism, and the chaos and anarchy which it causes.'[4] The Court acknowledged the purpose behind the measure — it provided the bank with a quick way to recover money, which, after all, it held in the public interest to begin with — but emphasized that this purpose was not at odds with having justiciable disputes resolved by courts.[5] The Court was also of the view that the measure did not manifestly succeed in saving substantial time and money for the Bank and that, compared with the inroad into the right of access to court, this purported advantage did not justify the measure.[6] The provision was therefore declared unconstitutional.[7]

[1] Chief Lesapo (supra) at para 11.
[2] Ibid at para 15.
[3] Ibid at para 20.
[4] Ibid at para 22.
[5] Ibid at para 24.
[6] Ibid at para 26.
[7] Ibid at para 29. See also First National Bank of South Africa Limited v Land and Agricultural Bank of South Africa and Others; Sheard v Land and Agricultural Bank of South Africa and Another 2000 (3) SA 626 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 876 (CC)('Land Agricultural Bank')(The Court struck down similar provisions of the Land Bank Act 13 of 1944. The Act has since been repealed.)

In Zondi v MEC, for Traditional and Local Government Affairs and Others,[1] the applicant challenged certain provisions of a KwaZulu-Natal Pound ordinance.[2] The ordinance provided for the seizure of a person's livestock that trespassed on another's land. In terms of the ordinance, if a landowner found livestock that had trespassed onto his land, then he was entitled to impound it. The landowner was not obliged to give notice to the owner of the livestock unless the owner of the livestock owned the land adjacent to the landowner's land,[3] in which case 12 hours' written or verbal warning would suffice.[4] Once the animals were seized they could be driven to a pound by the landowner. The ordinance obliged the landowner to provide various pieces of information to the poundkeeper, but not the identity of the livestock owner, even if this was known to him. The poundkeeper had to inform the livestock owner of the fact that the animals were impounded, but only if the owner's identity was known to him,[5] and only to facilitate a hearing to determine the quantum of damages to which the landowner was entitled as a consequence of the trespass. If the animals were not claimed, then they could be sold to defray costs and the remaining animals could be destroyed. If the livestock owner had been identified, then he could only reclaim his livestock on the payment of pound fees and any damages due to the landowner. The only notice of an impending sale of livestock by a pound was provided in local newspapers and the Provincial Gazette.

Having explained why access to court generally requires the prevention of self-help, Ngcobo J gave the following guidance on the application of FC s 34:

> Section 34, therefore, requires not only that individuals should not be permitted to resort to self-help, but it also requires that potentially divisive social conflicts must be resolved by courts, or other independent and impartial tribunals. Section 34 recognises that it is important to do so to ensure that orderly and fair solutions to such conflicts are found, to promote social cohesion and to avoid the exacerbation of division and unfairness. Determining whether it is necessary for such conflicts to be brought before courts will require a consideration of the potential for social conflict in relation to the particular matters concerned, the equality of arms of the parties that are likely to be involved in such conflict, and the practicalities of requiring such matters to be resolved by courts, amongst other things.

In considering the constitutionality of the impounding provision, the Court in Zondi did not consider whether the provision also limited the right of access to courts. Ngcobo J held that, even if the provision did, it would be justifiable in terms of FC s 36: it is necessary to have a provision that allows a landowner to impound animals on an immediate basis.[6] Standing alone, therefore, it would not

[1] 2005 (3) SA 589 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 347 (CC)('Zondi').

[2] Pound Ordinance 32 of 1947 (KZN). The applicant challenged ss 8, 10(2), 12, 16(1), 29(1), 33, 34, 37 and 41(4) of the Ordinance.

[3] Ownership was determined by the presence of the adjacent owner's brand on the livestock.

[4] See Zondi (supra) at paras 45ff.

[5] There is no obligation to take steps to ascertain the identity of the owner.

[6] Zondi (supra) at paras 66 and 67.

be improper for a provision to allow a landowner to impound animals without notifying the owner. It was necessary, however, to consider this provision in the context of the entire scheme.[1] Viewed in context, the entire scheme was held to limit the right of access to court.[2] The main problem with the scheme was not so much that the animals could be impounded without notice, but that the animals could be sold in execution and the quantum of damages suffered by the landowner would all be determined without any supervision by the courts:[3]

> The effect of the scheme, therefore, is to remove from the court's scrutiny one of the sharpest and most divisive conflicts of our society. The problem of cattle trespassing on farmland must be seen in the context I have outlined above. It is not merely the ordinary agrarian irritation it must be in many societies. It is a constant and bitter reminder of the process of colonial dispossession and exclusion. The potential for conflict between landless stockowners, whose forebears were deprived of their land, and farmers must be acknowledged. Moreover, in many cases, landless stockowners, for whom cattle constitute not only a form of material security, but also a way of life of tremendously significant social and communal importance, will have scant ability to approach courts for relief when their cattle are impounded. The effect of the impounding scheme as described, therefore, is to effectively remove from the arena of courts the sharp conflicts which will often underlie the process of impoundment.[4]

In assessing the justifiability of the measure, the Court in Zondi held that the more potentially divisive a conflict is, the more important it is for the dispute to be resolved by a court.[5] While it was clearly necessary to have an efficient, immediate mechanism to impound trespassing livestock, there was no reason why the process to determine damages and the execution process could not be supervised by a court.[6] The potentially devastating effects that the sale of livestock could have on poor people, coupled with the fact that it would not be necessary to oust the jurisdiction of the courts once the immediate problem of trespassing animals had been solved, led the court to conclude that the legislative scheme was not justifiable in terms of FC s 36.[7]

By contrast, the Constitutional Court in Metcash[8] found that certain provisions of the Value-Added Tax Act[9] did not limit the right of access to court. The [1] Zondi (supra) at para 73.

[2] Ibid at para 78.
[3] Ibid at paras 74-76.
[4] Ibid at para 76.
[5] Ibid at para 82.
[6] Ibid at para 83.
[7] Ibid at para 86.
[8] Metcash Trading Ltd v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service 2001 (1) SA 1109 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Metcash').
[9] Act 89 of 1991 ('the VAT Act'). The provisions of the Act that were struck down by the High Court (Metcash Trading Ltd v Commissioner for the SA Revenue Service and Another 2000 (2) SA 232 (W), 2000 (3) BCLR 318 (W)) were ss 36(1), 40(2)(a) and 40(5) of the Act.

VAT Act establishes a scheme in terms of which vendors are, in the first instance, obliged to police themselves and to submit VAT payments. However, if the Commissioner of the South African Revenue Service is not satisfied with a vendor's assessment, then he is entitled to intervene and inform that vendor that he will conduct an assessment into the vendor's VAT liability. The Commissioner's assessment has the effect of a civil judgment, but remains subject to an appeal-like process.[1] However, unlike the ordinary approach to noting of an appeal, which suspends the operation of the judgment appealed against, the VAT Act specifically provides that the Commissioner's assessment remains in effect. The Act creates a 'pay now, argue later' approach; only if the Commissioner's assessment turns out to be wrong is the vendor entitled to repayment of the excess amount, plus interest.[2]

The appeal process envisaged by the VAT Act allows a vendor to appeal the Commissioner's assessment to the Special Court created by the Income Tax Act[3] or a board.[4] Thereafter, the vendor possesses a further right to appeal the decision of the Special Court to an ordinary court of law.[5] The Court pointed out that the Act did not in any way oust the right of access to court. Had the special appeal process not been established, the decision of the Commissioner would, in any case, have been subject to judicial review.[6] Furthermore, the Commissioner's discretion would have to be exercised in the light of the Final Constitution.[7] The provision did not, therefore, limit the right of access to court.

The applicants also challenged the following provision:

> If any person fails to pay any tax, additional tax, penalty or interest payable in terms of this Act, when it becomes due or is payable by him, the Commissioner may file with the clerk or Registrar of any competent court a statement certified by him as correct and setting forth the amount thereof so due or payable by that person, and such statement shall thereupon have all the effects of, and any proceedings may be taken thereon as if it were, a civil judgment lawfully given in that court in favour of the Commissioner for a liquid debt of the amount specified in the statement.[8]

[1] The Court in Metcash pointed out that the process is not technically an appeal because the Commissioner performs an administrative and not judicial function. The process was therefore 'proceedings in terms of a statutory mechanism specially created for the reconsideration of this particular category of administrative decisions — and appropriate corrective action — by a specialist tribunal'. Metcash (supra) at para 32.

[2] Also noteworthy is the fact that the Commissioner has the discretion to waive the right to immediate payment and to allow the vendor not to pay in terms of the assessment, pending the appeal process being finalized.

[3] Act 58 of 1962.

[4] Metcash (supra) at para 32.

[5] See VAT Act s 34.

[6] Metcash (supra) at para 33.

[7] Ibid at paras 41–3.

[8] VAT Act s 40(2)(a).

The applicants argued that this provision sanctioned self-help by allowing the Commissioner to bypass the courts. The Constitutional Court rejected this contention. Although the provision provided a short-cut for the Commissioner, it did not in any way oust the normal judicial supervision over the execution process.[1]

In Armbruster, the Constitutional Court rejected the appellants' FC s 34 arguments. It held that the constitutional challenge failed on grounds similar to those that disposed of Metcash.[2] The impugned regulations deal with the seizure and forfeiture of foreign currency.[3] In terms of the regulations, foreign currency may not leave the country without an exemption or permission from the Treasury. The impugned regulations allow a customs official to search people leaving the country and seize foreign currency found in their possession. Furthermore, the seized currency is forfeited to the state unless the Treasury exercises its discretion to return the currency.

The Court in Armbruster distinguished Zondi and Chief Lesapo on three broad bases. Zondi and Chief Lesapo were concerned with respondents who could resort to self-help 'in the sense that they could execute and sell property without a court order and without any judicial supervision in respect of debts.'[4] The types of interventions in those cases, which amounted to sales of the complainants' property, were far more drastic and required far greater judicial control than forfeiture of currency about to be removed from the country: In the present case, '[t]he property has already been seized to achieve public purposes relating to protection of foreign exchange reserves.'[5] Secondly, a distinguishing feature of Zondi was that the impugned provisions had the potential to cause social conflict, which was not so in the case of the regulations impugned in Armbruster. Lastly, and perhaps most importantly, the decision whether to forfeit the currently was an administrative act, which meant that the ratio of Metcash was applicable. Thus, as in Metcash, the regulations did not infringe FC s 34.[6]

In the light of the above cases, and the recent case of Armbruster in particular, it seems that the greater the potential for social conflict, the more likely a particular measure will be to infringe FC s 34. Likewise, the more drastic the effect on an applicant's interests, the more likely a measure will be found to limit FC s 34. Furthermore, if an impugned measure provides for an administrative process, it is unlikely to infringe FC s 34, because the administrative conduct in question will

[1] Ibid at paras 50-51.

[2] Armbruster and Another v Minister of Finance and Others [2007] ZACC 17 (25 September 2007).

[3] The challenged regulations were regs 3(3) and 3(5) of Exchange Control Regulations promulgated under s 9 of the Currency and Exchanges Act 9 of 1933 (the Act), which empowers the Governor-General to make Exchange Control Regulations. The regulations were published under GN R1111 in GG Extraordinary 123 of 1 December 1961. The appellants technically challenged only the constitutionality of reg 3(5) but a consideration of that regulation was impossible without a consideration of reg 3(3).

[4] Armbruster (supra) at para 59.

[5] Ibid at para 60.

[6] Ibid at para 61.

be reviewable. It must be recalled that the Court, in Zondi, assumed that the measure limited FC s 34 and did its analysis under FC s 36. The factors that it introduced, such as the focus on the social context and divisiveness of the measure, were relevant to limitation analysis and not to whether FC s 34 had been limited. The Court was wrong in Armbruster, in our view, to take these factors into account when conducting its threshold analysis regarding the question whether FC s 34 had been limited. The only factor that leads to the conclusion that the impugned measures in Metcash and Armbruster did not limit FC s 34 is the fact that the administrative acts at issue are reviewable.

In another line of cases, the constitutional validity of common-law parate executie clauses, or summary-execution clauses, has been considered. These clauses provide for the sale of a debtor's property pursuant to a security agreement with a creditor. Before turning to those cases, it is necessary to provide some background to the common-law position. Susan Scott captures the common-law position succinctly and lucidly.[1] She points out that it is necessary to draw a distinction between three mechanisms that implicate a debtor's property. The first is a statutory mechanism allowing the state to seize a debtor's property without recourse to a court of law. Such mechanisms were considered in Chief Lesapo and Land Agricultural Bank. The second mechanism is a perfection clause in a contract creating a notarial bond. A notarial bond is essentially a mortgage in respect of movables. The perfection of the notarial bond creates a real right of security for the creditor.[2] It must be remembered that, in terms of a notarial bond, a creditor obtains a right of security in respect of the debtor's hypothecated movable without the debtor having to give possession of the movable to the creditor. (This feature reflects the most important distinction between a perfection clause and a pledge). However, in order for the creditor to obtain a real right of security, he needs to 'perfect' his claim by obtaining possession of the bonded movable.[3] The 'perfection clause' facilitates possession. The clause will permit the creditor to take possession of the bonded movables on the occurrence of certain events envisaged by the contract. Crucially, possession must occur either with the debtor's permission or with a court order.

The third mechanism is a summary-execution clause. In terms of such a clause, the debtor authorizes the sale of his hypothecated property by the creditor upon the debtor's default without court approval. In terms of the common law, such clauses are impermissible in respect of mortgage bonds but permissible in respect of pledges.[4] The crucial difference between the two is that in the case of mortgage bonds the debtor remains in possession of the property, whereas in the case of pledges, the creditor takes possession of the property in question upon conclusion of the pledge agreement.

[1] S Scott 'Summary Execution Clauses in Pledge and Perfecting Clauses in Notarial Bonds' (2002) 65 THRHR 656.
[2] Ibid at 659–60.
[3] Ibid at 660.
[4] Ibid at 660.

In Findevco (Pty) Ltd v Faceformat SA (Pty) Ltd, the applicant bondholder applied to court for an order allowing it to perfect its security agreement with the respondent by taking possession of the debtor's movable property hypothecated in terms of the contract and to sell it to discharge the security obligation.[1] In other words, the case concerned the second mechanism described above. Froneman J, relying upon Chief Lesapo and Land Agricultural Bank, held that, if such clauses were impermissible in terms of legislation, he could not see why the common law should permit them.[2] It is clear, therefore, that Froneman J treated perfection clauses as analogous to the statutory mechanisms struck down in Chief Lesapo and Land Agricultural Bank. In Senwes Ltd v Muller, Moseneke AJ (as he then was), relying too on Chief Lesapo, held that certain clauses in a contract that permitted the notarial bond-holder to attach and to execute against the hypothecated movables of the debtor without notice and without legal process were unenforceable.[3] This case was also concerned with a perfection clause. However, these clauses contained some particularly onerous provisions: — for instance, the creditor was unilaterally entitled to determine if default had occurred.

Harms JA made strong obiter remarks in Bock and Others v Duburoro Investments (Pty) Ltd indicating that he believed that Findevco was wrongly decided.[4] He drew attention to the distinction between summary-execution clauses where the hypothecated property remains in the possession of the debtor and such clauses where the creditor takes lawful possession of the property in terms of the contract. Harms JA pointed out that parate executie clauses are void in the former case and enforceable, subject to a condition, in the latter case.[5] The condition in the latter case is that clauses that impose obligations on the debtors that are too onerous are contrary to public policy: they are, therefore, not enforceable. Harms JA held that the common law had always rejected self-help, that the distinction drawn by the common law was aimed at prohibiting self-help and that the Constitutional Court in Chief Lesapo and Land Agricultural Bank was concerned with statutory exceptions to the norm. Those statutory exemptions permitted far more 'self-help' than the common law would tolerate.[6] Findevco was, therefore, wrongly decided.[7]

The Supreme Court of Appeal, in Juglal NO and Another v Shoprite Checkers (Pty) Ltd t/a OK Franchise Division,[8] approved the following summary of the common-law position, set out by Hurt J in the court below:

[1] 2001 (1) SA 251 (E)('Findevco')(This case concerned the return day of a rule nisi on which the respondent was obliged to show cause why the applicant should not be entitled to take possession of its property and sell it as security in terms of the agreement.)
[2] Ibid at 256E–G.
[3] 2002 (4) SA 134F, 142 (T).
[4] 2004 (2) SA 242 (SCA)('Bock').
[5] Ibid at paras 7 and 14.
[6] Ibid at paras 14–15.
[7] Ibid at para 15.
[8] 2004 (5) SA 248 (SCA)('Juglal').

> In summary, the common law, insofar as stipulations for parate execution are concerned, is that stipulations, which are not so far-reaching as to be contrary to public policy, are valid and enforceable; that, as a matter of practice, creditors seeking to enforce such stipulations take the precaution of applying for judicial sanction before doing so; and that the debtor can avail himself of the court's assistance in order to protect himself against prejudice at the hands of the creditor.[1]

The Supreme Court of Appeal continued:

> To this I would add that the 'matter of practice' referred to is in fact a constitutional requirement: creditors not in possession are obliged to apply for judicial sanction. With that qualification, Hurt J's exposition seems to me to be a correct summary of the present state of the common law.[2]

It is important to note that Juglal was concerned with a perfection clause in respect of a notarial bond.

Van Zyl, a third Supreme Court of Appeal judgment on this subject, concerns a contract in terms of which the debtor ceded certain insurance policies to the creditor bank in a contract that entitled the bank to sell or keep the policies upon default by the debtor.[3] The Supreme Court of Appeal confirmed that parate executie clauses had been deemed acceptable in our law so long as their terms were not too onerous. The Supreme Court of Appeal provided two examples of terms too onerous: (a) terms that would entitle the creditor unilaterally to determine default; and (b) terms that would entitle the creditor to seize the debtor's property without the permission of the court.[4] The Supreme Court of Appeal in Van Zyl also approved the dicta in Bock and Juglal and, on the facts, held that the clauses in question did not authorize the creditor to determine whether default had occurred. Furthermore, the clauses did not purport to authorize the creditor bank to bypass the courts in a dispute regarding the validity of the cession agreements.[5]

Many of these judgments, including those of the Supreme Court of Appeal, draw an inadequate distinction between perfection clauses and summary execution clauses.[6] Many of the cases discussed above made wide-reaching comments about all forms of parate executie clauses despite the fact that they were concerned only with perfection clauses. We can see nothing constitutionally objectionable about perfection clauses. In terms of such clauses, if the debtor does not give permission to the creditor to perfect his right of security (at the time at which the creditor seeks to do so), the only way for a creditor to perfect his right of security is through the courts. To the extent, therefore, that the Supreme Court of Appeal rejected the categorical reasoning of the High Courts in regard to perfection clauses, it must be supported.

[1] Juglal (supra) at para 9.
[2] Ibid.
[3] SA Bank of Athens Ltd v Van Zyl 2005 (5) SA 93 (SCA)('Van Zyl').
[4] Ibid at para 10.
[5] Ibid at paras 14–15.
[6] See S Cook & G Quixley 'Parate Executie Clauses: Is the Debate Dead' (2004) 112 SALJ 719, 728.

However, the really interesting constitutional question only seems to have been dealt with as part of the ratio of Van Zyl. Van Zyl engages the serious debate in the common law about the exact juridical definition of cessions in securitatem debiti.[1] For our purposes it is useful to see them as pledges of incorporeals. Therefore, Van Zyl dealt with the controversial aspect of the existing common law of parate executie clauses — the constitutionality of summary-execution clauses in which no court supervision is required. Although the High Court read the contract in such a way that there was no scope for the creditor unilaterally to determine default, it seems clear from the judgment that the contract allowed the creditor to sell the policies, once default had been established, without a court order.[2]

What, then, is the current position in regard to parate executie clauses? It seems that perfection clauses — which permit a creditor to take possession of movable property that is subject to a notarial bond, on the occurrence of events specified in the contract, provided that he obtains the debtor's permission or a court order — will be acceptable, so long as they do not contain unduly onerous terms. Furthermore, summary-execution clauses where the property remains in the possession of the debtor will only be acceptable if court supervision is required before the creditor may sell or deal with the hypothecated property. This reflects what has long been the common-law position. As far as summary-execution clauses in the case of pledges are concerned, the Supreme Court of Appeal is of the view that they are not per se inconsistent with FC s 34: the debtor must have the opportunity to approach a court to prevent prejudice and there must be no other unduly onerous clauses.

The crisp question then, is whether the Supreme Court of Appeal is correct in so far as summary-execution clauses in pledge agreements are concerned? Scott argues that summary-execution clauses in respect of pledges are constitutionally permissible. She accepts that the creditor and the debtor may not have equal bargaining positions but points out that the creditor is under no obligation to provide credit and the debtor is not compelled to seek it.[3] Furthermore, she points out that there will be greater costs involved for the creditor if he constantly has to approach the courts to oversee the process. Most importantly, she contends that, in terms of the common law, the pledgee is treated as a representative of the pledgor. He will therefore be bound by all the general duties of a representative.[4] Scott asks: 'if a person is willing to part with his/her property voluntarily to secure a debt, why should that person not be allowed to authorize the creditor to sell the property without recourse to the courts, should the debtor be in default?'[5]

[1] See Joubert (ed) Law of South Africa vol 17 at para 526 n5 (Additional authorities cited there.)
[2] See Van Zyl (supra) at para 8.
[3] Scott (supra) at 663.
[4] Ibid at 663.
[5] Ibid.

On the other hand, Cook and Quixley argue that much of the emphasis in Bock, in holding that parate executie clauses in the case of pledge will generally be acceptable, was on the fact that, since the property is already in the possession of the creditor in the case of pledge, there can be no question of self-help because there is no 'seizing' of the property.[1] However, Cook and Quixley correctly note that the selling of the pledged property without court supervision could ultimately amount to self help.[2] As a result, the fact that the debtor may approach a court in the case of alleged prejudicial conduct by the creditor may not cure the unconstitutional defect of such clauses.[3]

It is our view that a case-specific approach is vital in this context. Scott, Cook and Quixley all make the point that pledges are important commercial instruments. It would be unfortunate if an unduly rigid approach to their constitutionality were adopted by the courts. Such rigidity could have a chilling effect on the conclusion of these agreements. There is no doubt, however, that the constitutional enquiry cannot turn solely on the question whether the creditor is able to 'seize' the property. Self-help can also take the form of the creditor selling the property without supervision, even if the initial transfer of property (in terms of the pledge) occurs with the approval of the debtor. Context is all important. It seems that, where the parties to the contract are both powerful companies, the protection offered by the right of the debtor to approach the court in the case of prejudice ought to be sufficient to protect its interests. On the other hand, where the debtor is in a weak financial and social position, such that he may not be fully aware of his rights or may not have the resources to seek out the protection of the courts, it may be that it would be contrary to public policy (as informed by FC s 34) to allow a summary-execution clause. As will be discussed immediately below, the preferred approach of the Constitutional Court,[4] when considering the validity of contracts, is to see the clauses of the contract through the prism of the 'public-policy test' as informed by the Bill of Rights. This case-sensitive approach eschews the articulation of broad rules. A case-by-case approach is more likely to ensure that only those summary-execution clauses that operate unfairly in the circumstances will be set aside.

(ii) Prescription

In terms of the Prescription Act,[5] the standard period after which a civil debt prescribes is three years.[6] The Prescription Act itself creates exceptions,[7] but the [1] Cook & Quixley (supra) at 726.

[2] Ibid at 726–727.
[3] Ibid at 726.
[4] See Barkhuizen v Napier 2001 (5) SA 323 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 691 (CC).
[5] Act 68 of 1969.
[6] Section 11*(d)* read with s 10(1).
[7] See s 11 of the Act. An example is a debt secured by mortgage bond, which prescribes after only 30 years.

starting point is three years. Mohlomi v Minister of Defence was the first matter before the Constitutional Court in which an attempt by the legislature to shorten the period of prescription was challenged as a violation of FC s 34.[1]

The provision under attack was section 113(1) of the Defence Act.[2] Section 113(1) provided a six-month prescription of claims against the state and a requirement of notice at least one month before the commencement of an action against the state.[3] In Mohlomi, both aspects of this provision were challenged in terms of IC s 22 (FC s 34's precursor).

An important aspect of the scheme created by the Prescription Act is that prescription only begins to run once the creditor has knowledge of the debt due to him.[4] Although the Act speaks in terms of 'debts', 'creditors' and 'debtors', these rules apply to all claims. The basic rule is that prescription only begins to run where the plaintiff or applicant has knowledge (or reasonably ought to have had knowledge) of the existence of the cause of action, the identity of the debtor and the facts from which the debt arises.[5] One of the particularly harsh aspects of s 113(1) of the Defence Act, as interpreted by the courts, was that these rules of the Prescription Act did not apply to it. As a result, the six-month period was deemed a bar to the institution of an action against the state, regardless of whether the plaintiff had knowledge of his right to proceed within the six-month period or the facts necessary to proceed.[6]

In finding that the provision violated IC s 22, Didcott J held that the inflexible requirements of the section > must be viewed against the background depicted by the state of affairs prevailing in South Africa, a land where poverty and illiteracy abound and differences of culture and language are pronounced, where such conditions isolate the people whom they handicap from the mainstream of the law, where most persons who have been injured are either unaware of or poorly informed about their legal rights and what they should do in order to enforce those, and where access to the professional advice and assistance that they need so sorely is often difficult for financial or geographical reasons. The severity of s 113(1) which then becomes conspicuous has the effect, in my opinion, that many of the claimants whom it hits are not afforded an adequate and fair opportunity to seek judicial redress for wrongs allegedly done

[1] 1997 (1) SA 124 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1559 (CC).
[2] Act 44 of 1957. This Defence Act has almost entirely been replaced by the Defence Act 42 of 2002.
[3] Section 113 reads as follows:
No civil action shall be capable of being instituted against the State or any person in respect of anything done or omitted to be done in pursuance of this Act, if a period of six months . . . has elapsed since the date on which the cause of action arose, and notice in writing of any such civil action and of the cause thereof shall be given to the defendant one month at least before the commencement thereof.
[4] Prescription Act 68 of 1969 s 12.
[5] Prescription Act s 12(3). See also HMBMP Properties (Pty) Ltd v King 1981 (1) SA 906, 909A–B (N).
[6] Pizani v Minister of Defence 1987 (4) SA 592, 602D–G (A).

> to them. They are left with too short a time within which to give the requisite notices in the first place and to sue in the second. Their rights in terms of section 22 are thus, I believe, infringed.[1]

These remarks were made in the context of a test established by the court to determine whether a truncated prescription period violated the right of access to court. Didcott J held that it is not desirable for litigation to be drawn out forever and for cases to be determined long after the cause of action arose. It was therefore desirable for the legislature to fix a cut-off for the institution of litigation.[2] However, not all time-periods would be acceptable and the challenge in Mohlomi was to provide a test in terms of which to approach this matter. Didcott J explained that the dilemma with time-periods stems from the fact that any time period may operate to exclude, completely, the right of a plaintiff to obtain redress. Even a seven-year period of prescription could bar litigants from pursuing their actions. The court in Mohlomi chose not to adopt an approach in terms of which all prescription periods constitute limitations of the right of access to court, which must be justified, if possible, in terms of the limitation clause. Rather, the court in Mohlomi held as follows:

> What counts rather, I believe, is the sufficiency or insufficiency, the adequacy or inadequacy, of the room which the limitation leaves open in the beginning for the exercise of the right. For the consistency of the limitation with the right depends upon the availability of an initial opportunity to exercise the right that amounts, in all the circumstances characterising the class of case in question, to a real and fair one. The test, thus formulated, lends itself to no hard and fast rule which shows us where to draw the line. In anybody's book, I suppose, seven years would be a period more than ample during which to set proceedings in motion, but seven days a preposterously short time. Both extremes are obviously hypothetical. But I postulate them in order to illustrate that the enquiry turns wholly on estimations of degree.[3]

With respect to s 113(1) of the Defence Act, the particular circumstances prevailing in South Africa suggested that the six-month time frame was too short a period in which to exercise the right. The time-period limited the right of access to courts and analysis in terms of the limitation clause would be necessary to determine the provision's constitutionality.

The premise of the shortened period established by s 113(1) is that the state is beset by logistical obstacles which require shortened periods of time to apply in litigation initiated against it.[4] The Law Commission had rejected this argument in a detailed survey of prescription periods that it had conducted in the 1980s.[5]

[1] Mohlomi (supra) at para 14.
[2] Ibid at para 11.
[3] Ibid at para 12.
[4] Ibid at para 16.
[5] Investigation into Time Limits for the Institution of Actions against the State Project 42 (October 1985).

It had recommended scrapping these truncated prescription periods altogether. It favoured the ordinary rules applicable in the Prescription Act coupled with a notification period applicable only to actions against the state. Didcott J did not go so far as to endorse entirely these recommendations and, instead, referred to a provision recently enacted by the legislature in the new Police Act.[1] In that provision, the period in which actions concerning the police had to be brought was 12 months. In addition, the Police Act contained an equivalent provision to that in the Prescription Act: the provision delays the running of prescription 'until the date upon which the claimant became aware of the alleged act or omission, or after the date upon which the claimant might be reasonably expected to have become aware of the alleged act or omission, whichever is the earlier date.'[2] Furthermore, courts were given a discretion to dispense with the 12-month period if in the interests of justice.[3]

As part of his limitation analysis, Didcott J, unsurprisingly, left open the question of the constitutionality of the new provision in the SAPS Act. However, he pointed out that the difficulties facing the police were, if anything, greater than those facing the defence force and the legislature had been satisfied that the 12-month period would be adequate to protect the state's interests.[4] In particular,

> [t]he contrasts between section 113(1) and section 57 are striking. The time allowed by the latter for the start of any action, and accordingly for the prior notification of its imminence, is twice as long as that fixed by the former. The period begins to run not from the date when the cause of action arises, an occurrence of which a claimant may well be unaware at the time, but from the date when both the conduct in question and the identity of its perpetrator becomes or should reasonably become known to him or her. Ignorance of that second fact, more common perhaps than of the first, is easily illustrated. One thinks, for instance, of a hit and run collision caused by an unidentified motorist or an assault committed by somebody clad in battle dress of the sort worn by soldiers and the police alike which no civilian witness to the incident can tell apart. Then, in empowering the court to condone non-compliance with its requirements, section 57 permits account to be taken of the claimant's fault or the lack of that and the prejudice suffered by the state or its absence, factors that are wholly irrelevant to the operation of section 113(1). While paying due attention to the state's interests, section 57 is consequently much less stringent and detrimental to the interests of claimants than section 113(1).[5]

Section 113(1) was therefore deemed an unjustifiable limitation on the right of [1] South African Police Service Act 68 of 1995 ('SAPS Act').

[2] SAPS Act s 57.
[3] SAPS Act s 57(5).
[4] Mohlomi (supra) at para 18.
[5] Ibid at para 19.

access to court and was found unconstitutional.[1] Although the Court did not say much about the notice period – other than to question why the state adopted an inflexible attitude requiring compliance in all cases – it too was set aside, since the whole of the provision was declared unconstitutional.[2]

Mohlomi concerned two mechanisms that differ slightly. Notice periods do not seek to determine, directly, the period of prescription of the claim. However, they serve as a condition precedent to the institution of actions. If the notice period is not complied with, the litigation may not proceed and the practical effect is as if the debt has prescribed: although again, the two periods are not legally equivalent. The second mechanism that, in fact, attracted the bulk of the court's attention was the actual prescription provision.[3]

In Moise v Transitional Local Council of Greater Germiston, the court was concerned with a 90-day notice period applicable to proceedings against local governments.[4] The independent two-year prescription period that was also applicable was not considered by the Court. It did, however, see the need to consider the notice period within the context of the whole procedure adopted by the relevant statute: the Limitation of Legal Proceedings (Provincial and Local Authorities) Act.[5] The provision, s 2, had the following attributes: notification of an intention to institute legal proceedings against the government entity had to be given within 90 days of the debt arising. The debt was deemed to have arisen once the creditor had knowledge of the identity of the debtor and of the facts giving rise to the debt. Furthermore, once notice had been given, the claimant was barred from proceeding with the action for another 90 days and the debt was deemed to prescribe after 24 months. Another noteworthy feature of the statutory scheme was that the Act gave a claimant the right to approach a court to serve the notice after the expiration of the 90 days, which permission the court could grant if it was satisfied: (a) that there was no prejudice to the debtor; or (b) that special circumstances prevented the claimant from reasonably sending the notice within 90 days.

It is clear, therefore, that the provision was less harsh than the one impugned in Mohlomi. In particular, the power of the court to condone non-compliance, as [1] After Mohlomi, a High Court struck down s 32(1) of the Police Act of 1958. Section 32 was substantially similar to the provision struck down in Mohlomi. See Baldeo v Minister of Safety and Security for the Republic of South Africa 1997 (12) BCLR 1728 (D). Although, by the time of the decision in the High Court, this provision had been replaced by SAPS Act s 57, the repealed Act was applicable because of the date on which the action was instituted. Despite the fact that the case was heard in terms of the Interim Constitution, the parties agreed, in terms of IC s 101(6), that the court had jurisdiction to determine the provision's constitutionality.

[2] Mohlomi (supra) at para 26.

[3] There are a number of statutory provisions that impose limitations on the institution of civil proceedings in the form of notice requirements or prescription periods. See I Farlam et al Erasmus's Superior Court Practice (Service 27, 2007) E7-1–E7-36.

[4] 2001 (4) SA 1288 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC)('Moise').

[5] Act 94 of 1970. This Act has since been repealed and replaced by the Institution of Legal Proceedings against certain Organs of State Act 40 of 2002. This Act seeks to standardize the period of prescription applicable to litigation against organs of state.

well as the fact that the 90 days only began to run when the claimant had knowledge of the relevant facts, gave the provision a measure of flexibility that did not apply to the provision in Mohlomi. Nevertheless, the Court still struck it down as an unjustifiable limitation on the right of access to court. The limitation analysis turned on the failure of the state to justify the measure adequately. Of interest to this chapter is the analysis in respect of the content of FC s 34.

The Court in Moise held that the provision provided a very short period of time in which to issue the notice.[1] Furthermore, the condonation possibility did not remove the obstacle that the notice-period presented to access to court:

> The obstacle remains regardless of this potential amelioration of its harshness. This is particularly so if one takes into account that many potential litigants (arguably the majority) are poor, sometimes illiterate and lack the resources to initiate legal proceedings within a short period of time. Many are not even aware of their rights and it takes time for them to obtain legal advice. Some come by such advice only fortuitously. For them a mere 90 days from the commission of the delict within which to serve formal notice on the debtor*(s)* is, in the words of Didcott J in Mohlomi, not a 'real and fair' 'initial opportunity' to approach the courts for relief.[2]

In particular, the Court in Moise emphasized that condonation was not there for the asking and that the considerations justifying condonation were clearly circumscribed.[3] The Court therefore concluded that the provision unjustifiably limited the right of access to court.[4]

A 90-day notice period in terms of the Mental Health Act,[5] similar to the one considered in Moise,[6] was also declared invalid by the Constitutional Court.[7] In Potgieter the Court held that, in the light of its judgments in Moise and Mohlomi, the 90-day period did not give litigants a fair or adequate opportunity to institute litigation.[8] The Court held that the time-limit was particularly outrageous and drastic given the class of person to whom it would apply.[9] No attempt was made by the respondents to justify the measure and it was declared unconstitutional.[10]

[1] Moise (supra) at para 13.
[2] Ibid at para 14.
[3] Ibid at para 15.
[4] Ibid at para 16.
[5] Act 18 of 1973.
[6] The provision, s 68(4) of the Act, reads:
No such proceedings shall be commenced after the expiry of three months after the act complained of, or, in the case of a continuance of the cause of action, after the expiry of three months with effect from the termination thereof: Provided that in estimating the said period of three months so limited for the commencement of proceedings, no account shall be taken of any time or times during which the person wronged was lawfully under detention as a mentally ill person or was ignorant of the facts which constitute the cause of action.
[7] Potgieter v Lid van die Uitvoerende Raad: Gesondheid, Provinsiale Regering, Gauteng en Andere 2001 (11) BCLR 1175 (CC).
[8] Ibid at para 7.
[9] Ibid.
[10] Ibid.

Recently, in Engelbrecht v Road Accident Fund and Another,[1] the Constitutional Court struck down regulation 2(1)(c) of the regulations made in terms of the Road Accident Fund Act.[2] The RAF Act established the Road Accident Fund (RAF), the purpose of which is to compensate those who have been injured as a result of the driving of a vehicle. Section 17(1)(b) of the RAF Act provides for compensation for bodily injuries to victims of so-called hit and run accidents where the identity of the driver or owner of the offending vehicle has not been established. Regulation 2(1)(c) provided that the RAF will not be liable to compensate a person in terms of s 17(1)(b) of the RAF Act unless the victim 'submitted, if reasonably possible, within 14 days after being in a position to do so, an affidavit to the police in which particulars of the occurrence concerned were fully set out'.

The Court in Engelbrecht held that it was unnecessary to approach the matter, as it had done in Mohlomi, against the background of the state of affairs prevailing in South Africa. The period of 14 days, especially in the light of the fact that a 6-month period had been struck down in Mohlomi, was simply too short.[3] What the Engelbrecht Court seems to have been saying is this: in Mohlomi, the focus was on the fact that there are particular difficulties facing members of South African society which make a 6-month prescription period unreasonable. In any society, 14 days would be too short and it was therefore unnecessary to rely upon the particular difficulties facing South Africa in reaching its conclusion.

Relatively soon before this matter arose, the Supreme Court of Appeal had handed down judgment in Road Accident Fund v Makwetlane and had upheld the constitutionality of reg 2(1)(c).[4] The Supreme Court of Appeal in Makwetlane, in a split decision, rejected the argument based on FC s 34. The majority was of the view that a victim of a hit and run accident has no action at common law and there is therefore no cause of action that is limited by the time frame imposed by reg 2(1)(c).[5] Without a justiciable claim, there can be no application of FC s 34.

The Constitutional Court rejected this reasoning in Engelbrecht. Kondile AJ held, for a unanimous court, that a victim of a hit and run accident has a common-law right to compensation. The capacity to recover damages pursuant to a hit and run claim was another matter, but the lack of good prospects of [1] 2007 (5) BCLR 457 (CC)('Engelbrecht'). The discussion of this case draws heavily from K Hofmeyr & A Friedman 'Constitutional Law' (2007) January-March Juta's Quarterly Review of South African Law. We are grateful to Kate Hofmeyr for giving us permission to use this work and for her invaluable input in formulating our analysis.

[2] Act 56 of 1996 ('RAF Act').

[3] Engelbrecht (supra) at para 31.

[4] 2005 (4) SA 51 (SCA)('Makwetlane'). For a discussion of this case, and the related line of cases, see C Ala 'Submission of an Affidavit to the Police as a Prerequisite for Liability in Unidentified Vehicle Accident Claims: Road Accident Fund v Thugwana and Road Accident Fund v Makwetlane' (2006) 123 SALJ 573.

[5] Makwetlane (supra) at para 17.

success does not affect the existence of the common-law right. In any case, knowing the identity of the defendant is not a guarantee to recovery, which is why the legislature enacted the RAF Act and its predecessors in the first place.[1] The Court held that a victim of a hit and run claim has a common-law right to compensation that has been enhanced by the legislature with a view to giving the greatest possible protection to those who have suffered loss as a consequence of negligent driving. FC s 34 therefore had application to this matter and the applicant was entitled to rely on it.[2]

The Constitutional Court has, until recently, only been called upon to consider the constitutionality of time-based bars to the institution of claims arising from statute. In Barkhuizen, the Court, in a split decision, upheld a clause in an insurance policy that excluded insured parties from instituting legal proceedings against the insurer if not instituted within 90 days of the insurer repudiating liability in terms of the insurance contract.

The case is of interest because of the majority's and the minority's reasoning on the correct approach to determining the constitutionality of clauses in contracts. That issue falls beyond the scope of this chapter and we confine ourselves to a consideration of the Court's reasoning in regard to FC s 34. The Court's conclusion in regard to the correct approach to considering contractual clauses is relevant in one respect: the Court held that it was preferable to consider FC s 34 in the context of the question whether the clause was contrary to public policy, rather than applying FC s 34 directly to the clause.[3]

Ngcobo J, for the majority, referred to the fact, highlighted in Mohlomi, that time bars to the institution of actions serve an important purpose: in essence, ensuring that litigation is brought within a reasonable time, while evidence is still available, to prevent prolonged uncertainty. Ngcobo J held that there was no reason in logic or in principle to conclude that public policy would not tolerate time-limitation clauses subject to reasonableness and fairness.[4] Furthermore, the Final Constitution envisages that the right of access to court may be limited in terms of a law of general application where reasonable and justifiable. This too, according to Ngcobo J, reflected public policy.[5]

Ngcobo J held that there was no material difference between the Mohlomi test applicable in direct challenges based on FC s 34 and the public-policy approach adopted in Barkhuizen. In terms of Mohlomi, a time-limitation clause would limit the right of access to court if it did not give a litigant an adequate and fair

[1] Engelbrecht (supra) at para 20.
[2] Ibid at paras 23–4.
[3] Barkhuizen (supra) at para 30. Langa CJ dissented on this point, holding that FC s 34 may indeed be directly applicable to contractual clauses. Ibid at para 186. For a critique of the Court's method of analyzing such contractual claims in terms of 'indirect application' see S Woolman 'The Amazing, Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007) 124 SALJ 742.
[4] Ibid at para 48.
[5] Ibid.

opportunity to obtain redress. Similarly, it would be contrary to public policy to enforce a term of a contract that does not allow the person bound by it an adequate and fair opportunity to seek judicial redress.[1]

An interesting part of Ngcobo J's judgment is that it took one step further the debate between the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Constitutional Court on the scope of the right in FC s 34. In Engelbrecht/Makwetlane, the Supreme Court of Appeal found FC s 34 to be applicable only to claims that already exist. If a person has a pre-existing claim in terms of some or other law and the legislature seeks to limit the scope for prosecuting the claim by shortening the time within which to institute action, then FC s 34 becomes applicable and the question then is whether it has unjustifiably been limited. Where, however, the legislature creates the right for the first time but, at the same time, imposes a time limit on the exercise of the right, there can be no application of FC s 34 — the premise being that the legislature is free to impose conditions upon the exercise of a right which, but for the largesse of the legislature, would not have come into existence. In Engelbrecht, the Constitutional Court rejected this conclusion by holding that, in fact, a hit and run victim has a common-law claim and the fact whether such a person would ultimately be successful in obtaining redress does not affect this conclusion. In Barkhuizen, Ngcobo J went a step further:

> [T]here is a conceptual difference between a statute which introduces a limitation on the period within which a pre-existing right may be prosecuted and a contract which establishes rights and time periods within which those rights must be prosecuted. That conceptual difference, however, cannot have the consequence suggested by the Supreme Court of Appeal. Such a consequence would undermine the importance of the right of access to courts. In each case, of course, the question will be whether the contract contains a time limitation clause which affords a contracting party an adequate and fair opportunity to have disputes arising from the contract resolved by a court of law. In approaching this question, a court will bear in mind the need to recognise freedom of contract but the court will not let blind reliance on the principle of freedom of contract override the need to ensure that contracting parties must have access to courts.[2]

Ngcobo J held that, when considering whether the time-period imposed by a contract is fair, there are two questions: (a) is the time-clause itself unreasonable; (b) if not, is it nevertheless unenforceable in the light of the circumstances which caused non-compliance?[3] As far as the first question is concerned, a balancing between two interests is required to determine whether the term is unreasonable: on the one hand, there is a public interest in parties complying with terms to which they have agreed and, on the other hand, all individuals have a right to obtain judicial redress.[4] Once the clause, in the light of this test just described, is

[1] Barkhuizen (supra) at para 51.
[2] Ibid at para 55.
[3] Ibid at para 56.
[4] Ibid at para 57.

held to be reasonable, the party seeking to escape its consequences has a second opportunity to prevail: he may demonstrate that although the clause ordinarily is reasonable, it would be unreasonable in the light of the particular circumstances to enforce it. The onus would be on the party seeking to escape its consequences to demonstrate that it would be unreasonable to enforce the clause.[1] It seems that, when considering the first question, the main focus is on whether the clause is manifestly unreasonable in the light of the approach established in Mohlomi. When considering the second question, the focus seems mainly to be on the circumstances in which the contract was concluded: in particular, the relative bargaining positions of the parties. However, the court will also consider whether factors beyond the control of the party seeking to escape the clause prevented him from complying with its time frame.

The time bar in Mohlomi operated inflexibly: regardless of whether the plaintiff had sufficient knowledge to institute his action or not. In Barkhuizen, the Court pointed out that the 90-day period began to run only once the insured had full knowledge of his claim and had submitted his claim to the insurer. Such a time bar was not manifestly unreasonable.[2] As far as the second question was concerned the Court held that, although there may often be circumstances in South Africa in which contracts of this nature are signed as a consequence of the unequal bargaining power of the parties, there was nothing on the evidence to suggest that the parties were unequal in this matter. Therefore, there was nothing contrary to public policy about the clause.[3] In addition to considering the bargaining power of the parties, the Court also considered whether there were any good reasons why the applicant had been unable to comply with the time clause: the Court again pointed out that it would be contrary to public policy to enforce compliance with a time bar where non-compliance was a product of factors beyond the insured's control. In this case, the insured failed to plead facts explaining why he did not or could not have complied with the clause.[4]

Moseneke DCJ and Sachs J dissented in separate judgments.[5] Both disagreed with the focus in Ngcobo J's judgment on the personal circumstances of the person seeking to avoid the consequences of the time bar. They both preferred objective enquiries. And, indeed, both justices found that the particular clause in issue was contrary to public policy. Moseneke DCJ's preferred approach was to examine the time bar in the context of the contract as a whole to see whether it unreasonably limits the right to judicial redress.[6] This objective enquiry focuses

[1] Barkhuizen (supra) at para 58.
[2] Ibid at paras 62–63.
[3] Ibid at para 66.
[4] Ibid at para 84.
[5] Mokgoro J concurred in the judgment of Moseneke DCJ. Although the unpublished version of the judgment posted on the internet reflects Mokgoro J's concurrence after the judgment of O'Regan J, and not Moseneke DCJ, the text reflects that she concurred in Moseneke DCJ's judgment.
[6] Barkhuizen (supra) at paras 96 and 97.

on the terms of the contract and is unrelated to the personal circumstances of the applicant.[1] Sachs J noted that the time period established in the contract was less than > ten per cent of that in respect of which either an ordinary contractual claim, or else a claim against the Road Accident Fund, would prescribe; has the effect of significantly limiting a right to have a dispute settled by a court, a right long recognised by the common law and now guaranteed as a fundamental right by the Constitution; is not subject to express qualifications in case of impossibility or difficulty of compliance, nor apparently permissive of condonation where considerations of justice would require that its harshness be tempered by prolongation of the time; [and] when invoked does not simply limit or qualify the insurance claim, but wipes the claim out altogether, enabling the insurer to keep the premium, while the insured loses the right to find out if he or she should in fact have been paid for the damage done to his car.[2]

Section 12 of the Prescription Act deals with the question when prescription begins to run. Section 12(3) provides that '[a] debt shall not be deemed to be due until the creditor has knowledge of the identity of the debtor and of the facts from which the debt arises: Provided that a creditor shall be deemed to have such knowledge if he could have acquired it by exercising reasonable care.' Section 5(1)(c) of the previous Prescription Act[3] contained a similar provision. In Van Zijl v Hoogenhout, the Supreme Court of Appeal considered the question whether a claim for damages arising from sexual abuse allegedly perpetrated between 1958 and 1967, where the victim had attained majority in 1973 and instituted action in 1999, had prescribed.[4] The claim would have prescribed within three years of the complainant reaching the age of majority, unless s 5(1)(c) of the 1943 Prescription Act was applicable. The potential application of s 5(1)(c) arose from the fact that the evidence was that it may take many years before victims of sexual abuse are able to see their assailant, as opposed to themselves, as being to blame.[5]

The Van Zijl court ultimately found that there was sufficient evidence to suggest that the appellant had only come to realize that the defendant was responsible for her abuse in 1997 and that the defendant had failed, therefore, to discharge the onus of proving the special plea of prescription. Although the court did not deal in detail with FC s 34, it did, as part of its reasoning, point out that 'the plaintiff is entitled to the benefits of a constitutional dispensation that promotes, rather than inhibits, access to courts of law.'[6]

[1] Barkhuizen (supra) at para 96.
[2] Ibid at para 183.
[3] Act 18 of 1943.
[4] 2005 (2) SA 93 (SCA).
[5] Ibid at paras 10–14.
[6] Ibid at para 7.

In Ditedu v Tayob, the High Court referred to the above dictum of the Supreme Court of Appeal and applied similar reasoning to s 12(3) of the current Prescription Act.[1] In so doing, the High Court held that a plaintiff's claim based on the negligence of her attorney only arose when she consulted another attorney and not when the negligent conduct actually took place. The defendant's negligent conduct was a 'fact', as envisaged in s 12(3), which would only come to the attention of a layperson upon receiving adequate advice from another lawyer.[2]

These cases demonstrate that FC s 34 is not only of relevance when considering whether legislation unreasonably truncates the period in which a plaintiff may claim. It also speaks directly to the question whether prescription has begun to run in the first place.

(iii) Res judicata

The special plea of res judicata arises from the common-law. In essence, it concerns a situation where the subject-matter of a dispute between the parties has already been determined previously by a court. If the requirements of the special plea are met, then the defendant who raises it will succeed in having the plaintiff's claim dismissed without engaging the merits. Furthermore, since this plea is not merely dilatory, raising it successfully should result in a final judgment in favour of the defendant. It is clear, therefore, how the doctrine could serve to limit a plaintiff's right of access to court. The constitutionality of the doctrine has not been considered in detail. In the one case in which it was considered,[3] the High Court, acknowledging that it was required to develop the common law in the light of the Final Constitution, used FC s 34 (and IC s 22)[4] to inform its understanding of the elements of the special plea. The High Court was concerned with the exact requirements of the special plea and, having considered the authorities in detail, held that the elements were that the previous judgment was given by a competent court and (1) was between the same parties, (2) was based on the same cause of action and (3) was with respect to the same subject matter, or thing.[5] The High Court then continued, somewhat cryptically, that

> [t]he subject matter claimed in the two relevant actions does not necessarily and in all circumstances have to be the same. However where there is a likelihood of a litigant being denied access to the courts in a second action, and to prevent injustice it is necessary that the said essentials of the threefold test be applied. Conversely in order to ensure overall fairness (2) or (3) above may be relaxed.[6]

[1] 2006 (2) SA 176 (W).
[2] Ibid at paras 9–12.
[3] Bafokeng Tribe v Impala Platinum Ltd and Others 1999 (3) SA 517 (B), 1998 (11) BCLR 1373 (B)('Bafokeng').
[4] The court held that, for the purposes of the case, there was no material difference between the provisions of IC s 22 and FC s 34. Bafokeng (supra) at 1417.
[5] Ibid at 1419.
[6] Ibid.

It did, however, continue to point out that

> [a] court must have regard to the object of the exceptio res judicata that it was introduced with the endeavour of putting a limit to needless litigation, and in order to prevent the recapitulation of the same thing in dispute in diverse actions, with the concomitant deleterious effect of conflicting and contradictory decisions. This principle must be carefully delineated and demarcated in order to prevent hardship and actual injustice to parties.[1]

(iv) Procedural rules

O'Regan J, in Giddey, recently said the following:

> [F]or courts to function fairly, they must have rules that regulate their proceedings. Those rules will often require parties to take certain steps on pain of being prevented from proceeding with a claim or defence. A common example is the rule regulating the notice of bar in terms of which defendants may be called upon to lodge their plea within a certain time failing which they will lose the right to raise their defence. Many of the rules of court require compliance with fixed time limits, and a failure to observe those time limits may result, in the absence of good cause shown, in a plaintiff or defendant being prevented from pursuing their claim or defence. Of course, all these rules must be compliant with the Constitution. To the extent that they do constitute a limitation on a right of access to court, that limitation must be justifiable in terms of section 36 of the Constitution. If the limitation caused by the rule is justifiable, then as long as the rules are properly applied, there can be no cause for constitutional complaint. The rules may well contemplate that at times the right of access to court will be limited. A challenge to the legitimacy of that effect, however, would require a challenge to the rule itself. In the absence of such a challenge, a litigant's only complaint can be that the rule was not properly applied by the court. Very often the interpretation and application of the rule will require consideration of the provisions of the Constitution, as section 39(2) of the Constitution instructs. A court that fails to adequately consider the relevant constitutional provisions will not have properly applied the rules at all.[2]

The Constitutional Court seems to be saying that two important things must be kept in mind when considering the correct approach to the application of FC s 34 to procedural rules. First, as O'Regan J has made clear, the procedural rules are aimed at enhancing the fairness of proceedings and so the underlying rationale for the entire panoply of procedural rules is congruent with one of the aims of FC s 34.[3] This congruence will often make it easier to justify limiting a particular litigant's right of access in order to enhance access for all. Secondly, it is not just by way of direct challenge that the Final Constitution becomes relevant. There is much scope, within the rules, for the application of FC s 39(2). In particular, whenever a discretion may be exercised by a court (for example, in respect of costs), this discretion must be exercised in a way that promotes the spirit, purport and object of the Bill of Rights. FC s 39(2)'s obligation will require courts, when exercising a discretion that may have implications for a litigant's access to court, to bear the provisions of FC s 34 in mind.[1] Of course, since FC s 36 is also part of the Bill of Rights, it may be necessary to build the possibility of limitation into any exercise of a discretion.[2]

[1] Bafokeng (supra) at 1419.

[2] Giddey NO v JC Barnard and Partners 2007 (2) BCLR 125 (CC)('Giddey') at para 16.

[3] See also Hekpoort Environmental Preservation Society and Another v Minister of Land Affairs and Others 1998 (1) SA 349 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1537 (CC) at para 8 (The Constitutional Court held that 'even the most public spirited of litigants cannot simply ignore those procedural rules which are designed to regulate the fair and orderly dispatch of Court business and the protection of the rights of all.')

Eke v Sugden offers just such an example of a case in which FC s 34 was read with FC s 39(2) to interpret a particular rule in the spirit of the Bill of Rights: Eke concerned rule 10 of the Magistrates' Courts Rules.[3] Rule 10 provides that '[i]f summons in an action be not served within 12 months of the date of its issue or, having been served, the plaintiff has not within that time after service taken further steps in the prosecution of the action, the summons shall lapse.' The High Court held that the phrase 'further steps in the prosecution of the action', the meaning of which was undefined and in dispute, had to be interpreted in such a way as to impose the least possible restriction on litigants' right of access to courts.[4] Any act performed by a litigant that would advance the proceedings nearer to completion would evince his intention of pursuing the matter further, and would qualify as a further step as envisaged by rule 10.[5] This approach led the High Court to conclude that the furnishing of security for costs constituted a further step in terms of rule 10.[6]

It is a rule of the common law that review proceedings must be instituted within a reasonable time. If such proceedings are instituted within an unreasonable period of time, the presiding officer may nevertheless, in the exercise of a discretion, condone the delay and allow the review to proceed. It is now axiomatic that this discretion must be exercised in the light of FC s 34. In Bellocchio Trust Trustees v Engelbrecht NO and Another,[7] however, the applicant challenged the constitutionality of the common-law rule and argued that it prevented his access to court. Hlophe JP rejected this view. He held that the rule does not limit the right of access to court and that, even if it did, it is reasonable and justifiable. Hlophe JP stated that the applicant's argument would enable an applicant to institute unreasonably delayed review proceedings even if such delay would cause undue prejudice to the respondent. Furthermore, litigation would never be finalized.[8] Neither of these consequences could have been envisaged by the drafters of FC s 34.[9] The existence of the discretion, and the fact that the judge considers

[1] Giddey (supra) at para 18.
[2] See Barkhuizen (supra) at para 48.
[3] 2001 (2) SA 216 (E)('Sugden').
[4] Ibid at 221E.
[5] Ibid at 221F.
[6] Ibid at 222C.
[7] 2002 (3) SA 519 (C)('Bellocchio').
[8] Ibid at 523E–G.
[9] Ibid at 523H.

all relevant circumstances before refusing to allow the review to proceed, meant that the right of access to court was merely regulated, not prohibited.[1]

Rule 35 of the Uniform Rules deals with discovery. In terms of the rule parties involved in a trial provide copies of relevant documents by deposing to a discovery affidavit explaining the relevance of the documents in question and detailing which documents are to be provided to the other party. If a party is of the view that the other party is withholding relevant documents from him, then he has the onus of proving that there are relevant documents in the latter party's possession that are not being disclosed. Although access to all relevant documentation is a component of a fair civil trial, the fact that the onus is on the party seeking the additional documents does not violate FC s 34.[2] Notwithstanding the incidence of the onus, rule 35 is a vehicle that enables litigants to gain access to the documentation that is of relevance.[3]

Although not decided on the basis of FC s 34, Jaftha v Schoeman; Van Rooyen v Stoltz provides an example of a case in which the procedural rules of the Magistrates' Courts did not adequately protect the right of access to court.[4] The two applicants were unemployed women, with few assets, living in Prince Albert. Both women faced the threat of losing their homes in sales in execution for trifling debts. In a successful constitutional challenge to the relevant provision of the Magistrates' Courts Act,[5] the Constitutional Court held, relying on the right to housing in FC s 26, that the failure to provide judicial oversight over sales in execution against immovable property of judgment debtors in s 66(1)(a) of the Magistrates' Courts Act was unconstitutional. To remedy the defect, the Constitutional Court read words into the Act which had the effect of imposing judicial supervision on execution against immovable property.[6]

FC s 34 has also underwritten a more lenient approach to the substitution of parties where the plaintiff has incorrectly cited the wrong defendant. Substitution will be allowed > unless the application to amend is mala fide or unless the amendment would cause such injustice or prejudice to the other side as cannot be compensated by an order for costs and, where appropriate, a postponement. A mere erroneous description of the defendant will be condoned. Even the citing of the wrong defendant will be condoned, where there is no prejudice.[7]

[1] Bellocchio (supra) at 523J–524C.
[2] Swissborough Diamond Mines (Pty) Ltd and Others v Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others 1999 (2) SA 279, 320A–E (T).
[3] Ibid.
[4] 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC)('Jaftha').
[5] Act 32 of 1944.
[6] Jaftha (supra) at para 67.
[7] Airconditioning Design & Development (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Public Works, Gauteng Province 2005 (4) SA 103 (T) at para 11 ('Airconditioning Design').

A categorical denial of substitution where there is no prejudice would be incompatible with the right of access to courts.[1]

An example of a procedural rule that has the potential to limit litigants' access to court is contained in s 25(1) of the Supreme Court Act. That section provides that if a litigant wishes to sue a judge of the superior courts in any civil action he requires the leave of the court in which the action is brought.[2] This rule has been upheld along the same lines as the rules relating to vexatious litigants.[3] In Soller, Ngoepe JP pointed out that the rule serves a vital purpose: the independence of the judiciary, and the capacity of judges to perform their tasks fearlessly, would be severely hampered if judges were routinely required to face litigation as a consequence of their decisions.[4] The rule also ensured that judges would not spend more time on defending litigation than performing their function.[5] Important considerations leading to the conclusion that the rule is justifiable were that: first, the rule does not constitute a complete bar to the institution of proceedings — the section creates a bar only for claims without merit.[6] Secondly, if leave to sue the judge in question is refused, then the decision is appealable.[7]

Soller concerned an application to bring a defamation claim against a judge as a consequence of comments that he had made in one of his judgments. The considerations relating to the independence of the judiciary are particularly compelling in this context — if judges could be sued without leave as a consequence of their written judgments, there may indeed be a chilling effect on their capacity to render fearless judgments. Ngoepe JP held, however, that the rule is justified even in the context of ordinary debts and other proceedings against judges that are unrelated to their judgments.[8] It would seem that, in this context, the measure is justified solely on the basis that, without a screening process, judges' time would be wasted if they were required to defend litigation. While this justification is far less compelling than the first rationale, we agree that it is sufficient to justify the measure. Protecting judges from frivolous law-suits that have the potential to impede their capacity to perform their tasks properly serves the purpose of FC s 34.

[1] Airconditioning Design (supra) at para 8.
[2] Section 25(1) reads:
Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in any law contained, no summons or subpoena against the Chief Justice, a Judge of Appeal or any other Judge of the Supreme Court shall in any civil action be issued out of any court except with the consent of that court: Provided that no such summons or subpoena shall be issued out of an inferior court unless the Provincial Division which has jurisdiction to hear and determine an appeal in a civil action from such inferior court, has consented to the issuing thereof.
[3] Soller v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2005 (3) SA 567 (T)('Soller').
[4] Ibid at para 14.
[5] Ibid at para 14.
[6] Ibid at para 16.
[7] Ibid at para 16.
[8] Ibid at para 17.

In terms of the Constitutional Court rules, a litigant may approach the Court for direct access.[1] It is up to the Court to decide whether it is in the interests of justice to allow such access.[2] The Constitutional Court has rejected the argument that the requirement that leave be obtained before the court may be approached by way of direct access unjustifiably limits the right of access to courts. It did so for three reasons:[3]

(a) The Constitution itself envisages that leave be obtained before a litigant may approach the Constitutional Court by way of direct access.[4]

(b) FC s 34 of the Constitution does not give a litigant the right to approach any court in the court hierarchy for relief. So long as there is a court with the jurisdiction to grant the relief sought by the applicant, the requirements of FC s 34 are met. Since the High Courts have jurisdiction to decide constitutional matters, FC s 34 does not require direct access to the Constitutional Court as of right.

(c) The Constitutional Court, as the highest court in constitutional matters, is ordinarily a court of appeal and acts as a court of first and final instance only in limited circumstances. Other than in those circumstances, it is undesirable for the Constitutional Court to sit as a court of first and final instance.[5] If the Court routinely had to hear constitutional matters as a court of first instance, it would be required to 'deal with disputed facts on which evidence might be necessary, to decide constitutional issues which are not decisive of the litigation and which might prove to be purely academic, and to hear cases without the benefit of the views of other courts having constitutional jurisdiction'.[6] Furthermore, it is generally undesirable for a litigant to have no prospect of appeal against a decision. Experience has shown that decisions are more likely to be correct if more than one court considers them, and this is not possible where the Constitutional Court grants direct access.[7]

It should be noted that the wording of the rule in the Constitutional Court's Rules that deals with direct access goes further than the text of the Final Constitution. The Final Constitution envisages that direct access will be granted with leave of the court when it would be in the interests of justice. The Constitutional Court's rules envisage that direct access will be granted only in 'exceptional circumstances'. Chaskalson P (as he then was) alluded to the possibility that it may be

[1] If direct access is granted, then the Constitutional Court hears the matter as a court of first and final instance, rather than as an appellate court, which is the norm.

[2] Constitutional Court Rules, 2003, Rule 18. The equivalent rule in the 1998 rules was Rule 17.

[3] Dormehl v Minister of Justice and Others 2000 (2) SA 987 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 471 (CC)('Dormehl') at paras 4–5.

[4] FC s 167(6).

[5] Bruce v Fleecytex Johannesburg CC 1998 (2) SA 1143 (CC), 1998 (4) BCLR 415 (CC)('Bruce') at para 8.

[6] Ibid at para 7.

[7] Ibid at para 8.

in the interests of justice for the court to grant direct access when the requirement of 'exceptional circumstances' is not met.[1] In other words, it would appear that the ambit of circumstances in which direct access may be granted by the Court in terms of its rules is narrower than that envisaged by the Final Constitution. He did not, however, decide this question. The requirement that direct access only be granted in exceptional circumstances would not, in any case, limit the right of access to court. As discussed above, the right of access to court does not include a right of access to any court.[2]

The move of the Constitutional Court to restrict rather than enlarge the circumstances in which direct access will be granted reduces, Jackie Dugard argues, its capacity to serve as a forum for the poor to be heard.[3] In order to reach the Court through the ordinary process, starting in the High Court and possibly appealing first to the Supreme Court of Appeal, significant resources are required.[4] Dugard contends that, in the absence of a right to free legal representation in constitutional matters,[5] the only hope for greater access to justice for the poor is for the Constitutional Court to expand the circumstances in which direct access will be granted.

Dugard argues that in terms of the test applied by the Constitutional Court when deciding whether to grant direct access, the following factors are relevant: whether there are exceptional circumstances requiring the court to sit as a court of first and final instance; whether the matter is urgent; whether there are prospects of success; and whether other remedies have been exhausted.[6] While Dugard accepts the criteria of prospects of success and 'exhaustion of other remedies and procedures', she argues that the requirements of 'urgency' and 'exceptional circumstances' should be replaced by a consideration of whether it would be in the public interest to grant direct access.[7] When determining whether it would be in the public interest to grant direct access, the Court should focus on whether the matter is of general application or fundamental importance and, particularly, whether the matter engages the fundamental rights of the poor.[8]

[1] Bruce (supra) at para 4.
[2] Dormehl (supra).
[3] J Dugard 'Court of First Instance? Towards a Pro-Poor Jurisdiction for the South African Constitutional Court' (2006) 22 SAJHR 261, 266 (Dugard 'Court of First Instance').
[4] Ibid
[5] Ibid at 268-270. See §59.4*(b)(i)* infra. See also S Woolman and D Brand 'Is There a Constitution in this Courtroom: Constitutional Jurisdiction after Afrox and Walters (2003) 19 SA Public Law 38.
[6] Ibid at 272–273.
[7] Ibid at 277.
[8] Ibid at 277 n77.

We share Dugard's concern that the poor lack meaningful access to the courts and support her attempt to devise an appropriate mechanism to enhance such access. We disagree, however, with her proposal regarding access to the Constitutional Court. We have noted at various points in this chapter that access to courts in this country is determined largely by the means of the potential litigants and that being poor makes it extremely difficult to enjoy one's right of access. The solution to this problem does not, in our view, lie in increasing the scope of the Constitutional Court's direct-access jurisdiction. Extremely good reasons exist for retaining the Constitutional Court's largely appellate function. All parties will be ill served if the Constitutional Court acts as a court of first and final instance too readily.

We disagree with Dugard's treatment of these arguments. As far as the leading of evidence is concerned, she suggests that the cases in which evidence will need to be led will be 'minimal'.[1] She suggests that > Many Constitutional Court applications already are more in the form of abstract than concrete reviews, both in terms of the way the issue is framed and the relief granted, and the Court could further minimise its exposure to oral evidence and factual disputes by explicitly limiting argument to matters of law and constitutional interpretation.

In our view, the more urgent need is for constitutional litigation to be brought in line with ordinary litigation in our courts. Many constitutional challenges require the leading of evidence. The Constitutional Court has often had occasion to remark that the fact that a matter has been resolved on the papers is undesirable, given the disputes of fact that may be involved.[2] In particular, the Court has held that justification of a limitation will often be fact-based and that it will be necessary for the party seeking to justify a measure to lead factual evidence in support of a fact-based justification.[3] The truth is that thus far constitutional litigation has been treated as a special case in which litigants repeatedly bring applications to challenge law or conduct. These challenges often ought to be raised as constitutional matters within a trial. Litigants ought to recognize that the trial procedure is often better suited to determining constitutional challenges than the procedures of motion court. If they did, the Constitutional Court would possess far greater factual clarity in constitutional cases.

As far as the undesirability of the court being a court of first and final instance is concerned, Dugard suggests that it is the hardest argument to refute because it is the hardest argument to substantiate. She argues that this issue 'boils down to a matter of policy choices and balancing lesser harms'.[4] In other words, on the assumption that it would be better for the poor for the Constitutional Court to

[1] Dugard 'Court of First Instance' (supra) at 278.

[2] See, for example, Rail Commuters Action Group and Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail and Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC) at paras 52–6.

[3] See Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Reintegration of Offenders (NICRO) and Others 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2005 (5) BCLR 445 (CC) at para 36.

[4] Dugard 'Court of First Instance' (supra) at 278.

grant direct access more frequently, the Court would be entitled to make a policy choice to sacrifice the ordinarily desirable approach of having more than one court rule on cases in favour of a pro-poor approach. Dugard says that the Constitutional Court has shown that it is capable of acting as a court of first and final instance in those areas in which it has exclusive jurisdiction — such as disputes between national and provincial spheres of government.

Once again, we disagree. The Constitutional Court exercises exclusive jurisdiction in those rare cases, such as when the question arises whether the President has failed to discharge a constitutional obligation, in which the nature of dispute, and the organs of state involved, requires a court with the institutional status of the Constitutional Court to resolve the dispute. Other than in this narrow class of cases, which, after all, are expressly envisaged by the Final Constitution itself, it is plainly preferable for the parties to a matter to retain the possibility of an appeal. Of course, if expanding the circumstances in which direct access is to be granted by the Constitutional Court is indeed the elixir necessary to enhance the rights of the poor, perhaps the possibility of appeal ought to be sacrificed. However, it is in everyone's interest, including the poor, that the possibility of appeal exists in as many cases as possible. The decision-making process is enhanced when the possibility of appeal remains in place, and this is to the advantage of all litigants. Constitutional courts, such as the US Supreme Court, often argue that they benefit from the multiple perspectives that district and circuit courts offer on constitutional issues.

Furthermore, it is our view that it might set up something of a false dichotomy to offer a choice between expanded access and insufficient vindication of the rights of the poor. There are a range of measures that could be adopted at High Court level that would give the poor a louder voice without sacrificing the advantages that flow from the mainly appellate function exercised by the Constitutional Court. During the course of this chapter we discuss the question whether legal representation at state expense in certain civil matters is a component of the rights provided in FC s 34. We also point to the undeniable role that the approach to costs adopted by the High Court and SCA plays in inhibiting access to courts. There are a range of measures that could be adopted at High Court level to ensure greater access for the poor. These two are but examples. Another example might be for an enhanced role to be played by amici curiae at High Court level. We are aware of instances where judges have appointed members of the Bar to make submissions on issues implicating the rights of the poor, in circumstances where the parties themselves were inadequately represented. If this process could be adopted more often, there is no doubt that the poor's interests would be given more attention. It needs to be recognized that, ideally, the High Courts should be the institutions that are able to give sufficient weight to the interests of the poor. The fact that there are certain aspects of their procedure that currently inhibit that possibility does not require that the Constitutional Court should regularly be made into a court of first instance.

(v) Refusing leave to appeal without reasons

In Mphahlele v First National Bank of South Africa Ltd,[1] the applicant challenged, as a violation of access to court, the constitutionality of the practice of the Supreme Court of Appeal of refusing leave to appeal without reasons. The Court in Mphahlele did not consider which aspect of the right of access to court is implicated by such a challenge. It is, however, an important question. On the one hand, if there is no right of appeal in civil matters (which, as described above, is by no means a clear question), then limiting the possibility of appeal may bear no relation to the right of access to courts at all. On the other hand, it may not be conceptually legitimate to see the question of reasons as speaking to the fairness of the hearing, since at the leave to appeal stage we are concerned with the anterior question whether a hearing ought to be conducted in the first place. As mentioned above in the discussion on whether FC s 34 includes a right to appeal,[2] the Supreme Court of Appeal has treated the question of the appeal process provided in the Supreme Court Act as speaking to the fairness of the process.

Either way, the Court in Mphahlele held that the practice of refusing leave without reasons did not violate the right of access to court. The Court pointed out that where a court of first instance gives a judgment, its reasons are of importance for the prosecution of an appeal. It might, therefore, be the case that there would be a failure to comply with the Final Constitution's requirements if a court of first instance failed to give reasons for its decision.[3] That said, the mere fact that there is no appeal against a decision of a court does not in itself justify the failure to give reasons:[4] the giving of reasons is not justified solely by their relevance to the appeal process. However, when dealing with appellate courts, there are other practical considerations that are relevant: it is not in the interests of justice for the rolls of appellate courts to be clogged with unmeritorious and vexatious issues of law and fact.[5] Since the Supreme Court of Appeal is the court of final instance in all but constitutional matters, a litigant will not be prejudiced by its failure to provide reasons. The litigant will already have received reasons from the court a quo, and implicit in a refusal without reasons is that there are no prospects of success on appeal.[6] To require full reasons from the Supreme

[1] 1999 (2) SA 667 (CC), 1999 (3) BCLR 253 (CC)('Mphahlele').
[2] See § 59.3*(a)*(iv) supra.
[3] Mphahlele (supra) at para 12.
[4] Ibid at para 13.
[5] Ibid at para 13, citing S v Rens 1996 (2) BCLR 155 (CC) at paras 24 and 25.
[6] Mphahlele (supra) at paras 14–15.

Court of Appeal inthis context would undermine the very reason for requiring leave in the first place[1] — to streamline the process in order to provide greater access for meritorious claims.

(vi) Vexatious litigants

Section 2(1)(b) of the Vexatious Proceedings Act[2] provides that a court may grant an order requiring a litigant to seek permission to institute legal proceedings in the following circumstances:

- On application from a person against whom proceedings have been brought or who has reason to believe that litigation is being contemplated against him;
- Where the litigant who is required to seek permission has 'persistently and without any reasonable ground instituted legal proceedings in any court or in any inferior court, whether against the same person or against different persons'; and
- Where the litigant who is required to seek permission has been given an opportunity to be heard.

Once a court has determined that a particular litigant may only institute proceedings with permission, that permission may only be granted where the court is satisfied that the proceedings are not an abuse of the process of court and that there are prima facie grounds for the proceedings to be brought.

In Beinash and Another v Ernst and Young and Others, Mokgoro J, for a unanimous Court, held that, as a procedural barrier to the institution of litigation, s 2(1)(b) of the Act limited the right of access to court in terms of FC s 34.[3] The limitation was, however, deemed reasonable and justifiable in terms of FC s 36.[4] In conducting its limitation analysis, the Court pointed out that the vexatious-litigation provision protects two interests: the interests of the victim of the vexatious litigation and the public interest in ensuring that the courts are not clogged by groundless claims.[5] The Court wrote:

> a restriction of access in the case of a vexatious litigant is in fact indispensable to protect and secure the right of access for those with meritorious disputes. Indeed, as the respondents argued, the court is under a constitutional duty to protect bona fide litigants, the processes of the courts and the administration of justice against vexatious proceedings. Section 165(3) of the Constitution requires that '[n]o person or organ of state may interfere with the functioning of the courts.' The vexatious litigant is one who manipulates the functioning of the courts so as to achieve a purpose other than that for which the courts are designed. This limitation serves an important purpose relevant to section 36(1)(b). It

[1] Mphahlele (supra) at para 15.
[2] Act 3 of 1956.
[3] 1999 (2) SA 116 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 125 (CC)('Beinash') at para 16.
[4] Ibid at para 16.
[5] Ibid at para 15.

> would surely be difficult to anticipate the litigious strategies upon which a determined and inventive litigator might embark. Thus there is a requirement for special authorisation for any proposed litigation.[1]

The Court in Beinash pointed out that the order rendering a person a vexatious litigant is made by a court and only where the person has persistently, and without legal grounds, initiated legal proceedings.[2] The extent of the limitation was not, therefore, extreme since, first, the process was subject to judicial control and, secondly, the decision of a judge to declare someone a vexatious litigant is appealable.

The Beinash Court also held that the provision passed the proportionality test and achieved the correct balance between the relevant interests:

> The applicant's right of access to courts is regulated and not prohibited. The more remote the proposed litigation is from the causes of action giving rise to the order or the persons or institutions in whose favour it was granted, the easier it will be to prove bona fides and the less chance there is of the public interest being harmed. The closer the proposed litigation is to the abovementioned causes of action, or persons, the more difficult it will be to prove bona fides, and rightly so, because the greater will be the possibility that the public interest may be harmed. The procedure which the section contemplates therefore allows for a flexible proportionality balancing to be done, which is in harmony with the analysis adopted by this Court, and ensures the achievement of the snuggest fit to protect the interests of both applicant and the public.[3]

(vii) Costs

Rule 34 of the Uniform Rules of the High Court deals with settlement offers. The general practice in the High Court, which has an express analogue in the Magistrates' Courts Rules,[4] is that where a defendant makes a settlement offer that exceeds the amount ultimately awarded to the plaintiff, the plaintiff is liable for the defendant's costs from the time at which the offer was made.[5]

In NM and Others v Smith and Others (Freedom of Expression Institute as Amicus Curiae*)*, the appellants had sued the respondents for damages arising from the publication in a book of the fact that the appellants were HIV positive.[6] In the High Court, the respondents had made a settlement offer that was higher than the amount ultimately awarded by the court. The court ordered the appellants to pay the respondents' costs from the date on which the offer was made. In the Constitutional Court, the majority held that each party should bear its own costs. The basis for this appears to have been that each party's conduct was blameworthy to a greater or lesser extent, and does not seem to have had anything to do with the settlement offer.[7] Langa CJ, however, dealt squarely with the rule relating to [1] Beinash (supra) at para 17.

[2] Ibid at para 18.
[3] Ibid at para 19. See § 59.3*(b)* 'Nature of the State's Obligations' supra.
[4] Rule 18(6).
[5] See Farlam et al Superior Court Practice (1994) at B1–143n7 and the cases cited there.
[6] 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC)('NM').
[7] Ibid at paras 83–89.

settlement offers in a minority judgment. The appellants argued that they should not have been penalized in costs by the High Court because the offer of settlement, although ultimately higher in money terms than the High Court's award, did not vindicate their constitutional rights because it did not acknowledge liability. The respondents, on the other hand, argued that the High Court's approach to costs orders in this context is important because if the approach was not followed then the defendants would be faced with a choice either to admit liability even when believing that they are not liable or to run expensive trials. Langa CJ held that the problem with the prevailing approach to rule 34 is that it failed to take cognizance of the fact that, in the context of violations of constitutional rights, sometimes more than money is necessary to vindicate the right. The acknowledgement of wrongdoing that comes in the form either of an acknowledgment of liability by the defendant or by a court order is often more valuable than money.[1] Langa CJ pointed out that:

> There is a danger that the risk of adverse costs orders, despite ultimate success, might permit rich and powerful defendants to prevent the law from adapting to meet constitutional imperatives by throwing money at plaintiffs who cannot afford to take that chance. It already takes immense courage for ordinary people to take large powerful defendants to court and the additional peril of an adverse costs order will mean even fewer plaintiffs get their day in court.[2]

Despite the general approach adopted by the High Court to rule 34, the question of costs always remains discretionary. The message of Langa CJ's judgment in NM is that this discretion must be exercised in the light of the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.

In Hlatshwayo & Another v Hein[3] Dodson J read the Restitution of Land Act,[4] and the power of the Land Claims Court to make costs orders in the light of the right of access to court and held that it was necessary to interpret these powers in a way that does not deter litigants from having their justiciable claims determined by courts.[5] Dodson J pointed to the trend in the Constitutional Court to adopt a different approach to costs in public-interest litigation: the Constitutional Court has departed from the normal rule in civil matters that costs follow the result.[6] Dodson J was mindful of the potentially negative consequence of adopting an approach in terms of which costs do not necessarily follow the result in public-interest litigation — a risk of encouraging ill-founded claims and defences. However, the wide discretion retained by the court would ensure that costs would be awarded in appropriate cases.[7]

[1] NM (supra) at para 120.
[2] Ibid
[3] 1998 (1) BCLR 123 (LCC)('Hlatshwayo').
[4] Act 22 of 1994.
[5] Hlatshwayo (supra) at para 22.
[6] Ibid at para 24.
[7] Ibid at para 25.

Hlatshwayo was decided in 1997. In the intervening 10 years, the approach of Dodson J has been vindicated. The Constitutional Court has adopted an approach in terms of which a bona fide applicant who unsuccessfully raises an important constitutional issue will not be penalized in costs.[1] The Court retains a wide discretion, however, and does not hesitate to make adverse costs orders where the conduct of a party warrants it — say, for example, in the case of vexatious litigation.[2]

There is no doubt that the ordinary approach to costs — in which costs follow the result — implicates the right of access to courts. Experience reveals that litigation is, unfortunately, largely the preserve of the affluent in this country.[3] The ordinary approach to costs adopted by the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal (coupled with the fact that, in any case, most practitioners charge far in excess of what a taxed costs order will allow) exacerbates this problem. While not linking its approach directly to FC s 34, the Constitutional Court's approach to costs is clearly aimed at enhancing access to courts in constitutional matters.

(viii) Security for costs

Rule 47 of the Uniform Rules of the High Court deals with the requirement that a litigant furnish security for costs in certain circumstances.[4] In the Companies Act[5] specific provision is made for the furnishing of security by a company or a [1] See A Friedman 'Costs' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) 6–2.

[2] Ibid at 6–5ff.

[3] See G Budlender 'Access to Courts' (2004) 121 SALJ 339, 340–1.

[4] Rule 47 of the Uniform Rules provides:

Security for costs

(1) A party entitled and desiring to demand security for costs from another shall, as soon as practicable after the commencement of proceedings, deliver a notice setting forth the grounds upon which such security is claimed, and the amount demanded.

(2) If the amount of security only is contested the registrar shall determine the amount to be given and his decision shall be final.

(3) If the party from whom security is demanded contests his liability to give security or if he fails or refuses to furnish security in the amount demanded or the amount fixed by the registrar within ten days of the demand or the registrar's decision, the other party may apply to court on notice for an order that such security be given and that the proceedings be stayed until such order is complied with.

(4) The court may, if security be not given within a reasonable time, dismiss any proceedings instituted or strike out any pleadings filed by the party in default, or make such other order as to it may seem meet.

(5) Any security for costs shall, unless the court otherwise directs, or the parties otherwise agree, be given in the form, amount and manner directed by the registrar.

(6) The registrar may, upon the application of the party in whose favour security is to be provided and on notice to interested parties, increase the amount thereof if he is satisfied that the amount originally furnished is no longer sufficient; and his decision shall be final.

[5] Act 61 of 1973.

liquidator of a company that is being wound up.[1] There have been two ways in which FC s 34 has been implicated in cases concerning security for costs. As in the case of costs issues generally, these provisions give a court a discretion as to whether to require security for costs. In certain decisions, the courts have considered how this discretion must be exercised in the light of the Final Constitution.[2] It is easy to see how the obligation to give security for costs may implicate the right of access to court. In certain cases, the requirement to give security will prevent the party so required from proceeding with the litigation. The question, therefore, is how the discretion must be exercised in a way that gives due cognizance to FC s 34. In other cases, the requirement that security be provided has been challenged directly as violating FC s 34.

The issue of security for costs normally arises as follows: a plaintiff brings an action against a defendant in circumstances where the defendant has reason to believe that the plaintiff will be unable to pay the defendant's costs if the defendant is successful. The defendant delivers a notice in terms of rule 47(1) or, if necessary,[3] brings an application in terms of rule 47(3) requiring the plaintiff to give security for costs before proceeding. The general approach to costs, that an unsuccessful plaintiff must pay the defendant's costs, is designed, amongst other things, to prevent vexatious litigation. A plaintiff who anticipates being penalized in costs will think twice before proceeding with unmeritorious litigation.[4] The requirement of security for costs is aimed to buttress this rule:

> [T]he main purpose of section 13 is to ensure that companies, who are unlikely to be able to pay costs and therefore not effectively at risk of an adverse costs order if unsuccessful, do not institute litigation vexatiously or in circumstances where they have no prospects of success thus causing their opponents unnecessary and irrecoverable legal expense.[5]

In Lappeman, Joffe J considered how the courts had, up until that case, dealt with the discretion envisaged by s 13 of the Companies Act and its predecessor. He explained that the binding authority in his division (the WLD) was that courts will lean towards the ordering of security and will only refuse to do so when special

[1] Section 13 of the Companies Act reads as follows:
Where a company or other body corporate is plaintiff or applicant in any legal proceedings, the Court may at any stage, if it appears by credible testimony that there is reason to believe that the company or body corporate or, if it is being wound up, the liquidator thereof, will be unable to pay the costs of the defendant or respondent if successful in his defence, require sufficient security to be given for those costs and may stay all proceedings till the security is given.

[2] Lappeman Diamond Cutting Works (Pty) Ltd v MIB Group (Pty) LTtd (No 1) 1997 (4) SA 908 (W)('Lappeman'); Bookworks (Pty) Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council and Another 1999 (4) SA 799 (W)('Bookworks'); Giddey NO v JC Barnard and Partners 2007 (2) BCLR 125 (CC)('Giddey').

[3] The process requires the party seeking security first to deliver a notice to his opponent setting out the grounds upon which security is sought and the amount claimed. If the party receiving the notice disputes liability to give security, then the party seeking security will need to apply to court.

[4] Giddey (supra) at para 7.

[5] Ibid at para 7.

circumstances exist.[1] It was argued that, in exercising its discretion and in order to protect the right of access to court, a court should incline against the requirement of security in the absence of evidence of abuse of process. Joffe J pointed out that while the requirement of security for costs itself pursued a laudable objective, it had to be balanced against the right of access to court. Such a balance was better achieved, in his view, if the court would begin without a disposition in favour of requiring security and that the courts should possess a wide discretion to consider all relevant factors before requiring security.[2] This approach was approved by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Shepstone:

> The court must carry out a balancing exercise. On the one hand it must weigh the injustice to the plaintiff if prevented from pursuing a proper claim by an order for security. Against that, it must weigh the injustice to the defendant if no security is ordered and at the trial the plaintiff's claim fails and the defendant finds himself unable to recover from the plaintiff the costs which have been incurred by him in his defence of the claim.[3]

There will be cases where the requirement of giving security will not put an end to the litigation – because the plaintiff will be able to comply with the order. It is only when the litigation will be brought to an untimely end by the order that the right of access to courts becomes relevant. Although not especially concerned with FC s 34, the Supreme Court of Appeal has remarked on the potentially dispositive effect of a security order:

> [T]he fact that an order of security will put an end to the litigation does not by itself provide sufficient reason for refusing it. It is a possibility inherent in the very concept of a provision like s 13 which comes into operation whenever it appears to the Court that the plaintiff or applicant will not be able to pay the defendant or respondent's costs in the event of the latter being successful in his defence. If there is no evidence either way, the mere possibility that the order will effectively terminate the litigation can plainly not affect the Court's decision. It only becomes a factor once it is established as a probability by the plaintiff or applicant. And, even if it is established, it remains no more than a factor to be taken into account; by itself it does not provide sufficient reason for refusing an order.

Whether this approach accords with the requirements of the Final Constitution was considered by the Constitutional Court in Giddey. The Constitutional Court in Giddey confirmed that, when a court exercises its discretion, it must have regard to the right of access to court.[4] The question was what principles ought to be applied by the court when exercising this discretion.

The applicant argued that whenever the effect of the order requiring security would be to put an end to the litigation (in the sense that the plaintiff would be unable to provide security and, hence, proceed) it would be in conflict with the

[1] Lappeman (supra) at 914G.
[2] Ibid at 919H–I.
[3] Shepstone & Wylie and Others v Geyser NO 1998 (3) SA 1036, 1046 (SCA). quoting Keary Developments Ltd v Tarmac Construction Ltd and Another [1995] 3 All ER 534, 540 (CA).
[4] Giddey (supra) at para 30.

right of access to court. Therefore, one of the overarching principles guiding the discretion ought to be that the discretion will not be exercised where it will have this effect. The Court in Giddey rejected this approach to the interpretation of s 13:

> Section 13 contemplates that an order for security for costs will be made where a plaintiff or applicant company is in financial difficulties. The sharp commercial reality of such an order is that at times where the plaintiff or applicant cannot find security for costs it will not be able to pursue its action. This seems an inevitable and intended result of section 13. In my view, the section is not reasonably capable of being read as contended for by the applicant. The applicant did not challenge the constitutionality of the section, and in my view, it is not capable of being read, in light of the Constitution or otherwise, to mean that a court has no discretion to order security to be furnished where the effect of that order will be to terminate the litigation. The provision states the contrary quite clearly and the applicant's submissions in this regard must be rejected.[1]

The Court in Giddey held that the approach of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Shepstone accorded with what was required by the Final Constitution and that the courts should exercise a discretion neither inclined towards nor against requiring security.[2] The Court in Giddey stated that a court should take into account the following factors: the likelihood that the effect of an order to furnish security will be to terminate the plaintiff's action; the attempts the plaintiff has made to find financial assistance from its shareholders or creditors; the question whether it is the conduct of the defendant that has caused the financial difficulties of the plaintiff; and the nature of the plaintiff's action.[3]

The constitutionality of a rule was directly challenged in *Mthetwa and Others v Diedericks and Other*s.[4] Prior to its amendment in 1997, rule 49(1) of the Magistrates' Courts Rules, read as follows:

> A party to proceedings in which a default judgment has been given may within 20 days after the judgment has come to his knowledge apply to court upon notice to the other party to set aside such judgment and the court may upon good cause shown and, save where leave has been given to defend as a pro Deo litigant in terms of rule 53, provided the applicant has furnished to the respondent security for the costs of the default judgment plus an amount of R200 as security for the costs of the application, set aside the default judgment on such terms as it may deem fit: Provided that the respondent may by consent in writing lodged with the clerk of the court, waive compliance with the requirement of security.

Rule 53 establishes the procedure in terms of which a person may apply to litigate as a pro Deo litigant. In essence, if a court is satisfied that a person has a prima facie case and has insufficient means to enable him to pay the costs of the

[1] Giddey (supra) at para 29.
[2] The full bench of the WLD was also of the view that, although it did not say so explicitly, the SCA had adopted the approach in Shepstone based on what is required by FC s 34. Bookworks (supra) at 810B–G.
[3] Giddey (supra) at para 30.
[4] 1996 (7) BCLR 1012 (N)('Mthetwa').

action,[1] then the court may appoint an attorney to act for him, free of charge, and relieve him of the need to pay other costs. In Mthetwa, the High Court drew attention to the Legal Aid Act,[2] and pointed out that it establishes a detailed mechanism for indigent potential litigants to obtain legal aid.[3] The Legal Aid Act was enacted with the purpose of improving on the pro Deo procedure and a litigant would presumably prefer to obtain legal aid in terms of the Act, than to proceed by way of the pro Deo procedure.[4] However, following the Act would require such a person to forfeit the right not to provide security, since rule 49(1) exempted only pro Deo litigants. This was unfair.[5] The court pointed out that people frequently have default judgments taken against them without their knowledge. If such a person had a bona fide defence but was unable to cover the costs of security, he would be unable to have the judgment set aside, unless he applied to be a pro Deo litigant. At the very least, the rule should cover recipients of legal aid in terms of the Act.[6] The High Court therefore declared the whole of rule 49(1) unconstitutional.

It is always a difficult matter when a single judge of a provincial division declares invalid a rule or law where there is no requirement that the declaration of invalidity must be confirmed by the Constitutional Court. This difficulty was avoided by a 1997 amendment to the rules, which introduced a new rule 49, without the security requirement.

Shortly after this decision was handed down, a single judge in the same division struck down rule 49(13) of the Uniform Rules of the High Court.[7] The rule relates to the procedure to be adopted on appeal and envisages that security will be required.[8] The applicant argued that the rule limited his right of access to court because his inability to provide security effectively ended his possibility of prosecuting the appeal. The applicant relied on Mthetwa. The respondent sought to distinguish it as follows: the rule in the Magistrates' Courts Rules had the effect of preventing access to a court of first instance, whereas this rule only affects the right to appeal.[9] Implicit in this argument is the contention that FC s 34 (or IC s 22 as it then was) does not apply to appeals. Without directly responding to this argument, the High Court held:

[1] Rule 53(4).
[2] Act 22 of 1969.
[3] Mthetwa (supra) at 1013.
[4] Ibid.
[5] Ibid.
[6] Ibid at 1014.
[7] Shepherd v O'Niell and Others 1999 (11) BCLR 1304 (N)('Shepherd').
[8] At the time, the relevant rule read:
Unless the respondent waives his right to security, the appellant shall, before lodging copies of the record on appeal with the Registrar, enter into good and sufficient security for the respondent's costs of appeal. In the event of failure by the parties to agree on the amount of security, the Registrar shall fix the amount and his decision shall be final.
[9] Shepherd (supra) at 1307.

> There is much to be said for protecting a respondent in an appeal from an impecunious appellant who drags him from one court to the other. On the other hand to in effect bar access to a court of appeal because a deserving litigant is unable to put up security appears to me to be unfair and in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution. The conflicting rights of the litigants can in my view be adequately safeguarded were the court to be vested with the power to determine in the exercise of its discretion, whether a particular appellant should be compelled to put up security and in what amount. To the extent that Rule 49(13) does not embody that power I consider it to be in conflict with the Constitution and to that extent invalid.[1]

The High Court suspended the declaration of invalidity to provide the Rules Board with the opportunity to amend the rule. Rule 49(13) now provides a discretion to courts in regard to security for costs on appeal.[2]

(ix) Champertous agreements

A champertous agreement, broadly speaking, is an agreement in terms of which one party will fund (partially or fully) the litigation of another (in which the funding party has no interest) in exchange for a share of any amount awarded to the latter upon success. Such an agreement, therefore, has the potential to enhance, rather than limit, access to court by enabling litigants to proceed in matters that, without the champertous agreement, they would be unable to fund. Until the recent decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Price Waterhouse Coopers Inc and Others v National Potato Co-operative Ltd,[3] champertous agreements were generally considered contrary to public policy.

In Price Waterhouse, the Supreme Court of Appeal pointed out that the general disapproval of champertous agreements had been subject to one exception: if a party, in good faith, assisted a poor litigant in exchange for a reasonable interest in the suit, the agreement would not be contrary to public policy and void.[4] This exception was based on recognition that 'in a case where an injustice would be done if a litigant was not given financial assistance to conduct his case a champertous arrangement would not be contrary to public policy.'[5] The Supreme Court of Appeal pointed out that, other than this exception, champertous agreements continued to be considered contrary to public policy. Changed circumstances and the Final Constitution required a reassessment of the received wisdom.[6]

[1] Shepherd (supra) at 1310.
[2] Rule 49(13)(a) reads as follows:
Unless the respondent waives his or her right to security or the court in granting leave to appeal or subsequently on application to it, has released the appellant wholly or partially from that obligation, the appellant shall, before lodging copies of the record on appeal with the registrar, enter into good and sufficient security for the respondent's costs of appeal.
[3] 2004 (9) BCLR 930 (SCA)('Price Waterhouse').
[4] Ibid at para 27.
[5] Ibid at para 27.
[6] Ibid at paras 27–28.

The Supreme Court of Appeal pointed out that the antipathy to champertous agreements arose in times when the judiciary was not independent and there were insufficient safeguards to withstand corruption that might flow from such agreements; such as pressuring witnesses to relate a particular version or bribing judges. However, developments in England (where the antipathy to these agreements arose) and South Africa were such that an independent judiciary and a profession bound by strict ethics were strong enough to withstand such pressures.[1] Furthermore, both England and South Africa now allowed legal practitioners to charge contingency fees — albeit subject to strict controls.[2] This shift has direct implications for the right of access to court:

> As in England, this Act is designed to encourage legal practitioners to undertake speculative actions for their clients. The Legislature was obviously of the view that the conflict between the duty and interests of legal practitioners would not lead to an abuse of legal procedure. It clearly considered that it is better that people be able to take their disputes to court in this way rather than not at all.[3]

The Supreme Court of Appeal emphasized the importance of the right of access to court and the duty of courts to protect bona fide litigants. Allowing agreements of this sort would assist in facilitating access to court.[4] However, there might be circumstances in which a champertous agreement would constitute an abuse of process. Such agreements would not be enforced, notwithstanding the right of access to courts in FC s 34.[5]

(b) Fair public hearing before a court

One express component of FC s 34 is the right to a 'fair public hearing'. 'Fair' in FC s 34 therefore qualifies 'hearing'. 'Fairness' means different things in different places in the Final Constitution. FC ss 9(3) and 9(4) prohibit unfair discrimination. FC s 23 confers a right to 'fair labour practices'; FC s 33 is concerned with procedural fairness in the context of administrative decision-making; and FC s 35 guarantees the right to a fair criminal trial.[6] Although fairness is a central theme that runs through the Final Constitution, it does not possess a single denotation. FC ss 9, 23, 33, 34 and 35 all refer to 'fairness': but each uses fairness in relation to different proceedings and sets different standards of 'fairness'.

In Bernstein v Bester, faced with an IC s 22 which made no reference to a 'fair hearing', the Constitutional Court suggested that its exclusion might indicate a deliberate election by the drafters not to constitutionalize the right to a fair civil [1] Price Waterhouse (supra) at para 39.

[2] Ibid at paras 40–1.
[3] Ibid at para 42.
[4] Ibid at paras 42–4.
[5] Ibid at paras 50–2.
[6] FC s 35(3) provides that '[e]very accused person has the right to a fair trial'.

trial.[1] FC s 34, which provides expressly for a 'fair public hearing' must be interpreted as a deliberate reaction to Bernstein.

In respect of FC s 34, it is clear that 'fairness' does not entail a right to legally correct decisions for litigants.[2] In our view, fairness nevertheless does have both procedural and substantive components. In the remainder of this section, we consider specific sub-components of the right to a 'fair public hearing' under FC s 34. First, we consider whether 'fairness' under FC s 34 requires the state to provide free legal representation to some civil litigants. After that, we consider the application of the principle of 'equality of arms' to civil matters. We then consider the requirements of independence and impartiality of the courts. We also look at other requirements that go to the fairness of a hearing, in particular notice and the right to be heard. Finally, we discuss the requirement of a public hearing.

(i) Legal representation[3]

Does FC s 34 impose positive obligations on the State to provide free legal representation to civil litigants? It does not make such a guarantee expressly, but arguably the notion of 'fairness' implies the obligation. Currie and De Waal contend that such an interpretation of FC s 34 is unlikely owing to the realities of the resource constraints faced by the state.[4] In our view, such an approach confuses the content of the right with the remedy that a court should (or is likely to) grant on the basis of the right.[5] Therefore, we consider whether FC s 34 imposes such an obligation, and then consider what remedies appropriately flow from it.

FC s 35(3)(g) provides that every accused person has a 'right to a fair trial, which includes … the right to have a legal practitioner assigned to the accused person by the State and at state expense, if substantial injustice would otherwise result, and to be informed of this right promptly'. As discussed further below, FC s 28 makes a similarly-worded guarantee in respect of civil proceedings affecting a child. FC s 34 is silent on the matter. Nevertheless, the matter does not end there. We believe that there may be a basis on which to interpret the reference to fairness in FC s 34 to impose such an obligation on the state.

The major international instruments mirror the Final Constitution in guaranteeing free legal representation in criminal cases and merely a 'fair' trial in civil

[1] Bernstein and Others v Bester NO and Others 1996 (2) SA 7519 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC) at para 106.

[2] Lane and Fey NNO v Dabelstein and Others 2001 (2) SA 1187 (CC), 2001 (4) BCLR 312 (CC).

[3] In the discussion that follows, we draw in part from an earlier article by one of the authors. See J Brickhill 'The Right to a Fair Civil Trial: The Duties of Lawyers and Law Students to Act Pro Bono' (2005) 21 SAJHR 293.

[4] Currie & de Waal (supra) at 708–709.

[5] See Bel Porto School Governing Body v Premier, Western Cape and Another 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC) at para 186; Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC) at para 69; Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC) at para 27.

matters.[1] Nevertheless, the European Court of Human Rights has interpreted Art 6(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights to require a right to representation in some civil cases.[2] In Airey v Ireland, the European Court held that the Irish government's failure to provide Mrs Airey with free representation for the purpose of securing a judicial separation violated her right of access to court in Art 6(1).[3] Research presented as evidence could not provide a single instance in which a decree of judicial separation had been obtained in Ireland without legal representation.[4] The effect of Airey is that a fair civil hearing may, in certain circumstances, require the provision of legal representation at state expense. Article 6 of the European Convention is almost identical to FC s 34. This similarity provides a basis for interpreting FC s 34 in a manner that imposes a similar duty on government in circumstances where a litigant is unlikely to be able to obtain relief without representation. That said, Airey held that Art 6(1) does not guarantee a right to free civil legal aid. It merely obliges states parties to take steps to ensure the progressive realization of such a right.[5]

In G (J), the Canadian Supreme Court confronted the question of a right to free representation in civil suits in the context of s 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.[6] Section 7 reads: 'Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.'[7] The G (J) Court held that the combination of stigmatization, loss of privacy and disruption of family life that might result from a custody suit are sufficient to constitute a restriction of security of the person.[8] In deciding whether 'fundamental justice' necessitated the provision of legal representation in a particular case, the court referred to 'the best interests of the child' as the paramount consideration.[9] Provided these are not compromised, a court should then consider the interests at stake, the complexity of proceedings and the capacities of the parent.[10] In the circumstances of the case, the Supreme Court held that the government was under an obligation to provide the appellant with state-funded counsel.[11] It is worth noting that this right to free legal representation under s 7 of the Canadian Charter, which arises only in respect of threats to 'life, liberty and security of the person', is significantly narrower than the right that we argue arises under FC s 34, which encompasses all civil matters.

[1] See, for example, Art 14(1) and Art 14(3)(d) International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966); Art 6(1) and Art 6(3) European Convention on Human Rights (1950); Art 7 and Art 8(2)(e) American Convention on Human Rights (1969); Art 26 African Charter on Human and People's Rights (1981).

[2] Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305 ('Airey'). Article 6(1) refers to a 'fair and public hearing', while FC s 34 guarantees a 'fair public hearing'.

[3] Airey (supra) at para 28.

[4] Ibid at para 24.

[5] Ibid at para 26.

[6] New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v G (J) 66 CRR (2nd) 267 (1999)('G(J)').

[7] Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Constitution Act 1982.

[8] G (J) (supra) at 289.

[9] Ibid at 291.

[10] Ibid at 292–3.

[11] Ibid at 296.

The position under the Final Constitution is slightly different, because FC s 28 deals specifically with legal representation in matters affecting children. Under the Final Constitution, the Canadian case of G (J) might have been considered an appropriate case for the appointment of a legal representative to act for the child concerned. In the case of children's rights in civil suits, which are distinct from the right of all persons under FC s 34, FC s 28(1)(h) guarantees a child's right to 'have a legal practitioner assigned to the child by the state, and at state expense, in civil proceedings affecting the child, if substantial injustice would otherwise result.' FC s 28, therefore, expressly guarantees legal representation for children. The right appears not to be limited by the state's resource constraints: it is, however, subject to a significant constraint. It can only be invoked where 'substantial injustice' would result if representation at state expense were not provided. The provision is applicable not only to matters in which a child is a party to a civil suit, but in any matter 'affecting' the child, which would include adoption, custody, maintenance and possibly even divorce matters. In such matters, the representative would be 'assigned to the child', and directly represent him or her.[1] In Christian Education SA v Minister of Education, Liebenberg J held that FC s 28 makes it clear that the state is responsible for the expenses of a legal representative appointed in terms of FC s 28(1)(h).[2] However, this right does not cater for the interests of parents. Their claim to state-funded legal aid falls under FC s 34. FC s 28 is concerned solely with the child's right to legal representation.

In Nkuzi Development Association v Government of South Africa, the Land Claims Court held that the Final Constitution does confer a right to legal representation at state expense in civil suits, at least in respect of land tenants in the circumstances of that case.[3] The court, in a judgment delivered by Moloto AJ, held that there is no logical basis for distinguishing between criminal and civil matters, as civil matters are equally complex.[4] The court held that persons who have a right to security of tenure under the Extension of Security of Tenure Act,[5] whose security of tenure is threatened or infringed, have a right to legal representation or legal aid at state expense if substantial injustice would otherwise result, and if they cannot afford the cost of representation.[6] The court held that substantial injustice would result where the potential consequences of the matter are severe and the person concerned is not likely to be able to present his or her case effectively without representation.[7]

[1] The role of such a FC s 28 legal representative was usefully discussed in Soller NO v G 2003 (5) SA 430 (W) at para 27 (Satchwell J explained: 'The legal practitioner stands squarely in the corner of the child and has the task of presenting and arguing the wishes and desires of that child . . . . The legal practitioner does not only represent the perspective of the child concerned. The legal practitioner should also provide adult insight into those wishes and desires which have been confided and entrusted to him or her as well as apply legal knowledge and expertise to the child's perspective.')

[2] 1999 (4) SA 1092 (SE) at 1097.

[3] 2002 (2) SA 733 (LCC)('Nkuzi').

[4] Ibid at 737.

[5] Act 62 of 1997.

[6] Order at para 1.1.

[7] Order at para 1.3.

The court in Nkuzi grounded the right to representation at state expense in the property right, specifically in FC s 25(6), which guarantees legally secure tenure 'or comparable redress'.[1] The court seemed to assume a right to representation where 'substantial injustice' would otherwise result. The criterion of 'substantial injustice', which is contained in FC s 35 is, however, applicable only to criminal trials. Therefore, the decision in Nkuzi does not have an express constitutional basis, either in respect of the constitutional provision in which the court located the right to representation or in terms of the threshold standard for determining when civil legal aid ought to be given.

While the Nkuzi decision may be correct in holding that there is no principled reason to distinguish between civil and criminal matters in relation to the importance of legal representation, the textual distinction in the Constitution cannot be ignored. FC s 35 refers explicitly to legal representation as an aspect of a fair criminal trial where 'substantial injustice' would otherwise result. FC s 34 makes no such guarantee in relation to a fair civil hearing. In Legal Aid Board v Msila, the court endorsed the principle, originally laid down in Legal Aid Board guidelines and adopted by the courts, that the substantial injustice test is satisfied where the applicant for legal aid is criminally charged and faces the danger of imprisonment without the option of a fine.[2] This test clearly cannot apply to civil matters.

However, the concepts of fairness in criminal and civil trials might still overlap. The Constitutional Court has held that the right to a fair criminal trial is not limited to the specific rights listed in FC s 35.[3] Therefore, if FC s 34 contains a similarly open-ended concept of 'fairness', the fact that legal representation is listed as an element of a fair criminal trial but is not expressly mentioned as an aspect of the right to a fair civil hearing does not preclude the courts from interpreting FC s 34 to include such a right.[4] This gloss on FC s 34 requires us to consider what 'fairness' requires in each civil case. For starters, fairness in the civil context requires consideration of factors different to those that apply when determining whether 'substantial injustice' will result in the criminal context.

In our view, FC s 34 does impose limited positive obligations on the state to provide free legal representation to civil litigants where the failure to provide such assistance would render a hearing 'unfair'. Factors relevant to this enquiry may include the interests at stake, the complexity of proceedings and the capacities of the individuals concerned to litigate without assistance. Evidence to the effect that the particular type of proceedings may not, in reality, be conducted without legal assistance, as was adduced in Nkuzi, will also be relevant.

The state has already established the mechanism by which to discharge its constitutional obligations to provide legal aid: the Legal Aid Board, established

[1] Nkuzi (supra) at 734.
[2] 1997 (2) BCLR 229 (E) at 236.
[3] S v Zuma 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) at para 16.
[4] See § 59.3*(a)*(iv) supra.

in terms of the Legal Aid Act.[1] The Legal Aid Board prioritizes criminal legal aid, and currently provides far less assistance in civil matters. Its policy approach to the provision of legal aid is set out in the Legal Aid Guide, which is published by the Legal Aid Board in consultation with the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development and revised periodically.[2] To receive legal assistance through any of the legal service providers funded by the Legal Aid Board, an applicant must meet certain criteria. In terms of the Legal Aid Board Act, legal aid is only rendered to 'indigent' persons.[3] The term is not defined in the Act, but has been defined, although not in the context of the Act, in Smith v Mutual & Federal Insurance Co Ltd, where the judge distinguished 'indigent' from 'poor'.[4] The judge stated that 'to be indigent means to be in extreme need or want whereas to be poor means having few things or nothing'.[5]

The Legal Aid Board has established a number of Justice Centres, Satellite Offices and High Court Units through which it dispenses legal aid.[6] Presumably on the basis of the term 'indigent', the Board has laid down a financial means test. This test, which is revised from time to time, remains low enough to exclude a large group. At present, the means test provides that to qualify one must earn less than R2 000 a month if single or less than R2 500 for a 'household.'[7] However, this threshold excludes a large proportion of the population — people who earn above this threshold but are still unable to afford private representation. This strict threshold limits the provision of legal aid to those persons in extreme need or want for the basic necessities of life. It certainly excludes the working poor and middle class. The provision of legal aid by the Board is also restricted according to the type of matter for which assistance is sought. Defamation matters, 'undeserving' divorce cases, most maintenance matters and family violence are excluded.[8] The Board largely prioritizes criminal matters over civil legal aid: 87% of the latest Board budget for new matters was spent on criminal legal aid.[9]

[1] Act 22 of 1969.
[2] Section 3A(1) of the Act.
[3] See the long title of the Legal Aid Act 22 of 1969.
[4] 1998 (4) SA 626 (C) at 632.
[5] Ibid.
[6] There are currently 58 Justice Centres, 33 Satellite Offices and 13 High Court Units, according to the Legal Aid Board Annual Report 2005/6 (2006), available at http://www.legal-aid.co.za/publications/Legal%20Aid%20Board%20Annual%20Report%202005-06%20p% 2001-120.pdf (accessed on 1 November 2007) 23.
[7] See Legal Aid Board Circular No. 4 of 2006 (2 October 2006) available at http://www.legal-aid.co.za/publications/circs2006/Circular%204%20of%202006_Means%20Test%20applicable%20wef%201%20October%202006.pdf (accessed on 1 November 2007).
[8] PJ Brits Legal Aid Guide 2002 (10th Edition, 2002) available at http://www.legal-aid.co.za/publications/Legal%20Aid%20 Guide%202002.pdf (accessed on 1 November 2007) 49ff.
[9] Legal Aid Board Annual Report 2005/6 (supra) at 25, Table 5.

The Legal Aid Guide, which is prepared by the Legal Aid Board in consultation with the Minister, who must table it in Parliament for ratification,[1] may constitute a 'law of general application'. Accordingly, if the Guide curtails the entitlement to civil legal aid that arises out of FC s 34, that limitation may be saved under FC s 36.[2] Ellmann contends that costs and resource constraints are likely to play a greater role in limiting the state's obligations in the context of civil legal aid under FC s 34 than in respect of criminal legal aid under FC s 35.[3] Budlender, noting certain conceptual difficulties with allowing resource constraints to justify a limitation under FC s 36, suggests that this factor should be considered in deciding on remedy.[4]

(ii) Equality of arms

In the previous section, we have considered whether FC s 34 confers a right to state-funded legal aid in civil matters. We have contended that, in at least some civil matters, it does create such a right. The principle of 'equality of arms' takes the issue a step further. The principle essentially entails that, where parties are legally represented in litigious proceedings, their representation should be commensurate.

In Shilubana v Nwamitwa,[5] the Constitutional Court was faced with an eleventh-hour application by the respondent to postpone the hearing of the matter. One of the grounds of the application was that the respondent contended that he should received funding from the State Attorney towards his legal expenses.[6] We have considered the state's obligations in that regard above.[7] However, the argument went further: the respondent contended that, because the State Attorney had refused to fund the respondent, the parties were not 'represented on an equal basis' before the Court. The Court characterized the respondent's submission as 'faced with applicants unfairly represented by the State Attorney who briefed senior counsel, as well as two amici curiae who broadly support the applicants' case — six advocates in total — and hampered by insufficient funds, there was not an 'equality of arms' between the parties.'[8]

[1] Legal Aid Act s 3A(2).

[2] See Legal Aid Board (Ex Parte) v Pretorius and Another [2007] 1 All SA 458 (SCA)(The SCA dismissed an application for leave to appeal against an order directing the Legal Aid Board to provide alternative representation to certain criminal accused in one of the so-called 'Boeremag' trials. Although the judgment applied the FC s 35 criterion of 'substantial injustice' (rather than FC s 34) to determine the entitlement of the accused to representation, the judgment is relevant in that the SCA confirmed that the Legal Aid Guide gives effect to the constitutional right (para 36), must be interpreted in light of the provisions of the Constitution (para 25), and that the ultimate question is whether the constitutional requirement of fairness has been met (paras 36–41). These principles will apply equally to an entitlement to legal aid in civil matters under FC s 34.

[3] S Ellmann 'Weighing and Implementing the Right to Counsel' (2004) 121 SALJ 318, 328–329.

[4] G Budlender 'Access to Courts' (2004) 121 SALJ 339, 353.

[5] [2007] ZACC 14 ('Shilubana').

[6] Ibid at para 6.

[7] See § 59.4*(b)(i)* supra.

[8] Shilubana (supra) at para 21.

The issue of equality of arms has been raised previously in the Constitutional Court, in the criminal context. In Ex Parte Institute for Security Studies: In re S v Basson,[1] the Court was faced with an application by the Institute for Security Studies (ISS) to be admitted as an amicus curiae. It was apparent from the application that the ISS would make submissions that broadly supported the state's case and were adverse to the interests of the respondent (Basson, the accused in the High Court proceedings). It was submitted at the hearing by counsel appearing for Basson that they would struggle to deal with additional issues and argument in the limited time available for preparation, given the size of the appeal record. Counsel also referred to the large number of advocates who would be arguing for the other side if the ISS were admitted, stating that Basson was represented by only two counsel. One of the court's reasons for dismissing the ISS' application was that admitting the ISS as an amicus might lead to an inequality of arms:

> As a general matter, in criminal matters a court should be astute not to allow the submissions of an amicus to stack the odds against an accused person. Ordinarily, an accused in criminal matters is entitled to a well-defined case emanating from the State. If the submissions of an amicus tend to strengthen the case against the accused, this is cause for caution. This, however, is not an inflexible rule. But it is a consideration based on fairness, equality of arms, and more importantly, what is in the interests of justice.[2]

The principle of equality of arms was also briefly referred to in Bernstein v Bester. The Court in Bernstein stated that '[t]he principle of "equality of arms"', implicit in the right to a fair trial, has not been applied to situations such as the one we are considering in the case before us.'[3] In Shilubana, the Court stated obiter that the concept of equality of arms 'has its constitutional basis, in the civil context, in section 34's guarantee of a fair public hearing.'[4] However, the Court held that, in the absence of submissions by all concerned parties, it was not appropriate to consider whether the alleged imbalance was 'constitutionally cognisable or problematic', and accordingly did not need to consider whether an imbalance actually existed in that matter, and if so, what an appropriate ratio of representatives would be or whether it necessitated a postponement.[5] The Court held that the relevant question in considering the postponement was what the interests of justice required. Part of that enquiry, however, required asking whether the parties were 'effectively represented'.[6] The Court, which ultimately granted the requested postponement, held:[7]

> When considering the interests of justice there is room to consider the alignment of both amici with the applicant, the one-to-six counsel ratio in this case and the fact that senior counsel could be helpful in wading through difficult and important constitutional issues.

[1] 2006 (6) SA 195 (CC), 2006 (2) SACR 350 (CC).
[2] Ibid at para 15.
[3] 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC) at fn 154.
[4] Shilubana (supra) at para 21.
[5] Ibid.
[6] Ibid.
[7] Ibid at para 22.

Where does that leave the status of the principle of 'equality of arms'? The Constitutional Court has, as yet, only considered the issue of equality of arms in interlocutory proceedings, never as the principal claim. The Court's dicta in Basson (ISS amicus application), Bernstein and Shilubana all purported to leave open the question whether an inequality of arms gives rise to a constitutional cause of action. However, both Basson (ISS amicus application) and Shilubana gave weight to alleged imbalances in representation, in the context of an amicus application and a postponement application respectively. Both interlocutory applications were decided under the umbrella standard of 'the interests of justice'. Accordingly, equality of arms (regardless of nomenclature) is a factor relevant to the interests of justice, wherever that standard applies. This leaves open the question whether a free-standing substantive right to equality of arms arises in criminal proceedings (under FC s 35) or civil proceedings (under FC s 34). When Shilubana is heard on the merits, the question is likely again to go unanswered, unless the respondent presses the issue.

In our view, the principle of the equality of arms must flow from the right to legal representation in at least some civil matters that we argue above is conferred by FC s 34. For the right to legal representation to be meaningful, it must not result in an extreme imbalance in representation — for that would amount to a constitutional right to second-grade justice. If a right to legal representation in some civil matters exists, it must be a right to effective representation that is generally commensurate with the representation of the opposing parties. In this sense, equality of arms is a subsidiary concept to the right to legal representation. We have argued that the right to legal representation arises only in matters where the failure to provide such assistance would render a hearing 'unfair', taking into account factors such as the interests at stake, the complexity of proceedings and the capacities of the individuals concerned to litigate without assistance, as well as evidence to the effect that the particular type of proceedings may not, in reality, be conducted without legal assistance. Where these factors lead to the conclusion that free legal representation must be provided to secure a 'fair' hearing, a secondary question will arise in crafting an order: what type and scale of free representation must be provided to ensure fairness? In our view, this is where equality of arms must be considered: where FC s 34 requires free legal representation. Where FC s 34 does not require free legal representation at all, it would be premature for a free-standing claim to equality of arms to arise.[1]

[1] The European Court on Human Rights adopts a concept of equality of arms that applies more broadly than equality of arms with respect to legal representation. So, for instance, equality of arms has been held to require that each party should be given the opportunity to have knowledge of and to comment on the observations filed or evidence adduced by the other party. See Buchberger v Austria (2003) 37 EHRR 13 at para 50. The principle has been stated thus: 'Equality of arms' implies that each party must be afforded a reasonable opportunity to present his case — including his evidence — under conditions that do not place him at a substantial disadvantage vis-à-vis his opponent.' Dombo Beheer v. Netherlands (1994) 18 EHRR 213 at para 33. While this approach seems logical, no South African court has yet adopted it.

There is a risk that equality of arms, applied rigidly, would degenerate into counting heads and years of experience. In our view, even where FC s 34 does require legal representation to ensure fairness of civil proceedings, the right does not contemplate an absolute equality of arms. Rather, it requires representation that is substantially commensurate to that of opposing parties and sufficient to ensure effective representation in the particular proceedings. Head-counting will be, at most, a rough guide, because the fact that one party is represented by six counsel does not necessarily mean that every party requires six counsel to represent it effectively. Only in extreme cases, for example where the record in a matter is so bulky that numerical differences in representation will have a significant impact (such as, for example, in Basson (ISS amicus application)), should the courts give weight to such numbers concerns.

(iii) Independence and impartiality

FC s 34 provides for a right to a fair public hearing 'before a court or, where appropriate, another independent and impartial tribunal or forum'. Therefore, both the courts and, where it is appropriate to resolve disputes before them, other tribunals or fora must be independent and impartial.[1] In our view, these related requirements go to securing the fairness of dispute resolution proceedings. Below we look first at independence and then consider impartiality.

Independence is a structural or institutional requirement, as opposed to impartiality, which is concerned with actual or perceived bias in respect of specific judicial officers. In De Lange v Smuts NO, Ackermann J clearly articulated the basis for the distinction between independence and impartiality when he wrote:

> When the above principles are applied to the present case it illustrates even more clearly why officers in the public service do not enjoy the necessary independence, notwithstanding their actual competence and impartiality, for making the judicial decision to commit a recalcitrant examinee to prison. I am far from convinced that the first two essential requirements for independence referred to in the Canadian cases, namely those of security of tenure and a basic degree of financial security free from arbitrary interference by the Executive in a manner that could affect judicial independence, are present in the case of officers in the public service. It is unnecessary, however, to pronounce definitively on these requirements, for such officers undoubtedly lack the required objective structural independence and are not reasonably perceived to possess it.[2]

FC s 165(2) provides that '[t]he courts are independent and subject only to the Constitution and the law, which they must apply impartially and without fear, favour or prejudice.' FC s 165(3) provides further that no person or organ of state may interfere with the functioning of the courts. In Beinash v Ernst & Young, Mokgoro J referred to this provision and, implying that it was violated by the conduct of the applicant, stated that a vexatious litigant manipulates the functioning of the courts so as to achieve a purpose other than that for which the courts are designed.[1] The key institutional guarantors of judicial independence include the process for the appointment of judicial officers,[2] the judicial oath,[3] security of tenure,[4] financial security[5] and the limitation of civil liability of judges.[6]

[1] See President of the Republic of South Africa and Others v South African Rugby Football Union and Others 1999 (4) SA 147 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 725 (CC) at para 30; Sager v Smith 2001 (3) SA 1004 (SCA) at para 15.
[2] De Lange v Smuts NO 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at para 73.

Impartiality, by contrast, relates to the particular presiding officer, and is the constitutional basis for her recusal. In S v Basson ('Basson II'),[7] the Constitutional Court considered an appeal by the state against the decision of the trial judge, Hartzenberg J, not to recuse himself. The Court noted that access to courts that function fairly and in public is a basic right guaranteed in FC s 34.[8] The Court stated that the impartiality of judicial officers is essential to a constitutional democracy, and is closely linked to the independence of courts,[9] which is guaranteed in FC s 165(2).

The Court in Basson II confirmed[10] the following finding in President of the Republic of South Africa v South African Rugby Football Union ('SARFU II'):[11] a judge who sits in a case in which she or he is disqualified from sitting because, seen objectively, there exists a reasonable apprehension that the judge may be biased, acts in a manner inconsistent with FC s 34 and in breach of the requirements of FC s 165(2) and the prescribed oath of office.[12] The Court in SARFU II framed the test for recusal as follows:

[1] 1999 (2) SA 116 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 125 (CC) at para 17.

[2] FC s 174 governs the appointment of judicial officers, providing both substantive criteria for appointment and a process, in which the Judicial Service Commission (JSC) plays a critical role. The JSC is established in terms of FC s 178. Its members include judges, practising lawyers, academics and politicians. FC s 174(7) governs the appointment of Magistrates. Magistrates are appointed by a Magistrates' Commission established in terms of the Magistrates' Courts Act 90 of 1993.

[3] FC item 6(1) of Schedule 2 requires judges to take a prescribed oath, swearing or affirming that they will be 'faithful to the Republic of South Africa, will uphold and protect the Constitution and the human rights entrenched in it, and will administer justice to all persons alike without fear, favour or prejudice, in accordance with the Constitution and the law.'

[4] Security of tenure is protected by FC s 177. FC s 177 provides for the dismissal of judges by the President on the basis of a finding by the JSC or upon the passing of a resolution by two thirds of the members of the National Assembly.

[5] FC s 176(3) precludes the reduction of judges' salaries, allowances and benefits, which are determined in terms of the Judges' Remuneration and Conditions of Employment Act 88 of 1989. Section 10 of the Supreme Court Act 59 of 1959 repeats this prohibition on reduction.

[6] At common law, judicial officers may not be sued in delict for their judgments. See Penrice v Dickinson 1945 AD 6; May v Udwin 1981 (1) SA 1 (A). In addition, s 25(1) of the Supreme Court Act 59 of 1959 provides that no civil process may be issued against a judge without the consent of that court: that is, the consent of the Judge President of the relevant division or the President of the Supreme Court of Appeal, as the case may be. Section 5 of the Constitutional Court Complementary Act 13 of 1995 imposes an equivalent requirement in respect of judges of the Constitutional Court.

[7] 2005 (12) BCLR 1192 (CC).

[8] Ibid at para 23.

[9] Ibid at para 24.

[10] Ibid at para 25.

[11] 1999 (4) SA 147 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 725 (CC)('SARFU II')(This case concerned an application for the recusal of five judges of the Constitutional Court in a matter concerning a challenge to a decision of the President to appoint a commission of inquiry into rugby in South Africa. The recusal application failed.)

[12] Ibid at para 30.

> The question is whether a reasonable, objective and informed person would on the correct facts reasonably apprehend that the Judge has not or will not bring an impartial mind to bear on the adjudication of the case, that is a mind open to persuasion by the evidence and the submissions of counsel. The reasonableness of the apprehension must be assessed in the light of the oath of office taken by the Judges to administer justice without fear or favour; and their ability to carry out that oath by reason of their training and experience. It must be assumed that they can disabuse their minds of any irrelevant personal beliefs or predispositions. They must take into account the fact that they have a duty to sit in any case in which they are not obliged to recuse themselves. At the same time, it must never be forgotten that an impartial Judge is a fundamental prerequisite for a fair trial and a judicial officer should not hesitate to recuse herself or himself if there are reasonable grounds on the part of a litigant for apprehending that the judicial officer, for whatever reasons, was not or will not be impartial.[1] (Footnotes omitted.)

In SARFU II, the Court identified two different approaches for determining 'the appearance of bias'. The focus of the one is 'real likelihood of bias' and of the other 'a reasonable suspicion or apprehension of bias'.[2] The court preferred the latter approach, and, to avoid the potentially inappropriate connotations that the word 'suspicion' might carry, preferred the phrase 'reasonable apprehension of bias' to 'reasonable suspicion of bias'.[3] The Court also acknowledged that all judges as human beings bring to their work their life experience – that they are not neutral in an absolute sense. The Court held that it is not improper for judges to have individual perspectives and for these perspectives to be brought to bear on their adjudication of cases.[4]

In South African Commercial Catering and Allied Workers Union and Others v Irvin & Johnson Ltd (Seafoods Division Fish Processing),[5] the Constitutional Court held that not only is there a presumption in favour of the impartiality of the court, but it is a presumption which is not easily dislodged. Cogent and convincing evidence is required to rebut the presumption.[6] The bar is also raised by the requirement that a reasonable person would reasonably apprehend judicial partiality. In SACCAWU, Cameron AJ discussed the double requirement of reasonableness of the SARFU II recusal test:

> It is no doubt possible to compact the 'double' aspect of reasonableness inasmuch as the reasonable person should not be supposed to entertain unreasonable or ill-informed apprehensions. But the twofold emphasis does serve to underscore the weight of the burden resting on a person alleging judicial bias or its appearance. As Cory J stated in a related context on behalf of the Supreme Court of Canada:
>
> > 'Regardless of the precise words used to describe the test, the object of the different formulations is to emphasize that the threshold for a finding of real or perceived bias is high. It is a finding that must be carefully considered since it calls into question an element of judicial integrity.'[7]

[1] SARFU II (supra) at para 48.
[2] Ibid at para 36.
[3] Ibid at para 38.
[4] Ibid at paras 42-43.
[5] 2000 (3) SA 705 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 886 (CC)('SACCAWU').
[6] Ibid at para 12.
[7] Ibid at para 15. The quote is from R v S (RD) [1997] 3 SCR 484 (SCC) at para 113.

In Basson II, the court held in the criminal context that the right to a fair trial requires fairness to the accused, as well as fairness to the public as represented by the state.[1] This conclusion leads to the question whether, in civil matters, public-interest standing might entitle non-parties to apply for recusal of a presiding officer. While one can envisage a matter in which such an interest would be sufficient to grant standing, it would have to be a compelling interest, not only in the resolution of the underlying substantive dispute, but also in the public perceptions of the partiality of the court.

The Court in Basson II noted that both SACCAWU and SARFU II were concerned with perceived bias in appellate courts where the bench is composed of more than one judge. The Basson II court explained:

> In evaluating the situation regarding a trial before a single judge, a court must be sensitive to the different nuances of such a 'live' situation in a court of first instance, where demeanour or body language, tone of voice, the timing of remarks and the emotional response of participants in exchanges to one another may play a role. The context of the proceedings will be relevant to the determination of the apprehensions of a reasonable person. However, in principle, the test remains the same.[2]

The Court went on to distinguish between grounding a complaint of bias on the conduct of the judge in hearing the case and grounding such a complaint on the relationship between the judge and one of the parties or witnesses, and held that it was more difficult to establish a reasonable apprehension of bias based on the conduct of the judge.[3] The Court referred with approval to the dictum of Harms JA in the Supreme Court of Appeal that 'a Judge is not simply a 'silent umpire'.[4] The Court stated that inappropriate behaviour by a judge is unacceptable and may, in certain circumstances, warrant a complaint to the appropriate authorities. It will not, however, ordinarily give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias. It will only do so where an applicant for recusal can show that it arises not from irritation or impatience with the way in which a case is being litigated, but from what may reasonably be perceived to be bias.[5] Ultimately, in Basson II, the Court held that although 'some of the rulings made by the judge were mistaken, and that some of his remarks were ill-considered', they did not give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias.[6]

(iv) Notice and hearing requirements

One of the fundamental aspects of the audi alteram partem principle is that both sides in a dispute must be heard. This principle is the basis for the detailed rules

[1] Basson (II) (supra) at para 26.
[2] Ibid at para 32.
[3] Ibid at para 33. See also R v Silber 1952 (2) SA 475 (A) at 481C-H.
[4] Greenfield Manufacturers (Temba) (Pty) Ltd v Royton Electrical Engineering (Pty) Ltd 1976 (2) SA 565, 570 (A).
[5] Ibid at para 36.
[6] Ibid at para 102.

of service and notice that are applicable in all civil proceedings.[1] A rule or a provision that does away with the ordinary principles of notice may be seen to implicate the fairness of any subsequent hearing. Such a rule or provision could also implicate the right to have a justiciable dispute determined by a court if the rule or provision provides for an invasive measure to be granted against a respondent on an ex parte basis. Therefore, a measure that allows a hearing to take place with little or no notice to the other side, but where that side is still represented at the hearing, would implicate the fairness aspect of FC s 34. A measure that does not even entitle a respondent to be represented at a hearing that affects his rights would implicate the access component of FC s 34. For convenience, both types of measure will be discussed here.

In De Beer NO v North-Central Local Council & South-Central Local Council and Others (Umhlatuzana Civic Association Intervening), the Constitutional Court located the requirement of a hearing in the 'fairness' contemplated in FC s 34, and explained that reasonable notice was necessary to facilitate a hearing.[2] It wrote:

> This s 34 fair hearing right affirms the rule of law which is a founding value of our Constitution. The right to a fair hearing before a court lies at the heart of the rule of law. A fair hearing before a court as a prerequisite to an order being made against anyone is fundamental to a just and credible legal order. Courts in our country are obliged to ensure that the proceedings before them are always fair. . . . It is a crucial aspect of the rule of law that court orders should not be made without affording the other side a reasonable opportunity to state their case. That reasonable opportunity can usually only be given by ensuring that reasonable steps are taken to bring the hearing to the attention of the person affected.[3]

In National Director of Public Prosecutions and Another v Mohamed NO,[4] the Constitutional Court (in a judgment of Ackermann J) referred with approval to the above passage from De Beer.[5] It confirmed the principle that, as a matter of statutory construction, the audi rule should be enforced unless it is clear that the Legislature has expressly or by necessary implication enacted that it should not apply or that there are exceptional circumstances which would justify a court not giving effect to it.[6] In NDPP v Mohamed, a High Court had granted an order declaring the provision in s 38 of the Prevention of Organised Crime Act,[7] that permitted the National Director of Public Prosecutions to apply 'by way of an ex parte application' to a High Court for a preservation of property, unconstitutional. It ordered that s 38 was to be read as if the words 'by way of an ex parte application' did not

[1] See, for example, Davids and Others v Van Straaten and Others 2005 (4) SA 468 (C)(HJ Erasmus J held that the principles of audi alteram partem, as required by s 34 of the Constitution, were so fundamental to the fairness of a hearing that it was inappropriate to review a decision of an inferior court without notice to all parties, including the magistrate. Ibid at 486D–G).

[2] 2002 (1) SA 429 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1109 (CC).

[3] Ibid at para 11.

[4] 2003 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 476 (CC)('NDPP v Mohamed').

[5] Ibid at para 36.

[6] Ibid at para 37.

[7] Act 121 of 1998.

appear in the provision.[1] The basis of the High Court's decision was that s 38 did not provide for a rule nisi procedure that would allow interested parties to oppose the confirmation of a preservation order obtained ex parte. Accordingly, the provision limited FC s 34 and the limitation could not be saved under FC s 36.

The Constitutional Court disagreed. It held that s 38 should be interpreted to include a right to be heard, that is, to include the ordinary rule nisi procedures, although the section did not expressly provide for them. The Court concluded that there was only one proper construction of s 38: namely, that the audi rule had not been excluded and that the principles relating to the issuing of rules nisi and the making of interim preservation orders by the High Courts were applicable to the s 38 procedures.[2] Ackermann J was prepared to assume that the temporary deprivation before the return day constitutes a limitation of FC s 34, but held that any such limitation would be justifiable under FC s 36.[3] NDPP v Mohamed is therefore authority for a presumptive principle of statutory interpretation in favour of the right to be heard, which must be discovered in the interpretation of legislation unless it is expressly or by necessary implication excluded, or there are exceptional circumstances which would justify not giving effect to it.

The Domestic Violence Act[4] contains various provisions that could be said to limit the right of access to court.[5] The aim of the Act is, of course, to provide protection for victims of domestic violence. It provides, amongst other things, for the issuing by a court of a protection order against a respondent suspected of committing domestic violence against an applicant. In terms of DVA s 4, an applicant may approach a court for an interim protection order without notice to a respondent. Section 5 determines the circumstances in which the interim order may be granted.[6] For our purposes, it is important to note that, if the court issues the interim order, the respondent must be given notice of this order and notice of a return day at which he may resist the finalization of the order. The respondent must be given at least 10-days' notice of the return day, but is entitled to anticipate it.[7] Section 5 also provides that a court may refuse to [1] NDPP v Mohamed (supra) at paras 5-8. There were two High Court decisions. Mohamed NO and Others v National Director of Public Prosecutions and Another 2002 (4) SA 366 (W). The High Court reached this conclusion regarding the constitutionality of s 38 without considering certain issues. Accordingly, the Constitutional Court set aside the High Court's order and remitted the matter to the High Court. National Director of Public Prosecutions and Another v Mohamed NO and Others 2002 (4) SA 843 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 970 (CC). In a second unreported judgment delivered on 16 October 2002, the High Court reconsidered the matter and came to the same conclusion in respect of s 38.

[2] NDPP v Mohamed (supra) at para 51.

[3] Ibid at para 52.

[4] Act 118 of 1998('DVA').

[5] The scheme of the Act is summarized in Omar v Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others. 2006 (2) SA 289 (CC), 2006 (2) BCLR 253 (CC)('Omar') at paras 20-31.

[6] A court will grant an order if there is a prima facie case that the respondent is committing or has committed an act of domestic violence and undue hardship may be suffered by the applicant if the interim order is not granted.

[7] DVA s 5(5).

grant an interim order but put the respondent on notice that there will be a return day on which the question as to whether to issue an order will be determined. Where a court adopts this approach, there will be no limitation on the fairness of the proceedings since no justiciable dispute will have been determined without notice. DVA s 6 provides for the issuing of final orders. If the respondent does not appear on the return date, the court may grant the order if it is satisfied that proper service took place. If the respondent does appear, it must conduct a full hearing at which the respondent may present evidence.

In Omar v Government of the RSA and Others, the applicant challenged the constitutionality of DVA s 8. This provision gives a court the power, when issuing a protection order, to issue a warrant of arrest against a respondent. The idea is that the operation of the warrant will be suspended. However, if the respondent breaches the protection order (which, in terms of the Act, is a criminal offence),[1] the complainant may present the warrant to a member of the police service who must arrest the respondent if it appears to him that there are reasonable grounds to believe that the complainant will suffer imminent harm as a result of the respondent's breach of the protection order.[2] There is also provision for the police officer to decline to arrest the respondent there and then but to put the respondent on notice of a hearing at which the question as to whether he has breached the protection order will be determined.[3]

The question whether the court may issue a warrant of arrest along with an interim order, as opposed to a final order, is important to the determination of the question whether s 8 limits the right of access to court. If the warrant of arrest is only issued along with the final protection order, there can be little complaint from an access to courts point of view, since the respondent is put on notice in regards to the final order. The Court in Omar did not directly consider this matter but it would seem from the definition of 'protection order' in the Act, read with s 8, that an arrest warrant may accompany an interim order. The question, therefore, was whether this limited the right of access to court.

One might have expected the respondent to challenge the whole scheme providing for protection orders. He did not, for example, challenge s 5, which provides for the issuing of an interim order without notice. Not much turned on this, in the end, because the reasons given by the court for rejecting his challenge based on s 8 apply to s 5 as well. They may, for that matter, apply to many emergency provisions that allow interim relief to be granted without notice. It must be noted, however, that the court explicitly limited its ruling to s 8.[4]

The Court in Omar held that the procedure for warrants of arrest did not limit the right in FC s 34. The Court pointed out that it would defeat the purpose of the Act if notice had to be given to the respondent in advance of the issuance of [1] DVA s 17*(a)*.

[2] DVA s 8(4)(b).
[3] DVA s 8(5).
[4] Omar (supra) at para 33.

the interim order. However, despite the fact that the order could be issued without notice, it would only begin to operate once notice of it had been given to the respondent and, furthermore, would only be confirmed on the return day after notice had been given to the respondent. These procedures would enable him to make representations at the hearing for more permanent relief.[1] The Court explained:

> The procedure provided for to obtain a protection order is not uncommon for situations where a party who feels threatened by the immediate conduct of another approaches a court for urgent relief without giving notice to the respondent. Interim relief is granted by courts on a daily basis and respondents are called upon to appear before the court on a specified return date to show cause why the interim relief should not be made final. On the return date the court, after a proper hearing, decides whether to discharge an interim order or to grant final relief. It is also quite common that the return date may be anticipated by the respondent and that an interim order can be varied or set aside. It is not surprising that the legislature has opted to utilise established and well-known procedures for dealing with emergency situations, to adapt these to meet the needs related to domestic violence and to codify them in a statute. Section 8 does not deny a respondent access to the courts.[2]

The implication of this approach is that any 'justiciable dispute' that is determined by the court only takes place on the return day of the interim order. Since proper notice of the return day is given to the respondent and he may make representations on the return day, his right of access to court is not limited.[3]

(v) Public hearing

FC s 34 does not contain any internal limitations of the right to a public hearing. Therefore, any such limitations must survive limitations analysis under FC s 36. FC s 36 will, therefore, require that the publicity requirement be departed from only in terms of a law of general application. Useful guidance as to when the right to a public hearing may justifiably be limited may be drawn from art 14 of the ICCPR[4] which provides for exceptions > for reasons of morals, public order (ordre public) or national security in a democratic society, or when the interest of the private lives of the parties so requires, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice. . . .

The Constitutional Court has recently endorsed the 'principle of open justice', a constitutional principle that flows from, among other provisions, the right to a

[1] Omar (supra) at para 37.
[2] Ibid at para 38.
[3] Another approach is to conclude that even an interim order constitutes a limitation of the right of access to court. However, the extent of the limitation is not severe (because of the return day at which submissions may be made) and the purpose of the limitation is very important (to prevent the respondent frustrating the order) and so such limitation will likely be found justifiable in terms of FC s 36.
[4] See § 59.2*(c)* supra.

fair public hearing in FC s 34 and the right to a public trial under FC s 35. In South African Broadcasting Corp Ltd v National Director of Public Prosecutions ('SABC'),[1] the Court held that 'open justice' is an important part of those rights,[2] and explained the rationale for the principle:

> Courts should in principle welcome public exposure of their work in the courtroom, subject, of course to their obligation to ensure that proceedings are fair. The foundational constitutional values of accountability, responsiveness and openness apply to the functioning of the Judiciary as much as to other branches of government. These values underpin both the right to a fair trial and the right to a public hearing (ie the principle of open courtrooms). The public is entitled to know exactly how the Judiciary works and to be reassured that it always functions within the terms of the law and according to time-honoured standards of independence, integrity, impartiality and fairness.[3]

SABC concerned an application for leave to appeal against the order of the SCA refusing to allow the applicant to be present at and to record for the purpose of live broadcast the proceedings of the SCA in the high-profile criminal appeal of Mr Shaik. The majority ultimately held that there was no basis to interfere with the exercise of the SCA's discretion in refusing such access on the facts of this matter.[4]

In the subsequent judgment in Shinga v The State & Another (Society of Advocates, Pietermaritzburg Bar, as Amicus Curiae*); O'Connell and Others v The State*,[5] Yacoob J (for a unanimous Court) endorsed the above dictum in the context of a challenge to a provision of the Criminal Procedure Act.[6] The provision allowed criminal appeals to be held in chambers rather than in open court. Yacoob J wrote:

> It is important that the significance of this deviation from the rule of law, fairness and justice be fully understood. The section makes dangerous inroads into our system of justice which ordinarily requires court proceedings that affect the rights of parties to be heard in public. It provides that an appeal can be determined by a Judge behind closed doors. No member of the public will know what transpired; nobody can be present at the hearing. Far from having any merit, the provision is inimical to the rule of law, to the constitutional mandate of transparency and to justice itself. And the danger must not be underestimated. Closed court proceedings carry within them the seeds for serious potential damage to every pillar on which every constitutional democracy is based.[7]

Yacoob J added that the principle of open justice is 'not without exception'.[8] In our view, examples of cases in which it would be appropriate to limit the right to

[1] 2007 (1) SA 523 (CC), 2007 (2) BCLR 167 (CC).
[2] Ibid at para 30.
[3] Ibid at para 32.
[4] Ibid at paras 61–67. For criticism of this decision see R Danay & J Foster 'The Sins of the Media: The SABC Decision and the Erosion of Free Press Rights' (2006) 22 SAJHR 563.
[5] 2007 (4) SA 611 (CC), 2007 (5) BCLR 474 (CC)('Shinga').
[6] Act 51 of 1977.
[7] Ibid at para 25.
[8] Ibid at para 27.

a public hearing include such matters as: testimony of child witnesses; sensitive family law matters;[1] confidential information implicating national security or public security interests;[2] and criminal matters (in particular, sexual offences) in which the complainant prefers privacy. In each case, the departure from the requirement of open justice must be justified by means of a law of general application. Therefore, a law of general application must ordinarily permit a judicial officer to hold a hearing behind closed doors. The absence of such a law would deny the court any discretion to hold in camera proceedings. In criminal proceedings, s 153 of the Criminal Procedure Act provides the statutory basis for a trial not to be held in open court.[3] The provision is concerned mainly with witness safety, sexual offences and offences involving 'inspiring fear' and with children involved in criminal proceedings. As a general rule, all High Court civil proceedings must be conducted in open court.[4] The High Court has a discretion to order otherwise in special cases.[5] These departures, in appropriate cases, will be reasonable and justifiable limitations of the right to have a hearing in open court.

Parties often agree that private arbitrations should be held behind closed doors. Christie contends that such agreements constitute a waiver of the right to a public hearing in FC s 34.[6] He further refers to the Supreme CA decision in Total Support Management (Pty) Ltd v Diversified Health Systems (SA) (Pty) Ltd[7] as authority for the proposition that FC s 34 probably does not apply to consensual arbitration — although it may apply to statutorily imposed arbitration.[8] We have argued above that FC s 34 may apply horizontally, at least when private parties litigate in the state courts.[9] In addition, however, FC s 34 is arguably capable of horizontal application in the context of private arbitration. The mere existence of [1] W v W 1976 (2) SA 308, 310 (W)(Evidence was permitted to be given in camera in this divorce case).

[2] See R v Muzorori 1967 (2) SA 177 (RA). See also Masetlha v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others (Independent Newspapers (Pty) Ltd and Minister for Intelligence Services Intervening), (Unreported, CCT 38/07, 22 August 2007)(The First Intervening Party, Independent Newspapers (Pty) Ltd, made application for parts of the record that had been removed from the public domain to again be made public. It also made an interlocutory application for its legal representatives and senior editors to have access to the record in the main proceedings so that they could properly prepare for the primary application. The First Intervening Party contended that the right in FC s 34 to a 'public hearing' extends to the documents contained in the appeal record. A majority of the Court issued an order dismissing the interlocutory application without reasons. The main application was heard in November 2007.)

[3] Act 51 of 1977.

[4] Supreme Court Act 59 of 1959 s 16.

[5] Ibid. See also Cerebos Food Corporation Ltd v Diverse Foods SA (Pty) Ltd 1984 (4) SA 149 (T); Botha v Minister van Wet and Orde 1990 (3) SA 937 (W) 944; S v Mothopeng 1978 (4) SA 874 (T); S v Sekete 1980 (1) SA 171 (N).

[6] For a critique of the notion of constitutional waiver, see S Woolman 'Category Mistakes and the Waiver of Constitutional Rights: A Reply to Deeksha Bhana' (2008) 125 SALJ –. This article does not necessarily reflect the views of the authors.

[7] 2002 (4) SA 661 (SCA) at paras 27–8.

[8] See RH Christie 'The Law of Contract and the Bill of Rights' in Bill of Rights Compendium (1996) 3H38.

[9] See § 59.3*(a)*(ii) supra.

a contract is not sufficient to exclude its application. In Telcordia Technologies Inc v Telkom SA Ltd, the Supreme Court of Appeal held that FC s 34 does apply to consensual arbitration proceedings, but that its requirements may be waived by parties entering into an arbitration agreement.[1] In our view, and as we discuss immediately below, arbitration may constitute dispute resolution in alternative independent and impartial fora, and, to that extent, will be regulated by FC s 34.

(c) Another independent and impartial tribunal or forum

The possibility of justiciable disputes being determined by alternative fora to courts has not been considered extensively by our courts. There are, however, various contexts in which, it seems, it will be acceptable for an alternative forum to determine a justiciable dispute. For example, the Value Added Tax Act, discussed above, creates a Special Court that resolves certain disputes. It is appropriate for this independent and impartial tribunal to be used in tax cases.[2] Since the resolution of disputes in alternative fora will only comply with FC s 34 where it is 'appropriate', the question whether an alternative forum may be used is clearly justiciable. But the nature of such 'appropriateness' has not yet been considered in detail. The other important question that arises is how the fair public hearing requirement of FC s 34 will be applied in fora other than courts. In the discussion that follows, we consider the application of FC s 34 to particular types of proceedings and proceedings held in special alternative fora and tribunals.

(i) Extradition hearings

In Geuking v President, RSA and Others[3] the applicant challenged the constitutionality of s 10(2) of the Extradition Act.[4] In order to understand this challenge it is necessary, briefly, to consider the mechanism for extradition provided in the Act.

Where a foreign state requests the extradition of a person present in South Africa a detailed procedure is invoked. For our purposes, it is necessary to note that, when a person is arrested pursuant to an extradition request, he is brought before a magistrate for a hearing.[5] The purpose of the hearing is to determine whether the person is 'extraditable'. If the person is found not to be extraditable, then he is released.[6] However, even if he is found to be extraditable, the process does not end there. The Minister must make the final determination whether to extradite him.[7]

[1] 2007 (3) SA 266 (SCA) at para 47.
[2] Metcash Trading Ltd v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service 2001 (1) SA 1109 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 47.
[3] 2003 (3) SA 34 (CC), 2004 (9) BCLR 895 (CC)('Geuking').
[4] Act 67 of 1962.
[5] Extradition Act s 9(1).
[6] Extradition Act s 10(3).
[7] See Extradition Act ss 10(1) and 11 .

Moreover, in order for a person to be extradited, the principle of 'double criminality' is applicable. The offence must constitute a crime both in South Africa and the country that seeks extradition.[1] Whether the offence, if proved, would constitute an offence here is an issue that is clearly within the expertise of the magistrate and he must hear evidence and submissions in this regard. However, the question whether the offence would constitute an offence in the foreign country is not within the expertise of local judicial officers and the Act provides that a certificate from the authorities of the foreign state to the effect that the offence, if proved, would indeed be an offence in the foreign country is conclusive proof of this fact.[2] So, a number of considerations must be taken into account by a magistrate before he may conclude that a person is extraditable. A full hearing, with evidence, takes place in respect of all of them. The exception is proof of the crime's status in the foreign country. The applicant in Geuking argued that this part of the process violated his right of access to court.

In rejecting his argument, the Court pointed out that the magistrate's hearing was merely a step on the way to the determination whether the person ought to be extradited. The Minister makes the final decision.[3] The Court held that it was not inappropriate or unfair of the legislature to relieve the magistrate of having to make a determination in respect of which South African lawyers would usually have no knowledge.[4] Furthermore, an appeal exists against the decision of the magistrate to a High Court.[5] In any case, before the Minister makes a final decision, she is obliged to take representations from the prospective extraditee and might, in appropriate cases, be called upon to determine whether the certificate issued by the foreign authorities was indeed sufficient evidence of the status of the alleged offence in foreign law.[6] The implication of this obligation is that the affected person will have the opportunity to lead evidence to the Minister before the decision is made and will have the opportunity to argue that the certificate issued by the foreign authorities should not be considered an accurate reflection of the status of the crime in that jurisdiction.

Implicit in the court's reasoning is that the provision for a hearing before the Minister constitutes an appropriate use of an alternative tribunal or forum. In determining whether the right of access to court had been violated the Court placed great stock in the fact that the Minister hears from the affected person and has a discretion whether to order extradition or not. The question whether a person ought to be extradited is clearly a justiciable dispute within the ambit of FC s 34. Therefore, Geuking could be understood in terms of that part of FC s 34 that allows for an alternative forum in appropriate cases. Of course, since the

[1] For the definition of 'extraditable offence', see Extradition Act s 1.
[2] Extradition Act s 10(2).
[3] Geuking (supra) at para 44.
[4] Ibid at para 45.
[5] Ibid at para 42.
[6] Ibid at paras 42 and 46.

attack was against the hearing before the magistrate, and not the Minister, the compliance of the hearing before the Minister with FC s 34 was not raised by the applicants. The Court did not directly consider this question and so the answer to the question as to whether the Minister is an 'independent and impartial' tribunal will have to wait for resolution in some future dispute.

(ii) Arbitration

There are two forms of arbitration proceedings: those that result as a consequence of agreement between the parties in terms of the Arbitration Act[1] and those that are compulsory in terms of legislation. An example of the latter is arbitration of disputes referred to the Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration (CCMA). The CCMA, established by the Labour Relations Act,[2] is not a court of law.[3] In terms of the LRA, certain labour disputes must be determined by arbitration in the CCMA and there is no right to appeal.[4] There is, however, a right to review on limited grounds.[5] This structure envisages that the CCMA will be the final arbiter of certain disputes of fact or law. The Labour Appeal Court has held that this arrangement does not violate the right of access to court:

> There is no constitutional right to have matters capable of being decided by the application of law determined by a court of law. It may be done by another independent and impartial tribunal (section 34 of the Constitution). The Commission is such a tribunal. It is (and was, see Hira v Booysen 1992 (4) SA 69 (A) at 91E-I) quite proper to give an independent and impartial administrative tribunal the exclusive competence to decide not only matters of fact, but also of law, with no right of appeal to a court.[6]

It was previously unclear whether arbitration proceedings of the CCMA constitute administrative action under FC s 33 (and PAJA) and/or whether they fall under FC s 34 and are to be deemed proceedings conducted in another independent and impartial forum or tribunal. The Constitutional Court, in Sidumo, has resolved this uncertainty. The majority held that CCMA arbitrations constitute administrative action under FC s 33. However, they are not reviewable under PAJA, but must comply with the requirements of a 'fair public hearing' under FC s 34. In addition to clarifying the application of FC s 34 to CCMA arbitration proceedings, the reasoning of the Court, and the divergent views among its members, sheds light on the relationship between FC s 34 and other constitutional rights.

[1] Act 42 of 1965.
[2] Act 66 of 1995 ('LRA').
[3] Carephone (Pty) Ltd v Marcus NO and Others 1999 (3) SA 304 (LAC), 1998 (10) BCLR 1326 (LAC)('Carwephone') at para 18.
[4] LRA s 143(1).
[5] LRA s 145.
[6] Carephone (supra) at para 33.

Navsa AJ noted in his majority judgment that compulsory arbitrations by the CCMA under the LRA are distinct from private arbitrations.[1] CCMA commissioners exercise public power of a character which, under the pre-constitutional approach to categorisation of functions, would have been regarded as 'an administrative body exercising a quasi-judicial function'.[2] He concluded, therefore, that a commissioner conducting a CCMA arbitration is performing an administrative function.[3] However, he held that PAJA does not apply to the review of CCMA awards because they are reviewable under s 145 of the LRA — the specific, constitutionally-mandated legislation enacted to govern labour disputes.[4]

Against this background, Navsa AJ considered an argument advanced by counsel for the employee, in support of the argument that PAJA ought not to apply to the review of CCMA awards, that 'the rights sought to be vindicated in arbitrations conducted under the LRA are linked to the fundamental rights provided for in ss 23 and 34 and not to the right to just administrative action contained in s 33 of the Constitution'.[5] Navsa JA rejected this argument, and his reasoning sheds light on the Court's understanding of the relationship that the right of access to courts bears to other rights, in particular the labour and administrative justice rights in FC ss 23 and 33:

> This submission is based on the misconception that the rights in sections 23, 33 and 34 are necessarily exclusive and have to be dealt with in sealed compartments. The right to fair labour practices, in the present context, is consonant with the right to administrative action that is lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair. Everyone has the right to have these rights enforced before the CCMA acting as an impartial tribunal. In the present context, these rights in part overlap and are interconnected.[6] (Footnotes omitted)

In a separate concurring judgment, O'Regan J agreed with Navsa AJ that a CCMA arbitration constitutes administrative action that is subject to the requirements of FC s 33, and concluded that the CCMA constitutes an independent and impartial forum under FC s 34.[7] Her judgment is animated by a concern that > if we understand section 33 and section 34 to be mutually exclusive constitutional provisions, we may end up with a formalist jurisprudence based on a distinction between 'administrative' in section 33 and 'judicial' or 'adjudicative' decisions by tribunals governed only by section 34 which is at odds with the substantive vision of our Constitution.[8]

[1] Sidumo and Another v Rustenburg Platinum Mines Ltd and Others [2007] ZACC 22 at para 88. Moseneke DCJ, Madala J, O'Regan J and Van der Westhuizen J concurred in the judgment of Navsa AJ. The bench of ten judges split 5-4 in this matter, with Sachs J filing a judgment that purports to agree with both of the main divergent judgments. The judgment of Navsa AJ accordingly constitutes the majority judgment.

[2] Ibid

[3] Ibid

[4] Ibid at para 104. Navsa AJ held, further, that the reasonableness standard embodied in FC s 33 now infuses review under s 145 of the LRA, Ibid para 106.

[5] Ibid at para 111.

[6] Ibid at para 112.

[7] Ibid at para 124.

[8] Ibid at para 135.

In a minority judgment, Ngcobo J (Mokgoro, Nkabinde and Skweyiya JJ concurring) classified the function performed by the CCMA as judicial, identified it as an 'independent and impartial tribunal' within the scope of FC s 34 and concluded, therefore, that its decisions do not constitute administrative action as contemplated by FC s 33.[1]

In a judgment in which he claims to align himself with the positions of both Navsa AJ and Ngcobo J, Sachs J emphasized the hybridity of the rights relationship at issue and contended that FC ss 23, 33 and 34 apply to CCMA arbitrations.[2] Sachs J appears to believe that CCMA awards do constitute administrative action under FC s 33, that PAJA should nevertheless not apply to their review, and that CCMA arbitrations are subject to the 'fairness' requirements of FC s 34.[3] Sachs J holds that FC s 33 requires 'fair dealing'; FC s 23 requires that the 'arbitration process must not fall outside the bounds of reason [because] to accept it doing so would hardly represent a fair outcome'; and FC s 34 requires fairness which, according to Sachs J, entails 'some reasonably sustainable fit between the evidence and the outcome'.[4] Sachs J appears to have been alive to the criticism that this approach, emphasizing hybridity and permeability could conduce to imprecision. He defends his mode of reasoning as follows:

> Seepage should be understood not as a form of analytical blurring to be avoided, but rather as a desirable mechanism for ensuring that constitutional interests in appropriate cases are properly protected, and constitutional justice fully achieved.[5]

We share the concern expressed by Navsa AJ, O'Regan J and Sachs J as to the dangers of compartmentalizing FC ss 33 and 34 (and FC s 23). However, to subsume the requirements of the provisions of FC ss 23, 33 and 34 under a generalized standard of fairness-cum-reasonableness, as Sachs J seems to propose, cannot be supported. Fairness, as embodied in various rights in the Bill of Rights, is not a one-size-fits-all concept. Nor is it readily interchangeable with concepts such as reasonableness or rationality. Legal realists might contend that judges in any event exercise a wide discretion when they apply pliable standards such as reasonableness or fairness to decide particular cases and merely rationalize their decisions by applying specific legal rules. We do not wish to enter that complex jurisprudential debate here. Suffice it to say that, in our view, it remains important that the Constitutional Court, as an apex court, delivers judgments that provide lower courts and practitioners with sufficient guidance to take reasoned decisions on how to approach particular cases.

[1] Sidumo (supra) at paras 160–289, especially para 238.
[2] Ibid at taras 156–7.
[3] Ibid at para 158.
[4] Ibid.
[5] Ibid at para 151

The majority in Sidumo enunciates at least the following two principles:

(i) CCMA arbitrations constitute administrative action under FC s 33, but are reviewable under s 145 of the LRA, infused with the reasonableness standard of FC s 33. They are not reviewable under PAJA.
(ii) The CCMA constitutes an independent and impartial forum under FC s 34, and a CCMA arbitration must therefore (also) satisfy the requirements of a 'fair public hearing' in terms of FC s 34.

It is beyond the scope of this chapter to engage with the principles governing the review of CCMA awards under the LRA and FC s 33. From an access to courts perspective, however, we note that the application of the fair public hearing requirement of FC s 34 to CCMA arbitration proceedings will obviously not entail transposing the FC s 34 requirements for judicial proceedings onto the CCMA. We explore the issue of the flexible nature of fairness under FC s 34 in § 59.4*(c)*(v) and (vi) below. A similar approach is likely to be taken when fairness is applied to CCMA arbitrations.

When it comes to consensual arbitrations in terms of the Arbitration Act, there are two ways to view them: one could see them as constituting alternative independent and impartial fora, or one could see the parties to them as having waived their right of access to court.[1] The Supreme Court of Appeal in Total Support Management[2] left open the question whether the right of access to court may be waived.[3] It also did not directly decide that an arbitration proceeding constitutes an appropriate alternative forum.[4] It held, instead, that the fairness requirement of FC s 34 is, in any case, satisfied where the parties by mutual agreement define what is fair in their arbitration agreement.[5] In Patcor Quarries CC v Issroff and Others,[6] Mpati J (as he then was) progressed on the assumption that IC s 22 includes a right to appeal. It was argued that s 28 of the Arbitration Act, which provides that arbitration awards are final and not subject to appeal, violated the right of access to court. Mpati J pointed out that the Act provides that parties may agree to an appeal in their contract. Parties who signed arbitration agreements without providing for appeals could be said to have abandoned their right to appeal.[7]

This debate has now been resolved – at least until the matter comes before the Constitutional Court. In the recent case of Telcordia Technologies Inc v Telkom SA Ltd, the Supreme Court of Appeal unanimously held that FC s 34 applies to [1] See Christie (supra) at 3H38.

[2] Total Support Management (Pty) Ltd &Another v Diversified Health Systems (SA) (Pty) Ltd and Another 2002 (4) SA 661 (SCA)('Total Support').
[3] Ibid at para 27.
[4] Ibid at para 27.
[5] Ibid at para 28.
[6] 1998 (4) BCLR 467 (SE).
[7] Ibid at 481.

arbitrations in terms of the Arbitration Act: however it also held that the requirements of FC s 34 may be waived.[1] Harms JA held that there was nothing preventing the parties from defining what is 'fair' for the purposes of their dispute.[2] Furthermore, Harms JA, referring to the Supreme Court of Appeal judgment in Napier v Barkhuizen,[3] held that the Final Constitution prizes the values of autonomy and dignity and that these values 'find expression in the liberty to regulate one's life by freely engaged contractual arrangements.'[4] Harms JA therefore held that the rights contained in FC s 34 could be waived unless the waiver was in conflict with another constitutional provision or was otherwise contra bonos mores.[5]

(iii) Parliamentary disciplinary proceedings

De Lille v Speaker of the National Assembly[6] concerned the decision of an ad hoc committee of Parliament to suspend the applicant and demand a formal apology from her for remarks made during a session of the National Assembly that were considered 'unparliamentary'. In short, the applicant had made remarks to the effect that certain senior members of the African National Congress (ANC) were spies during apartheid. Having been asked to withdraw these remarks she unconditionally did so, but was later punished by an ad hoc disciplinary committee. The relevant facts regarding the committee were as follows:[7]

- It was convened with proportionate representation of the National Assembly and was therefore dominated by ANC members.
- The chair of the committee was also a member of the ANC.
- The chair conducted himself in a way that suggested that the ANC had already come to a decision in regard to the appropriate sanction before the committee had begun its deliberations.
- The committee did not formally reach a conclusion that the applicant was guilty of the offence with which she was charged but, nevertheless, proceeded to consider the appropriate sanction.

The High Court found that the committee had acted in a biased and mala fide manner.[8] It therefore held that > it was incumbent on the National Assembly to create a disciplinary mechanism which is consonant with the Constitution. The ad hoc committee was not and could not be an independent and impartial forum for purposes of s 34 because, unlike the disciplinary

[1] 2007 (3) SA 266 (SCA)('Telcordia')
[2] Ibid at para 47.
[3] Napier v Barkhuizen 2006 (4) SA 1 (SCA), 2006 (9) BCLR 1011 (SCA), [2006] 2 All SA 469 (SCA).
[4] Telcordia (supra) at para 47.
[5] Ibid at para 48.
[6] De Lille and Another v Speaker of the National Assembly 1998 (7) BCLR 916 (C)('De Lille').
[7] Ibid at para 6.
[8] Ibid at para 18.

committee envisaged in the rules [of Parliament], it was dominated by the majority party. Its independence or impartiality was significantly compromised.[1]

(iv) The status of refugees and immigrants

Prior to the enactment of the Refugees Act,[2] decisions as to refugee status were taken by the Refugee Affairs Standing Committee. There was however a right to appeal to a Refugee Affairs Appeal Board. In Baramoto and Others v Minister of Home Affairs and Others,[3] this set-up was alleged to violate the right of access to court because, as alternative tribunals, these boards were neither impartial nor independent. The High Court held that there was nothing to suggest that, on the facts of the case, the Committee and Board were neither independent nor impartial.[4] The focus was not on whether there was some form of institutional bias inherent in these tribunals but rather whether, in the context of the particular matter, the potential for bias existed.

In terms of the Refugees Act, decisions regarding applicants' refugee status are taken, at first instance, by a Refugee Status Determination Officer.[5] The Act establishes a Standing Committee for Refugee Affairs.[6] The Committee reviews the decisions of Refugee Status Determination Officers in certain cases.[7] The Act provides for appeals from decisions of the Standing Committee to an Appeal Board.[8] The same question engaged by Baramoto arises under the Refugees Act — is the Appeal Board an independent and impartial alternative forum to a court?[9]

Other similar tribunals, established in terms of legislation, exist and raise similar issues. For instance, in terms of the Immigration Act,[10] decisions as to immigration status are made, in the first instance, by immigration officers. Decisions of immigration officers may be reviewed by the Minister in certain cases and reviewed or appealed to the Director-General in others.[11] The latter may be appealed or reviewed further to the Minister. There is no right of appeal to a court. This arrangement naturally raises the question whether the Director-General and the Minister constitute independent and impartial tribunals.

[1] DeLille (supra) at para 36.
[2] Act 130 of 1998.
[3] 1998 (5) BCLR 562 (W).
[4] Ibid at 576.
[5] Refugees Act s 21.
[6] Refugees Act s 9(1).
[7] Refugees Act ss 11 and 25.
[8] Refugees Act s 26.
[9] It should be noted that the Immigration Act 13 of 2002 sought to amend s 26 of the Refugees Act to replace the appeal to the Appeal Board with an appeal to a court. This would have rendered the debate about whether the Appeal Board is an independent and impartial alternative forum somewhat moot, because a full appeal would be available before an ordinary court. This amendment has not, as yet, come into force. It should also be noted that if one consults Juta's versions of the statutes, it seems as if the amendment has indeed come into force. This is not, in fact, so and the Butterworths version reflects this.
[10] Act 13 of 2002.
[11] See, generally, Immigration Act s 8.

(v) Commissions of inquiry

In Mbebe and Others v Chairman, White Commission and Others, the applicants had been members of the Transkeian police force and, just prior to the advent of democracy, had received promotions.[1] In 1998, the White Commission, which had been appointed by the President in terms of IC s 236(6), found that the promotions had been irregular and, as a result, the promotions were either set aside or altered.[2] The applicants sought to have the findings of the White Commission set aside for various reasons. Of interest for our purposes is an amendment to the applicants' pleadings, which sought to challenge IC s 236(6) as being 'unconstitutional' for violating FC s 34. Although this contention may seem strange, it was a plausible argument to advance. Item 24 of Schedule 6 to the Final Constitution, which deals with transitional arrangements, preserved IC s 236(6) 'subject to consistency with the new Constitution'. It was therefore open to the applicants to argue that IC s 236(6) was inconsistent with FC s 34 and, therefore, invalid.

The High Court rejected this argument. It proceeded on the assumption that a commission envisaged by IC s 236(6) was not a court of law, but a sui generis tribunal.[3] The High Court held that this tribunal satisfied the criteria of independence and impartiality required by the Final Constitution. The commission was headed by a judicial officer and a judicial officer appointed in terms of the Constitution is in all material respects an 'impartial entity, independent of the executive and the legislature' who is 'to act as arbiter between the individual and the State'.[4] The High Court held, further, that the proceedings in an alternative forum or tribunal did not need to be identical to those conducted in court, but that, in any case, > the procedures that were adopted by the first respondent were largely consistent with those employed in an ordinary court of law. The applicants were given the right to legal representation, the right to cross-examine the witnesses who were called by the official appointed by the Commission to perform such function and the right to give evidence and to call witnesses. In practice therefore the applicants were afforded the same rights as those enjoyed by a litigant in ordinary civil proceedings.[5]

[1] 2000 (7) BCLR 754 (Tk)('Mbebe').

[2] IC s 236(6) provided:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of this section, the conclusion or amendment of a contract, the appointment or promotion, or the award of a term or condition of service or other benefit, which occurred between 27 April 1993 and 30 September 1994 in respect of any person employed at any time during the said period by an institution referred to in subsection (1), or any class of such persons, may, at the instance of any interested party, before 31 December 1996 be referred to a commission appointed by the President and presided over by a judge, for review, and if not proper or justifiable in the circumstances of the case, the commission may reverse or alter the contract, appointment, promotion or award before a date to be determined by the Minister for the Public Service and Administration.

[3] Mbebe (supra) at 773.

[4] Ibid at 775, relying on Nel v Le Roux NO and Others 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC) at para 15.

[5] Mbebe (supra) at 776.

The Commission appointed by the President in this matter was therefore compliant with FC s 34. The court deemed it unnecessary to decide whether, in all such cases, a commissioner appointed in terms of IC s 236(6) had to be a judge.[1]

In Bongoza v Minister of Correctional Services and Others, the High Court reached a similar conclusion in respect of the same commission of inquiry as that considered in Mbebe.[2] Unlike the court in Mbebe, which focused on the similarities between the procedures adopted by the White Commission and those procedures used in a court of law, the court in Bongoza confronted the differences: in particular, it confirmed that the rules of evidence applicable to the commission differed from a court of law in that the commission could have regard to a wider range of evidence, such as hearsay evidence, and was not obliged to allow cross-examination of witnesses.[3] The Bongoza court confirmed that the requirements of fairness are flexible and that FC s 34 envisages that courts do not have a monopoly on independence and impartiality: an independent and impartial hearing is possible in a forum other than a court. The commission of inquiry at issue qualified as such.[4]

(vi) Specialist complaints tribunals

Statutes often establish tribunals the function of which is to determine the validity of specific complaints that fall within the scope of operation of a particular piece of legislation.[5] At times, these complaints embrace disputes that ought to be resolved by the application of the law as contemplated in FC s 34. At others, the tribunals are best understood as administrative decision-makers whose decisions may constitute 'administrative action', subject to PAJA review but not to FC s 34.

In Islamic Unity Convention v Minister of Telecommunications and Others,[6] the applicant challenged certain provisions of the now repealed Independent Broadcasting

[1] Mbebe (supra) at 775 and 776.
[2] 2002 (6) SA 330 (TkH)('Bongoza').
[3] Ibid at paras 17–18.
[4] Ibid at paras 22–5.
[5] Chapter 9 of the Final Constitution establishes certain institutions whose functions include the investigation and adjudication of complaints: the Public Protector, Human Rights Commission and Commission for Gender Equality. For more on the Chapter 9 Institutions, see S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS) Chapters 24A–F. Statutory examples include the Inspector-General of Intelligence established in terms of the Intelligence Services Control (Oversight) Act 40 of 1994, which investigates complaints against members of the intelligence services; the Independent Complaints Directorate established in terms of the South African Police Service Act 68 of 1995, which investigates complaints against members of the South African Police Service; and professional boards established to consider complaints against health professionals in terms of the Health Professions Act 56 of 1974. On oversight of the police and intelligence services see December 2007) Chapter 23B.
[6] Unreported WLD case no 3431/06, 26 April 2007 ('Islamic Unity Convention'). At the time of writing, the confirmation proceedings in this matter were pending before the Constitutional Court.

Act[1] (and regulations made under it) and its successor statute, the Independent Communications Authority of South Africa Act.[2] The challenge relied on FC s 34. It focused on the powers and functions of the Broadcasting Monitoring and Complaints Committee (BMCC), and had its origins in a complaint lodged against the applicant for broadcasting a programme concerning Zionism and Israel that contravened the Code of Conduct for Broadcasting Services contained in the IBA Act.[3] The applicant noted that the impugned provisions conferred monitorial, investigative and adjudicative powers on a single body, the BMCC — and it contended that the concatenation of such powers was inconsistent with FC ss 33 and 34.

The Court in Islamic Unity noted that '[t]he intermingling of these powers brings into question the impartiality of the BMCC'.[4] It stated that the appropriate test was to ask whether a reasonable apprehension of partiality and therefore bias existed in the scheme provided for under the impugned provisions. Van Oosten J referred with approval to the decision of the Canadian Federal Court of Appeal in MacBain v Canadian Human Rights Commission et al, MacBain v Lederman et al.[5] In MacBain, the fairness of proceedings arising from a complaint filed with the Canadian Human Rights Commission was in issue. Van Oosten J noted that the procedure adopted by the Commission, like that of the BMCC, involved it assuming the role of investigator, prosecutor and adjudicator of complaints.[6] In MacBain, the court found that this arrangement 'easily gives rise … to a suspicion of influence or dependency'. Van Oosten J approved of the reasoning in MacBain and adopted it in deciding Islamic Unity. After noting the separation of roles of investigator, prosecutor and decision-maker in criminal proceedings, Van Oosten J held:

> I can see no reason why the principles underscoring fundamental concepts such as independence, impartiality and resulting fairness should not with equal force apply to administrative bodies like the BMCC. It is accordingly my finding that a reasonable suspicion of influence, dependency or bias arising from the direct connection between the prosecutor of the complaint (the chairperson of the BMCC) and the decision maker (the BMCC) cannot be excluded. It follows that the constitutional challenge of the impugned provisions of the IBA Act must be upheld. The impugned provisions of the ICASA Act, which are similar to the impugned provisions of the IBA Act, must accordingly suffer the same fate.

We note that the court did not indicate whether the basis of its finding was FC s 33 and/or FC s 34, but its references to a 'fair hearing' in its reasons suggest that FC s 34 was applied. The High Court then turned to consider the constitutionality of regulations regarding the powers of the BMCC. The regulations

[1] Act 153 of 1993 ('IBA Act').
[2] Act 13 of 2000 ('the ICASA Act').
[3] Ibid at para 3.
[4] Ibid at para 16.
[5] 22 DLR (4th) 119 (FedCA).
[6] Islamic Unity Convention (supra) at para 18.

allowed for witnesses to be questioned through the Chairperson and to be cross-examined only if the Chairperson deemed it necessary and in the interests of the functions of the BMCC. The High Court held that these regulations were at odds with the 'normal rights of cross-examination' and unreasonably curtailed the right of a party to conduct its case.[1] Accordingly, the regulations were inconsistent with the right to a fair hearing in FC s 34.[2]

In our view, Islamic Unity erred in two respects. First, it is not clear that complaints referred to the BMCC constitute 'disputes that can be resolved by the application of law'. They may be. For example, the subject of a complaint could constitute actionable defamation and the outcome of the complaints process would be dispositive of such a civil claim. However, breaches of a broadcasting code of conduct will not necessarily constitute disputes falling within the ambit of FC s 34. As noted above, the question whether a dispute of law exists at all is one requirement for the application of FC s 34.

Secondly, and more fundamentally, however, the judgment rigidly equates the normal procedures applicable in courts to the fairness of a hearing in a complaints tribunal. We think that the approach adopted in Bongoza,[3] which acknowledges that fairness is a flexible concept that varies depending on a number of factors, and that it is not necessarily unfair to depart from the ordinary procedures of the courts, is to be preferred. We would also endorse the dicta of Van Niekerk AJ in Avril Elizabeth Home for the Mentally Handicapped v Commission For Conciliation, Mediation & Arbitration and Others.[4] Of procedural fairness as it applies in CCMA proceedings in terms of the LRA, the judge wrote:

> Where a commissioner is obliged (as commissioners are) to arbitrate dismissal disputes on the basis of the evidence presented at the arbitration proceedings, procedural requirements in the form that they developed under the criminal justice model are applied ultimately only for the sake of procedure, since the record of a workplace disciplinary hearing presented to the commissioners at any subsequent arbitration is presented only for the purpose of establishing that the dismissal was procedurally fair. The continued application of the criminal justice model of workplace procedure therefore results in a duplication of process, with no tangible benefit to either employer or employee.
>
> The signal of a move to an informal approach to procedural fairness is clearly presaged by the explanatory memorandum that accompanied the draft Labour Relations Bill. The memorandum stated the following:
>
> "The draft Bill requires a fair, but brief, pre-dismissal procedure. . . . [It] opts for this more flexible, less onerous, approach to procedural fairness for various reasons: small employers, of whom there are a very large number, are often not able to follow elaborate pre-dismissal procedures; and not all procedural defects result in substantial prejudice to the employee.'

[1] Islamic Unity Convention (supra) at para 23.
[2] Ibid
[3] Bongoza (supra).
[4] (2006) 27 ILJ 1644 (LC).

On this approach, there is clearly no place for formal disciplinary procedures that incorporate all of the accoutrements of a criminal trial, including the leading of witnesses, technical and complex 'charge-sheets', requests for particulars, the application of the rules of evidence, legal arguments, and the like.

In our view, FC s 34 requires a similarly flexible approach to fairness when disputes are resolved in an alternative forum or tribunal. Although criminal justice procedures may be followed as a matter of convenience, what is unfair in a court is not necessarily unfair in another forum.

(d) Right to enforcement of an effective remedy

In Jooste v Score Supermarket, the Constitutional Court held that the predecessor to FC s 34, IC s 22, did not call for the retention of all common law rights of action which existed at any stage of the litigation.[1] FC s 34 also provides no protection against legally incorrect judicial decision-making.[2] FC s 34 is therefore not concerned at all with the content of the substantive law: that is, what causes of action, defences and rules may exist at common law or in legislation. But where causes of action do exist under the substantive law, including but not limited to those founded on the specific terms within the Bill of Rights, FC s 34 entitles persons not only to have access to courts for the sake of access, but to meaningful access that leads ultimately to enforcement of an 'effective remedy'. In Modderklip, the Constitutional Court concluded, in the face of the intractable legal stalemate that gave rise to the dispute before it, that:

> The obligation resting on the State in terms of section 34 of the Constitution was, in the circumstances, to take reasonable steps to ensure that Modderklip was, in the final analysis, provided with effective relief. The State could have expropriated the property in question or provided other land, a course that would have relieved Modderklip from continuing to bear the burden of providing the occupiers with accommodation. The State failed to do anything and accordingly breached Modderklip's constitutional rights to an effective remedy as required by the rule of law and entrenched in section 34 of the Constitution.

In Fose v Minsiter of Safety and Security,[3] without reference to FC s 34, the Constitutional Court discussed the right to 'appropriate relief' in terms of IC s 7(4)(a) as follows:

> Appropriate relief will in essence be relief that is required to protect and enforce the Constitution. Depending on the circumstances of each particular case the relief may be a declaration of rights, an interdict, a mandamus or such other relief as may be required to ensure that the rights enshrined in the Constitution are protected and enforced. If it is necessary to do so, the courts may even have to fashion new remedies to secure the protection and enforcement of these all-important rights.[4]

[1] Jooste v Score Supermarket Trading (Pty) Ltd 1999 (2) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 139 (CC) at para 21.
[2] Lane & Fey NNO v Dabelstein and Others 2001 (2) SA 1187 (CC), 2001 (4) BCLR 312 (CC).
[3] 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC).
[4] Ibid at para 19.

Other provisions of the Final Constitution refer to relief and remedial entitlements. FC s 172(1)(b) provides that a court deciding a constitutional matter may make 'any order that is just and equitable'. FC s 38 provides that a court may 'grant appropriate relief' to a person entitled to approach it. Modderklip has drawn a new and powerful link between the entitlement to relief in these non-rights provisions of the Final Constitution and the rights that the Final Constitution confers. The judgment is authority for the proposition that from FC s 34 flows an entitlement to judicial and enforcement mechanisms that allow persons to vindicate their substantive rights. This entitlement, which flows from the rule of law doctrine embraced in FC s 1*(c)*, extends beyond merely obtaining a court order. It requires its actual enforcement. It would seem, therefore, that FC s 38 entrenches the right to appropriate relief when a substantive provision of the Bill of Rights is infringed and that FC s 34 entrenches the right to the enforcement of a court order providing that relief in whichever way is most appropriate.[1] In most cases, the ordinary mechanisms of execution will suffice to discharge the state's obligations. But Modderklip is an example of a case in which they did not, owing to its exceptional facts.[2] In Modderklip, the Court vindicated the applicant's right by awarding damages, in lieu of execution of the eviction order that the applicant had obtained.[3] Although the Court used the mechanism of the Expropriation Act as a formula to calculate these damages, given that they arose out of the applicant's right in FC s 34, the damages may appropriately be described as 'constitutional'.

[1] See K Hofmeyr Understanding Constitutional Remedial Power (Unpublished MPhil thesis, University of Oxford, 2007)(The author draws attention to John Austin's two-tiered structure of rights in which a distinction is drawn between secondary, remedial rights (ie, the rights to relief following from violations of substantive rights) and primary rights, such as those deriving from a judgment of a court, from which secondary rights arise. Based on this distinction, Hofmeyr argues that FC s 34, as interpreted in Modderklip, entrenches the right to enforcement of a primary right provided by a judgment of a court (in this case, an eviction order). FC s 38, by contrast, gives rise to secondary rights to 'appropriate relief' for violations of constitutional rights.)

[2] An example of a case in which it was held that there were not exceptional facts such as would impose Modderklip-type obligations on the State is Rootman v President of the RSA [2006] SCA 80 (RSA). Mr Rootman sought an order against the President and the Minister of Justice compelling them to take steps to assist him in enforcing a money judgment against the Government of the Democratic Republic of Congo (the DRC). The DRC had refused to make payment and Rootman had succeeded in recovering only a small portion of the judgment debt. The Pretoria High Court dismissed Rootman's application for an order compelling the state to take steps to assist him to recover, and he appealed to the SCA. In the SCA, he sought only a declaratory order that the state has an obligation to take reasonable steps to assist him in achieving compliance with the court order. He relied, in part, on FC s 34 which, he argued, conferred a right to execute the judgment in his favour and imposed an obligation on the state to ensure the effectiveness of court orders. The SCA dismissed his appeal. Its main reason was that the Constitution does not apply extra-territorially. It relied on Kaunda v President of the Republic of South Africa 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) at paras 11–12. The court held further , in relation to the argument that the DRC's evasion of the debt threatened the rule of law, that the DRC was no different in this respect to any other (South African) commercial debtor. Rootman (supra) at para 12. Finally, the court noted that an order declaring that the state was required to take reasonable steps to assist Mr Rootman to recover the judgment debt would be satisfied by a mere request by the state to the DRC that it comply with the order, which would not constitute 'effective relief' for Mr Rootman. Ibid at 14.

[3] President of the RSA v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC) at paras 59–66.

Modderklip has established that the relief or the remedy-enforcement component of FC s 34 may be engaged during the execution stage of proceedings. In Modderklip, the obstacles to execution arose from the facts, not from the law. However, provisions that limit the rights of litigants to execute court orders may also infringe this component of FC s 34. A prime example is s 3 of the State Liability Act.[1] The Act prohibits execution against property of the State, providing:

> 3. Satisfaction of judgment.–No execution, attachment or like process shall be issued against the defendant or respondent in any such action or proceedings or against any property of the State, but the amount, if any, which may be required to satisfy any judgment or order given or made against the nominal defendant or respondent in any such action or proceedings may be paid out of the National Revenue Fund or a Provincial Revenue Fund, as the case may be.

In Nyathi v MEC for the Department of Health, Gauteng and Another, the Pretoria High Court declared s 3 inconsistent with the Final Constitution and invalid.[2] The applicant, Dingaan Nyathi, had a delictual claim against the state that arose out of the negligence of hospital staff who treated him for burns.[3] As a result of their negligence, he had suffered a stroke and severe left hemiplegia. He instituted action and claimed damages in the amount of R1 496 000. When he instituted action, the respondent MEC conceded the merits and the matter was set down for hearing on the quantum of damages. Mr Nyathi successfully applied for an order directing the MEC to make an interim payment of R317 700 to enable him to meet his medical and legal expenses, pending the determination of quantum. The MEC failed to pay.[4] Mr Nyathi then made urgent application for an order declaring s 3 of the State Liability Act inconsistent with the Final Constitution and invalid.[5] The MEC did not oppose the application: but the state still failed to pay.

Davis AJ noted that, at common law, a distinction is made between two types of civil orders: orders ad factum praestandum and orders ad pecuniam solvendam — that is, orders to do (or refrain from doing) something and orders to pay an amount of money.[6] The former may be enforced by civil contempt proceedings, and the latter by the issue of a writ of attachment followed by the attachment and sale in execution of the assets of the debtor. Arguably, s 3 of the State Liability Act prevents litigants from enforcing either type of order against the State. As concerns the possibility of contempt orders against organs of state, the case law is divided.[7] In Jayiya v Member of the Executive Council For Welfare, Eastern Cape and

[1] Act 20 of 1957.
[2] Unreported, TPD case no 26014/2005, (30 March 2007)('Nyathi'). At the time of writing, the confirmation proceedings in this matter were pending in the Constitutional Court.
[3] Ibid at para 2.
[4] Ibid at para 3.1.
[5] Ibid at para 3.3.
[6] Ibid at para 4.
[7] See P Hoffman 'Civil Servants can Commit Contempt of Court' (2006, October) De Rebus 45.

Another,[1] the Supreme Court of Appeal held that, save for a maintenance order, a money judgment is not enforced by contempt proceedings, but by execution. The State Liability Act precluded execution against the property of a provincial government, therefore closing that avenue of obtaining satisfaction of the appellant's debt. However, the prohibition against execution against the state or a provincial government did not allow, as an alternative, the introduction of civil imprisonment for officials who failed to carry out obligations resting upon the state.[2] However, the Supreme Court of Appeal in MEC, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape v Kate has now clarified its earlier decision in Jayiya. It wrote:

> [m]uch of what was said in Jayiya was indeed obiter and the ratio in that case was decidedly narrow. Jayiya decided only that a money judgment given against a provincial government (which is the construction that was placed upon the relevant order) is not enforceable by incarcerating for contempt a defendant who has been cited nominally for the government if the government fails to comply with the order.[3]

Later in the judgment, the Kate court added the following in respect of orders to do or refrain from doing something:

> Moreover, there ought to be no doubt that a public official who is ordered by a court to do or to refrain from doing a particular act, and fails to do so, is liable to be committed for contempt, in accordance with ordinary principles, and there is nothing in Jayiya that suggests the contrary.[4]

In Kate, the Supreme Court of Appeal ultimately awarded constitutional damages to vindicate the rights of the particular ligitant. The court in Kate held that the state's unreasonable delay in discharging its obligation under FC s 33 (the right to just administrative action) to decide the applicant's application for social assistance led to a violation of her substantive right to social assistance.[5] In the circumstances, the court held, referring to the decision of the Constitutional Court in Modderklip, that the 'appropriate remedy' under FC s 38 was an award of constitutional damages.[6]

The challenge of crafting enforceable orders against the state has been met with other, similarly thoughtful, judicial approaches. In Magidimisi and Others v MEC and Others,[7] which also concerned non-compliance with an order sounding in money, Froneman J crafted an order that combined a declarator (of non-compliance with constitutional duties and an obligation to comply), a mandamus to take all necessary steps to ensure compliance, a supervisory order requiring a report to the court on progress in complying with the court order and an order requiring the State Attorney to hand the judgment personally to the individual state respondents and to report to court that this had been done.

[1] 2004 (2) SA 611 (SCA), 2004 (8) BCLR 821 (SCA) at paras 15–16.
[2] Ibid
[3] 2006 (4) SA 478 (SCA) at para 19.
[4] Ibid at para 30.
[5] Ibid at para 22.
[6] Ibid at paras 23–7.
[7] Unreported, SECLO case no 2180/04, 13 April 2006.

Given that the Supreme Court of Appeal in Kate was not faced with a frontal constitutional challenge to s 3 of the State Liability Act, its award of constitutional damages was appropriate. However, owing to the way the case was pleaded, the court was deprived of the opportunity to consider the constitutionality of s 3. That opportunity arose for the Pretoria High Court in Nyathi.

In upholding the constitutional challenge, Davis AJ held that s 3 infringed FC s 34 in two ways. First, because the failure to make the interim payment (which would go, in part, towards legal expenses) prevented Mr Nyathi from preparing for the quantum portion of his trial, there was a 'consequential encroachment' on FC s 34, which was particular to the facts of the case.[1] Secondly, however, the 'blanket ban' on executing an order sounding in money against the state contained in s 3 > constitutes a material limitation of the right of access to court and the consequent right to have the effects of such successful access implemented. The section therefore also offends against the provisions of section 34 of the Constitution.[2]

The court ordered that the following portion of s 3 is inconsistent with the Final Constitution and invalid: 'No execution, attachment or like process shall be issued against the defendant or respondent in any such action or proceedings or against any property of the State'.[3]

Section 3 is, potentially, capable of an interpretation that does not preclude orders of contempt of court against state officials who wilfully and in bad faith fail to comply with an order directing them to do or refrain from doing something. Moreover, the latter part of s 3, which was not declared unconstitutional in Nyathi, provides that, although the normal execution procedures are precluded, a claim against the state sounding in money may be paid out of the National Revenue Fund or a Provincial Revenue Fund. On this reading, s 3 may not be inconsistent with the Final Constitution at all. It may, in fact, constitute a justifiable limitation of the right of access to court. The challenge may be to craft orders that are practicable in light of the proper construction of s 3. As concerns orders for performance, a supervisory order (such as was granted in Magidimisi) may often be appropriate, followed by a contempt order, where necessary. As concerns claims sounding in money, while s 3 provides the source of funds to satisfy such judgments (the National or relevant Provincial Revenue Fund), the same combination of supervisory and contempt orders may provide the practical mechanism with which to secure payment.

59.5 Reasonable limitations of the right

Azanian People's Organisation and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others ('AZAPO') concerned the constitutionality of s 20(7) of the Promotion of [1] Nyathi (supra) at para 13.

[2] Ibid at para 19.
[3] Ibid at para 30.

National Unity and Reconciliation Act.[1] The Act provided for amnesty to be granted to perpetrators of gross violations of human rights in certain circumstances. The main issue, as far as this chapter is concerned, was the civil consequences of such amnesties. In short, a person who was granted amnesty could not be held civilly liable in damages for the act, omission or offence for which he was given amnesty.[2] Furthermore, the state could not be held civilly liable in damages for the same act, omission or offence by virtue of the principles of vicarious liability.[3] Lastly, all other persons (natural or juristic) could not be held vicariously liable for acts for which amnesty was given.

The applicants challenged the Act as, amongst other things, violating their right of access to court in IC s 22 and argued that the state and individual perpetrators should be potentially liable in damages for the murdering and maiming of activists during apartheid.[4] The Court in AZAPO held that the extinction of civil liability clearly limited the right of access to court. The question was whether this limitation was envisaged by other provisions of the Interim Constitution or whether the limitation was reasonable and justifiable in terms of IC s 33 (the IC equivalent of FC s 36).

The conclusion that the provisions of the Reconciliation Act described above limit the right of access to court was inescapable. At the beginning of this chapter we gave the example of the Ciskeian decree that prevented the state from being held liable for certain unlawful acts. That decree was held to be clearly unconstitutional.[5] In substance, there is little difference between that provision and the provisions of the Reconciliation Act. One would assume, therefore, that it would be quite hard to justify such a limitation in terms of FC s 36 or IC 33. If one considers the dicta of the courts about the importance of the right of access to court, it would seem hard to imagine the circumstances in which it would be reasonable to obliterate the right in this manner. The Court in AZAPO was, however, spared the dilemma of having to subject the provisions to justification in terms of IC s 33. It held that other provisions of the Interim Constitution itself limited the right of access to court in this context. The advantage of this approach was that a full proportionality enquiry was rendered unnecessary.

The epilogue of the Interim Constitution referred broadly to the possibility of amnesty. Section 232(4) of the Interim Constitution provided that the epilogue was deemed to form part of the substantive provisions of the Interim Constitution. Mahomed DP, for the majority, held that, as a consequence of IC s 232(4), it was as if IC s 22 had, within its text, a subsection that read as follows:

[1] Act 34 of 1995 (Reconciliation Act).
[2] Reconciliation Act s 20(7)(a).
[3] Reconciliation Act s 20(7)(c).
[4] Azanian Peoples Organisation (AZAPO) v President of the Republic of South Africa 1996 (4) SA 671) (CC), 1996 (8) BCLR 1015 (CC)('AZAPO') at para 8.
[5] See § 59.4*(a)* supra.

> Nothing contained in this sub-section shall preclude Parliament from adopting a law providing for amnesty to be granted in respect of acts, omissions and offences associated with political objectives committed during a defined period and providing for the mechanisms, criteria and procedures, including tribunals, if any, through which such amnesty shall be dealt with at any time after the law has been passed.[1]

In fact, Parliament not only had a right but an obligation to pass a law facilitating amnesty.[2] It was argued by the applicants that the word 'amnesty', as used in the epilogue, envisaged immunity from criminal prosecution but not civil liability.[3] The Court in AZAPO accepted that certain dictionaries contain definitions of amnesty that suggest that it applies to criminal proceedings only.[4] However, it held further that the term 'amnesty' has no technical and fixed meaning:

> Its origin is to be found from the Greek concept of 'amnestia' and it indicates what is described by Webster's Dictionary as 'an act of oblivion'. The degree of oblivion or obliteration must depend on the circumstances. It can, in certain circumstances, be confined to immunity from criminal prosecutions and in other circumstances be extended also to civil liability.[5]

As part of its reasoning in regard to criminal amnesties, the Court pointed out that one of the objectives of the amnesty process was to obtain the truth about atrocities committed during apartheid. Without a criminal amnesty, perpetrators would not be induced into making disclosure about the past and many facts would remain obscured. The Court held that this purpose was equally applicable to civil amnesties.[6] The Court was fortified in its conclusion by the fact that the epilogue envisaged amnesty for 'acts, omissions or offences'. Had the drafters intended to provide amnesty only for criminal prosecutions, they could simply have referred to 'offences'.[7]

As far as the amnesty for civil liability of the state by virtue of vicarious liability was concerned, it was argued by the applicants that it was not necessary to extinguish vicarious liability on the part of the state in order to facilitate the 'truth-seeking' objective. While a person might be inspired to keep silent for fear of facing a delictual claim against him personally, he would not be similarly reticent when the only possible consequence of his testimony might be liability in damages on the part of the state.[8]

The Court in AZAPO accepted that the truth-seeking objective that was vindicated by giving personal amnesties to those with information would be less

[1] AZAPO (supra) at para 14.
[2] Ibid at para 14.
[3] Ibid at para 33.
[4] Ibid at para 34.
[5] Ibid at para 35.
[6] Ibid at para 36.
[7] Ibid at para 37.
[8] Ibid at paras 39 and 40.

applicable in the case of an immunity for the state.[1] The Court held, however, that the bigger question related to the vision of transformation and how the drafters of the Interim Constitution envisaged this transformation taking place:

> Those negotiators of the Constitution and leaders of the nation who were required to address themselves to these agonising problems must have been compelled to make hard choices. They could have chosen to direct that the limited resources of the state be spent by giving preference to the formidable delictual claims of those who had suffered from acts of murder, torture or assault perpetrated by servants of the state, diverting to that extent, desperately needed funds in the crucial areas of education, housing and primary health care. They were entitled to permit a different choice to be made between competing demands inherent in the problem. They could have chosen to direct that the potential liability of the state be limited in respect of any civil claims by differentiating between those against whom prescription could have been pleaded as a defence and those whose claims were of such recent origin that a defence of prescription would have failed. They were entitled to reject such a choice on the grounds that it was irrational. They could have chosen to saddle the state with liability for claims made by insurance companies which had compensated institutions for delictual acts performed by the servants of the state and to that extent again divert funds otherwise desperately needed to provide food for the hungry, roofs for the homeless and black boards and desks for those struggling to obtain admission to desperately overcrowded schools. They were entitled to permit the claims of such school children and the poor and the homeless to be preferred.[2]

The crux of the Court's reasoning is to be found in the following passage:

> The election made by the makers of the Constitution was to permit Parliament to favour 'the reconstruction of society' involving in the process a wider concept of 'reparation', which would allow the state to take into account the competing claims on its resources but, at the same time, to have regard to the 'untold suffering' of individuals and families whose fundamental human rights had been invaded during the conflict of the past. In some cases such a family may best be assisted by a reparation which allows the young in this family to maximise their potential through bursaries and scholarships; in other cases the most effective reparation might take the form of occupational training and rehabilitation; in still other cases complex surgical interventions and medical help may be facilitated; still others might need subsidies to prevent eviction from homes they can no longer maintain and in suitable cases the deep grief of the traumatised may most effectively be assuaged by facilitating the erection of a tombstone on the grave of a departed one with a public acknowledgement of his or her valour and nobility. There might have to be differentiation between the form and quality of the reparations made to two persons who have suffered exactly the same damage in consequence of the same unlawful act but where one person now enjoys lucrative employment from the state and the other lives in penury.[3]

[1] AZAPO (supra) at para 41.
[2] Ibid at para 43.
[3] Ibid at para 45.

The Court concluded that there was a range of options that could have been adopted to facilitate the reconstruction of society other than to allow those with provable delictual claims to proceed with them. The Court was of the view that the epilogue, with its reference simply to 'amnesty' and the 'need for reparation', envisaged that the details were to be determined by an Act of Parliament.

As far as vicarious liability for other organizations was concerned, there were two justifications for excluding it: in the first place, the truth-seeking objective might well be undermined by not providing immunity from vicarious liability to such organizations because individuals with information might well still be reliant on such organisations for support and thus be induced not to reveal the truth. Secondly, those in power would never have agreed to the transformation in the first place if they were not guaranteed that their organizations (such as political parties) would not be hit with delictual claims after the transition.[1]

The decision in AZAPO has been discussed in great detail elsewhere and many criticisms have been levelled against the judgment.[2] We do not seek to add to, or endorse, the comments on this case or to discuss it with a particular political purpose in mind. Although the Court in AZAPO relied on the epilogue to the Interim Constitution as justification for the Act, there is no doubt that the Court read a lot into the epilogue to reach its result. Certain of the factors discussed in terms of the epilogue would have been better suited to limitation analysis. So, despite the Court's reliance on the epilogue of the Interim Constitution — and the unique status of that provision in our constitutional history – AZAPO still gives us an indication of the types of justification that will be necessary to save a provision that effectively obliterates the right of access to court in FC s 34.

Whether one accepts the reasoning of the Court, it is clear that the Court saw the amnesty provisions as constitutionally-envisaged mechanisms to facilitate reconciliation and balance various interests. At the time at which the judgment was written, there could be no social imperative and legislative purpose more important than reconciliation. Therefore, it is unsurprising that the Court in AZAPO refused to strike down the provisions of the Act facilitating amnesty, despite the fact that they effectively extinguished any common-law claims that victims might have had.

AZAPO, therefore, constitutes an exception that can be explained by the moment in history at which it occurred. The limitation of the right of access to Courts that was tolerated in that case could only possibly be acceptable in the context in which AZAPO was decided. Generally, the Court has been unsympathetic towards provisions that have the potential to oust access to court altogether. In the context of time bars, for example, the only case in which the shortened period in which to institute the action was upheld involved a contract.[1]

[1] AZAPO (supra) at para 49.

[2] See, for example, J Dugard 'Is the Truth and Reconciliation Process Compatible with International Law? An Unanswered Question' (1997) 13 SAJHR 258; D Moellendorf 'Amnesty, Truth and Justice: AZAPO' (1997) 13 SAJHR 283; A O'Shea 'Should Amnesty be Granted to Individuals who are Guilty of Grave Breaches of Humanitarian Law? A Reflection on the Constitutional Court's Approach' (1997) 1 HRCLJSA 24. For a recent collection of discussions of AZAPO, see W le Roux & K van Marle (eds) Law, Memory and the Legacy of Apartheid: Ten Years after AZAPO v President of South Africa (2007).

Equally difficult, if not impossible, to justify are provisions that allow self-help. The Constitutional Court has made clear that such provisions are the antithesis of the right of access to court and, as such, require compelling justification to be saved. Outside of an emergency situation, it is difficult to imagine a provision that truly warrants self-help being upheld.

On the other hand, the Court has been far more accepting of purported limitations of access to court which themselves facilitate greater access. Thus, provisions such as those governing vexatious litigants, as in Beinash v Ernst & Young, are far easier to justify because they have the effect of freeing the courts to adjudicate deserving cases.[2] This theme underlies most of the procedural rules that potentially limit access: although these rules were mainly introduced before the advent of the Final Constitution, most of them have, as their rationale, the aim of enhancing access to court.

When it comes to justification of limitations of the right of access to court, a broad spectrum of positions exist. On one side of the spectrum are limitations, such as those considered in Chief Lesapo and AZAPO, which not only obliterate the right but undermine its very purpose. Justification of such limitations will prove extremely difficult. On the other side of the spectrum are those provisions that limit access to a particular litigant, but have, as their underlying rationale, the aim of improving the functioning of the courts. The provisions at issue in Beinash v Ernst & Young are an example of justifiable limitations.[3] If such provisions actually achieve this purpose, they will almost always be upheld as reasonable limitations.

[1] See § 59.4*(a)*(ii) supra.
[2] See § 59.4*(a)*(vi) supra.
[3] Beinash v Ernst & Young 1999 (2) SA 116 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 125 (CC).

60 Citizenship

Jonathan Klaaren

60.1 Historical background 60–1
60.2 Questions of interpretation 60–3
60.3 Theories of citizenship 60–4
60.4 Concepts of constitutional citizenship 60–9
60.5 National legislation 60–11
(a) National legislation: loss 60–12
(b) National legislation: acquisition 60–13
(c) National legislation: beyond acquisition & loss? 60–14
60.6 Rights, privileges and benefits of citizenship 60–14

3. Citizenship
(1) There is a common South African citizenship.
(2) All citizens are —
(a) equally entitled to the rights, privileges and benefits of citizenship; and
(b) equally subject to the duties and responsibilities of citizenship.
(3) National legislation must provide for the acquisition, loss and restoration of citizenship.

19. Political Rights
(1) Every citizen is free to make political choices, which includes the right — (a) to form a political party; (b) to participate in the activities of, or recruit members for, a political party; and (c) to campaign for a political party or cause.
(2) Every citizen has the right to free, fair and regular elections for any legislative body established in terms of the Constitution.
(3) Every adult citizen has the right — (a) to vote in elections for any legislative body established in terms of the Constitution, and to do so in secret; and (b) to stand for public office and, if elected, to hold office.

20. Citizenship
No citizen may be deprived of citizenship.

21. Freedom of movement and residence
. . .
(3) Every citizen has the right to enter, to remain in and to reside anywhere in, the Republic.
(4) Every citizen has the right to a passport.

22. Freedom of trade, occupation and profession
Every citizen has the right to choose their trade, occupation, or profession freely. The practice of a trade, occupation, or profession may be regulated by law.

60.1 HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The origins of citizenship in South Africa lie in the regulation of the mobility of its people. By means of a working framework of mobility, law and citizenship, one can identify the initial structuring of South African citizenship between 1897 and 1937, as well as its development and change through the war years, the apartheid period, and the more recent years of constitutional democracy.

Three significant moments may be identified in the crucial initial forty years.[1] In the first moment, provincial elites drafted a series of comprehensive immigration laws before joining together in the Union. These laws responded to the Asian migration of the time and culminated in the Transvaal migration regime of 1907. In the second moment, which lasted until 1927, the Transvaal-based immigration and Asiatic affairs bureaucracy extended its influence across the incipient South

[1] See J Klaaren Migrating to Citizenship: Mobility, Law, and Nationality in South Africa, 1897-1937 (PhD Dissertation, Department of Sociology, Yale University, 2004.)

African territory through the drafting and administration of the Union immigration law as well as through increasing national control of the Asian population. By contrast with the Native Affairs Department, which largely retreated from its putative role in the regulation of migration except in respect of large-scale recruitment, the Department of the Interior played a strong role in the regulation of Asian affairs and immigration. In the third moment, the establishment of the office of the Commissioner for Immigration and Asiatic Affairs began a process that consolidated and extended control of, as well as the conceptual framework for, nationality over the South African population. Such control was of particular importance for resident Asian and African populations.

Subsequent to 1937, the starting point for exploring the peculiar warping of South African citizenship must be, as Deborah Posel argues, the story of the modernising of the South African state.[1] Initially, the outbreak of global war and the consequent development of state capacity drove migration regulation: pass laws were, for example, suspended. Although administrative policies showed great organizational variation, there was relatively little change in the legislative framework or the longer-term orientation of the South African polity with respect to migration and nationality policy. The Commissioner for Immigration and Asiatic Affairs fully nationalized registration of the Asian population and added registration responsibilities with respect to aliens to its mandate. After the war's end in 1945, the pass laws were re-instated. Even with the experience of suspended pass laws, growing calls were made for improving the enforcement of influx control. The state attempted to implement a variety of administrative initiatives for migration regulation. These initiatives encompassed a foreign farm labour scheme that presaged legislative changes under apartheid.

After the 1948 electoral victory of the National Party by the nearly entirely white electorate, the misnamed Abolition of Passes and Co-ordination of Documents Act 67 of 1952 together with the Population Registration Act 30 of 1950 attempted to completely regulate African movement and identity documentation.[2] The legal struggles of the formal apartheid era often related to citizenship and the homelands were a particular site of struggle. Denationalization was a dominant theme. Slogans such as 'foreigners in the land of their birth' were repeated, and resonated, throughout the struggle.

[1] D Posel 'Race as Common Sense: Racial Classification in Twentieth-Century South Africa' (2001) 44 African Studies Review 87, 99.

[2] J Klaaren 'Post-Apartheid Citizenship' in A Aleinikoff & D Klusmeyer (eds) From Migrants to Citizens: Membership in a Changing World (2000) 221-252 (Outlines the formal history of citizenship under apartheid.) For the classic text on South African law under apartheid, see J Dugard Human Rights and the South African Legal Order (1978). See also G Erasmus 'South African Citizenship in a Constitutional Context' (1998) 23(2) Tydskrif vir Regswetenskap 1.

More recent history, from 1990 to 1994, has placed citizenship within the framework of a constitutional democracy. Within such an overarching framework, other specific narratives can be identified: these narratives embrace stories of a rainbow nation, of truth and reconciliation, and of an African Renaissance.[1]

60.2 QUESTIONS OF INTERPRETATION

Accepting the relative determinacy of the historical account, the following relevant issue for understanding constitutional citizenship is the place that such an account might have in the interpretation of the right to citizenship. It could be the case that a generally preferred theory of constitutional interpretation would apply to constitutional citizenship. Nonetheless, there are reasons to investigate first the fit of interpretive theory to constitutional citizenship, since constitutional citizenship can itself be a constitution-determining and thus interpretation-determining concept.

Standard but nuanced South Africa-located accounts of interpretation identify five schools of interpretation: grammatical, systematic, teleological, historical, and comparative.[2] Taking this five part set as a starting point, we can investigate their fit with constitutional citizenship. A grammatical theory investigates the linguistic nuances and the multiplicity of meanings.[3] For citizenship, the texts — FC ss 3, 20, and 21 — are, of course, important but not crucial. They do not occupy the place within South African constitutionalism that the text of the US fourteenth amendment — forged in the American Civil War — does.[4] A systematic theory looks at linkages to the rest of the document or system.[5] The rest of the Final Constitution offers a variety of links to citizenship. However, citizenship is not the primary gatekeeper to the application and the force of the rest of the Final Constitution. (Nonetheless, the Department of Home Affairs, through its function of provision of identity documents, is, ironically a key gatekeeper in practice.) A teleological theory looks at values. Of course, values and effect-directedness is [1] See, eg, G Maharaj (ed) Between Unity and Diversity: Essays on Nation-Building in Post-Apartheid South Africa (1999).

[2] See LM Du Plessis 'Interpretation' in Law of South Africa; LM Du Plessis 'Interpretation of the Bill of Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2008) Chapter 32.

[3] See G Budlender 'On Citizenship and Residence Rights: Taking Words Seriously' (1989) 5 *SAJHR*37 (Budlender argues — prior to the introduction of constitutional democracy — that statutory interpretation with respect to citizenship policy should take into account parliamentary speeches.)

[4] US Constitution, Amendment XIV, section 1 provides: 'All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.'

[5] See, eg, Kaunda & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) at para 233 (O'Regan J).

important for citizenship. But again such a theory seems to lend itself as much to the entire document as to constitutional citizenship in particular. A historical theory examines the specific situation from which a legal instrument emerges. This strategy has real appeal when it comes to the domain of citizenship. A comparative theory looks at either public international law or at comparative foreign contexts.[1] Applied to constitutional citizenship, this approach would seem to miss specifically South African dimensions and determinants of citizenship.

This brief survey argues in favour of an historical approach to the interpretation of constitutional citizenship in South Africa — or at the least suggests that it is the best of the available options. That said, towards what substantive theory or vision of citizenship does this school of historical interpretation lead us?

60.3 THEORIES OF CITIZENSHIP

To answer our question, we need to take a step back into theory and then one forward into adjudicated cases. Widening the scope, we can identify four broad theories — four ideal types — of citizenship: cultural citizenship, membership citizenship, lawful status citizenship, and post-national citizenship.[2] Cultural citizenship identifies a particular culture (which may or may not consist of narrow conceptions of race, ethnicity or religion) with constitutional citizenship.[3] As articulated by TH Marshall, membership citizenship draws a sharp distinction between the status of citizens (who are equals as citizens and members) and that of non-citizens (who are defined as aliens and non-members). Lawful status citizenship extends citizenship through law: it views all persons who are lawfully and permanently residing within a country to be presumptively full members of the national community. Post-national citizenship (or universal citizenship) views all persons as entitled to human rights on account of their identification as human beings.[4]

While traction on each of these theories may be gained through each interpretive school, certain affinities exist between the various ways of reading the Final Constitution and the theories of citizenship envisaged. A particularly strong affinity exists between the historical school of interpretation and the lawful status citizenship theory.[5]

[1] See A Katz & M du Plessis 'Citizenship' in I Currie & J de Waal (eds) Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 468-476 (Applies a comparative theory (public international law) to citizenship.)

[2] For greater detail, see J Klaaren 'Contested Citizenship in South Africa' in P Andrews & S Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 304-325.

[3] For an interesting exploration of the Israeli example, see A Shachar 'Citizenship and Membership in the Israeli Polity' in A Aleinikoff & D Klusmeyer (eds) From Migrants to Citizens 386-433.

[4] For a judgment drawing, in part, on this vision of citizenship, see Minister of Home Affairs v Watchenuka 2004 (4) SA 326 (SCA), 2004 (2) BCLR 120 (CC) at para 25 ('Human dignity has no nationality.')

[5] See G Budlender 'A Common Citizenship?' (1985) 1 SAJHR 210.

One might initially think that a grammatical school would have an affinity for membership citizenship. But this does not appear to be the case. Here, the content of FC ss 19, 20, and 21 steps to the fore. Each of these sections reserves rights to citizens (as do other sections of the Final Constitution). What does one make of these special reservations (the extent and content of which is discussed in greater detail below)? Through its linkage of citizenship status with important rights of political exercise, FC s 19 initially supports a republican reading of South African citizenship, a reading within membership citizenship. But this interpretation works only at the most superficial level — though it certainly has some weight at the polling station level of voting in state (but not necessarily party) elections! Even within the grammatical or systematic schools, such interpretations should admit that citizenship has become and has been used at the level of a signifier such as 'employer', 'worker' or 'child'. As such a signifier, there is of course some real work that is being done. But in most instances of designating rights and rights holders, the linkage between the status and the rights is obvious and relatively uncontroversial. Thus, the Bill of Rights, in these reservations, does not place citizenship above other signifiers. This constitutional deployment of citizenship is thus an argument for the downplaying of constitutional citizenship.

Furthermore, the very use of citizenship as a reservation is a particular argument for the constitutional fit of lawful status citizenship rather than membership citizenship. The constitutional baseline is not a grant of rights to citizens as opposed to other lawful members — the grant of rights to citizens is done as a special reservation from the other operating baseline of rights granted to 'everyone'.[1]

Against the background of such a theoretical and interpretive spectrum, we may now ask where the judiciary's and the political branches' understanding of constitutional citizenship fits. The legislative branch's understanding can be relatively quickly dispatched.[2] The South African Citizenship Act 88 of 1995[3] was largely a consolidation of pre-existing law.[4] The primary impetus for the 1995 Act was to create a unified national citizenship regime and it repealed, in the process, the various statutes governing the citizenships of the homelands. Apart perhaps from affirming the South African policy of relative tolerance of dual

[1] For more on the beneficiaries of the Bill of Rights, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2005) §31.3.

[2] While one should not neglect the executive branch's interpretation of the Final Constitution, this branch (at least in the form of the Department of Home Affairs) has neglected to articulate a substantive vision of citizenship. Indeed, from 2007, the government has recognized the dire situation at this Department. Its lack of vision with respect to citizenship services and has pushed the government to implement a concerted 'Turn Around' strategy for a 'New Home Affairs'.

[3] The 1995 Act has been amended by the South African Citizenship Amendment Act 17 of 2004.

[4] Klaaren 'Post-Apartheid Citizenship' (supra) at 233-235. The previous South African (as opposed to homelands legislation) Act was the South African Citizenship Act of 1949.

nationality and making several changes to naturalization policy and procedure,[1] the first post-apartheid citizenship statute was by no means a radical transformation of pre-existing citizenship policy. It was more an exercise of legislative continuity than one of constitutional change.

In the area of citizenship policy, the Constitutional Court has served as the leading forum for articulation and contestation of principle. The principal tension in the Court's jurisprudence has been driven both by a lawful residence concept of citizenship and a more republican vision of citizenship, and, by the relative textual significance of citizenship in the Bill of Rights, including FC s 7, and the citizenship 'rights, privileges, and benefits' clause set forth in FC s 3. This tension is clearly on display in the Court's multiple judgments in Kaunda. Although Kaunda concerns events and persons largely beyond the borders of South Africa, when read with Khosa,[2] this case provides the primary locus for discerning the Constitutional Court's vision of constitutional citizenship.

The majority in Kaunda denied the citizen applicants an order compelling the government to seek an assurance from Equatorial Guinea (to where the applicants faced extradition on serious charges) not to impose the death penalty on the applicants. Using a request and response paradigm, the majority judgment of Chaskalson CJ articulated a carefully circumscribed extra-territorial duty on the South African state to afford diplomatic protection of nationals where their rights in terms of international law were threatened. Chaskalson CJ's judgment rejected a strong view of the extraterritorial application of citizens' rights under the Bill of Rights.[3] The request and response obligation he did support entitles citizens to request diplomatic protection of their rights and requires the state to consider such requests fairly. The precise ambit and content of the right is considered below. As a number of commentators have noted, it is not 'a particularly strong right'.[4]

For present purposes, the conceptual reasoning behind the existence of the state's obligation is of interest. In the view of the majority, this duty was derived from an incident of citizenship, nationality, and hinged upon the national's request to have his or her international law rights respected. It was one of the privileges and the benefits of citizenship in FC s 3 to have such a request considered. In extreme instances, the state might have an obligation to act even without such a request by one of its nationals. For the majority, the obligation thus was not founded in the Bill of Rights: even though FC s 7(2) does point towards the constitutional duty of the executive to protect the fundamental rights

[1] Klaaren 'Post-Apartheid Citizenship' (supra) at 235-241 (dual citizenship policy) and 241-243 (changes to naturalization).

[2] Khosa v Minister of Social Development; Mahlaule v Minister of Social Development 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC).

[3] On extraterritorial application, generally, see Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.7.

[4] M Du Plessis & G Penfold 'Bill of Rights Jurisprudence' (2004) Annual Survey of South African Law 18.

of its nationals. Indeed, the rights that would be protected would be the international law rights of the nationals, rather than any extra-territorial application of fundamental rights found in the Bill of Rights.[1] Chaskalson CJ relied upon the language of FC s 7(1): 'This Bill of Rights is a cornerstone of democracy in South Africa. It enshrines the rights of all people in our country and affirms the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom.'[2] There is more to Chaskalson CJ's interpretation here than a mere textual reading of the word 'in'. This territorialized view is actually consistent with and draws down upon the lawful status conception of membership described above.

The main judgment may nonetheless be profitably contrasted with one of the concurrences and with the dissent. [3] The concurrence of Ngcobo J was driven by the status of the citizen and focused its attention on FC s 3(2) as a substantive domestic protection, rather than a mere vehicle for the protection of international law rights. Indeed, Ngcobo J's understanding of the rights at issue appears to envision multiple overlaps between the benefits flowing from citizenship status and benefits flowing from the Bill of Rights.[4] His analysis may be broken into several steps: the guarantee and the entrenchment of the right of citizenship is in the Bill of Rights (in particular FC s 20);[5] South African citizens have a right to 'rights, privileges, and benefits' in FC s 3(2)(a); the rights are at least those guaranteed in the Bill of Rights and reserved to citizens,[6] but there are privileges and benefits beyond such rights;[7] diplomatic protection is at least a benefit;[8] and thus one must read FC s 3 and FC s 7(2) together to impose an obligation on the

[1] The import of Kaunda for the extra-territorial application of the Bill of Rights, and a criticism of a narrowly textual approach to the doctrine, is discussed in Woolman 'Application' (supra) at 31-113 — 31-122. While Chaskalson's reliance on the text of FC s 7(1) can be criticized as an over weighty interpretation of the preposition 'in', his interpretation of FC s 7(1) could also be argued to be directly supported by the lawful status citizenship theory that provides the best fit with the Final Constitution.

[2] Kaunda (supra) at para 37.

[3] Sachs J views the concurrence and the majority as saying virtually same thing. Ibid at para 275. Indeed, there is much that is shared in the three substantive judgments. Both the majority judgment of Chaskalson CJ and the concurrence of Ngcobo J mention, in an approving manner, an article in the academic literature. G Erasmus & L Davidson 'Do South Africans Have a Right to Diplomatic Protection' (2000) 25 South African Yearbook of International Law 113 (Discussed in Kaunda (supra) at paras 59 (Chaskalson CJ) and 184 (Ngcobo J)). Erasmus and Davidson argue that citizenship should include entitlement to diplomatic protection, harmonizing the national and international dimensions of citizenship.

[4] Kaunda (supra) at para 180 ('Some of the rights to which citizens are entitled are spelt out in the Bill of Rights.')

[5] Ibid at paras 176 and 185. This argument may constitute the strongest point of the opinion's difference from the majority's judgment.

[6] O'Regan seems to feel that the rights referred to in FC s 3(2)(a) are only the rights reserved to citizens in the Bill of Rights. Ibid at para 234.

[7] Ibid at para 176. On O'Regan J views on rights and privilege and benefits, respectively, see Kaunda (supra) at paras 234 and 235.

[8] Ibid at para 186.

state.[1] Ngcobo J's analysis is thus quite close to the classic TH Marshall understanding of membership citizenship: citizenship entitles the citizen to the right to have rights.

With some important differences of emphasis, O'Regan J also explored an obligation on the state to afford diplomatic protection to individual citizens through FC s 3(2)(a). Part of her reasoning is that one must avoid ascribing no meaning to that status.[2] Still, her conclusion was reached as an extension of the values of the Final Constitution and motivated in terms of equality analysis.[3] In O'Regan J's view, the privilege of diplomatic protection by a state created an entitlement rather than mere equal protection: 'It is proper to understand s 3 as imposing on government an obligation to provide diplomatic protection to its citizens to prevent or repair egregious breaches of international human rights norms.'[4]

The majority confirmed that the decision by the government to respond to the request for diplomatic protection would be justiciable, at least on grounds of irrationality and bad faith.[5] Review would be exercised, however, at the relatively low level of intensity currently the practice in England and Germany.[6]

The concurrence and the dissent in Kaunda would have extended an obligatory mechanism of diplomatic protection to citizens that was, at the very least, stronger than the benefit offered by the majority. In any case, this regime of diplomatic protection would not be available to permanent residents or other non-nationals.

The content flowing from this distinction between citizens and non-citizens should not be over-emphasized. As the only extant duty specifically sourced to FC s 3, this relatively narrow protection would be the sum total of citizens' entitlements above (apart from the explicit political rights reservations discussed below) those possessed by other permanent residents in South Africa. The best theory of South African constitutional citizenship — perhaps paradoxically so for a nation that has struggled with citizenship questions since before 1910 — is one that downplays the significance of the concept.

This proposition is bolstered by an examination of Khosa. Here, the majority, per Mokgoro J, held unconstitutional the denial of social grants to permanent

[1] Kaunda (supra) at para 176.

[2] Ibid at para 235.

[3] By grounding her opinion in equality jurisprudence, O'Regan's analysis demonstrates an affinity for a post-national or universal citizenship.

[4] Ibid at para 238.

[5] Ibid at paras 78 and 80. The concurrence and the dissent are broadly in agreement on this point. Ibid at paras 193 and 244-47. In examining the claim for extradition from Zimbabwe or Equatorial Guinea to South Africa (eg for nationals to face process in SA), the court was willing to assume that the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act might apply to a decision not to prosecute. Ibid at para 84.

[6] Ibid at paras 74-75. The German position is given in Hess. 55 BVerfGE 349, 90 ILR 386 (1980). The British position is laid out in Abbasi & Another.v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs & Another. [2002] EWCA Civ 1598.

residents. The Court noted that the Final Constitution extended the socio-economic rights of social security to 'everyone' and that legislative policy presumptively equated the rights and duties of permanent residents and citizens.[1] Mokgoro J wrote:

> In my view, the importance of providing access to social assistance to all who live permanently in South Africa and the impact upon life and dignity that a denial of such access has, far outweighs the financial and immigration considerations on which the State relies. For the same reasons, I am satisfied that the denial of access to social grants to permanent residents who, but for their citizenship, would qualify for such assistance, does not constitute a reasonable legislative measure as contemplated by s 27(2) of the Constitution.[2]

This holding is consistent only with a lawful status citizenship theory.[3] Indeed, within the forum of the Khosa Court, one should not be surprised to find Ngcobo J articulating an opposing position. In Khosa, Ngcobo J asserted that '[t]here are important differences between citizens and permanent residents.'[4] These differences amounted to the Final Constitutional rights of political rights and freedom of trade, occupation, and profession. Having particular regard to the benefits of a policy that would encourage naturalization, Ngcobo J was prepared to find the limitations of benefits to citizens reasonable.[5] While one might differ regarding the importance of these distinctions, Ngcobo J clearly relies upon a theory of membership citizenship.

60.4 Concepts of constitutional citizenship

The Final Constitution does not define the requirements for South African citizenship. This textual silence should not be read as a failing. There are indeed a number of models of relationship between a constitutional text and the definition of citizenship. For instance, within the Southern African Development Community, the countries with their primary source of citizenship rules outside of their constitutions (Angola, Botswana, Lesotho, Malawi, Seychelles, South Africa, Swaziland, and Tanzania) outnumber those with detailed rules in their constitutions

[1] Khosa (supra) at para 57 (Section 25(1) of Immigration Act reads: 'The holder of a permanent residence permit has all the rights, privileges, duties, obligations of a citizen, save for those rights, privileges, duties and obligations which a law or the Constitution explicitly ascribes to citizenship.'). See also SACA s 1*(b)*, as noted in Khosa (supra) at para 118, which provides, in part: '"South African citizen" includes any person who . . .(b) is a member of a group or category of persons defined by the Minister, with the concurrence of the Minister of Finance, by notice in the Gazette'.

[2] Khosa (supra) at para 82.

[3] Ibid at para 59 ('While they do not have the rights tied to citizenship, such as political rights and the right to a South African passport, they are, for . . . other purposes, . . . in much the same position as citizens.')

[4] Ibid at para 125.

[5] Ibid at paras 130 and 134.

(Mauritius, Mozambique, Namibia, Zambia, and Zimbabwe).[1] Instead of providing detailed rules, FC s 3(3) states: 'National legislation must provide for the acquisition, loss and restoration of citizenship.'

The scrutiny and the specific topics of such legislation will be discussed below. Apart from the requirement for such legislation, the Final Constitution further provides for at least three substantive concepts with respect to constitutional citizenship. First, it establishes a common South African citizenship. Second, and third, the Final Constitution mandates equality among citizens in terms of rights, privileges and benefits, as well as among citizens in terms of duties and responsibilities. The remainder of this section explores these concepts.

Initially, it should be recognized that there is a difference between the establishment of a common citizenship and the constitutional requirement of equal citizenship. Commonality is best understood as providing for the unity of the nation. The dangers being guarded against here are those usually associated with federalism and with provincialism. In Mhlekwa v Head of the Western Tembuland Regional Authority, the concept of Transkei citizenship was held not compatible with FC s 3 but nonetheless was authorized for use for jurisdictional purposes within the administration of justice.[2] The commonality of citizenship requirement will mean that the doctrinal difficulties faced by federal states to the incorporation of international human rights law (as part of international law) will not apply in South Africa.[3]

The equality requirement of citizenship likely does away with distinctions among classes of citizenship based on the acquisition of citizenship. Earlier citizenship policy has often used these concepts — for instance, citizenship by naturalization, by descent, or by birth — as the basis for different rights. Once one accepts the equality of citizenship, these classes can be used only for matters related to the acquisition of citizenship. For both the concurrence and the dissent in Kaunda, the content of the equality of citizens was understood to encompass more than formal equality.[4] This requirement is also consistent with the trend of contemporary South African citizenship legislation. The South African Citizenship Act 88 of 1995 ('SACA') no longer makes any significant distinctions among these acquisition classes of citizens. Note that other classifications, including the distinction between dual citizens and citizens, apparently remain valid bases for policy distinctions.

[1] J Klaaren & B Rutinwa 'Towards the Harmonization of Immigration and Refugee Law in SADC' (2004) 1 MIDSA Report 14 115-116.

[2] 2001 (1) SA 574 (Tk), 2000 (9) BCLR 979 (Tk).

[3] The incorporation of international law into substantive domestic law in South Africa is discussed in H Strydom & K Hopkins 'International Law and International Agreements' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 30.2.

[4] Kaunda (supra) at paras 237-238 (O'Regan J). Ngcobo is clear that differences are allowed. Ibid at para 177.

An as-yet hypothetical constitutional question regarding the relationship of this common citizenship to other transnational citizenships may be posed. Drawing particularly from the European Union experience, some have seen a shift from a constitutionalism based on the sovereignty of the nation state to constitutionalism based more upon overlapping of domestic and international legal orders.[1] The immediately analogous situation for South Africa would be citizenship in the Southern African Development Community (SADC). Such a citizenship does not as yet exist. But it could be proclaimed and established by the Treaty of the Southern African Development Community, as amended.[2] And one might even argue that there are trace elements of the sociological substance of regional citizenship.[3] SADC citizenship appears as yet a distant prospect — all the more so with regard given the current Zimbabwean crisis. Nonetheless, it is at least worth asking the legal interpretive question: would the South African Constitution adopt a preclusive or facilitative attitude towards legal effect in South Africa of a SADC citizenship? To answer this question, we must assume that SADC citizenship provides some rights beyond those provided by the Final Constitution properly interpreted — an assumption that may not in fact be the case. But assuming it is, one potential route for such rights (of such persons who are SADC citizens and South African citizens) to enter the South African legal order is through the (South African) citizenship ensured by FC s 3. While the requirement of equality would seem clearly not to stand against such a development, the requirement of commonness might. As discussed above, the best interpretation of the requirement of commonness is one that promotes national unity and guards against federalism. In this interpretation, the requirement proscribes citizenships from legal orders 'below' the national legal system but says nothing of those citizenships from legal orders 'above' the national legal system. Nonetheless, an interpretation that views commonness as precluding legal effect of citizenship from any legal order other than the national legal order remains a possible, if not likely, interpretation. An alternative, and as yet unexplored, route to the importation of SADC rights through FC s 3 may be through the development of the common law.[4]

60.5 National legislation

A number of subsidiary questions are raised by FC s 3(3)'s requirement that national legislation must provide for the acquisition, loss and restoration of citizenship. One initial question is the content of the national legislation. It seems

[1] M Hunt Using Human Rights Law in English Courts (1997) 3-5.

[2] The treaty is available at http://www.sadc.int/key_documents/treaties/sadc_treaty_amended.php (accessed 12 December 2007.)

[3] J Klaaren 'Southern Africa: As Seen Through Mobility, Sexuality, and Citizenship' (2006) 9(2) African Sociological Review 168.

[4] See R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex parte McQuillan [1995] 4 All ER 400 (Sedley J, as discussed in Hunt (supra) at 290-294.)

clear from the text that the constitutional mandate here is not for Parliament to enact a specific piece of legislation not yet enacted. This differentiates the constitutionally mandated citizenship legislation from the legislation that was enacted pursuant to the express directives contained within the right to equality, the right to just administrative action, and the right of access to information. While there is much legislation that has relevance to citizenship,[1] this section will limit itself to SACA. SACA satisfies the requirements of FC s 3(3) and is the primary piece of national legislation to do so.[2]

Before one examines the content of SACA, we need to know how intensely the Final Constitution will examine the legislation. A number of questions might arise. To what extent does the constitutional legislation forcing provision in FC s 3(3) influence the interpretation of such legislation? Is the less forceful mandate of this legislation forcing provision a factor to be considered? Is the placement of FC s 3(3) outside of the Bill of Rights an indication of less intense review? Taken together, it would seem that the national legislation should be subjected to at least some intensity of review greater than 'normal' legislation. As discussed in the next section, the greatest scrutiny will be in matters of loss rather than in those of acquisition.

(a) National legislation: loss

One section of the Bill of Rights provides that '[n]o citizen may be deprived of citizenship.' The term used differs from the term used in FC s 3(3), 'loss'. 'Loss' of citizenship is constitutionally acceptable. 'Deprivation' is not.

Note also that the existence of FC s 20 leads one to afford less deference to the statutory framework in matters of loss. In evaluating the constitutionality of SACA's chapter 3, which provides for loss, one will be using FC s 20 (reinforcing s 3(3)), and courts will employ a higher intensity of review than elsewhere in SACA.

SACA provides for loss via voluntary relinquishment as well as through acts by a citizen resulting in loss.[3] The constitutionality of acts automatically resulting in the loss of citizenship may be questioned. Foreign jurisdictions have found laws withdrawing citizenship from persons voting in foreign elections unconstitutional.[4] Legislation is, however, on surer footing where the loss of citizenship is directed to dual citizens. In terms of SACA, citizens automatically lose their

[1] For instance, the Department of Home Affairs administers a number of pieces of arguably relevant legislation: the Immigration Act 13 of 2002, the Refugees Act 130 of 1998, the South African Citizenship Act 88 of 1995, the Identification Act 68 of 1997, the Births and Deaths Registration Act 51 of 1992, the South African Passports and Travel Documents Act 4 of 1994, and the Alteration of Sex Description and Sex Status Act 49 of 2003 not to mention electoral and marriage/civil union legislation.

[2] The principal Act was amended by the South African Citizenship Amendment Act 17 of 2004.

[3] SACA s 7.

[4] Afroyim v Rusk 387 US 253 (1967)(US federal law that withdraws citizenship from persons voting in foreign elections held to be unconstitutional.)

citizenship if they acquire the citizenship of another country than the Republic by engaging in some voluntary and formal act other than marriage.[1] Likewise, dual citizens engaging in the armed services of a country at war with the Republic may also lose their citizenship.[2]

Ministerial deprivation of South African citizenship in the case of dual citizens presents a special statutory case. In terms of SACA, the Minister may deprive such citizens of their citizenship if such a citizen has been sentenced to 12 months or more of imprisonment resulting from an offence or if she is satisfied that it is in the public interest that such person cease being a South African citizen.[3] Both statutory powers would be susceptible to a reasonably strong constitutional challenge. One challenge would be that the SACA is overbroad: it allows for deprivation of citizenship without guidelines and thereby violates the principles articulated in Dawood.[4] Another potential challenge, based upon FC s 20, is that the deprivation must not leave the person deprived of South African citizenship stateless.[5]

(b) National legislation: acquisition

As noted in the previous section, national legislation possesses the greatest latitude with respect to providing for the acquisition of citizenship. The South African Citizenship Act currently provides for South African citizenship to be granted in three ways: birth, descent, and naturalisation.[6] At least for the purposes of this chapter, restoration will be considered as a special case of naturalisation.

In terms of birth, while South Africa is technically a jus soli jurisdiction with a territorial right to citizenship, the ambit of that right is restricted at law. Citizenship by birth is limited by legislation to a child born in the Republic of a South African citizen or to parents who are both permanent residents.[7] It may be the case that this requirement is significantly relaxed in its application and in policy.[8] Reflecting the jus soli norm, SACA provides citizenship by descent for persons born outside the Republic to at least one citizen parent (together with registration of birth).[9]

[1] SACA s 6(1)(a).
[2] SACA s 6(1)(b).
[3] SACA s 8(2)(a) and (b).
[4] A Katz & M Du Plessis 'Citizenship' in I Currie & J de Waal (eds) The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 471-472.
[5] F Venter 'Citizenship and Nationality' Volume 2(2), Law of South Africa; Katz & du Plessis (supra) at 471.
[6] SACA ss 2, 3, and 4.
[7] SACA s 2(2). There are exceptions to this rule in s 2 for children adopted by South African citizens and for stateless children registered in terms of the Births and Deaths Registration Act 51 of 1992.
[8] Indeed, there may be a case for a legitimate expectation or right of continued relaxed requirements.
[9] SACA s 3(1)(b)(i).

This putative bar against citizenship for a large class of persons born in South Africa makes the conditions for obtaining naturalisation of greater interest and importance. It only through naturalisation that such second generation persons have a chance of becoming citizens in the land of their birth. In terms of SACA, citizenship by naturalisation may be obtained if a person is not a minor, admitted for permanent residence, continuously resident for one year before applying for naturalisation, ordinarily resident for at least four of the eight years preceding the application[1], of 'good character', intending to continue to reside in the Republic, able to communicate in one of the official languages, and has an adequate knowledge of the responsibilities and privileges of South African citizenship.[2] Minors admitted to permanent residence may be granted citizenship without these conditions.[3] In the case of permanent residents married to South African citizenship or in a partnership, the only requirement for citizenship is residence with the citizen spouse in South Africa for two years.[4] SACA s 13 provides for resumption of South African citizenship, particularly for those persons who have lost citizenship.

(c) National legislation: beyond acquisition and loss?

Are there topics within the legislation that are neither acquisition nor loss? There is at least one: criminalization of use of dual citizenship in order to gain an advantage over other citizens. SACA was amended in 2004 to add section 26B. Section 26B is entitled 'Use of foreign citizenship' and provides that:

> A major citizen who (a) enters the Republic or departs from the Republic making use of the passport of another country; or (b) while in the Republic, makes use of his or her citizenship or national of another country in order to gain an advantage or avoid a responsibility or duty, is guilty upon conviction to a fine or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding 12 months.

While undeniably substantive, this single topic does not expand the national legislation much beyond acquisition and loss. Indeed, it may not even fall within the scope of FC s 3(3). In any case, this legislative enactment further bolsters the argument of this chapter in favour of a downplayed notion of constitutional citizenship.

60.6 Rights, privileges and benefits of citizenship

When interpreting FC s 3(2)(a), we start with the recognition that one category of constitutional rights that belong to citizens includes those rights reserved to citizens. FC ss 19, 20, 21, and 22 have a series of provisions that provide benefits

[1] Ngcobo J seemed to view this five year period as relatively short in Khosa (supra) at para 115. He noted also the provision allowing for naturalization before the expiry of that five year period. Ibid at para 116 citing SACA section 5(9)(a).
[2] SACA s 5(1).
[3] SACA s 5(4).
[4] SACA s 5(5).

exclusively to citizens. Other places of the Final Constitution do so as well: FC s 47(1), FC s 106(1), and FC s 158(1). These rights and provisions are covered elsewhere in this text.[1] In particular, the protection against loss contained in FC s 20 is covered above in this chapter. The real question here is whether there are any rights attaching to citizenship that have not already been covered.[2]

Note that the citizen's right to have an extradition justified is based upon the protection afforded persons by the right to the freedom of movement and residence. This protection is restricted to citizens in terms of FC s 21(3).[3] Likewise, the right of a citizen to a passport is based upon FC s 21(4) and is implemented in terms of s 3 of the South African Passports and Travel Documents Act.

After Kaunda, there is at least one such right. What is clear from Kaunda is that part of the content of FC s 3's 'rights, privileges and benefits' consists of limited diplomatic protection. While the rationale and constitutional basis for this right of diplomatic protection is discussed elsewhere in this volume,[4] it is also appropriate to discuss here what the actual content of this duty is.

The majority in Kaunda views the obligation of the state (to the extent that it is an obligation) within a request and respond paradigm.[5] One suggested and reasonable interpretation is that the duty entails full consideration of the request, a fair procedure for the decision, and a duty to provide reasons for the decision regarding the request.[6] Another interpretation is that diplomatic protection may not be denied arbitrarily and without good cause.[7] In any case (as noted above), the protections afforded to citizens regarding exercises of public power will apply.

Is there an entitlement beyond the request and respond paradigm? A fair reading of Kaunda would say that there is. Certainly and explicitly for O'Regan J, the government has an obligation 'to provide diplomatic protection to its citizens to prevent or repair egregious breaches of international human rights norms.'[8] The [1] On FC s 19, see J Brickhill & R Babiuch 'Political Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 45. On FC s 21, see J Klaaren 'Movement and Residence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 66. On FC s 22, see D Davis 'Freedom of Trade, Occupation and Profession' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 54.

[2] Note that what does not belong in this discussion is the doctrine of application and the place of nationality within that doctrine nor the doctrine of equality. See J Klaaren 'Movement and Residence' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 66; C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 35; S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31.

[3] Geuking v President of the RSA 2002 (1) SA 204 (C), 2001 (11) BCLR 1208 (C).

[4] See K Hopkins & H Strydom in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 30.

[5] Kaunda (supra) at paras 66 and 67.

[6] See Katz & du Plessis (supra) at 475; du Plessis & Penfold (supra) at 18.

[7] Kaunda (supra) at para 184 (Ngcobo J citing views of Erasmus & Davidson).

[8] Kaunda (supra) at para 238.

obligation adumbrated in Ngcobo J's concurrence would be similar in effect to O'Regan J's dissent.[1] The Kaunda majority admits a similar possibility within its request and response paradigm:

> There thus may be a duty on government, consistent with its obligations under international law, to take action to protect one of its citizens against a gross abuse of international human rights norms. A request to the government for assistance in such circumstances where the evidence is clear would be difficult, and in extreme cases impossible to refuse. It is unlikely that such a request would ever be refused by government, but if it were, the decision would be justiciable, and a court could order the government to take appropriate action. There may even be a duty on government in extreme cases to provide assistance to its nationals against egregious breaches of international human rights which come to its knowledge. The victims of such breaches may not be in a position to ask for assistance, and in such circumstances, on becoming aware of the breaches, the government may well be obliged to take an initiative itself.[2]

Note that this duty will not apply where the individual citizen does not qualify at international law for assertion of rights as a national. O'Regan J writes: 'In practice, save where a State's claim that persons are its nationals is contested in an international forum, a State's citizens are its nationals, as international law generally leaves it to States to determine who their nationals are.'[3] Nonetheless, apart from fraud,[4] or some instances of dual nationality,[5] this duty will apply.

Do companies with South African nationality enjoy a similar right or benefit to diplomatic protection? The answer given in Van Zyl v Government of the RSA[6] was in the negative.[7] The reasoning of the Van Zyl court is persuasive. Although they are legal persons, companies are not citizens:

> [They] 'enjoy no rights or privileges in terms of section 3 of the Constitution. In consequence, the guarantee to citizens under section 3 of the Constitution which gives rise to the entitlement to citizens who are nationals to request diplomatic protection, does not apply to companies.[8]

So, is there anything in the general right of citizenship beyond the obligation for diplomatic protection? The answer is 'no'.

[1] Kaunda (supra) at para 169.
[2] Ibid at paras 69 and 70.
[3] Ibid at para 241 (O'Regan J discusses the relationship between the concepts of citizen and national at paras 239-241.) For more on citizenship and nationality, see A Pantazis and A Friedman 'Children's Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 47.
[4] Ibid at paras 63 and 239.
[5] Ibid at para 240.
[6] [2005] 4 All SA 96 ('Van Zyl'). See J Dugard & G Abraham 'Public International Law' (2005) Annual Survey of South African Law 155-6. Leave to appeal in this matter was recently refused by the Constitutional Court.
[7] Van Zyl (supra) at para 100.
[8] Ibid.

61 States of Emergency

Nicole Fritz

61.1 Introduction 61–3
61.2 Positioning FC s 37 61–4
(a) Legal regimes that regulate states of emergency 61–4
(b) Challenges brought about by new types of threat 61–7
61.3 Themes emanating from FC s 37 61–11
(a) Role envisaged for the courts 61–11
(b) International law and South Africa's emergency powers . 61–13
61.4 Analysis of FC s 37 61–17
(a) When may an emergency be declared? 61–17
(b) Regulating declarations of a state of emergency 61–19
(c) Action taken during an emergency 61–21
(d) Non-derogable rights 61–22
(e) Rights of detainees 61–23

States of Emergency

37. (1) A state of emergency may be declared only in terms of an Act of Parliament, and only when—

(a) the life of the nation is threatened by war, invasion, general insurrection, disorder, natural disaster or other public emergency; and

(b) the declaration is necessary to restore peace and order.

(2) A declaration of a state of emergency, and any legislation enacted or other action taken in consequence of that declaration, may be effective only—

(a) prospectively; and

(b) for no more that 21 days from the date of the declaration, unless the National Assembly resolves to extend the declaration. The Assembly may extend a declaration for no more than three months at a time. The first extension of the state of emergency must be by a resolution adopted with a supporting vote of a majority of the members of the Assembly. Any subsequent extension must be by a resolution adopted with a supporting vote of at least 60 per cent of the members of the Assembly. A resolution in terms of this paragraph may be adopted only following a public debate in the Assembly.

(3) Any competent court may decide the validity of—

(a) a declaration of a state of emergency;

(b) an extension of a declaration of a state of emergency; or

(c) any legislation enacted, or other action taken, in consequence of a declaration of a state of emergency.

(4) Any legislation enacted in consequence of a declaration of a state of emergency may derogate from the Bill of Rights only to the extent that—

(a) the derogation is strictly required by the emergency; and

(b) the legislation—

(i) is consistent with the Republic's obligations under international law applicable to states of emergency;

(ii) conforms to subsection (5); and

(iii) is published in the national Government Gazette as soon as reasonably possible after being enacted

(5) No Act of Parliament that authorises a declaration of a state of emergency, and no legislation enacted or other action taken in consequence of a declaration, may permit or authorise—

(a) indemnifying the state, or any person, in respect of any unlawful act;

(b) any derogation from this section; or

(c) any derogation from a section mentioned in column 1 of the Table of Non-Derogable Rights, to the extent indicated opposite that section in column 3 of the Table.

Table of Non-Derogable Rights

1 Section number	2 Section title	3 Extent to which the right is protected
9	Equality	With respect to unfair discrimination solely on the grounds of race, colour, ethnic or social origin, sex, religion or language
10	Dignity	Entirely
11	Life	Entirely

12	Freedom and Security of the person	With respect to subsections (1)(d) and (e) and 2*(c)*
13	Slavery, servitude and forced labour	With respect to slavery and servitude
28	Children	With respect to: — subsection (1)(d) and (e); — the rights in subparagraphs (i) and (ii) of subsection (1)(g); and — subsection (1)(i) in respect of children of 15 years and younger
35	Arrested, detained and accused persons	With respect to: — subsections (1)(a), (b) and (c) and (2)(d) ; — the rights in paragraphs (a) to (o) of subsection (3), excluding paragraph (d) — subsection (4); and — subsection (5) with respect to the exclusion of evidence if the admission of that evidence would render the trial unfair

(6) Whenever anyone is detained without trial in consequence of a derogation of rights resulting from a declaration of a state of emergency, the following conditions must be observed:

(a) An adult family member or friend of the detainee must be contacted as soon as reasonably possible, and informed that the person has been detained.

(b) A notice must be published in the national government gazette within five days of the person being detained, stating the detainee's name and place of detention and referring to the emergency measure in terms of which that person has been detained.

(c) The detainee must be allowed to choose, and be visited at any reasonable time by, a medical practitioner.

(d) The detainee must be allowed to choose, and be visited at any reasonable time by, a legal representative.

(e) A court must review the detention as soon as reasonable possible, but no later than 10 days after the date the person was detained, and the court must release the detainee unless it is necessary to continue the detention to restore peace and order.

(f) A detainee who is not released in terms of a review under paragraph (e), or who is not released in terms of a review under this paragraph, may apply to a court for a further review of the detention at any time after 10 days have passed since the previous review, and the court must release the detainee unless it is necessary to continue the detention to restore peace and order.

(g) The detainee must be allowed to appear in person before any court considering the detention, to be represented by a legal practitioner at those hearings, and to make representations against continued detention.

(h) The state must present written reasons to the court to justify the continued detention of the detainee, and must give a copy of those reasons to the detainee at least two days before the court reviews the detention.

(7) If a court releases a detainee, that person may not be detained again on the same grounds unless the state first shows a court good cause for re-detaining that person.

(8) Subsections (6) and (7) do not apply to persons who are not South African citizens and who are detained in consequence of an international armed conflict. Instead, the state must comply with the standards binding on the Republic under international humanitarian law in respect of the detention of such persons.[1]

61.1 Introduction

South Africa's past made the inclusion in the Final Constitution of provisions allowing for states of emergency fairly controversial.[2] Under apartheid, states of emergency had been speciously invoked in order to perpetrate massive state-sponsored violence against the civilian population.[3] That South Africa's new, hard-won Bill of Rights should contain provisions allowing for the suspension of those selfsame rights must have struck some as fairly sinister. However, recent global events cast the inclusion of these provisions in a somewhat different light. International terrorist attacks — of the type orchestrated in New York, London, Delhi and Bali — and fears about the intensification of these attacks suggest that there may be circumstances in which some type of emergency legal order is warranted. Like many throughout the world concerned for the protection of human rights and civil liberties, South African human rights lawyers and practitioners are now more likely to believe that resort to emergency powers may in certain circumstances be legitimate.

Bruce Ackerman articulates a not uncommon view when he observes:

> The attack of September 11 is the prototype for many events that will litter the twenty-first century. We should be looking at it in a diagnostic spirit: What can we learn that will permit us to respond more intelligently the next time round?[4]

Certainly South Africa's emergency provisions, although untested, have occasioned considerable international interest, as legislators and theorists from other jurisdictions look about, searching for models of how legal regimes should respond in times of great peril. Paradoxically, within South Africa itself, relatively little consideration has been given to how these provisions might be utilized.

This chapter begins with a general discussion — attempting to position South Africa's state of emergency provisions within classical and contemporary debates on the need for legal regimes that regulate emergency periods — before narrowing its focus. § 67.3 examines two distinct themes emanating from South Africa's

* I would like to thank Julie Ebenstein and Omar Farah for the research assistance they provided on this chapter.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Act 108 of 1996)('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[2] Gerhard Erasmus 'Limitation and Suspension' in Dawid van Wyk, John Dugard, Bertus de Villiers & Dennis Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1995) 650.

[3] For a discussion of states of emergency under apartheid, see John Dugard Human Rights and the South African Legal Order (1978); Stephen Ellmann In a Time of Trouble: Law and Liberty in South Africa's State of Emergency (1992).

[4] Bruce Ackerman 'The Emergency Constitution' (2004) 113 Yale Law Journal 1029.

state of emergency provisions (FC s 37): the heightened, supervisory role allocated the courts and the extent to which international law has influenced the drafting of FC s 37. § 67.4 examines the specific provisions of FC s 37.

61.2 Positioning Section 37

(a) Legal regimes that regulate states of emergency

In praising the Roman Senate's appointment of a dictator during periods of emergency, Machiavelli provides a justification that continues to be relied upon today for making provision within legal regimes for extraordinary measures to be taken during times of state peril:

> And truly, among the other Roman institutions, [the dictatorship] is one that merits to be considered and counted among those which were the cause of the greatness of so great an Empire: For without a similar institution, the Cities would have avoided such extraordinary hazards only with difficulty; for the customary orders of the Republic move too slowly (no council or Magistrate being able by himself to do anything, but in many cases having to act together) that the assembling together of opinions takes so much time; and remedies are most dangerous when they have to apply to some situation which cannot await time. And therefore Republics ought to have a similar method among their institutions. And the Venetian Republic (which among modern Republics is excellent) has reserved authority to a small group (few) of citizens so that in urgent necessities they can decide on all matters without wider consultation.[1]

In contemporary terms, the justification is this: observation of the rights and protections provided by modern constitutions in situations of emergency can prevent the government from responding efficiently and energetically to enemies or to events that would destroy those rights and, perhaps, even the constitutional order itself.[2] As Ferejohn and Pasquino note, following Machiavelli, this justification is fundamentally conservative in nature, aiming to address the threat to the system in such a way that the constitutional state is returned to its normal functioning. Rights are to 'be restored, legal processes resumed and ordinary life taken up again.'[3] The conservative nature of the extraordinary measures permitted is generally apparent from the fact that the provisions permit no permanent changes to be made to the constitutional system by the authority empowered to enact the extraordinary measures. Again, this safeguard can be traced to the rule of the Roman Senate. As Machiavelli explained:

> A dictator was made for a (limited) time and not in perpetuity, and only to remove the cause for which he was created; and his authority extended only in being able to decide by himself the ways of meeting that urgent peril, (and) to do things without consultation, and to punish

[1] Niccolo Machiavelli Discourses on Livy (Jon Roland ed., Henry Neville trans 1675) (1517) Book 1, Chapter 34, available at http://www.constitution.org/mac/disclivy_.htm.

[2] John Ferejohn & Pasquale Pasquino 'The Law of the Exception: A Typology of Emergency Powers' (2004) 2 International Journal of Constitutional Law 210, 210-11.

[3] Ibid.

> anyone without appeal; but he could do nothing to diminish (the power) of the State, such as would have been the taking away of authority from the senate or the people, to destroy the ancient institutions of the City and the making of new ones.[1]

The placement of the states of emergency provisions in the Bill of Rights of the Final Constitution suggests that the drafters of these provisions were all too appreciative of the ultimately conservative purpose of these provisions: that they, like Machiavelli, appreciated that 'no Republic will be perfect, unless it has provided for everything with laws, and provided a remedy for every incident, and fixed the methods of governing it' and that 'those Republics which in urgent perils do not have resort to either a Dictatorship or a similar authority, will always be ruined in grave incidents.'[2] There is thus no anomaly in the inclusion of provisions that allow for derogation from fundamental rights in a chapter that begins: 'This Bill of Rights is a cornerstone of democracy in South Africa'.[3] In fact, this placement serves fundamentally to underscore that rights are to be suspended only in order to preserve the larger constitutional edifice that safeguards such rights.

Were these powers to be used to undercut or to modify substantially the legal order of the constitution itself — were they to be used to effect permanent changes to the normal legal order — it would not only be a violation of the norms regulating the emergency powers, it would also 'no longer properly [be] an exercise of an emergency power at all but … an exercise of constituent power. It [would be] an abrogation or transformation of the constitution and … [would] not [be] functioning to preserve it.'[4] In addition, Jon Elster notes, in response to Ferejohn and Pasquino, that 'if the events calling for a state of emergency have structural rather than conjunctural roots, the exercise of emergency powers should aim, among other things, to prevent similar events from occurring in the future.'[5] Elster, however, fails to allow for the very real possibility that effective resolution might involve amendment to the underlying constitutional structure.

The placement of FC s 37 in the Bill of Rights indicates that it follows the orthodox justification offered for emergency regimes — that it is intended to allow for threats to the nation to be addressed in such a way that the constitutional state is returned to its normal functioning. There are, nonetheless, a variety of ways in which emergencies might be addressed and the legal regime returned to normal. To better appreciate the specific model adopted in the Final Constitution, it is worth examining the typology of emergency powers set out by Ferejohn and Pasquino.

As they explain, emergencies may be dealt with through resort to specifically enumerated constitutional powers, or through ordinary legislation.[6] The mere [1] Machiavelli (supra) at Book 1, Chapter 34.

[2] Ibid.
[3] FC s 7(1).
[4] Ferejohn & Pasquino (supra) at 211.
[5] Jon Elster 'Comments on the Paper by Ferejohn and Pasquino' (2004) 2 International Journal of Constitutional Law 240.
[6] Ferejohn & Pasquino (supra) at 215.

existence of specifically enumerated constitutional provisions pertaining to emergencies does not necessarily mean that states will not resort to ordinary legislative measures — thus analogues of Britain's Defence Against Terrorism Act and the USA's Patriot Act might be enacted in other jurisdictions through ordinary legislative procedures, notwithstanding the existence of specific emergency provisions. South Africa, too, may, when faced with grave emergency, choose not to avail itself of its constitutional provisions but address the peril through ordinary legislation. There is, however, a disincentive for doing so in that such legislation would be checked for consistency against the ordinary provisions of the Bill of Rights, and not adjudicated in terms of the suspensive conditions expressly contemplated by FC s 37.

Ferejohn and Pasquino further distinguish between monist and dualist systems.[1] Monist systems insist that the normative order remains invariant at all times. They draw no distinction between regular government and exceptional government because the principle 'let the good of the people be the supreme law' operates not as the basis for derogation from regular government but as the very principle of ordinary government.[2] Dualist systems, conversely, maintain the possibility of two separate constitutional normative orders: each operates under different sets of circumstances.[3] Within dualist systems, a regulator allows, in exceptional circumstances, for the normal order or regular government to be replaced by a normative order in which the temporary suspension of the rights characteristic of the normal order is permitted.[4] The emergency provisions enumerated in FC s 37 indicate that our constitutional order may be classified within this typology as a dualist system.

Ferejohn and Pasquino further distinguish those systems that support the principle that necessity knows no law, or that in war, the laws are silent, from those systems which expressly regulate the emergency government.[5] In respect of the latter, a further distinction is made between those systems, classified as neo-Roman, that provide for regulation ex ante by constitutional ad hoc

[1] Ferejohn and Pasquino (supra) at 223-24.

[2] Ibid at 224.

[3] For a critique of Ferejohn and Pasquino's identification of dualist systems, see David Dyzenhaus 'Terrorism, Globalisation and The Rule of Law: Schmitt v Dicey: Are States of Emergency Inside or Outside the Legal Order?' (2006) 27 Cardozo Law Review 2005. Dyzenhaus maintains that one has to resist the categorization of dualism and insist on a legal order that is unitary. Otherwise, Dyzenhaus contends, Ferejohn and Pasquino are forced to concede Carl Schmitt's thesis that a state of emergency is a lawless void, a black hole, in which the state acts unconstrained by law. Dyzenhaus argues that Ferejohn and Pasquino ultimately contradict themselves in claiming 'that responses to emergencies require a dualist legal order, one divided between ordinary law that responds to the normal, and emergency law which responds to the exception', but also favouring 'the idea that the emergency legal system should be a legal order — a rule of law order, to the extent possible'. Ibid at 210. I am less troubled by this ostensible contradiction. I read Ferejohn and Pasquino, in their description of a dualist order that contains a constitutionally inscribed regulator, to mean not that the law or the rule of law is inapplicable during periods of emergency but that certain concessions to the emergency are made. However, I shall return to Dyzenhaus' argument in a later section when examining the role of the courts.

[4] Ferejohn & Pasquino (supra) at 221.

[5] Ibid at 229.

provisions, and 'those who believe that laws, special laws, or executive measures are better able to confront the crisis.'[1] It may be noted that, for Ferejohn and Pasquino, judicial oversight does not appear to be a characteristic of a truly emergency constitutional regime. . Constitutional emergency regimes for them tend to embrace a larger number of ex ante controls.

South Africa's constitutional system of emergency powers appears to fall somewhere between the latter two classifications. It is regulated ex ante by the temporal restrictions found in FC s 37(2)(b). Again, temporal restrictions, as ex ante controls, have been a feature of constitutional emergency orders since Roman Senate times, when the appointment of a dictator was limited to a period of six months.[2] In South Africa, time limitations are more stringent: the first declaration of a state of emergency operates for only 21 days and extensions thereof are limited to three month periods.

Ferejohn and Pasquino submit that those who are supportive of special laws and extraordinary measures 'seem less worried about the exercise of emergency powers and its possible abuse by the regular branches of government. They seem to be more satisfied with ex post control by the judiciary on the measures taken to face the emergency.'[3] South Africa's constitutional arrangement reserves a prominent role for the courts during emergencies: in this hybrid arrangement the existence of ex ante controls is supplemented by stringent ex post controls.[4]

Yet, despite the many checks, an important control of Roman Senate times finds no place within South Africa's emergency order or for that matter any modern constitutional order. Under the Roman model, regulation was automatic in separating the agency declaring the emergency from the one invested with the emergency powers (heteroinvestiture): 'in the republican model, the executor is called by others (a senate) to the special position of dictator, which is dormant within the constitution, and is automatically dismissed when the emergency ends.'[5] As the agency declaring and the agency exercising emergency powers are separate there is limited incentive for the declaring agency to act opportunistically.

(b) Challenges brought about by new types of threat

As Ferejohn and Pasquino concede, '[m]odern circumstances of emergency are very much different from those faced by Rome and this seems especially true after the events of September 11.'[6] International terrorism does not share the features that generally defined emergencies of the past, which were limited

[1] Ferejohn & Pasquino (supra) at 229.
[2] Ibid at 212.
[3] Ibid at 229.
[4] See FC section 37(3).
[5] Ferejohn & Pasquino (supra) at 235. See also Elster (supra) at 240. Clinton Rossiter lists eleven criteria that must be met for a dictatorship to remain constitutional. The second of these is that 'the decision to institute a constitutional dictatorship should never be in the hands of the man or men who will constitute the dictatorship.' Constitutional Dictatorship (New Edition, 1979) 298.
[6] Ferejohn & Pasquino (supra) at 228.

spatially and temporally. These very obvious differences call into question the utility and the efficacy of modern constitutional emergency regimes.

This raises the spectre of needing a permanent emergency regime. The Roman practice of either being in a state or emergency or not may be too rigid. We may need to develop an emergency regime that operates alongside the normal regime. That is, it may be necessary to create legal boundaries around emergencies to substitute for geographic and temporal ones that no longer exist.[1]

Certainly, South Africa is not immune from these threats and, like governments elsewhere, may want to have resort to more flexible models, where governing instruments can be tailored to the actual exigencies of the situation — concerns which may increasingly incline governments to lean towards the use of legislative models. These types of laws might delegate a great deal of authority to the executive and may only be enacted for temporary periods. As with the USA's Patriot Act or India's Prevention of Terrorism Act, there may be a sense that the legislation is in some ways exceptional: 'But however unusual it may be, emergency legislation remains ordinary within the framework or the constitutional system: it is an act of the legislature working within its normal competence.'[2]

Ferejohn and Pasquino rightly express concern at this growing inclination. They contend that legislative emergency models are much more likely to bring about permanent changes to the normal legal order: 'the special danger of the legislative model is that the authority by which the president takes action is an ordinary statute, and statutes have, intrinsically, the potential to change the legal system in some permanent way.'[3]

Bruce Ackerman shares this concern over the normalization of emergency regimes in an era of international terrorism.[4] He calls for the design of a model that allows for short-term emergency measures while protecting against permanent changes.[5] His model, however, is rooted in a reassurance rationale rather than the traditional existentialist justification — i.e. that the emergency threatens the very existence of the state. As Ackerman explains:

> September 11 and its successors will not pose such a grave existential threat, but major acts of terrorism can induce short-term panic. It should be the purpose of a newly fashioned emergency regime to reassure the public that the situation is under control, and that the state is taking effective short-term actions to prevent a second strike.[6]

At the core of Ackerman's constitutional emergency model is the principle of supermajoritarian escalation.[7] While it may be necessary for the executive to act

[1] See Ferejohn & Pasquino (supra) at 228.

[2] Ibid at 215. South Africa has also made provision for international terrorist threat through ordinary legislation: The Protection of Constitutional Democracy Against Terrorist and Related Activities Act 40 of 2004.

[3] Ferejohn & Pasquino (supra) at 219.

[4] See Ackerman (supra) at 1047.

[5] For criticisms of Ackerman's reassurance model, see Lawrence Tribe & Patrick Guldridge 'The Anti-Emergency Powers Constitution' (2004) 113 Yale Law Journal 1801; David Cole 'The Priority of Morality: The Emergency Constitution's Blind Spots' (2004) 113 Yale Law Journal 1753.

[6] Ackerman (supra) at 1031.

[7] Ibid at 1047.

unilaterally in the early days of the emergency, the power to act unilaterally should avail only for the period necessary for the legislature to convene. Thereafter, the state of emergency > should expire unless it gains majority approval. But this is only the beginning. Majority support should serve to sustain the emergency for a short time — two or three months. Continuation should require an escalating cascade of supermajorities: sixty percent for the next two months; seventy for the next; eighty thereafter.[1]

By requiring new and ever greater majority support for the state of emergency within the legislature, the process of supermajoritarian escalation marks the emergency regime as provisional and temporary, requiring 'self-conscious approval for limited continuation'.[2] The process also automatically places the emergency regime on the path to extinction. In the later stages of the emergency it will become virtually impossible to attain the heightened levels of support that the escalation requires. As Ackerman notes, 'modern pluralist societies are simply too fragmented to sustain this kind of politics — unless, of course, the terrorists succeed in striking repeatedly with devastating effect.'[3]

FC s 37(2)(b) already contains a supermajoritarian escalator. It requires that any extension of a declaration of a state of emergency, bar the first (which need only be supported by a majority vote within the legislature), must be supported by 'a supporting vote of at least 60 per cent of the members of the Assembly.' This is a fairly simple escalation, with no further escalation but for the 60 per cent majority vote required for any subsequent extension. Given South Africa's political realities — a ruling party, the ANC, that controls an overwhelming majority within Parliament — this particular supermajoritarian escalation may not hold out sufficient protection against the normalization of emergency regimes. Ackerman notes: 'Only a more elaborate multistage mechanism can reliably steer the system toward the eventual dissolution of emergency conditions.'[4]

As Dyzenhaus observes, Ackerman's model envisages a limited role for the judiciary:

> Because Ackerman does not think that judges are likely to do, or can do, better than they have in the past at containing the executive during an emergency, he proposes mainly the creative design of constitutional checks and balances to ensure, as did the Roman dictatorship, against the normalization of the state of emergency. Judges should not be regarded as 'miraculous saviors of our threatened heritage of freedom.' Hence, it is better to rely on a system of political incentives and disincentives, a 'political economy' that will prevent abuse of emergency powers.[5] (footnotes omitted)

For Dyzenhaus, the allocation of so limited a role to the judiciary is mistaken, both as a practical matter and normatively. Practically, the very political economy

[1] Ackerman (supra) at 1047.
[2] Ibid at 1048.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Ibid at 1055.
[5] Dyzenhaus (supra) at 2016.

Ackerman constructs to constrain emergency powers 'still has to be located in law in order to be enforceable, which means that Ackerman cannot help but rely on judges'.[1] Dyzenhaus asks: 'why should we accept his claim that we can rely on judges when the executive asserts the necessity of suspending the exceptional constitution, the constitution for the state of emergency, when one of his premises is that we cannot so rely?'[2]

Normatively, Dyzenhaus insists that the judiciary will always have some role to play in maintaining the rule of law and not just rule by law. Where the executive is given prerogative power or the equivalent to suspend the normal legal order, by the constitution or by statute, it is the duty of judges to try to understand that delegation as constrained by the rule of law:

> To the extent that the delegation cannot be so understood, judges must treat it as, to use terminology developed by Ronald Dworkin, an 'embeded mistake', that is, a fact which they have to recognize, but whose force they should try to limit to the extent possible. They are entitled to do this because they should adopt as a regulative assumption of their role the view that all the institutions of government are cooperating in what we can think of as the rule of law project, the project which tries to ensure that political power is always exercised within the limits of the rule of law.[3]

But Dyzenhaus never explains why such faith in the courts is well placed. Indeed if, as he points out, the executive asserts the necessity of suspending the exceptional constitution, and fails to adhere to the procedures stipulated, why would it be any more likely to comply with anti-executive orders handed down by courts, assuming courts were inclined to render such decisions in times of emergency? Dyzenhaus contends that 'judges also have an important role in calling public attention to a situation in which such cooperation wanes or ceases'. But if we return to Ackerman's supermajoritarian escalator, it is not at all clear why the legislature, if its procedures are violated, would not play that role equally well.

The scepticism of some academics, like Ackerman, regarding the judiciary's ability or inclination to properly supervise declarations of emergency and adopted responses, and the absence of convincing responses to such scepticism from other academics, like Dyzenhaus, must imbue South Africa's emergency provisions with some poignancy, if not concern. In the subsequent section, greater consideration is given to the role of the courts under South Africa's emergency provisions. But it is worth noting that the role of the courts in supervising the emergency is at all times underlined in the Final Constitution. The language and the structure of FC s 37 must be read as a rejection of South Africa's emergency past — a past during which the role of courts was minimized. And yet, despite the attempt at reassuring South Africans that the past will not repeat itself, the protections promised by judicial supervision under FC s 37 may not be well realized during future states of emergency.

[1] Dyzenhaus (supra) at 2017.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid at 2035 citing Ronald Dworkin Taking Rights Seriously 81, 121-22 (1977)

61.3 Themes Emanating from Section 37

FC s 37 is fairly detailed in its provisions. These details will be discussed later in § 61.4. Two primary themes, however, emerge from this section, and both deserve sustained attention: the heightened role afforded the courts in supervising states of emergency; and the extent to which the provisions track those found in international law.

(a) Role envisaged for the courts

An essential feature of the state of emergency provisions are the powers carved out for the courts in supervising any emergency measures taken. Not only are the courts specifically empowered to decide the validity of any declaration of a state of emergency, any extension of such a declaration or any legislation enacted or action taken in consequence of a declaration,[1] but the Final Constitution explicitly prohibits any legislation or action that would place unlawful conduct on the part of the state or any person beyond the purview of the courts.[2] No indemnities for unlawful conduct can receive constitutional sanction. Moreover, there can be no derogation from the role afforded the courts under FC s 37.[3]

Furthermore, in respect of any detentions carried out in consequence of a declaration of a state of emergency, courts are to review these detentions as soon as reasonably possible but in any event no later than ten days after the date of detention.[4] A court must release the detainee unless further detention is necessary to restore peace and order.[5] Detainees not released are thereafter permitted to apply for further review of their detention once a period of ten days has expired since their previous review, and are entitled to release unless further detention is necessary, again, under the same standard.[6] On further review, the state is to provide written reasons to the court to justify the continued detention of the detainee and must provide a copy of those reasons to the detainee at least two days prior to the review.[7] Finally, in respect of detainees, once the court releases a person, that person is not to be detained again on the same grounds unless the state establishes before a court that there exists good cause for re-detaining that person.[8]

These provisions mark an obvious departure from the emergency provisions under the apartheid legal order and, in this sense, are some of the clearest indicators that the Final Constitution is, in Ruti Teitel's terminology, a 'transitional

[1] See FC s 37(3)
[2] See FC s 37(5)(a).
[3] See FC s 37(5)(b).
[4] See FC s 37(6)(e).
[5] Ibid.
[6] See FC s 37(6)(f).
[7] See FC s 37(6)(b).
[8] See FC s 37(7).

constitution': being 'both backward- and forward-looking, as it disclaims past illiberal, and reclaims future liberal, norms.'[1] These provisions reflect are a clear rejection of parliamentary supremacy, the doctrine under which South Africa's notorious emergency provisions were enacted.[2] They are also an unambiguous refutation of the tenor of the previous emergency provisions, which sought time and again to oust judicial review, making protection by the courts, 'for all practical purposes, non-existent'.[3]

Implicit, if not explicit, in the constitutional arrangement for states of emergency, is the belief that the courts will temper the worst excesses of any legislation enacted or action taken pursuant to a declaration of a state of emergency — that in supervising emergency powers the courts will act to safeguard individual rights. And yet, as the academic debates reflected in the previous section suggest (together with actual court conduct in many jurisdictions, including South Africa), such faith may not be entirely well placed. Arguably, South Africa's past experience of states of emergency may account for the absence of greater appreciation for concerns such as Ackerman's and the concomitant design of a more elaborate ex ante type control procedure.[4]

Samuel Issacharoff and Richard Pildes conclude, in their study of US constitutional practice in times of emergency, that American courts have neither wholly endorsed executive unilateralism nor a civil libertarian stance:

> Instead, the courts have developed a process-based, institutionally oriented (as opposed to rights-oriented) framework for examining the legality of governmental action in extreme security contexts. Through this process-based approach, American courts have sought to shift the responsibility for these difficult decisions away from themselves and toward the joint action of the most democratic branches of the government.[5]

[1] Ruti Teitel 'Transitional Jurisprudence: The Role of Law in Political Transformation' (1997) 106 Yale Law Journal 2009, 2015, 2078 ('In ordinary times constitutionalism is conceived as entirely forward-looking in nature, designed to endure for generations. Constitutionalism in transitional times is particularly retrospective in nature, justificatory and constructive of the political transformation.')

[2] See Etienne Mureinik 'Book Review: Emerging from Emergency: Human Rights in South Africa: In a Time of Trouble: Law and Liberty in South Africa's State of Emergency By Stephen Ellman' (1994) 92 Michigan Law Review 1977, 1985.

[3] 'States of Emergency' Iain Currie & Johan de Waal (eds) The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 801.

[4] Nonetheless it would be wrong to suggest that South Africa's emergency arrangement makes no provision for ex ante type controls: the powers given the legislature to extend states of emergency are of this type.

[5] Samuel Issacharoff & Richard Pildes 'Emergency Contexts Without Emergency Powers: The United States' Constitutional Approach to Rights during Wartime' (2004) 2 International Journal of Constitutional Law 296, 297. Issacharoff and Pildes merely describe this approach. Cass Sunstein prescribes a 'minimalist' stance that he argues judges should adopt in deciding all constitutional matters. He insists that judicial minimalism is to be promoted during normal times but is even more essential under emergencies: 'Courts will not have the requisite information to second-guess the executive on the balance between security and liberty but they can still require clear congressional authorization for any executive action that intrudes on constitutionally protected interests.' Cass Sunstein 'Minimalism at War' (2004) 47 Supreme Court Review 48, 53-54.

This approach appears to have been conditioned by an appreciation, articulated by former US Chief Justice William Rehnquist, that '[j]udicial inquiry, with its restrictive rules of evidence, orientation towards resolution of factual disputes in individual cases, and long delays is ill-suited to determine an issue such as "military necessity"'.[1] The courts have felt more emboldened to issue orders against the executive when there is not found to be institutional endorsement by both political branches for departures from ordinary legal structures and rules.[2] Issacharoff and Pildes point out that although critics of the limited or deferential role that US courts have assumed in times of emergency have tended to 'frame the problem as a character failing — courts need to have more "courage" — this long-standing judicial practice, across many generations, suggests there are deeper structural and institutional reasons that consistently lead judges to define their role in specific, limited ways.'[3]

As I have already indicated, the emergency provisions of the Final Constitution are as yet untested.[4] Nonetheless, there is some reason to believe that South African courts may, at least in respect of the determination that a state of emergency exists, afford substantial deference to the executive. The Constitutional Court case that comes closest to touching on such security concerns is Kaunda & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others.[5] At issue in Kaunda, were the arrests of 69 South African citizens in Zimbabwe on the suspicion of being mercenaries en route to stage a coup in Equatorial Guinea. The majority held that courts should be careful about intervening in areas where the executive possesses unique skills and experience — in this case the conduct of diplomacy and foreign relations. They therefore declined to issue any directive to the executive, notwithstanding the grave danger in which the applicants were placed.[6]

(b) International law and South Africa's emergency powers

There are two express references in FC s 37 to international law. First, FC s 37(4)(b)(i) requires that legislation enacted pursuant to a declaration of a state of emergency may derogate from the Bill of Rights only to the extent that the legislation is 'consistent with the Republic's obligations under international law applicable to states of emergency'. Second, FC s 37(8) provides that non-South

[1] William Rehnquist All the Laws But One: Civil Liberties in Wartime (1998) 205.
[2] Issacharoff & Pildes (supra) at 315.
[3] Ibid at 332.
[4] The only appraisal occurred in the Second Certification Judgement. See Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 45.
[5] 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC). The applicants maintained that the South African government be required to take steps to have them extradited to South Africa so that any trial they might have to face could be conducted here and that it be required to seek assurances relating to their conditions of detention and to trial procedures should they face trial in Zimbabwe or Equatorial Guinea.
[6] O'Regan J's dissent offered a far less deferential approach.

Africans detained in South Africa in consequence of an international armed conflict may avail themselves of 'the standards binding on the Republic under international humanitarian law in respect of the detention of such persons'.

International law has also influenced the drafting of other provisions contained in FC s 37 — the formulation that a state of emergency may be declared only when 'the life of the nation is threatened' is drawn directly from the provisions dealing with states of emergency and derogation of rights in the authoritative international instruments. Similarly, the identification in FC s 37 of those rights that are non-derogable directly corresponds to such identification under international law. The stipulation that the right to equality is non-derogable 'with respect to unfair discrimination solely on the grounds of race, colour, ethnic or social origin, sex, religion or language' is lifted from Article 4(1) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (the ICCPR).[1]

International law provisions relating to state obligations during times of emergency are primarily concerned with two themes: the circumstances that must obtain before a derogation of rights can be justified; and the rights that may be derogated from as opposed to those that must be preserved no matter the exigency which the state faces. These two concerns are reflected, for example, in art 4 of the ICCPR: 'On the one hand, it allows for a State Party unilaterally to derogate temporarily from a part of its obligations under the Covenant. On the other hand, Article 4 subjects both this very measure of derogation, as well as its material consequences, to a specific regime of safeguards.'[2]

These concerns are also reflected in the derogation provisions of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (European Convention)[3] and the American Convention on Human Rights (American Convention).[4] Interestingly, the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights[5] makes no such provision for derogation: the drafters believed that the exclusion of a derogation provision from the Charter would discourage governments from

[1] International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966) 999 UNTS 171, 6 ILM 368 (Ratified by South Africa on 10 December 1998). Article 4(1) provides: '[I]n time of public emergency which threatens the life of the nation and the existence of which is officially proclaimed, the State Parties to the present Covenant may take measures derogating from their obligations under the present Covenant to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation, provided that such measures are not inconsistent with their other obligations under international law and do not involve discrimination solely on the ground of race, colour, sex, language, religion or social origin.'

[2] Human Rights Committee General Comment No 29 'States of Emergency' (art 4 of the Covenant) (2001) CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.11 at para 2.

[3] Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (1950, entered into force 3 September 1953) 213 UNTS 221 (Not ratified by South Africa). Article 15 reads in relevant part: 'In time of war or other public emergency threatening the life of the nation any High Contracting Party may take measures derogating from its obligations under this Convention to the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation.'

[4] American Convention on Human Rights (1969, entered into force 18 July 1978) OAS Official Records OEA/ser K/XVI/1.1, 1144 U.N.T.S. 123, ILM 673 (1970). Article 27(1) provides: 'in time of war, public danger, or other emergency that threatens the independence or security of a State Party, it may take measures derogating from its obligations. . .'

[5] African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (1981, entered into force 21 October 1986) OAU Doc CAB/LEG/67/3 rev 5, 21 ILM 58 (1982)(Ratified by South Africa on 9 June 1996).

resorting too easily to extraordinary measures that would violate human rights.[1] More recent international initiatives like the Paris Minimum Standards of Human Rights Norms in a State of Emergency[2] and the Siracusa Principles[3] indicate a growing international consensus that states should be subject to more detailed restraints during times of emergency than the fairly generalized provisions of the core instruments — such as the ICCPR and European Convention — suggest.

And yet even the 'relaxed' threshold protections of the core instruments have not met with compliance. Despite the requirement that the life of the nation itself must be jeopardized by the emergency before the derogation of rights is justified, states have employed emergency powers in substantially less threatening circumstances. Rarely have international courts held states to the language of international legal instruments. The Greek Case, decided by the ECHR*,* is the exception: 'the Greek military declared a state of emergency to justify a coup and the repression of a general strike, [and] the European Institutions rejected [the] state's claim of the existence of an emergency'.[4] Lawless,[5] the most oft-cited case on emergency powers, is notable for the establishment of a strict test for the use of emergency powers — that the threat must be actual or imminent; that its effects must involve the whole nation and that the organized life of the community must be threatened. And yet the European Court deferred quite readily to the determination of the government of Ireland that an emergency threatening the life of the nation existed as a result of the activities of paramilitary groups using violence which substantially and negatively effected relations with its neighbours.[6]

Lawless therefore takes two somewhat contradictory legal positions: doctrinally, it is uncompromising in the showing it requires to justify states of emergency; at the same time, the case also establishes a deferential standard of review once the state of emergency has been called. This Manichean approach reflects the balance international law must strike on the issue of states of emergency: it cannot afford to overreach on this issue because it implicates national security concerns so sensitive for states. Too invasive and onerous an intervention would undermine the relevancy and the effectiveness of international law. However, the international legal regime cannot ignore the fact that many of the struggles to establish human rights and the rule of law are fought against governments that hide their authoritarianism behind a pretence of national emergency which demands, so they contend, the derogation of rights for the greater good.

[1] Stephen Livingstone 'International Law Relating to States of Emergency and Derogations from International Human Rights Treaties' Human Rights Centre, Queens University Belfast, 1, available at: www.interights.org/doc/Livingstone_derogation_final.doc (accessed on 9 January 2007).

[2] Adopted by the International Law Association (ILA) Conference in 1984.

[3] The Siracusa Principles on the Limitation and Derogation provisions in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1984), reprinted in (1985) 7 Human Rights Quarterly 3, 7-8.

[4] Livingstone (supra) at 4 (citing the European Court of Human Rights Greek Case (1969) 12 Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights 1.)

[5] Lawless v Ireland (No. 3) (1961) 1 EHRR 15.

[6] See Oren Gross 'Once More Unto the Breach: The Systemic Failure of Applying the European Convention on Human Rights to Entrenched Emergencies' (1998) 23 Yale Journal of International Law 437, 464-65.

The deferential standard that the European Court applied in Lawless was reaffirmed as recently as 2001. In fact, in the most recent derogation case considered, Marshall v United Kingdom:[1] > the Court rejected as inadmissible on the grounds of being manifestly ill-founded a challenge to the derogation the United Kingdom maintains to this day in Northern Ireland. This was despite the fact that the major terrorist organisations in Northern Ireland had been on ceasefire for two years before the events which occurred in this case.[2]

The international legal system appears to have settled on a rational basis standard of judicial review where states of emergency are concerned. As a result, the European Court of Human Rights has held that 'a State has a wide margin of appreciation … to determine whether the life of the nation was threatened by a public emergency and, if so, how far it might go in attempting to overcome it.'[3] In a system where enforcement and sanction methods are limited and in many cases non-existent, this is the most tactically sound approach for international courts to take. It affords them the best chance to maintain their relevance without being ignored by states unwilling to subordinate the decision of a national government to an order of an international court. That said, this deference holds out the potential for permitting abuse.

It is because of the deference afforded states in their determination of states of emergency that commentators argue that the provisions identifying those rights from which no derogation is permitted offer more effective protection:

> Neither national nor international judicial institutions have been willing to challenge on a regular basis a state's assertions of the need for a state of emergency or the need for the measures taken to respond to it, measures which lead to substantial curtailment of non-derogable human rights. What they have been prepared to do is firmly uphold the status of non-derogable rights. Thus both the European and American Courts of Human Rights have firmly rejected arguments from states that killings by state forces or the use of force against suspects are in any way justifiable because of a situation of war or the threat of terrorism.[4]

In July 2001, the UN Human Rights Committee (HRC), in its authoritative General Comment 29 on Article 4 of the ICCPR, indicated that a number of rights should be upheld during a state of emergency, in part to give effect to the obligations of non-discrimination, customary law obligations or obligations under international humanitarian law:

- prohibition on taking hostages;
- prohibition on forced displacement of persons;
- the rights of minorities;

[1] Marshall v United Kingdom Application No 41571/98 (10 July 2001).
[2] Livingstone (supra) at 4.
[3] Republic of Ireland v United Kingdom 2 EHRR 25 (Series A) (1978) at III (C). On the substantial deference standard created by the margin of appreciation in the context of emergency derogation, see Gross (supra) at 495.
[4] Livingstone (supra) at 4. See also Gross (supra) at 498.

- the rights of all detained people to be treated in a way which respects their dignity;
- fundamental aspects of the right to fair trial, such as the presumption of innocence; and
- arbitrary deprivation of liberty.

Finally, it should be noted that South Africa is bound to comply with certain international obligations once a state of emergency is declared. The ICCPR, for instance, requires that a state derogating from its obligations under the Convention notify the UN Secretary-General of such derogation. General Comment 29 emphasized the need for immediate notification and for the notification to include full information on the measures taken (including the text of any relevant laws) plus a full explanation of the reasons why these measures were taken.

61.4 Analysis of FC s 37

(a) When may an emergency be declared?

FC s 37(1) authorizes the declaration of a state of emergency where two conditions are met, namely: that the 'life of the nation is threatened by war, invasion, general insurrection, disorder, natural disaster or other public emergency'; and where the declaration is 'necessary to restore peace and order'. There are thus two assessments to be made: (a) whether the disturbance qualifies as a threat to the life of the nation; and (b) whether the declaration is necessary — and not just desirable or advisable — for the restoration of peace and order.

There is little domestic jurisprudence that might guide an assessment of what constitutes a threat to the life of the nation. However, international human rights jurisprudence is instructive. The European Court of Human Rights has held that a state of emergency can be justified only by 'an exceptional situation of crisis which affects the whole population and constitutes a threat to the organised life of the community of which the state is composed'.[1] In a later decision, the Court set down several criteria that had to be met before the derogation section of the European Convention[2] could be relied upon. These criteria are:

> (a) the threat must be actual or imminent; (b) its effects must involve the whole nation; (c) the continuance of the organised life of the nation must be threatened; (d) the crisis or danger must be exceptional, in that normal measures or restrictions permitted by the

[1] Lawless (supra) at para 28. See also Currie & de Waal (supra) at 803.

[2] Article 15 (Measures derogating from human rights are permissible 'in time of war or other public emergency threatening the life of the nation.')

> Convention for the maintenance of public safety, health and order, are plainly inadequate.[1]

The last criterion invokes the same concerns made explicit in the second condition set by the Final Constitution for the declaration of a state of emergency — that the declaration, and the extraordinary powers thereby availed, be necessary for the restoration of peace and order. Where ordinary measures would suffice — where the normal powers and processes of the criminal justice system could adequately address the threat — no declaration may be made. The obvious corollary of this second condition, as noted by Currie and de Waal, is that 'once peace and order are restored the justification for a state of emergency falls away and it should end.'[2]

It is interesting to note that, unlike Canada's Emergencies Act, which distinguishes between four types of emergency (natural disasters, threats to public order, international emergencies and states of war) and subjects each to different regimes,[3] neither the Final Constitution nor legislation[4] distinguishes between the types of occurrences that may constitute a state of emergency. Thus the same acts may be taken in response to an emergency brought about by general disorder

[1] Greek Case (supra) at 72. See also Currie & de Waal (supra) at 803. International and nongovernmental organizations have attempted to define in greater detail what circumstances will qualify as public emergencies. For example, a report submitted in 1982 to the UN Subcommission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities refers to 'states of emergency' as a generic juridical term reflecting the use of emergency powers in exceptional circumstances. Exceptional circumstances exist when there are:

> Temporary factors of a generally political character which in varying degrees involve extreme and imminent danger, threatening the organized existence of a nation, that is to say, the political and social system that it comprises as a State, and which may be defined as follows: a crisis situation affecting the population as a whole and constituting a threat to the organized existence of the community which forms the basis of the State.

Nicole Questiaux 'Study of the Implications for Human Rights Developments Concerning Situations Known as States of Siege or Emergency' UN ESCOR, 35th Sess. 60, at 16 UN Doc E/CN4/Sub2/1982/15 (1982). The International Law Association's Paris Minimum Standards of Human Rights Norms in a State of Emergency (1984), prescribes:

(a) The existence of a public emergency which threatens the life of the nation, and which is officially proclaimed, will justify the declaration of a state of emergency.

(b) The expression 'public emergency' means an exceptional situation of crisis or public danger, actual or imminent, which affects the whole population or the whole population of the area to which the declaration applies and constitutes a threat to the organized life of the community of which the state is composed.

The Siracusa Principles provide:

> A state party may take measures derogating from its obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights pursuant to Article 4 only when faced with a situation of exceptional and actual or imminent danger which threatens the life of the nation. A threat to the life of the nation is one that: affects the whole of the population and either the whole or part of the territory of the State, and threatens the physical integrity of the population, the political independence or the territorial integrity of the State or the existence of basic functioning of institutions indispensable to ensure and protect the rights recognized in the Covenant.

[2] Currie and de Waal (supra) at 802.

[3] See Bruce Ackerman 'The Emergency Constitution' (2004) 113 Yale Law Journal 1029, 1061-62. While emergencies responding to threats to public order require renewal every 30 days, an emergency response to war requires a revote every 120 days.

[4] See State of Emergency Act 64 of 1997.

as in response to an emergency brought about by invasion. Yet, whatever the genesis of the threat, only where the extraordinary powers that avail the government under a state of emergency are necessary to restore peace and order may a declaration be made. It is this threshold of necessity in the second condition which acts as safeguard against any default resort to emergency powers in circumstances of threat not requiring such measures.

This reading was confirmed by the Constitutional Court in the Second Certification Judgment: the Court observed that a declaration of a 'state of national defence', as permitted under FC s 203, would not in itself make for a declaration of a state of emergency.[1] It might provide grounds for the declaration, but even in that event all the provisions of FC s 37 would remain applicable. To be constitutional, any declaration of a state of emergency following on a declaration of a state of national defence would need to be necessary for the restoration of peace and order. The circumstances giving rise to the state of national defence would also need to be such that they threaten the life of the nation.

(b) Regulating declarations of a state of emergency

A state of emergency may be declared 'only in terms of an Act of Parliament'. The authorizing legislation is the State of Emergency Act.[2] The SoE Act provides that any declaration of a state of emergency must be by proclamation in the Government Gazette. The President may declare a state of emergency within the Republic or in any area within the Republic and must briefly state the reasons for the declaration.[3]

FC s 37 sets out a number of safeguards protecting against the possible abuse of state of emergency powers. Some of these protections are time-related: thus a state of emergency, and any ensuing legislation or action, is effective only prospectively.[4] Any declaration and ensuing legislation or action is valid only for 21 days from the date of the declaration unless the National Assembly resolves to extend the declaration, and it may do so for no more than three months at a time.

The role afforded the National Assembly in extending a state of emergency identifies additional institutional safeguards, and the prominent powers given other branches of government in supervising the state of emergency. No limit is set on the number of times the National Assembly may extend the declaration. However, while the first extension needs only the support of a majority of the members of the Assembly, any subsequent extension must be supported by at least 60 per cent of the members of the Assembly. Any resolution, to extend or to refuse to extend a state of emergency, can only be made following a public debate in the Assembly. The provisions relating to the National Assembly's extensions

[1] See Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 45. See also Currie & de Waal (supra) at 803.

[2] Act 64 of 1997 ('SoE Act').

[3] SoE Act ss 1(1) and (2).

[4] See FC s 37(2)(a).

are those to which Ackerman refers when he speaks of South Africa's 'super-majoritarian escalator'. As has already been noted, the provisions require only a fairly simple escalation and, given South African political realities, a more elaborate multistage mechanism might have been preferred to ensure that any extensions are genuinely necessary, command overwhelming public support, and are not a pretext for mere discrimination. Nonetheless, the requirement that resolutions must follow public debate in the Assembly ensures that opposition, if not sufficient to terminate the state of emergency, is at least heard and disseminated.

In addition to the role played by the National Assembly in supervising the operation of a state of emergency, the supervisory functions of the courts during this time are explicitly reinforced. They may decide on the validity of the initial declaration, on any extension, and on any ensuing legislation or action. As Currie and de Waal explain, the conditions stipulated in FC s 37(1) are thereby made justiciable — meaning courts may determine whether there did exist a threat to the life of the nation and whether a declaration was necessary to restore peace and order.[1] These authors further suggest that 'the requirement of "necessity" suggests a proportionality test'. They rely, as the basis for this argument, on the Siracusa Principles. The Principles provide that the 'severity, duration and geographic scope of any derogation measure shall be such only as are strictly necessary to deal with the threat of life to the nation and are proportionate to its nature and extent'.[2]

Currie and de Waal are not alone in maintaining that the requirement of necessity incorporates a proportionality test. In fact, Oren Gross insists that the principle of proportionality is one of the basic substantive principles underlying the derogation regime:

> Proportionality is essential to the legitimacy and justification of a claim to derogation from otherwise protected human rights. Even where an act of derogation may be justified under the conventions, the state does not enjoy unfettered discretion with respect to the derogation measures that it wishes to pursue. Such measures can only be taken to 'the extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation'.[3]

I would argue, admittedly against the weight of authority, that the terms 'necessity' and 'strictly required' (both used in FC s 37) demand only that the state have no alternative means at its disposal, no less restrictive or less harmful measures to deploy, but not that the action taken be proportional to the result achieved. FC s 37 does not, contrary to what Currie and De Waal suggest, require the weighing of harms.

Recall that the South African emergency provisions are intended to allow for the preservation of the 'life of the nation'. This phrase embraces the 'organised

[1] Currie & de Waal (supra) at 804.

[2] The Siracusa Principles on the Limitation and Derogation Provisions in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights UN Doc E/CN4/1985/4 Annex (1985). See also Currie & de Waal (supra) at 804.

[3] Gross (supra) at 449. See also Ronald St J Macdonald 'Derogations Under Article 15 of the European Convention on Human Rights' (1997) 36 Columbia Journal of Transnational Law 225, 242-45; Jaime Oraa 'Human Rights in States of Emergency' (1992) 31 International Law 140, 140–70.

life of the nation' and thus the continued existence and functioning of the constitutional infrastructure. Within the constitutional emergency arrangement, this objective of preserving the 'life of the nation', and thus the 'organised life of the nation', reigns supreme. While it may be difficult to imagine circumstances in which this objective might weigh less than the harm caused in securing the objective, we might consider the following hypothetical.

Suppose three-quarters of South Africa's citizenry rises up in violent protest against current levels of crime and demands the suspension of the Bill of Rights: they believe the Bill unjustly enables and enriches criminals. Suppose that the state believes that in order to quell the insurrection that it must embark on a process of massive detention (assuming there were such facilities to detain so large a number) and that it declares a state of emergency on the grounds that the life of the nation is threatened by general insurrection and that the declaration is necessary to restore peace and order. In such a situation, we might argue that the declaration is necessary and the measures strictly required and yet still be forced to concede that they are not proportional to the measures taken and the harm caused: the detention of the majority of South Africa's citizenry cannot be proportional to safeguarding the continued functioning of the current constitutional infrastructure.

States of emergency will come to an end in one of two ways. Either the President, through a proclamation, will declare that the state of emergency is withdrawn, or the National Assembly will resolve not to extend the declaration or will allow the declaration of the state of emergency to lapse.[1]

(c) Action taken during an emergency

FC s 37 first protects against abuse by regulating the actual declaration of a state of emergency. But it then goes further and regulates the measures that may be taken once a state of emergency has been declared. The key characteristic of the emergency regime is that it allows for derogation from fundamental rights in a way that the normal constitutional order would not permit. However, any legislation authorizing derogation from the Bill of Rights must be strictly required by the emergency, must be consistent with South Africa's international law obligations applicable to states of emergency, and is to be published in the Government Gazette as soon as reasonably possible after enactment.

FC s 37(5) prohibits an Act of Parliament authorizing the declaration of emergency or any legislation enacted or other action taken pursuant to the declaration from indemnifying the state or any person for unlawful acts. As Currie and de Waal observe:

> These requirements are all justiciable. It is also specifically provided that no derogation from s 37 itself is permissible. This means that the jurisdiction of the courts cannot be ousted during emergencies.[2]

[1] See FC s 37(2)(b); SoE Act s 4.
[2] Currie & de Waal (supra) at 805 (footnotes omitted).

(d) Non-derogable rights

FC s 37 contains a list of non-derogable rights and provides the extent to which these rights are non-derogable. Only the rights of human dignity and life are non-derogable in their entirety. As concerns the right to equality, which is non-derogable 'with respect to unfair discrimination, solely on the grounds of race, colour, ethnic or social origin, sex, religion or language', there are omissions which must register as peculiar. Why, for instance, is unfair discrimination on the basis of race or religion strictly prohibited during a state of emergency and yet unfair discrimination on the basis of gender or sexual orientation is not? Currie and de Waal argue that 'the fact that some rights are derogable does not make them "weaker" rights and does not make the non-derogable rights "core rights" or "superior rights"'[1] Still the omission of some of the listed grounds in FC s 9(3), prohibiting unfair discrimination, from those listed in the Table of Non-Derogable Rights suggests that within the Final Constitution not all unfair discrimination is viewed as equally offensive. It would appear that this more restrictive list of grounds than that which appears in FC s 9(3) is occasioned by the identical wording of art 4 of the ICCPR. Still, while the section might be laudable in seeking to keep faith with South Africa's international law obligations, it might yet be asked why the drafters did not consider that unfair discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation was as unlikely to advance the restoration of peace and order as unfair discrimination on the basis of colour.

It should be noted that the analogous provision under the Interim Constitution[2] (IC s 34) was more expansive in its listing of non-derogable rights. Gerhard Erasmus argued against such expansive incorporation, insisting that '[t]o make the list of non-derogable rights as wide as possible in the belief that a pro-rights approach is thereby displayed is mistaken.'[3] This is so, because as with FC s 37, a number of categories of threat might trigger a state of emergency and derogation of rights. However, Erasmus argues that:

> in the case of war, which is the gravest emergency, more extreme needs are experienced than in situations of less gravity. The temptation may then arise to resort to 'implied' powers going beyond s 34 in order to suspend certain rights because of extreme need despite the fact that they are listed in s 34 as non-derogable.[4]

The less expansive list contained in FC s 37 may be, in part, a response to concerns such as those of Erasmus. Still, the Table of Non-Derogable Rights is more extensive in its protections than many international instruments that contain 'four common non-derogable rights: the right to life; the right to be free from torture or inhuman or degrading treatment; freedom from slavery and servitude; and the right to be free from a retroactive application of penal laws'.[5] It is at least

[1] Currie & De Waal (supra) at 806.
[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').
[3] Gerhard Erasmus 'Limitation and Suspension' in Dawid van Wyk, John Dugard, Bertus de Villiers & Dennis Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 659.
[4] Ibid.
[5] Ibid at 660.

arguable that the directive contained in FC s 37(4)(a) that 'any legislation enacted in consequence of a declaration of a state of emergency may derogate from the Bill of Rights only to the extent that the derogation is strictly required by the emergency' is sufficiently protective and preservative of rights that it diminishes the need to make as many explicitly non-derogable.

A related concern is that by placing certain rights outside the ambit of those which may be suspended, an incentive may be given to those enacting and interpreting emergency legislation to give non-derogable rights their bare minimum content. This seems to be particularly true in respect of the right to dignity. In fact, it may even be argued that a narrow reading of the right to human dignity, as it appears in the Table of Non-Derogable Rights, is textually mandated. The Table also lists certain sections relating to the rights of arrested, detained and accused persons as non-derogable. But, while FC s 35(2)(d) is specifically enumerated as non-derogable, that is not true of FC s 35(2)(e). FC s 35(2)(e) provides that 'every prisoner has the right to conditions of detention that are consistent with human dignity, including at least exercise and the provision, at state expense, of adequate accommodation, nutrition, reading material and medical treatment.' This omission suggests that the latter provision may be suspended — a conclusion which seems difficult to square with the listing of the right to human dignity, in its entirety, as a non-derogable right.

(d) Rights of detainees

FC ss 37(6)(a) to (h) and 37(7) and (8) regulate detention without trial under a state of emergency. The detail of these regulations, and the protection they afford, is a reflection not only of the fact that detention without trial is generally the hallmark of emergency regimes throughout the world, but that detention without trial was among the most egregious features of apartheid emergency powers. The detention of political opponents of the apartheid state often served to facilitate further violations — torture, cruel, unusual and degrading treatment and, in some cases, disappearance.

Under a constitutionally mandated state of emergency, violations of the sort perpetrated in the past would be much more difficult to achieve: a friend or family member of the detainee must be informed of the detention as soon as is reasonably possible; and a notice in the Government Gazette identifying the detainee, place of detention and the emergency measure under which detention is made must be published within five days of the detention. Access to legal and medical practitioners is guaranteed. Most importantly, the courts' supervision of such detention is entrenched: detention is to be reviewed as soon as reasonably possible, but no later than 10 days after the date of detention. And unless it can be established that the detention is necessary to restore peace and order, the detainee must be released. If not released, the detainee may, after ten days have elapsed, apply for further review: and the same standard for continued detention applies. The detainee has the right to appear personally in court, to be represented by a legal practitioner and to argue against the detention. She must also have access, at least two days prior to the review date, to the state's written reasons for continued detention. These written reasons must also be supplied to the court.[1]

To prevent the type of abuse perpetrated under South Africa's notorious 90 Day Detention Law of 1963, whereby on expiry of such period, detainees were released and simply re-detained,[2] FC s 37(7) provides that, 'if a court releases a detainee, that person may not be detained again on the same grounds unless the state first shows a court good cause for re-detaining that person.'

Finally, FC s 37(8) regulates the treatment of non-South African detainees, detained 'in consequence of on international armed conflict', and guarantees to such persons rights correlative to South Africa's obligations under international humanitarian law. These obligations are primarily to be found in the Hague and the Geneva Conventions.[3] This provision may appear not to warrant much attention — simply underscoring as it does South Africa's international law commitments. However, some of the domestic protections afforded under FC s 37 are more extensive than those guaranteed under international law. This being the case, it is not clear why the exigencies of international armed conflict, whatever the circumstances, justify heightened protection for citizens over permanent or temporary residents, or even visitors.[4]

[1] These protections are all contained in FC s 37(6).

[2] See Ruth First 117 Days: An Account of Confinement and Interrogation Under the South African Ninety-Day Detention Law (New Edition, 1989)(For a personal account of this type of abuse.)

[3] See, for comparison, the protections provided in art 75 of the Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949, and Relating to the Protection of Victims of International Armed Conflicts (Protocol I) (1977) 1125 UNTS 3 (Ratified by South Africa on 21 November 1995.)

[4] For a discussion of the differences between citizens and non-citizens as beneficiaries of fundamental rights, see Stu Woolman 'Application' in Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux, Jonathan Klaaren, Anthony Stein, Matthew Chaskalson & Michael Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service, March 2005) Chapter 31; Jonathan Klaaren 'Freedom of Movement & Residence' in Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux, Jonathan Klaaren, Anthony Stein, Matthew Chaskalson & Michael Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service, March 2007) Chapter 66; Jonathan Klaaren 'Citizenship' in Stuart Woolman, Theunis Roux, Jonathan Klaaren, Anthony Stein, Matthew Chaskalson & Michael Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service, July 2007) Chapter 65.

62

Access to Information

Jonathan Klaaren
Glenn Penfold

Page

62.1 Introduction 62–1
62.2 The relationships between the Constitution, the Access to Informaton Act and other legislation 62–4
(a) The relationship between the Constitution and the AIA and between the Constitution and other legislation. 62–4
(b) The relationship between the AIA and other legislation 62–7
62.3 General structure of the AIA 62–8
62.4 What the AIA is not: data protection legislation. 62–9
62.5 Blanket exclusion of certain records. 62–10
(a) Records requested for criminal or civil proceedings 62–10
(b) Records of Cabinet 62–10
(c) Records of judicial functions of courts 62–11
(d) Records of members of Parliament 62–11
62.6 The distinction between public and private bodies 62–11
62.7 Required for the exercise or protection of any rights. 62–14
62.8 Grounds of refusal. 62–18
(a) Privacy 62–19
(b) Defence, security and international relations 62–21
(c) Operatoins of public bodies 62–22
62.9 Public interest override. 62–24

62.1 INTRODUCTION

Section 23 of the interim Constitution introduced a free-standing right of access to information.[1] The right of access to information is generally treated, in international instruments and foreign legislation dealing with such rights, as a corollary of the right to freedom of expression.[2] The separate and constitutional entrenchment of this right underscores its significance in the South African constitutional order.[3] In addition, this separate right makes it clear that the right is enforceable against the entity holding the information and is not simply a negative freedom to receive and impart information free of interference, which is a frequent interpretation of the right to freedom of expression.[4]

The final Constitution replaced and upgraded the interim Constitution's right of access to information with s 32, which reads as follows:

> '(1) Everyone has the right of access to — > (a) any information held by the state; and
> (b) any information that is held by another person and that is required for the exercise or protection of any rights.
> (2) National legislation must be enacted to give effect to this right, and may provide for reasonable measures to alleviate the administrative and financial burden on the state'.

The right set out in s 32 did not, however, come into operation immediately. The transitional provision in item 23 of Schedule 6 to the final Constitution stipulated that Parliament must enact the legislation referred to in clause 32(2) within 3 years of the commencement of the final Constitution (that is, by 3 February 2000). Prior to such enactment, the right in s 32 was to be read as set out in item 23(2)(a) of Schedule 6, which was essentially the same as the text in s 23 of the interim Constitution.

The right contained in s 32 of the final Constitution significantly expands the right of access to information in two fundamental respects. First, in relation to information held by the state, it applies to all information and removes the proviso in the interim Constitution

[1] Section 23 of the interim Constitution provided that: 'Every person shall have the right of access to all information held by the state or any of its organs at any level of government in so far as such information is required for the exercise or protection of any of his or her rights.' The importance of this constitutional right was underlined by Constitutional Principle IX, which provided that: 'Provision shall be made [in the final Constitution] for freedom of information so that there can be open and accountable administration at all levels of government.'

[2] See, for example, art 19 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 and International Fund for Animal Welfare Inc v R [1989] 35 CRR 359 (Canadian freedom of expression includes access to information pertinent to intended expression). Such a right is specifically included in s 16(1)(b) of the Constitution. For a comparison of the South African rights of freedom of expression and information with those of the international instruments, see L Johannessen 'Freedom of Expression and Information in the New South African Constitution and its Compatibility with International Standards' (1994) 10 SAJHR 216.

[3] Interestingly, a number of formerly communist states have included a separate access to information right in their constitutions. For example, art 24 of the Russian Constitution, 1993 states:

> '(1) It shall be forbidden to gather, store, use and disseminate information on the private life of any person without his/her consent.
> (2) The bodies of state authority and the bodies of local self-government and the officials thereof shall provide to each citizen access to any documents and materials directly affecting his/her rights and liberties unless otherwise stipulated under the law.'

[4] In Leander v Sweden 1987 (9) EHRR 433 at 456, the European Court of Human Rights held that the freedom to receive information in terms of art 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights 'basically prohibits a government from restricting a person from receiving information that others wish or may be willing to impart to him' but does not confer a positive right to personal information held by the state.

that the relevant information must be required for the exercise or protection of rights.[1] Secondly, it expands the reach of the right of access to information to include information held by persons other than the state.

Following the trend towards legislation in a number of other democracies,[2] s 32(2) of the Constitution goes further and obliges Parliament to enact access to information legislation to 'give effect to' the constitutional right. The national legislation envisaged in s 32(2) is the Promotion of Access to Information Act,[3] which was enacted on the day of the deadline, 3 February 2000.[4] Broadly speaking, the AIA provides for access to records held by both public and private bodies, and sets out the grounds on which disclosure must or may be refused and the manner in which such grounds may be overridden in the public interest, as well as mechanisms for the resolution of disputes over access, notably judicial review.

What are the rationales for a right of access to information?[5] The most significant argues that there is a fundamental connection between access to information and South Africa's effort to create a constitutional democracy based fundamentally on the principle of openness and transparency.[6] Access to relevant information is fundamental to meaningful participation in the democratic process and to ensure that government is accountable to the governed.[7] This 'good government' or 'open democracy' rationale has also been identified by the

[1] As G E Devenish, K Govender & H Hulme state in Administrative Law and Justice in South Africa (2001) 189, in relation to access to information held by the state: 'Section 23 of the Interim Constitution provides for access to information on a need to know as opposed to a right to know, whereas the 1996 Constitution provides for the latter.'

[2] In addition to the American Freedom of Information Act see, for example, the Australian Freedom of Information Act, 1982; the Canadian Access to Information Act, 1980; the New Zealand Official Information Act, 1982; and the recently enacted United Kingdom Freedom of Information Act, 2000 (which will take full effect in 2005).

[3] Act 2 of 2000 ('the AIA'). For a discussion of the drafting history of the AIA, previously called the Open Democracy Bill, see J White 'Open Democracy: Has the Window of Opportunity Closed?' (1998) 14 SAJHR 65; and Iain Currie & Jonathan Klaaren The Promotion of Access to Information Act Commentary (2002) paras 1.3–1.12 ('AIA Commentary').

[4] The AIA did not immediately come into force. Section 93(1) provided that it would come into operation on a date determined by the President in the Government Gazette. The President brought the AIA, save for ss 10, 14, 16 and 51, into force on 9 March 2001 in terms of Government Notice 22125, R20 of 2001. Those sections were brought into force on 15 February 2002 in terms of Government Notice R9 of 2002 GG 23119. The Judicial Matters Amendment Act 42 of 2001 made a series of textual corrections to the Act.

In the period between 4 February 2000 and 9 March 2001 it appears that the wording set out in Schedule 6 continued in force (see Minister of Public Works v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 652 (CC) at para 53 in relation to administrative action). See also Nextcom (Pty) Ltd v Funde NO & others 2000 (4) SA 491 (T) at 503, which held that, as the AIA had been assented to but was not yet in force, the applicable constitutional right of access to information was that set out in Schedule 6 to the Constitution.

[5] For a detailed discussion of the rationales for the protection of access to information, see L Johannessen, J Klaaren & J White 'A Motivation for Access to Information Legislation' (1995) 112 SALJ 45. See also AIA Commentary paras 2.2–2.5.

[6] See, for example, Qozeleni v Minister of Law and Order & another 1994 (3) SA 625 (E) at 642: 'Section 23 [of the interim Constitution] is . . . a necessary adjunct to an open democratic society committed to the principles of openness and accountability.' See also Khala v Minister of Safety and Security 1994 (4) SA 218 (W) at 225, 1994 (2) BCLR 89 (W): '[T]he purpose of s 23 is to enable a person to gain access to information held by the State in order to create, and thereafter to maintain, an open and democratic society.' This rationale of open and accountable administration is also emphasized in the wording of Constitutional Principle IX.

[7] E Mureinik 'Reconsidering Review: Participation and Accountability' (1993) Acta Juridica 35 states that transparency serves the dual purpose of promoting public accountability as well as greater public participation in government.

Constitutional Court as underpinning the access to information right.[1] In other words, access to information is fundamental to a proper functioning participatory democracy. Another rationale, self-actualization, argues that access to information about oneself is necessary in order to gain self-knowledge and indeed to constitute oneself. A further rationale for freedom of information is that access to information is vital to protecting a person's other rights and interests (including, for example, the constitutional rights to privacy and equality).

The need for open and accountable government is particularly important given South Africa's recent past. This was characterized by extreme levels of government secrecy in which vital decisions were taken behind closed doors on the basis of documents to which the public (including persons whose rights or interests were detrimentally affected by the relevant decisions) could not have access. During the years of apartheid a number of legislative and other legal devices were used to withhold information or restrict access to information.[2] The complete set of these rationales does not serve in the same manner to explain the right of access to information in private hands. In the private sector the justification for the right of access may lie more with the self-actualization and rights-based rationales, essentially more with promoting and supplementing rights than with enhancing democracy.[3]

In this chapter we begin by analysing the relationship between the Constitution, other legislation and the AIA. After a brief examination of the general structure of the AIA we discuss the few blanket exclusions from most of its provisions. This is followed by a discussion of the distinction between public and private bodies for purposes of access to information and an analysis of the fundamental requirement for access to private information — 'required for the exercise or protection of any rights'. We then examine a few of the grounds of non-disclosure under the AIA and the Act's public interest override. While this chapter adopts a constitutional perspective, it does, to some extent, necessitate an analysis of some of the provisions of the AIA. The detailed provisions of this Act are fundamentally important as it is these provisions that will form the real battleground for the protection of the constitutional right of access to information.

From the point of view of Bill of Rights jurisprudence, the most dramatic effect of the Act is that it removes most access to information litigation from direct Bill of Rights control. In other words, from the time of implementation of the Act, most cases in this area will involve statutory causes of action and the application of statutory rights and remedies and will no longer involve the direct application of the Bill of Rights.

[1] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 83.

[2] For example, the Official Secrets Act 16 of 1956, the Protection of Information Act 84 of 1982, the Nuclear Energy Act 92 of 1982 and the Internal Security Act 44 of 1950. See generally, A S Matthews The Darker Reaches of Government: Access to Information About Public Administration in Three Societies (1978).

[3] See AIA Commentary paras 2.6–2.9.

62.2 THE RELATIONSHIPS BETWEEN THE CONSTITUTION, THE ACCESS TO INFORMATION ACT AND OTHER LEGISLATION

(a) The relationship between the Constitution and the AIA and between the Constitution and other legislation

In terms of s 32(2) of the Constitution the AIA was enacted 'to give effect to' the constitutional right to access to information. The AIA therefore provides a legislative basis for access to information and the starting point for access applications will be the Act itself. The question here is, what role does the constitutional right continue to play?

One approach would be that the AIA is now the sole basis of the constitutional right and that the right itself has no further application. This would be the case if 'give effect to' was read to mean 'created by'. This approach should, however, be rejected on the basis (among others) that it would be anomalous to include the right of access to information as a fundamental right in an entrenched Bill of Rights only to enable the substance of the right to be altered by simple legislative amendment. It may be consistent with constitutional democratic theory to give Parliament the ability to flesh out the detail of a fundamental right, but not to construct the very meaning of the right.[1]

The better argument is that the AIA gives effect to the right in the sense of making the right more effective through providing a detailed elaboration of both the scope and content of the informational rights, as well as providing an institutional framework for their implementation and enforcement.[2] The thrust of this argument is that the constitutional right continues to exist, notwithstanding the enactment of the AIA. In other words, there is a freestanding constitutional right of access to information.

There appear to be three ways in which the constitutional right will continue to play a role: to challenge the constitutionality of the AIA itself; to challenge other legislation passed after the AIA; and to assist in interpreting the provisions of the AIA.[3] Additionally, there may be rare instances of direct application. Each of these roles for the constitutional right of access is discussed in turn below.

First, the most dramatic use of the constitutional right would be to challenge the constitutionality of the AIA itself. Currie & Klaaren divide these potential challenges to the AIA into two categories: 'underinclusive' and 'overrestrictive' challenges.[4] Possible attacks on the AIA on the basis that it is underinclusive may include the blanket exclusion of Cabinet records and records held by members of Parliament in their capacity as such, as well as the fact that the Act only applies to recorded information. Overrestrictive challenges to the Act could be founded on the basis that the procedures that the Act imposes for the exercise of rights are overly burdensome. This may include the fees payable for access.

[1] AIA Commentary paras 2.12–2.13.

[2] This is the view favoured by Currie & Klaaren AIA Commentary para 2.12. In addition, it finds support in the Constitutional Court's judgment in Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC). During the course of its judgment the court held (at para 83) that the reason for the suspension of the right of access in terms of item 23 of Schedule 6 was 'a means of affording Parliament time to provide the necessary legislative framework for the implementation of the right to information. Freedom of information legislation usually involves detailed and complex provisions defining the nature and limits of the right and the requisite conditions for its enforcement.'

[3] For a detailed discussion of these uses of the constitutional right, see AIA Commentary paras 2.13–2.15.

[4] AIA Commentary para 2.15.

It is unclear what approach our courts will adopt to assessing the constitutionality of the AIA. One argument is to treat the AIA in the same manner as other parliamentary legislation, that is, the AIA is unconstitutional if it infringes the rights in s 32(1), unless such infringement is reasonable and justifiable in accordance with the Constitution's general limitation clause. Another approach is to afford the legislature a greater degree of deference in relation to the AIA. There are essentially two reasons for this: the AIA, unlike most other legislation, is constitutionally mandated to give effect to a fundamental right; and s 32(2) expressly provides that this legislation 'may provide for reasonable measures to alleviate the administrative and financial burden on the state'.[1] Klaaren suggests a two-tiered approach to adjudication of the AIA's constitutionality.[2] In terms of this approach the provisions of the AIA can be divided into two categories: those which define and detail substantive rights, and those which set out procedures and structures to enforce the relevant rights. While some extra deference is due to the legislature in relation to the latter, no special deference is due for the former. As Klaaren states:[3]

> 'Where Parliament enjoys extra authority mandated by the text of the Constitution, it should receive greater deference. However, since this extra enforcement power does not extend to Parliament's interpretative authority over the rights, Parliament receives no extra deference there.'

Regardless of the approach, in the event of a court finding that a provision of the AIA unconstitutionally fails to give effect to the constitutional right of access to information, the appropriate remedy would be for the court to allow Parliament a specified period within which to remedy the defect. A judicial approach in terms of which Parliament is required properly to give effect to the right within a set time would be consistent with the scheme provided for in the Constitution itself (that is, that Parliament was required to enact the relevant legislation within a period of three years). The issue of individual relief in the particular circumstances would, of course, need to be considered as well.

Secondly, the constitutional right could be used to challenge legislation enacted after the AIA which unjustifiably limits the right. Although the AIA prevails over previous legislation which is materially inconsistent with its objects or provisions,[4] the same cannot be said of subsequent inconsistent legislation. While every effort should be made to interpret the AIA and other subsequent legislation consistently, some such legislation may well be truly inconsistent. Such legislation can only be challenged by the constitutional right itself.

Finally, the constitutional right to access to information remains a valuable tool for the interpretation of the provisions of the AIA. In interpreting the Act, it should always be borne in mind that it is intended to give effect to the rights set out in s 32 of the Constitution. This is reiterated in the preamble to the Act and s 9, which states that the objects of the Act include

[1] It should be noted that the latter provision only indicates special deference in relation to burdens on the state, and not other non-state entities.

[2] J Klaaren 'Constitutional Authority to Enforce the Rights of Administrative Justice and Access to Information' (1997) 13 SAJHR 549.

[3] J Klaaren 'Constitutional Authority to Enforce the Rights of Administrative Justice and Access to Information' (1997) 13 SAJHR 549 at 563.

[4] Section 5 of the AIA.

giving effect to the constitutional right and promoting transparency, accountability and good governance of both public and private bodies.[1]

It could also be argued that the constitutional right to just administrative action may be used as a residual right to obtain access to information which would not be available under the AIA. This could include, for example, obtaining access to information which is not in recorded form. It may also include direct adjudication of the application of the right of access to information to organs of state such as Cabinet, the records of which are exempt from the AIA. This would apply to all instances of overrestrictive challenges and may be attractive to courts as it obviates the need to strike down provisions of the AIA. In addition, the constitutional right may be relied on directly in circumstances where a particular piece of information is not being requested. This may include access to information through physical access such as where the media requests access to courts and tribunals for purposes of obtaining information and access to an event.[2]

Courts should, in our view, resist directly invoking a residual constitutional right in circumstances where the AIA itself fails to 'give effect to' the constitutional right apart from in exceptional circumstances. First, the residual right approach undermines the role of Parliament, which the Constitution specifically contemplates as the body which is required to 'give effect to' the constitutional right. Whatever individual relief may be granted, the focus of a proper remedy would rather be for a court to order that Parliament rectify the position and give effect to the right through a suitable amendment to the AIA. Secondly, if applied generally, the residual right approach could create anomalies where the substantive law under the Constitution could differ from that under the AIA. Moreover, reliance on the residual right would create the anomaly that the procedural requirements of the AIA would not apply where the constitutional right itself is invoked (for example, the internal appeal procedure of the AIA would not apply).

Nonetheless, in some instances, direct application of the constitutional right may be appropriate to adjudicate an access to information matter. Our conclusion on this issue differs from our conclusion with respect to the constitutional right of just administrative action, where we do not see any such rare instances. The difference between our conclusions is really the result of a major textual difference between s 32 and the AIA, on the one hand, and s 33 and the AJA, on the other. The AIA is not like the AJA in that there is no equivalent in the AIA of the definition of 'administrative action' which sets the limits of enforceability of the rights to reasonable, fair and lawful administrative action. The AIA has been built around the concept of a 'record' not the concept of 'information held by the State'.[3] The lack of a precise statutory parallel in the AIA of the constitutional text in s 32 leaves room for rare instances of direct application.

A particular difficulty (and one instance where the right potentially directly applies) arises as a result of the fact that the AIA only applies to recorded information. An entity may have within its knowledge certain information that will not necessarily be recorded. A particular decision, for example, may not have been reduced to writing (or recorded in any manner). Information may be capable of being recorded but may not yet be compiled. In certain circumstances the information may not yet be in existence. For example, the media may request access to a particular tribunal where the oral evidence will only be adduced in the future.[1] Alternatively, the media may wish to have access to an event in order to record the event itself in some form. In such instances the AIA as currently drafted will not assist them.

[1] See also s 2(1) of the AIA, which directs that a court interpreting a provision of the Act 'must prefer any reasonable interpretation of the provision that is consistent with the objects of this Act over any alternative interpretation that is inconsistent with those objects'.

[2] See In re Application NBC 635 F2d 945 (2d Cir 1980) (television networks entitled to copy and disseminate videotapes entered in evidence at a criminal trial subject to the orderly conduct of the trial).

[3] See AIA Commentary para 2.13.

The question of the constitutional right's application then arises. As we see it, there are three possible approaches to this issue. First, one could argue that the constitutional right of access to information, properly construed, only applies to recorded information. This argument would probably emphasize the use of the term 'held' in s 32(1) together with the term 'information'. Unless a particular piece of 'information' has been reduced to a physical form, it cannot be 'held'. 'Information held' would thus mean information that already exists in physical form. A second approach would be to accept that s 32(1) contemplates access to all types of information, but to argue that Parliament's decision to limit the right to recorded information, through the mechanism of the AIA, amounts to a justifiable limitation on the constitutional right. If this is the case, the AIA is constitutional and adequately gives effect to the right of access to information. While the first of these approaches is unsatisfactory as it depends upon a rather strained purposive interpretation, the second is not entirely satisfactory either. In particular, access to information through physical access — a form of access to information that was at least partially catered for in the Open Democracy Bill in the sections on open meetings — may mean that the Act is significantly underinclusive. In addition to direct adjudication in these exceptional circumstances an appropriate remedy might direct Parliament to draft legislation giving effect to this dimension of the right of access to information.

In another particular difficulty (and a second potential instance of direct application of the right) the AIA exempts from its ambit records of the Cabinet and the judiciary, for instance. But this does not mean that the Cabinet and judiciary are not bound to give effect to the right. Their Act exemption (which is a limited one) just indicates that these bodies do not have to respond to AIA requests for records. In our view, the argument that in exceptional cases the right of access to information may be directly applied to the Cabinet is a plausible and persuasive one.[2] Likewise, one may rely on the constitutional right to challenge the laws and practices of the courts in relation to access to their records.

(b) The relationship between the AIA and other legislation

Two provisions of the AIA deal with the relationship between the AIA and other legislation. Section 5 provides that the AIA applies to the exclusion of other legislative provisions that

[1] In the latter case the constitutional right to freedom of expression would appear to be more appropriate as the information to be divulged cannot be said to be 'held' for purposes of s 32 of the Constitution (see, for example, Dotcom Trading 121 (Pty) Ltd t/a Live Africa Network News v King NO & others 2000 (4) SA 973 (C), which held that the blanket exclusion of broadcasting of the King Commission of Inquiry was contrary to s 16(1)(a) of the Constitution; see also South Africa Broadcasting Corporation & others v The Public Protector & others (unreported, TPD case no 13992/2001, relating to broadcasting of the arms deal investigations)).

[2] See below, 62–10. See also AIA Commentary para 4.17.

prohibit or restrict disclosure and that are 'materially inconsistent' with the AIA. It therefore appears that if another piece of legislation is materially inconsistent with the AIA, the provisions of the AIA will apply to the exclusion of such other legislation. Section 6 of the AIA makes it clear that the provisions of the Act do not restrict the application of other legislation set out in the schedules which provide for access to information.[1]

62.3 General Structure of the AIA

The AIA provides for requests for access to all records held by public bodies and those records held by private bodies which are 'required for the exercise or protection of any rights'.[2] The Act therefore generally follows the distinction set out in s 32(1)(a) and (b) of the Constitution, although the distinction between the state and other persons is replaced by a distinction between public and private bodies.[3]

The AIA could perhaps have been more accurately titled the Promotion of Access to Records Act. A 'record' is defined in s 1 of the AIA as recorded information, regardless of form or medium, in the possession or under the control of the relevant body, whether or not it was created by that body. Section 4 of the Act goes on to provide that every record in the possession or under the control of an official of, or an independent contractor engaged by, a body is regarded as being a record of such body. Accordingly, although the AIA only applies to recorded information, it is clear that it extends to a wide range of recorded information.

Requests for access to records must be made to the information officer of the public body or the head of the private body. The relevant person must then consider the request within the stipulated time period and, in certain circumstances, must notify affected third parties of the request and allow such third parties to make representations as to whether the request should be granted.[4] If the requester is dissatisfied with a refusal of access by a department of state or administration in any sphere of government, he or she must follow the internal appeal procedure provided in the AIA.[5] In addition, a dissatisfied requester can, on application, appeal a decision to refuse access to a court.[6]

The AIA then sets out a number of mandatory and discretionary grounds for refusal of requests for access to records of both public and private bodies. If the request for a record falls within a ground of refusal, the body that holds the record must or may refuse to disclose it, unless the public interest override applies.[7]

[1] The only legislation currently listed in the schedule are the National Environmental Management Act 107 of 1998 and the Finance Intelligence Centre Act 38 of 2001. For a detailed discussion of the operation of this provision to other legislation not listed in the schedule, see AIA Commentary paras 3.5–3.7.

[2] Sections 11(1) and 50(1) in relation to public and private bodies respectively.

[3] See below, § 62.6.

[4] The third-party notification and intervention procedures are set out in Chapter 5 of Part 2 and Part 3 of the AIA (ss 47–49 and 71–73).

[5] Chapter 1 of Part 4 (ss 74–77).

[6] Chapter 2 of Part 4 (ss 78–82). Section 79 provides that the Rules Board for Courts of Law must, within 12 months from the date on which that section came into force (that is, 9 March 2001), make and implement rules of procedure for the hearing of access to information appeals by the High Court and designated magistrates' courts. Prior to the implementation of such rules, applications may be lodged with a High Court or a court of similar status.

[7] Sections 46 and 70. See below, § 62.9.

The AIA additionally places some positive duties on public and private bodies to produce manuals identifying the types of records held by the body in order to facilitate requests and to encourage the Act's goal of participation and accountability.[1]

62.4 WHAT THE AIA IS NOT: DATA PROTECTION LEGISLATION

Prior to embarking on a more detailed discussion of the provisions of the AIA, it is important to point out what the AIA is not. It is not a data protection or privacy statute, like those which apply in a number of other jurisdictions,[2] which protects the right to privacy and other interests in data. Typically, data protection legislation performs three functions: it prevents unauthorized disclosure and use of private information; it allows for the correction of personal information held by another body; and it allows for access to one's own information (that is, for personal requesters). The focus of such legislation is on the protection of privacy and not on access to information.

The AIA does contain certain elements of data protection legislation in that it allows for personal requesters (defined as a requester seeking personal information about him- or herself) to obtain access to information. In addition, s 88 provides that public and private bodies must take reasonable steps to establish 'adequate and appropriate internal measures' providing for the correction of personal information, 'until legislation providing for such correction takes effect'.

Nevertheless, the AIA does not contain a general prohibition on the disclosure of certain categories of information. Rather, it is a request-driven statute which merely provides for mandatory grounds of non-disclosure in relation to requests under the Act.[3] The role of privacy in the AIA is merely a restriction (albeit a mandatory one) on the right of access to information.[4] In circumstances where private information is disclosed beyond the parameters of the AIA, affected persons would rather need to rely on the common law relating to breaches of privacy as well as the constitutional right to privacy.[5] The South African Law Commission is currently compiling a report with a view to preparing separate data protection legislation.

[1] See, for example, s 14 and s 51.

[2] See, for example, the United Kingdom Data Protection Act, 1984 and the Canadian Privacy Act, 1985. See also the OECD Guidelines on the Protection of Privacy and Transborder Flows of Personal Information, 1980 and the Council of Europe Convention for the Protection of Individuals with regard to Automatic Processing of Personal Data, 1981.

[3] This creates the somewhat anomalous situation that a head of a private body or information officer is obliged, in certain circumstances, not to disclose information requested under the AIA. Nevertheless, the same person may disclose such information voluntarily where there has been no such request (for example, when data is transferred within a corporate group or to business partners). This, of course, also opens the way for abuse by bodies informally granting requests outside the Act, to the detriment of legitimate third-party interests.

[4] See below, § 62.8*(a)*.

[5] Privacy protection provisions were included in the initial version of the AIA, that is, Part IV the Open Democracy Bill, but were excluded at a later stage.

62.5 BLANKET EXCLUSION OF CERTAIN RECORDS

The AIA excludes certain categories of records from its application. Such exclusions have important consequences for the right of access to information as they have the effect that these categories of records may not be requested under the AIA even if the public interest override applies. We will briefly discuss each of these exclusions in turn.

(a) Records requested for criminal or civil proceedings

Section 7(1) of the AIA stipulates that the Act does not apply to a record that is requested for purposes of pending criminal or civil proceedings, where the production of or access to that record is provided for in any other law.[1] This provision relates to both public and private body requests. The provision indicates that the AIA was intended to have no impact on the current rules relating to discovery and compulsion of evidence at criminal and civil trials.[2] There are three elements that will have to be satisfied for s 7 to apply: the request must be for the purpose of proceedings, the request must be after the commencement of such proceedings, and the production of the records must be provided for in another law.[3]

In a case decided before the AIA, Inkatha Freedom Party & another v Truth and Reconciliation Commission & others,[4] Davis J had 'serious doubts' as to whether the constitutional right of access to information could be used to justify a principle of discovery before the time provided in the Court Rules, which 'would mean that a defendant who falls within the scope of s 32 [of the interim Constitution] must lay bare its entire case before any action is in fact launched'. While discovery is not so extended, since the exemption applies only where litigation has commenced and since reasons for requests to public bodies do not need to be furnished, the use of the AIA in pre-discovery contexts cannot be ruled out.

(b) Records of Cabinet

Section 12*(a)* provides that the AIA does not apply to records of the Cabinet and its committees. The purpose of this exclusion appears to be to perpetuate the Westminster tradition of Cabinet secrecy, a part of which is that the Cabinet as a whole is indivisibly responsible for the body's actions. As discussed above, this complete exclusion of a certain category of records from the application of the Act may arguably be unconstitutional.[5] There

[1] Section 7(2) goes on to provide that any record obtained in a manner which contravenes s 7(1) is not admissible in the relevant criminal or civil proceedings, unless the exclusion of such record would, in the court's opinion, be detrimental to the interests of justice.

[2] The Judicial Matters Amendment Bill [B43-2001] intends to amend s 7 and the index of the AIA to make it clear that the section applies to records requested and not records required.

[3] Discovery is currently provided for in Rule 35 of the Uniform Rules of the High Court and Rule 23 of the Magistrates' Court Rules. Generally speaking, discovery can only be obtained after the close of pleadings.

[4] 2000 (3) SA 119 (C) at 135–6. It should, however, be noted that s 7(1) only applies to requests made after commencement of proceedings, whereas Davis J was dealing with pre-action discovery.

[5] See AIA Commentary para 4.17, where the authors express the view that this provision is not unconstitutional. A similar exclusion is contained in s 34 of the Australian Freedom of Information Act, 1982. See also J White 'Open Democracy: Has the Window of Opportunity Closed?' (1998) 14 SAJHR 65 at 73, who argues that this exclusion is unconstitutional.

seems little justification for treating Cabinet records with such a degree of secrecy. In a legal system in which the right of access to all information held by the state is constitutionally protected, Cabinet should at least be required to disclose its records where the public interest in disclosure outweighs the instrumental value of Cabinet secrecy.[1] It is unacceptable for Cabinet secrecy, in effect, always to trump the right of access to information, particularly given the fact that such information goes to the heart of democratic decision-making.

(c) Records of judicial functions of courts

The AIA does not apply to a record of the 'judicial functions' of a court referred to in s 166 of the Constitution,[2] a special tribunal established in terms of s 2 of the Special Investigating Units and Special Tribunals Act[3] or a judicial officer of such court or tribunal.[4] The relevant judicial functions are not defined in the Act. It is submitted that they should be restricted to those functions of the judiciary that relate to the hearing or the determination of legal proceedings.[5]

(d) Records of members of Parliament

The AIA does not apply to a record held by an individual member of Parliament or of a provincial legislature 'in that capacity'.[6] For similar reasons to those discussed in relation to the Cabinet exclusion, this exclusion may be unconstitutional.

62.6 The Distinction between Public and Private Bodies

For purposes of deciding on requests for access to information the AIA adopts the distinction between a public and private body.[7] The definition of a 'public body' is substantially similar to the definition of an organ of state in s 239 of the Constitution, and reads as follows:

[1] In the English case of Attorney-General v Jonathan Cape Ltd [1996] QB 752 the Attorney-General sought to restrain a former Cabinet member from publishing an account of various Cabinet discussions, on the basis that such disclosure would amount to a breach of a duty of confidence. Lord Widgery CJ held that, although Cabinet discussions were confidential, the government's interest in maintaining confidence had to be balanced with the public interest in the freedom to impart information in a democratic society. In other words, the public interest in protecting Cabinet confidences was not indefinite.

[2] Section 166 of the Constitution lists the Constitutional Court, the Supreme Court of Appeal, the High Courts, the magistrates' courts and 'any other court established or recognized in terms of an Act of Parliament'.

[3] Act 74 of 1996.

[4] Section 12*(b)* of the AIA.

[5] See AIA Commentary para 4.18.

[6] Section 12*(c)* of the AIA.

[7] This distinction is different to the distinction between 'the state' and other bodies contained in s 32(1) of the Constitution. It is arguable that the state, properly construed, does not include all public bodies (see Inkatha Freedom Party & another v Truth and Reconciliation Commission & others 2000 (3) SA 119 (C) at 133, 2000 (5) BCLR 553 (C): '[T]he definition of organ of State in the 1996 Constitution expands the definition beyond [institutions which form part of the state] for it includes within the definition those institutions or functionaries who might otherwise be outside of the State but which exercise public power.' Davis J therefore concluded that the TRC was an organ of state even though it 'is not under the direct control of central government'). For example, an institution which performs a public regulatory function may be independent of the state. This development extends the effect of the right to access to information and is to be welcomed.

'(a) any department of state or administration in the national or provincial sphere of government or any municipality in the local sphere of government; or

(b) any other functionary or institution when —

(i) exercising a power or performing a duty in terms of the Constitution or a provincial constitution; or

(ii) exercising a public power or performing a public function in terms of any legislation.'

Paragraph (a) of the definition would include, for example, the Department of Agriculture and a local municipality.[1] Paragraph (b)(i) would include the Judicial Service Commission and the Auditor-General.[2] Paragraph (b)(ii) expands the scope of public bodies much wider and would cover entities such as the Financial Services Board, the Independent Communications Authority of South Africa and other entities exercising public power or performing public functions in terms of legislation.[3] This could include, for example, financial exchanges, universities and parastatals such as Eskom, Telkom and Transnet.[4]

In relation to the latter category it is important to note that s 8(1) of the AIA provides that such a public body may in one instance be a private body and in another a public body, depending on whether the relevant record relates to the exercise of a function as a public body or as a private body.[5] For such bodies the distinction between a public and private body is therefore less important. The important enquiry is rather whether the function to which the record relates is a public or private one.[6]

The crucial question in establishing whether a body, other than a state department or constitutional body, is a public or private body is therefore whether it is 'exercising a public power of performing a public function in terms of legislation'.

In light of the similarity between the definition of public body and that of organ of state in the Constitution it may be useful to have regard to the number of cases relating to the meaning of 'organ of state' under the interim Constitution. Although there was some initial

[1] See also Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality 2001 (3) SA 925 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC) at para 27 (the Independent Electoral Commission is not an organ of state within the national sphere of government).

[2] The Truth and Reconciliation Commission would arguably fall within this category (see Davis J in Inkatha Freedom Party & another v Truth and Reconciliation Commission & others 2000 (3) SA 119 (C), 2000 (5) BCLR 553 (C), holding that the TRC forms part of the state for purposes of the access to information clause). Davis J at 131–2 emphasized that, amongst other things, the commissioners are appointed by the President, s 41 of the Promotion of National Unity and Reconciliation Act 34 of 1995 provides that the State Liability Act 20 of 1957 applies to the Commission, and the TRC's function was mandated by the postscript to the interim Constitution.

[3] See Nextcom (Pty) Ltd v Funde NO & others 2000 (4) SA 491 (T) at 503, where the court held that the South African Telecommunications Regulatory Authority (the predecessor to ICASA in relation to the regulation of telecommunications) amounted to an organ of state.

[4] See Hoffman v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC).

[5] Section 8(1) provides for the same position in relation to private bodies. Section 8(1), however, does not apply to those public bodies falling within paras (a) and (b)(i) of the definition and applies only to para (b)(ii). This is important as it would arguably be unconstitutional for s 8(1) to apply to government departments as this would, in effect, mean that a requester would, in certain instances, be entitled to access to information held by the state only where it is necessary to exercise or protect rights. If this were the case, the AIA would not properly give effect to the right in s 32(1)(a) of the Constitution. To the extent that any body falling under para (b)(ii) of the definition constitutes part of 'the state', the operation of s 8(1) could be constitutionally problematic.

[6] This enquiry will often be a difficult one, particularly where a record may be prepared or kept for numerous purposes, some of which are public and others are private. Additionally, the requester may face an issue in choosing which forms (public body request or private body request) to use. Requests may of course be made in the alternative.

disagreement, our courts generally adopted the control test as to whether an institution amounted to an organ of state for purposes of the interim Constitution. In terms of this test an institution, which was not a state department, was an organ of state if it fell under the control of the state in one way or another.[1] It is, however, important to bear in mind that, whereas the interim Constitution defined an organ of state as 'any statutory body or functionary', both the final Constitution and the AIA shift the focus to the public nature of the function or power.[2] Accordingly, the cases decided under the interim Constitution are only of limited assistance in determining whether a body amounts to 'public body' under the AIA.[3] The focus should rather be on whether the function or power performed by the relevant entity is public in nature.[4]

An important consideration in assessing whether a body is exercising a public power or performing a public function in terms of legislation is whether the institution is obliged to act in the public interest. As Lawrence Baxter states,[5] discussing whether an institution is a 'public authority':

> 'Ultimately we are driven to an assessment of whether the institution concerned is under a duty to act in the public interest and not simply to its own private advantage.'

This emphasis on public interest is also consistent with the judgement of the Witwaterstrand Local Division in Goodman Bros (Pty) Ltd v Transnet Ltd.[6]

An additional issue will be whether the public function is exercised 'in terms of national legislation'. For instance, the function of providing universal service in terms of a cellphone licence granted to a private body in terms of telecommunications legislation may not be a function undertaken 'in terms of' that legislation but rather undertaken in terms of the licence.

[1] See, for example, Directory Advertising Cost Cutters v Minister for Posts, Telecommunications and Broadcasting & others 1996 (3) SA 800 (T); Oostelike Gauteng Dienste Raad v Transvaal Munisipale Pensione Fonds 1997 (8) BCLR 1066 (T). See above, ch 10 'Application' for a detailed discussion of these cases.

[2] Section 233(1)(x) of the interim Constitution. See Y Burns Administrative Law under the 1996 Constitution (1998); and see I M Rautenbach & E F T Malherbe Constitutional Law 2 ed (1996) 299.

[3] See, however, Nextcom (Pty) Ltd v Funde NO & others 2000 (4) SA 491 (T) at 503, which applied the control test in finding that SATRA constituted an organ of State under the final Constitution. See also Hoffman v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC) and Korf v Health Professions Council of South Africa 2000 (1) SA 1171 (T) at 1177, in which Van Dijkhorst J held that the definition in the final Constitution was not intended to differ materially from that under the interim Constitution and the control test thus remained determinative.

[4] A useful analysis of the term 'public function' is set out in De Smith, Woolf & Jowell Judicial Review of Administrative Action 5 ed (1995) at 167–8: 'A body is performing a "public function" when it seeks to achieve some collective benefit for the public or a section of the public and is accepted by the public or that section of the public as having authority to do so. Bodies therefore exercise public functions when they intervene or participate in social or economic affairs in the public interest. This may happen in a wide variety of ways. For instance, a body is performing a public function when it provides "public goods" or other collective services, such as health care, education and personal social services, from funds raised by taxation. A body may perform public functions in the form of adjudicatory services . . . They also do so if they regulate commercial and professional activities to ensure compliance with proper standards.'

[5] Administrative Law 100.

[6] 1998 (4) SA 989 (W). In this case Blieden J, in concluding that Transnet amounted to an 'organ of state' in terms of s 239 of the Constitution, stated at 995–6: 'Of particular importance are the provisions of ss 15 and 17 of [the Legal Succession to the South African Transport Services Act 9 of 1989], that the respondent is required to provide a service "that is in the public interest" and can be directed by the Minister not to act contrary to the strategic or economic interests of the Republic. In my view, this brings it squarely within the definition of an organ of State as required by s 239 of the Constitution in that it performs a public function in terms of the relevant legislation.'

62.7 REQUIRED FOR THE EXERCISE OR PROTECTION OF ANY RIGHTS

Section 50(1) of the AIA, following the lead of the constitutional right, provides that one can only obtain access under the Act to the record of a private body if such record is 'required for the exercise or protection of any rights'. The existence of a right and a link between the request and the protection or promotion of that right is therefore necessary in order to obtain access to a record of a private body.

The term 'rights' should not be limited to constitutional rights but should rather be read widely as including all legal rights whether constitutional, statutory or arising in common law. This was the position taken by Cameron J in Van Niekerk v City Council of Pretoria,[1] which was subsequently endorsed by the Supreme Court of Appeal.[2]

In another respect the term 'rights' could be broadly interpreted, namely, it should include circumstances where the state has unilaterally incurred liability without establishing a contractual nexus between the individual and the state.[3] In this case the term 'rights' moves closer to the meaning of legitimate expectations.

The other important term in relation to private bodies is 'required'. Several different interpretations of this term are possible.[4] Although often textually linked to the term 'required', the interpretations vary in their treatment of two analytically distinct ideas: the element of need and the element of relevance.[5] For present purposes, the element of need is most important. A strict interpretation of this element would demand that the information be necessary for the exercise or protection of a right. A more expansive interpretation would demand that the information be 'reasonably required', where all the circumstances promoting

[1] 1997 (3) SA 839 (T).

[2] The Cape Metropolitan Council v Metro Inspection Services (Western Cape) CC & others 2001 (3) SA 1013 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1026 (SCA) at para 27. During the course of his judgment Cameron J described the previous decision in Directory Advertising Cost Cutters v Minister for Posts, Telecommunications and Broadcasting & others 1996 (3) SA 800 (T), which held that 'rights' was limited to constitutional rights, as 'clearly wrong'. For the protection of at least statutory rights, see Van Huyssteen & others v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism & others 1996 (1) SA 283 (C) at 300B–E, 1995 (9) BCLR 1191 (C) and Balmoral Investments (Edms) Bpk v Minister van Mineraal- en Energiesake en andere 1995 (9) BCLR 1104 (NC) (treating a statutory right of appeal under s 57(1) of the Minerals Act 50 of 1991 as falling within the category of rights protected by IC s 23, but finding that no such right of appeal existed against the action of a Regional Director). See also Aquafund (Pty) Ltd v Premier of the Province of the Western Cape 1997 (7) BCLR 907 (C) at 913E–F; NISEC (Edms) Bpk v Western Cape Provincial Tender Board & others 1998 (3) SA 228 (C), 1997 (3) BCLR 367 (C) at 374H; ABBM Printing and Publishing (Pty) Ltd v Transnet Ltd 1998 (2) SA 109 (W), 1997 (10) BCLR 1429 (W) (contractual and delictual rights).

[3] See the discussion of Premier, Mpumalanga, & another v Executive Committee, Association of State-Aided Schools, Eastern Transvaal 1999 (2) SA 91 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 151 (CC) at 106n10. See below, ch 25 'Just Administrative Action'.

[4] Shabala v Attorney-General, Transvaal & another; Gumede & others v Attorney-General, Transvaal 1995 (1) SA 608 (T) at 624C–D, 1994 (6) BCLR 85 (T): 'the word "required" is capable of a number of meanings ranging from "desired" through "necessary" to "indispensable" . . . To my mind, "required" in s 23 conveys an element of need: the information does not have to be essential, but it certainly has to be more than "useful" . . . or "relevant" . . . or simply "desired".'

[5] For a detailed discussion of both the elements of need and relevance, and support for a generous approach to both elements, see the previous edition of this chapter. A strict interpretation of the element of relevance might demand that the information be personally relevant to the person asserting the right of access rather than relevant to the exercise or protection of that person's rights. A generous interpretation of this element would demand only that the information be relevant to the exercise or protection of the relevant right. The generous interpretation is supported by the text of s 32(1)(b) of the final Constitution, which refers to 'any rights' and not merely those of the requester.

need and relevance may be examined.[1] It is the latter, generous approach which has found favour with our courts. Such a generous interpretation is consistent with the constitutional value of openness and is to be welcomed.[2]

There is a potential further weakening of the right of access to information held by private bodies within the term 'exercise or protection'. Courts may read narrowly the forum in which a right is to be exercised or protected. In particular, access may be granted only where such information is required to exercise or protect one's rights through litigation, that is, through formal action in the courts. However, a broader reading is possible and, it is submitted, desirable. As the decided cases have recognized, one can also exercise or protect rights through informal action before administrative bodies, in front of a political forum, and through the public media.[3]

At a minimum, applicants for access to information would need to comply with the following requirements of the Supreme Court of Appeal in The Cape Metropolitan Council v Metro Inspection Services:[4]

> 'Information can only be required for the exercise or protection of a right . . . It follows that, in order to make out a case for access to information in terms of s 32, an applicant has to state what the right is that he wishes to exercise or protect, what the information is which is required and how that information would assist him in exercising or protecting that right.'

A number of cases which have turned on the issue of whether the relevant information is 'required' for the exercise or protection of rights, relate to requests for information which the requester believes will reveal whether the requester has a legal claim (to either claim damages or to take a particular administrative decision on review).[5] Our courts have generally adopted two different approaches to this issue.

[1] See Van Huyssteen & others v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism & others 1996 (1) SA 283 (C) at 299D–300F, 1995 (9) BCLR 1191 (C); Nortje & another v Attorney-General (Cape) & another 1995 (2) SA 460 (C) at 474H; Aquafund (Pty) Ltd v Premier of the Province of the Western Cape 1997 (7) BCLR 907 (C) at 913G–H; see, in particular, the discussion of Cameron J in Van Niekerk v City Council of Pretoria 1997 (3) SA 839 (T) at 842J–846G; ABBM Printing and Publishing (Pty) Ltd v Transnet Ltd 1998 (2) SA 109 (W), 1997 (10) BCLR 1429 (W); Inkatha Freedom Party & another v Truth and Reconciliation Commission & others 2000 (3) SA 119 (C), 2000 (5) BCLR 553 (C).

[2] See ss 1*(d), 36(1) and 39(1)(a)* of the final Constitution.

[3] See Van Huyssteen & others v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism & others 1996 (1) SA 283 (C) at 300E, 1995 (9) BCLR 1191 (C) ('It is to be noted that s 23 of the [interim] Constitution does not limit in any way the rights for the exercise or protection of which an applicant is entitled to seek access to officially held information, nor is there any limitation or restriction in respect of the manner or form in which such exercise or protection will take place'); Qozeleni v Minister of Law and Order & another 1994 (3) SA 625 (E) at 642; 1994 (1) BCLR 75 (E); Le Roux v Direkteur-Generaal van Handel en Nywerheid 1997 (4) SA 174 (T) at 183F–G, 1997 (8) BCLR 1048 (T).

[4] The Cape Metropolitan Council v Metro Inspection Services (Western Cape) CC & others 2001 (3) SA 1013 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1026 (SCA) at para 28.

[5] These cases arose under the right of access to information against the state in the interim Constitution or Schedule 6 of the final Constitution.

The one approach requires the applicant to make out some prima facie case that its rights have been infringed. For example, in Goodman Bros (Pty) Ltd v Transnet Ltd[1] Blieden J refused to order the disclosure of certain documents relating to a tender because no basis has been established by the applicant that its constitutional rights had been infringed.[2]

A similar approach was adopted in another Witwatersrand Local Division decision[3] by Heher J, who stated that persons were only entitled to information in terms of s 23 of the interim Constitution if they could

> 'show a reasonable basis for believing a disclosure of documents in the possession of the State or an organ of State will assist him to protect or exercise a right, however derived . . . Even allowing for a broad and generous purposive approach to constitutional interpretation . . . the section is not capable of meaning that access should be ordered if insight into the document is required in order to determine whether a right needs to be protected. Desirable as that may be in theory, it seems to me to be commercially impracticable and wide open to abuse.'

In two earlier cases our courts adopted a more liberal approach to this issue in holding that an applicant was entitled to access to information in order to establish whether he or she had a claim, without the need to show the existence of a prima facie case. In Van Niekerk v Pretoria City Council[4] Cameron J held that the applicant was entitled to access to a report for purposes of establishing whether the applicant had a delictual claim against the local council in relation to a power surge which caused the applicant damage. As the learned judge stated:

> 'In the present case, there can be no doubt that having sight of the electricity department's report would assist the applicant in either proceeding with or abandoning his claim against the respondent. The report will disclose why the respondent considers that the report exonerated it of negligence. It may also reveal information which would advance the applicant's claim. Either way, disclosure will promote an early settlement of the dispute and bring the envisaged litigation, by settlement or abandonment, to a short, sharp end. In this sense, the applicant can in my view be said reasonably to "require" the report.'[5]

Similarly, Schwartzman J, in ABBM Printing and Publishing (Pty) Ltd v Transnet Ltd,[6] held that an unsuccessful tenderer was entitled to access to the other tenders and other relevant documentation, in order to assess whether its rights to procedural fairness had been infringed. During the course of its judgement, the court expressly rejected the argument that the applicant must show the appearance of an irregularity in the tender process in order to be entitled to the documentation:

> 'The applicant clearly requires the documents . . . in order to determine whether the tender process complied with the requirements of s 33 of the Constitution. Until it has had sight thereof, it cannot decide whether it has any claim for relief against the respondent. Sight of the documents could well result in forestalling any further litigation which is in itself a good reason for ordering their

[1] 1998 (4) SA 989 (W).

[2] During the course of his judgment the learned judge remarked as follows at 1000–1: 'It seems that the whole basis for the present portion of the application is for the applicant to gather information which it might or might not use in further legal proceedings which it might or might not embark upon . . . [I]t is my view that the applicant needs to have more than just an unsubstantiated apprehension of harm to it before it is to be entitled to [claim access to the relevant information].'

[3] SA Metal Machinery Co Ltd v Transnet Ltd (unreported, WLD, 22 March 1998) at page 11.

[4] 1997 (3) SA 839 (T).

[5] At 848.

[6] 1998 (2) SA 109 (W).

> production at this stage . . . To hold that a tenderer such as the applicant is required to lay a jurisdictional basis before being able to assert his constitutional right to information would serve to undermine the basis on which I am required to interpret the Bill of Rights.'[1]

A particularly interesting case in this context is the decision of the Cape Provincial Division in IFP v TRC.[2] In this case the IFP requested access to relevant documentation of the TRC in order to establish whether it had a claim for defamation against the TRC. Of particular relevance here was that the relevant legislation[3] provides that persons who perform tasks on behalf of the Commission may only be liable if they act in bad faith. As a result of this statutory exclusion of liability the applicants contended that they could only assess whether they had an action in law if they had sight of the relevant documents on which the TRC based its actions. Davis J, in principle, appeared to endorse this approach, stating that the applicants were entitled to information which would enable them 'to launch proceedings in an informed fashion' and held that:

> 'In the present case the question is thus whether information is reasonably required for the enforcement of applicants' rights in that, based on such information, applicants can obtain advice as to whether they have a claim and can then frame their pleadings in a manner which discloses a cause of action'.[4]

This liberal approach was, in our view, particularly appropriate in determining whether an applicant was entitled to access to information against the state in terms of interim Constitution. This is because such an approach better facilitates the underlying rationales of access to information against the state, that is, open and accountable, democratic governance. Nevertheless, this liberal approach may be less appropriate in deciding disputes relating to access to information held by private bodies under the final Constitution, where the focus is more on the protection of rights and less on the promotion of democracy, than in the public sector.

One case effectively avoids substantive limitations analysis by determining that there is no right at issue to be protected or exercised, exploiting the particular language (and the use of the past tense) of the internal limitation of the interim Constitution's formulation of the right. The danger of this 'no right to be protected' approach is demonstrated pointedly by Tobacco Institute of Southern Africa & others v Minister of Health.[5] This case essentially disregards any role for the right of access to information to play in a deliberative democracy

[1] At 119. This approach was subsequently endorsed by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Transnet Ltd v Goodman Bros (Pty) Ltd 2000 (1) SA 853 (SCA) at 867, 2001 BCLR 176 (SCA). This liberal approach is also consistent with the approach of the SCA in Cape Metropolitan Council v Metro Inspection Services (Western Cape) CC & others 2001 (3) SA 1013 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1026 (SCA) at paras 28–9.

[2] Inkatha Freedom Party & another v Truth and Reconciliation Commission & others 2000 (3) SA 119 (C), 2000 (5) BCLR 553 (C).

[3] Section 41(2) of the Promotion of National Unity and Reconciliation Act 34 of 1995.

[4] At 135. Davis J, however, expressed grave doubts as to whether the right of access to information gave rise to a general right to pre-action discovery. Interestingly, the learned judge rejected the argument that an ordinary defamation plaintiff is entitled to relevant information held by the defendant in order to establish whether the defendant had acted reasonably, in light of the new defence to defamation of reasonableness (see above, ch 20 'Expression'): '[T]o suggest that s 32 of the Constitution can now be interpreted so as to impose upon defendants in such cases an obligation to provide information to plaintiff and therefore to disclose the basis for their defence is indeed to extend the right of information far beyond that which is reasonably required for the enforcement of applicants' rights, that is to be able to launch proceedings in an informed fashion.'

[5] 1998 (4) SA 745 (C), 1999 (1) BCLR 83 (C).

by completely denying a multi-pronged request for information with regard to proposed legislation on the rationale that proposed legislation can affect rights only after it becomes enacted into law. With respect, this case eviscerated one aspect of the core rationale for the right of access to information — participation in democratic decision-making.[1] The preferable approach would have been instead to examine which of the requests for information were validly refused and which not. For instance, with the use of the exemptions in the AIA much, if not most, and perhaps all, of the information sought could have been validly withheld.[2]

62.8 GROUNDS OF REFUSAL

Like all other constitutional rights, the right of access to information is not absolute and may be limited, provided such limitation complies with the limitation clause of the Constitution, in that it is provided for by a law of general application and is 'reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom'.[3] The AIA, which is intended to give effect to that constitutional right, provides such a law of general application in at least most instances and allows for certain mandatory and discretionary grounds of non-disclosure. Such grounds will only withstand constitutional scrutiny if they constitute reasonable and justifiable limitations on the right.

In interpreting the grounds of refusal, as with interpreting the Act as a whole, it should be borne in mind that the primary object of the AIA is to promote openness and transparency through giving effect to the right of access to information. This should result in courts adopting a restrictive approach to the grounds of non-disclosure. As Currie & Klaaren state:[4]

> 'Access to information is the normal course. The Act is intended to give effect to the constitutional right of access to information. Access should only be denied where the denial is clearly justified. Any doubts as to whether the withholding of particular information is justified should be resolved in favour of disclosure.'[5]

A detailed discussion of all the grounds of non-disclosure is beyond the scope of this chapter.[6] We will, however, briefly discuss three of the grounds set out in the Act which raise particularly constitutional legal issues: privacy, national security and defence, and the operations of public bodies.

[1] This rationale, however, does not hold in the private sector.

[2] The Constitutional Court case of Mphahlele v First National Bank of South Africa 1999 (3) BCLR 253 (CC) also entertained an access to information claim, but denied it on the basis of the internal limitation. This case upheld the Supreme Court of Appeal's practice of not giving reasons for the dismissal of a petition to the Chief Justice for leave to appeal. The expressed rationale of the court was that since the petition was final, there was no right to be exercised or protected.

[3] Section 36 of the 1996 Constitution. See above, ch 12 'Limitations'.

[4] See AIA Commentary para 2.10.

[5] It should, however, be borne in mind that one specific object of the Act is to give effect to the constitutional right, subject to justifiable limitations aimed at the reasonable protection of privacy, commercial confidentiality and effective, efficient and good governance (s 9*(b)*(ii)). Section 3(2) of the Australian Freedom of Information Act, 1982 specifically adopts a restrictive approach to exclusions, in providing that 'any discretions conferred by this Act shall be exercised as far as possible so as to facilitate and promote, promptly and at the lowest possible cost, the disclosure of information'.

[6] For such a discussion, see AIA Commentary ch 8.

(a) Privacy

The protection of the privacy of third parties is an internationally recognized restriction on freedom of information.[1] In the context of the South African Constitution, this ground of non-disclosure is particularly important as it gives effect to the constitutionally protected right to privacy.[2] In principle, this ground of non-disclosure (which amounts to a limitation on the right of access to information) is therefore reasonable and justifiable. Nevertheless, interpreting this ground of non-disclosure in a constitutionally acceptable way will involve a careful balancing of the values of these two constitutional rights, the right of access to information and the right to privacy.

The text of the relevant ground of refusal in the AIA provides that a body must refuse a request for access if disclosure 'would involve the unreasonable disclosure of personal information about a third party, including a deceased individual'.[3] 'Personal information' is broadly defined as 'information about an identifiable individual'. The definition goes on to list a number of examples of personal information, including information relating to race, gender, pregnancy, medical, criminal or employment history, address, fingerprints or blood type, personal opinions, views or preferences, and private or confidential correspondence.[4] The relevant sections provide that this ground of refusal does not apply to certain information, including where the relevant individual has consented in writing to its disclosure, he or she was informed at the time that it was given to the relevant body that it belongs to a class of information that would or might be made available to the public; it is already publicly available; and, importantly, information 'about an individual who is or was an official of a public body and which relates to the position or functions of the individual'.[5]

[1] See, for example, the Australian Freedom of Information Act and the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights interpreting art 10(2) of the European Convention on Human Rights.

[2] Section 14 of the Constitution. See generally above, ch 18 'Privacy'.

[3] Sections 34 and 63 for public and private bodies respectively.

[4] Section 1 of the AIA provides that 'personal information', includes, but is not limited to:

'(a) information relating to the race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, national, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, physical or mental health, well-being, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth of the individual;

(b) information relating to the education or the medical, criminal or employment history of the individual or information relating to financial transactions in which the individual has been involved;

(c) any identifying number, symbol or other particular assigned to the individual;

(d) the address, fingerprints or blood type of the individual;

(e) the personal opinions, views or preferences of the individual, except where they are about another individual or about a proposal for a grant, an award or a prize to be made to another individual;

(f) correspondence sent by the individual that is implicitly or explicitly of a private or confidential nature or further correspondence that would reveal the contents of the original correspondence;

(g) the views or opinions of another individual about the individual;

(h) the views or opinions of another individual about a proposal for a grant, an award or a prize to be made to the individual, but excluding the name of the other individual where it appears with the views or opinions of the other individual; and

(i) the name of the individual where it appears with other personal information relating to the individual or where the disclosure of the name itself would reveal information about the individual,

but excludes information about an individual who has been dead for more than 20 years. . . .'

[5] Sections 34(2) and 63(2). The latter exception is particularly important as it gives effect to the related principles of open and accountable government and the diminished expectation of privacy of public officials. The privacy of such officials may not be used to frustrate access to information about that individual, which relates to that person's official functions. This type of information is obviously important in promoting an informed electorate and enhancing participatory democracy.

It is important to note that the AIA only prohibits the 'unreasonable' disclosure of personal information. The crucial question in applying these provisions will therefore be whether, in the relevant circumstances, disclosure will be unreasonable. The first stage of this enquiry will be whether the disclosure amounts to an infringement of privacy in that it is a disclosure of private facts.[1] This will only be the case where the third party can be said to have a legitimate or reasonable expectation of privacy in relation to the particular information.[2]

The next stage is to determine whether the disclosure is 'unreasonable'. This requires an examination of all the surrounding circumstances, including the strength of the third party's privacy interest, the nature of the particular record and the importance of the purpose for which it is requested.[3] It is submitted that our common law, as interpreted in the light of the Constitution, could play an important role in this enquiry as the common-law test for a breach of privacy is essentially the same. Under the common law a disclosure of private facts would only be wrongful if it is unreasonable in the circumstances and if one of the established defences is not met, including consent, qualified privilege, and truth in the public interest.[4] It is difficult to contemplate a situation in which disclosure would not be wrongful under the common law but would be prohibited under the AIA. For example, if the public interest in disclosure outweighs the individual's privacy interest, disclosure would not be 'unreasonable'.[5]

[1] An alternative approach would be that ss 34 and 63 of the AIA contemplate that any disclosure of 'personal information' (other than the categories of information set out in subsecs (2)) amounts to the disclosure of private facts. The only relevant question in each case is therefore whether such disclosure of private facts is reasonable in the circumstances. We, however, believe that the suggested preliminary enquiry is preferable in that the aim of the relevant sections, as their headings indicate, is to protect the privacy interests of third parties. If the privacy rights of a third party are not undermined by disclosure, this mandatory ground of non-disclosure would not be justified under the Constitution. In any event, the strength of the third party's privacy interest plays an important role in determining whether disclosure will be unreasonable.

[2] See above, ch 18 'Privacy' and especially the Constitutional Court in Bernstein v Von Wielligh Bester NO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC) para 75: '[T]he party seeking suppression of the evidence must establish both that he or she has a subjective expectation of privacy and that the society has recognized that expectation as objectively reasonable . . . It seems to be a sensible approach to say that the scope of person's privacy extends a fortiori only to those aspects in regard to which a legitimate expectation of privacy can be harboured.' One way of understanding the exceptions in ss 34(2) and 63(2) is that no legitimate expectation of privacy arises in relation to such information. See also G E Devenish, K Govender and H Hulme Administrative Law and Justice in South Africa (2001) at 203–4.

[3] A similar balancing approach is applied by the United States Courts in interpreting the Federal Freedom of Information Act. In US Department of Justice v Reporters Committee for Freedom of Expression et al 489 US 749 (1989) the United States Supreme Court stated that 'whether disclosure of a private document . . . is warranted must turn on the nature of the requested document and its relationship to "the basic purpose of the Freedom of Information Act to open agency action to the light of public scrutiny" . . . rather than on the particular purpose for which the document is being requested'. See also Department of Airforce v Rose 425 US 352 (1977).

[4] See, generally J Neethling, J M Potgieter & P J Visser Neethling's Law of Personality (1996) at 239–77.

[5] It should be noted that the public interest contemplated here is broader than the public interest override contained in the AIA (see below, § 62.9). For example, while the disclosure of malfeasance has long been recognized as being in the public interest, this would not necessarily amount to a substantial contravention of law contemplated in the statutory public interest override. This is also consistent with the position in the United Kingdom that a defence to an action for breach of confidence exists if the public interest in disclosure outweighs the public interest in preserving the confidence (see, generally, G Robertson and A Nicol Media Law 3 ed (1992) 183–7 and D Feldman Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales (1993) 438–41).

(b) Defence, security and international relations

This discretionary ground of non-disclosure, contained in s 41 of the AIA, applies only to public bodies. This provision provides, in s 41(1), that the information officer of a public body may refuse a request if disclosure 'could reasonably be expected to cause prejudice to' the defence, security or international relations of the Republic.[1] Subsection (2) goes on to include a number of examples of specific records.[2] Section 41(4) goes further in providing that the information officer may refuse to confirm or deny the existence or non-existence of the record if such a disclosure would harm South Africa's defence, security or international relations.

National security is an important concern for any state. Instances where a genuine threat to national security or defence outweighs the constitutional right of access to information would accordingly constitute a justifiable limitation on that constitutional right.[3] Such an approach is consistent with the approach in foreign jurisdictions[4] and international conventions.[5] For example, in the Canadian decision of Zanganeh v Canadian Security Intelligence Service[6] the court held that the refusal to disclose information relating to national security was a justifiable limitation under the Canadian Charter's limitations clause, notwithstanding the fact that the Canadian government had made a false denial that it did not have the relevant information in its possession.

In the context of national security the important terms which require interpretation in s 41 of the AIA are 'reasonably be expected to cause', 'prejudice', 'defence' and 'security'. In interpreting these terms our courts should be careful to strike a proper balance between this

[1] Information which could prejudice the international relations of the Republic is subject to a sunset provision that this ground cannot be relied upon if the record came into existence more than 20 years before the request. Information which could prejudice defence or security is not, however, subject to such a provision.

[2] These records are records including information relating to: military tactics, strategy, exercises or operations 'undertaken in preparation of hostilities or in connection with the detection, prevention, suppression or curtailment of subversive or hostile activities'; the quantity, characteristics, capabilities, vulnerabilities or deployment of weapons; the characteristics of any military force and information held for the purposes of defence intelligence. The crucial issue is whether the list is of information that can be presumptively assumed to reasonably be expected to cause prejudice or whether the list is just a set of examples of the type of information that could have that effect, that is, if a record contains information about military tactics can it be refused for this reason, or is it additionally necessary for the public body to show that its disclosure can reasonably be expected to cause harm to defence? See AIA Commentary paras 8.89–8.95 for a more detailed discussion of this ground of non-disclosure, concluding that s 41(2) is presumptive.

[3] As Cameron J stated in the Commission of Inquiry into Armscor Transactions, Ruling on in camera proceedings, (7 November 1994) the concept of national security 'may be invoked to inhibit the public debate on the problem and the State's response to it. Thus, in South Africa, massive legislation was introduced under apartheid to preclude comment on the armaments and nuclear industries and other issues. In our view, the Commission needs to find a balance between too broad and too narrow a determination of national security and the national interest. In finding that balance, as we have indicated, we consider that commercial interests related to the country's future well-being and prosperity may play a legitimate role.'

[4] For example, in the context of freedom of expression, the United States Supreme Court adopted the 'clear and present danger' test in New York Times v United States 403 US 713 (1971), in holding that the United States administration had not justified its attempt to prevent publication of the so-called 'Pentagon papers'.

[5] See, for example, art 19 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 and art 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights, 1950.

[6] (1988) 50 DLR (4th) 747.

compelling interest and the constitutional right of access to information.[1] In striking the correct balance it is important to stress that access to information is a fundamental right. As Cameron J stated in the Armscor inquiry, assessing whether there was 'reason to believe' that the national security of South Africa may be threatened if the hearing is not conducted in camera:

> 'Reasonableness as a standard of public conduct in South Africa now requires that decision-makers should have due regard to appropriate constitutional standards and principles. These include in the present case the value of openness and visibility in the government and official processes. In other words, an assessment whether the reasonable justification test has been fulfilled may include, in the weighing process, giving consideration to the public's constitutional right to know, and the constitutional value of an open society. To put the matter differently, the public's right to know should not be omitted from the assessment whether the "reasonable justification" standard has been fulfilled.'[2]

Courts should, in particular, closely scrutinize an assertion of national security in view of the long history of the abuse of this ground in South Africa and elsewhere and in view of the conflict between the notion of national security and the constitutional value of openness.[3] It is all too easy for the government simply to assert national security as a ground for non-disclosure, particularly where the very existence of the record need not be confirmed under this ground. As David Feldman states:

> 'The security of the state and its institutions is an important public interest. Yet the law which buttresses those institutions is inevitably viewed with suspicion by democrats and libertarians, as a threat to state security can too easily be asserted by those in power, as a justification for restricting a wide range of freedoms in ways which protect the interests of the governing party rather than the public.'[4]

(c) Operations of public bodies

Section 44 of the AIA provides that the information officer of a public body may refuse access to a record if that record relates to the operations of the public body in a particular manner. Section 44(1)(a) applies if the record contains an opinion, advice, report or recommendation or an account of a consultation, discussion or deliberation 'for the purpose of assisting to formulate a policy or take a decision in the exercise of a power or performance of a duty conferred or imposed by law'. Paragraph (b) applies if 'the disclosure of the record could

[1] This balancing is implicit in the approach of Cameron J in the final Armscor inquiry judgment, in which he 'accept[ed] that no decision as to disclosure in this area can be without risk or harm, or without anxiety as to its consequences . . . [T]hat risk, in the present case, however, is not sufficient to entitle us to bar from the press and the public an important right to examine our past, including our past armaments dealings, whether or not that examination causes embarrassment, and even complexity, for other governments, and indeed for the present Government of National Unity.' (Commission of Inquiry into Armscor Transactions, Ruling on in camera application — country classification for armaments trade: log 17 Pam 19.)

[2] It should be noted that Cameron J specifically stated that this consideration may 'have a marginal influence' in that case. Nevertheless, it is submitted that its emphasis is useful in interpreting s 41 of the AIA.

[3] As G E Devenish, K Govender & H Hulme state in Administrative Law and Justice in South Africa (2001) at 192: '[I]n South Africa, there is no doubt that the courts will meticulously scrutinize any claim that information is privileged by virtue of considerations of national security as a result of the manifest abuse of national security as a cloak for covering up human rights violations and abuses that were committed on an inordinate scale during the era of white minority rule.'

[4] D Feldman Civil Liberties in Human Rights in England and Wales (1993) at 682.

reasonably be expected to frustrate the deliberative process in a public body or between public bodies' by inhibiting candid communication or deliberation; or the disclosure, by prematurely disclosing a policy or contemplated policy, could 'reasonably be expected to frustrate the success of that policy'.

This ground of non-disclosure protects the disclosure of public decision-making and therefore draws on the purposes behind the state communications privilege.[1]

The most striking feature of this ground of non-disclosure is the breadth of para (a). On the face of it, this provision will permit public bodies to refuse to disclose almost all information which is formulated for the purposes of formulating a policy or taking a decision, including decisions which would constitute administrative action for purposes of the just administrative action clause.[2]

While the breadth of this provision may be constitutionally suspect, it is important that it is restrictively interpreted. In this regard, there are three respects in which it should be restrictively interpreted. First, this provision only protects pre-decision, and not post-decision, documents. A post-decision document cannot be 'for the purpose of assisting' in formulating policy or taking a decision. Thus, a pre-decision document which is adopted or incorporated in an administrative decision should also lose its protection.[3] Secondly, this ground should not ordinarily protect internal secret law, working law or administrative guidelines as such documents would constitute a policy or decision in themselves.[4] Thirdly, this provision should ordinarily be limited to documents containing opinion and not those which set out facts. These restrictive interpretations of the ground of non-disclosure are justified by the fact that the records contemplated in this ground go to the heart of open government and democratic functioning.

Section 44(2) further provides that the information officer may refuse a request if disclosure could 'reasonably be expected to jeopardize the effectiveness of a testing, examining or auditing procedure or method used by a public body'; or if the record contains evaluative material and disclosure would breach a promise to hold the information in confidence. Subsection (2)(c) provides that the information officer may refuse access if the [1] Cases interpreting the executive privilege in the content of the US FOIA have distinguished three purposes behind the state communications or executive privilege. First, the privilege is designed to encourage open, frank discussions on policy matters between subordinates and superiors. Secondly, the privilege is designed to protect against premature disclosure of proposed policies before they are finally adopted. Thirdly, the privilege protects against public confusion by disclosure of reasons and rationales that were not the actual reasons for state actions. Coastal States Gas Corp v Department of Energy 617 F2d 854 (DC Cir 1980).

[2] Although s 44(4) provides that this provision may not be used to refuse a record 'insofar as it consists of an account of, or a statement of reasons required to be given in accordance with s 5 of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act, 2000', this would not prevent a body from refusing to disclose information leading up to the decision. Applicants in judicial review applications would be entitled to such information as part of the record under Rule 53 of the Uniform Rules of the High Court of South Africa. G E Devenish, K Govender & H Hulme (eds) Administrative Law and Justice in South Africa (2001) at 206 argue that the 'or' between paras (a) and (b) of s 44(1) is an error and that the conjunctive 'and' should have been used instead, 'because otherwise a completely untenable and absurd situation would arise in terms of which the exception to the right of access to information would completely negate the operation of the right itself'. But see AIA Commentary para 8.99.

[3] AIA Commentary paras 8.100 and 8.101.

[4] See Justine White 'Open Democracy: Has the Window of Opportunity Closed?' (1998) 14 SAJHR 65 at 71–2 for a criticism of secret guidelines.

record 'contains a preliminary, working or other draft of an official of a public body'. The latter provision is unclear but appears to envisage draft documents held by a public official.[1]

62.9 PUBLIC INTEREST OVERRIDE

Sections 46 and 70 of the AIA, in relation to public and private bodies respectively, contain public interest overrides which provide for mandatory disclosure in the public interest. These provisions override all the grounds of non-disclosure included in the Act, save for one.[2] In terms of this provision, a request for access to a record must be granted, notwithstanding the other provisions of the Act, if:

'(a) the disclosure of the record would reveal evidence of —
(i) a substantial contravention of, or failure to comply with, the law; or
(ii) an imminent and serious public safety or environmental risk; and
(b) the public interest in the disclosure of the record clearly outweighs the harm contemplated in the provision in question.'

The public interest overrides therefore contemplate a particularly serious type of public interest, namely, a substantial contravention of law or an imminent and serious public safety or environmental risk. This provision does not require the mandatory disclosure of information which is in the public interest, in the general sense.[3]

It is unfortunate that the wider provision in clause 44(2) of the Open Democracy Bill was abandoned in the drafting process of the AIA. This clause would have required mandatory disclosure if the public interest in disclosure of the relevant information outweighed any right or interest which would be protected by the relevant ground of refusal.

Of particular concern is that the emphatic language of these provisions ('substantial contravention', 'imminent and serious' and 'clearly outweighs') could have the effect that the public interest override will seldom apply. If this is the case, the constitutional right of access to information could be undermined, which could call into question the constitutionality of the entire structure of the AIA.[4] Even with the liberal interpretation in favour of openness of information which is in the public interest which these terms should therefore be given, the clause seems unavoidably restrictive.

[1] This is consistent with the previous draft of the Open Democracy Bill, which contained the term 'working draft or note of an official of a government body'.

[2] Namely, s 35(1), which provides for the mandatory protection of certain records of the South African Revenue Service.

[3] The public interest, as a defence to a delictual claim for defamation or invasion of privacy, is significantly wider. The public interest, in this sense, is simply something which is of serious concern or benefit to the public. In National Media Ltd v Bogoshi 1998 (4) SA 1196 (SCA) at 1212, Hefer JA stated that the 'public interest' is 'material in which the public has an interest' as opposed to 'material which is interesting to the public'. For example, it would include a disclosure of simple malfeasance.

[4] It is, however, acknowledged that the broad public interest could have the effect that a particular ground of non-disclosure will not apply, in which case the public interest override is irrelevant. See above, 62–20 for a discussion of the manner in which a public interest may result in a disclosure of personal information not being unreasonable.

63 Just Administrative Action

Jonathan Klaaren
Glenn Penfold

63.1 Introduction: administrative justice in a constitutional democracy 63–1
63.2 The relationship between the Final Constitution, PAJA, the principle of legality, and the common law 63–5
(a) The relationship between the Final Constitution and PAJA 63–5
(i) The extent of PAJA's exclusivity 63–6
(ii) The constitutional command to enact legislation contemplated in FC s 33(3) 63–8
(iii) Can other legislation give effect to the right to just administrative action? 63–8
(iv) The continuing role of FC s 33 63–10
(b) The principle of legality 63–15
(c) The relationship between the Final Constitution and the common law 63–19
63.3 The meaning of administrative action 63–20
(a) Introduction 63–20
(b) Administrative action under the Final Constitution 63–25
(i) The general scope of administrative action 63–25
(ii) The distinction between legislative and administrative action 63–26
(iii) The distinction between executive policy decisions, political judgments and administrative action. 63–28
(iv) The distinction between judicial and administrative action 63–33
(v) The distinction between administrative action and labour relations 63–34
(vi) Rule-making as administrative action 63–38

(vii) Statutory arbitrations as administrative action 63–44
(viii) The distinction between public and private power . . 63–48
(ix) Some relevant factors in assessing whether a power is private or public 63–56
(c) The meaning of administrative action under PAJA 63–59
(i) Background and the general approach to 'administrative action' under PAJA 63–59
(ii) A decision of an administrative nature 63–61
(iii) Made in terms of an empowering provision (or the Constitution, a provincial constitution or legislation) 63–62
(iv) Specific exclusions from the definition of administrative action 63–65
(v) A decision of an organ of state or person exercising public power or performing a public function 63–68
(vi) The requirement of adversely affecting rights 63–69
(vii) A direct, external legal effect 63–74
63.4 The right to lawful administrative action 63–75
63.5 The right to procedurally fair administrative action 63–80
(a) Introduction 63–80
(b) The rationales for procedural fairness 63–81
(c) The flexible nature of procedural fairness 63–83
(d) The scope of procedurally fair administrative action affecting any person 63–84
(i) The difficulty in reconciling s 3(1) with the definition of 'administrative action' in s 1 of PAJA . 63–85
(ii) The meaning of 'materially and adversely affects the rights or legitimate expectations of any person' 63–89
(e) The content of procedurally fair administrative action affecting any person 63–95
(f) The scope and content of procedurally fair administrative action affecting the public 63–99
(g) The rule against bias 63–100
(h) Institutional bias 63–103
63.6 The right to reasonable administrative action 63–104
(a) Reasonableness: a (somewhat) controversial ground of review 63–104
(b) The constitutional right to reasonable administrative action 63–107
(d) Reasonableness review under PAJA 63–110

63.7 The right to written reasons 63–113
(a) The constitutional right to written reasons 63–113
(b) The rationales for the right to written reasons 63–113
(c) The scope of the right to written reasons 63–114
(d) The content of PAJA s 5: the meaning of 'adequate' reasons. 63–117
(e) The request-driven nature of the right to written reasons under PAJA 63–118
63.8 Standing to enforce the right to just administrative action. . . 63–119
63.9 Substantive relief 63–121
63.10 The substantive protection of legitimate expectations 63–123

63.1 Introduction: Administrative Justice in a Constitutional Democracy

While this chapter focuses primarily on constitutional issues that engage just administrative action (FC s 33), this limited exercise will inevitably require a detailed discussion of the provisions of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act ('PAJA').[1] PAJA is, in practice, the primary tool for FC s 33's enforcement. We begin by analysing the relationship between the Final Constitution, PAJA, and the common law. We follow that foundational analysis with an interrogation of the meaning of the most important phrase for purposes of both the constitutional right and PAJA: 'administrative action'. We then proceed to discuss each of the four components of the right to just administrative action: the constitutional rights to lawful, procedurally fair, and reasonable administrative action, as well as the right to written reasons for administrative action. We conclude with an examination of standing and substantive remedies in administrative law.[2]

Prior to the advent of the Interim Constitution, South African administrative law was generally understood to be founded on the common law.[3] The courts reviewed the exercise of public power based on their inherent jurisdiction.[4] In so doing, the courts developed and applied judge-made rules of review with which exercises of public power were required to comply. Accordingly, the actions of decision-makers could be set aside if they abused their discretion, failed properly to apply their minds or failed to follow the rules of natural justice.[5] In the

* The authors would like to thank Stu Woolman for editorial assistance and Theunis Roux for commenting on a portion of an earlier version of this chapter.

[1] Act 3 of 2000.

[2] The right to just administrative action no longer needs to carry the legal burden — the work — in providing a front line against the depredations of an apartheid state — that administrative law generally, and natural justice particularly, were obliged to do prior to the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC'). Accordingly, we have previously noted: 'The work performed in comparable constitutional instruments by a single, all-embracing due process clause has been divided and allocated to several distinct sections of the South African Constitution: the limitations clause, the right of access to information, and the right of access to court as well as the right of freedom and security of the person.' See J Klaaren 'Administrative Justice' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) § 25.1). See also Minister of Health & Another v New Clicks SA (Pty) Limited & Others 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC), 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 587('New Clicks')(Sachs J)('[FC s 33] does not stand alone as a solitary bulwark against arbitrary or unfair exercise of public power. Administrative justice in itself has less work to do than it had in the pre-democratic era').

[3] But see Zantsi v Council of State, Ciskei & Others 1995 (4) SA 615 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1424 (CC)(For an understanding of judicial review and the South African legal system prior to 1994 that emphasises its constitutional, as compared to its common law, nature.)

[4] Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd & Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council & Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC)('Fedsure') at paras 23 and 28. See also Johannesburg Consolidated Investment Company Ltd v Johannesburg Town Council 1903 TS 111, 115 ('Whenever a public body has a duty imposed upon it by statute, and disregards important provisions of the statute, or is guilty of gross irregularity or clear illegality in the performance of the duty, this Court may be asked to review the proceedings complained of and set aside or correct them. This is no special machinery created by the Legislature; it is a right inherent in the Court . . .')

[5] See Johannesburg Stock Exchange & Another v Witwatersrand Nigel Ltd & Another 1988 (3) SA 132, 152 (A)(Succinct formulation of the common-law grounds of review.)

pre-constitutional era, administrative law and the courts' power of review were based on the constitutional principles of the rule of law and sovereignty of Parliament.[1] Parliamentary sovereignty, in terms of which the will of Parliament was supreme, was the primary feature of South African constitutional law. Accordingly, the application of principles of judicial review was subject to the whim of Parliament. Parliament could limit the level of scrutiny of administrative action or even ultimately oust the courts' jurisdiction to enquire into the validity of administrative action.[2]

The legislative tools that flowed from Parliamentary sovereignty set the executive free to be as repressive as it wished in relation to laws governing racial segregation, national security statutes and a host of other apartheid legislation. They also affected areas of social and economic regulation less directly implicated in the apartheid legal apparatus. This dire set of legal circumstances was exacerbated by the executive-mindedness of certain judges who failed seriously to scrutinise the executive's actions. The result is that South Africa's history of administrative law and practice is littered with instances of abuses of power — particularly in the context of apartheid laws.[3]

The constitutionalisation of the right to administrative justice in the Interim Constitution amounted to a radical break in South African administrative law. Not only did the Interim Constitution replace the sovereignty of Parliament with the new governing principle of constitutional supremacy,[4] but the constitutional rights to lawful and reasonable administrative action, procedural fairness and written reasons began the process of political disentrenchment of legislative and executive abuse of power.[5] The basis for judicial review of administrative action is now the protection of a fundamental right (FC s 33), an express commitment to [1] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa & Another: In re Ex parte President of the RSA & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC)('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers') at paras 33, 35 and 37.

[2] On ouster, see Staatspresident en Andere v United Democratic Front en 'n Ander 1988 (4) SA 830 (A) and Natal Indian Congress v State President & Others 1989 (3) SA 588 (D). Devices to reduce the level of judicial scrutiny included the legislative use of subjective discretions. See generally J Gauntlet 'The Satisfaction of Ministers, Judicial Review of "Subjective" Discretions in South Africa' in E Kahn (ed) The Quest for Justice: Essays in Honour of Michael MacGregor Corbett (1995) 208.

[3] A large amount of literature has been written on this issue. See D Dyzenhaus Hard Cases in Wicked Legal Systems: South African Law in the Perspective of Legal Philosophy (1991) and S Ellmann In a Time of Trouble: Law and Liberty in South Africa's State of Emergency (1992).

[4] FC s 2 proclaims that '[t]he Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic; law or conduct inconsistent with it is invalid, and the obligations imposed by it must be fulfilled'.

[5] IC s 24, entitled 'Administrative justice', read as follows:

'Every person shall have the right to —

(a) lawful administrative action where any of his or her rights or interests is affected or threatened;

(b) procedurally fair administrative action where any of his or her rights or legitimate expectations is affected or threatened;

(c) be furnished with reasons in writing for administrative action which affects any of his or her rights or interests unless the reasons for such acts have been made public; and constitutional supremacy (FC s 2) and the constitutionally-inspired principle of legality (or the rule of law doctrine (FC s 1)). The principle of legality — or the rule of law doctrine — recognizes that all public power flows from the Final Constitution and must be consistent therewith.[1] As Chaskalson P stated on behalf of the Constitutional Court in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers:

(d) administrative action which is justifiable in relation to the reasons given for it where any of his or her rights is affected or threatened.'

> The interim Constitution which came into force in April 1994 was a legal watershed. It shifted constitutionalism, and with it all aspects of public law, from the realm of common law to the prescripts of a written constitution which is the supreme law.[2]

The Final Constitution[3] replaced the Interim Constitution's right to administrative justice with FC s 33, entitled 'Just Administrative Action', which reads as follows:

(1) Everyone has the right to administrative action that is lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair.
(2) Everyone whose rights have been adversely affected by administrative action has the right to be given written reasons.
(3) National legislation must be enacted to give effect to these rights, and must —
    (a) provide for the review of administrative action by a court or, where appropriate, an independent and impartial tribunal;
    (b) impose a duty on the state to give effect to the rights in subsections (1) and (2); and
    (c) promote an efficient administration.

Unlike most other fundamental rights in the Bill of Rights, the precise terms of the right set out in FC s 33 did not come into operation immediately on 3 February 1997. The transitional provision in item 23 of Schedule 6 to the Final Constitution provided that Parliament was required to enact the legislation referred to in FC s 33(3) within three years from the commencement of the Final Constitution (that is, by 3 February 2000). Prior to such enactment, the right in FC s 33 was to be read as set out in item 23(2)(b) of Schedule 6: that provision was essentially the same as the text of IC s 24.

The national legislation envisaged in FC s 33(3) is PAJA. PAJA was enacted on the day of the deadline, 3 February 2000.[4] Broadly speaking, PAJA elaborates on [1] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at paras 19–45. For a discussion of the principle of legality, see F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 11.

[2] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 45. See also Fedsure (supra) at paras 32 and 40; Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs & Tourism & Others 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC) ('Bato Star') at para 22 ('The grundnorm of administrative law is now to be found in the first place not in the doctrine of ultra vires, nor in the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty, nor in the common law itself, but in the principles of our Constitution.')

[3] The Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC')

[4] PAJA itself did not immediately come into force. Section 11 provided that it would come into operation on a date fixed by the President in the Government Gazette. The President brought PAJA, save for ss 4 and 10, into force on 30 November 2000 in terms of Government Notice R73 dated 29 November 2000. In respect of administrative action taking place between 4 February 2000 and 30 November 2000, the Constitutional Court stated, without discussion, that the form of the constitutional right provided for in Schedule 6 (ie the Interim Constitution's right to administrative the broad constitutional right to just administrative action, clarifies the scope and content of the right to procedural fairness, enacts a detailed regime for the provision of reasons, provides a legislative basis for judicial review of administrative action, and provides an institutional framework for the enforcement of such rights.

Prior to the introduction of constitutional democracy in South Africa, there was a perception that 'good' administrative lawyers favoured judicial activism and intervention in carefully scrutinising and setting aside administrative decisions. 'Bad' administrative lawyers favoured judicial deference, which was equated with executive-mindedness and acquiescence in injustice. The reasons for this are not difficult to understand. There was a need to control the exercise of public power as much as possible when that power had the effect of applying unjust laws. In the absence of participation of the majority in legislative decision-making and without a justiciable Bill of Rights, administrative law was often the only tool for avoiding injustice and preventing the erosion of or indeed the snuffing out of most South Africans' basic rights.[1]

It has been generally recognised that this pro-interventionist approach to judicial review needed to be re-assessed in our new constitutional democracy. A pro-interventionist approach tends to be less respectful of democracy, and the democratic institution of the executive, than may be appropriate. It may also run contrary to the principle of separation of powers. That principle requires that the judiciary pay appropriate respect to the executive's sphere of operation.[2] A choice for constitutional democracy is, to some extent, a choice to respect the constitutional drafters' decision to confer decision-making powers and discretions on the executive branch of government.[3] In addition, it is no longer necessary for justice) would apply. See Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association & Another 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC)('Kyalami Ridge') at para 52. For a discussion of the interpretive applicability of PAJA with respect to administrative action taking place in this period, see I Currie & J Klaaren The Promotion of Administrative Justice Act Benchbook (2001) ('Benchbook') 84–85. Sections 4 and 10 of PAJA were brought into force on 31 July 2002 by Proclamation R63 of 31 July 2002. As of the time of writing (October 2008), there remains one significant element of the envisaged PAJA enforcement scheme that is not yet in operation — the PAJA jurisdiction of the magistrates' courts. For a discussion of the drafting history of PAJA, see Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 4–13 and I Currie The Promotion of Administrative Justice Act: A Commentary (2008) ('The PAJA') 18–23.

[1] See generally C Hoexter 'The Future of Judicial Review in South African Administrative Law' (2000) 117 SALJ 484 ('Future of Judicial Review'). South African administrative lawyers therefore generally supported 'red-light' theories of administrative law. See also C Harlow & R Rawlings Law and Administration (1984); J Klaaren 'Redlight, Greenlight' (1999) 15 SAJHR 209 ('Redlight, Greenlight').

[2] For a discussion of this principle or doctrine, see S Seedorf and S Sibanda Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 12.

[3] See C Hoexter 'Future of Judicial Review' (supra) at 500 (Judicial activism creates problems of democracy and legitimacy); J Klaaren 'Structures of Government in the 1996 South African Constitution: Putting Democracy Back into Human Rights' (1997) 13 SAJHR 3. See also D Davis 'Administrative Justice in a Democratic South Africa' 1993 Acta Juridica 21.

administrative law to do all the work of rights protection. All public power must now comply with the requirements of the Final Constitution and, in particular, the Bill of Rights.[1]

At the same time, the Final Constitution should give the courts greater security to scrutinise administrative action closely, safe in the knowledge that their powers of review are constitutionally mandated and protected. They no longer have to push back the boundaries, using artificial devices like the intention of the legislature, to justify setting aside decisions. Their power is derived directly from the Final Constitution.[2]

These parallel developments could lead to the extension of administrative review in certain instances and its narrowing in others. It is thus appropriate to reassess administrative law in certain respects. In undertaking this reassessment, the courts should attempt to ensure that the actions of the administration are carefully scrutinised for compliance with the constitutional requirements of lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair administrative action. However they should not intervene in areas which are properly the executive's domain. In attempting to strike this difficult balance, the fundamental tension should be recognised, that is, between participation, accountability, transparency and fairness, on the one hand, and efficient, effective government on the other.

63.2 The relationship between the Final Constitution, PAJA, the principle of legality, and the common law

(a) The relationship between the Final Constitution and PAJA

As stated above, Parliament enacted PAJA pursuant to the Final Constitution's mandate 'to give effect' to the constitutional right to just administrative action as required in FC s 33(3). PAJA therefore provides guidance and rules for administrators to follow as well as a legislative basis for administrative review. As we shall discuss in more detail below, applications for judicial review will usually be brought in terms of PAJA itself.

The questions that we shall consider in this section are an initial question regarding the procedure for bringing applications for judicial review, the degree of exclusivity of PAJA and then what could be termed three pure constitutional questions. Those three questions are: Did the enactment of PAJA satisfy the [1] Chapter 2 of the Final Constitution. The relevant constitutional requirements also include the principles of constitutional supremacy and legality. See Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 20: 'The exercise of all public power must comply with the Constitution, which is the supreme law, and the doctrine of legality, which is part of that law'. See also K O'Regan 'Breaking Ground: Some Thoughts on the Seismic Shift in our Administrative Law' (2004) 121 SALJ 424.

[2] See Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 45 ('But there has been a fundamental change. Courts no longer have to claim space and push boundaries to find means of controlling public power. That control is vested in them under the Constitution which defines the role of the courts, their powers in relation to other arms of government, and the constraints subject to which public power has to be exercised.').

constitutional command of FC s 33(3)? Is PAJA the only statute of Parliament that gives effect to FC s 33? What roles should the constitutional right to just administrative action continue to play in the accountability scheme now that PAJA has been enacted and brought into force?

(i) The extent of PAJA's exclusivity

The initial question is the degree to which PAJA is the exclusive procedural gateway for judicial review of administrative action. It is clear that the primary mechanism for asserting administrative justice rights is not direct reliance on FC s 33, but through review under PAJA.[1] If the proposition was not apparent from the text of the basic law itself, the Constitutional Court indicated in Bato Star that an application for judicial review of administrative action must 'ordinarily' to be brought in terms of PAJA.[2]

Assuming acceptance of this primary role of PAJA, several questions nonetheless remain. The first is the degree of exclusivity.[3] One practical way to pose this question is to ask: to what extent does PAJA cover the field of civil procedure for administrative review? Bato Star seemed to lean towards the position that s 6 of PAJA entirely replaces the substantive judicial review grounds found in the common law but added that it was not necessary in that case to consider 'causes of action for judicial review of administrative action that do not fall within the scope of PAJA'.[4] Chaskalson CJ in New Clicks seemed to go a step further, stating that PAJA 'was required to cover the field and purports to do so' and that '[a] litigant cannot avoid the provisions of PAJA by going behind it, and seeking to rely on s 33(1) of the Final Constitution or the common law'.[5] In our view,

[1] See Bato Star (supra) at para 22; and New Clicks (supra) at paras 95–97 (Chaskalson CJ) and paras 433–438 (Ngcobo J).

[2] Ibid at para 25 ('The provisions of s 6 divulge a clear purpose to codify the grounds of judicial review of administrative action as defined in PAJA. The cause of action for the judicial review of administrative action now ordinarily arises from PAJA, not from the common law as in the past.')(O'Regan J).

[3] See Zuma v National Director of Public Prosecutions, Unreported Decision of the Natal Provincial Divisions, Case no. 8652\08 (September 2008) at para 57 ('Zuma v NDPP').

[4] Bato Star (supra) at para 25.

[5] New Clicks (supra) at paras 95–97. Chaskalson CJ continues: 'That would defeat the purpose of the Constitution in requiring the rights contained in s 33 to be given effect to by means of national legislation.' Ibid at para 96). See also New Clicks (supra) at paras 433–438 (Ncgobo J)('Our Constitution contemplates a single system of law which is shaped by the Constitution. To rely directly on s 33(1) of the Constitution and on common law when PAJA, which was enacted to give effect to s 33, is applicable, is, in my view, inappropriate. It will encourage the development of two parallel systems of law, one under PAJA and another under s 33 and the common law. . . . Where, as here, the Constitution requires Parliament to enact legislation to give effect to the constitutional rights guaranteed in the Constitution, and Parliament enacts such legislation, it will ordinarily be impermissible for a litigant to found a cause of action directly on the Constitution without alleging that the statute in question is deficient in the remedies it provides'.) See also Sidumo & Another v Rustenburg Platinum Mines Ltd & Others 2008 (2) SA 24 (CC), 2008 (2) BCLR 158 (CC)('Sidumo') at para 43.

FC s 33 envisages PAJA as the centerpiece of judicial review of administrative action, with the common law retaining only a gap-filling function (as well as of course an interpretive role with regard to PAJA and at least to some extent with regard to FC s 33). As will become apparent below, the position in relation to other legislation is more complex, with some legislation performing a supplementary role and other specialist legislation applying to the exclusion of PAJA.

A second closely related and properly constitutional question is whether any assertion of unlawfulness of government conduct by way of administrative law review necessarily proceeds via PAJA. In our view, the answer to this question is dependent on the placement of the conduct complained of within the ambit of 'administrative action'. Outside of administrative action, and only outside of administrative action,[1] it remains open to assert administrative unlawfulness via the common law, as interpreted and developed in the light of the Final Constitution.[2] Where the action to be reviewed is administrative action, the procedure to be followed is that of PAJA.[3]

The exception to this last point involves processes associated with internal, statutory review. Here, the relevant procedure and substantive grounds for the review of administrative action are those grounds contained in the statutory regime. Such procedures and grounds are separate and independent from the procedure governing, and the substantive grounds available in, PAJA causes of action.[4]

Another instance in which this issue may arise is where conduct that amounts to administrative action under FC s 33 does not fall to be regulated by PAJA because it is regulated by other specialist legislation. In Sidumo, the Constitutional Court held (per Navsa AJ) that arbitral decisions of the Commission for Conciliation Mediation and Arbitration ('the CCMA'), while amounting to 'administrative action' for purposes of FC s 33, are reviewable under the Labour Relations Act[5] and not PAJA, because the LRA is specialised labour legislation (and, indeed, special administrative law) that should apply in its sphere to the exclusion of the general administrative law contained in PAJA.[6] According to Navsa AJ:

[1] We refer here to 'administrative action' as conduct that falls within this concept under both FC s 33 and PAJA.

[2] See § 63.2*(c)* infra. One can, of course, review both administrative and non-administrative action on constitutional grounds other than those that flow from FC s 33, including a violation of the Bill or Rights or the principle of legality and rationality (§ 63.2*(b)* infra).

[3] The Constitutional Court has distinguished the question of whether PAJA covers the field of judicial review procedure from the question of whether PAJA provides 'an exclusive statutory basis for the review of all administrative decisions' in Sidumo (supra) at para 80.

[4] A majority of the Constitutional Court has assumed and used the availability of such a statutory ground of review as a factor in limiting its interpretation of PAJA. See Walele v The City of Cape Town & Others, Unreported Decision, Case no, CCT 64/07 (13 June 2008)('Walele') at para 32. The Court depended in part upon s 7 of the Building Standards Act 109 of 1977 to adopt a particular construction of s 3 of PAJA. This reasoning arguably demonstrates that PAJA and other review-granting statutory provisions should be treated as separate and independent.

[5] Act 66 of 1995 ('the LRA').

[6] See Sidumo at paras 90–104. As Navsa AJ remarked at para 103: 'This is an appropriate case for the application of the principle that specialised provisions trump general provisions'.

'[n]othing in section 33 of the Constitution precludes specialised legislative regulation of administrative action such as section 145 of the LRA alongside general legislation such as PAJA'.[1]

(ii) The constitutional command to enact legislation contemplated in FC s 33(3)

On the question as to whether the enactment of PAJA satisfied FC s 33(3), as distinct from whether the provisions of PAJA are in substance constitutional,[2] the test that should be adopted here is procedural. If Parliament has attempted in good faith to satisfy the demands of FC s 33(3) and enacted legislation that it believes emanates from FC s 33(3), then the legislation should pass constitutional muster.[3]

(iii) Can other legislation give effect to the right to just administrative action?

The satisfaction of the FC s 33(3) duty to pass legislation does not necessarily mean, however, that further legislation distinct from PAJA should not be considered as legislation enacted to 'give effect to' FC s 33.[4] To the extent that the limitations enquiry for statutes or provisions in statutes giving effect to FC s 33 differs from the general limitations enquiry (an open possibility that we cover below), the question whether legislation other than PAJA can give effect to FC s 33 has practical implications in assessing the constitutionality of such legislation.[5]

We would suggest that the approach to this question should be grounded in the structure of FC s 33 itself. As noted above, FC s 33, which is limited in scope to administrative action, encompasses four principal sub-rights: administrative action which is lawful, procedurally fair, reasonable, and for which reasons must be given. Sections 6, 7, and 8 of PAJA (apart from ss 6(2)(c) and 6(2)(h))

[1] Ibid at para 91 and para 92 ('It is apparent . . . that [PAJA] is not to be regarded as the exclusive legislative basis of review'.)

[2] For a discussion of the approach to the constitutionality of the substance of PAJA, see § 63.2*(a)*(iv) infra.

[3] J Klaaren 'Constitutional Authority to Enforce the Rights of Administrative Justice and Access to Information' (1997) 13 SAJHR 549 ('Constitutional Authority').

[4] We take it as given that good faith amendments to PAJA would qualify as national legislation in terms of FC s 33(3).

[5] To the extent that one wishes to avoid dealing with this constitutional question and its implications, one might be tempted to adopt an interpretation of the FC s 33(3) limitations enquiry that parallels the FC s 36 enquiry. We note that the question as to the applicable limitations enquiry may also be directed at the two other primary pieces of national legislation mandated in the Bill of Rights and enacted at the same time as PAJA: the Promotion of Access to Information Act 2 of 2000 ('PAIA') and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 ('the Equality Act'). In relation to PAIA, FC s 32(2) provides that national legislation must be enacted to give effect to the right of access to information, which legislation 'may provide for reasonable measures to alleviate the administrative and financial burden on the state'. The scope for this argument in respect of the Equality Act is reduced by the fact that the wording of FC s 9(4) does not smack of an in-built limitations clause. It simply states that national legislation must be enacted 'to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination'.

primarily implement the right to lawful administrative action. Sections 3, 4 and 6(2)(c) of PAJA implement the right to procedurally fair administrative action, s 6(2)(h) of PAJA implements the right to reasonable administrative action. PAJA s 5 implements the right to be given reasons for administrative action. Moreover, these sections implement these sub-rights generally. The intent to cover the field and the character of PAJA as general administrative law can and should serve to distinguish PAJA from other statutes and statutory provisions (which are specific administrative law). Apart from the Interpretation Act,[1] no other statutory enactments would appear to possess PAJA's broad, general sweep of application.[2]

The simplest of solutions is the one we prefer. Where Parliament has indeed enacted a law with general application designed to cover the field, only such a law should be given the potential benefit of an easier-to-satisfy limitations enquiry. Thus, specific statutes or statutory provisions providing for judicial review or for regimes of reasons-giving, for example, should be judged against FC s 33 and the FC s 36 limitations enquiry without reference to FC s 33(3).[3]

This use of Ockham's razor leaves us with one potential 'partner' to PAJA at the level of legislation with general application to administrative action: the Interpretation Act. We note that the draft Interpretation Bill proposed by the South African Law Reform Commission in fact contains several provisions that are not strictly speaking the province of interpretation and appear to belong more squarely within the coverage of general administrative law (indeed, of PAJA). For instance, the Interpretation Bill as currently proposed would, if enacted, require publication of legislation including subordinate legislation. It thus seems to us that the proposed Interpretation Act will need to be read with PAJA as a coherent and consistent whole — the expression of the Parliamentary will regarding the content and coverage of general administrative law in South Africa.[4]

In terms of the above analysis, the Constitutional Court's decision in Sidumo — to the effect that the LRA, and not PAJA, implements the FC s 33 guarantee of administrative justice in the labour context (or, put differently, it 'gives effect' to the FC s 33 right)[5] — is then best explained, as the Court did, by emphasising the

[1] Act 33 of 1957 ('Interpretation Act'). Note that the PAJA definition of administrative action is itself intended to 'cover the field' and thus another other piece of general administrative law — such as the Interpretation Act — must be interpreted — at least subject to FC s 33 — consistent with that definition. See Sidumo (supra) at para 90.

[2] Note that this is not necessarily the case with the other legislation mandated by the Bill of Rights. For instance, the Protection of Information Bill (B28–2008)('PoI Bill') apparently purports to cover the same field as PAIA.

[3] For an example of statutory review, see s 25 of the Refugees Act 130 of 1998. For an example of a regime of reasons-giving, see s 13(2) of the Electricity Regulation Act 4 of 2006. Note that in terms of the Zondi's interpretation command, such specific statutes and statutory provisions will also have to be interpreted in a manner consistent with FC s 33 and, insofar as possible, in a manner consistent with PAJA (§ 63.2*(a)*(iv) infra).

[4] The revision and replacement of the Interpretation Act is currently the subject of a project of the South African Law Reform Commission (Project 25).

[5] See Sidumo (supra) at para 91.

implicit choice of Parliament, in passing PAJA, to allow the LRA to dispose of such discrete domain-specific administrative action.[1] In our view, Parliament is to be accorded some deference in its institutional choices regarding the enforcement of FC s 33.

(iv) The continuing role of FC s 33

Where does this then leave the role of FC s 33? One approach initially suggested was to the effect that PAJA would be the sole substantive basis of the constitutional right and that the right itself has no further application. This would be the case if 'give effect to' in FC s 33(3) was read to mean 'created by'.[2] This approach should be rejected on the basis that it would be anomalous to include the right to just administrative action as a fundamental right in an entrenched Bill of Rights only to enable the substance of the right to be altered by simple legislative amendment. It may be consistent with constitutional democratic theory to give Parliament the ability to flesh out the detail of a fundamental right, but not to possess the sole say on the construction of the right.[3]

The better argument is that PAJA gives effect to the right (including the sub-rights in FC s 33) in the sense of interpretation and enforcement: making the rights more effective through providing a detailed elaboration of both the scope and content of the rights, as well as providing an institutional framework for their implementation and enforcement.[4] The implication of this argument is that the constitutional right in FC s 33 continues to possess a meaningful purpose. In other words, despite PAJA's enactment, a free-standing constitutional right to just administrative action still exists. Given the continued viability of a free-standing constitutional rights, we can identify three ways in which the constitutional right to just administrative action will continue to play a role: to assist in interpreting the provisions of PAJA; to challenge the constitutionality of PAJA itself; and to interpret and to challenge other legislation.[5]

Firstly, the constitutional right to just administrative action remains a valuable tool for the interpretation of the provisions of PAJA. In interpreting the Act it

[1] A counter-argument to this is that decisions of the CCMA are not included in the specific exclusions listed in PAJA's definition of 'administrative action'. See § 63.3*(c)*(iv) infra.

[2] See Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 27; I Currie & J Klaaren 'Just Administrative Action' in J de Waal, I Currie & G Erasmus (eds) The Bill of Rights Handbook 4 ed (2001)('Just Administrative Action') 496.

[3] See Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 27.

[4] See Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 27. The view finds some support in the Constitutional Court's judgment in Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa. 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 83 (During the course of its judgment relating to the constitutional right of access to information which was suspended in a similar manner to the right to just administrative action, the Court held that the reason for the suspension was 'a means of affording Parliament time to provide the necessary legislative framework for the implementation of the right to information. Freedom of information legislation usually involves detailed and complex provisions defining the nature and limits of the right and the requisite conditions for its enforcement.').

[5] For a more detailed discussion of these uses of the constitutional right, see Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 26–29.

should always be borne in mind that it is intended to give effect to the rights set out in FC s 33.[1] For example, as discussed below, the broad standing requirements of the Bill of Rights set out in FC s 38, rather than the more narrow grounds for standing in the common law, should be read into the Act.[2] The same goes for the interpretation of other statutes of general administrative law as well as for the other statute held to be giving effect to FC s 33, the LRA.[3]

While PAJA should generally be interpreted in a manner which best complies with FC s 33,[4] we wish to emphasize that our courts should not attribute an 'unduly strained' meaning of the language of PAJA.[5] If PAJA limits FC s 33 in a manner that cannot be reconciled through reasonable interpretation, then courts should adopt the position that PAJA limits the constitutional right. The court should then engage in a limitations enquiry in order to assess whether the limitation of the right is justified.[6] Of course, this limitations enquiry should acknowledge and even employ the factors laid out in FC s 33(3). If the PAJA provision is a justified limitation, then PAJA should be left undisturbed. If the provision is not a reasonable or justifiable limitation of the right, the challenged provision of PAJA must be declared unconstitutional. In engaging in this limitations enquiry, courts are obliged to engage with the countervailing considerations appropriate to the limitations stage of the enquiry that may be raised in support of the more restrictive approach adopted in PAJA and then to decide whether or not to extend PAJA's scope (through their remedial powers of, for example, reading in and severance).[7] This approach is superior to that of interpretation that results in an unduly strained reading of PAJA. The danger, from a constitutional perspective, in a court simply 'rewriting' the language of PAJA in the name of compliance with FC s 33 is that the court engages in 'legislating' and, in doing

[1] See Bato Star (supra) at para 44, Grey's Marine Hout Bay (Pty) Limited & Others v Minister of Public Works & Others 2005 (6) SA 313 (SCA), 2005 (10) BCLR 931 (CC) ('Grey's Marine') at para 22, New Clicks (supra) at para 100 (Chaskalson CJ) and Walele (supra) at para 123 (O'Regan J).

[2] See Currie & Klaaren 'Just Administrative Action' (supra) at 496 ftn 29. See also § 63.8 infra.

[3] For an example of this interpretation of s 145 of the LRA, see Sidumo (supra) at para 110 ('Section 145 [of the LRA] is now suffused by the constitutional standard of reasonableness.')

[4] See, for example, Wary Holdings (Pty) Limited v Stalwo (Pty) Limited & Another, (July 2008) CCT 78/07 at paras 44–47 (It is necessary to take the best of the possible interpretations in giving effect to the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.)

[5] See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) at paras 23–24; Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences & Others v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others: In re Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others v Smit NO & Others 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC) at para 24; Daniels v Campbell NO & Others 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC) ('Daniels v Campbell'). For a discussion of these cases, see L Du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 32.

[6] For a detailed discussion of the limitations enquiry, see S Woolman and H Botha 'Limitation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[7] See M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 9.

so, undermines the separation of powers.[1] In particular, FC s 33(3) identifies Parliament as the appropriate institution to give effect to the constitutional right to just administrative action. The principal separation of powers difficulty occasioned by such an approach (as opposed to, for example, the constitutional remedy of reading in) is that a court effectively re-writes legislation without first engaging in a limitations enquiry and making a finding of constitutional invalidity.[2]

Secondly, the most dramatic use of the constitutional right would be to challenge the constitutionality of PAJA itself. Potential challenges to PAJA may be divided into two categories: 'underinclusive' and 'overrestrictive' challenges.[3] Possible attacks on PAJA on the basis that it is underinclusive may include: the narrowing of the definition of 'administrative action' and the apparent limitation of the right to procedural fairness to circumstances where a person's rights or legitimate expectations are adversely affected.[4] They may also encompass certain categorical exclusions from the definition of administrative action.[5] Overrestrictive challenges to the Act would engage procedures that are overly burdensome. Such burdensome challenges may include the requirements that judicial review must be sought within a period of 180 days[6] and that an applicant must first exhaust internal remedies.[7]

While we offered some hints, it still remains unclear as what approach our courts will adopt in assessing the constitutionality of a provision of PAJA. Very broadly speaking, there are two options, and, perhaps, a middle way. One option is to treat PAJA in the same manner as other parliamentary legislation, that is,

[1] See Daniels v Campbell (supra) at paras 68, 83, 84 and 104 (Moseneke J dissenting).

[2] See M du Plessis and G Penfold 'Bill of Rights Jurisprudence' 2004 Annual Survey of South African Law 15 at 25–28 and M Du Plessis and G Penfold 'Bill of Rights Jurisprudence' 2005 Annual Survey of South African Law 27 ('Bill of Rights Jurisprudence') at 92–93.

[3] See Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 29–30 (Authors refer to a third category of challenges to the constitutionality of PAJA, namely, fundamentalist challenges. These challenges maintain that PAJA may not impose any limitations on the constitutional right to just administrative action as FC s 33(3) empowers Parliament to 'give effect to' and not to limit the constitutional right. This approach finds some textual support in the fact that, unlike FC s 32(2), which performs a similar role in relation to access to information, FC s 33(3) does not expressly state that the national legislation 'may provide for reasonable measures to alleviate the administrative and financial burden on the state'. It is, however, submitted that fundamentalist challenges should be rejected on the basis that to apply the wide wording of FC s 33(1) without limitation would impose an impossible burden on the administration of government. In addition, an absolute right to just administrative action is inconsistent with the general limitation clause applying to all rights in the Bill of Rights (FC s 36(1)).

[4] See §§ 63.3*(c)* and 63.5*(d)*(ii) infra.

[5] See § 63.3*(c)*(iv) infra.

[6] Section 7(1) of PAJA.

[7] Section 7(2)(a). Neither of these challenges is likely to succeed, particularly since PAJA allows for a relaxation of both these requirements (ss 7(2)(c) and 9(1) of PAJA).

PAJA is unconstitutional if it infringes the rights in FC s 33(1) or (2), unless such infringement is reasonable and justifiable in accordance with the Final Constitution's general limitation clause.[1] Another approach is to afford the legislature a greater degree of deference in relation to PAJA. Two arguments support the second approach. PAJA, unlike most other legislation, is constitutionally mandated to give effect to a fundamental right. FC s 33(3)(c) expressly provides that this legislation must 'promote an efficient administration', words that appear at least capable of a reading that would create a lower threshold for justification than that of the general limitations clause.[2]

One of the authors has suggested a middle way, a two-tiered approach to adjudication of PAJA's constitutionality based on its functions of interpretation and enforcement.[3] In terms of this approach, the content of PAJA can be divided into two categories: those provisions which define and detail substantive rights, and those provisions which set out procedures and structures to enforce the relevant rights. While some extra deference is due to the legislature in relation to the latter, no special deference is due for the former.[4]

The third function of the constitutional right would be to interpret and to challenge legislation other than PAJA. Although PAJA is mandated by the Final Constitution, it is not a constitutional document and is not specially entrenched. It could not, therefore, be used to challenge subsequent — and facially inconsistent — parliamentary legislation. The constitutional right would have to be relied on directly in such cases. As indicated above, the appropriate limitations vehicle would the inquiry supplied by FC s 33 read with FC s 36. For instance, the constitutional right to lawful administrative action could be invoked directly to challenge attempts in future legislation to oust the court's review jurisdiction.

The interpretive role of FC s 33 extends beyond PAJA to other statutes, at [1] This option finds support in that, unlike the terminology in FC s 32(2), the wording of FC s 33(3) does not constitute a special limitation. See Currie The PAJA (supra) at 40. It perhaps counts against this interpretation to note the specific references to FC s 36(1), in the context of the national legislation referred to in FC ss 23(5), 23 (6), and 25(8).

[2] It should, however, be noted that the phrase 'promote an efficient administration' is capable of two meanings. See J Klaaren 'Constitutional Authority' (supra) at 561 (Klaaren points out that it could be read 'downwards' to authorise the reduction of legal burdens on the administration, promote cost-effectiveness and simplicity of procedures. On the other hand, it could be read 'upwards' to require an administration that is accountable, open, rational, effective and responsive). See also D Davis & G Marcus 'Administrative Justice' in Fundamental Rights in the Constitution: Commentary and Cases (1997) 163.

[3] Klaaren 'Constitutional Authority' (supra) 561.

[4] See Klaaren 'Constitutional Authority' (supra) at 563 ('Where Parliament enjoys extra authority mandated by the text of the Constitution, it should receive greater deference. However, since this extra enforcement power does not extend to Parliament's interpretative authority over the rights, Parliament receives no extra deference there.').

least to the extent that they relate to administrative action.[1] This role should be viewed in concert with the role of FC s 33 in interpreting PAJA. Its effect is likely to be significant. According to the Constitutional Court: '[a]ll statutes which authorise the making of administrative action must now be read with PAJA unless their provisions are inconsistent with it. PAJA was intended to interface with all statutes (whether enacted before or during the current constitutional order) which authorise administrative action.'[2] We would make a distinction here between the strong 'suffusing' interpretative effect of FC s 33 — which has been used and is relevant to PAJA and other legislation giving effect to FC s 33 in the sense contemplated in FC s 33(3) — and the more ordinary 'reading with' interpretive effect of FC s 33 on ordinary legislation, which is sourced in both the principles of avoidance of unconstitutionality and, in line with FC s 39(2), of promoting the spirit, purport, and objects of the Bill of Rights. The effect of the more widespread interpretive role of FC s 33 in relation to legislation that does not give effect to the constitutional right is that, instead of raising the statutory provision to the level of PAJA, the particular administrative action taken in terms of that provision is subject to PAJA (unless of course the two statutes are inconsistent).[3]

Finally, we note that we do not see a possible role for the constitutional right to just administrative action to be used as a residual right to challenge the validity of administrative action that falls outside the scope of PAJA. In our view, such a direct role for FC s 33 would undermine the role of Parliament. As we have already argued, the proper remedy for under-inclusiveness in PAJA is not direct reliance on FC s 33. It is, rather, an order that PAJA is unconstitutional and does not properly give effect to the right.[4]

[1] The relevance of FC s 33 is arguably heightened to the extent that a particular statute provides for statutory review of administrative action authorised by that statute.

[2] See Walele (supra) at para 51 (citing Zondi v MEC for Traditional and Local Government Affairs & Others 2005 (3) SA 589 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 347 (CC) at para 101).

[3] The use of the constitutional right in the interpretation of PAJA will be of particular value in determining the consistency of PAJA with other statutes that are also to be interpreted consistently with FC s 33. The influence of the constitutional right in both statutory contexts will give added force to the argument that non-PAJA statutes should be interpreted, to the extent feasible, in a manner consistent with PAJA. See Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) 20–21 (Argue that subsequent non-PAJA legislation should be interpreted if at all possible to be consistent with PAJA as the authoritative expression of Parliament's interpretation of the administrative justice right in the Final Constitution. This view is consistent with the dictum in Walele quoted above.).

[4] See Hlophe v Constitutional Court of South Africa and Others, Witwatersrand Local Division, Case no. 09/22932 (25 September 2008)('Hlophe v Constitutional Court')(The action complained of in that case was not judicial action. The decision of the High Court in Hlophe could be read as interpreting the action of the Constitutional Court judges as an instance of action accountable in terms of the direct, judicial application of FC s 33. The case concerned the procedural fairness of judges (all the judges of the Constitutional Court) complaining about the alleged misconduct of another judge (the Judge President of

(b) The principle of legality

In a series of cases crucial for the project of constitutionalism, the Constitutional Court has clearly identified a principle of legality that is distinct from, yet supportive of, the constitutional right of just administrative action.[1] In Fedsure, the Court first identified and applied this principle of legality. The principle requires that public power may only be exercised in accordance with law, a requirement that has purchase far beyond the ambit of administrative action. Fedsure held that the principle of legality is a constitutional principle founded on the rule of law.[2] As Chaskalson P, Goldstone J and O'Regan J stated:[3]

> It seems central to the conception of our constitutional order that the Legislature and Executive in every sphere are constrained by the principle that they may exercise no power and perform no function beyond that conferred upon them by law. At least in this sense, then, the principle of legality is implied within the terms of the interim Constitution.

The Constitutional Court went further in the SARFU 1.[4] It held that, although the President's decision to appoint a commission of inquiry was not administrative action, it was constrained by the principle of legality. According to the Court, the principle required that t the President must act personally, in good faith, and without misconstruing the nature of his powers.[5]

A third case reaffirmed the principle of legality and appeared to articulate an additional one of rationality — albeit a less clearly outlined principle. In Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, the Constitutional Court dealt with the President's decision to bring an Act into force despite the fact that the regulatory infrastructure for the operation of the Act had not yet been put in place. The Court held that the

---

the Cape Provincial Division) as well as the fairness of making the fact of such a complaint public.) See Independent Newspapers (Pty) Ltd v Minister for Intelligence Services: In re Masetlha v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2008 (5) SA 31 (CC), 2008 (8) BCLR 771 (CC)('Independent Newspapers') at para 161 fn 18 (Citing cases of on-the-spot exercises of judicial discretion. In this case a cluster of three rights comprising the concept of open justice is undertaken directly and judicially rather than by mediation of a statute.) Nonetheless, it is not clear whether the majority in Hlophe v Constitutional Court viewed the action of the Constitutional Court judges in laying a complaint as administrative action. Certain portions of the judgment indicate that the majority relied directly on the common law. Ibid at paras 20 and para 52. In any case, the result would perhaps better be understood as an application of the principle of legality and rationality. However, such a conclusion would be contrary to the finding of the Constitutional Court in Masetlha v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2008 (1) SA 566 (CC), 2008 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ('Masetlha'). See § 63.2*(b)* infra.

[1] For a discussion of the principle of legality, see F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 11.

[2] FC s 1*(c)* proclaims that two of the foundational values of the Republic of South Africa are the supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law.

[3] Fedsure (supra) at para 58.

[4] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC) ('SARFU 1').

[5] Ibid at paras 148 and 149. SARFU 1 thus represents a conception of legality that moves beyond ultra vires in the narrow sense. See Pepcor Retirement Fund & Another v Financial Services Board & Another 2003 (6) SA 38 (SCA) ('Pepcor'), as discussed at § 63.4 infra.

President's decision was not 'administrative action'.[1] Chaskalson P went on to state that it was a general requirement of the Final Constitution that public officials should not only exercise their powers in good faith but that such powers may not be exercised arbitrarily. Decisions must therefore 'be rationally related to the purpose for which the power was given, otherwise they are in effect arbitrary and inconsistent with this requirement'.[2] The Court therefore struck down the President's decision to bring the Act into operation on the basis that it was objectively irrational. Chaskalson P summed up the position, in words reminiscent of the traditional administrative law concerns over review on the merits:[3]

> Rationality in this sense is a minimum threshold requirement applicable to the exercise of all public power by members of the Executive and other functionaries. Action that fails to pass this threshold is inconsistent with the requirements of our Constitution and therefore unlawful. The setting of this standard does not mean that the Courts can or should substitute their opinions as to what is appropriate for the opinions of those in whom the power has been vested. As long as the purpose sought to be achieved by the exercise of public power is within the authority of the functionary, and as long as the functionary's decision, viewed objectively, is rational, a Court cannot interfere with the decision simply because it disagrees with it or considers that the power was exercised inappropriately. A decision that is objectively irrational is likely to be made only rarely but, if this does occur, a Court has the power to intervene and set aside the irrational decision.

While this articulation initially appeared to indicate the existence of a second separate principle of rationality, later cases have made it clear that this requirement of objective rationality is best seen as a component of the principle of legality.[4]

The principle of legality remained largely undeveloped for several years. And, while it has played a role in a significant pair of Constitutional Court cases, it has essentially not moved on.

In New Clicks, it was the minority (of one) judgment of Sachs J that introduced a set of creative possibilities for further development of the principle of legality. Holding part of the subordinate legislation at issue in that case not to be administrative action,[5] Sachs J nonetheless would have held such subordinate legislation accountable to not only legality (in the narrow sense) but also procedural fairness and substantive reasonableness, identifying the principle of legality — or, in his words, 'an expansive notion of legality' — as the basis for such a regime.[6] Sachs J would thus have sourced not only narrow and broad ultra vires (e.g. lawfulness) limits on subordinate legislation but also rules for rule-making (e.g. procedural

[1] See § 63.3*(b)*(iii) infra.

[2] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 85. In adopting this approach Chaskalson P drew on the Court's previous equality jurisprudence relating to mere differentiation (see, for example, Prinsloo v van der Linde & Another 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 25).

[3] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 90.

[4] See Masetlha (supra) at para 81 (The principle is termed 'the principle of legality and rationality'.)

[5] See § 63.3*(b)*(vi) infra.

[6] See New Clicks (supra) at paras 611–640.

fairness and reasonableness) in the principle of legality. Given the lack of a clear majority from the remaining members of the New Clicks Court, the use of the principle of legality to hold rule-making accountable was and remains a serious open question.[1]

Nonetheless, the second case of the recent pair, Masetlha, has at the very least closed off one principal avenue of development for the principle of legality. The Masetlha Court was given the opportunity to include procedural fairness within the principle of legality but chose firmly not to do so. Contesting his dismissal, the former head of the National Intelligence Agency ('NIA'), Mr Billy Masetlha, was afforded the protection of the law (namely, the Final Constitution) but not the specific protection of procedural fairness. On behalf of the majority, having found in FC s 209(2) an implied power to dismiss the head of NIA, Moseneke DCJ noted that the dismissal was a FC s 85(2)(e) exercise of executive authority. As such, it was excluded from PAJA, although subject to the principle of legality and rationality. In Moseneke DCJ's view, the executive nature of the power trumped the usual need for procedural fairness in a dismissal.[2] In the view of the majority, this exercise of executive authority gave priority to effective government over procedural fairness.[3] In dissent, Ngcobo J, with Madala J concurring, argued that the rule of law rationale at the heart of the principle of legality could and did found a legal basis in this case for a right to procedural fairness for the dismissed NIA chief.[4] In their view, 'the rule of law imposes a duty on those who exercise executive powers not only to refrain from acting arbitrarily, but also to act fairly when they make decisions that adversely affect an individual.'[5]

It seems to us that the decision of the majority in Masetlha was appropriate — and not only because of its national security context. To turn procedural fairness into a component of the principle of legality would effectively mean that the [1] Note Moseneke DCJ's description of the views of Sachs J in New Clicks as 'immaculately reasoned'. See New Clicks (supra) at para 723. On rule-making, see § 63.3*(b)*(vi) infra. We express there the view that rule-making amounts to 'administrative action' and is thus subject to the rigours of FC s 33 and PAJA.

[2] See Masetlha (supra) at para 77 (Moseneke DCJ)('The power to dismiss — being a corollary of the power to appoint — is similarly executive action that does not constitute administrative action, particularly in this special category of appointments. It would not be appropriate to constrain executive power to requirements of procedural fairness, which is a cardinal feature in reviewing administrative action.')

[3] Ibid at para 77 (Cites the Court's position from Premier, Mpumalanga, & Another v Executive Committee, Association of State-Aided Schools, Eastern Transvaal 1999 (2) SA 91 (CC); 1999 (2) BCLR 151 (CC)('Premier, Mpumalanga') at para 41: 'In determining what constitutes procedural fairness in a given case, a court should be slow to impose obligations upon government which will inhibit its ability to make and implement policy effectively (a principle well recognised in our common law and that of other countries). As a young democracy facing immense challenges of transformation, we cannot deny the importance of the need to ensure the ability of the Executive to act efficiently and promptly.' The reasoning here may leave room for a finding that legality can include a certain measure of procedural fairness protection in other contexts (e.g. in the context of rule-making, if our courts ultimately hold, contrary to our view, that rule-making does not amount to administrative action.)

[4] Masetlha (supra) at paras 178–189.

[5] Ibid at para 180.

performance of every public function, and not only administrative action, would attract challenges related to procedural fairness. The limiting of procedural fairness to contexts of administrative action is also sensitive to the relatively slender reed that is the rule of law claim at the heart of the constitutional principle of legality (and rationality). While most of the earlier principle of legality cases were incremental advances, the two-step of New Clicks and Masetlha, read in sequence, represents a significant (and, in our view, appropriate) retreat, in principle, from what might have been. As a result, the principle of legality has now attained a significant degree of clarity and certainty. Indeed, the view that the principle of legality could have grown to encompass or to even replace administrative law was an overstated and unlikely position.[1] That said, it cannot be denied that Ngcobo J's reasoning in dissent in Masetlha is cogent and powerful. There can be no watertight divide between the concepts of legality and of procedural fairness (as well as that of rationality). Thus, our courts would in an appropriate case be justified in incrementally expanding the existing jurisprudence to encompass within the principle of legality and rationality an element of procedural fairness. Even if the broad avenue is closed off, a few side streets could be mapped on to our current rule of law and legality jurisprudence. In any event, the development of the principle (and, to a certain extent, its cabining) is a significant constitutional development.

That said, one should note that the possibility explored by Sachs J in his minority opinion in New Clicks — that subordinate legislation should be governed by the principle of legality — is a route that may yet be taken by the legislature. It will, however, not be as wide a route, nor perhaps one as restrictive of other traffic, as the route Sachs J proposed. The initial recommendations made by Hugh Corder, proposing in part the adoption by Parliament of a legislative regime for the scrutiny of subordinate legislation, have not resulted in such a mechanism. A provincial legislature (Gauteng) has, however, taken some steps in this institutional direction, drawing both upon the principle of legality and the right of lawful administrative action to anchor its exercise of legislative oversight of subordinate legislation.[2] While complying with the basic thrust of Sachs J's proposal, this legislative scrutiny of subordinate legislation differs in two key respects: first it

[1] For a discussion of the open-ended possibilities presented by the principle of legality, see C Hoexter 'The Principle of Legality in South African Administrative Law' (2004) 4 Macquarie Law Journal 165. It seems to us that the more ambitious use of, or aspirations for, the principle of legality as a peg for administrative law review was born less from constitutional principle than from concerns relating to the overly restrictive definition of 'administrative action' in PAJA. We submit that the preferable way forward is not to stretch undely the principle of legality but rather to ensure that PAJA adequately gives effect to the constitutional right to just administrative action.

[2] The Final Report of the Task Team on Oversight and Accountability was presented to the Joint Rules Committee of Parliament on 19 March 2008, available at 20080319–final-report-task-team-oversight-and-accountability.htm. For the Gauteng structure, operative as of October 2008, see Standing Rules 220 and 224–227 of the Gauteng Provincial Legislature.

enforces only norms of lawfulness rather than additionally those of procedural fairness and of proportionality or reasonableness; and second, it anchors itself in the right to lawful administrative action as well as in the principle of legality.

(c) The relationship between the Final Constitution and the common law

It is now part of constitutional history that the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Constitutional Court once expressly differed on the degree of separation between the Final Constitution and the common law in the context of judicial review as part of administrative law. The Supreme Court of Appeal in Commissioner of Customs and Excise v Container Logistics (Pty) Ltd held that '[j]udicial review under the Constitution and the common law are different concepts' and that the common-law system of judicial review was separate from the constitutional one.[1] Thus to the SCA, administrative law had not been constitutionalised in its entirety and one could still mount a challenge to administrative action based on the common law.[2]

The SCA's decision, however, was overruled by the Constitutional Court in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers:[3]

> The common-law principles that previously provided the grounds for judicial review of public power have been subsumed under the Constitution and, insofar as they might continue to be relevant to judicial review, they gain their force from the Constitution. In the judicial review of public power, the two are intertwined and do not constitute separate concepts.[4]

Where is the common law left in the constitutional scheme of administrative law? We would make four points relevant to what we see as a clearly diminished, albeit by no means negligible, role. First, as discussed below, it appears that administrative action as contemplated in the Final Constitution (and more clearly under PAJA) relates to the exercise of public power and does not encompass private action. FC s 33 and its progeny, PAJA, are thus not available in this context for use in serving the purposes of accountability and transparency. Yet, under the common law the exercise of certain private powers was subject to judicial review for compliance with administrative law.[5] We maintain that it is possible that the

[1] Commissioner of Customs and Excise v Container Logistics (Pty) Ltd; Commissioner of Customs and Excise v Rennies Group Ltd t/a Renfreight 1999 (3) SA 771 (SCA), 1999 (8) BCLR 833 (SCA) at para 20.

[2] Ibid. ('[T]o the extent that there is no inconsistency with the Constitution, the common-law grounds for review were intended to remain intact. There is no indication in the interim Constitution of an intention to bring about a situation in which, once a Court finds that administrative action was not in accordance with the empowering legislation or the requirements of natural justice, interference is only permissible on constitutional grounds.')

[3] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 33. Ibid at paras 44 and 50.

[4] Note that perhaps the strongest interpretive use of the common law in the new constitutional scheme is that proposed by Ngcobo J. See Masetlha (supra) at paras 178–189 (Ngcobo J argued for a duty of fairness based on the rule of law.)

[5] See, eg, Marlin v Durban Turf Club & Others 1942 AD 112; Turner v Jockey Club of South Africa 1974 (3) SA 633 (A) ('Turner v Jockey Club'); and Theron en Andere v Ring van Wellington van die NG Sendingkerk in Suid-Afrika en Andere 1976 (2) SA 1 (A).

common law will continue to apply in this narrow sphere notwithstanding the constitutionalisation of administrative law generally.[1]

Secondly, the common law will play an indirect role in interpreting the provisions of both the Final Constitution and PAJA.[2] For example, in Premier, Mpumalanga the Court used the common-law meaning of 'legitimate expectations' to interpret this phrase in IC s 24*(b)*.[3] Several years later the majority in Walele did the same in the context of s 3(1) of PAJA.[4] Most importantly and pertinently, the common law will be of undoubted assistance in interpreting the content of the principle of legality.[5] But, in such a context, one must never forget that it is a constitutional principle that a court is interpreting and not a thread of the common law that one is articulating.

Third, the common law may still persist in its role as regulating the procedure for judicial review. This topic is of course covered by s 7 of PAJA. It remains in our view an open question as to whether PAJA covers the field of procedure for judicial review, thus completing ousting the common law. If s 7 does not oust the common law procedure for judicial review completely, then the common law will play a supplementary role. If s 7 does oust the common law procedure for judicial review, then the common law has no role here (apart from an interpretative one).

Fourth, it is of course the case that the common law often provides the regulatory backdrop against which administrative law operates. In this role, the common law provides the substantive and usually default rules for an operative legal background. We would argue that apart from these four specific and defined roles, the common law no longer has a direct part to play in administrative law in South Africa.

63.3 THE MEANING OF ADMINISTRATIVE ACTION

(a) Introduction

The notion of 'administrative action' as the threshold to administrative law review arose for the first time through the use of this phrase in the right to administrative justice contained in IC s 24. This phrase is repeated in the right to just administrative action entrenched in FC s 33 and delineates the scope of application of PAJA. The label 'administrative action' is thus the crucial threshold concept in post-democratic administrative law. Generally speaking, conduct that amounts to

[1] For a welcome use of administrative law in a private setting, see Klein v Dainfern College & Another 2006 (3) SA 73 (T) at para 24 (Describing the application of natural justice to private, disciplinary tribunals as a 'branch of private administrative law.')

[2] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 45 ('[T]hat is not to say that the principles of common law have ceased to be material to the development of public law. These well-established principles will continue to inform the content of administrative law and other aspects of public law, and will contribute to their future development.') See also SARFU 1 (supra) at paras 135–136.

[3] Premier, Mpumalanga (supra) at para 36.

[4] Walele (supra) at paras 28, 30 and 34 to 42.

[5] See, for example, the aspects of legality identified in SARFU 1.

administrative action is reviewable on a broad range of administrative law grounds (which are now set out in PAJA). Conduct that falls short of this threshold is not.[1]

The assessment of whether or not conduct amounts to 'administrative action' has proved often extremely difficult. Our courts (including the members of the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal) regularly disagree on whether or not conduct falls within its ambit. One reason for this difficulty is the complex definition of 'administrative action' in PAJA. While the elaboration of a constitutional concept by Parliament could in principle have assisted in providing clarity as to this concept, most agree that the statutory definition is at best unwieldy and at worst confusing and potentially internally inconsistent. Perhaps even more fundamental as a reason for the difficulty encountered is the fact that the assessment of 'administrative action' often raises difficult issues that go to the heart of public law, including the precise boundary between public and private power, the role of the doctrine of separation of powers, and the need to balance the principle of efficient administration with effective judicial oversight of administrative functioning. As a judge of the Constitutional Court has remarked, the classification of conduct as administrative action under the Final Constitution is 'a matter of considerable complexity'.[2]

In the absence of a Constitution-level definition of 'administrative action', the Constitutional Court began to give meaning to this phrase in a line of judgments handed down in the years following the enactment of the Interim Constitution. While these judgments did not generally tell us what administrative action is, they gave some measure of definition to the phrase by telling us what it is not. Most significantly, the Constitutional Court held that administrative action does not include legislative,[3] executive[4] and judicial action.[5] By contrast with this strategy of definition by exclusion, the drafters of PAJA tackled the task of defining 'administrative action' head-on: PAJA includes an extensive and extraordinarily complex definition of this term of art. In addition to the uncertainty that this statutory definition has created, it purports to cut down the ambit of administrative action and thus narrows the range of administrative conduct to which PAJA relates.

Given the high stakes at play as well as the complexities involved in deciding the issue, it is commonplace for a decision-maker, in the face of a challenge, to [1] 'Absent [an administrative] act, the application for [administrative] review is stillborn.' Gamevest (Pty) Limited v Regional Land Claims Commissioner, Northern Province and Mpumalanga, & Others 2003 (1) SA 373 (SCA), 2002 (12) BCLR 1260 (SCA) at para 11. As discussed above, conduct that falls short of this threshold may, however, be subject to review on a number of other grounds, including legality and rationality, and a breach of the Bill of Rights.

[2] See New Clicks (supra) at para 720 (Moseneke J). See also SARFU 1 (supra) at para 143 ('Difficult boundaries may have to be drawn in deciding what should and should not be characterised as administrative action for purposes of s 33.')

[3] Fedsure (supra).

[4] SARFU 1 (supra).

[5] Nel v Le Roux NO & Others 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC) ('Nel').

deny that its conduct amounts to administrative action.[1] As a result, a large amount of judicial time has been taken up in assessing whether particular conduct amounts to administrative action. The meaning of 'administrative action' has thus become a (if not the) 'focal point of South African administrative law'.[2]

A plethora of cases have been handed down on the meaning of administrative action under IC s 24, FC s 33 and PAJA. These cases are extensively discussed in other works,[3] and we do not aim to repeat the exercise here. For purposes of this chapter, we rather focus on the classification of administrative action from a constitutional angle. We assess: (1) the constitutional meaning of administrative action and the correct approach to defining the boundaries of this concept; and (2) the meaning of 'administrative action' under PAJA, viewed through the prism of the constitutional right to just administrative action, as well as the constitutionality of the PAJA definition.

As we aim to flesh out in further detail below, the correct approach to these threshold questions is to search first for a substantive understanding of 'administrative action' in FC s 33.[4] The priority of FC s 33 requires an assessment of whether it is consistent with constitutional purpose to hold the action accountable under FC s 33. In our view, this assessment must draw heavily on the doctrine of separation of powers.

The enquiry as to what is and what is not administrative action, however, does not end with FC s 33. In assessing whether conduct amounts to administrative action under PAJA, it is important to bear in mind that the drafters of the Final Constitution left it to Parliament to give effect to the constitutional right in FC s 33(1) and (2).[5] PAJA, as the product of that process, should thus be treated with respect. This respect does not mean that one blindly accepts PAJA's apparent restrictions on the scope of administrative action. It rather sets a context for the application of the rules of statutory interpretation.[6] For the reasons discussed

[1] If conduct is administrative action, then the full range of administrative law grounds of review set out in s 6(2) of PAJA applies. If it is not administrative action, the other grounds of review based on legality (or the application of administrative law rules in the private sphere) may of course apply. But these grounds are 'lesser' than PAJA grounds.

[2] Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 164. Hoexter laments that this focus on the meaning of 'administrative action' has taken our attention away from more important issues, such as the content of lawfulness, reasonableness and procedural fairness in particular contexts. See also C Hoexter "Administrative Action" in the Courts' 2006 Acta Juridica 303, 309 ('Administrative Action').

[3] See, for example, Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) 162–222; J de Ville Judicial Review of Administrative Action in South Africa (2005) ('Judicial Review') 35–87; Currie The PAJA (supra) at 42–91; Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 34–86; Y Burns & M Beukes *Administrative Law under the 1996 Constitution (*3rd Edition 2006)('Administrative Law') 107–149.

[4] The language here is taken from para 137 of the separate, concurring judgment of O'Regan J in Sidumo (supra), in which she refers to 'a substantive understanding of section 33'.

[5] FC s 33(3). See § 63.2*(a)*(iv) supra.

[6] For a detailed discussion of statutory (and constitutional) interpretation under the Constitution, see L Du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 32.

above, PAJA's definition of 'administrative action' should be interpreted in a manner which best complies with FC s 33, provided that the resulting interpretation is a reasonable reading of the language of PAJA and is not 'unduly strained'.[1] If PAJA's definition of 'administrative action' limits FC s 33 in a manner that cannot be reconciled through reasonable interpretation, courts should find a prima facie violation of FC s 33 and then engage in a limitations enquiry. If the PAJA limitation is justified, then the more limited definition in PAJA should be applied. If it is not, then PAJA should be declared unconstitutional and the remedies of striking down, reading in and severance could then be used to expand PAJA's scope.[2]

Another point that we wish to make at the outset is that the jurisprudence of our courts indicates that the classification of conduct as 'administrative action' is by no means a mechanical exercise in which the court simply applies established rules developed by the courts or the wording of the PAJA's detailed statutory definition. The approach of judges and academics to this question is coloured by a variety of theoretical concerns.

One such theoretical concern is the proper approach to the task of judicial review of administrative action in a constitutional democracy. Some (so-called red light) theorists see the primary function of judicial review as a means of holding the administration accountable and thereby hopefully improving effective decision-making. Other (so-called green light) theorists place greater emphasis on the need to ensure that administrative review does not become an unruly horse and thus undermine administrative efficiency. They would rather see administrators spending less time in court defending their decisions and more time getting on with the pressing task of running government.[3]

A related issue that may affect one's stance on the definition of administrative action is one's willingness to embrace the concept of variability or, in what may not be quite the identical exercise,[4] to apply different levels of review (or scrutiny) to different types of administrative action. If one accepts that the substance of the grounds of review are, at least to some extent, variable (as would be the case with different levels of review), one is likely to embrace a wide definition of 'administrative action' without the fear of opening the floodgates that may result if the full gamut of review grounds apply in the same way to all forms of administrative action. As the chief proponent of variability in administrative review, Cora Hoexter, says, this concept 'allows the courts to be more generous about the

[1] See § 63.2*(a)*(iv) supra.

[2] See M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 9.

[3] See Klaaren 'Redlight, Greenlight' (supra); and Hoexter 'Future of Judicial Review' (supra).

[4] For a brief discussion of the difference, and similarity, between variability and levels of scrutiny, see § 63.4 infra.

application of administrative justice and to vary its precise content according to the circumstances'.[1] Likewise, different levels of scrutiny applied to different types of administrative action will provide similar leeway.

A third theoretical issue that comes into play is one's view of the scope for the application of other available public law review mechanisms (and the substantive 'teeth' of such mechanisms). The most important contender in this regard is the constitutional principle of legality (which applies to all exercises of public power, and which Hoexter has described as 'a constitutional safety net').[2] The more one regards these alternative mechanisms as encompassing principles of administrative law, the more one is likely to be comfortable with giving a more limited interpretation to 'administrative action'. Perhaps the best illustration of this approach is the separate judgment of Sachs J in New Clicks. Sachs J's finding that regulation-making does not generally amount to administrative action is very much linked to his view that procedural fairness and substantive reasonableness can be accommodated under the umbrella of 'an expanded notion of legality'.[3] While we (and more importantly a Court plurality) disagree with Sachs J's position,[4] it is certainly both understandable and, with respect, wise to view the ambit of administrative action with due regard to other constitutional mechanisms of accountability.

[1] Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 201. See also Currie The PAJA (supra) at 83 ftn 144. A similar approach to Hoexter's notion of variability is, in effect, adopted by the Constitutional Court in relation to arbitrary deprivations of property under FC s 25(1). The Court has adopted a wide approach to the meaning of 'deprivation of property' and deals with the relevant importance of the property right at stake, and the extent of the interference with that right, in adopting a variable test for arbitrariness (a test that, depending on the circumstances, ranges from mere rationality to proportionality). See First National Bank of South Africa Limited t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service; First National Bank of SA Limited t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) at paras 57 and 100. As Theunis Roux points out in the property chapter in this treatise, '[t]he more likely scenario is that a court hearing a constitutional property clause challenge will construe almost any interference with the use or enjoyment of property as a deprivation, and will deal with the level of intrusiveness of the deprivation when considering whether the requirements of s 25(1) have been met'. See T Roux 'Property' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 46.4.

[2] Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 164. See § 63.2*(b)* supra.

[3] New Clicks (supra) at para 583. See also New Clicks (supra) at para 612(Sachs J):

> If the result of excluding such law-making from the purview of s 33 and PAJA would effectively be to immunise subordinate legislation from judicial review, save for limited grounds such as bad faith and outright irrationality, the outcome would be constitutionally unacceptable. A strained reading of PAJA would in these circumstances have much to commend it. I feel, however, that there is an alternative and better way of securing constitutional supervision of subordinate legislation. The approach I propose shares the philosophy underlying s 33, but is not founded on that section, nor is it constrained by the format of PAJA. In my view, the basis for judicial review of subordinate legislation lies in an expansive notion of legality derived from both express provisions and implied principles of the Constitution.

We note that, as stated at § 63.2*(b)*, the majority of the Constitutional Court in Masetlha held that the principle of legality does not incorporate procedural fairness and, by describing legality as including review for rationality, suggests that reasonableness is also not included within the scope of legality review. Masetlha (supra) at paras 78 and 81.

[4] See § 63.3*(b)*(vi) infra.

A final theoretical issue that arises from the case law is that the scope of administrative action is affected by one's approach to the proper interpretation of PAJA as constitutionally mandated legislation, and particularly the emphasis (or lack thereof) that one places on the text of PAJA. This approach, in turn, can depend on the level of respect that one accords to the legislature (as the drafters of PAJA) in light of the doctrine of separation of powers as well as, in another manifestation of the doctrine of separation of powers, on the competence and authority of the various institutions and structures set up by the Final Constitution.[1] As we point out below, certain judgments have tended to disregard the wording of the PAJA definition of 'administrative action', in favour of a strained interpretation that, according to the courts, is consistent with the scope of the constitutional right in FC s 33.[2]

The Constitutional Court has held that the proper approach to interpreting the scope of administrative action is first to consider whether the conduct falls within the meaning of 'administrative action' for purposes of FC s 33 and, if it does, to then assess whether PAJA nevertheless excludes this conduct from the scope of 'administrative action'.[3] The starting point is thus FC s 33. And that is where we begin.

(b) Administrative action under the Final Constitution

(i) The general scope of administrative action

Generally speaking, the constitutional reach of 'administrative action' extends to all action taken by persons and bodies exercising public power or performing public functions, save for specific exceptions that have been identified by the Constitutional Court. These exceptions are: legislative action by elected, deliberative legislatures; executive policy decisions (or matters of high political judgment); judicial action by judicial officers; and, it seems, the recently added category of labour relations.[4]

[1] One example of the latter aspect might concern the decisions of the Judicial Services Commission and the scope of administrative action. See § 63.3*(c)*(iv) infra.

[2] The best illustrations of this tendency are the decisions of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Grey's Marine and the Constitutional Court in Steenkamp NO v Provincial Tender Board, Eastern Cape 2007 (3) SA 121 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 300 (CC) ('Steenkamp'). See § 63.3*(c)*(vi) infra.

[3] See New Clicks (supra) at para 100 (Chaskalson CJ), para 446 (Ngcobo J) and para 586 (Sachs J). This is repeated by Ngcobo J in his minority judgment in Sidumo (supra) at para 202, and on behalf of the majority in Chirwa v Transnet Limited & Others 2008 (4) SA 367 (CC), 2008 (3) BCLR 251 (CC)('Chirwa') at para 139 ('PAJA only comes into the picture once it is determined that the conduct in question constitutes administrative action under section 33. The appropriate starting point is to determine whether the conduct in question constitutes administrative action within the meaning of section 33 of the Constitution.')

[4] The boundaries between these types of public power may often be difficult to draw. See SARFU 1 (supra) at para 143. See also Grey's Marine (supra) at para 25 ('The exercise of public power generally occurs on a continuum with no bright line marking the transition from one form to another. . .') In addition to these exceptions, a good argument can be made that the constitutional right to just administrative action does not extend to the exercise of a public power or the performance of a public

We discuss each of these exceptions, in turn, before considering two specific types of action which starkly raise the distinctions between the various categories of public power, and the classification of which have divided the Constitutional Court: rule-making and compulsory, statutory arbitrations. The Court's treatment of these types of action provides fertile ground for assessing the approach that the Constitutional Court has thus far adopted to the ambit of administrative action. We then turn to an assessment of the other important prerequisite for the label 'administrative action': namely, the meaning of public (as opposed to private) power.

(ii) The distinction between legislative and administrative action

In Fedsure, the Constitutional Court was called on to review a municipal council's decision to pass resolutions adopting a budget, imposing rates and levies, and paying subsidies. In examining whether the resolutions amounted to administrative action, the Constitutional Court emphasised the changed constitutional landscape in which administrative review operated following the advent of the Interim Constitution. In relation to legislative action, the Court pointed out the need to distinguish between the processes by which laws are made. The process by which delegated legislation is made by a functionary vested with such power by a legislature is different from the process by which laws are made by 'deliberative legislative bodies'.[1] The Court carefully examined the status of local government under the Interim Constitution and concluded that it recognised three levels of government: national, provincial, and local.[2] The municipal council was an elected, deliberative body which, like national and provincial legislatures, exercised original legislative power derived directly from the Constitution. The Court remarked that, although the detailed powers and functions of local government were to be determined by the laws of the competent authority, this did not mean that the powers exercised by them were delegated powers.[3] During the course of its judgment, the Court emphasised the political nature of municipal councils, the deliberative process and their political accountability:

function that, while not falling within these exceptions, fails to meet an impact threshold requirement, e.g. it does not have a discernable effect on a person's rights or interests. See Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) 117 citing H Corder 'Administrative Justice: A Cornerstone of South Africa's Democracy' (1998) 14 SAJHR 38. This question has not yet received the attention of our courts, other than through giving a wide meaning to PAJA's threshold requirements of 'adversely affecting rights' and 'direct, eternal legal effect.' See § 63.3*(c)*(vi) and (vii)).

[1] Fedsure at paras 27 and 28.

[2] Ibid at paras 34–40.

[3] See also Fedsure (supra) at para 38 (The Court noted: 'The constitutional status of a local government is thus materially different to what it was when Parliament was supreme, when not only the powers but the very existence of local government depended entirely on superior legislatures.' The Court therefore acknowledged the departure from the pre-constitutional position where municipal by-laws constituted delegated legislation, which courts would review but construe 'benevolently' if they were enacted by elected councils. See L Baxter Administrative Law (1984)('Administrative Law') 193. See also Sehume v Attridgeville City Council & Another 1992 (1) SA 41, 57–58 (A).

> The council is a deliberative legislative body whose members are elected. The legislative decisions taken by them are influenced by political considerations for which they are politically accountable to the electorate. . .. Whilst this legislative framework is subject to review for consistency with the Constitution, the making of by-laws and the imposition of taxes by a council in accordance with the prescribed legal framework cannot appropriately be made subject to challenge by 'every person' affected by them on the grounds contemplated by [IC] s 24*(b)* . . . . The deliberation ordinarily takes place in the assembly in public where the members articulate their own views on the subject of the proposed resolutions. Each member is entitled to his or her own reasons for voting for or against any resolution and is entitled to do so on political grounds. It is for the members and not the Courts to judge what is relevant in such circumstances.[1]

Accordingly, the Court held that the resolutions and by-laws passed by the municipal council were legislative and did not constitute administrative action.[2] In the course of its judgment, the Court also pointed out that the Interim Constitution reserved the power of taxation and the appropriation of government funds to legislatures. When a legislature exercises such powers it is therefore exercising a power 'peculiar to elected legislative bodies' after due deliberation.[3]

In Ed-U-College, the Constitutional Court held that a specific allocation by the MEC for Education in the Eastern Cape of funds for independent schools out of the total budgetary allocation for education in the province, which was derived from the explanatory memorandum to the relevant Appropriation Act, did not constitute administrative action. The Ed-U-College Court emphasised the legislative nature of the explanatory memorandum. It stated that the estimate expenditures set out in the memorandum are debated in the legislature itself and are the basis on which votes on the Bill are decided. This memorandum therefore 'play[s] an important role in the legislative process which leads to the approval of an appropriation Bill'.[4]

It is important to note that these cases do not simply exclude legislative action from the ambit of 'administrative action' because it is 'legislative' (or rule-generating), in the sense that it has a general effect or application. Legislative action is

[1] Fedsure (supra) at para 41.

[2] National legislation passed by Parliament and provincial legislation passed by a provincial legislature are obviously not instances of administrative action. In relation to provincial legislation, see Permanent Secretary of the Department of Education and Welfare, Eastern Cape, & Another v Ed-U-College (PE) (Section 21) Inc 2001 (2) SA (1) (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 118 (CC)('Ed-U-College') at para 12.

[3] Fedsure (supra) at paras 44 and 45.

[4] Ed-U-College (supra) at para 14. It is submitted that the reasoning here is open to criticism since the allocation did not directly derive from the explanatory memorandum. The MEC for Education, in deciding on the allocation for independent schools out of the total education budget, is not bound by the estimates in the explanatory memorandum, or so-called 'White Book'. The decision by the MEC to divide funds between independent schools and other categories of schools appears to be an executive one. A better basis for holding that this allocation decision does not amount to administrative action may be that it was an executive policy decision. The fact that the White Book, which formed the basis on which the legislation was passed, included these estimated expenditures supports this argument.

excluded because it is sourced in parliamentary, or other deliberative legislative, processes.[1] These cases do not therefore suggest that delegated legislation does not amount to administrative action. We return to this issue below.[2]

By the same token, the fact that the action is taken by a legislative body (such as Parliament) does not mean that the (non-legislative) actions of that body do not amount to administrative action.[3] For example, in De Lille, the Cape High Court found that the decision of a parliamentary committee to suspend Patricia De Lille MP was reviewable as administrative action.[4]

(iii) The distinction between executive policy decisions, political judgments and administrative action

During the course of its judgment in Fedsure, the Constitutional Court alluded to a further category of public action that does not amount to administrative action: certain types of executive action.[5]

This distinction between administrative and executive action took centre stage in the Constitutional Court's decision in SARFU 1. This case involved a review of President Mandela's decision to institute a commission of inquiry into South African rugby in terms of FC s 84(2)(f) and to declare the Commissions Act[6] applicable to the inquiry. During the course of its judgment, the SARFU 1 Court pointed out that a determination as to whether conduct constitutes administrative action does not equate with the enquiry as to whether the action is performed by a member of the executive arm of government. In an oft-quoted passage, the court remarked that:

> [W]hat matters is not so much the functionary as the function. The question is whether the task itself is administrative or not.[7]

The difficulty which then emerges is how to distinguish between administrative action and other acts of the executive. The SARFU 1 Court declared that the distinction between executive and administrative action essentially boils down to a [1] See also Colonial Development (Pty) Limited v Outer West Local Council 2002 (2) SA 262 (N) at para 60 (Court held that, although the actions of a town planning commission in modifying a town planning scheme amounted to administrative action, the conduct of the local council in giving the commission's decision legal effect did not amount to administrative action as it was 'part of the law-making process').

[2] See § 63.3*(b)*(vi) infra.

[3] See SARFU 1 (supra) at para 141.

[4] De Lille v Speaker of the National Assembly 1998 (3) SA 340 (C), 1998 (7) BCLR 916 (C)('De Lille').

[5] Fedsure (supra) at para 59 ('In relation to legislation and executive acts that do not constitute "administrative action", the principle of legality is necessarily implicit in the Constitution.' (Emphasis added).)

[6] Act 8 of 1947. This Act empowers the President to confer upon a commission of inquiry the powers to summon and examine witnesses, to administer oaths and affirmations, and to call for the production of books, documents and objects (s 3(1)).

[7] SARFU 1 (supra) at para 141.

distinction between the implementation of legislation, which is administrative action, and the formulation of policy, which is not. Acknowledging that this line may be difficult to draw, the Court said it will depend primarily upon the nature of the power.[1] The factors relevant to this consideration in turn are: the source of the power, the nature of the power, its subject-matter, whether it involves the exercise of a public duty, and whether it is related to policy matters or the implementation of legislation.[2]

The President's power to appoint a commission of inquiry derived from FC s 84(2)(f).[3] The SARFU 1 Court noted that the powers in FC s 84(2) are original constitutional powers that are conferred upon the President as head of state rather than as head of the national executive.[4] The Court described a commission of inquiry as 'an adjunct to the policy formulation responsibility of the President' as it merely performed a fact-finding function for the President, who was not bound by its findings.[5] In addition, when the President appoints a commission of inquiry he is not implementing legislation but rather exercising an original constitutional power.[6] The Court therefore concluded that the appointment of the commission did not amount to administrative action.[7]

The President's decision to make the Commissions Act applicable to the rugby commission of inquiry was, according to the Court, a more difficult matter. The

[1] SARFU 1 (supra) at paras 142 and 143.

[2] Ibid at para 143.

[3] FC s 84(2) provides that the President is responsible for a number of listed functions. These include assenting to and signing Bills, referring a Bill to the Constitutional Court for a decision on the Bill's constitutionality, summoning the National Assembly, calling a national referendum, receiving and recognizing foreign diplomatic and consular representatives, appointing ambassadors, pardoning or reprieving offenders, and conferring honours.

[4] SARFU 1 (supra) at para 144. The Court remarked that none of the powers in FC s 84(2) are concerned with the implementation of legislation in any sphere of government and are closely related to policy (at paras 145 and 146). The historical source of these powers is the prerogative. Nevertheless, they now find their source directly in the Constitution and may be reviewed for compliance with the supreme Constitution. (See President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC); A Breitenbach 'The Sources of Administrative Power: The Impact of the 1993 Constitution on the Issues raised by Dilokong Chrome Mines (Edms) Bpk v Direkteur-Generaal, Department van Handel en Nywerheid 1992 (4) SA 1 (A)' (1994) 5 Stellenbosch Law Review 197).

[5] SARFU 1 (supra) at paras 146 and 147.

[6] Ibid at para 147.

[7] Ibid at para 147. The SARFU 1 Court, at para 146, appears to state obiter that all the powers set out in FC s 84(2) are not administrative action: 'It is readily apparent that these responsibilities could not suitably be subjected to s 33.' It should, however, be noted that the Court's decision is confined to the President's decision to appoint a commission of inquiry. The Court expressly stated that the conduct of the commission itself 'is a different matter' (at para 147). It is submitted that the conduct of a commission of inquiry should be classified as administrative action (see the analogous case of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission proceedings in Du Preez & Another v Truth and Reconciliation Commission 1997 (3) SA 204 (A), 1997 (4) BCLR 531 (A)('Du Preez')).

source of this power was derived from legislation and not the Constitution itself. That fact suggested that its exercise constituted administrative action.[1] There were, however, indications to the contrary. As the Court stated, this power is closely related to the exercise by the head of state of the power to appoint a commission and to ensure it is able to perform its task effectively.[2] The Court, however, left this issue undecided and assumed for purposes of the judgment that the powers under the Commissions Act amounted to administrative action.[3]

The line-drawing exercise was even more difficult is Pharmaceutical Manufacturers. This case dealt with the President's decision to bring the South African Medicines and Medical Devices Regulatory Authority Act[4] into force (despite the regulations and schedules required to make sense of the Act not yet being ready). The President's power to bring the legislation into operation was derived from the relevant section of the legislation itself.[5] Nevertheless, the exercise of that power did not clearly amount to the implementation of legislation, as the legislation had not yet come into force. The Constitutional Court acknowledged that the President's power lay somewhere between the law-making process and the administrative process. It was a power derived from the legislation itself but was incidental to the law-making process.[6] The Court concluded that, having regard to the nature and source of the power, and particularly the fact that it required a 'political judgment as to when the legislation should be brought into force, a decision that is necessarily antecedent to the implementation of the legislation', the decision to bring the law into operation did not constitute administrative action as it was 'closer to the legislative process than the administrative process'.[7]

Unlike Presidential assent to Bills (which thus converts them into Acts of Parliament), the President who issues a proclamation is not, strictly speaking, engaging in a legislative act but is rather acting as the head of the national executive.[8] The decision in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers is thus best understood as an executive decision of the President which (because of its close link to the legislative process, the fact that it did not clearly involve the implementation of

[1] SARFU 1 (supra) at para 165.
[2] Ibid at para 166.
[3] Ibid at para 167.
[4] Act 132 of 1998.
[5] Section 55 of the Medical Devices Regulatory Authority Act reflected fairly standard wording, i.e. that the Act shall come 'into operation on a date determined by the President by proclamation in the Gazette'.
[6] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 79. It should, however, be noted that the President was not exercising a power circumscribed in legislation as the Medical Devices Regulatory Authority Act was not yet in force and therefore did not bind the President. Nevertheless, it was a power conferred by Parliament, without which the President could not simply bring legislation into force. Ibid at para 78.
[7] Ibid at para 79.
[8] Kruger v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others, [2008] ZACC 17 (2 October 2008) at para 6.

legislation[1] and that it required the exercise of a 'political judgment') was of a high policy nature and thus fell outside the ambit of administrative action.[2]

A more recent case in which the Constitutional Court has held that a decision amounts to executive action rather than administrative action is Masetlha.[3] As stated above, this case dealt with the President's decision effectively to dismiss the head of the NIA. Moseneke DCJ, writing on behalf of the majority of the Court, held that this type of dismissal fell into a special category because the implied power to dismiss the head of an intelligence service derived from both the Final Constitution and national legislation, and the power to dismiss was 'specially conferred upon the President for the effective business of government and, in this particular case, for the effective pursuit of national security'.[4] The nature of the special relationship that Moseneke DCJ refers to appears most clearly in the dissenting judgment of Ngcobo J,[5] who refers to the fact that the head of the NIA deals with extremely sensitive matters affecting national security, that the President must have absolute trust in the head of the NIA and '[t]he moment [the President] loses confidence in the ability, judgment or loyalty of the head of the NIA, he must have the power to remove him or her'.[6]

It is important not to over-extend the category of executive policy decisions so as to exclude a large range of actions from the application of the right to just administrative action. A number of public decisions which are affected by policy considerations (for example, a decision whether to continue to grant subsidies to Model C schools which were previously white schools) should properly be

[1] See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 172 (Takes a different view and contends that the case was 'obviously concerned with the implementation of legislation'.)

[2] See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 172–3 (Hoexter offers a critique of the Constitutional Court's reasoning in what she describes as a 'troubling case'. Hoexter points out that one difficulty with the Court's approach is that the making of delegated legislation will often require a 'political judgment' of some kind, both in relation to the timing of the legislation and its content. We submit that the 'political judgment' in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers should be limited to a judgment made by the head of the executive to bring legislation produced by an elected, deliberative, legislative body into force. Thus understood, the reasoning in this case does not apply to delegated legislation.)

[3] See also Geuking v President of the Republic of South Africa 2003 (3) SA 34 (CC), 2004 (9) BCLR 895 (CC)(Constitutional Court expressed the view that a decision of the President to consent to extradition was not administrative action. The President's decision 'is a policy decision which may be based on considerations of comity or reciprocity between the Republic and the requesting State. The decision is based not on the merits of the application for extradition but on the relationship between this country and the requesting State'. Ibid at para 26. The Constitutional Court expressed this view despite the fact that the President's power flowed from legislation — the Extradition Act, 1962.) Another instance of a court finding that an action amounted to executive rather than administrative action is found in Nephawe v Premier, Limpopo Province 2003 (5) SA 245 (T), 2003 (7) BCLR 784 (T) at pars 92 (Dealt with the decision of the Premier to refer a report of a commission of inquiry on traditional leaders to the relevant Minister 'as a contribution to the development of national policy'.)

[4] Masethla (supra) at para 77.

[5] Although Ngcobo J dissented as to the outcome of the case, he appears to agree with the majority that the dismissal of the head of the NIA did not amount to administrative action.

[6] Masethla (supra) at paras 166–7.

categorised as administrative action.[1] Such decisions are generally made in the course of implementing legislation. It is therefore important to distinguish between policy in the narrow sense and policy in the broad sense. The former cluster of actions includes decisions that are political. They are political in the sense of being a matter of controversy or party political debate or being taken by a high political authority.[2] The latter set of decisions — executive policy decisions — are themselves political in the sense of being subject only to the political accountability of the representative institutions of the Final Constitution. These decisions include the development of policy and the initiation of legislation. It is only policy decisions in the broad sense which should be excluded from the ambit of administrative action.[3] On this distinction, which is sometimes quite difficult to draw, O'Regan J, in Ed-U-College, wrote:[4]

> Policy may be formulated by the Executive outside of a legislative framework. For example, the Executive may determine a policy on road and rail transportation or on tertiary education. The formulation of such policy involves a political decision and will generally not constitute administrative action. However, policy may also be formulated in a narrower sense where a member of the Executive is implementing legislation. The formulation of policy in the exercise of such powers may often constitute administrative action.

In Ed-U-College the Court held that the determination of the formula for the grant of subsidies and the allocation of such subsidies (as opposed to the determination of the share of the budget for independent schools in the total education budget) contained an aspect of policy formulation, but it was policy in the narrow rather than the broad sense. The Court held that, having regard to the source of power (that is, the legislature), the constraints upon its exercise and its scope, it amounted to administrative action.

The approach of the Ed-U-College Court in distinguishing between policy in the narrow and broad sense has been employed in a number of subsequent decisions of our courts. These judgments hold that decisions do not fall beyond the reach of administrative justice simply because they have policy implications or 'overtones'.[5] As Nugent JA remarked in Grey's Marine: '[t]here will be few

[1] See Premier, Mpumalanga (supra) at para 41 ('Citizens are entitled to expect that government policy will ordinarily not be altered in ways which would threaten or harm their rights or legitimate expectations without their being given reasonable notice of the proposed change or an opportunity to make representations to the decision-maker.' (Our emphasis).)

[2] See Ed-U-College (supra) at para 17 ('[T]he fact that a decision has political implications does not necessarily mean that it is not an administrative decision within the meaning of s 33.')

[3] Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 169 (Helpfully refers to these decisions as '(high) policy decisions'.)

[4] Ed-U-College (supra) at para 18.

[5] See Hayes v Minister of Finance and Development Planning, Western Cape 2003 (4) SA 598 (C) at 611 (Decision on applications for departures from zoning regulations); Grey's Marine (supra) para 27 (Decision to grant lease of quayside property in Hout Bay); Mkhatshwa v Mkhatshwa & Another 2002 (3) SA 441 (T) (Premier's power to appoint a 'chief' in terms of the Black Administration Act 38 of 1927); Sebenza Forwarding and Shipping Consultancy (Pty) Ltd v Petroleum Oil and Gas Corporation of South Africa (Pty) Limited t/a Petro SA & Another 2006 (2) SA 52 (C)('Sebenza')(Decision of the Minister of Minerals and Energy not to conduct a formal enquiry into alleged irregularities in connection with a parastatal contract.)

administrative acts that are devoid of underlying policy — indeed, administrative action is most often the implementation of policy that has been given legal effect — but the execution of policy is not equivalent to its formulation'.[1]

As with Pharmaceutical Manufacturers, another case that is difficult to place in the categories of exceptions to administrative action is the decision of the Cape Provincial Division in Steele v South Peninsula Municipal Council.[2] In Steele, the High Court held that a resolution of a local council to remove speed bumps from two roads in its area of jurisdiction did not amount to administrative action. The Steele court also found that the decision was not legislative action but was rather 'a decision taken by a politically elected deliberative assembly whose individual members could not be asked to give reasons for the manner in which they had voted'.[3] The correctness of the decision in Steele is open to question. The mere fact that the local council is an elected, deliberative assembly is not necessarily sufficient to remove the decision from the realm of administrative action. The council was performing an executive act and did so in terms of a general statutory obligation in relation to traffic control and road safety. (However, as the court itself pointed out, it was not implementing any particular law).[4] While a decision to remove speed bumps may have certain overtones of executive policy in the local government context (particularly where the Final Constitution envisages that a local council acts both as a legislature and executive body at the local government level), a decision to remove speed bumps from two specific roads in a suburban area does not, in our view, amount to a high policy decision. Although there is merit in the Steele court's observation that one cannot expect individual members of an elected, deliberative body to give reasons for why they voted to remove the speed bumps, a local authority should not be able to avoid the requirements of administrative law by making administrative decisions in a deliberative forum.[5]

(iv) The distinction between judicial and administrative action

The third category of public power that does not amount to administrative action for purposes of FC s 33 is judicial action. In Nel, Ackermann J stated obiter that the summary sentencing procedure in s 205 of the Criminal Procedure Act[6] was 'judicial and not administrative action'.[7] One reason for this conclusion is that

[1] Grey's Marine (supra) at para 27.
[2] 2001 (3) SA 640 (C).
[3] Ibid at 644.
[4] Ibid at 633–4.
[5] For a preferable approach, see King William's Town Transitional Local Council v Border Alliance Taxi Association 2002 (4) SA 152 (E)(Holds that a decision of a local council to close a taxi rank amounts to administrative action.) See also Richardson and Others v South Peninsula Municipality and Others 2001 (3) BCLR 265 (C)(Holds that a municipal council's decision to approve a subdivision of property amounts to administrative action.)
[6] Act 51 of 1977.
[7] Nel (supra) at para 24.

the procedure was subject to appeal in the same manner as a sentence imposed in a criminal prosecution.[1]

This category of action — as with the category of legislative action — should be characterised by its source in the judicial process (involving the act of sentencing) rather than by its adjudicative nature (eg, the application of law to facts). It is the location of the courts' powers in the Final Constitution, and the accountability that flows from the constitutional position of judicial authorities, that is important for this purpose, not the adjudicative function they perform.[2] In this regard, a major area of contention has been whether arbitrations amount to administrative or judicial action. This question is discussed at length below.[3]

Again, as with the legislature, actions of judicial officers do not always fall on the judicial side of the administrative/judicial divide.[4] Judges and magistrates can act administratively. They exercise such powers under the Foreign Co-Operation in Criminal Matters Act[5] when issuing a letter of request to a foreign state for assistance[6] or, perhaps, when they issue a search warrant.[7]

(v) The distinction between administrative action and labour relations

A few years prior to the Interim Constitution, the Appellate Division in Administrator, Transvaal & Others v Zenzile & Others[8] held that the dismissal of a public sector employee was an exercise of pubic power and was subject to administrative law review. Nevertheless, since the advent of: (a) the Final Constitution, which not only entrenches the right to just administrative action but also guarantees to 'everyone' the right to fair labour practices[9] and (b) the post-constitutional LRA, which extends the protections of labour law to public sector employees, courts have grappled afresh with the question as to whether the relationship between public sector employers and employees is governed by administrative law.

Until the recent decision of the Constitutional Court in Chirwa, the focus of the dispute, which has been described as one of 'mystifying complexity',[10] was

[1] Nel (supra) at para 24.

[2] Sidumo employs a largely consistent approach. See § 63.3*(b)*(vii) infra. In Independent Newspapers, the Court noted but did not criticise the exclusion of judicial records from the scope of the PAIA in the arguably analogous context of the right of access to information.

[3] See § 63.3*(b)*(vii) infra.

[4] SARFU 1 (supra) at para 141('[J]udicial officers may, from time to time, carry out administrative tasks.')

[5] Act 75 of 1996.

[6] See Kolbatschenko v King NO & Another 2001 (4) SA 336 (C), 2003 (3) BCLR 288 (C) at paras 355–356 (It appears that this issue was common cause between the parties in this case.)

[7] See Terry v Botes and Another [2002] 3 All SA 798 (C). But see Pretoria Portland Cement Co Limited & Another v Competition Commission & Others 2003 (2) SA 385 (SCA).

[8] 1991 (1) SA 21 (A) ('Zenzile') at 34.

[9] FC s 23.

[10] See Transnet Ltd and Others v Chirwa 2007 (2) SA 198 (SCA)('Chirwa (SCA)') at para 33, quoted by Ngcobo J in Chirwa (supra) at para 81.

whether the decision of the public sector employer to dismiss its employee was public or private vis-à-vis the employee. A line of cases held that such decisions were public and therefore amounted to administrative action,[1] while another line held that employment relationships should be governed exclusively by labour law, were private and thus did not amount to administrative action.[2] It was hoped that the Supreme Court of Appeal would provide greater clarity when the issue came before it in Chirwa (SCA) (a case arising from the dismissal of the Human Resources Executive Manager of the Transnet Pension Fund). But the SCA proved divided. Two judges (per Mthiyane JA) held that, in dismissing the applicant, Transnet 'did not act as a public authority but simply in its capacity as an employer' and did not engage in administrative action.[3] Two other judges (per Cameron JA) held that the dismissal involved the exercise of public power and thus amounted to administrative action.[4]

Given the long line of divergent cases that preceded it, it came as somewhat of a surprise that when Chirwa was decided by the Constitutional Court, it was virtually unanimous in finding that the dismissal of the employee concerned did not amount to administrative action.[5] A further surprise was that, despite the previous focus of the case law on the public / private divide, the majority of the Constitutional Court decided the matter on a different basis. Ngcobo J, who wrote the majority judgment on this issue, adopted the view that the dismissal of an employee by Transnet did involve the exercise of public power,[6] but that it nevertheless did not amount to administrative action because it fell into a newly identified constitutional-level category of employment and labour relations.

Ngcobo J adopts a functional approach to the meaning of administrative action, stressing, in the language of SARFU 1, that what matters in the identification of administrative action is the function and not the functionary, and that the most important consideration is the nature of the power involved.[7] Ngcobo J observes that the source and nature of the power in this case was contractual, that it did not involve the implementation of legislation and that the termination of the [1] See, for example, Police and Prisons Civil Rights Union & Others v Minister of Correctional Services & Others (2006) 27 ILJ 555 (E). See also Chirwa (supra) at para 128 fn 63 (For other citations).

[2] See, eg, SA Police Union & Another v National Commissioner of the SA Police Services & Another (2005) 26 ILJ 2403 (LC). For other cases, see Chirwa (supra) at para 128 ftn 62.

[3] Chirwa (SCA) (supra) at para 15.

[4] The fifth judge (Conradie JA) decided the matter on a different basis and thus did not address whether the dismissal amounted to administrative action.

[5] Ten judges held that the dismissal was not administrative action. The eleventh, Skweyiya J, did not consider it necessary to decide this issue but added, in language suggesting that he had decided it anyway, that: 'If, however, I had been called upon to answer that question, I would have come to the same conclusion as Ngcobo J: namely, that the conduct of Transnet did not constitute administrative action under section 33 of the Constitution for the reasons that he advances in his judgment.' Chirwa (supra) at para 73.

[6] For a discussion of this aspect of the judgment in Chirwa, see § 63.3*(b)*(vii) infra.

[7] See Chirwa (supra) at paras 139–142.

contract of employment did not amount to 'administration' but was 'more concerned with labour and employment relations'.[1] Ngcobo J thus concludes that the dismissal did not amount to administrative action.[2] Ngcobo J then points to the structure of the Final Constitution in supporting his view. He remarks that '[t]he Constitution draws a clear distinction between administrative action on the one hand and employment and labour relations on the other' and contemplates that these two areas of law 'will be subject to different forms of regulation, review and enforcement'.[3] He goes on to emphasise the separate protection of the constitutional right to fair labour practices in FC s 23 and states that there is no indication that public sector labour disputes should be treated any differently to those in the private sector.[4] Ngcobo J then refers to the range of legal protections now available to public sector employees in labour law, and notes that is no longer necessary to extend the protection of administrative law to this category of employees.[5] He concludes as follows:

> In my judgement labour and employment relations are dealt with comprehensively in section 23 of the Constitution. Section 33 of the Constitution does not deal with labour and employment relations. There is no longer a distinction between public and private sector employees under our Constitution. The starting point under our Constitution is that all workers should be treated equally and any deviations from this principle should be justified. There is no reason in principle why public sector employees who fall within the ambit of the LRA should be treated differently from private sector employees and be given more rights than private sector employees. Therefore, I am unable to agree that a public sector employee, who challenges the manner in which a disciplinary hearing that resulted in his or her dismissal, has two causes of action, one flowing from the LRA and another flowing from the Constitution.

This approach of the majority of the Constitutional Court in Chirwa is novel. It identifies a category of public power to which the label 'administrative action' does not apply; an exception that is not based on the doctrine of separation of powers (unlike the traditional categories of legislative action, broad executive policy decisions and judicial decisions) but rather in a distribution of constitutional competence rooted in the Bill of Rights itself.[6] There are two important

[1] Chirwa (supra) at para 142.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Ibid at paras 143–4.

[4] Ibid at para 145 ('On the contrary, section 23 contemplates that employees regardless of the sector in which they are employed will be governed by it. The principle underlying section 23 is that the resolution of employment disputes in the public sector will be resolved through the same mechanisms and in accordance with the same values as the private sector, namely, through collective bargaining and the adjudication of unfair labour practice as opposed to judicial review of administrative action'.)

[5] Ibid at para 148. In this sense, the Chirwa majority interprets Zenzile as a pre-Bill of Rights decision necessary for its time.

[6] An analogous exclusion from the PAJA definition of administrative action is arguably s 1(hh), the exclusion of a decision taken in terms of the PAIA. FC s 33 arguably does not provide a separate and additional source of accountability for the action taken in implementing FC s 32. Of course, at the level of legislation giving effect to FC s 32, PAIA does at least provide an alternative source of accountability by including provisions for review of PAIA decisions.

threads in this portion of Ngcobo J's judgment. The one is that the decision to dismiss is contractual in nature, is concerned with labour and employment relations and is thus not 'administration'. The second thread is that the Final Constitution envisages that labour relations are dealt with separately to administrative action and that public sector employees have the same protections as their private sector counterparts. While the first thread suggests that the position would be different if the power to terminate the employment contract arose from legislation rather than contract, the second thread suggests that this is not the case.

Ngcobo J's judgment can thus be read as adopting the position that public sector employees enjoy protection under the fundamental right to fair labour practices (and the legislation that implements and enforces that right) and therefore do not need additional protection under the right to just administrative action. This approach to determining the ambit of FC s 33 would be an unusual way to interpret a constitutional right. There are many instances in which particular conduct infringes more than one right. In fact, it is seldom that a litigant in fundamental rights litigation goes to court asserting the breach of only one fundamental right.[1] It is, in our view, inadvisable for courts to limit the ambit of a particular fundamental right based on the ambit of other overlapping fundamental rights.[2] If a right is truly fundamental, its substance should not vary depending on other complementary rights that are placed alongside it (i.e. rights that operate in the same direction, as opposed to rights that are in opposition).[3] As Langa CJ

[1] There is, for example, often an overlap between freedom of expression and freedom of religion, between the right to property and equality, and between dignity and a number of other fundamental rights.

[2] Such an approach is also, we submit, contrary to that of the majority of the Constitutional Court in Sidumo (supra), discussed at § 63.3*(b)*(vii) infra. In Sidumo the majority rejected an argument that a decision of the CCMA did not amount to administrative action because it was governed by FC s 33 (labour relations) and FC s 34 (access to court). Navsa AJ held as follows: 'This submission is based on the misconception that the rights in ss 23, 33 and 34 are necessarily exclusive and have to be dealt with in sealed compartments. The right to fair labour practices, in the present context, is consonant with the right to administrative action that is lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair. Everyone has the right to have these rights enforced before the CCMA acting as an impartial tribunal. In the present context, these rights in part overlap and are interconnected.' Ibid at para 112. This apparent inconsistency in approach is even more surprising when one considers that the judgment in Chirwa was handed down less than two months after the judgment in Sidumo and that a number of judges signed on to both majority judgments. See also C Hoexter 'Clearing the Intersection? Administrative Law and Labour Law in the Constitutional Court' in 1 Constitutional Court Review (2008) — (forthcoming)('Clearing the Intersection?'). We acknowledge, however, that the practical outcomes of the decisions in Chirwa and Sidumo are not contradictory. The result of these decisions is that the dismissal of an employee (whether a public or private sector employee) will not amount to 'administrative action' but will rather enjoy the protection of labour law (i.e., FC s 23, the LRA and other applicable legislation). And while a decision of the CCMA in respect of such dismissal will amount to 'administrative action' for purposes of FC s 33, it will fall to be dealt with under the LRA rather than PAJA.

[3] We accept that the reach of one fundamental right may be limited by other fundamental rights that pull in a different direction in a particular case. Fundamental rights may be limited by countervailing considerations, including other rights. For example, in the context of defamation, the plaintiff's right to dignity may limit the defendant's right to freedom of expression. Fundamental rights should, however, not be limited by complementary or overlapping rights that pull in the same direction.

stated in his minority judgment in Chirwa: '[a] litigant is entitled to the full protection of both rights, even when they seem to cover the same ground'.[1]

On the other hand, Ngcobo J's judgment can be read as adopting the position that 'administrative action' requires an act of 'administration', in the sense of an other-regarding act through which the administrator engages with the subject of administration qua administrator.[2] In other words, the action must have an external effect.[3] This approach is also, in our view, not entirely convincing. As we stated in the original version of this chapter, the disciplining of a public servant can be seen to have a direct, external legal effect on the relevant person.[4]

Having examined the main categories of public power that are excluded from the ambit of administrative action, we now turn to consider two other contentious issues relating to the scope of administrative action: rule-making and compulsory, statutory arbitrations.

(vi) Rule-making as administrative action

Does rule-making qualify as administrative action? The question has attracted much attention since the advent of the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution's protection of the fundamental right to administrative justice.

South African academic opinion is fairly unanimous: yes, delegated or subordinate legislation and other forms of rule-making should be treated as administrative action and should be subject to administrative review.[5] To restrict

[1] Chirwa (supra) at para 175.

[2] We reiterate in this regard that Ngcobo J states that the dismissal is not administrative action, on the basis that the nature of the power is contractual, is not the implementation of legislation and does not constitute 'administration'. Ibid at para 142. It is only after this conclusion that Ngcobo J goes on to state that this view is supported by the provisions of the Constitution that, according to him, draw a distinction between administrative action and labour relations. Ibid at paras 143–149.

[3] The requirement of this 'external' effect is reflected in the corresponding requirement in PAJA's definition of 'administrative action'. See § 63.3*(c)*(vii).

[4] The other important aspect of Chirwa (of course not directly relevant to the scope of the right to just administrative action) relates to the question as to the overlapping jurisdiction between the Labour Court (under the LRA) and the High Court (under PAJA). The Chirwa Court held that a public sector dismissal falls within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Labour Court. For a criticism of this aspect of the judgment, amongst others, see Hoexter 'Clearing the Intersection?' (supra). See also Nugent JA in Makambi v The Member of the Executive Council, the Department of Education, Eastern Cape Province, Unreported judgment of the SCA, Case no. 638/06 (29 May 2008)(Nugent JA writes: 'Regrettably I can find no clear legal — as opposed to policy — reason for the outcome in Chirwa' (at para 21). Nugent JA points out that it is impossible to reconcile Chirwa with the previous decision of the Constitutional Court in Fredericks v MEC for Education and Training, Eastern Cape 2002 (2) SA 693 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 113 (CC).)

[5] See Burns & Beukes Administrative Law (supra) at 131 ('Since the exercise of this authoritative power (the promulgation of subordinate legislation) potentially has far-reaching consequences for the individual and may often impact harshly on individual rights, it must be included in the definition of administrative action'); Currie The PAJA (supra) at 88; Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 84; De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 39–40; Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 191; I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (2005) 656 ('It seems extremely unlikely that [PAJA] does not apply to the making of delegated legislation'); and M Beukes 'The Constitutional Foundation of the Implementation and Interpretation of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000' in C Langa and J Wessels (eds) The Right to Know: South Africa's Promotion of Administrative Justice and Access to Information Acts (2004) 1, 12.

'administrative action' to purely administrative decisions and adjudications would be unacceptable given the vast bulk of governmental administration undertaken by regulation. Nevertheless, the Constitutional Court has still not provided a clear answer to this question.

The first occasion on which the issue arose, albeit tangentially, was in in Fedsure. In Fedsure, the Court clearly supported coverage of the administrative justice clause beyond purely administrative decisions and adjudications.[1] The Court was thus willing to go beyond the bounds of South African Roads Board v Johannesburg City Council.[2] In South African Roads Board v Johannesburg City Council, Milne JA articulated a distinction between those government decisions applying generally (termed 'legislative') and those applying in a particular situation. According to the Court, the cases referred to by Milne JA in exempting the impact of natural justice from legislative decisions were of 'little assistance' in determining the content of administrative action in terms of the Interim Constitution.[3] The majority judgment, delivered by the triumvirate of Chaskalson P, Goldstone J and O'Regan J, noted:

> Laws are frequently made by functionaries in whom the power to do so has been vested by a competent legislature. Although the result of the action taken in such circumstances may be 'legislation', the process by which the legislation is made is in substance 'administrative'.[4]

The issue came before the Constitutional Court more squarely in the post-PAJA case of Minister of Home Affairs v Eisenberg.[5] Eisenberg involved a challenge to immigration regulations. Here the Court avoided the issue of classifying the delegated legislation. It assumed that the regulations amounted to administrative action for purposes of PAJA and then found that the regulations did not fall foul of PAJA's provisions. Passing statements of Chaskalson CJ, who delivered judgment on behalf of the Court in Eisenberg, are ambivalent. One dictum suggests that rule-making might not be administrative action for purposes of PAJA.[6] Yet another raises potential doubts about the constitutionality of such an outcome.[7]

[1] Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 173 describes the judgment in this case as giving a 'strong hint' that delegated legislation amounts to administrative action under the Constitution.

[2] 1991 (4) SA 1 (A).

[3] Fedsure (supra) at para 26.

[4] Fedsure (supra) at para 27.

[5] Minister of Home Affairs v Eisenberg and Associates: In re Eisenberg and Associates v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2003 (5) SA 281 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 838 (CC)('Eisenberg').

[6] Ibid at para 52.

[7] Ibid at para 53 fn 30 (Chaskalson CJ states that the question as to the application of PAJA to this case 'raises complex issues including the question whether a construction of PAJA that excludes the making of regulations from the ambit of administrative action would be consistent with the Constitution'.) For another case which supports the view that the making of delegated legislation amounts to administrative action, see Association of Chartered Certified Accountants v Chairman, Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board 2001 (2) SA 980 (W).

The decision of the Constitutional Court in New Clicks was therefore read with keen interest to see how the Court would deal with the respondents' assertion that the delegated legislation (in that case, the ministerial regulations dealing with medicine pricing that had been promulgated under the Medicines and Related Substances Control Act)[1] amounted to administrative action and should be reviewed under PAJA. The decisions that preceded the appeal to the Constitutional Court were a mixed bag. The majority of the Full Bench of the Cape High Court[2] held that the Pricing Regulations, and the Pricing Committee's recommendations that preceded them, did not amount to administrative action under PAJA, but that they were, in any event, reviewable under FC s 33.[3] Traverso DJP wrote a dissenting judgment. She found that the Pricing Regulations were administrative action for purposes of both FC s 33 and PAJA.[4] The Supreme Court of Appeal unanimously struck down the Pricing Regulations on grounds of legality and therefore did not find it necessary to consider the administrative action question.[5] There is, however, a strong suggestion towards the end of the judgment that regulations should be treated as administrative action because it would otherwise result in the 'unlikely' situation of the scope of administrative justice being reduced under the Final Constitution and PAJA.[6]

Those who hoped that the Constitutional Court would clarify the issue once and for all in New Clicks came away disappointed. The Court was very much divided in the way that it dealt (or did not deal) with this issue. Of the five substantive judgments delivered by the Court in this case, only the opinion of Chaskalson CJ (in whose judgment O'Regan J concurs) came down in favour of the general principle that regulations amount to administrative action under both FC s 33 and PAJA. Chaskalson CJ starts by pointing out that rule-making was reviewable on administrative law grounds prior to the Interim Constitution,[7] and that neither the Interim Constitution nor Final Constitution showed any intention

[1] Act 101 of 1965 ('the Medicines Act'). The regulations at issue were the Regulations Relating to a Transparent Pricing System for Medicines and Scheduled Substances in Government Notice R553 in Government Gazette 26304 of 30 April 2004 ('the Pricing Regulations').

[2] The decision of the Cape High Court is reported as New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Limited v Tshabalala-Msimang & Another NNO; Pharmaceutical Society of South Africa & Others v Tshabalala-Msimang & Another NNO 2005 (2) SA 530 (C) ('New Clicks (HC)').

[3] New Clicks (HC) (supra) at paras 45, 49 and 50. Presumably this means that the majority found that the Pricing Committee's recommendation and the regulations amounted to 'administrative action' for purposes of FC s 33. As pointed out at § 63.2*(a)*(iv) supra, this approach to the relationship between FC s 33 and PAJA is incorrect. One cannot simply circumvent the requirements of PAJA by relying directly on FC s 33, unless one is challenging the constitutionality of PAJA.

[4] New Clicks (HC) (supra) at paras 41 and 58 (Traverso DJP).

[5] See Pharmaceutical Society of South Africa & Others v Tshabalala-Msimang & Another NNO; New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Limited v Minister of Health & Another 2005 (3) SA 238 (SCA), 2005 (6) BCLR 576 (SCA)('New Clicks (SCA)').

[6] New Clicks (SCA) (supra) at para 94. Under our common law, regulations were subject to review on administrative law grounds. See Baxter Administrative Law (supra) at 490–494.

[7] New Clicks (supra) at paras 101–106.

to exclude rule-making from the reach of administrative justice.[1] In fact, according to the Chief Justice, the Final Constitution does the opposite. Chaskalson CJ points to a number of constitutional provisions which reflect the importance of accountability, transparency and public participation in the law-making process,[2] and concludes that:

> The making of delegated legislation by members of the Executive is an essential part of public administration. It gives effect to the policies set by the Legislature and provides the detailed infrastructure according to which this is to be done. The Constitution calls for open and transparent government, and requires public participation in the making of laws by Parliament and deliberative legislative assemblies. To hold that the making of delegated legislation is not part of the right to just administrative action would be contrary to the Constitution's commitment to open and transparent government.[3]

Ngcobo J (with whom Langa DCJ and Van der Westhuizen J concur) agrees that the Pricing Regulations at issue in New Clicks amount to administrative action under both FC s 33 and PAJA, but leaves open the question as to whether delegated legislation generally amounts to administrative action.[4] As with other (more recent) judgments that Ngcobo J has penned on the meaning of administrative action,[5] his reasoning in New Clicks focuses on the nature of the powers and functions conferred by the relevant empowering provision (s 22G of the Medicines Act). He emphasises that s 22G provides for a 'unique process', in that the Minister must make regulations 'on the recommendation of the Pricing Committee'.[6] In other words, neither the Minister nor the Pricing Committee may act alone. They must act together.[7] The Pricing Committee's investigation, recommendation and the ministerial regulations are thus 'interlinked' and 'inseparable', and 'the recommendation of the Pricing Committee represents part of the process of regulation-making'.[8] Ngcobo J concludes that the nature of the power and its subject-matter in this particular case amounts to the implementation of legislation and can 'readily be subjected to s 33'.[9] We note that, although Ngcobo J left open

[1] Ibid at paras 107–113.

[2] See FC s 59 (Obliges the National Assembly to facilitate public involvement in the legislative process.) New Clicks (supra) at paras 110–113.

[3] New Clicks (supra) at para 113.

[4] Ibid at para 422.

[5] See § 63.3*(b)(v)* supra, and § 63.3*(b)*(vii) infra.

[6] New Clicks (supra) at para 441.

[7] Ibid.

[8] Ibid at para 442.

[9] Ibid at para 450. The nature of the power that, for Ngcobo J, seems to be determinative is the fact that the Pricing Regulations are specific, providing for a specific pricing system with particular prices and fees, and that the Pricing Committee operated in a similar way to an administrative decision-maker — ie it investigated the matter and made a recommendation. Ibid at paras 440–442 and 450. It is difficult to pin down Ngcobo J's reasoning on this score, particularly as he also states that PAJA applies to the specific regulations at issue in this case for the reasons set out in Chaskalson CJ's judgment but that 'there are additional reasons why PAJA is applicable'. Ibid at para 422.

the question as to whether general rule-making amounts to administrative action, much of his reasoning would seem to support of an argument that this question should be answered in the affirmative.[1]

Moseneke J (in whose judgment Madala, Mokgoro, Skweyiya and Yacoob JJ concurred) adopts the position that it was 'neither prudent nor necessary' to decide whether the Pricing Regulations amount to administrative action.[2] He confines himself to noting briefly that there are, on the one hand, compelling reasons for holding that ministerial regulation-making is reviewable under PAJA and, on the other, there are 'at the very least equally compelling considerations that ministerial legislation is not administrative action. . .'.[3]

The final judgment in New Clicks to deal with this question is that of Sachs J. Sachs J adopts a creative and thought-provoking approach to the question of the review of rule-making. His position is that the right to just administrative action is confined to 'adjudication' (in the sense of administrative decision-making) and does not extend to rule-making. As he states:

> Section 33 is directed towards administrative acts of an adjudicative kind, and not to legislative functions carried out by the administration. The notions of procedural fairness and the right to be given written reasons fit in closely with adjudicative justice for individuals. They are not, without undue interpretive strain consonant with subordinate legislation.[4]

Sachs J is therefore the only judge in the New Clicks saga (and, in fact, the only judge that we are aware of in any decision of our courts) who has held that regulation-making does not amount to administrative action for purposes of FC s 33. This is, however, not because he adopts a narrow view on the ambit of administrative law review. On the contrary, his judgment in New Clicks calls for 'an expansive notion of legality', which he regards as 'an alternative and better way of securing constitutional supervision of subordinate legislation'.[5] This expanded notion of legality would embody both procedural fairness (members of the public should be given a reasonable opportunity to comment during the rule-making process)[6] and substantive reasonableness.[7]

[1] See New Clicks (supra) at para 849 (O'Regan J) and para 851 (Van der Westhuisen J). See also W Wakwa-Mandlana and C Plasket 'Administrative Law' in 2005 Annual Survey of South African Law 104, 108. See also New Clicks (supra) at para 476 (Ngcobo J)('Nor am I persuaded that categorisation of the exercise of public power as adjudicative or legislative provides the criterion as to whether the exercise of the power in question amounts to administrative action. The trend in modern administrative law has been to move away from formal classification as a criterion'.)

[2] Ibid at para 722.

[3] Ibid at para 723.

[4] Ibid at para 596.

[5] Ibid at para 612.

[6] Ibid at para 630.

[7] Ibid at paras 635–637. Sachs J regards legality as, at least in part, a branch of administrative law: 'Thus to say that the making of subordinate legislation involves the implementation of primary legislation and is therefore part of administrative law, is to state the question, not to resolve it. The question that remains is: is it a form of implementation which falls under the concept of administrative action as envisaged in s 33 of the Bill of Rights, or is it in essence an extension of the legislative process that happens to be undertaken by the administration, thereby falling to be considered under a different constitutional rubric?' Ibid at para 582.

With regard to the specific regulations at issue in New Clicks, Sachs J holds that the Pricing Regulations are generally not administrative action because they are rule-making in form.[1] The regulation dealing with the more specific issue of the determination of a dispensing fee for pharmacists,[2] on the other hand, is, according to Sachs J, sufficiently specific to be 'adjudicative' in form and therefore falls within the scope of administrative action as contemplated in FC s 33 and PAJA.[3]

The approach of Sachs J is a salutary reminder of the importance of fairness and substantive reasonableness in all areas of administrative decision-making. Nonetheless, constitutional law is made from majority judgments. And the interesting pathway indicated by Sachs was not taken by the Court in Masetlha.[4] Thus, the substantive underpinning for the one judgment against rule-making as administrative action has been cut away, leaving five judges broadly in favour of treating rule-making as administrative action and five yet to decide. We contend that the preferable approach is that advanced by Chaskalson CJ in New Clicks. All administrative rule-making shall be accommodated under the rubric of 'administrative action'. This approach avoids attempting to draw difficult lines between different types of regulations (which Ngcobo J's approach intimates). More importantly, it is in our view consistent with a principled approach to the ambit of administrative action based on the separation of powers. A rule-making act performed by a member of the executive should not be characterised as a legislative (rather than an administrative) act simply because it has rule-making qualities. As stated above, legislative action should only fall beyond the label 'administrative action' when it is performed by a deliberative, legislative body in respect of which the Final Constitution provides an alternative form of accountability. As discussed below, this approach is, on our view, consistent with that of the majority of the Constitutional Court in Sidumo in the context of statutory arbitrations.[5]

We accept that there may well be a need for greater flexibility with respect to administrative law rules that apply to rule-making and the manner in which those rules are scrutinised on review. This conclusion does not, however, mean that rule-making should be excluded from the ambit 'of administrative action'. This

[1] New Clicks (supra) at para 642 (Sachs J states that the scheme created by the regulations 'affects the public at large and applies indefinitely into the future' and is thus '[l]aw-making in the fullest sense'.)

[2] Regulation 10.

[3] Sachs J explains that the objective in relation to the dispensing fee is 'not so much to establish a general normative structure as to determine a precise figure for a particular activity of a directly identified group of persons. The price tag put on the activity of the pharmacists affects their interests materially, adversely and in an immediately operative way.' Ibid at para 646. It is surprising that Sachs J did not find that the same applies to another key regulation in New Clicks, regulation 5(2)(c) which, read with Annexure A to the Pricing Regulations, sets out a detailed (though unclear) method for determining the initial single exit price of medicines. It would seem that this regulation would equally have a material and immediate effect on, at least, pharmaceutical manufacturers.

[4] See § 63.2*(b)* supra.

[5] See § 63.3*(b)*(vii) infra.

conclusion suggests that courts should develop an appropriate approach to scrutiny of administrative rule-making through the concepts of variability or levels of scrutiny.[1]

(vii) Statutory arbitrations as administrative action

Another contentious issue regarding the application of FC s 33 is whether or not it applies to decisions of arbitrators pursuant to compulsory, statutory arbitrations. The context in which this issue has arisen is compulsory arbitration before the CCMA under the LRA. It is an issue that divided the Constitutional Court in the Sidumo.[2]

The majority of judges (five to four)[3] held that a compulsory, statutory arbitration amounts to administrative action.[4] After noting the standard caution in SARFU 1 that what matters is 'not so much the functionary as the function',[5] the majority notes that administrative tribunals 'straddle a wide spectrum', from those that implement and give effect to policy or legislation to those that resemble courts of law.[6] Navsa AJ goes on to point out some similarities between the CCMA process and courts (e.g. the manner of adducing evidence, the power of subpoena, the contempt power and the fact that an award is final and binding).[7] He, however, points out that there are important differences between the two fora (the CCMA must conduct matters with a minimum of legal formalities in order to determine the dispute fairly and quickly, there is no blanket right to legal representation, no system of binding precedents and CCMA commissioners do not have security of tenure).[8] As Navsa AJ says: '[t]he CCMA is not a court of law'.[9] Relying on this institutional characterisation of the CCMA, the majority concluded that, as the commissioners exercised public power, their decisions amounted to administrative action under FC s 33.[10]

Consistent with his other decisions, Ngcobo J commences his minority judgment by stressing that the test for determining whether conduct amounts to [1] See § 63.4 infra.

[2] Supra.
[3] Navsa AJ delivered the majority judgment in Sidumo, in which four other judges concurred, including O'Regan J who wrote a separate concurring judgment. Ngcobo J penned the minority judgment, in which three judges concurred. Sachs J wrote a separate judgment concurring with both the majority and the minority judgments.
[4] A unanimous Supreme Court of Appeal had found that CCMA arbitrations amounted to administrative action for purposes of PAJA. See Rustenburg Platinum Mines Limited (Rustenburg Section) v Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration 2007 (1) SA 576 (SCA).
[5] SARFU 1 (supra) at para 141.
[6] Sidumo (supra) at paras 81–82.
[7] Ibid at para 84.
[8] Ibid at para 85.
[9] Ibid.
[10] Ibid at para 88.

administrative action is whether the function is administrative in nature.[1] He even goes so far as to say that '[t]he identity of the functionary performing the function is not relevant for purposes of determining whether a particular conduct constitutes administrative action.'[2] True to his word, Ngcobo J focuses on the arbitral function of the CCMA. he notes that it 'involves a determination of facts and the application of legal principles in order to decide whether or not a dismissal is fair' and that CCMA arbitrations 'bear all the hallmarks of a judicial function'.[3] He points out that the CCMA thus constitutes an independent and impartial tribunal for purposes of FC s 34 and must therefore decide matters in a fair, public hearing.[4] The minority thus distinguishes between actions of the CCMA that are administrative in nature (which are governed by FC s 33) and those that are adjudicative in nature (to which FC s 34 applies). Ngcobo J concludes that the conduct of CCMA arbitrations is very different from the functions of other statutory tribunals. The CCMA's functions 'are closer to, if not identical to the judicial function'.[5] As a result, the decisions of the CCMA do not amount to administrative action.[6]

A comparison of the majority and the minority judgments in Sidumo reveals a significant difference of approach to the distinction between judicial and administrative action. The majority adopt a primarily institutional test in drawing the line between judicial and administrative action. By this, we mean that the majority considered whether the action was judicial (as opposed to administrative) by focusing on whether the CCMA was institutionally a court of law, rather than by adopting a functional approach which would emphasise the nature of the function that the CCMA performs (which, in this case, is adjudicative).[7] Accordingly, the actions of the CCMA are not taken out of the administrative realm simply because they are adjudicative (or judicial) in nature. By contrast, the

[1] Sidumo (supra) at para 203.

[2] With apparent reliance on SARFU 1, Ngcobo J adds: '[t]he fact that the CCMA is not a court of law and does not have judicial authority, is irrelevant'. Ibid at paras 203 and 220

[3] Sidumo (supra) at paras 207–208.

[4] Ibid at para 215.

[5] Ibid at para 238.

[6] Ibid at para 240. The Supreme Court of Appeal reached the same conclusion in Total Support Management (Pty) Limited & Another v Diversified Health Systems (SA) (Pty) Limited & Another. 2002 (4) SA 661 (SCA), 2007 (5) BCLR 503 (SCA) ('Total Support Management'). (This case, dealing with a private, consensual arbitration, held that it amounts to judicial action and is thus not administrative action. Ibid at para 25). This aspect of the SCA's decision is in effect overruled by the judgment of the majority of the Constitutional Court in Sidumo. Nevertheless, it is still possible to argue that private arbitrations amount to the exercise of private rather than public power and, for that reason, are not administrative action. See Total Support Management at para 24. See, further, the discussion on the distinction between public and private power at § 63.3*(b)*(viii). See also Telecordia Technologies Inc v Telkom SA Limited 2007 (3) SA 266 (SCA) at para 45.

[7] Navsa AJ accepts that the decision of the CCMA would, in pre-constitutional language, have been described as a 'quasi-judicial function' and bears many similarities to the judicial process. Sidumo (supra) at para 88.

minority adopt a thorough-going functional approach to the distinction. They repeatedly refer to the adjudicative nature of the CCMA's arbitrations and adopt the attitude that the functionary is irrelevant.[1] Ngcobo J's focus on a functional approach is evident in his regular reiteration of the SARFU 1 test on numerous occasions in his judgment.[2]

The majority's approach in Sidumo is correct. And it can be reconciled with the dictum in SARFU 1. The ability to reconcile the two judgments does not, however, most clearly appear from Navsa J's majority judgment. It is rather to be found in the separate concurring judgment written by O'Regan J.[3]

O'Regan J calls for a 'substantive understanding of section 33'.[4] She stresses that 'the question of whether the CCMA falls within the scope of section 33 should be answered by determining the constitutional purpose of section 33 and then considering whether it is constitutionally suitable to impose the requirements of section 33 on the conduct of the CCMA.'[5] She refers to the passage in SARFU 1 that focuses on the function rather than the functionary, but points out that this phrase was used by the Constitutional Court in that case in seeking to draw the line between two forms of executive action (policy decisions and administrative action), and was not used to distinguish between judicial and administrative action.[6] O'Regan J points to the decisions of the Constitutional Court in Nel and De Lange v Smuts NO & Others,[7] which, according to her, held that powers are judicial 'not only because they involved adjudication, but because they were powers which under our constitutional order, are to be exercised only by the judiciary'.[8] Although she accepts that arbitral decisions of the CCMA are adjudicative in nature and that the CCMA is an independent and impartial tribunal as contemplated in FC s 34, she rejects Ngcobo J's view that this description means that the decisions are judicial rather than administrative.[9] O'Regan J adopts the position that the distinctions between different forms of public power (legislative, executive, judicial, on the one hand, and administrative, on the other) should be based on the doctrine of separation of powers. It is for

[1] See, for example, Sidumo (supra) at paras 207–208, 215–220 and 233–238.

[2] Ibid at paras 203, 217, 225, 230 and 234.

[3] O'Regan J's judgment is, in our view, one of the most meaningful decisions on the proper approach to assessing the scope of 'administrative action' under FC s 33. It is unfortunate that no other judges signed on to it.

[4] Sidumo (supra) at para 137.

[5] Ibid at para 135. O'Regan J makes a similar point elsewhere. Ibid at para 132 ('In my view, the question needs to be answered by understanding the proper constitutional purpose of section 33 and then considering that purpose against the context of the adjudicative functions of the CCMA'.)

[6] Ibid at para 130.

[7] 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) ('De Lange v Smuts').

[8] Sidumo (supra) at paras 127–129.

[9] Ibid at paras 124 and 126.

this reason, she says, that the Constitutional Court has held that the legislative action of democratically elected legislative bodies, certain executive policy decisions and judicial actions of judicial officers do not amount to administrative action. Why? Again, because it is not constitutionally appropriate to review these actions on administrative law grounds.[1] In this regard, it seems that the most important question is whether the principles of responsiveness, transparency and, most importantly, accountability indicate that the conduct should be subject to administrative review.[2] In O'Regan J's words:

> The content of section 33 is straightforward. It requires administrative action to be 'lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair'. It also requires that written reasons be given for administrative action that adversely affects the rights of individuals. Section 33 should be understood as one of the key constitutional provisions giving life to the constitutional values of accountability, responsiveness and openness to be found in section 1 of our Constitution. It recognises that requiring administrative action to be lawful, procedurally fair and reasonable is one of the ways of ensuring the exercise of public power that is accountable. The question of purposive constitutional interpretation that thus arises is whether it is constitutionally appropriate to hold the CCMA to these standards.[3]

Turning to the classification of CCMA arbitrations, O'Regan J rightly concludes that the separation of powers doctrine has 'no application' to such decisions, and that there are 'powerful reasons' why adjudicative tribunals should be held to the standards of FC s 33.[4] These reasons flow from the fact that the CCMA is an organ of state exercising public power under legislation, that it determines disputes as to the fairness of labour practices, that the LRA contemplates that it should do so in a speedy and cheap fashion and that an appeal does not lie against its decisions.[5] To this we would only add that, whereas an entire constitutional chapter (as well as the doctrine of separation of powers more generally) structures the accountability of the judiciary,[6] FC s 33 imposes constitutional accountability on non-s 166 tribunals.

The approach of the Sidumo majority judgments reflects two principles that are, in our view, equally applicable to the classification of administrative rule-making.[7] The first is that an act of the administration is not removed from the ambit of administrative action merely because it has the characteristics of power

[1] Sidumo (supra) at para 136.

[2] O'Regan J points out that a similar approach was adopted by the Constitutional Court in Fedsure. Fedsure (supra) at para 41. It is noteworthy that the judgments of Ngcobo J in Sidumo and Chirwa are, in some respects, consistent with this general approach in that they emphasise the alternative form of constitutional accountability in relation to the decisions at issue in those cases, which accountability arises from FC s 34 and FC s 23, respectively.

[3] Sidumo (supra) at para 138.

[4] Ibid at para 137.

[5] Ibid at para 139–140.

[6] See Chapter 8 of the Final Constitution: Courts and the Administration of Justice.

[7] See § 63.3*(b)*(vi) supra.

that is traditionally exercised by one of the other branches. In other words, it does not fall beyond 'administrative action' simply because its nature is judicial (i.e. adjudicatory).[1] The related second principle is that the exercise of public power that is judicial in nature falls outside the ambit of administrative action when it is exercised by an institution that forms part of one of the other branches of government: namely, when a judicial function is exercised by a judicial authority, or, drawing on Fedsure, when a legislative power is exercised by an elected, deliberative legislature.[2] In both these instances, we note that the legislative or judicial power is a power that derives directly from the Final Constitution and that the exclusion of these acts is justified in light of the fact that these categories of action are subject to alternative forms of both political and constitutional participation and accountability. These actions are therefore subject to institutional accountability under the Final Constitution rather than the safeguards of administrative justice.[3]

These principles have important implications for the classification of rule-making. In Sidumo, the majority of the Constitutional Court held that the exercise of judicial (i.e. adjudicatory) powers by the executive does not mean that the power crosses over from the administrative to the judicial sphere. This suggests that the performance of legislative functions by the executive does not, in itself, go from being executive to legislative for purposes of determining the scope of administrative action. If action of the executive is only judicial (as opposed to administrative) when it is performed by a court of law (or other judicial authority), it seems to us that action is not legislative (for purposes of this characterisation) unless it is performed by a legislative body contemplated under the Final Constitution.

(viii) The distinction between public and private power

Administrative action is confined to the exercise of public power.[4] The difficulty is that the line between public and private power is a very difficult one to draw. As Langa CJ remarked in his minority judgment in Chirwa '[d]etermining whether a power or function is "public" is a notoriously difficult exercise. There is no simple definition or clear test to be applied'.[5]

The case law has dealt with a number of contentious areas in which the public/private divide is most difficult to identify. For purposes of this chapter, we do not aim to cover all these areas, but rather identify two broad areas which have

[1] See Sidumo (supra) at paras 88, 126 and 135.
[2] Fedsure (supra).
[3] See Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 57.
[4] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 45.
[5] Chirwa (supra) at para 186. See also AAA Investments (Pty) Limited v Micro Finance Regulatory Council & Another 2007 (1) SA 343 (CC), 2006 (11) BCLR 1255 (CC) ('AAA Investments') at para 119 ('It is true that no bright line can be drawn between "public" functions and private ordering'.)

attracted the attention of our highest courts and which starkly raise the difficult question of the public/private divide, namely, the case of public entities exercising contractual rights (including in an employment context); and private bodies exercising regulatory powers. This is followed by an attempt to extract some of the factors that courts have identified as assisting in the classification of powers into either public or private.

The question as to the classification of contractual powers (or rights) exercised by public entities has recently become particularly significant in light of the increased practice of public entities engaging in outsourcing, corporatisation, privatisation and generally entering into contracts with third parties.[1] The question as to whether the exercise of contractual rights in such a setting amounts to administrative action is significant as its answer is not only important for the public entity to consider and implement but also dramatically affects the judicial scrutiny that can be brought to bear in relation to the exercise of those rights. Most importantly, the classification of 'administrative action' may mean that the public entity must engage in a fair process and in some circumstances may only exercise its contractual rights after giving the other party (and perhaps third parties) a hearing.

This issue has come before the Supreme Court of Appeal in two significant cases. The first is Cape Metropolitan Council v Metro Inspection Services (Western Cape) CC & Others.[2] Cape Metro involved a decision by a municipal council to cancel an outsourcing contract with a private firm (for the collection of municipal levies and the identification of non-payers) on grounds of fraud. The contract had been concluded pursuant to a public tender process and, in canceling the contract, the municipal council relied on the contract's breach clause (rather than the alternative statutory power that the council enjoyed to cancel the contract in the event of fraud). The private party challenged the decision to cancel the contract on the basis that it had not been given a hearing prior to the cancellation. The Supreme Court of Appeal unanimously held that the cancellation of the contract did not amount to administrative action. According to the SCA, the municipal council was exercising a contractual power derived from the agreement between the parties. The Supreme Court of Appeal's reasoning is captured in the following passage:

[1] See Transnet Limited v Goodman Bros (Pty) Limited 2001 (1) SA 853 (SCA), 2001 (2) BCLR 176 (SCA) ('Goodman Brothers') at para 31 ('The identification of an administrative action, in contrast to an act regulated by private law, has become more difficult with the increasing use by the State of private law institutions, notably contract, to perform its duties. This takes place by privatisation, delegation, outsourcing, etc'.) For useful discussions of these developments, see A Cockrell 'Can You Paradigm? — A New Perspective on the Public Law/Private Law Divide' 1993 Acta Juridica 227; Y Burns 'Government, Contracts and the Public/Private Law Divide' (1998) 13 SAPL 234; and Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 147–159. On the meaning of organs of state, and the public/private divide, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31.

[2] 2001 (3) SA 1013 (SCA) ('Cape Metro').

> The appellant is a public authority and, although it derived its power to enter into the contract with the first respondent from statute, it derived its power to cancel the contract from the terms of the contract and the common law. Those terms were not prescribed by statute and could not be dictated by the appellant by virtue of its position as a public authority. They were agreed to by the first respondent, a very substantial commercial undertaking. The appellant, when it concluded the contract, was therefore not acting from a position of superiority or authority by virtue of its being a public authority and, in respect of the cancellation, did not, by virtue of its being a public authority, find itself in a stronger position that the position it would have been in had it been a private institution. When it purported to cancel the contract it was not performing a public duty or implementing legislation; it was purporting to exercise a contractual right founded on the consensus of the parties in respect of a commercial contract. In all these circumstances it cannot be said that the appellant was exercising a public power. Section 33 of the Constitution is concerned with the public administration acting as an administrative authority exercising public powers, not with the public administration acting as a contracting party from a position no different from what it would have been in had it been a private individual or institution.[1]

The SCA placed considerable emphasis on the contractual source of the right of cancellation. Streicher JA even went so far as to say that 'there can be no question' that if the council had chosen to exercise its statutory power of cancellation, it would have been exercising a public power that amounted to administrative action.[2]

This decision, read on its own, suggests that a large amount of public contracting will fall outside the realm of administrative action.[3] It should, however, now be read subject to the subsequent decision of the SCA in Logbro Properties CC v Bedderson NO & Others.[4] Logbro turns on a decision by a province to withdraw a property from tender in terms of the tender conditions: the SCA assumed (without deciding) that the tender constituted a contract between the province and the tenderers. The appellant relied on, amongst others, Cape Metro in arguing that the right to withdraw the tender flowed from the contract and therefore did not

[1] Cape Metro (supra) at para 18.

[2] Ibid at para 20. Streicher JA distinguishes the pre-constitutional cases in Zenzile (supra) and Administrator, Natal & Another v Sibiya & Another 1992 (4) SA 532 (A). Ibid at paras 11 and 12 (On the basis that they involved the exercise of statutory powers.) But see The Government of the Republic of South Africa v Thabiso Chemicals (Pty) Ltd, Unreported Decision, Case no. 148/2007 (25 September 2008) ('Thabiso Chemicals'). The obiter statement in this judgment is most surprising, and concerning: 'I do not believe that the principles of administrative law have any role to play in the outcome of the dispute. After the tender had been awarded, the relationship between the parties in this case was governed by the principles of contract law .... The fact that the Tender Board relied on authority derived from a statutory provision (i.e. s4(1)(eA) of the State Tender Board Act) to cancel the contract on behalf of the Government, does not detract from this principle. Nor does the fact that the grounds of cancellation on which the Tender Board relied were, inter alia, reflected in a regulation. All that happened, in my view, is that the provisions of the Regulations — like the provisions of ST36 — became part of the contract through incorporation by reference'. Ibid at para 18.

[3] For a sustained criticism of the judgment in Cape Metro, see C Hoexter 'Contracts in Administrative Law: Life After Formalism?' (2004) 121 SALJ 595; Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 176–7.

[4] 2003 (2) SA 460 (SCA)('Logbro').

amount to administrative action. Cameron JA (with whom the remaining judges agreed) held that the decision, notwithstanding its contractual source, amounted to administrative action and was therefore subject to the constraints of procedural fairness.[1] He was careful to emphasise that Cape Metro turned on its own facts and certainly is not authority for the principle that the exercise of contractual rights by a public entity is never subject to the duty to act fairly. Instead, he noted, 'the answer depends on all the circumstances'.[2] According to Cameron JA, the impact of Cape Metro is limited to the following proposition:

> [A] public authority's invocation of a power of cancellation in a contract concluded on equal terms with a major commercial undertaking, without any element of superiority or authority deriving from its public position, does not amount to an exercise of public power.[3]

The crucial advance from Cape Metro by the Logbro Court was making explicit and more significant the recognition of the relative bargaining power of the parties, a relationship that does not always favour the public party to the contract. According to the SCA in Logbro, the province had itself dictated the tender conditions, and was thus undoubtedly acting 'from a position of superiority or authority by virtue of its being a public authority'.[4]

Logbro is a welcome caveat to the judgment in Cape Metro. It takes account of the variability and reality of public power in dealings with tenderers, promotes public accountability and cuts down the argument that the source of the power — be it contractual or legislative — automatically determines the classification of the power as public or private.[5] Logbro is also consistent with a long line of cases that hold that the rules of administrative law apply in the context of public tenders, even when the public body would otherwise be acting in an ordinary commercial capacity.[6] It is not so simple to draw the line between Cape Metro and Logbro. Despite the recognition that some public entities may not be in a position to 'dictate terms', it seems to us that in most instances in which government and other public entities contract, the public entity is in an advantageous position by virtue of its public authority. That said, many private entities obviously wield significant power in a contractual setting.

The public sector employment context is a particular contractual setting that has spawned a large number of cases on the distinction between public and [1] Logbro (supra) at paras 7 and 8.

[2] Ibid at para 9.

[3] Ibid at para 10 (Our emphasis). See Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 72 (Point out that the decision in Cape Metro 'turned on the equality of bargaining of the parties.')

[4] Logbro (supra) at para 11.

[5] The argument that the contractual source of a power automatically means that it is private has now been removed by the decision of the Constitutional Court in Chirwa (supra).

[6] In Goodman Brothers, the Supreme Court of Appeal held that a tender for long service gold watches amounted to administrative action for purposes of FC s 33. As Schutz JA stated, the actions of Transnet in calling for and adjudicating tenders amounted to administrative action 'whatever contractual arrangements may have been attendant upon it'. Ibid at para 9. See also G Penfold and P Reyburn 'Public Procurement' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 25.8 (Further case citations).

private power. Prior to the recent decision of the Constitutional Court in Chirwa, the case law was, as discussed above, heavily divided.[1] The SCA in Chirwa was similarly divided, with two judges saying the dismissal of the public sector employee was public, while two held it was private.

The applicant in Chirwa was dismissed from her position as the Human Resources Executive Manager of the Transnet Pension Fund, a business unit of Transnet Limited (a wholly state-owned enterprise). Ngcobo J delivered the majority judgment on the issue as to whether the dismissal amounted to the exercise of a public power. Ngcobo J held that it did.[2] The thrust of his reasons for this finding is that Transnet is obliged to act in the public interest, is established by statute and draws its authority from statute. As Ngcobo J states:

> In my view, what makes the power in question a public power is the fact that it has been vested in a public functionary, who is required to exercise it in the public interest. When a public official performs a function in relation to his or her duties, the public official exercises public power. I agree with Cameron JA that Transnet is a creature of statute. It is a public entity created by the statute and it operates under statutory authority. As a public authority, its decision to dismiss necessarily involves the exercise of public power and, '[t]hat power is always sourced in statutory provision, whether general or specific, and, behind it, in the Constitution'[3]

The minority judgment of Langa CJ (with whom Mokgoro and O'Regan JJ concurred) adopts the opposite view. The minority found that the applicant's dismissal was a private act. The minority based its conclusion on a consideration of four factors. First, 'the relationship of coercion or power that the actor has in its capacity as a public institution'.[4] In this regard, Langa CJ noted that Transnet has no specific authority over its employees by virtue of its status as a public body and the power it has over its employees is identical to that of other private entities.[5] The second factor is 'the impact of the decision on the public'. Langa CJ pointed out that the dismissal of the HR Executive Manager of the parastatal's pension fund would not have much impact on the public.[6] In particular, the applicant 'does not take decisions regarding transport policy or practice'.[7] The third factor is the source of the power, i.e. a contractual source. Langa CJ commented that, while this factor was not decisive, the contractual source 'points[s] strongly in the direction that the power is not a public one.'[8] The final factor,

[1] See § 63.3*(b)(v)* supra.

[2] Chirwa (supra) at para 138. Ngcobo J found, for different reasons, that the dismissal did not amount to administrative action. See § 63.3*(b)(v)* supra.

[3] Ibid. Ngcobo J then quotes the following dictum from Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC) ('Hoffmann v SAA')("Transnet is a statutory body, under the control of the State, which has public powers and performs public functions in the public interest.').

[4] This factor, as Langa CJ pointed out, was particularly relevant in Cape Metro.

[5] Chirwa (supra) at para 187.

[6] Ibid at para 188.

[7] Ibid.

[8] Ibid at para 189.

according to the minority, is 'whether there is a need for the decision to be exercised in the public interest'. Langa CJ's view is that the public interest in the running of the Transnet Pension Fund is not as great as it is in relation to other public entities.[1]

At the conclusion of his judgment, Langa CJ notes that the minority's decision is very much based on the facts of the case, and should not be taken to mean that the dismissal of public sector employees will never amount to the exercise of public power. He offers three examples of a public dismissal: (a) where the person is dismissed in terms of a legislative provision; and (b) where the dismissal 'is likely to impact seriously and directly on the public' as a result of (i) 'the manner in which it is carried out' or (ii) 'the class of public employee dismissed'.[2]

While the approach of the minority in Chirwa is, to some extent, consistent with that of the SCA in Cape Metro, the same cannot necessarily be said of decision of the majority. One would think that the reasoning applied by the majority in Chirwa would result in a finding that a municipal council canceling a public, or outsourcing contract for fraud, would be obliged to act in the public interest and operates, directly or indirectly, under statutory authority. It seems to us that, in light of the majority's decision in Chirwa, a court will seldom find that an indisputably public body is not performing a public power or performing a public function. This is as it should be.[3]

Whereas the cases discussed above under this heading approach the public/private divide from one direction (ie public entities performing what would otherwise be classified as private functions), a number of other cases deal with the situation where this divide is approached from the other direction, namely, where a private entity performs a public function.[4] The most common type of case that arises in the latter context relates to the performance of regulatory powers. The most often cited example of this in the common law was the decision of Goldstone J in Dawnlaan Belleggings (Edms) Beperk v Johannesburg Stock Exchange.[5] The Court held that the decisions of the stock exchange were

[1] Chirwa (supra) at paras 190–193.

[2] Ibid at para 194.

[3] This conclusion is also consistent with the decisions of the SCA finding that, where the state exercises its rights of ownership in property in order to grant rights in respect of that property to private parties, the state engages in administrative action (at least insofar as rights are granted in relation to a valuable resource). See Bullock NO v Provincial Government, North West Province 2004 (5) SA 262 (SCA) ('Bullock')(Granting of a servitude over property on the banks of the Hartbeespoort Dam); Grey's Marine (supra)(Conclusion of a lease for quayside property in Hout Bay harbour). We point out, however, that the latter case involved the exercise of a statutory power. See also S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31 (On the nature of organs of state as public bodies.)

[4] Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 176 - 183 (Helpfully groups the cases into '[p]owers exercised by public bodies in a private-law setting' and '[p]rivate bodies exercising public powers'.)

[5] 1983 (3) SA 344 (W)('Dawnlaan Beleggings').

reviewable on administrative law grounds because, although it was not a statutory body, it was under a statutory duty to act in the public interest.[1]

A number of cases that attempt to draw the difficult line between when a non-statutory body exercises a public power and when it does not, have been decided since the advent of the Interim and Final Constitutions. The most significant one is the recent decision of the Constitutional Court in AAA Investments. AAA Investments involved a challenge to the rules of the Micro Finance Regulatory Council ('the MFRC') that regulate small lenders. The MFRC is a section 21 company that regulates members who agree to comply with its rules. The primary significance of the MRFC, in legal terms, is that the Usury Act[2] stipulates that the Minister of Trade and Industry may exempt categories of moneylending transactions from the application of the Usury Act 'on such conditions and to such extent as he may deem fit'.[3] The main effect of this stipulation is that an exempted moneylender may charge in excess of the rate of interest prescribed in the Usury Act. The exemption notice published by the Minister under this provision states that small moneylenders must, amongst other things, register with a regulatory institution approved by the Minister in order to qualify for exemption. The MFRC was established by representatives of government, money-lending institutions and community bodies, and was approved as the regulatory institution for purposes of the exemption notice.[4] Accordingly, as Yacoob J stated in AAA Investments, 'all micro-lenders who wished to qualify in terms of the exemption notice had to be registered with the [MFRC]' and, therefore, the MFRC 'has become responsible for the regulation of the micro-lending sector'.[5]

Whereas the High Court found that the MFRC exercised public power in making the rules,[6] the Supreme Court of Appeal held that the MFRC is not a 'public regulator' but is rather a 'private regulator' of moneylenders whose

[1] Dawnlaan Beleggings (supra) at 364. Goldstone J stated that: 'the decisions of the committee of the stock exchange affect not only its own members or persons in contractual privity with it, but the general public and indeed the whole economy. It is for that reason that the Act makes the public interest paramount. To regard the JSE as a private institution would be to ignore commercial reality and would be to ignore the provisions and intention of the Act itself. It would also be to ignore the very public interest which the Legislature has sought to protect and safeguard in the Act.' Ibid at 364– 365. The correctness of this approach was confirmed by the Appellate Division in Johannesburg Stock Exchange & Another v Witwatersrand Nigel Ltd & Another 1988 (3) SA 132 (A) at 152. See also R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers, ex parte Datafin plc [1987] 1 All ER 564 (CA)('Datafin')(Held that the take-overs panel exercises public power despite not being a statutory body and not exercising statutory powers on the grounds that the panel exercised considerable powers, performed an important public duty which affected the public and the government in effect made use of the panel because its existence meant that the government did not itself need to establish a similar body. Ibid at 577 and 585. For a brief discussion of these cases, see Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 179–180.

[2] Act 73 of 1968.

[3] Section 15A of the Usury Act.

[4] AAA Investments (supra) at para 13.

[5] Ibid at paras 2 and 14.

[6] AAA Investments (Pty) Limited v Micro Finance Regulatory Council & Another 2004 (6) SA 557 (T).

authority derives from the agreement of the lenders.[1] This approach, which we submit does not give sufficient weight to the statutory context in which the MFRC operates and overstates the element of voluntary consent (in that, the reality is that one cannot operate effectively as a micro-lender without being registered with the MFRC), was overruled by the Constitutional Court on appeal. Yacoob J held that the MFRC exercised a public function.[2] The Minister passed on his regulatory power by creating a regime that enabled the MFRC to regulate the micro-lending sector[3] and the Minister exercised control over the functioning of the MFRC (eg approving the registration criteria for the MFRC's members).[4] As Yacoob J concluded:

> The fundamental difference between a private company registered in terms of the Companies Act and the Council [the MFRC] is that the private company, while it has to comply with the law, is autonomous in the sense that the company itself decides what its objectives and functions are and how it fulfills them. The Council's composition and mandate show that, although its legal form is that of a private company, its functions are, essentially, regulatory of an industry. These functions are closely circumscribed by the ministerial notice. I strain to find any characteristic of autonomy in the functions of the Council equivalent to that of an enterprise of a private nature. The Council regulates, in the public interest and in the performance of a public duty.[5]

The approach of the Constitutional Court in AAA Investments is to be welcomed. It provides for a context-sensitive test in which one assesses the public or private nature of a body exercising regulatory control by examining all relevant factors, including the legislative context, whether agreement to the rules is truly voluntary, the level of state control over the functioning of the body and whether the body regulates in the public interest.[6]

---

[1] Micro Finance Regulatory Council v AAA Investments (Pty) Limited & Another 2006 (1) SA 27 (SCA) at para 24.

[2] AAA investments (supra) at paras 43–45. O'Regan J, who wrote a separate concurring judgment, agreed with this conclusion, adding that the MFRC's rules are 'coercive and general in their effect'. Ibid at paras 119–121.

[3] See AAA Investments (supra) at para 43 (Yacoob J): 'The fact that the Minister passed on the regulatory duty means that the function performed must, at least, be a public function'.

[4] Ibid at para 44.

[5] Ibid at para 45.

[6] A series of cases have dealt with the question as to whether non-statutory sports regulators exercise public power. See Cronje v United Cricket Board of South Africa 2001 (4) SA 1361 (T)(Court held that because the United Cricket Board ('the UCB') was a voluntary body unconnected to the State and was not recognised in legislation, it did not exercise public power in banning the South African cricket captain Hansie Cronje for life. In our view, this decision does not give sufficient weight to the significant power that the UCB wields for those who pursue cricket as their chosen career, the extent of the regulatory function it performs, the public interest in the regulation of a national sporting code and the fact that the government would probably intervene to regulate cricket if the UCB did not exist.) For a critique of this case, see S Driver & C Plasket 'Administrative Law' 2001 The Annual Survey of South African Law 81, 116 (Point out, amongst other things, that this decision ignores the reality of the monopoly power at the disposal of the UCB and that it performs the equivalent of government function.) See also Y Burns 'Do Principles of Administrative Justice Apply to the Actions of Domestic Bodies and Voluntary Associations such as the South African Rugby Union and the United Cricket Board?' 2002 SAPL 372; Burns & Beukes Administrative Law (supra) at 140–144. We rather favour the approach adopted in

(ix) Some relevant factors in assessing whether a power is private or public

As the Chief Justice pointed out in his dissenting judgment in Chirwa, there is no precise test for determining whether a power is public or private. This enquiry depends on a consideration of all relevant factors.[1] Having examined some of the important decisions in this area, we now attempt to extract from the case law some of the factors that should be taken into account when making this assessment.

Perhaps the most important factor is whether the actor has a duty to act in the public interest rather than for its own private advantage. The Constitutional Court in SARFU 1 remarked that one of the factors in assessing whether conduct amounts to administrative action is 'whether it involves the exercise of a public duty'.[2] Likewise, the majority of the Constitutional Court in Chirwa stated that 'what makes the power in question a public power is the fact that it has been vested in a public functionary, who is required to exercise the power in the public interest'.[3] In the context of English law, the point is well captured by De Smith, Woolf and Jowell:[4] decisions of the Cape High Court in the following two cases. Coetzee v Comitis Others 2001 (1) SA 1254 (C)(Court held that the National Soccer League ('the NSL') performed public functions in the public interest and that any person who wants to play professional football is subject to the NSL's rules); Tirfu Raiders Rugby Club v South African Rugby Union & Others [2006] 2 All SA 549 (C) at para 28 (Court held that a decision of the Rugby Union which affected log positions of rugby teams was a matter of 'significant public interest'.) In light of the latter two decisions, it may be that the decisions of the Jockey Club would now amount to the exercise of public power (despite the decision of the Appellate Division in Turner v Jockey Club (supra), holding that the Jockey Club exercises private power but is subject to the rules of administrative law in so doing, pursuant to an implied term of the contract between the Club and its members). See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 193. See also L Thornton 'The Constitutional Right to Just Administrative Action — Are Political Parties Bound' (1999) 15 SAJHR 351 (Argues that 'administrative action' should include certain private actions.)

[1] Chirwa (supra) at para 186.

[2] SARFU 1 (supra) at para 143.

[3] Chirwa (supra) at para 138. This important factor is also recognised in Langa CJ's judgment. Chirwa (supra) at para 186 ('Whether there is a need for the decision to be taken in the public interest.') See also AAA Investments (supra) at para 45 ('The Council regulates in the public interest and in the performance of a public duty'); Hoffman v SAA (supra) at para 23. See further, Police and Prisons Civil Rights Union & Others v Minister of Correctional Services & Others No. 1 2008 (3) SA 91 (E), [2006] 2 All SA 175 (E) ('POPCRU') at para 53 (Public power not confined to power that impacts on the general public, but rather depends on whether it 'has been vested in a public functionary who is required to exercise it in the public interest, and not to his or her own private interest or at his or her own whim'); Nxele v Chief Deputy Commissioner, Corporate Services, Department of Correctional Services [2006] 10 BLLR 960 (LC) at para 59; Olivier JA in Goodman Brothers (supra) at para 37; Dawnlaan Belleggings (supra) at 364; Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Others v African National Congress & Others 2005 (5) SA 39 (C) at para 27 (Relying on J Klaaren and G Penfold 'Access to Information' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2002) § 62–13, court remarked that a service or activity required to be undertaken in the public interest is an 'essential characteristic of a public power or function.')

[4] Judicial Review of Administrative Action (5th Edition 1995)('De Smith, Woolf and Jowell') at 167, quoted with approval by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Mittalsteel South Africa Ltd v Hlatshwayo 2007 (1) SA 66 (SCA) ('Mittalsteel') at para 20.

> A body is performing a 'public function' when it seeks to achieve some collective benefit for the public or a section of the public and is accepted by the public or that section of the public as having authority to do so. Bodies therefore exercise public functions when they intervene or participate in social or economic affairs in the public interest.

The next factor is the source of the power.[1] A legislative source is a very strong indication that the power is public.[2] After all, as our courts have remarked, the implementation of legislation is the quintessential example of administrative action.[3]

Another important factor is the extent of state control over the actor, either through an ownership interest (in the case of state-owned entities) or control over its functioning.[4] While this factor is taken into account, it is important to stress that it is by no means determinative. Although certain cases decided under the Interim Constitution held that the 'control test' was applicable in deciding whether or not an entity amounted to an 'organ of state',[5] this is not the case under the Final Constitution. In a recent decision, the Supreme Court of Appeal has helpfully pointed out that the fact of state control remains useful 'when it is necessary to determine whether functions, which by their nature might as well be private functions, are performed under the control of the State and are thereby turned into public functions instead'.[6]

A factor that, as we have seen, has played a significant role in classifying power as public or private in circumstances in which a public entity exercises contractual rights, is the power relationship between the public entity and the other party to the contract.[7]

Another factor is the impact of the decision on the public.[8] This consideration has played a role in assessing the nature of the state's exercise of its ownership rights in relation to valuable resources (such as waterfront property at [1] SARFU 1 (supra) at para 143; Chirwa (supra) at para 186.

[2] See P Craig 'What is Public Power?' in H Corder and T Maluwa Administrative Justice in Southern Africa (1997) 25 ('Public Power') at 27.

[3] SARFU 1 (supra) at para 142; and Chaskalson CJ and Ngcobo J in New Clicks (supra) at paras 126 and 461, respectively. Nevertheless, as we have seen, a power is not private simply because it flows from a non-statutory source, such as a contract or a common law right of ownership. See § 63.3*(b)*(viii) supra.

[4] Mittalsteel (supra) at para 19; AAA Investments (supra) at paras 44–45. See also Hoffmann v SAA (supra) at para 23.

[5] See, for example, Directory Advertising Cost Cutters v Minister of Posts, Telecommunications and Broadcasting 1996 (3) SA 800 (T), [1996] 2 All SA 83 (T). For a discussion of the 'control test' and the authorities in support of — and against — that test, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 31.4*(f)*.

[6] Mittalsteel (supra) at para 19. See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 154–155. See also Goodman Brothers (supra) at paras 37–38 (Olivier JA) and para 8 (Schutz JA).

[7] Cape Metro (supra) and Logbro (supra). See § 63.3*(b)*(viii) supra.

[8] See Chirwa (supra) at para 186 (Langa CJ).

Hartbeespoort Dam)[1] and has proved helpful in assessing whether rules made by an entity amount to the exercise of public power.[2] Although a public interest in a decision does not mean that the entity exercises a public function, significant public interest in a decision can operate as an indicator that the function is public.[3]

Another factor that has played a role in certain decisions is whether the conduct is 'governmental' in nature or, in other words, whether it corresponds to a power traditionally exercised by government.[4] This factor is particularly relevant when assessing whether a private actor is engaging in the exercise of public power, and it results in the characterisation of most regulatory power as public.[5] Moreover, certain cases suggest that the fact that an entity exercises monopoly power or near-monopoly power over its sphere of activity plays a role in coming to this conclusion.[6]

The final factor that we wish to mention is whether the existence of the function is recognised (expressly or impliedly) in a government's regulatory scheme.[7] Closely related to this consideration is whether the function is such that the government would intervene and itself regulate the activity if the actor did not exist.

[1] Bullock (supra) at para 14.

[2] In AAA Investments, O'Regan J stated that one of the criteria to be taken into account in assessing whether rules are public in character is whether they 'apply generally to the public or a section of the public.' Ibid at para 119 . The fact that a decision does not affect the public at large obviously does not mean that it is not the exercise of a public power. A great deal of administrative action only affects an individual or a small group of individuals. See Currie The PAJA (supra) at 76–77.

[3] See Tirfu Raiders (supra) at para 28; POPCRU (supra) at para 54 ('The pre-eminence of the public interest' in the proper administration of prisons indicated that the dismissal of a number of correctional officers amounted to the exercise of public power.)

[4] See Mittalsteel (supra) at para 22 ('In an era in which privatisation of public services and utilities has become commonplace, bodies may perform what is traditionally a government function without being subject to control by any of the spheres of government and may therefore . . . properly be classified as public bodies' (emphasis added)). See also Goodman Brothers (supra) at para 30 ('The essential characteristics of the concept of administrative action are seen as the exercise of a public (ie governmental) function by a public authority or official. . .') See further R v Disciplinary Committee of the Jockey Club: ex parte Aga Khan [1993] 2 All ER 853, 867 ('Aga Khan') (Jockey Club's powers not subject to public law review as its functions are not 'governmental.').

[5] See Currie PAJA (supra) at 76. As the Supreme Court of Appeal apparently noted in Mittalsteel: one sense of the term public power is 'being able to regulate or control the conduct of others'. Mittalsteel (supra) at para 12.

[6] See Goodman Brothers (supra) at para 8; and De Smith, Woolf and Jowell (supra) at 170 referred to in Mittalsteel (supra) at para 21. But see Aga Khan (supra) at 867.

[7] See AAA Investments (supra) at para 119 (One factor in assessing whether the power is public is whether it is 'related to a clear legislative framework and purpose'); Datafin (supra) at 577 and 585. See also De Smith, Woolf and Jowell (supra) at 170 referred to in Mittalsteel (supra) at para 21; Craig 'Public Power' (supra) at 29 (Describes this process as the 'Privatisation of the Business of Government', using a term coined by Hoffman LJ in Aga Khan (supra) at 874).

(c) The meaning of administrative action under PAJA

(i) Background and the general approach to 'administrative action' under PAJA

The definition of 'administrative action' in PAJA went through a tortuous drafting process. Although the broad definition initially proposed in the South African Law Commission's draft Administrative Justice Bill was largely accepted by Cabinet, the Parliamentary Portfolio Committee on Justice and Constitutional Development ('the Portfolio Committee') made a significant number of changes.[1] It appears that the changes made by the Portfolio Committee, particularly in the period shortly before the finalisation of PAJA, were intended to narrow the scope for judicial scrutiny of the administration.[2] The Committee, in particular, added a series of limitations to the definition (such as the requirements of a 'decision', 'adversely affects the rights of any person' and 'direct, external legal effect'). The result is a very complex and, on its face, narrow definition. As the Supreme Court of Appeal has remarked: '[t]he cumbersome definition [of administrative action] in PAJA serves not so much as to attribute meaning to the term as to limit its meaning by surrounding it within a palisade of qualifications'.[3]

Despite these problematic aspects of PAJA, it is worthwhile reiterating that an approach to interpreting PAJA properly mindful of the doctrine of separation of powers requires a court to respect the drafting choices of the legislature, while always ensuring that its provisions (including the definition of administrative action) are interpreted insofar as possible in a manner that is consistent with FC s 33. As noted above, the Constitutional Court has indicated that the correct approach to determining whether conduct amounts to administrative action is to assess whether it is 'administrative action' for purposes of FC s 33 and, if so, whether PAJA nevertheless excludes it.[4] The FC s 33 jurisprudence discussed

[1] For a useful discussion of the process of drafting PAJA, including a table comparing the wording of the definition of 'administrative action' in the various drafts, see Currie PAJA (supra) at 18–22.

[2] Ibid at 21 ftn 80.

[3] Grey's Marine (supra) at para 21. See also Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 185 (Hoexter agrees: 'The definition of administrative action in the Act is both extremely narrow and highly convoluted. Indeed, one feels that the legislature could hardly have made it more so'.) See also Hoexter 'Administrative Action' (supra) at 303 ('The statutory definition seems parsimonious, unnecessarily complicated and probably as unfriendly to users as it is possible to be'.) See also Sebenza (supra) at para 21.

[4] See § 63.3*(a)* supra. Certain statements of the Constitutional Court indicate that the meaning of 'administrative action' in PAJA cannot extend beyond that contemplated in FC s 33, and that a finding that conduct does not amount to 'administrative action' under FC s 33 is thus the end of the PAJA enquiry. See Ngcobo J, on behalf of a minority of judges in Sidumo (supra) at para 240 and, on behalf of a majority of judges, in Chirwa (supra) at para 150. See also Sachs J in New Clicks (supra) at para 607. The correctness of this approach is open to question. Although PAJA is intended to give effect to the constitutional right to just administrative action, there would seem to be no legal barrier to Parliament deciding to extend the scope of administrative review so as to cover a wider range of conduct than that contemplated in FC s 33 (eg to extend the reach of administrative justice to private decision-makers). At least absent another conflicting scheme of constitutional accountability (see, eg, Independent Newspapers), why should Parliament not be allowed to be expansive in its definition of administrative action? Perhaps the better interpretation of these dicta is that they only serve to reflect that a decision that is not of an administrative nature in terms of the constitutional jurisprudence will not amount to administrative action under PAJA (by virtue of the fact that the requirement of a decision 'of an administrative nature' is included in PAJA's definition). See § 63.3*(c)*(ii) infra.

above thus continues to play a significant role in interpreting the meaning of 'administrative action' under PAJA. In addition, to the extent that PAJA adopts a more restrictive definition of 'administrative action', the constitutional right could be used to challenge PAJA as failing to give effect to the constitutional right.

Section 1 of PAJA sets out the definition of administrative action for purposes of the Act.[1] This definition, when read with the definition of a 'decision',[2] essentially comprises six elements: (1) a decision of an administrative nature; (2) made in terms of an empowering provision (or the Final Constitution, a provincial constitution or legislation); (3) not specifically excluded from the definition; (4) made by an organ of state or by a private person exercising a public power or performing a public function; (5) that adversely affects rights; and (6) that has a direct external legal effect.[3] The first four elements relate to the nature of [1] Administrative action is defined as 'any decision taken, or any failure to take a decision, by —

(a) an organ of state, when —
(i) exercising a power in terms of the Constitution or a provincial constitution; or
(ii) exercising a public power or performing a public function in terms of any legislation; or
(b) a natural or juristic person, other than an organ of state, when exercising a public power or performing a public function in terms of an empowering provision, which adversely affects the rights of any person and which has a direct, external legal effect, but does not include —
(aa) the executive powers or functions of the National Executive, including the powers or functions referred to in sections 79(1) and (4), 84(2)(a), (b), (e), (d), (f), (g), (h), (i) and (k), 85(2)(b), (c), (d) and (e), 91(2), (3), (4) and (5), 92(3), 93, 97, 98, 99 and 100 of the Constitution;
(bb) the executive powers or functions of the Provincial Executive, including the powers or functions referred to in sections 121(1) and (2), 125(2)(d), (e) and (f), 126, 127(2), 132(2), 133(3)(b), 137, 138, 139 and 145(1) of the Constitution;
(cc) the executive powers or functions of a municipal council;
(dd) the legislative functions of Parliament, a provincial legislature or a municipal council;
(ee) the judicial functions of a judicial officer of a court referred to in section 166 of the Constitution or of a Special Tribunal established under section 2 of the Special Investigating Units and Special Tribunals Act, 1996 (Act No. 74 of 1996), and the judicial functions of a traditional leader under customary law or any other law;
(ff) a decision to institute or continue a prosecution;
(gg) a decision relating to any aspect regarding the appointment of a judicial officer, by the Judicial Service Commission;
(hh) any decision taken, or failure to take a decision, in terms of any provision of the Promotion of Access to Information Act, 2000; or
(ii) any decision taken, or failure to take a decision, in terms of section 4(1).'

[2] A 'decision' is defined in s 1 of PAJA as 'any decision of an administrative nature made, proposed to be made, or required to be made, as the case may be, under an empowering provision, including a decision relating to
(a) making, suspending, revoking or refusing to make an order, award or determination;
(b) giving, suspending, revoking or refusing to give a certificate, direction, approval, consent or permission;
(c) issuing, suspending, revoking or refusing to issue a licence, authority or other instrument;
(d) imposing a condition or restriction;
(e) making a declaration, demand or requirement;
(f) retaining, or refusing to deliver up, an article; or
(g) doing or refusing to do any other act or thing of an administrative nature, and a reference to a failure to take a decision must be construed accordingly.'

[3] This division of the PAJA definition into six elements draws down on Currie & Klaaren's Benchbook. See Benchbook (supra) at 40–82.

action, while the fifth and sixth relate to the effect of the action (i.e. the so-called 'impact threshold').[1]

The purpose of this portion of the chapter is not to replicate the texts that provide a detailed commentary on the meaning of 'administrative action' under PAJA and the growing body of cases interpreting PAJA.[2] It is, rather, to focus on those issues that raise fundamental questions about PAJA's scope and its constitutionality.

(ii) A decision of an administrative nature

The first element of the PAJA definition of administrative action is that it must be a decision 'of an administrative nature'. In our view, this is no more than an incorporation of the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court discussed above.[3] The first element embraces all exercises of public power other than legislative action, judicial action, broad policy-making decisions and certain decisions in the context of public sector employment relations.

As we have seen above in the discussion of FC s 33, a crucial question is whether PAJA applies to administrative rule-making such as delegated or subordinate legislation (usually taking the form of regulations).[4] If one accepts, as we argue, that rule-making amounts to administrative action for purposes of FC s 33, then the correct question is therefore whether PAJA nevertheless excludes it. While this question was left open by the Constitutional Court in Eisenberg, several judges confronted the issue in New Clicks. Chaskalson CJ held that all regulation-making amounts to administrative action under PAJA and Ngcobo J found that the particular regulations at issue in that case amounted to administrative action (ie regulations that are inextricably linked to the recommendation from which they emanated).[5]

In coming to this conclusion, Chaskalson CJ made four important points that have a bearing upon the interpretation of PAJA's definition of 'administrative action'. First, the executive power of implementing legislation as contemplated in FC s 85(2)(a) is omitted from the list of executive powers expressly excluded from PAJA's definition of administrative action.[6] Second, although the making of

[1] See De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 37.

[2] For detailed commentaries on the scope of 'administrative action' under PAJA, see Currie The PAJA (supra) 42–91; Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) 34–86; Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) 184–222; De Ville Judicial Review (supra) 35–87; Burns & Beukes Administrative Law (supra) 107–149.

[3] See § 63.3*(b)*(ii) to (v) supra.

[4] See § 63.3*(b)*(vi) supra. The Law Commission's draft Bill contained a definition of a 'rule' and specifically included this within the definition of administrative action. Nevertheless, the Portfolio Committee deleted this definition and many of the provisions relating to rule-making. The decision to delete these provisions from PAJA was apparently based in part on the Australian jurisprudence that a 'decision' does not include rule-making. See Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 83–84.

[5] See § 63.3*(b)*(vi) supra.

[6] New Clicks (supra) at paras 123–126. See New Clicks at para 461 (As Ngcobo J (whose reasoning is slightly different, though complementary, to that of Chaskalson CJ on this score) states: 'The conclusion that the deliberate exclusion of implementation of legislation from the list of executive powers or functions that do not fall within the ambit of PAJA was intended to bring those powers or functions within the ambit of PAJA is irresistible.') regulations is not referred to in the definition of 'decision', the references in this definition to 'any decision of an administrative nature' and 'doing or refusing to do any other act or thing of an administrative nature'[1] bring the making of regulations within the meaning of this definition.[2] Third, the definitions in PAJA must, in the case of doubt, be construed in a manner that is consistent with FC s 33: FC s 33, according to Chaskalson CJ, speaks to rule-making.[3] Finally, the inclusion of s 4 in PAJA, which provides for procedural fairness for administrative action affecting the public, suggests that regulations, 'the most common form of administrative action affecting the rights of the public', are subject to review under PAJA.[4]

(iii) Made in terms of an empowering provision (or the Constitution, a provincial constitution or legislation)

The second element of PAJA's definition of administrative action is that it must be made 'in terms of an empowering provision' or, as we explain below, 'in terms of the Constitution, a provincial constitution or legislation'. The definition of 'empowering provision' is extremely broad and includes 'a law, a rule of common law, customary law' or 'an agreement, instrument or other document in terms of which an administrative action was purportedly taken'.

The use of the phrase 'an empowering provision' in PAJA's definition of 'administrative action' and 'decision' is odd.[5] The phrase is used in the definition of 'decision' in a manner that suggests that it applies to all types of administrative action, i.e. the opening words of this definition read 'any decision of an administrative nature made, proposed to be made, or required to be made … under an empowering provision'. The definition of 'administrative action', on the other hand, only uses the phrase to qualify the definition insofar as it applies to the exercise of a public power or public function by a natural or juristic person other than an organ of state.[6] The phrases that are used to qualify the exercise of public powers and functions of an organ of state are rather 'in terms of the Constitution or a provincial constitution'[7] or 'in terms of any legislation'.[8]

[1] See para (g) of PAJA's definition of 'decision'.
[2] New Clicks (supra) at para 128. See also New Clicks at para 467 (Ngcobo J).
[3] At para 128.
[4] At para 133. See, however, Sachs J in New Clicks (supra) at paras 599–606 (Points to various provisions of PAJA in support of his conclusion that PAJA does not apply to rule-making, but does nonetheless apply to the making of one of the regulations at issue in this case (the specific determination of a dispensing fee). As discussed above, Sachs J is of the view that rule-making should rather fall to be scrutinised under an expanded notion of legality, while five judges in New Clicks did not consider the question of whether the Pricing Regulations amount to administrative action.) See § 63.3*(b)*(vi) supra.
[5] This phrase was included for the first time in the drafting process by the Parliamentary Portfolio Committee.
[6] See para (b) of the definition of 'administrative action'.
[7] See para (a)(i) of the definition of 'administrative action'.
[8] See para (a)(ii) of the definition of 'administrative action'.

In light of the very broad definition of 'empowering provision', this drafting discrepancy suggests that the scope of administrative action is, in some respects, narrower in respect of organs of state than it is in respect of non-organs of state. Such an inversion of public power and private power does not make sense. It cannot be that the reach of administrative justice is narrower in relation to government and organs of state than it is in relation to private entities.

It has been suggested that the phrases 'in terms of the Constitution or a provincial constitution' and 'in terms of legislation' are superfluous. These legal sources of power are, in any event, covered by the phrase 'empowering provision', and most commentators seem to express the view that the requirement of an 'empowering provision' should apply equally to organs of state and non-organs of state.[1] While this reading is artificial, it has the attraction of avoiding the anomaly of the scope of administrative action being broader in relation to non-organs of state than organs of state.[2]

The dilemma comes into sharp focus in the minority judgment of Langa CJ in Chirwa. The Chief Justice concludes that one of the bases for finding that the decision to dismiss the employee of the Transnet Pension Fund does not amount to administrative action under PAJA is that decision was not taken 'in terms of legislation', but rather in terms of the contract of employment.[3] To the extent that the minority in Chirwa is suggesting that, even though the power of dismissal may be public,[4] the fact that the decision was not taken in terms of legislation takes it out of the realm of administrative action, this suggestion is surprising. It is anomalous to find that a decision of an organ of state falters at the 'administrative action' threshold if it is not taken in terms of legislation, whereas the contract of employment would undoubtedly amount to an 'empowering provision' under PAJA should the entity in question be a private entity.[5] Such a result should be avoided.

It seems to us that another potential route of avoiding the absurdity described above, but that is more consistent with the text of PAJA than simply stating that the 'empowering provision' requirement applies to organs of state and non-organs of state alike, is to adopt the following two-step approach. Our analysis incorporates constitutional organ of state jurisprudence.[6] First, it could argued

[1] See Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 40–1; De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 46; Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 191–2; Currie The PAJA (supra) at 60.

[2] This position accords with the principle of statutory interpretation that the legislature did not intend that legislation would result in an absurdity. See Walele (supra) para 37. See also L du Plessis Re-Interpretation of Statutes (2002) at 162–164. Since the conflict here is between two definitions at the equivalent level of generality, the approach adopted by O'Regan ADCJ in Walele (at para 126) would appear not to apply.

[3] Chirwa (supra) at paras 182–185.

[4] Langa CJ goes on to find that the dismissal in this particular case was the exercise of private rather than public power. Ibid at para 194.

[5] The definition of 'empowering provision' expressly includes 'an agreement'.

[6] For more on the meaning of organ of state under FC s 239, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31.

that, in relation to bodies that qualify as 'organs of state' in terms of paragraph (b) of the definition in FC s 239,[1] such bodies amount to 'organs of state' only insofar as they exercise powers or perform functions in terms of the Constitution, a provincial constitution or legislation.[2] If they do not exercise powers in terms of such instruments, then they should then be judged according to paragraph (b) of the PAJA definition of 'administrative action' (i.e. do they exercise a public power or function in terms of an 'empowering provision'?). Such an approach effectively negates the 'Constitution or provincial constitution' or 'legislation' requirement in relation to this category of organ of state. This conclusion then leaves entities that are classified as organs of state by virtue of paragraph (a) of the definition in FC s 239, namely, a 'department of state or administration in the national, provincial or local sphere of government'.[3] The second leg of the argument is that, in relation to these bodies, any exercise of public power or performance of a public function by these entities necessarily takes place, directly or indirectly, in terms of the Final Constitution, a provincial constitution or legislation. We note that, although the decision of the majority of the Constitutional Court in Chirwa does not deal with the application of PAJA, it is explicitly consistent with the broad approach we suggest here. In this regard, Ngcobo J stated: '[a]s a public authority, [Transnet's] decision to dismiss necessarily involves the exercise of public power and, "that power is always sourced in statutory provision, whether general or specific, and, behind it, the Constitution."'.[4]

Lastly, it may be important to note that the definition of 'empowering provision' includes the phrase 'was purportedly taken'. Administrative action therefore includes acts that go beyond the power of the administrator. Exercises of public power are often challenged on the grounds that they were not made in terms of an empowering provision and are thus ultra vires. It would be nonsensical to argue that, due to its ultra vires nature, such action was not taken 'in terms of an empowering provision' and therefore does not amount to administrative action.[5]

[1] That is, any functionary or institution 'exercising a power or performing a function in terms of the Constitution or a provincial constitution' or 'exercising a public power or performing a public function in terms of any legislation'.

[2] This interpretation of the definition of organ of state in FC s 239 is supported by the use of the words 'exercising' and 'performing' in paragraph (b) of the definition.

[3] The difficulty is that entities and functionaries falling within this category of organs of state are organs of state per se. Their status cannot vary depending on the function that they perform. The dilemma that litigants have in challenging decisions of these entities or functionaries is reflected in the following statement in Sebenza. Sebenza (supra) at para 20 ('The applicant contended that the Minister's decision constituted administrative action as defined in ether s 1*(a)(ii) or 1(b)* of the PAJA. Since the first subsection relates to a decision taken by "an organ of State" and the second to a natural or juristic person other than an organ of State, the applicant cannot have it both ways. The Minister must either be an organ of State or not. Since she is sued in her representative capacity and having regard to the wide definition of an "organ of State" in s 239 of the Constitution, it would seem that s 1*(a)*(ii) is applicable.')

[4] See Chirwa (supra) at para 138, quoting Cameron JA in Chirwa (SCA) (supra) at para 52. Langa CJ disagrees with this approach. Chirwa (supra) at para 183. The difficulty with the argument we advance here is that it appears that organs of state do occasionally exercise public power without doing so in terms of either legislation or a constitution. See Kyalami Ridge (supra) at paras 33–48.

[5] See Tirfu Raiders (supra) at para 30. But see Marais v Democratic Alliance 2002 (2) BCLR 171 (C) at para 55.

(iv) Specific exclusions from the definition of administrative action

The definition of administrative action in PAJA contains a number of specific exclusions. These exclusions are, broadly speaking, as follows: executive powers or functions of the national executive, a provincial executive and a municipal council; legislative functions of Parliament, a provincial legislature or a municipal council; judicial functions of a judicial officer (including a judge or magistrate); judicial functions of a Special Tribunal and a traditional leader under customary law or any other law; decisions to institute or continue prosecutions; decisions relating to any aspect regarding the appointment of a judicial officer by the Judicial Service Commission; decisions in terms of PAIA; and a decision in terms of s 4(1) of PAJA.[1]

A number of these exclusions are based on, and consistent with, the categories of public power excluded from the meaning of administrative action in the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence.[2] For example, the exclusion of legislative acts of a municipal council in paragraph (dd) flows from the decision in Fedsure,[3] while the exclusion of the judicial functions of a judicial officer in paragraph (ee) is consistent with Nel.[4]

The first two exclusions in paragraphs (aa) and (bb) engage the executive powers or functions of the national executive and provincial executive and include a list of constitutional powers and functions that are specifically excluded.[5] It is important to ensure that these powers and functions are interpreted in a manner that ensures that only executive policy decisions (or matters involving high political judgment) are excluded.[6]

A similar issue arises in relation to the exclusion in paragraph (cc) of the executive powers or functions of a municipal council. This exclusion should be

[1] For a detailed discussion of these specific exclusions, see Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 53–69; Currie PAJA (supra) at 60–75; Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 210–216; Burns & Beukes Administrative Law (supra) at 113–128.

[2] These express exclusions are not strictly speaking necessary as these decisions would in any event not amount to decisions 'of an administrative nature' for purposes of PAJA. See § 63.3*(c)*(ii) supra. These exclusions also do not limit the FC s 33 right and thus need not be scrutinised under the FC s 36(1) limitations enquiry.

[3] See § 63.3*(b)*(ii) supra.

[4] See § 63.3*(b)*(iv) supra.

[5] In New Clicks, Ngcobo J (with whom Langa DCJ and Van der Westhuizen J concurs) holds that the listed exclusions in paragraph (aa) are exhaustive. New Clicks (supra) at paras 453–460. In other words, the only executive powers and functions excluded under paragraphs (aa) and (bb) are those contemplated in the enumerated sections. See Burns & Beukes Administrative Law (supra) at 114 (Take the view that if a power or function is not specifically listed, it is not excluded from the meaning of administrative action.) But see Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 210 (States that the powers and functions listed in these paragraphs are not exhaustive.) In our view, since the exclusion of some non-enumerated categories also flows from the constitutional jurisprudence, it is the non-exhaustive interpretation that is to be preferred.

[6] Such an approach appears to be consistent with Masetlha. In assessing whether the President's power to dismiss the head of the NIA fell within the ambit of the exclusion of the President's performance of 'any other executive function provided for in the Constitution or national legislation' (paragraph (aa) of PAJA's definition of 'administrative action', read with s 85(2)(e) of the Constitution), Moseneke J emphasised that the President's special power to appoint is expressly conferred in the Constitution, that the power to dismiss is a corollary of that constitutional power and that it would not be appropriate to constrain the exercise of this executive power to the requirements of procedural fairness.

interpreted narrowly, and in accordance with the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court,[1] to include only the deliberative exercise by municipal councils of decision-making power in the realm of broad policy-making or legislating and not the actions of municipal councils in implementing provincial legislation and national legislation.[2] If this exclusion is not given such a meaning, it may well be unconstitutional.

Paragraphs (dd) and (ee) exclude the legislative functions of Parliament, provincial legislatures and municipal councils as well as the judicial functions of a judicial officer of a court[3] and a Special Tribunal[4] and a traditional leader under customary law or any other law. The exclusion of the legislative functions of legislatures and judicial functions of judicial officers is based on the separation of powers doctrine and is consistent with the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court on the distinction between administrative action, on the one hand, and legislative and judicial action, on the other. As the majority judgment in Sidumo makes clear, what matters is not only the nature of the function (administrative, legislative or adjudicative) but also the institution that is performing the function.[5]

As a number of authors have pointed out, the exclusion of the judicial functions of traditional leaders is, however, controversial. The legal safeguards of independence, impartiality and accountability are less extensive in relation to these functionaries.[6]

The remaining exclusions from the ambit of PAJA are pragmatic, legislative choices and, as such, should be narrowly interpreted in order to survive constitutional scrutiny.[7] We briefly discuss each of these exclusions in turn.

Paragraph (ff) stipulates that administrative action does not include 'a decision to institute or continue a prosecution'. This pragmatic exception is justified on the grounds that the criminal justice system would be delayed by administrative reviews before criminal proceedings have even commenced. The accused is, in any event, given an opportunity during the course of the criminal trial to address

[1] See § 63.3*(b)*(ii) and (iii).

[2] This interpretation is consistent with the use of the same phrase 'executive powers or functions' in paragraphs (aa) and (bb) followed by a list of powers and functions under the Final Constitution that are related to broad policy making or political judgment. This view is shared by a number of authors. See R Pfaff & H Schneider 'The Promotion of Administrative Justice Act from a Germen Perspective' (2001) 17 SAJHR 59 ('German Perspective') at 77; Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 64–65; Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 212; and Burns & Beukes Administrative Law (supra) at 118–119.

[3] In terms of FC s 166, 'court' would encompass the Constitutional Court, the Supreme Court of Appeal, the High Courts, the Magistrates' Courts and 'any other court established or recognised in terms of an Act of Parliament' (the latter would include, for example, the Labour Appeal Court and the Competition Appeal Court).

[4] Tribunals may be established under s 2 of the Special Investigating Units and Special Tribunals Act 74 of 1996.

[5] But see the minority judgment in Sidumo (Ngcobo J).

[6] See Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 66–67. For an updated discussion of the exclusion of judicial functions of traditional leaders, see Currie The PAJA (supra) at 71–72. For a discussion of the judicial powers of traditional leaders, see T Bennett & C Murray 'Traditional Leaders' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) § 26.6*(c)*(i).

[7] To the extent that the excluded actions amount to 'administrative action' under FC s 33, the exclusion of these decisions in PAJA would, if challenged, be subjected to the limitations test under FC s 36(1).

the case against him or her.[1] The extension of this exclusion to a decision not to prosecute or a decision to discontinue a prosecution is hotly contested.[2] Indeed, it has been discussed in the high-profile (and high-impact) judgment by Nicholson J in Zuma v NDPP.[3] It seems somewhat anomalous to have full-blown administrative accountability for a decision not to prosecute but not for a decision to prosecute, especially in the light of the protection offered in this area by the more specific legal regime relating to prosecution.[4] Nevertheless, it seems to us that the language of paragraph (ff) of PAJA, coupled with the need to interpret PAJA's exclusions in a restrictive manner, means that this exclusion does not extend to decisions not to prosecute or to discontinue prosecutions.[5] Such decisions are therefore reviewable under PAJA, where they meet the other requirements for 'administrative action'.

The next exclusion from the ambit of administrative action concerns decisions of the Judicial Services Commission ('the JSC') 'relating to any aspect regarding the nomination, selection or appointment of a judicial officer or any other person'.[6] The JSC is a public entity that exercises powers granted by legislation and, although certain of its members are judges, it does not exercise judicial functions.

[1] A decision to institute a prosecution is thus similar to a decision to institute civil proceedings or, for example, a decision by the Competition Commission to refer a complaint to the Competition Tribunal, which decisions have been held to lack the requisite finality for a classification as administrative action. See Eastern Metropolitan Substructure v Peter Klein Investments (Pty) Limited 2001 (4) SA 661 (W), 2001 (4) BCLR 344 (W) ('Peter Klein'); Norvartis SA (Pty) Limited and Others v Competition Commission and Others (CT 22/CR/B/Jun 01, 2.7.2001) at paras 40–61; Simelane and Others NNO v Seven-Eleven Corporation SA (Pty) Limited and Another 2003 (3) SA 64 (SCA), [2003] 1 All SA 82 (SCA) at paras 16 and 17; and Telkom SA Limited v The Competition Commission of South Africa & Another, unreported judgment of the Transvaal Provincial Division under case no. 44239/04 (20 June 2008). See also Podlas v Cohen No & Others 1994 (4) SA 662 (T), 1994 (3) BCLR 137 (T) at 675 and Park-Ross v Director, Office for Serious Economic Offences 1998 (1) SA 108 (C) at para 18.

[2] A number of authors are of the view that this exclusion from PAJA does not apply to a decision not to prosecute: Currie The PAJA (supra) at 73; Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 213–214 (noting the South African Law Reform Commission rationale that whereas a positive decision to prosecute would lead to judicial accountability for that decision in a trial, a negative decision would not); De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 65; Burns & Beukes Administrative Law (supra) at 126. Schneider & Pfaff (supra) express the opposite view (at 22). One should also note that unlike an accused who is prosecuted, a decision not to prosecute has a final effect in respect of the victim of a crime. The question of the extension of the exclusion was left open by Constitutional Court in Kaunda and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) ('Kaunda') at para 84.

[3] The alternative to the inclusion of a decision not to prosecute is its review on 'mere' grounds of legality. Such a review regime may well accord with the Constitutional Court's seeming approval of the cautious approach to this issue in the United Kingdom in Kaunda. Kaunda (supra) at para 84 n64.

[4] See FC s 179(5). For more on the statutory framework and case law, see Currie The PAJA (supra) at 73 and Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 214 fn 340.

[5] A potential argument excluding the specialised area of prosecutions from administrative action in a parallel to the LRA, as understood by the Constitutional Court in Sidumo, could be constructed but would rely upon parallel grounding in the constitutional scheme of accountability (ie the FC s 33 regime).

[6] Paragraph (gg) of the definition of 'administrative action'. Note that the action of the JSC relating to misconduct of judges would not fall within this PAJA exclusion.

Some authors express doubts as to the justifiability of this exclusion.[1] Jacques De Ville is of the view that it is a justifiable exception on the basis that decisions on the appointment of judges are unsuitable for review on administrative law grounds.[2] Although the constitutionality of this exclusion is not free from doubt, the facts are that: (a) the JSC's powers to nominate judges, and to consult with and advise the President on the appointment of judges, are derived directly from the Final Constitution;[3] and (b) the appointment of judges is an inherently political decision, with considerable policy attributes, that is ultimately taken by the President in terms of a constitutional power. From these two facts it follows that this exclusion would survive constitutional scrutiny.

Paragraph (ii) of the definition excludes a decision taken, or a failure to take a decision, in terms of PAIA. This exception is justified in light of the specific internal appeal and statutory review mechanisms, as well as the reason-giving requirements, provided for in PAIA.[4]

The final express exclusion from the definition of 'administrative action' is any decision, or failure to take a decision, in terms of s 4(1) of PAJA. As discussed below, s 4(1) states that, in the case of administrative action affecting the rights of the public, an administrator must decide to follow one of a number of procedures for giving effect to procedural fairness under s 4(1) (e.g. to follow a notice and comment procedure or to hold a public inquiry). The full extent of this exclusion is that the administrator's choice of procedure under s 4(1) does not amount to administrative action, ie that the administrators choice of procedure is final.[5] The administrator is still obliged to make a decision and to follow one of the processes set out in s 4(1).[6] The subsequent conduct of the chosen process will be subject to administrative law review.[7]

(v) A decision of an organ of state or person exercising public power or performing a public function

In order to qualify as administrative action in terms of PAJA, the decision must be made by an organ of state or by another person exercising a public power or performing a public function. The crucial question that this element of the

[1] See Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 68; Currie The PAJA (supra) at 73; Pfaff & Schneider (supra) at 77 (Describe the exclusion as 'unfortunate'); Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 214 (Describes paragraph (gg) as an 'enigmatic exclusion' and remarks that it may seem 'somewhat whimsical.')

[2] See De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 66.

[3] FC ss 174(3), (4) and (6).

[4] It has been argued, however, that this should only be the case if the review of decisions by statutory bodies under PAIA is at least as extensive as that under PAJA (see I Currie & J Klaaren The Promotion of Access to Information Act Commentary 2002 at 202–209). In any case, this exclusion may have constitutional grounding in the competence asserted by FC s 32.

[5] New Clicks (supra) at para 132 (Chaskalson CJ) and New Clicks at para 468 (Ngcobo J).

[6] This follows from the principle of legality, coupled with the use of the mandatory word 'must' in s 4(1).

[7] Chaskalson CJ in New Clicks (supra) at para 132.

definition raises is whether the relevant actor is exercising a public power or performing a public function. Since the placement of this requirement in PAJA raises no issues apart from the understanding of this requirement in terms of FC s 33, the detailed discussion above on the distinction between public and private powers or functions for purposes of FC s 33 applies equally to this element of PAJA's definition of administrative action.[1]

(vi) The requirement of adversely affecting rights

As we have already noted, the most controversial element of the definition of administrative action in PAJA has been the requirement that the decision must 'adversely affect the rights of any person'. This requirement, together with the requirement of a 'direct, external legal affect', imposes an impact threshold[2] on the meaning of administrative action. This impact threshold, on the face of it, greatly restricts the scope of PAJA.[3]

It may be argued that the 'adversely affecting rights' requirement is unconstitutional. It fails to give effect to the constitutional right to just administrative action by restricting the meaning of administrative action to a class of action which is narrower than that contemplated in FC s 33. Depending on the meaning given to this phrase in PAJA, this argument may well succeed. In our view, this argument is strengthened by the fact that, while the right to written reasons in FC s 33(2) applies only to persons 'whose rights have been adversely affected' by administrative action, no similar limitation is placed on the application of FC s 33(1). If FC s 33(1) contemplates that administrative action arises only in circumstances where rights have been adversely affected, this qualification in FC s 33(2) would be unnecessary.[4]

We now turn to consider the meaning of the PAJA requirement that the decision 'adversely affects the rights of any person'. We then return to the question of its constitutionality below.

The word 'affects' is capable of two meanings — 'deprived' and 'determined'. If the former definition is to be preferred, PAJA will cover a narrow class of administrative action. If the latter is given precedence, then it will cover a relatively broad class of administrative action. For example, if 'affects' means 'deprived', a person whose licence is prematurely terminated will be protected by the rules of administrative justice but a first-time applicant for a licence will

[1] See § 63.3*(b)*(viii) and (ix) supra.

[2] The term 'impact threshold' to describe these two elements of the definition of 'administrative action' is used in De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 37.

[3] As stated above, the 'adversely affecting rights' and 'direct, external legal effect' requirements were inserted during the drafting process by the Portfolio Committee and were not contained in the Law Commission's draft Bill. In fact, the draft Bill did not contain any impact threshold requirement; it defined administrative action with reference to its administrative character rather than its effect.

[4] Hoexter 'Future of Judicial Review' (supra) at 514 criticises this restriction on the definition of administrative action, stating as follows: 'This is a startling departure both from the definition proposed by the South African Law Commission and from the common law, and in my view its effect is to narrow the ambit of administrative action beyond what is acceptable. . . . On this score alone one must harbour the gravest doubts about the constitutionality of s 1 of the Act.'

not. This dispute between the determination theory and the deprivation theory of administrative justice is not new to our law and had already generated a considerable amount of debate in relation to the scope of natural justice prior to the finalisation of the Interim Constitution.[1]

While it is possible that the inclusion of the word 'adversely' indicates the deprivation theory, this interpretation would give administrative action such a limited meaning as to render PAJA unconstitutional. To hold that administrative justice only applies to decisions which deprive a person of his or her rights cannot be said to give effect to the constitutional right to just administrative action.[2] Such an interpretation should thus be avoided. Our courts should rather adopt the determination theory in interpreting this requirement of PAJA.[3] Although our courts have not, to date, expressly grappled with the deprivation versus determination theories in this context, the decision by the majority of the Constitutional Court in Union of Refugee Women clearly endorses the determination theory in the context of PAJA's definition of administrative action.[4]

Even if one accepts that the word 'affects' in the phrase 'adversely affects the rights of any person' means 'determines', the difficulty still remains as to how to

[1] See, for example, E Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where?: Introducing the Interim Bill of Rights' (1994) 10 SAJHR 31. See also E Mureinik, 'Admin justice in the BoR' (6 July 1994, Unpublished memorandum on file with authors); E Mureinik 'Reconsidering Review: Participation and Accountability' (1993) Acta Juridica 35, 36–40 ('Reconsidering Review'). It is decidedly odd that this debate now takes place in the context of defining 'administrative action' as the threshold requirement for the application of PAJA (ie as a threshold requirement for the application of administrative review). It has, historically, been a debate attaching to the scope of natural justice (which is generally considered to have a more limited scope than the reach of administrative review), in which a compromise was found in the form of the legitimate expectation doctrine. See § 63.5*(d)*(ii) infra; Laubscher v Native Commissioner, Piet Retief 1958 (1) SA 546, 549 (A)(Indicates that natural justice attaches to deprivations of rights); Hack v Venterspost Municipality & others 1950 (1) SA 172, 189–90 (W)(Indicates that natural justice attaches to determinations of rights.) But see Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 78–79 (Interpret the debate as having been appropriately and entirely displaced by a regime of constitutional supremacy, particularly in view of the two-stage theory of fundamental rights and limitations analysis.)

[2] See Hoexter 'Future of Judicial Review' (supra) at 516 (states that the deprivation theory 'clearly creates an unacceptably high threshold for admission to the category of "administrative action"'.)

[3] Such an approach, when combined with the other limitations contained in PAJA, will, in effect, result in the adoption of Mureinik's provisional determination theory (see Mureinik 'Reconsidering Review' (supra) at 37; and Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 78–9). Courts will, in practice, work in from the determination theory by accepting that all public power which determines rights will constitute administrative action, unless the other elements of PAJA's definition are not met.

[4] Union of Refugee Women & Others v Director: Private Security Industry Regulatory Authority & Others 2007 (4) SA 395 (CC) at para 70 (Kondile AJ)('The refusal to register an applicant as a private security service provider is an adverse determination of the applicants' rights. The determination has an immediate, final and binding impact on the applicants, who have no connection with the Authority. The decisions therefore do have a direct, external legal effect and constitute administrative action in terms of PAJA.') Some support for the determination theory may also be found in the following dictum of Boruchowitz J in the pre-PAJA case of Association of Chartered Certified Accountants v Chairman, Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board 2001 (2) SA 980 (W) at 997, in holding that the relevant decision amounted to administrative action: '[T]he Board's decision has plainly affected the rights and interests of the applicant. It has determined its rights' (our emphasis). See also the decision of the SCA in Grey's Marine (supra) at para 23, stating that the administrative action must have 'capacity to affect rights'; and Minister of Defence and Others v Dunn 2007 (6) SA 52 (SCA)('Dunn') at para 4. The determination theory also enjoys extensive academic support. See, for example, Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 200; Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 77; Currie The PAJA (supra) at 82.

interpret the other two key words, 'adversely' and 'rights'. The most significant decision on the meaning of this requirement in PAJA is that of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Grey's Marine. In dealing with the question whether a decision by the Minister of Public Works to grant a lease over the quayside in Hout Bay amounted to administrative action, Nugent JA remarked as follows on behalf of a unanimous SCA:

> While PAJA's definition purports to restrict administrative action to decisions that, as a fact, 'adversely affect the rights of any person', I do not think that a literal meaning could have been intended. For administrative action to be characterized by its effect in particular cases (either beneficial or adverse) seems to me to be paradoxical and also finds no support from the construction that has until now been placed on s 33 of the Constitution. Moreover, that literal construction would be inconsonant with s 3(1) [of PAJA], which envisages that administrative action might or might not affect rights adversely. The qualification, particularly when seen in conjunction with the requirement that it must have a 'direct, external legal effect', was probably intended rather to convey that administrative action is action that has the capacity to affect legal rights, the two qualifications operating in tandem serving to emphasise that administrative action impacts directly and immediately on individuals.[1]

Although this passage can be read to indicate that the test for the 'adversely affecting rights' requirement is whether the decision has the capacity to affect legal rights (which we take as a synonym for 'determines rights'), other statements in the judgment suggest that the Grey's Marine test is whether the decision has a a direct and immediate impact on individuals or groups.[2] Most dramatically, the SCA appears completely to disregard the word 'adversely' in the phrase 'adversely affects the rights of any person' (apparently in keeping with its view that classifying administrative action based on its effect is paradoxical). The SCA does so by basing its decision that the grant of the lease amounts to administrative action on the fact that it had direct and immediate consequences for the lessee.[3] As the lessee was the recipient of rights flowing from the lease, it cannot be said that the decision had an 'adverse' effect on the lessee's rights.[4]

The Court in Grey's Marine is not alone in disregarding the language of the PAJA phrase 'adversely affects the rights of any person'. The Constitutional Court has itself done so in a passage in Steenkamp. Moseneke DCJ remarks (on

[1] Grey's Marine (supra) at para 23.

[2] See Grey's Marine (supra) at paras 23, 24 and 28. Other decisions of our courts have followed this approach in Grey's Marine and focused on the direct and immediate impact of the decision. See Chirwa (SCA) (supra) at para 53; Kiva v Minister of Correctional Services, Unreported, Eastern Cape Local Division (27 July 2006) Case no 1453/04, [2006] JOL 188512('Kiva') at para 28; Dunn (supra) at para 4 (SCA remarked that the appointment of a person to a post in the South African National Defence Force amounted to administrative action 'even though it cannot be said to adversely affect the "right" of a person who is non-suited'). See also Walele (supra) at paras 27 and 31 ('There can be no doubt' that the decision to approve the building plans constitutes administrative action, despite later remarking that 'the approval could not, by itself, affect the applicant's rights.)

[3] Grey's Marine (supra) at para 28.

[4] See Du Plessis and Penfold 'Bill of Rights Jurisprudence' (supra) at 92–93.

behalf of the majority of the Court) that a decision to award or refuse a tender constitutes administrative action because the decision 'materially and directly affects the legal interests or rights of tenderers concerned'.[1] Moseneke J thus seems to ignore the legislative choice of the word 'rights' in the definition of administrative action, and adopts the position that an impact on legal interests is sufficient.[2] As with Grey's Marine, the Constitutional Court thus effectively disregards the language of PAJA and redraws the ambit of the Act.[3]

Another judicial route around the 'adversely affecting rights' requirement is to say that the term 'rights' includes the constitutional right to just administrative action. This approach was adopted by Schutz JA on behalf of the majority of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Goodman Brothers in the slightly different context of the constitutional right to written reasons under the Interim Constitution.[4] The problem is that, as Cora Hoexter has pointed out, this amounts to 'bootstrap' reasoning. In the PAJA context, it negates the requirement that the decision must adversely affect rights.[5] To say that the decision adversely affects the administrative rights of persons affected by it is to put the question, not to answer it.

These cases, in our view, adopt an overly artificial interpretation of PAJA's 'adversely affecting rights' requirement. If one looks back to the beginning of the process of drafting PAJA, what appears to have taken place is as follows: the Law Commission prepared a sensible, wide definition of 'administrative action'; in an effort to reduce judicial scrutiny of the administration, this definition was cut down by the Portfolio Committee, through various amendments including the introduction of the impact threshold; and the courts have subsequently clawed-back its extension by 'redrafting' the definition so as to restore administrative

[1] Steenkamp (supra) at para 21 (Our emphasis)(Although it may be suggested that Moseneke DCJ is referring to 'administrative action' under FC s 33 rather than PAJA, the language of this passage and the reference in ftn 15 to both s 1 of PAJA and Grey's Marine suggests that this is not the case.)

[2] Other courts, though not going as far as the Steenkamp Court, either equate rights and legitimate expectations or apparently read in that the action may affect legitimate expectations. See Dunn v Minister of Defence 2006 (2) SA 107 (T) para 5 (Decision is administrative action if it adversely affects 'rights and/or legitimate expectations'); and Tirfu Raiders (supra) at para 36 (Decision is administrative action if it affects 'rights, in the form of legitimate expectations'). For a comment on the latter case, see R Stacey 'Substantive protection of Legitimate Expectations in the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act — Tirfu Raiders Rugby Club v South African Rugby Union' (2006) 22 SAJHR 664.

[3] It may be argued that the word 'rights' has no natural limit and can bear a sufficiently broad meaning so as to encompass 'interests'. See, for example, De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 53–54 (Argues that the 'adversely affecting rights' requirement simply means that the decision must have a discernable effect on an individual or group of individuals). We disagree. In our view, the terms rights, interests and legitimate expectations have meanings that are sufficiently established in our administrative law that the word 'rights' cannot simply be equated with the far broader concept of 'interests'. See Currie The PAJA (supra) at 82–83).

[4] Goodman Brothers (supra) at paras 11–12.

[5] C Hoexter 'The Current State of South African Administrative Law' in Realising Administrative Justice H Corder and L van der Vijver (eds) (2002) 20, 30–32 ('The Current State'). See also Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 202; Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 80–81.

review to its more appropriate scope. The courts have, however, done so through an interpretation of the impact threshold which pays little attention to the language used in the statute.[1]

Although one is tempted to conclude that these judgments more appropriately delineate the scope of administrative justice than the drafters of PAJA have done and to accept these judgments as correctly proclaiming the law,[2] it is important not to lose sight of the fact that these judgments are, as a matter of constitutional principle, flawed. It is a trite principle of constitutional law, emphasised by the Constitutional Court on a number of occasions, that one can only interpret legislation in a manner which is consistent with the Final Constitution if the meaning arrived at is one that the language of the legislation is reasonably capable of bearing and is not 'unduly strained'.[3] In our view, the meanings attributed to the phrase 'adversely affects the rights of any person' in Grey's Marine and in Steenkamp are unduly strained. The courts are, in our view, effectively engaged in legislative redrafting. If PAJA's definition of 'administrative action' limits the scope of FC s 33, which we submit it does, the proper approach is to assess whether that limitation complies with the limitations clause. In this case, one must thus assess whether the 'adversely affecting rights' requirement amounts to a reasonable and justifiable limitation of FC s 33, taking into account any justification that the state advances for the narrowing of the scope of administrative action in this manner. If a court then finds that the phrase is unconstitutional, the court could apply ordinary constitutional remedies: such as striking down the definition of administrative action or engaging in severance (e.g. striking out the word 'adversely') or reading-in (e.g. reading in the word 'interests').

We can now return to the question as to whether the phrase 'adversely affects the rights of any person' amounts to a reasonable and justifiable limitation on the constitutional right. It should be borne in mind that if the determination theory applies in interpreting PAJA (as the case law, including that of the Constitutional Court, thus far indeed suggests), the restrictive impact of this phrase is significantly reduced. This restrictive impact is further reduced by interpreting 'rights' broadly in at least two respects. First, it should not be restricted to constitutional rights but should include all forms of legal rights, including statutory and common-law rights.[4] Second, O'Regan J, in examining the application of administrative justice in the Interim Constitution on behalf of the Constitutional Court,

[1] See Currie The PAJA (supra) at 46 ftn 9 ('One of the most problematic aspects of s 1 is that it does not mention "legal interests" but confines itself to "rights". But it is a great deal less troublesome if, as the approach in Steenkamp suggests, one ignores that small problem.')

[2] See, for example, Currie The PAJA (supra) at 79 (States that the SCA's interpretation of the 'adversely affecting rights' requirement in Grey's Marine 'cuts the Gordian knot created by this ill-advised insertion into the Act', and adds at 81 that the approach in Grey's Marine 'has considerable attraction'.)

[3] See § 63.2*(a)*(iv) supra.

[4] This approach finds support in the case law dealing with the analogous right of access to information in the Interim Constitution, which could only be invoked where it was required to exercise or protect a right. See J Klaaren and G Penfold 'Access to Information' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2002) § 62.7.

stated obiter that it 'may well be appropriate' to adopt a broader notion of 'right' than that used in private law, to include circumstances where the State has unilaterally incurred liability without establishing a contractual nexus between the individual and the State.[1]

If this broad meaning is given to 'rights' and the determination theory is adopted, then much of the potential unconstitutionality is alleviated. Nonetheless, we are of the view that the PAJA definition is still too narrow to comply with, and give effect to, the constitutional right to just administrative action in at least one limited respect. It would still exclude decisions that do not deprive or determine rights in an adverse manner despite the fact that such decisions may be administrative in nature, confer rights on some and impact adversely on the material interests of others (eg, the neighbouring landowners in Bullock or Grey's Marine). Cases of significant impact on the interests of third parties should constitute a category of administrative action excluded by PAJA but within constitutional purview, and which exclusion is not justifiable. Accordingly, the phrase 'adversely affects the rights of any person' is, in our view, unconstitutional as underinclusive. It seems to us that consideration should be given to removing this unconstitutionality in one of three ways: (a) deleting the phrase 'adversely affects the rights of any person'; (b) deleting the word 'adversely'; or (c) adding the words 'or interests' after the word 'rights'.

(vii) A direct, external legal effect

The final element of PAJA's definition of administrative action is that it must have 'a direct, external legal effect'. This requirement, which was yet another late addition to the Act by the Portfolio Committee, is derived from the German Federal Law of Administrative Procedure of 1976.[2] Pfaff & Schneider explain the phrase as follows:[3]

> As a general principle, . . . the decision must not only have an effect internally, ie within the sphere of public administration . . .. The purpose is to avoid legal disputes with regard to measures and actions of public authorities that may well influence the final decision, but do not determine individual rights in a binding way.

The most important implication of this definitional element is that, together with the phrase 'adversely affects the rights of any person', it introduces the concept of finality. A decision will have a direct legal effect only if it has an actual and final impact on a person's rights or interests. It therefore appears that preparatory steps and recommendations that do not have such an impact will not amount

[1] Premier, Mpumalanga (supra) at para 32 ftn 10.

[2] The relevant provision reads as follows: 'Administrative act is every order, decision or other sovereign measure taken by an authority for the regulation of a particular case in the sphere of public law and directed at immediate external legal consequences.'.

[3] Pfaff & Schneider (supra) at 71.

to administrative action.[1] Nevertheless, it is important to note that a preliminary or intermediate decision can still meet this requirement where it, in itself, has a material impact on individuals or groups.[2] In addition, an intermediate decision (e.g. a recommendation) can, together with the final decision that results from that intermediate decision, amount to administrative action which is reviewable as a composite whole.[3]

The phrase 'external effect' implies that the decision must have a direct impact on a person or entity other than the administrative actor. It would therefore exclude a decision of a subcommittee which makes a recommendation to the final decision-making body. The phrase should not be taken literally. If it were, then it would exclude actions which affect the members of (or the persons within) the public body itself.[4] For example, the internal transfer of a prisoner to a higher level of security has a direct, external legal effect on the relevant person and should constitute administrative action.

63.4 THE RIGHT TO LAWFUL ADMINISTRATIVE ACTION

The right to lawful administrative action was entrenched in IC s 24(a) and is now entrenched in FC s 32(1). While its content overlaps with the principle of legality, the right to lawful administrative action differs from that principle because it applies only to administrative action.

The content of the right to lawful administrative could be broken down and analysed in terms of two components: a prospective component and retrospective judicial review component. With respect to the first prospective component, the

[1] See, for example, Registrar of Banks v Regal Treasury Private Bank (under curatorship) & Another (Regal Treasury Bank Holdings Ltd intervening) 2004 (3) SA 560, 567 (W); Sasol Oil (Pty) Ltd & Another v Metcalfe NO 2004 (5) SA 161 (W) at para 13. This outcome may be at odds with the decision in Nextcom Cellular (Pty) Ltd v Funde NO & Others 2000 (4) SA 491 (T)(Coetzee AJ held that a recommendation of the South African Telecommunications Regulatory Authority to the Minister of Communications as to the award of the third cellular licence constituted a reviewable decision.) See also Oosthuizen Transport (Pty) Limited & Others v MEC, Road Traffic Matters, Mpumalanga, & Others 2008 (2) SA 570 (T) at paras 28–32 (Holds that a recommendation to suspend operating permits had a direct, external legal effect under PAJA, because it was a jurisdictional requirement for the suspension, the recommending body was responsible for the investigation of the matter and the recommendation was 'aimed at' affecting, and had the capacity to affect, rights.)

[2] See, eg, Director: Mineral Development, Gauteng Region v Save the Vaal Environment 1999 (2) SA 709 (SCA), 1999 (8) BCLR 845 (SCA) and South African Heritage Recourses Agency v Arniston Hotel Property (Pty) Ltd 2007 (2) SA 461 (C) at para 24 (a provisional protection order had a 'direct, external legal effect' as it temporarily 'froze' certain property rights.)

[3] See, eg, New Clicks (supra) at paras 136–141.

[4] As discussed at § 63.3*(b)(v)* supra, the majority in Chirwa held that a decision to dismiss a public sector employee does not amount to administrative action. It is unclear whether the majority regarded these acts as internal to the administration, and therefore as lacking an external effect (this is partly explained by the fact that the majority found that the dismissal did not amount to administrative action for purposes of FC s 33 of the Constitution and thus did not consider the application of PAJA). The minority (per Langa CJ) expressly did not address whether the dismissal had an 'external' effect for purposes of PAJA. Ibid at para 181.

right — just like the principle of legality — is of immediate application.[1] Where administrative action is taken it is prospectively subject to the right of lawful administrative action. At a minimum, this component of the constitutional right serves the purpose of guarding against parliamentary ouster clauses covering administrative action. Such clauses would be invalid. Under our system of constitutional supremacy (and unlike the previous system of parliamentary sovereignty), an Act of Parliament can no longer unjustifiably oust a court's constitutional jurisdiction and deprive the courts of their review function to ensure the lawfulness of administrative action.[2] With respect to the retrospective component, the right of lawful administrative action is identified and enforced primarily through the mechanism of judicial review.[3] We focus on this second component in the pages that follow.

Both components of the right to lawful administrative action overlap with the principle of legality in relation to administrative action.[4] As noted above, this principle has been described as ensuring that the executive 'may exercise no power and perform no function beyond that conferred upon them by law'.[5] The right to lawful administrative action therefore constitutionalises the fundamental rule of administrative law that a decision-maker must act within his or her powers and must not act ultra vires.[6] It is clear that this right requires that an

[1] Indeed, it is presumably subject to the principle of objective constitutional invalidity. On this doctrine, see S Woolman 'Application' in in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31; M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 9.

[2] Parliamentary ouster clauses were, in the past, upheld in a number of cases, including Staatspresident en Andere v United Democratic Front en 'n Ander 1988 (4) SA 830 (A) and Natal Indian Congress v State President & Others 1989 (3) SA 588 (D). One could argue that the courts' general supervisory function with respect to administrative action is additionally or alternatively provided for by the right of access to court in FC s 34. See J Brickhill & A Friedman 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) § 59.4*(a)(i)*.

[3] This is not, however, exclusive. For instance, the administrative procedures of internal review and appeal are non-judicial mechanisms that would also seek to give effect to the right to lawful administrative action. See for instance the Refugees Appeal Board in the Refugees Act 130 of 1998 and s 38 of the National Health Act 61 of 2003. This body of administrative law is not currently fully-fledged or articulated but is likely to develop significantly under the Final Constitution. Note that this review is separate from the constitutionally authorised review in terms of the PAJA that a tribunal may engage in — although no such tribunals have been established or designated. See Currie The PAJA (supra) 154–155.

[4] See Fedsure (supra) at para 59. See also § 63.2*(b)* supra (Discussion of the application of this constitutional principle beyond administrative action.) Given the explicit entrenchment of the right to lawful administrative action in the specific context of administrative action, the general principle would seem to be that its protection would be at least equivalent to the protection offered by the implicit principle of legality outside of those bounds.

[5] See Fedsure (supra) at para 56.

[6] See Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 50 ('What would have been ultra vires under the common law by reason of a functionary exceeding a statutory power is invalid under the Constitution according to the doctrine of legality.') administrator must act in terms of, and in accordance with, the terms of an empowering statute or other law. This right therefore prohibits a decision-maker acting beyond the terms of the relevant empowering legislation and thus outlaws action which is ultra vires in the narrow sense.[1]

We believe, however, that the right to lawful administrative action goes further and applies to acts that are ultra vires in a broader sense of that term. As Lawrence Baxter and other writers have pointed out, the traditional grounds of common-law judicial review are founded on this broad ultra vires principle. Where a decision-maker acts, for example, for an ulterior purpose, in bad faith, takes into account irrelevant considerations or fails to take into account relevant considerations, or makes an error of law, he or she acts beyond his or her powers.[2]

PAJA gives effect to this constitutional right to lawful administrative action principally by providing for judicial review of all administrative action in s 6 of the Act. Section 6(2) sets out a comprehensive list of grounds on which administrative action can be judicially reviewed, including: that the administrator was not authorised to take the action by the empowering provision; that the administrator acted under a delegation of power which was not authorised by the empowering provision; that a mandatory and material procedure or condition was not complied with; that the action was taken for a reason not authorised by the empowering provision; and that the action itself is not authorised by the empowering provision.[3]

While it is beyond the scope of this chapter to cover the materials interpreting each of the PAJA grounds of review, the remainder of this section is devoted to offering a constitutional perspective on these grounds. Other texts provide a view of the grounds of judicial review informed by canons of statutory interpretation.[4]

The most significantly shift is the constitutional basis for the institution of judicial review.[5] Consistent with our general approach in this chapter, we would argue that this change in the legal landscape has two particular implications: that the common law review jurisprudence may not be taken for granted, and that it

[1] See Farjas (Pty) Ltd & Another v Regional Land Claims Commissioner; KwaZulu-Natal 1998 (2) SA 900 (CC), 1998 (5) BCLR 579 (LCC) at para 18 (IC s 24*(a)* 'cast[s] a duty on reviewing courts to be all the more astute to ensure that public officials confine themselves strictly to the law which confers powers on them.')

[2] See Baxter Administrative Law (supra) 30–31. See Estate Geekie v Union Government & Another 1948 (2) SA 494, 502 (N)('In considering whether the proceedings of any tribunal should be set aside on the ground of illegality or irregularity, the question appears always to resolve itself into whether the tribunal acted ultra vires or not.')

[3] Section 6(2)(a)(i) and (ii), (b), (e)(i) and (f)(i). These provisions appear to provide for review for ultra vires in the narrow sense. In our view, the remainder of the grounds of review in s 6(2) also give effect to the right to lawful administrative action by providing that administrative action may be reviewed, for amongst other things, bias, errors of law, ulterior purpose or motive, or bad faith. All such defects in decision-making contravene the right to lawful administrative action in the broad sense.

[4] See, eg, Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 150–74; and Currie The PAJA (supra) at 152–174.

[5] See Currie The PAJA (supra) at 155–156.

must be critiqued and reformulated; and, secondly, the intensity of judicial review must be evaluated in terms of the separation of powers doctrine.[1]

In respect of this latter contention, it may be appropriate to outline our view on the concept of standards of review.[2] In our view, the effect of the Final Constitution (and the entrenchment of the right to just administrative action, in particular) is not a rising tide that lifts all boats of judicial review. Its effect is not to achieve a general heightening of judicial review. Instead, the standard of intensity of judicial review of administrative action will differ according to the context. In this respect, we agree with Cora Hoexter's suggestion that there is a pressing need to develop an appropriate approach to variability. Nonetheless, this differentiation is by no means case specific and potentially casuistic — it ought nor to vary according to each and every set of circumstances.[3] In order to satisfy constitutional dictates of rationality and, insofar as possible, to provide predictability and accountability, the standard of judicial review should, we argue, differ according to general categories. For instance, decisions will need to take into account the statutory context in which they are taken and therefore vary in their degree of deference (or respect) offered to the administrators having taken the decision. While theoretically appealing, it remains to be seen whether this degree of discipline on the variability impulse will be accepted and, more significantly, usefully used by the judiciary.

Second, the constitutional right to lawful administrative action would also appear to prohibit vague and uncertain delegations of law-making power as well as the conferral of over-broad discretionary powers on a decision-maker. This view finds support in Janse van Rensburg NO & Another v Minister of Trade and Industry & Another NNO.[4] In Janse van Rensburg, the Constitutional Court struck down a provision of the Consumer Affairs (Unfair Business Practices) Act[5] that enabled the Minister of Trade and Industry to take steps to prevent the continuation of business practices which were the subject of an investigation and in addition to attach and freeze assets. Interpreting the right of just administrative action directly, the Court held that these far-reaching powers could not be used in the absence of procedural fairness and without guidance as to how

[1] The debate over whether subjective jurisdictional facts ought to be given less weight in the constitutional era ought to be considered against the backdrop of the doctrine of the separation of powers. See Currie The PAJA (supra) at 163; Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 270–271.

[2] See Currie The PAJA (supra) at 157, Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 143, 200–201, and 328–330, De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 23–34 (Identifying an approach of institutional comity) and 213–216 (Identifying a deferential rationality, an unreasonableness, and a rational connection standard of review within reasonableness); H Corder 'Reviewing "Executive Action"' (supra) at 73–78; J Klaaren 'Five Models of Intensity of Review' in J Klaaren (ed) A Delicate Balance: The Place of the Judiciary in a Constitutional Democracy (2006) 79 - 82. De Ville's entire work can be seen as a working out of a model of judicial review that attempts to specify different degrees of scrutiny.

[3] Cf Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 200–201 (Conceiving variability as case-specific.)

[4] 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC)('Janse van Rensburg').

[5] Act 71 of 1988.

they are to be exercised. Goldstone J, in striking down the relevant provision, concluded as follows:

> Every conferment by the Legislature of an administrative discretion need not mirror the provisions of the Constitution or the common law regarding the proper exercise of such powers. However, as this court has already held (in the context of a limitations analysis), the constitutional obligation on the Legislature to promote, protect and fulfill the rights entrenched in the Bill of Rights entails that, where a wide discretion is conferred upon a functionary, guidance should be provided as to the manner in which those powers are to be exercised.[1]

The Constitutional Court found that uncircumscribed administrative discretion, together with the other circumstances of the case, was contrary to the right to procedural fairness.[2]

Subsequent cases, albeit in a non-administrative action context, have emphasised the point of principle.[3] Janse van Rensburg thus represents authority for the fact that, in certain circumstances, a broad decision-making power, which does not give adequate guidance as to the manner in which it is to be exercised, may be unconstitutional.[4] Still, Janse van Rensburg does not stand for the proposition that such breadth on its own (at least in primary legislation) will constitute an infringement of the right of just administrative action. Any discretion will therefore need to be assessed on its own terms to determine whether it is constitutionally defective in the manner contemplated in Janse van Rensburg.

Third, the common law relating to mistake of law and that relating to subjective jurisdictional facts is inconsistent with the right to lawful administrative action and requires reconceptualisation in the constitutional era. In the pre-constitutional case of Hira & Another v Booysen & Another,[5] the Appellate Division held that an

[1] Janse van Rensburg (supra) at para 25. See also Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others; Shalabi & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others; Thomas & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) at paras 42–48, which held that an uncircumscribed discretion would not comply with the limitations clause where a fundamental right is infringed. The latter decision applies only where the exercise of a discretion has the effect of infringing a fundamental right.

[2] This case illustrates the close connection between the requirement of lawful administrative action and procedural fairness as the Court could just as easily have found that the relevant provisions contravened the right to lawful administrative action. This appears to have been accepted by the Constitutional Court. See Janse van Rensburg (supra) at para 19.

[3] See Affordable Medicines Trust v Minister of Health 2006 (3) SA 247 (CC), 2005 (6) BCLR 529 (CC)('Affordable Medicines Trust') at paras 27–28. Nevertheless, Affordable Medicines Trust can, in some respects, be seen as a retreat from Dawood and Janse van Rensburg. The Court in Affordable Medicines Trust held that sufficient guidance was given to the decision-maker, despite the wide wording of the relevant discretion (the power to issue licences 'on the prescribed conditions'), because the factors constraining that discretion could be established by having regard to the provisions and objects of the empowering legislation read as a whole. Ibid paras at 30–39.

[4] Nevertheless it is important to note that the breadth of the power was only one of the factors which led the Court to conclude that the right to procedural fairness was infringed in this particular instance. Janse van Rensburg (supra) at para 25. The Court also emphasised the cumulative effect of the other features set out in para 23 of the judgment.

[5] 1992 (4) SA 69 (A) at 93.

agency's interpretation of its empowering provisions is reviewable unless the legislature intended to commit the question of interpretation solely to the agency's discretion. Among others, Michael Asimow has convincingly argued that, under the Final Constitution, Parliament can no longer completely commit a question of legal interpretation to an agency's discretion as all interpretive issues must now be reviewable.[1] Asimow suggests, appropriately in our view, that courts retain interpretive authority but give deference to carefully reasoned interpretations of ambiguous statutory language where an agency's expertise gives it some interpretive advantage over the courts. While Hira is essentially on the right track, a recalibration (either general or in particular areas of statutory interpretation) is necessary: legislation should not be permitted effectively to oust the courts' power to review a mistake of law.[2] While we are somewhat more hesitant with respect to the doctrine of subjective jurisdictional facts[3] — due to its potential for judicial overreach — a similar argument can in principle be made for a version of that doctrine.[4] We should, however, not be read as suggesting that a subjectively-phrased discretion renders the administrative decision immune from administrative review. It may simply suggest that a lower level of judicial scrutiny is appropriate.[5]

Fourth, we note that the right of lawful administrative action has engendered a new ground of review: that of a material mistake of fact. In Pepcor, certificates issued on the basis of incorrect actuarial information were the basis for deciding to transfer money to a retirement fund. This decision was set aside on the basis of a material mistake of fact. In reaching this conclusion, the Supreme Court of Appeal drew more support from the principle of legality than from FC s 33(1). While PAJA does not list this ground of review explicitly, the Act's silence has not prevented its use.[6]

63.5 THE RIGHT TO PROCEDURALLY FAIR ADMINISTRATIVE ACTION

(a) Introduction

The right to procedurally fair administrative action, entrenched in FC s 33(1), is a right of participation. This right entitles persons to participate in the decision-making process in relation to administrative decisions that affect them. It, at a

[1] M Asimow 'Administrative Law under South Africa's Final Constitution: The Need for an Administrative Justice Act' (1996) 113 SALJ 613, 623.

[2] Cf Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 258–259 (Seeming to endorse the Hira approach without change in the constitutional era).

[3] Subjective jurisdictional facts include subjectively phrased discretions such as 'is satisfied that', 'in his discretion' and 'has reason to believe'.

[4] See J Klaaren 'Teaching Procedural Jurisdictional Facts' (1998) 14 SAJHR 60.

[5] For a similar approach, based on deference, see Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 270–271. Hoexter also points out that wide, subjective discretions may, at times, fall foul of the requirement that the conferral of decision-making power must not be unguided.

[6] Section 6(2)(i) of PAJA provides for a catch-all ground of review where 'the action is otherwise unconstitutional or unlawful'.

minimum, entrenches the common law rules of natural justice. These rules are embodied in two fundamental principles — the right to be heard (audi alteram partem) and the rule against bias (nemo iudex in sua causa).

It is important, at the outset, to note that the right is to procedural fairness. It goes to the procedure by which administrative decisions are made and does not safeguard a right to substantive fairness. The majority of the Constitutional Court made this clear in Bel Porto School Governing Body & Others v Premier, Western Cape, & Another.[1] It concluded that a standard of substantive fairness 'would drag Courts into matters which, according to the separation of powers, should be dealt with at a political and administrative level and not at a judicial level'.[2]

(b) The rationales for procedural fairness

The primary rationale for the right to procedural fairness is that it improves the quality of administrative decision-making by ensuring that all relevant information, interests and points of view are placed at the administrator's disposal.[3] As Ngcobo J remarked on behalf of the Constitutional Court:

> It is a fundamental element of fairness that adverse decisions should not be made without affording the person to be affected by the decision a reasonable opportunity to make representations. A hearing can convert a case that was considered to be open and shut to be open to some doubt, and a case that was considered to be inexplicable to be fully explained.[4]

Procedural fairness thus promotes informed, rational and legitimate decision-making and reduces the risk of arbitrary decisions.[5] In so doing, it enhances the constitutional principles of openness, accountability and participation.[6]

This first rationale is related to a second: Procedural fairness gives a person potentially affected by a decision a chance to influence that decision.[7] The

[1] 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC)('Bel Porto') at para 88.

[2] We note, however, that the requirement of reasonable administrative action approaches that of substantive fairness and requires courts, to some extent, to engage with the merits of administrative decision-making. See § 63.6 infra.

[3] See Janse van Rensburg (supra) at para 24 ('[O]bservance of the rules of procedural fairness ensures that an administrative functionary has an open mind and a complete picture of the facts and circumstances within which the administrative action is to be taken.') See also Mokgoro J in De Lange v Smuts (supra) at para 131 ('Everyone has the right to state his or her case, not because his or her version is right, and must be accepted, but because, in evaluating the cogency of any argument, the arbiter, still a fallible human being, must be informed about the points of view of both parties in order to stand any real chance of coming up with an objectively justifiable conclusion that is anything more than chance'.)

[4] Zondi (supra) at para 112. See also Ngcobo J in Masetlha (supra) at para 187; and Megarry J in John v Rees & Others; Martin & Another v Davis & Others; Rees & Another v John [1970] Ch 345 ('John v Rees') at 402, quoted with approval in POPCRU (supra) at para 76.

[5] POPCRU (supra) at 76. See also De Lange v Smuts (supra) at para 131; De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 217. See Masetlha (supra) at para 187 (Ngcobo J, dissenting)(Decision-maker having all the relevant facts at his or her disposal 'is essential to rationality, the sworn enemy of arbitrariness'.)

[6] See, eg, FC s 1*(d)* and FC s 195 (Setting out the values and principles of public administration).

[7] See Masetlha (supra) at para 75.

exercise of procedural fairness leaves those concerned 'with the feeling that their views have been taken into consideration in the process'.[1] At least two benefits flow directly from such participation. First, persons who have had a real chance to influence a decision are more likely to accept the decision even if it goes against them. As Megarry J remarked, one should not underestimate 'the feelings of resentment of those who find that a decision against them has been made without their being afforded an opportunity to influence the course of events'.[2] Second, allowing affected persons an opportunity to influence decisions that affect them affirms their equal worth and human dignity.[3] These rationales are well captured in the following passage:

> It is of first importance in a democracy that, when public bodies make decisions affecting the rights, liberties, interests, or legitimate expectations of individuals, they are obliged to treat such individuals with respect, and as participants in, rather than as mere objects of, the administrative process. In a relationship between citizen and state thus conceived lie the seeds of a healthy polity, in which public bodies earn the trust of individuals; in which individuals are paid the respect due to them by state bodies; and in which the chances of good decisions are enhanced. [4]

As discussed below, the right to procedurally fair administrative action is not confined to those decisions that have an effect on individuals. It extends to administrative decisions that have a general effect on the public. This post-constitutional development in our law enhances the constitutional principle of participatory democracy. Our Constitutional Court has described participatory democracy as 'one of [our democracy's] basic and fundamental principles': it 'provides vitality to the functioning of representative democracy'.[5] The Court's endorsement of the principle of participatory democracy, in the context of the right to participate in the parliamentary legislative process, is expressed in terms that apply equally to general administrative decisions (like rule-making):

> The participation by the public on a continuous basis provides vitality to the functioning of representative democracy. It encourages citizens of the country to be actively involved in public affairs, identify themselves with the institutions of government and become familiar

[1] See Bel Porto (supra) at para 245.

[2] See John v Rees (supra) at 402, quoted in POPCRU (supra) at para 76, fn 89.

[3] See De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 217; Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 326–327; TRS Allan 'Procedural Fairness and the Duty of Respect' 1998 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 497.

[4] Beatson, Matthews and Elliott's Administrative law: Text and Materials (3rd Edition, 2005) 391.

[5] Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC) ('Doctors for Life') at para 145 (Ngcobo J) and Matatiele Municipality v President of the Republic of South Africa 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC). See K Govender 'An assessment of section 4 of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 2000 as a means of advancing participatory democracy in South Africa' (2003) 18 SAPL 404. For a discussion of the fundamental importance of democracy, including participatory democracy, under the Final Constitution, see T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 10. In Doctors for Life, the Constitutional Court used the principle of participatory democracy as a basis for holding that legislatures are often obliged to allow interested parties an opportunity to comment during the legislative drafting process.

> with the laws as they are made. It enhances the civic dignity of those who participate by enabling their voices to be heard and taken account of. It promotes a spirit of democratic and pluralistic accommodation calculated to produce laws that are likely to be widely accepted and effective in practice. It strengthens the legitimacy of legislation in the eyes of the people. Finally, because of its open and public character, it acts as a counterweight to secret lobbying and influence-peddling. Participatory democracy is of special importance to those who are relatively disempowered in a country like ours where great disparities of wealth and influence exist. . . . Therefore our democracy includes, as one of its basic and fundamental principles, the principle of participatory democracy.[1]

In fact, it may be said that public participation is of greater importance in the context of administrative decision-making in that subordinate legislation lacks to some extent the democratic legitimacy of original legislation that emanates from democratically elected legislatures. Participation in such a decision-making process thus acts as a 'surrogate political process'[2] and enhances the legitimacy of administrative action 'by emphasising openness, consultation and reasoned decision-making'.[3] As with the right to a hearing in individual cases, public participation in relation to administrative action that has a general impact thus advances a number of important objects. As Cora Hoexter puts it:

> Public participation encourages people to exercise their rights and perform their duties as citizens; it educates citizens and counters their sense of 'powerlessness'; it leads to better and more informed decisions; and it helps ensure that administrators remain or become politically accountable to those affected by their decisions.[4]

(c) The flexible nature of procedural fairness

The content of procedural fairness varies widely depending on the contexts in which it is applied. This was true under the common law and continues to be the case under the Final Constitution.[5] As Ngcobo J has noted, '[t]he very essence of the requirement to act fairly is its flexibility and practicability'.[6]

This flexibility is reflected in s 3(2)(a) of PAJA. Section 3(2) provides that 'a fair administrative procedure depends on the circumstances of each case'. This

[1] See Doctors for Life (supra) at paras 115–116. See also New Clicks (supra) at paras 156–157 (Chaskalson CJ).

[2] L Baxter 'Rulemaking and Policy Formulation in South African Administrative Law Reform' in H Corder (ed) Administrative Law Reform (1993) 176, 179.

[3] Currie The PAJA (supra) at 118.

[4] Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 78. See also Hoexter's discussion of public participation at 75–84; C Mass 'Section 4 of the AJA and procedural fairness in administrative action affecting the public: A comparative perspective' in C Lange and J Wessels (eds) The Right to Know: South Africa's Promotion of Administrative Justice and Access to Information Acts (2004) 63 at 63–64; Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 108–9; and Currie The PAJA (supra) at 118.

[5] See, eg, Premier, Mpumalanga (supra) at para 39; SARFU (supra) at para 216; Ed-U-College (supra) at para 19; Zondi (supra) at paras 113–114; Janse van Rensburg (supra) at para 24; Kyalami Ridge (supra) at para 101; New Clicks (supra) at paras 145 and 152.

[6] Masetlha (supra) at para 190.

section has been described as '[codifying] the idea, at the heart of the right at common law, that procedural fairness is situation-specific and what is fair depends on the circumstances'.[1]

Flexibility is perhaps more important in the context of procedural fairness than in any other area of administrative law. There is a need to balance the interests of the individual or group affected by the administrative action against the public interest in efficient administration. In the Constitutional Court's first decision regarding procedural fairness, Premier, Mpumalanga, O'Regan J put the matter as follows:

> In determining what constitutes procedural fairness in a given case, a court should be slow to impose obligations upon government which will inhibit its ability to make and implement policy effectively (a principle well recognized in our common law and that of other countries). As a young democracy facing immense challenges of transformation, we cannot deny the importance of the need to ensure the ability of the Executive to act efficiently and promptly. On the other hand, to permit the implementation of retroactive decisions without, for example, affording parties an effective opportunity to make representations would flout another important principle, that of procedural fairness.[2]

In another important decision reiterating the circumstances-based basis of the right to procedural fairness, the Constitutional Court in Kyalami Ridge wrote:

> Where, as in the present case, conflicting interests have to be reconciled and choices made, proportionality, which is inherent in the Bill of Rights, is relevant to determining what fairness requires. Ultimately, procedural fairness depends in each case upon the balancing of various relevant factors including the nature of the decision, the 'rights' affected by it, the circumstances in which it is made, and the consequences resulting from it.[3]

We now turn to examine the scope and the content of the right to procedural fairness. These concerns are primarily governed by PAJA and engage the right to procedural fairness in two contexts: that of administrative action affecting any person (ie individual administrative action) and that of administrative action affecting the public (ie general administrative action).

(d) The scope of procedurally fair administrative action affecting any person

The right to procedural fairness was constitutionally entrenched in IC s 24*(b). IC s 24(b)* provided that 'every person shall have the right to procedurally fair administrative action where any of his or her rights or legitimate expectations is affected

[1] See POPCRU (supra) at para 70.

[2] Premier, Mpumalanga (supra) at para 41. See also Walele (supra) at para 123 (O'Regan J, dissenting)('That administrative action be procedurally fair is therefore an important constitutional right which we should seek to protect. Yet, the Constitution does not require a knee-jerk response of affording a right to a hearing in every case regardless of the context or the circumstances of those affected. These are countervailing considerations of equal importance to the interpretation of both section 33 of the Constitution and section 3(1) of PAJA.') or threatened'. FC s 33(1) removed the in-built qualification (as it did with the other elements of the right) and simply provided that 'everyone' is entitled to administrative action that is procedurally fair.

[3] Kyalami Ridge (supra) at para 101.

Whereas FC s 33(1) suggests that all administrative action must be procedurally fair, s 3(1) of PAJA seems to reintroduce a similar threshold to that contained in IC s 24*(b)*. Section 3(1) of PAJA provides that '[a]dministrative action which materially and adversely affects the rights or legitimate expectations of any person must be procedurally fair'.

(i) The difficulty in reconciling s 3(1) with the definition of 'administrative action' in s 1 of PAJA

A significant interpretive difficulty that arises in relation to the scope of procedural fairness under PAJA is that s 3(1) applies to 'administrative action' which 'materially and adversely affects the rights or legitimate expectations of any person',[1] while 'administrative action' is defined in s 1 as a decision which adversely affects any person's rights. On the face of it, procedural fairness therefore appears, in some respects, to apply to a narrower category of action than 'administrative action' (the inclusion of the word 'materially') and, in other respects, to a wider category of action (that which affects legitimate expectations and not only rights).[2] The latter conclusion would, however, be logically inconsistent (at least under usual principles of statutory interpretation). Action must first constitute 'administrative action' under PAJA before one can consider whether it is subject to the requirement of procedural fairness. The ambit of s 3(1) cannot be wider than the ambit of 'administrative action' in s 1.[3]

The relationship between the definition of 'administrative action' in s 1 and the wording of s 3(1) comes into sharp focus when one considers the outcome in Grey's Marine. In Grey's Marine, the Supreme Court of Appeal held that the decision to lease quayside property in Hout Bay harbour amounted to administrative action because it had direct and immediate consequences for the lessee. As discussed above, the SCA thus effectively disregarded the word 'adversely' in the definition of 'administrative action'.[4] One of the reasons that the SCA offered for giving this non-literal meaning to the phrase 'adversely affect the rights of any person' in s 1 was because a literal construction would be inconsistent with s 3(1), 'which envisages that administrative action might or might not affect rights adversely'.[5] Despite holding that the decision amounted to 'administrative action'

[1] Emphasis added.

[2] Some commentators have used the differing directions in which these two conclusions pull to attempt to construct an interpretation of the PAJA consistent with their interpretation of FC s 33. We have referred to such interpretations above as strained and prefer here to work directly and closely with the doctrine of separation of powers.

[3] But see Walele (supra) at paras 37 and 126.

[4] See § 63.3*(c)*(vi) supra.

[5] Grey's Marine (supra) at para 23.

for purposes of PAJA, the SCA, however, held that s 3(1) was not triggered and the adjacent landowners were thus not entitled to a hearing prior to the decision. Nugent JA remarked that, while 'rights' may have a wide connotation in this context, and may include 'prospective rights that have yet to accrue', 'it is difficult to see how the term could encompass interests that fall short of that'.[1] Nugent JA then appeared to emphasise the word 'adversely' in s 3(1) — the same word that the court effectively disregarded in the definition of 'administrative action'. He wrote: 'It has not been shown that any rights — or even prospective rights — of any of the appellants (or of any other person) have been adversely affected by the Minister's decision.'[2]

A number of academics have attempted to reconcile the 'logical puzzle'[3] presented by the inclusion of 'legitimate expectations' (a wider concept than rights) in s 3(1), with the fact that PAJA only applies to action that adversely affects 'rights'.[4] One such approach to solving this puzzle is to emphasise the word 'materially' in s 3(1). The inclusion of this word indicates that a certain class of administrative action (as defined) will not require the application of procedural fairness. That is, those actions which affect rights but do not affect one's rights or legitimate expectations in a material manner do not trigger procedural fairness. In such a situation the rules of procedural fairness will apply if the action materially affects the relevant person's legitimate expectations.[5] According to this approach, legitimate expectations only matter when rights are adversely affected in a non-material manner. While logically consistent, this view appears to unduly strain the words of PAJA and would give legitimate expectations very little scope in which to operate.

A second approach is to regard a 'legitimate expectation' that is both materially and adversely affected, as contemplated in s 3(1), as a species of 'right' for purposes of the definition of 'administrative action'.[6] This approach is unattractive. It collapses the distinction between rights and legitimate expectations and is inconsistent with the fact that PAJA itself uses these two distinct terms. PAJA's use of these two terms of art suggests that they have different meanings. Indeed, they are placed alongside one another in s 3(1).

[1] In this regard, as is apparent from the footnotes in Grey's Marine, Nugent JA essentially followed the approach indicated by the Constitutional Court in Kyalami Ridge. Kyalami Ridge (supra) at para 100.

[2] Grey's Marine (supra) at para 30 ((Emphasis added). In the same paragraph, Nugent JA continued: 'None of the appellants has any right to use the property that has been let, or to restrict its use by others, nor has any case been made out that their rights of occupation of their premises have been unlawfully compromised'.)

[3] Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 93.

[4] See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 358 (The use of the phrase 'legitimate expectations' in s 3(1) 'seems entirely illogical'.)

[5] See Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 93–94. The authors accept that this will only apply to a narrow class of action.

[6] See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 359. Hoexter, however, notes that this approach 'fails to appeal to logic since . . . the whole point of legitimate expectations is that they are not rights'.

Jacques De Ville offers another interpretation. He contends that the phrase 'materially and adversely affects rights and legitimate expectations' does not qualify the scope of application of procedural fairness but rather identifies factors that affect the content of procedural fairness.[1] While this gloss on the text is creative, it seems to us to strain the language of s 3(1) of PAJA, which appears to use the phrase 'materially and adversely affects the rights or legitimate expectations' as a threshold requirement.[2] Moreover, to argue that s 3(1) merely sets out factors for the content of a duty to act fairly would potentially collapse the distinction between scope and content. This distinction — although never absolute — has been a useful and accepted concept in procedural fairness jurisprudence.

The approach to which we find ourselves most attracted requires that the phrase 'materially and adversely affects rights' in s 3(1) refers only to decisions which deprive one of rights and not those which determine one's rights. We point out that this approach differs from our preferred position under the definition of 'administrative action'. There, one will recall, we argued that the determination theory should apply.[3] If this approach is adopted, 'administrative action' could include a broad category of action which determines one's rights and procedural fairness could apply to a narrower class of action which deprives one of one's rights or legitimate expectations. Although this approach may also seem somewhat artificial, it does satisfy constitutional purpose and attaches real meaning to the term 'legitimate expectations'. In addition, this approach is supported by the fact that, unlike the definition of administrative action, s 3(1) couples the term 'rights' with 'legitimate expectations'. If rights meant the determination of one's rights in s 3(1), there would seem little need to include the phrase 'legitimate expectations'.[4]

In the recent decision of Walele, the Constitutional Court avoided the difficulty of attempting to reconcile PAJA's definition of 'administrative action' and s 3(1) by, in effect, holding that the definition of 'administrative action' in s 1 does not apply to the use of that term in s 3(1)(or the defined term is 'supplemented' for the purposes of s 3(1)). Jafta AJ, writing on behalf of a bare majority of the Court (which was divided six judges to five), pointed out that applying the definition of 'administrative action' to s 3 would lead to 'incongruity or absurdity' and, as a [1] See De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 222–223. See § 63.5*(e)* infra.

[2] See Walele (supra) at para 28 ('The express precondition for the requirement to act fairly, in terms of [s 3], is that the administrative action must materially and adversely affect the rights or legitimate expectations of the aggrieved person' (emphasis added).)

[3] See § 63.3*(c)*(vi) supra.

[4] See Mureinik 'Reconsidering Review' (supra) at 44–45 (Expresses the view that similar wording in drafts of the Bill of Rights proposed by the African National Congress and the government amounted to the adoption of the liberal version of the deprivation theory, ie, the deprivation theory expanded by the doctrine of legitimate expectations.) The down-side of this approach is that the scope of procedural fairness is limited in a manner which may not fully give effect to the constitutional right to procedural fairness, unless the broad approach to legitimate expectations discussed below is applied (ie, a legitimate expectation arises whenever the duty to act fairly requires a hearing.)

result, 'administrative action' in s 3 'cannot mean what was intended in the definition section'.[1] For purposes of s 3, s 1 was essentially read out of the statute. The majority, therefore, accepted that s 3 confers procedural fairness on persons whose legitimate expectations are materially and adversely affected.

O'Regan ADCJ, writing on behalf of the five-judge minority in Walele, dealt with what she described as 'the enigma' of the relationship between the definition of 'administrative action' and s 3(1), by adopting the position that, in determining the scope of procedural fairness, the specific provision of s 3(1) should take precedence over the general definition of 'administrative action' (particularly in light of the fact that s 3(1) is aimed at giving effect to the constitutional right to procedurally fair administrative action).[2] In this approach, s 1 is not read out of the statute but is essentially altered with respect to s 3 to fit the ends of the latter section. She reasoned that:

> The apparent contradiction between the two provisions should be resolved by giving effect to the clear language of section 3(1) which expressly states that administrative action which affects legitimate expectations must be procedurally fair. Thus, the narrow definition in section 1 must be read to be impliedly supplemented for the purposes of section 3(1) by the express language of section 3(1). If this were not to be done, the clear legislative intent to afford a remedy to those whose legitimate expectations are materially and adversely affected would be thwarted.[3]

While we are taking on a full set of eleven judges here (!), it seems to us that the approaches of both (!) the majority and the minority in Walele do not satisfactorily explain the relationship between the definition of 'administrative action' and s 3(1). The interpretation of s 3 of PAJA cannot be cabined within the specific constitutional sub-right of procedural fairness, but should rather be understood within the context of FC s 33 as a whole. It cannot, we submit, be the case that the right to procedural fairness applies to a wider category of administrative action than other aspects of the right to just administrative action reflected in PAJA. While it is sometimes argued that procedural fairness applies to all conduct that is susceptible to administrative law and to administrative law review, it is generally understood that it applies to a narrower range. It has never been suggested that the right to procedural fairness extends to a wider range of conduct than, for example, the right to lawful administrative action. In our view, the approach of the Constitutional Court in Walele is thus best understood as a decision in which the Court pragmatically engages with the proper scope of the application of s 3(1), while leaving the question of the constitutionality of the definition of 'administrative action' for another day.[4] Against this necessarily

[1] Walele (supra) at para 37.
[2] Ibid at para 126.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Walele also expressly leaves open the question as to the constitutionality of s 3(1). Walele (supra) at paras 30 and 123.

less-than-clear backdrop, we now consider the meaning of the crucial phrase in s 3(1): 'materially and adversely affects the rights or legitimate expectations of any person'.

(ii) The meaning of 'materially and adversely affects the rights or legitimate expectations of any person'

For the reasons discussed above, it may well be that the phrase 'adversely affects' in s 3(1) should be read as referring only to decisions that deprive one of rights or legitimate expectations and not also those that determine rights. We note, however, that the position is by no means clear. Some support for the determination theory can be found in the fact that a number of decisions of our courts have assumed, though not decided, that the phrases 'where any of his or her rights … is affected or threatened' in IC s 24*(b)* (and FC item 23(2)(b) of Schedule 6) and 'adversely affects the rights … of any person' in s 3(1) of PAJA (both of which delineate the scope of procedural fairness) cover not only existing rights but also prospective rights.[1]

In addition, and again for the reasons discussed above, we submit that the term 'rights' should be interpreted broadly as including all forms of legal rights as well as situations where the State has unilaterally incurred liability without establishing a contractual nexus between the individual and the State.[2]

Nevertheless, 'rights' cannot be equated with interests.[3] Such an interpretation would be inconsistent with the fact that the concepts of rights and interests are distinct in administrative law and the fact that, during the process of drafting PAJA, the Parliamentary Portfolio Committee specifically amended the version of PAJA prepared by the Law Commission which provided that administrative action must be procedurally fair where it 'adversely affects rights, interests or legitimate expectations'.

The next important question that arises is: what is meant by the phrase 'legitimate expectations' in s 3(1) of PAJA? The doctrine of legitimate expectations was accepted by the Appellate Division in Administrator, Transvaal & Others v Traub & Others.[4] This doctrine extended the scope of the right to a hearing

[1] See Kyalami Ridge (supra) at para 100 ('It may well be that persons with prospective rights such as applicants for licences or pensions, are entitled to protection …'); Grey's Marine (supra) at para 30: ('Rights' in s 3(1) of PAJA 'may include prospective rights that have yet to accrue'). The determination theory also enjoys academic support. See, eg, De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 224–227). But see Walele (supra) at 32 (The reference to a 'pre-existing right' appears in Jafta AJ's judgment for the majority of the Constitutional Court — it thereby intimates a preference for the deprivation theory.)

[2] See § 63.3*(c)*(vi) supra.

[3] See Kyalami Ridge (supra) at para 100; Grey's Marine (supra) paras 30–31. These judgments indicate skepticism in this regard. The majority judgment of Jafta AJ in Walele fairly emphatically indicates that interests falling short of rights or legitimate expectations do not trigger the right to a hearing in s 3 of PAJA. Walele (supra) at para 44. See also Walele (supra) at para 127 (O'Regan J).

[4] 1989 (4) SA 731 (A).

beyond circumstances in which a person's property, liberty or existing rights were adversely affected, to those where he or she has a legitimate expectation which entitles him or her to a hearing. The traditional approach to legitimate expectations is that they arise 'either from an express promise given on behalf of the public authority or from the existence of a regular practice which the claimant can reasonably expect to continue'.[1] On this approach, a legitimate expectation flows from an express promise or undertaking or from a regular and long-standing past practice.[2] This traditional approach to the ambit of legitimate expectations has been applied by the Supreme Court of Appeal in a number of decisions. For example, in South African Veterinary Council & Another v Syzmanski, Cameron JA stated that the requirements for a legitimate expectation included that it was based on a clear, unambiguous representation that was induced by the decision-maker.[3]

It is important to note that a legitimate expectation can be either substantive or procedural. That is, as O'Regan J states in Premier, Mpumalanga, '[e]xpectations can arise either where a person has an expectation of a substantive benefit, or an expectation of a procedural kind'.[4] For example, a legitimate expectation will arise not only where an official promises that a particular procedure will be followed but also where an official promises that a particular substantive benefit will be given.

The problem with the traditional approach to the ambit of legitimate expectations in the context of s 3(1) of PAJA is that it fails to afford a right to a hearing where a person's rights are not materially affected by the decision and where there

[1] Council of Civil Service Unions v Minister for the Civil Service [1984] 3 All ER 935, 944 (HL).

[2] It will not always be reasonable to expect that a past practice will continue (in which case, that practice will not give rise to a legitimate expectation). See Ed-U-College, in which the Court examined all circumstances of the case, in holding that procedural fairness does not require the right to a hearing for all affected persons simply because a decision is taken which has the effect of reducing annual subsidies to schools. During the course of her judgment, O' Regan J wrote: 'Subsidies are paid annually and, given the precarious financial circumstances of education departments at present, schools and parents cannot assume, in the absence of any undertaking or promise by an education department, that subsidies will always continue to be paid at the rate previously established or that they should be afforded a hearing should subsidies have to be reduced because the legislature has reduced the amount allocated for distribution.' Ed-U-College (supra) at para 22. A single previous occurrence obviously does not give rise to a regular practice. See Walele (supra) at paras 41 and 135.

[3] 2003 (4) SA 42 (SCA), 2003 (4) BCLR 378 (SCA) para 19, quoting Heher J in National Director of Public Prosecutions v Phillips & Others 2002 (4) SA 60 (W), 2002 (1) BCLR 41 (W) at para 28, with approval. The requirements for a legitimate expectation set out in these cases are: (a) a representation that is 'clear, unambiguous and devoid of relevant qualification'; (b) the expectation is reasonable; (c) the representation was induced by the decision-maker; and (d) the representation was one which it was competent and lawful for the decision-maker to make. See also Grey's Marine (supra) at para 33 ('Counsel for the appellants could point us to no conduct on the part of the State or any of its officials to suggest that the appellants were brought under the impression that that state of affairs would continue indefinitely or even that they would be invited to comment before its use was changed.' (Emphasis added)).

[4] See Premier, Mpumalanga (supra) at para 36. See, generally, Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 381–382.

is no expectation based on prior conduct of the administrator — and yet the facts cry out for a hearing.[1] As Wandisile Wakwa-Mandlana and Clive Plasket observe in relation to the approach of the SCA in Grey's Marine:

> [It] highlights the problem created by the narrow and formalistic approach to procedural fairness that was taken by the drafters of the PAJA: the rights and legitimate expectations approach leaves a big hole in the net of procedural fairness in the form of cases that may not involve rights but interests of sufficient importance to warrant procedural protection. This rigidity may well undo the important developments that have taken place prior to the enactment of the PAJA in entrenching the fairness doctrine in South African administrative law.[2]

Despite the apparent endorsement of the traditional approach in these decisions of the SCA, and the views of certain authors that legitimate expectations are confined to these situations,[3] some recent authority suggests that current understandings of 'legitimate expectations' are somewhat broader.

In the decision of the Constitutional Court in Premier, Mpumalanga O'Regan J restated Corbett CJ's decision in Traub in the following terms:[4]

> Corbett CJ also recognized that a legitimate expectation might arise in at least two circumstances: first, where a person enjoys an expectation of a privilege or a benefit of which it would not be fair to deprive him or her without a fair hearing; and, secondly, in circumstances where the previous conduct of an official has given rise to an expectation that a particular procedure will be followed before a decision is made.

This statement suggests that the concept of legitimate expectations may be usefully thought of in three categories: express promise, past practice, and fairness. The first two fit into the category of the previous conduct of an official. The third category is a residual one, fairness, and is in fact the first category mentioned by O'Regan J in Premier, Mpumalanga. This approach may, depending on one's reading of the judgment, also be reflected in the following dictum of the Constitutional Court in SARFU 1:

> The question whether an expectation is legitimate and will give rise to the right to a hearing in any particular case depends on whether in the context of that case, procedural fairness requires a decision-making authority to afford a hearing to a particular individual before

[1] See Traub (supra) at 761. See also CF Forsyth 'Audi alteram partem since Administrator, Transvaal v Traub' in The Quest for Justice: Essays in Honour of Michael McGregor Corbett E Kahn (ed) (1995) 196('Audi'). Forsyth does not regard this as a failing of the legitimate expectation doctrine, but rather as an issue to be accommodated under the general 'duty to act fairly'.

[2] W Wakwa-Mandlana and C Plasket 'Administrative Law' 2005 Annual Survey of South African Law 74, 119.

[3] See, eg, Forsyth 'Audi' (supra) at 196, 204–205 (This is not because Forsyth is of the view that a right to a hearing should not arise in other circumstances, but because such a right should rather flow from the broad 'duty to act fairly' — 'to those situations where no existing rights were affected, where there was no legitimate expectation of anything at all, yet the facts cried out for a legal remedy'). See also CF Forsyth 'A Harbinger of a Renaissance in Administrative Law' (1990) 107 SALJ 387, 398–399.

[4] Premier, Mpumalanga (supra) at para 35 (Emphasis added).

> taking the decision. To ask the question whether there is a legitimate expectation to be heard in any particular case is, in effect, to ask whether the duty to act fairly requires a hearing in that case. The question whether a 'legitimate expectation of a hearing' exists is therefore more than a factual question. It is not whether an expectation exists in the mind of a litigant but whether, viewed objectively, such expectation is, in a legal sense, legitimate; that is, whether the duty to act fairly would require a hearing in those circumstances.[1]

In light of this jurisprudence from the Constitutional Court, Jacques De Ville argues persuasively that a legitimate expectation 'need not be coupled with previous governmental conduct' and 'is completely context-dependent'.[2] In fact, in Nortje en 'n Ander v Minister van Korrektiewe Dienste en Andere[3] the Supreme Court of Appeal held that the right to a hearing can arise where a decision is significantly prejudicial to a person (in that case, a decision to transfer a prisoner to a maximum security prison).[4] A broad approach to the scope of legitimate expectations is also evidenced in the decision of the SCA in Bullock, which held that a legitimate expectation arose from the fact that the yacht club had been the lessee of the foreshore (over which the servitude was granted) for 30 years in terms of successive leases, it had made substantial improvements on the property during that period and, 'perhaps most importantly', negotiations with the yacht club for a new lease on the property were far advanced.[5]

The recent decision of the Constitutional Court in Walele is, to date, the most comprehensive judicial consideration of the meaning of 'legitimate expectations' for purposes of s 3 of PAJA. Walele involved a challenge to the City of Cape

[1] SARFU 1 (supra) at para 216. Nevertheless, it is conceivable that SARFU 1 is consistent with the traditional approach to legitimate expectations (requiring a promise or past practice), with the quoted paragraph only relating to the additional requirement that the expectation must be 'legitimate'. See SARFU 1 (supra) at paras 212, 215 and 216. See also Walele (supra) at para 38 (Majority appears to adopt this reading of the quoted paragraph in SARFU 1.)

[2] De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 230–232. Other authors also support a broader approach to legitimate expectations. See, eg, J Hlophe 'Legitimate expectations and Natural Justice: English, Australian and South African law' (1987) 104 SALJ 165, 177–179; J Hlophe 'The Doctrine of Legitimate Expectations and the Appellate Division' (1990) 107 SALJ 197 at 200–201; J Grogan 'Audi after Traub' (1994) 111 SALJ 80, 89–90; PP Craig 'Legitimate expectations: a conceptual analysis' (1992) 108 LQR 79, 82–84. As De Ville points out, some support for a broad approach to legitimate expectations can be found in the case law. See Foulds v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 1996 (3) SA 137, 149 (W) ('Foulds'); Minister of Justice, Transkei v Gemi 1994 (3) SA 28 (TkA).

[3] 2001 (3) SA 472 (SCA).

[4] Nortje (supra) at para 14 ('The audi rule is applicable where an administrative decision can prejudice a person to such an extent that, in accordance with that person's legitimate expectation, the decision ought not to be taken unless he is heard' (translation from the headnote, quoted in Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 379). For a criticism of this judgment, see DM Pretorius 'Die Leerstuk van Regverdigbare Verwagtinge en die Reg op n Billike Aanhoring: Nortje v Minister van Korrektiewe Dienste 2001 3 SA 472 (HHA)' (2002) 64 THRHR 436.

[5] Bullock (supra) at para 22. The SCA judgment in Grey's Marine could, however, be read as clawing back from Bullock, in stating that the Bullock Court might have had in mind a legitimate expectation 'grounded in past practice'. Grey's Marine (supra) at para 31.

Town's approval of the building plans of a four-storey block of flats on a neighbouring property. The construction of the flats was consistent with the zoning scheme in respect of the relevant area. One of the bases for challenging the approval was that the applicant had not been afforded an opportunity to make representations in respect of the building plans application. The applicant asserted that he enjoyed the right to procedural fairness under s 3 of PAJA because, as the owner of the neighbouring property, his property would be devalued and his right to use and enjoyment of his property would be undermined because the flats would cast a shadow over his property. Although the Constitutional Court was split (six to five) on the outcome on other grounds, the Court unanimously agreed that the applicant did not enjoy a right to a hearing in this case. Both the majority and the minority held that the granting of approval did not affect the applicant's rights, that the applicant had not proved that his property would be devalued as a result of the erection of the flats and that the applicant could not rely on a legitimate expectation.[1] While we will not quibble with the outcome of the case, the attitude of the majority and the minority in Walele to the possible scope of legitimate expectations is of particular interest for present purposes.

The attitude of the majority appears to be that legitimate expectations are confined to the established categories of promises and past practices. For example, at one point in his judgment Jafta AJ states that '[a] legitimate expectation may arise either from a promise made by a decision-maker or from a regular practice which is reasonably expected to continue.'[2] At another point, he rejects the idea that an impact on interests that falls short of rights or legitimate expectations can found a right to a hearing.[3]

In her minority judgment, O'Regan ADCJ, while leaving open the question as to whether legitimate expectations extend beyond their traditional scope, suggests that there may well be room for such expansion under PAJA:[4]

[1] Walele (supra) at paras 31, 33, 42, 132. It is interesting to note that O'Regan ADCJ found that the applicant's rights had not been materially and adversely affected despite the fact that his use and enjoyment of his property may have been affected by the approval. In explaining this finding, she stated that '[o]ur use and enjoyment of property is affected by many things' and to hold that s 3(1) of PAJA applies in respect of every administrative action that impacts on use and enjoyment of property 'may well cause great disruption to the administration of urban spaces.' Ibid at para 132. O'Regan ADCJ thus appears to take policy considerations into account in assessing whether rights are materially and adversely affected for purposes of s 3(1), and may well advocate an understanding of 'material' in s 3(1) that goes beyond non-trivial.

[2] Ibid at paras 35, 37, 38 and 42 ('Since the concept of legitimate expectation referred to in section 3 of PAJA is not defined, it must be given its ordinary meaning as understood over a period of time by the courts in this country'. Jafta AJ goes on to assess whether a past practice gave rise to a legitimate expectation in this case and states that '[a] legitimate expectation may arise from an express promise or a regular practice. It cannot arise from ownership of a neighbouring property.').

[3] Walele (supra) at paras 44 and 45.

[4] Walele (supra) at para 133.

> From time to time, our courts have taken the view that a legitimate expectation may also arise simply because the administrative action in question constitutes a dramatic impairment of interests less than rights. It may well be that the concept of legitimate expectation in PAJA is not limited to the narrow requirement of a promise or a practice as set out in Lord Fraser's reasoning. Indeed, a broader understanding of 'legitimate expectation' may be appropriate given the language of section 33 of the Constitution that '[e]veryone has the right to administrative action that is … procedurally fair.'

It may be argued that an expansive approach to legitimate expectations, as outlined above, deviates from the concept of legitimate expectations understood in its pure form, and that an expansive approach to the ambit of procedural fairness should more appropriately be accommodated under a broad duty to act fairly (assuming that such duty is accepted in our law).[1] Nevertheless, it seems to us that the extension of legitimate expectations beyond the traditional categories of promises and past practices is useful in the context of s 3(1) of PAJA. It introduces sufficient flexibility so as to remove the constitutional difficulties with this section.[2] In addition, it does so without unduly straining the language of the provision. Where one, having regard to all the circumstances, has a reasonable expectation of a hearing, it can be said that one has a 'legitimate expectation' of that hearing.[3] In other words, an extended concept of legitimate expectations can be used to interpret s 3(1) in a manner that gives effect to the constitutional right to procedurally fair administrative action (particularly in circumstances in which s 3(1) adopts the deprivation theory, which we suggest it does).

[1] See W Wakwa-Mandlana and C Plasket 'Administrative Law' 2004 Annual Survey of South African Law 74 at 92–93. See also Forsyth 'Audi' (supra) at 196 and 205; DM Pretorius 'Ten years after Traub: The doctrine of legitimate expectation in South African administrative law' (2000) 117 SALJ 520, 523–525 ('Ten years after Traub'). See Board of Education v Rice [1911] AC 179, 182 (The duty to act fairly is 'a duty lying upon everyone who decides anything'.) A case that is often cited as supporting the application of the duty to act fairly in our law is Van Huyssteen NO v Minster of Environmental Affairs and Tourism 1996 (1) SA 283 (C), 1995 (9) BCLR 1191 (C). The decision held that procedural fairness entitles affected persons to 'the principles and procedures' which in the circumstances are 'right and just and fair' (quoting Lord Morris of Borth-Y-Gest with approval). See also Mpande Foodliner CC v Commissioner for the South African Revenue Service & Others 2000 (4) SA 1048, 1067 (T).)

[2] See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 380 ('The trend towards a wider understanding of legitimate expectations is attractive because it would allow the doctrine to cover mere interests as well as expectations in the usual sense, thus offering a way around the wording of s 3 of PAJA.')

[3] We note that the expectation in this expanded context would appear to be limited to a procedural expectation (ie a reasonable expectation of a hearing). A reasonable expectation of a substantive benefit arising other than from a promise or past practice would not suffice for purposes of triggering the right to a hearing (unless the substantive expectation gave rise to an accompanying reasonable expectation of a hearing). See Council of Civil Service Unions v Minister for the Civil Service [1984] 3 All ER 935 (HL)(Lord Diplock stated that the term 'legitimate' should be preferred to 'reasonable': 'in order thereby to indicate that it has consequences to which effect will be given in public law, whereas as expectation or hope that some benefit or advantage would continue to be enjoyed, although it might well be entertained by a "reasonable" man, would not necessarily have such consequences.') We discuss the difference between procedural and substantive expectations above.

Before leaving the topic of the scope of the right of procedural fairness, we must note that there may well be (at least!) one other way of interpreting PAJA in order to come to the same conclusion. One could argue, with some conviction, that s 3(1) should be limited to decisions that affect rights and legitimate expectations in the traditional sense (ie based on past practice or promise); that s 3(1) is not exhaustive of the scope of administrative action but rather requires administrative action that 'materially and adversely affects the rights or legitimate expectations of any person' to be procedurally fair in the sense contemplated in the remainder of s 3; that all administrative action must be procedurally fair;[1] and that a failure to comply with procedural fairness in respect of any administrative action is reviewable under s 6(2)(c) of PAJA.[2] According to this approach, the duty to act fairly flows from s 6(2)(c) rather than from an expanded concept of legitimate expectations. While initially attractive, we would be wary of adopting such a position. A free-floating duty to act fairly sourced in s 6(2)(c) runs contrary to the concept that the content of ss 3 and 4 provides the material basis for the courts' review powers. Moreover, the language of s 3(1) suggests that it determines the scope for procedural fairness. Nonetheless, even if this approach is untidy, and in our view overly complex, it is at least conceptually possible that administrative enforcement of procedural fairness in FC s 33 (the business of ss 3 and 4 of PAJA) is based on the doctrine of legitimate expectations and judicial enforcement of procedural fairness in FC s 33 (the business of s 6 of PAJA) is based on the duty to act fairly.

(e) The content of procedurally fair administrative action affecting any person

As discussed above, the content of procedural fairness varies from case to case. Indeed, the most significant characteristic of procedural fairness is its flexibility. In the words of Lord Mustill, '[t]he principles of fairness are not to be applied by rote identically in every situation. What fairness demands is dependent on the context of the decision, and this is to be taken into account in all its aspects'.[3] This flexibility is particularly important if one accepts (as we do) that the ambit of administrative action to which procedural fairness applies is quite broad. Nevertheless, flexibility cannot alone determine the content of procedural fairness: were flexibility to determine the extension of procedural fairness it would inevitably lead to uncertainty. Administrative decision-makers and those affected by administrative decisions would not know what procedural fairness demands. There is thus a need for our courts to develop different standards of procedural fairness that apply to various different types of administrative action. This exercise, to some extent, requires a shift in focus from the scope of administrative action to the content of administrative justice in the particular circumstances of the case.

[1] This approach has the attraction of being consistent with the formulation of the right to procedurally fair administrative action in FC s 33(1).

[2] For more on this approach, see De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 222–223 and 234. See also Wakwa-Mandlana and Plasket (supra) at 93 (Raise the alternative possibility of reviewing procedural unfairness in respect of decisions with an adverse impact on interests under the catch-all in s 6(2)(i) of PAJA.)

[3] See Doody v Secretary of State for the Home Department and Other Appeals [1994] 1 AC 531 (HL) at 560, quoted with approval by Chaskalson CJ in New Clicks (supra) at para 152; Chairman, Board on Tariffs and Trade & Others v Brenco Inc & Others 2001 (4) SA 511 (SCA) ('Brenco') at para 13.

The content of procedural fairness in relation to administrative action affecting a person (ie individual administrative action) is governed by s 3 of PAJA. This section divides the content of procedural fairness into mandatory and directory elements.

Section 3(2)(b) lists those elements that fall into the former category: 'the core, minimum content of the right [to procedural fairness] when fairness requires a hearing to be given'.[1] As was the case under the common law, the focus of the mandatory elements is that affected persons must be given adequate notice and a reasonable opportunity to make representations prior to a decision being taken.[2] Mirroring the language of the Constitutional Court in Premier, Mpumalanga, paragraphs (i) and (ii) of s 3(2)(b) stipulate that an administrator 'must' give a person whose rights or legitimate expectations are materially and adversely affected: adequate notice of the nature and the purpose of the proposed administrative action; and a reasonable opportunity to make representations.[3] The use of the words 'adequate' and 'reasonable' in these provisions leave much room for flexibility as to the precise content of the notice and the opportunity given to make representations.

It is important to note that the notice provided to persons affected by the decision must include the reasons (or purpose) for the proposed administrative action, and must be 'adequate' both as to the time provided to make representations[4] and the information that is provided to affected persons.[5] The rule of thumb is that these persons must be provided with sufficient information in order for them to know the case they have to meet and so that their opportunity to make representations is a meaningful one.[6] Although the content of procedural fairness varies from case to case, this rule of thumb generally means that an affected person must be notified of the gist or substance of the case against

[1] POPCRU (supra) at para 70.

[2] As to the position under the common law, see Heatherdale Farms (Pty) Ltd v Deputy Minister of Agriculture & Another 1980 (3) SA 476, 486 (T)('Heatherdale Farms'). See also Russel v Duke of Norfolk [1949] 1 All ER 109, 117.

[3] Premier, Mpumalanga (supra) at para 41 (O'Regan J)('Citizens are entitled to expect that government policy will not be altered in ways which would threaten or harm their rights or legitimate expectations without their being given reasonable notice of the proposed change or an opportunity to make representations to the decision-maker'.)

[4] See Du Preez (supra); POPCRU (supra) at para 73.

[5] See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 332–337.

[6] See Heatherdale Farms (supra) at 486; Earthlife Africa (Cape Town) v Director-General: Department of Environmental Affairs and Tourism & Another 2005 (3) SA 156 (C)('Earthlife') at para 52.

him or her,[1] any particular information that is adverse to him or her[2] and any significant policy considerations that apply to the proposed decision.[3] The remainder of the mandatory elements of procedural fairness set out in s 3(2)(b) are: a clear statement of the administrative action;[4] adequate notice of any right of review or internal appeal and the right to request reasons.[5]

Section 3(3) of PAJA sets out directory elements of procedural fairness. This subsection provides that the administrator 'may, in his or her or its discretion'[6] give a person whose rights or legitimate expectations are materially and adversely affected, the opportunity to: (1) obtain assistance and, in serious or complex cases, legal representation; (2) present and dispute information and arguments; and (3) appear in person. The placement of this provision is curious in that it suggests that elements such as legal representation and an oral hearing are purely discretionary and that a failure to allow for these elements cannot be challenged on the basis of procedural fairness.[7] Such an outcome should be avoided. It would, in our view, result in PAJA failing to give effect to the constitutional right to procedural fairness. One way to avoid this outcome is to adopt the approach that an administrator is obliged to consider granting these elements in a particular case,[8] and that the administrator's decision to refuse to provide for one or more of these elements is itself 'administrative action' and is thus

[1] Du Preez (supra) at 232; Brenco (supra) at para 42; and Earthlife (supra) at para 53. See also New Clicks (supra) at para 153 (Chaskalson CJ)(In the case of individual administrative action '[a]n individual needs to know the concerns of the administrator and to be given an opportunity of answering those concerns.')

[2] Du Bois v Stompdrift Kamanassie Besproeiingsraad 2002 (5) SA 186, 188–189 (C).

[3] See Tseleng v Chairman, Unemployment Insurance Board 1995 (3) SA 162 (T), 1995 (2) BCLR 138, 178–179 (T); Foulds (supra) at 148–149. See also Yuen v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 1998 (1) SA 958 (C).

[4] This requirement appears to demand a clear statement of the administrative action once it has been taken. See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 337.

[5] On the consequences of non-compliance with these requirements, see I Currie & J Klaaren 'Remedies for Non-Compliance with Section 3 of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act' in C Lange & J Wessels (eds) The Right to Know: South Africa's Promotion of Administrative Justice and Access to Information Acts (2004) 31.

[6] The use of this subjectively-phrased discretion is unfortunate in an Act aimed at promoting administrative justice.

[7] The reason for this odd drafting is that the Parliamentary Portfolio Committee altered the Law Commission's draft Bill which listed these elements after the phrase '[a] fair procedure may also entail'. This wording would have made it clear that these elements may, depending on the circumstances, be required in order to give effect to procedural fairness. See Currie The PAJA (supra) at 103, fn 49. But see POPCRU (supra) at para 70 (Describes s 3(3) as '[providing] for discretionary additions to the core, minimum requirements when fairness makes them necessary'.)

[8] With respect to this obligation in respect of s 3(3), see Schoon v MEC, Department of Finance, Economic Affairs and Tourism, Northern Province [2003] 9 BLLR 963 (T) para 26 and 23 (Although the High Court seems to regard s 3(3)(a) as requiring legal representation in serious and complex cases, an earlier statement in the judgment partially undercuts this claim.) See also Dladla v Administrator, Natal 1995 (3) SA 79 (N)(Held that a disciplinary committee must properly exercise its discretion as to whether or not to afford the right to legal representation, and cannot fetter that discretion on the basis that the usual practice is not to allow such representation.)

susceptible to review under PAJA.[1] Iain Currie points out, for example, that if legal representation is essential in a particular case in order to ensure fairness, a decision by the administrator not to provide an opportunity for legal representation would be unreasonable (and thus susceptible to challenge).[2] A second approach would emphasise that the specific elements listed (as discretionary elements) in s 3(3) cannot diminish the mandatory obligation in s 3(2)(b)(ii) to provide affected persons with 'a reasonable opportunity to make representations', and that a failure to, for example, allow for legal representation where procedural fairness demands it would fall foul of this requirement.

The difficulty with the second approach is that, while it is most consistent with the underlying constitutional right to procedurally fair administrative action, it does strain the ordinary meaning of s 3(3). Although it is not necessarily an unduly strained reading, it would be preferable for s 3(3) to be amended to reflect that the discretionary elements are only directory in the sense that they do not generally apply but that they must be afforded where procedural fairness so requires.

Despite the use of the label 'mandatory' elements, PAJA retains the flexible nature of procedural fairness. It allows an administrator to depart from any of the mandatory elements in subsection (2) if to do so is 'reasonable and justifiable in the circumstances'.[3] PAJA goes on to provide that, in determining whether a departure is reasonable and justifiable, an administrator must take all relevant factors into account, including the urgency of the matter and the need to promote an efficient administration and good governance.[4] This provision is consistent with the post-constitutional case law on procedural fairness. These cases have allowed a relaxation of the right to make representations in cases of pressing urgency[5] and have held that an opportunity to make representations after the administrative action is taken can suffice in certain circumstances.[6]

Finally, s 3(5) provides that an administrator may act in accordance with a different procedure if he or she is granted the power to follow a different, but still fair, procedure. In assessing the fairness of a different procedure, the courts should carefully scrutinize the relevant procedure to ensure that it gives affected

[1] Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 100 and Currie The PAJA (supra) at 103–104 and 110.

[2] Currie The PAJA (supra) at 110. See Baxter (supra) at 555 ('In unusually complex cases involving complex evidence or legal issues, legal representation might be regarded as a sine qua non of a fair hearing . . .') See also Hamata v Chairperson, Peninsula Technikon Internal Disciplinary Committee 2002 (5) SA 449 (SCA) at paras 12–13.

[3] Section 3(4)(a) of PAJA. The Minister may also, with the approval of Parliament, exempt administrative actions or classes of administrative actions from s 3 where it is reasonable and justifiable to do so (s 2(1) of PAJA). For a criticism of this approach in PAJA, see Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 343–344.

[4] Section 3(4)(b).

[5] Kyalami Ridge (supra) at paras 104–109.

[6] See, eg, Hindry v Nedcor Bank Ltd & Another 1999 (2) SA 757 (W) at 781–782; and Buffalo City Municipality v Gauss & Another 2005 (4) SA 498 (SCA), 2006 (11) BCLR 1314 (SCA) at para 14.

persons an adequate opportunity to be heard. After all, the constitutionally mandated aim of PAJA is to give effect to the constitutional right to procedural fairness.

(f) The scope and content of procedurally fair administrative action affecting the public

Whereas a large amount of PAJA codifies the common law position, s 4 constitutes a significant development. In what has been described as 'a great innovation in South African administrative law',[1] s 4 applies procedural fairness to administrative action that 'materially and adversely affects the rights of the public'. PAJA therefore introduces general procedures that must be followed in relation to administrative action affecting the public generally. This development represents a change from the common-law position where administrative decisions which had a general, rather than a particular, effect were not subject to the requirements of natural justice.[2] This development is to be welcomed. One positive effect of s 4 is that it requires public participation in the administrative rule-making process. Given that the administrative rule-making process is frequently employed by modern legislatures that devolve their law-making powers to administrative functionaries, a legal regime that enhances access to this process is a necessary complement to the constitutional commitment to participatory democracy.

Section 4(1) stipulates that where an administrative action 'materially and adversely affects the rights of the public' an administrator must decide between five courses of action. He or she must: either hold a public inquiry (which includes a public hearing on the proposed administrative action, and public notification of the inquiry);[3] follow a notice and comment procedure (which involves publishing the proposed action for public comment and written representations on the proposal);[4] follow both the public inquiry and notice and comment procedures; follow a fair but different procedure in terms of an empowering provision; or follow another appropriate procedure which gives effect to the right to procedural fairness in s 3 of PAJA (eg, granting hearings to the entire group affected by the proposed action).[5]

[1] Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 364.

[2] South African Roads Board v Johannesburg City Council 1991 (4) SA 1 (A). For a general discussion of administrative rule-making, see L Baxter 'Rule-making and Policy Formulation in South African Administrative-law Reform' (1993) Acta Juridica 176 and C O'Regan 'Rules for Rule-making: Administrative Law and Subordinate Legislation' (1993) Acta Juridica 157.

[3] The procedure for a public inquiry is set out in s 4(2), read with Chapter 1 of the Regulations on Fair Administrative Procedures published under GN R 1022 in Government Gazette 23674 of 31 July 2002 ('the Regulations').

[4] The notice and comment procedure is set out in s 4(3), read with Chapter 2 of the Regulations.

[5] For a discussion of the effect of this latter provision, and the thorny question as to the relationship between s 3 and s 4 of PAJA, see Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 374; Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 130–131; Currie The PAJA (supra) at 119–122; and Mass (supra) at 67.

The important threshold test for s 4 is whether the relevant administrative action 'materially and adversely affects the rights of the public'. In interpreting this phrase, it is important to bear in mind that 'public' is defined in s 1 of PAJA as '[including] any group or class of the public'.

Currie and Klaaren propose that s 4 is triggered where administrative action: has a general impact; has a significant public effect; and if the rights of the public are in issue.[1] In order to have a general impact the administrative action must apply to members of the public 'equally' and 'impersonally', although it may impact on certain members of the public more than others (for example, a regulation prohibiting the consumption of alcohol on a particular day of the week).[2] The requirements of an adverse effect on the rights 'of the public' must be taken to mean that the action impacts on the rights of members of the public (rather than the rights of the group).[3] Whether the materiality requirement is met will depend on the circumstances of each case and should be judged cumulatively in relation to the public as a group.[4] As with individual administrative action under s 3, an administrator may depart from the requirements in s 4 if it is 'reasonable and justifiable in the circumstances', taking into account all relevant factors.[5]

(g) The rule against bias

The second component of procedural fairness[6] is the rule against bias. This rule is captured by the maxim nemo iudex in sua causa ('no one shall be a judge in their own cause'). This common law ground of review is now codified in s 6(2)(a)(iii) of PAJA. This provision stipulates that administrative action may be judicially reviewed if the administrator who took it 'was biased or reasonably suspected of bias'. This rule aims to ensure that a decision-maker is, and is seen to be, impartial. In the context of quasi-judicial bodies, the administrative law rule (which forms part of the constitutional right to procedurally fair administrative action) is supplemented by FC s 34. FC s 34 entrenches the right to have any

[1] Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 114.

[2] Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 114–116.

[3] Currie The PAJA (supra) at 125. We prefer this interpretation to the approach advocated by De Ville. De Ville argues that, as there are no rights in the traditional sense inhering in the public, the term 'rights' as used in s 4(1) must be understood as including 'interests'. De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 227.

[4] An example of an administrative action affecting the public in a manner which does not meet the requirement of materiality would be Hugh Corder's example of a regulation requiring that the background of motor vehicle licence plates should be red rather than yellow. See H Corder 'Administrative Justice: A Cornerstone of South Africa's Democracy' (1998) 14 SAJHR 38, 46.

[5] Section 4(4) of PAJA. The Minister may also, with the approval of Parliament, exempt actions or classes of administrative actions from s 4 where it is reasonable and justifiable to do so (s 2(1) of PAJA).

[6] Bias is subsumed under procedural fairness at least in the sense in which the term is used in FC s 33. Under PAJA s 6, bias and procedural fairness are treated as separate grounds of review.

dispute that can be resolved by application of law decided by a court or 'an independent and impartial tribunal'.[1]

The primary rationales for the rule against bias are: (a) to enhance good administrative decision-making, as a person who is free from bias (or impermissible partiality) is more likely to come to a decision in the public interest; (b) promoting fairness — it is fundamentally unfair to expose an affected person to decision-making by an administrator that is biased (or perceived to be biased) against him or her; and (c) enhancing confidence in administrative decision-making processes.[2] As Lord Hewitt famously remarked, in the context of judicial decision-making: 'justice should not only be done, but should manifestly and undoubtedly be seen to be done.'[3]

Traditionally, the rule against bias was applied in the context of judicial and quasi-judicial decisions.[4] The rule now applies more broadly to all administrative decision-making. There are at least two reasons why this should be the case. First, the rule against bias is a component of the right to procedurally fair administrative action (which attaches to all administrative action under FC s 33(1)). Second, bias is specifically listed as one of the grounds of review of administrative action in s 6(2)(a)(iii) of PAJA. As the Constitutional Court stated in SARFU 2, the rule against bias is applicable to judicial cases 'as well as quasi-judicial and administrative proceedings'.[5]

Broadly speaking, there are two types of impermissible bias. The first is actual bias: the decision-maker was in fact biased or partial. This form of bias arises where the decision-maker approached the issues 'with a mind that was in fact prejudiced or not open to conviction'.[6] Actual bias has rarely been found to have arisen in our case law.[7]

[1] That a quasi-judicial tribunal is governed by both FC s 33 and FC s 34 is apparent from the decision of the majority of the Constitutional Court, and the separate concurring judgment of O'Regan J, in Sidumo. Sidumo (supra) at paras 112, 124 and 135. On FC s 34, see J Brickhill and A Friedman 'Access to courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, November 2007) Chapter 59, especially § 59.4*(c)*.

[2] See De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 269; Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 405.

[3] R v Sussex Justices, ex parte McCarthy (1924) 1 KB 256 at 259. See also the Constitutional Court in S v Jaipal 2005 (4) SA 581 (CC), 2005 (5) BCLR 423 (CC) at para 31 ('The principle that justice must not only be done but also be seen to be done is well known'); S v Roberts 1999 (4) SA 915 (SCA)('Roberts') at para 22.

[4] See, eg, Hack v Venterspost Municipality & Others 1950 (1) SA 172 (W) at 189.

[5] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v South African Rugby Football Union & Others 1999 (4) SA 147 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 725 (CC) ('SARFU 2') at para 35. See also Umfolozi Transport (Edms) Bpk v Minister van Vervoer en Andere [1997] 2 All SA 548, 552, 553 (A).

[6] BTR Industries South Africa (Pty) Ltd v Metal and Allied Workers Union 1992 (3) SA 673 (A) ('BTR Industries') at 690. See De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 271–273.

[7] For a fairly recent instance of actual bias, see De Lille (supra), in which the High Court found that a decision of an ad hoc parliamentary committee to recommend the suspension of Patricia De Lille MP was vitiated by actual bias. Ms De Lille was suspended for alleging that a number of African National Congress MPs had acted as spies for the apartheid government. This decision was taken on the recommendation of a committee, where the majority of the committee members were ANC MPs and where certain members of the committee appeared to have pre-judged the matter.

The second form of bias, which more often arises in practice, is where there is a reasonable suspicion (or apprehension)[1] of bias. The reasonable suspicion test is objective. One considers whether the hypothetical reasonable person with ordinary intelligence, knowledge and common sense, placed in the circumstances of the person alleging bias, would be of the view that there was a reasonable suspicion that the decision-maker would be biased.[2] In SARFU 2, the Constitutional Court rejected such a biased-based application for the recusal of a number of judges of that Court:

> The question is whether a reasonable, objective and informed person would on the correct facts reasonably apprehend that the Judge has not or will not bring an impartial mind to bear on the adjudication of the case, that is a mind open to persuasion by the evidence and the submissions of counsel.[3]

The reasonable person postulated in this test is, as Lord Bingham recently remarked on behalf of the House of Lords, characterised by the following: 'he must adopt a balanced approach and will be taken to be a reasonable member of the public, neither unduly complacent or naïve nor unduly cynical or suspicious'.[4] Our courts have, post-SARFU 2, emphasised that the test for bias in respect of judicial officers involves four requirements: (a) a reasonable suspicion that the judicial officer might, not would, be biased; (b) the suspicion must be that of a reasonable person in the position of the accused or litigant; (c) the suspicion must be based on reasonable grounds; and (d) the suspicion is one which a reasonable person would, not might, have.[5]

Our courts are likely to apply a similar test for a reasonable suspicion of bias in the context of administrative decision-makers — at least insofar as they exercise quasi-judicial or disciplinary power. In such a context, the test for disqualifying bias may be easier to meet than in the judicial realm. This is because there is a presumption that, in light of the oath of office, institutional independence, and legal training and experience of judicial officers, such officers act impartially and free from bias.[6] The stricter nature of the test for bias in the context of quasi-judicial decision-makers is reflected in the following statement in Mönnig & Others v Council of Review & Others:

[1] The term 'apprehension' was preferred by the Constitutional Court in SARFU 2, on the basis that the word 'suspicion' may possess 'inappropriate connotations'. SARFU 2 (supra) at para 38.

[2] See BTR Industries (supra) at 693.

[3] SARFU 2 (supra) at para 48.

[4] R v Abdroikov; R v Green; R v Williamson [2008] 1 All ER 315 at para 15.

[5] Roberts (supra) at paras 32–34. See also South African Commercial Catering and Allied Workers Union & Others v Irvin & Johnson Limited 2000 (3) SA 705 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 886 (CC) and S v Shackell 2001 (4) SA 1 (SCA)('Shackell').

[6] See, for example, SARFU 2 (supra) at para 48. The Supreme Court of Appeal in Shackell (supra) describes this as 'the weighty presumption of judicial impartiality' (at para 21). See also the Canadian Supreme Court in R v S (RD) (1997) 118 CCC (3d) 353 at para 113.

> [I]n the case of non-judicial officers performing functions indistinguishable from the judicial process, the test operates more strictly even than in the case of judicial officers. Reasonable litigants are less likely to regard judicially trained officers as inclined to succumb to outside pressures or to be influenced by anything other than the evidence given before them. The quality of impartiality is not so readily conceded to non-judicial adjudicators. Since the appearance of impartiality has to do with the public perception of the administration of justice, it is only to be expected that some tribunals will be more vulnerable to suspicion of bias than others. The most vulnerable, I venture to suggest, are tribunals — other than courts of law — which have all the attributes of a court of law and are expected by the public to behave exactly as a court of law does.[1]

It is important to note that the test of a reasonable suspicion of bias should vary. The variability of the test should turn on the nature of the administrative body concerned and the nature of the administrative action. As L'Hereux Dubé J noted on behalf of the Canadian Supreme Court: 'the standards for reasonable apprehension of bias may vary … depending on the context and the type of function performed by the administrative decision-maker involved.'[2] There is a significant difference as to the circumstances in which a reasonable suspicion of bias would arise in respect of, for example, a disciplinary tribunal as opposed to a committee that makes decisions based on broad policy considerations.[3]

(h) Institutional bias

Prior to the advent of the constitutional protection of procedural fairness, our courts applied the concept of 'institutional bias'. A finding of 'institutional bias' could preclude the conduct from review on the ground of bias. By 'institutional bias', we mean the term used to describe a lack of impartiality that is explicit or implicit in the empowering legislation. For example, legislation that specifically provides for a hearing before a person that has some or other interest in the matter, clearly contemplates and thus arguably authorises a degree of partiality in the conduct of that hearing. In the pre-constitutional era, the approach of our courts was that if a level of partiality was a necessary consequence of the legislative scheme, such partiality did not result in impermissible bias. In other words, institutional bias (sometimes referred to 'structural bias') operated as an exception to the rule against bias. Jacques De Ville explains the position as follows:

> Before the coming into effect of the 1993 Constitution, there was no possibility of challenging the validity of legislation setting up an administrative body with institutional bias. Such bias had to be tolerated 'because it had its origin in the nature of the hearing for which the Legislature has specifically provided'. Such a body would be acting improperly 'only if it > could be shown that it had approached the matter which it had to consider with a closed mind, that it had, for example, irrevocably decided on a certain cause of action and only went through the motions in considering objections', ie in the event of a real likelihood of bias.[1]

[1] 1989 (4) SA 866 (C) at 880.
[2] Baker v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) (1999) 174 DLR (4th) 193 (SCC) at para 47.
[3] See De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 270–271, fn 462 (Authorities cited there.)

This approach was consistent with the doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty that applied prior to the Interim Constitution. As a result, the administrative law rule against bias could not be used to challenge the legality of a structure that was specifically envisaged in the legislation. As Etienne Mureinik stated:

> The point of calling bias institutional is that statutory approval means that it must be tolerated. . .. [I]f it is the institutional character of the bias which generates the statutory exclusion or curtailment, that must be because the legislature must be taken not to want to disqualify for bias arising from the decisionmaking procedure itself.[2]

The doctrine of parliamentary sovereignty has been eclipsed by doctrine of constitutional supremacy found in the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution. In light of the constitutionally protected right to procedural fairness (which includes the rule against bias), there is a need to reassess the concept of 'institutional bias'. For if one has a constitutional right to an unbiased hearing, then even a law of Parliament cannot simply override such a right without justification. The difference between the approach to institutional bias before and after the Final Constitution is aptly described by Ross Kriel:

> [A]t common law one determines whether the legislature has authorised an 'institutional bias', and if so, it must be tolerated .... Under the Constitution, particularly given that section 34 separately grounds rights to independent and impartial tribunals, the question is not whether the legislature has authorized institutional bias, but whether it can justify institutional bias. These are two entirely different enquiries.[3]

63.6 THE RIGHT TO REASONABLE ADMINISTRATIVE ACTION

(a) Reasonableness: a (somewhat) controversial ground of review

FC s 33 proclaims that everyone has the right to reasonable administrative action. It is therefore indisputable that the Final Constitution subjects administrative action to a standard of reasonableness. Despite this clear starting point, it is important to bear in mind the somewhat controversial nature of this ground of review.

[1] De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 281. See, eg, Ciki v Commissioner of Correctional Services & Another; Jansen v Commissioner of Correctional Services & Another 1992 (2) SA 269 (E) at 272; and Loggenberg & Others v Robberts & Others 1992 (1) SA 393 (C) at 405–406.

[2] 'Administrative Law' 1992 Annual Survey of South African Law 732–733.

[3] 'Administrative Law' 1999 Annual Survey of South African Law 73.

The traditional concern with review for unreasonableness is that it invites judicial scrutiny of the merits of the administrative decision or, more formalistically, that it narrows the distinction between a review and an appeal. Unreasonableness review therefore opens the way for courts to interfere with, and second guess, executive decisions and the policy prerogatives flowing from those decisions. It is, in particular, said that courts are ill-equipped to decide polycentric questions and are not institutionally competent to do so. The concern is therefore expressed that reasonableness review undermines the separation of powers.[1]

While it is correct that review for unreasonableness requires a court to assess the substance or merits of administrative decisions,[2] reasonableness review, properly construed, is both appropriate and consistent with the principle of separation of powers as entrenched in the Final Constitution. It is important, in this regard, that administrative decision-makers are required to act reasonably. It cannot, in principle, be correct that administrators should be at liberty to act unreasonably.[3] That a reasonableness standard strikes an appropriate balance is well expressed by Cora Hoexter:

> Standard dictionaries reveal that reasonable means 'in accordance with reason' or 'within the limits of reason'; and surely this is precisely what we are entitled to demand of discretionary administrative action. Within the limits of reason suggests an area of 'legitimate diversity', and a space within which various reasonable choices may be made. It does not suggest that a decision is reasonable only when it is correct or perfect. On the ordinary dictionary meaning of 'reasonable', in fact, s 33 captures exactly the right standard.[4]

It is important that, whatever form reasonableness review takes, the courts' role is confined to assessing the reasonableness of administrative action, and not its correctness. In this way, separation of powers is respected and the distinction between [1] On the principle of separation of powers generally, see S Seedorf and S Sibanda 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 12.

[2] See, for example, Bato Star (supra) at para 45; Sidumo (supra) at para 108. This is not, in itself, problematic. For one thing, a number of traditional grounds of administrative review involve, at least to some extent, an assessment of the substantive merits of the decision, including the old common law grounds of symptomatic or gross unreasonableness. See Hoexter 'Future of Judicial Review' (supra) at 512; C Hoexter 'Unreasonableness in the Administrative Justice Act' in C Lange and J Wessels (eds) The Right to Know: South Africa's Promotion of Administrative Justice and Access to Information Acts (2004) 148, 157–158 ('Unreasonableness'); J Chan 'A Sliding Scale of Reasonableness in Judicial Review' in H Corder (ed) Comparing Administrative Justice Across the Commonwealth (2007) at 234–235).

[3] See E Mureinik 'Reconsidering Review: Participation and Accountability' 1993 Acta Juridica 35 ('Reconsidering Review') at 41 ('It is difficult to see why the fact that a decision is strikingly grossly unreasonable does not, on its own, prove abuse of discretion. Or, for that matter, why unreasonableness does not, on its own, prove abuse of discretion. After all, if we characterize a decision as unreasonable, we mean much more than that we disagree with it, or that we consider it wrong. We mean that we judge it to lack plausible justification. If so, how can we believe it to have been reached without an abuse of discretion?') review and appeal is maintained.[1] Perhaps most significantly, the legitimacy of judicial review of the administration is maintained. As Froneman DJP stated, commenting on the test of 'justifiable' administrative action in IC s 24*(d)*:[2]

[4] 'Future of Judicial Review' (supra) at 510.

> In determining whether administrative action is justifiab1e in terms of the reasons given for it, value judgments will have to be made which will, almost inevitably, involve the consideration of the 'merits' of the matter in some way or another. As long as the Judge determining this issue is aware that he or she enters the merits not in order to substitute his or her own opinion on the correctness thereof, but to determine whether the outcome is rationally justifiable, the process will be in order.[3]

Reasonableness review only played a small role in pre-constitutional administrative law. In relation to the largest category of administrative conduct (so-called 'purely administrative decisions') the role played by reasonableness was limited to the application of two doctrines. First, symptomatic unreasonableness, which meant unreasonableness that established the existence of another ground of review.[4] The second related doctrine was that of gross unreasonableness. Gross unreasonableness stood for the proposition that a decision will be set aside only if the degree of unreasonableness is particularly egregious. In National Transport Commission & Another v Chetty's Motor Transport (Pty) Ltd,[5] the court wrote that a decision will be set aside if it is 'grossly unreasonable to so striking a degree as to warrant the inference of a failure to apply … [the] mind'.

Reasonableness review was not, however, entirely foreign to our common law during this period. Most significantly, unreasonableness was a ground for challenging delegated legislation, where the rule in Kruse v Johnson[6] was applied in a 'long train of cases'.[7] In addition, certain cases applied a variant of reasonableness review to 'purely judicial' administrative decisions.[8]

---

[1] See Bato Star (supra) at para 45; and Sidumo (supra) at para 109 (Navsa AJ). As Ngcobo J stated in his minority judgment in Sidumo discussing the standard of review under s 145(2)(a) of the LRA: 'there may well be a fine line between a review and an appeal, in particular, where … the reviewing court considers the reasons given by a tribunal, not to determine whether the result is correct, but to determine whether a gross irregularity occurred in the proceedings. At times it may be difficult to draw the line. There is, however, a clear line. And this line must be maintained'. Sidumo (supra) at para 244,

[2] Carephone (Pty) Ltd v Marcus NO & Others 1999 (3) SA 304 (LAC), 1998 (10) BCLR 1326 (LAC) ('Carephone') at para 36.

[3] See also Mureinik 'Reconsidering Review' (supra) at 40–43 ('"Reasonableness" marks off decisions as tolerable even where they may be wrong.') See also Kotze v Minister of Health & Another 1996 (3) BCLR 417 (T) at 425–426.

[4] See, for example, Union Government (Minister of Mines and Industries) v Union Steel Corporation (South Africa) Ltd 1928 AD 220, 236–237. The term 'symptomatic unreasonableness' was coined by J Taitz 'But 'Twas a Famous Victory' 1978 Acta Juridica 109, 111.

[5] 1972 (3) SA 726 (A) at 735.

[6] [1898] 2 QB 91 at 99–100.

[7] R v Jopp 1944 (4) SA 11, 13 (N). See Baxter Administrative Law (supra) at 478–479, fn 13. For a discussion of the application of reasonableness review to legislative administrative acts under the common law, see Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 296–301.

[8] Theron en Andere v Ring van Wellington van die NG Sendingkerk in Suid-Afrika en Andere 1976 (2) SA 1 (A)(Jansen JA). See Baxter Administrative Law (supra) at 499 (Explains what Jansen JA appeared to mean by 'purely judicial' decisions are 'decisions that have to be reached by reference to clear rules, principles or standards, not decisions involving a high degree of policy', ie decisions with which the courts are closely familiar.) See also Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 301.

(b) The constitutional right to reasonable administrative action

IC s 24*(d)* dramatically altered the existing common-law position of the time. It provided that 'every person shall have the right to administrative action which is justifiable in relation to the reasons given for it where any of his or her rights is affected or threatened'. The key substantive component of the administrative justice clause amounted to a constitutional command for rational decision-making.[1] Although the term 'justifiable' was used in the Interim Constitution, most authors expressed the view that 'justifiable' was synonymous with 'reasonableness'.[2] While certain courts agreed with this approach,[3] the majority of the Constitutional Court in Bel Porto suggested that 'justifiability', at least in the context of that case, meant no more than mere rationality.[4]

FC s 33(1) appears to have eliminated any uncertainty by simply and forthrightly stating that everyone has the right to administrative action which is 'reasonable'. If one adopted a more restrictive approach to the ambit of justifiability under the Interim Constitution, there is no doubt that FC s 33(1) went further in providing for reasonableness review. As Chaskalson CJ (who had penned the judgment of the majority in Bel Porto) remarked in his judgment in New Clicks, FC s 33 means that administrative action can be reviewed for reasonableness and that reasonableness is a 'higher standard' than rationality. This higher standard 'in many cases will call for a more intensive scrutiny of administrative decisions than would have been competent under the interim Constitution'.[5]

The question that inevitably arises is what is meant by 'reasonableness'? Part of the answer is that it, at a minimum, encompasses rationality. This overlaps with the constitutional principle of rationality discussed above,[6] and requires a rational

[1] J Klaaren 'Administrative Justice' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa 1st ed. (5th revision, 1999) § 25.8.

[2] See, for example, E Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where? Introducing the Interim Bill of Rights' (1994) 10 SAJHR 31; Klaaren 'Administrative Justice' (supra) at § 25.8; Hoexter 'Future of Judicial Review' (supra) at 511; L du Plessis & H Corder Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights (1994) at 169. But see D Davis & G Marcus 'Administrative Justice' in D Davis, H Cheadle & N Haysom (eds) Fundamental Rights in the Constitution: Commentary and cases (1997) 161, who suggest that reasonableness might be a wider concept than justifiability since a decision may be justifiable, although the reasons for the decisions do not have an objectively reasonable basis.

[3] See Standard Bank of Bophuthatswana Ltd v Reynolds NO & Others 1995 (3) BCLR 305 (B); and Roman v Williams NO 1998 (1) SA 270 (C), 1997 (9) BCLR 1267 (C) ('Roman').

[4] Bel Porto (supra) at paras 89 and 127–128 (per Chaskalson CJ). This portion of Chaskalson CJ's judgment suggests that certain administrative decisions may require a stricter standard of justifiability than rationality. Chaskalson CJ stated in his later judgment in New Clicks (supra) that IC s 24*(d)* 'in substance set rationality as the review standard' (at para 108). See, however, the minority judgment of Mokgoro and Sachs JJ in Bel Porto, stating that the rationality requirement in IC s 24*(d)* extended beyond rationality review and encompassed a proportionality standard (paras 162–166). For a criticism of the majority decision in Bel Porto, see A Pillay 'Reviewing reasonableness: An appropriate standard for evaluating state action and inaction?' (2005) 122 SALJ 419 at 427–428.

[5] New Clicks (supra) at para 108.

[6] See § 63.2*(b)* supra.

connection between the decision, the information before the decision-maker and the purpose that the decision seeks to achieve.[1] As Hoexter argues:

> Rationality means, first, that administrative action must be supported by the evidence before the administrator and the reasons given for it. This requirement may be summed up as follows: 'Is there a rational objective basis justifying the connection made by the administrative decision-maker between the material properly available to him and the conclusion he or she eventually arrived at?' [quoting from Carephone][2] Secondly, administrative action must be objectively capable of furthering the purpose for which the power was given and for which the action was purportedly performed.[3]

The next question that is commonly asked is whether 'reasonableness' includes proportionality. Broadly speaking, proportionality requires a proportionate balance between the objective sought to be achieved by the administrative action and the impact of that decision on persons' rights and interests.[4]

There is some judicial support for the idea that proportionality forms part of the test for reasonable administrative action.[5] In his minority judgment in New Clicks, Sachs J even goes so far as saying that '[p]roportionality will always be a significant element of reasonableness'.[6] Some support for the application of the proportionality principle as part of a reasonableness enquiry is also found in the arguably analogous decisions of the Constitutional Court which consider proportionality in assessing whether or not the State is complying with its obligation to [1] The requirement of a rational connection between the decision and its purpose covers the same ground as the constitutional principle of rationality, which the Constitutional Court has held flows from the rule of law (see § 63.2*(b)* supra). As the Court stated in Pharmaceutical Manufacturers (supra) at para 85: 'Decisions must be rationally related to the purpose for which the power was given, otherwise they are in effect arbitrary and inconsistent with this requirement.' The requirement of a rational connection between the decision and the information before the decision-maker, however, goes further. In this latter sense rationality seems to mean illogical or arbitrary. It is thus akin to unreasonableness in the sense referred to by Mureinik 'Reconsidering Review' (supra) at 41 (ie lacking plausible justification) or, at the very least, gross unreasonableness.

[2] Supra, at para 37.

[3] 'Unreasonableness' (supra) at 153. See also Hoexter 'Future of Judicial Review' (supra) at 511.

[4] The principle of proportionality is well-known in South African constitutional law as it is integral to the general limitations analysis under FC s 36. Nonetheless, it is a contested concept. For a discussion and a critique of proportionality in this context, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 34.8*(b)* and (d).

[5] Roman (supra) at 284–285 (in the context of review of administrative action for justifiability under IC item 23(2)(b) of Schedule 6); Peter Klein (supra) at para 36; Schoonbee & Others v MEC for Education, Mpumalanga & Another 2002 (4) SA 877 (T) at 885. See also the post-PAJA decision of the Constitutional Court in Bato Star (supra), at § 63.6*(d)* infra. A number of academics also favour the requirement of proportionality in relation to administrative action. See, eg, Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 309; and Pillay (supra) at 420 and 429; De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 215–216 (Argues that proportionality review should apply to certain types of administrative action, ie where a fundamental right has been infringed, where a penalty is imposed or fees are determined.)

[6] New Clicks (supra) at para 637.

take 'reasonable measures' to achieve the progressive realisation of socio-economic rights.[1] This is significant, given the fact that the judicial enforcement of socio-economic rights raises similar separation of powers concerns as does reasonableness review in administrative law, namely, polycentric decision-making and involving courts in an assessment of policy matters, with which courts are generally considered ill-equipped to deal.[2]

In deciding on the appropriate test to adopt, one should not lose sight of the fact that the text of the Constitution specifically uses the term 'reasonable'. It is this term, rather than a substitute, that must be given meaning. As Froneman DJP, discussing the test of justifiability in the Interim Constitution, remarked:

> Without denying that the application of these formulations [of 'reasonableness, rationality' and 'proportionately'] in particular cases may be instructive, I see no need to stray from the concept of justifiability itself. To rename it will not make matters easier.'[3]

That being the case, a legitimate approach to reasonableness in FC s 33(1) is to regard it as importing the standard of a reasonable decision-maker (similar to the reasonable person test for negligence in delict). This standard does not, however, mean that the decision taken by the real-world administrator must be the same decision as that at which the Herculean reasonable person would arrive.[4] Such an approach would negate the administrator's legitimate area of administrative discretion. Moreover, such a standard would be virtually impossible to apply in the administrative law context, where one is dealing with a variety of polycentric decisions which are often driven by policy considerations and which courts are at times ill-equipped to assess. Accordingly, the reasonableness standard should mean that a court is required to establish whether the decision taken falls within the range of decisions that a reasonable administrator could have taken.[5] Although this test is not identical to the test for negligence, it is similar in that it postulates a reasonable decision-maker. As we will see below, the Constitutional Court in Bato Star has interpreted reasonableness in PAJA in this very manner.

[1] See Pillay (supra) at 421 and 429–432; C Steinberg 'Can reasonableness protect the poor? A review of South Africa's socio-economic rights jurisprudence' (2006) 123 SALJ 264, 279–280.

[2] Pillay (supra) 420–421.

[3] Carephone (supra) at para 37.

[4] See R Dworkin Law's Empire (1986).

[5] The rationality aspect of reasonableness review can be accommodated within this approach. A reasonable decision-maker could not make an irrational decision. Similarly, it would generally follow that a reasonable decision-maker could not have taken a decision which is disproportionate in its effect. It should, however, be noted that proportionality goes further than this conception of reasonableness, in that proportionality does not simply focus on the perspective of the administrator; it looks at the impact of the action. It is conceivable that a decision may have a disproportionate effect although the administrator could not reasonably have been aware of this effect at the time of taking the decision (particularly in urgent circumstances). Accordingly, it may well be that reasonableness, in the sense contemplated in FC s 33, goes beyond the reasonable administrator test contemplated in the text above and extends to objective proportionality (although we acknowledge that this will, in the case of limitations of fundamental rights, overlap with the proportionality requirement flowing from FC s 36(1)).

(d) Reasonableness review under PAJA

The concept of reasonableness review is included in two ways in PAJA. First, s 6(1)(f) provides that administrative action may be judicially reviewed if it is not 'rationally connected' to: (a) the purpose for which it was taken; (b) the purpose of the empowering provision; (c) the information before the administrator; or (d) the reasons given by the administrator. This provision clearly requires that administrative action must be rational in the sense discussed above: that there is a connection between, on the one hand, the action and, on the other hand, the purpose, information and reasons, and that the connection flows in the 'correct' direction. (It may not be counterproductive).

The first two aspects of rationality review (ie (a) and (b)) ask whether the action objectively operates in the direction of fulfilling its purpose. This understanding accords with the concept of rationality in the general constitutional sense. It is, perhaps unnecessary now, as the exercise of all public power must, courtesy of the principle of legality, be rationally related to a legitimate objective.[1] (It does retain the virtue of having been codified in PAJA.) The last two aspects ((c) and (d)), however, add another dimension to rationality. They look not to the likelihood of a particular outcome, but rather assess whether the action is supported by the evidence and the reasons. While s 6(1)(f) helpfully identifies the matters to which there must be a rational connection, the extent of the connection remains unclear. What level of support is required for the decision or what likelihood of furthering the purpose is required? As we will see below, the judgment of the Constitutional Court in Bato Star suggests that there must be a reasonable link between the decision, the evidence on which it is based and the objective it seeks to achieve.[2] Section 6(2)(h) of PAJA goes further, in providing that administrative action may be set aside if it is 'so unreasonable that no reasonable person could have so exercised the power or performed the function'.[3]

While one might argue that this provision means that only particularly egregious instances of unreasonableness will be reviewable,[4] such an approach should be avoided because it would fail to give effect to the constitutional right to reasonable administrative action. Section 6(2)(h) should rather be read as simply

[1] See § 63.2*(b)* supra.

[2] Bato Star (supra) at para 48 (Suggests that a court may review a decision 'which will not reasonably result in the achievement of the goal, or which is not reasonably supported on the facts').

[3] The draft of PAJA prepared by the Law Commission provided that a court could review administrative action if 'the effect of the action is unreasonable, including any: (i) disproportionality between the adverse and beneficial consequences of the action; and (ii) less restrictive means to achieve the purpose for which the action was taken'. See Hoexter 'Future of Judicial Review' (supra) at 518–519 for a criticism of s 6(2)(h).

[4] One reason for this is that s 6(2)(h) employs very similar language to the test for unreasonableness in Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corporation. [1947] 2 All ER 680 (CA) at 683 and 685 (Lord Greene referred to a decision 'so unreasonable that no reasonable authority could ever have come to it.') The Wednesbury test is similar to that of gross unreasonableness in our common law, and has been much-criticised in the United Kingdom. See, eg, HWR Wade and CF Forsyth Administrative Law 9th ed. (2004) 371–372. See also Bato Star (supra) at para 44.

providing for review for unreasonableness.[1] This standard requires a decision-maker to act reasonably, in the sense that the decision taken would have been one of the decision-making options open to the reasonable administrator in all the circumstances. It is therefore not the decision which a reasonable decision-maker would have made but rather one he or she could have made. In other words, reasonableness is assessed by examining whether the action of the administrator was one of the courses of action open to a reasonable administrator. This enquiry involves a limited proportionality enquiry as a wholly disproportionate action would not be one open to a reasonable decision-maker.

The Constitutional Court adopted this approach in Bato Star. Relying on the need to interpret s 6(2)(h) in light of the constitutional right in FC s 33(1), O'Regan J states as follows:[2]

> Even if it may be thought that the language of section 6(2)(h), if taken literally, might set the standard such that a decision would rarely if ever be found to be unreasonable, it is not the proper constitutional meaning which should be attached to the subsection. The subsection must be construed consistently with the Constitution and in particular section 33 which requires administrative action to be 'reasonable'. Section 6(2)(h) should then be understood to require a simple test, namely, that an administrative decision will be reviewable if, in Lord Cooke's words,[3] it is one that a reasonable decision-maker could not reach.[4]

In other words, the administrative decision must be one that would be open to a reasonable decision-maker. Only if it goes beyond those parameters, is it open to challenge as unreasonable. The administrative decision at issue in Bato Star required a reasonable equilibrium to be struck between various factors. O'Regan J thus remarked that the precise 'equilibrium is best left to the decision-maker. The court's task is merely to determine whether the decision made is one which achieves a reasonable equilibrium in the circumstances'.[5] O'Regan J added that this test is a flexible, context-sensitive one:[6]

> What will constitute a reasonable decision will depend on the circumstances of each case. . .. Factors relevant to determining whether a decision is reasonable or not will include the nature of the decision, the identity and expertise of the decision-maker, the range of factors relevant to the decision, the reasons given for the decision, the nature of the competing interests involved and the impact of the decision on the lives and well-being of those affected.

[1] See Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 171–173.

[2] Bato Star (supra) at para 44.

[3] In R v Chief Constable of Sussex, ex parte International Trader's Ferry Ltd [1999] 1 All ER 120, 157 (HL).

[4] The SCA in Foodcorp (Pty) Ltd v Deputy Director General Department of Environmental Affairs and Tourism: Branch Marine and Coastal Management & Others 2006 (2) SA 191 (SCA) ('Foodcorp') at para 12 described the test in the following way: 'whether the decision was one that a reasonable decision-maker could not have reached or, put slightly differently, a decision-maker could not reasonably have reached'. Although the courts in Bato Star (supra) and Foodcorp have not adopted a strictly literal interpretation of s 6(2)(h), it seems to us that this interpretation is not unduly strained and is thus, we submit, appropriate as a matter of constitutional principle.

[5] Bato Star (supra) at para 49.

[6] At para 45.

The decision in Bato Star is to be welcomed. It provides a flexible test for determining reasonableness, taking into account not only the impact of the decision and its benefits, but also factors that are policy-based (and which are sensitive to the institutional competence of courts and administrators). It allows for courts to vary the level of scrutiny depending on factors such as the nature of the decision and the 'identity and expertise of the decision-maker'. It also makes clear that reasonableness goes beyond rationality and includes at least some elements of proportionality.[1] The core focus of the test, however, remains the standard of the reasonable decision-maker and whether the decision is one that such decision-maker could have made. As O'Regan J reiterated in a slightly different context, and with reliance on her judgment in Bato Star, the standard of reasonableness requires the public authority's conduct 'to fall within the range of possible conduct that a reasonable decision-maker in the circumstances would have adopted.'[2]

Conscious of the potential of reasonableness review to blur the distinction between review and appeal, and to undermine the separation of powers, O'Regan J in Bato Star emphasised the need for appropriate 'respect' (the term that she prefers to 'deference') towards the administrative decision-maker. She did so in a manner that locates the idea of respect or deference not as an extra-legal trump card but as an incidence of the separation of powers:[3]

> [T]he need for courts to treat decision-makers with appropriate deference or respect flows not from judicial courtesy or etiquette but from the constitutional principle of the separation of powers itself. . . . In treating the decisions of administrative agencies with the appropriate respect, a court is recognising the proper role of the executive within the Constitution. In doing so a court should be careful not to attribute to itself superior wisdom in relation to matters entrusted to other branches of government. A court should thus give due weight to findings of fact and policy decisions made by those with special expertise and experience in the field. The extent to which a court should give weight to these considerations will depend on the character of the decision itself, as well as the identity of the decision-maker. A decision that requires an equilibrium to be struck between a range of competing interests or considerations and which is to be taken by a person or institution with specific expertise in that area must be shown respect by the courts. . . . This does not mean however that where the decision is one which will not reasonably result in the achievement of the goal, or which is not reasonably supported by the facts or not reasonable in the light of the reasons given for it, a court may not review that decision. A court should not rubber-stamp an unreasonable decision simply because of the complexity of the decision or the identity of the decision-maker.[4]

[1] See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 316 (Points out that the references to 'the impact of the decision', 'the nature of the competing interests involved' and 'the range of factors relevant to the decision' in this dictum in Bato Star suggest a proportionality enquiry.) As we discuss above, there may be a need to go further, in light of FC s 33, and to accommodate proportionality within the grounds of review in s 6(2) of PAJA. One possibility in this regard is to bring disproportionality under the catch-all in s 6(2)(i) of PAJA: 'otherwise unconstitutional or unlawful'.

[2] Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC) at paras 86 and 87. See also Sidumo (supra) at para 119.

[3] See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 138–147 and 318–321.

[4] Bato Star (supra) at paras 46–8.

63.7 THE RIGHT TO WRITTEN REASONS

(a) The constitutional right to written reasons

In an oft-noted and oft-lamented gap, there was no right to reasons in general administrative law under the common law.[1] This position was radically altered by IC s 24*(c)*. It proclaimed that every person has the right to be furnished with written reasons for administrative action which 'affects his or her rights or interests unless the reasons for such action have been made public'. The surprisingly broad ambit of this right to reasons (referring to both 'rights' and 'interests') was reduced under the Final Constitution. FC s 33(2) abandons the reference to 'interests' and states that everyone whose 'rights have been adversely affected by administrative action has the right to be given written reasons'.[2] The right to written reasons in FC s 33(2) is thus subject to a threshold test of 'rights' (to which the right to lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair administrative action in FC s 33(1) is not subject). We return to the significance of this below.

(b) The rationales for the right to written reasons

The right to reasons has been described as 'the bulwark of the right to just administrative action'.[3] It promotes administrative justice and good decision-making in a constructive manner without the need to rely on judicial review. If a decision-maker knows that he or she is required to provide written reasons to justify his or her decision, then he or she will be more inclined to consider all alternatives and to act in conformity with principles of good administration.[4] The requirement of written reasons also promotes accountability, with decision-makers needing to justify their conduct. In so doing, it increases public confidence in the administration and advances the foundational constitutional values of accountability, responsiveness and openness.[5]

The furnishing of reasons simultaneously promotes the values of lawful and efficient administrative decision-making in the following manner. If the decision has been properly taken and adequate reasons are furnished in respect of that decision, then a person affected by it may well accept it and take the matter no

[1] Baxter Administrative Law (supra) at 226. Some statutes, however, required reasons for particular decisions. Ibid. See also Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 419–420.

[2] Emphasis added.

[3] See Goodman Brothers (supra) at para 42 (Olivier JA, concurring.)

[4] See Bel Porto (supra) at para 159. See also Baxter Administrative Law (supra) at 228 ('A duty to give reasons entails a duty to rationalise the decision. Reasons therefore help to structure the exercise of discretion, and the necessity of explaining why a decision is reached requires one to address one's mind to the decisional referents which ought to be taken into account.') further (thus reducing the prospect of disgruntled persons bringing review applications for purposes of finding out whether a decision was properly taken, which undermines efficient administration). If, on the other hand, the reasons reveal that the decision was not properly taken (eg relevant considerations were not taken into account or irrelevant considerations were), the affected person would be able to make an informed decision as to whether and how to challenge the decision.[1] In other words, written reasons enable persons to assess whether or not their rights have been infringed and to review or, where appropriate, appeal a particular decision.

[5] FC s 1*(d)*. See also FC s 195(1)(Sets out the principles of public administration); De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 287; and Kiva (supra) at paras 22 and 37.

In addition, the right to written reasons can perform an educational function; informing, for example, an applicant for a licence how he or she can improve his or her chances of being awarded a licence the next time around.[2]

Some of these rationales are well-captured in the minority judgment of Mokgoro and Sachs JJ in Bel Porto:

> The duty to give reasons when rights or interests are affected has been stated to constitute an indispensable part of a sound system of judicial review. Unless the person affected can discover the reason behind the decision, he or she may be unable to tell whether it is reviewable or not and so may be deprived of the protection of the law. Yet it goes further than that. The giving of reasons satisfies the individual that his or her matter has been considered and also promotes good administrative functioning because the decision-makers know that they can be called upon to explain their decisions and thus be forced to evaluate all the relevant considerations correctly and carefully. Moreover, as in the present case, the reasons given can help to crystallize the issues should litigation arise.[3]

(c) The scope of the right to written reasons

As stated above, FC s 33(2) confers the right to written reasons on a person whose 'rights are adversely affected' by administrative action. Section 5(1) of PAJA gives this constitutional right statutory form. It provides that any person 'whose rights have been materially and adversely affected by administrative action and who has not been given reasons for the action' may request the administrator to furnish written reasons for the action.[4] The administrator is obliged to provide such reasons within 90 days after receiving the request.[5] Subsection (3) goes

[1] See Bel Porto (supra) at para 159. See also Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 416.

[2] Baxter Administrative Law (supra) at 138 (Quoted with approval in a number of decisions of our courts, including the SCA in Goodman Brothers (supra) at para 6 (per Schutz JA)). For more detailed discussions of the rationales for the right to written reasons, and the disadvantages of the requirement to furnish reasons, see Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 416–419; De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 287–288; Currie The PAJA (supra) 137–139; Burns & Beukes Administrative law (supra) at 253–255.

[3] Bel Porto (supra) at para 159.

[4] The request for reasons must be made within 90 days from the date on which the affected person 'became aware of the action or might reasonably have been expected to have become aware of the action'. PAJA s 5(1).

[5] PAJA s 5(2).

on to provide that if an administrator fails to furnish adequate reasons, it will be rebuttably presumed in any judicial review proceedings that the administrative action was taken without good reason. An administrator may depart from the requirement to furnish adequate reasons if it is reasonable and justifiable in the circumstances[1] and may follow a fair but different procedure in terms of an empowering provision.[2]

The right to written reasons therefore only arises under PAJA if a person's 'rights' have been 'materially and adversely affected'. Here, PAJA adds the qualification 'materially' as a threshold requirement that must be satisfied in order to invoke the right to written reasons as expressed in FC s 33(2). In order to ensure that PAJA properly gives effect to the constitutional right, only fairly insignificant, trivial effects should fall short of the 'materially' requirement.[3]

The more significant question (and one fundamentally parallel to our discussion above regarding s 3 of PAJA) is what is meant by an adverse effect on 'rights' in the context of s 5(1) of PAJA? One answer is to apply the approach of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Goodman Brothers. Goodman Brothers concerned a request for reasons by an unsuccessful tenderer. Although the case was decided in terms of the transitional FC s 33(2), which repeated the wording of IC s 24*(c)*,[4] the SCA did not consider whether the decision to award the contract to another tenderer adversely affected the unsuccessful tenderer's 'interests'. It focused on whether its 'rights' were adversely affected. Schutz JA, writing on behalf of the majority of the SCA, held that the affected right was that of lawful and procedurally fair administrative action. Schutz JA arrived at this conclusion because, without reasons, the affected person could not assess whether his or her right to lawful and fair administrative action had been violated.[5] Without reasons, the unsuccessful tenderer 'is deprived of the opportunity … to consider further action'.[6]

Some have suggested that the approach of the majority of the SCA in Goodman Brothers can usefully be employed in relation to s 5 of PAJA.[7] And at least one decision of our courts has indeed applied it to s 5.[8] However, if this approach

[1] PAJA s 5(4)

[2] PAJA s 5(4). Section 2 also provides for an exemption from the requirement to furnish written reasons.

[3] Kiva (supra) at para 23.

[4] FC item 23(2)(b) of Schedule 6.

[5] Goodman Brothers (supra) at paras 10–11.

[6] Ibid at para 12.

[7] De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 290–291. Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 424–426 also seems to support the application of Goodman Brothers to s 5(1) of PAJA, though in more tentative terms, acknowledging the difficulties with the 'bootstraps' reasoning in Goodman Brothers, but stating that 'it is reasoning that will appeal to anyone who cares about the values of participation and accountability'.

[8] Kiva (supra) at paras 29–32 (Plasket J). The Court in Kiva also held that the rights to equality, access to court and fair labour practices were affected by the decision not to promote the applicant (at para 32).

is correct, then all administrative action which adversely impacts on a person will trigger the right to written reasons.[1] In adopting this approach, the differences between FC s 33(1) (which applies to all administrative action) and FC s 33(2) (which only applies to administrative action adversely affecting rights) would 'seem to be obliterated'.[2]

While we have some sympathy for the furtherance of the aims of the right to written reasons through this approach, it is, in our view, flawed. It amounts to 'bootstraps' reasoning that reads out the adversely affecting rights requirement in s 5 of PAJA (and FC s 33(2)).[3] It thus fails to give effect to the language used in both FC s 33(2) and PAJA. Perhaps most problematically, it undermines the clear choice of the drafters of the Final Constitution to list the right to written reasons (in FC s 33(2)) separately from the right to lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair administrative action (in FC s 33(1)) and to make the former right expressly subject to the additional threshold of adversely affected rights.[4] It also fails to pay due respect to the drafters of PAJA, who expressly limited the right to written reasons to situations where administrative action adversely affects 'rights', while providing that procedural fairness applies to a wider range of decisions (adversely affecting 'rights or legitimate expectations').[5] This 'lack of respect' for an important distinction made by another branch of government is inappropriate both as a means to interpret correctly a constitutional right (FC s 33(2)) as well as a provision of constitutionally mandated legislation (s 5(1) of PAJA).[6]

It seems to us that the purpose of the 'adversely affecting rights' requirement in FC s 33(2) is not to entitle persons to written reasons in order to assess whether or not their rights (including their rights to just administrative action) have been infringed (as laudable as such an approach would be), but rather to adopt the approach that has been used for some time in administrative law in the context of the right to a hearing; namely, to narrow the categories of persons who are entitled to that right based on the impact of the administrative decision on those persons.[7] In this regard, it is instructive to compare the language in FC s 33(2) with the right to access to information in private hands in FC s 32(1)(b). FC s 32(1)(b) entitles persons to access information 'that is required for the exercise or protection of any rights'. While FC s 32(1)(b) contemplates the need to

[1] See De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 291.

[2] Hoexter Administrative law (supra) at 424.

[3] See Hoexter Administrative law (ibid) and Hoexter 'The Current State' (supra) at 31.

[4] This purpose is particularly apparent when one has regard to the extensive use of this type of threshold in qualifying each of the rights to just administrative action under IC s 24.

[5] Compare s 5(1) and s 3(1) of PAJA.

[6] The problem is captured by Hoexter 'The Current State' (supra) at 32 in the following terms: '[Goodman Brothers] is a fairly clear illustration of what judicial enthusiasm can do to obliterate the limits deliberately drawn by any legislature. To put it rather crudely, the decision shows just how easy it is to make administrative justice fully applicable to everyone all the time'.

[7] This approach was also adopted in relation to the various aspects of administrative justice in IC s 24.

have sight of information in order to exercise or protect one's rights,[1] FC s 33(2) applies where the administrative action actually has an adverse effect on rights.

We submit that a more appropriate approach is to read the 'adversely affecting rights' requirement in s 5(1) of PAJA as denoting administrative action that determines one's rights. 'Rights' in this context includes all rights and may well extend to unilateral obligations undertaken by the State.[2] Differing significantly from our interpretation of the scope of ss 3 and 4 of PAJA but nonetheless not going so broad as Goodman Brothers, this 'determining' interpretation of s 5 would entitle a broad range of persons who are affected by administrative action to written reasons in respect of that action (including an unsuccessful tenderer such as in Goodman Brothers) but, in our view, gives effect to the wording of FC s 33(2) and s 5(1) of PAJA.

(d) The content of PAJA s 5: the meaning of 'adequate' reasons

Another important question for purposes of s 5 of PAJA is what constitutes 'adequate reasons'? Although PAJA does not provide guidance on this issue, a number of cases shed light on it.

In the pre-PAJA case of Moletsane v Premier of the Free State & Another, the Court laid down the general approach that 'the more drastic the action taken, the more detailed the reasons which are advanced should be'.[3] The degree of seriousness of the administrative act should therefore determine the particularity of the reasons furnished. This approach links the level of detail to the impact on the person affected by the action.

Shying away from such a unidimensional approach, Currie and Klaaren point out that there are other possible alternatives to assessing what is adequate in the [1] See J Klaaren and G Penfold 'Access to Information' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2002) § 62.7.

[2] See § 63.3*(c)*(vi) supra. An interesting issue that would arise if this approach is adopted is the impact of the right to equality. See Goodman Brothers (supra) at para 42 (Olivier JA, in a separate concurring judgment, held that, in the context of a tender, the right to equality in FC s 9 gave rise to an effect on rights: 'The right to equal treatment pervades the whole field of administrative law, where the opportunity for nepotism and unfair discrimination lurks in every dark corner. How can such a right be protected other than by insisting that reasons be given for an adverse decision? It is cynical to say to an individual: you have a constitutional right to equal treatment, but you are not allowed to know whether you have been treated equally'.) At the risk of being accused of cynicism, we submit, for the reasons set out above, that the right to written reasons (under FC s 33(2)) does not arise simply because one needs to have sight of reasons in order to assess whether one has been subject to unequal treatment. Nevertheless, the nature of the right to equality (and particularly 'mere differentiation' contemplated in FC s 9(1)) may mean that a wide range of administrative action adversely affects the right to equality, in the sense that it results in different treatment (even though that different treatment is not unconstitutional). In addition, the context of tenders may have specific implications on the rights at issue and their interpretation and application. See G Penfold and P Reyburn 'Public Procurement' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 25.

[3] 1996 (2) SA 95 (O) at 98G-H, 1995 (9) BCLR 1285, 1228B (O).

circumstances and too much store should not be set by the seriousness of the administrative action. One should have regard to all relevant considerations, including the level of complexity relating to the matter and the cost of providing detailed reasons in the circumstances, in assessing the adequacy of reasons.[1] The guiding principle in this regard is that the reasons should be sufficient in order to serve the objects of the right to written reasons. Accordingly, 'a statement of reasons is adequate … when it is intelligible to the persons seeking the reasons and is of sufficient precision to give them a clear understanding of why the decision was made'.[2]

A helpful and authoritative statement as to the meaning of 'adequate reasons' and one that references the purposes of the right to written reasons is provided in the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Phambili Fisheries:

> [Section] 13(1) of the [Australian] Judicial Review Act requires the decision-maker to explain his decision in a way which will enable a person aggrieved to say, in effect: 'Even though I may not agree with it, I now understand why the decision went against me. I am now in a position to decide whether that decision has involved an unwarranted finding of fact, or an error of law, which is worth challenging.'
>
> This requires that the decision-maker should set out his understanding of the relevant law, any finding of fact on which his conclusions depend (especially if those have been in dispute), and the reasoning processes which led him to those conclusions. He should do so in clear and unambiguous language, not in vague generalities or the formal language of legislation. The appropriate length of the statement covering such matters will depend upon considerations such as the nature and importance of the decision, its complexity and the time available to formulate the statement.[3]

(e) The request-driven nature of the right to written reasons under PAJA

The starting-point of PAJA's treatment of reasons is that the process is request-driven. While this would probably not affect the constitutionality of PAJA, it equally should not be taken as a signal for the legislature to depart from the recent legislative trend to require that reasons be automatically given in relation to certain decisions. The automatic grant of written reasons serves the interests of good administration. In addition to adhering to this trend in legislative drafting, the provisions of s 5(6) should be employed for this purpose.[1]

[1] See Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 143–146.

[2] Currie & Klaaren Benchbook (supra) at 144. See also in J Wessels '"Adequate reasons" in terms of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act' in C Lange and J Wessels (eds) The Right to Know: South Africa's Promotion of Administrative Justice and Access to Information Acts (2004) 116, 125–131.

[3] Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism & Others v Phambili Fisheries (Pty) Ltd; Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism & Others v Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd 2003 (6) SA 406 (SCA) at para 40 (Schutz JA), quoting Woodward J in the Australian case of Ansett Transport Industries (Operations) Pty Ltd & Another v Wraith & Others (1983) ALR 500, 507. On the adequacy of reasons, see Nomala v Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, & Another 2001 (8) BCLR 844 (E); Commissioner, South African Police Service, & Others v Maimela & Another 2003 (5) SA 480 (T).

63.8 Standing to enforce the right to just administrative action

In administrative law, standing primarily refers to the right of an applicant to approach the court for relief by way of judicial review.[2] In enforcing the Bill of Rights, FC s 38 expands the common-law grounds of standing in cases in which it is alleged that a constitutional right has been infringed or threatened. In such cases the following persons may approach a court: anyone acting in their own interest; anyone acting on behalf of another person who cannot act in their own name; anyone acting as a member of, or in the interest of, a group or class of persons; anyone acting in the public interest; and an association acting in the interests of its members.[3]

This constitutional position has a relatively clear implication for general administrative law and the enforcement of the right to just administrative action: that the approach to standing must be broader than has previously been the norm. The standing clause of the Bill of Rights should be read into the PAJA.[4] In our view, a broad approach to standing, such as has by and large been adopted by our courts thus far, would not only follow the constitutional direction in this area of public law[5] but would also be consistent with the fact that s 6(1) of the PAJA provides that 'any person' may institute judicial review proceedings. One specific implication is that final administrative action with a general effect should be justiciable regardless of its implementation or enforcement in individual cases.[6] Such a position would reverse the existing, narrow common-law understanding.

[1] Section 5(6)(a) provides that '[i]n order to promote an efficient administration, the Minister may, at the request of an administrator, by notice in the Gazette publish a list specifying any administrative action or a group or class of administrative actions in respect of which the administrator concerned will automatically furnish reasons to a person whose rights are adversely affected by such actions, without such person having to request reasons in terms of this section'.

[2] As noted above, standing may also be relevant in non-judicial administrative proceedings such as those of internal review and appeal.

[3] See C Loots 'Standing, Ripeness and Mootness' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 7.

[4] Currie The PAJA (supra) at 179. For a general discussion of standing in administrative law, see Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) chapter 9 'Standing' 434–460. While Hoexter considers standing to be a separate topic from that of ripeness and mootness, we consider these issues together.

[5] See Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 229 (O'Regan J emphasised that litigation of a public character is suited to such an expansion.)

[6] See Currie The PAJA (supra) at 181–182.

In one treatment of standing within administrative law, the Constitutional Court has supported a relatively expansive view of standing. In AAA Investments, the Court granted leave to appeal even where the case had become moot due to its important implications for regulation.[1]

An important class action case in the lower courts supports the general argument that the broad constitutional provision relating to standing should be applied in the context of review under the PAJA. In relation to administrative justice, Froneman J in Ngxuza & Others v Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape Provincial Government & Another[2] adopted a broad approach to standing:

> Particularly in relation to so-called public law litigation there can be no proper justification of a restrictive approach [to standing]. The principle of legality implies that public bodies must be kept within their powers. There should, in general, be no reason why individual harm should be required in addition to the public interest of the general community. Public law litigation may also differ from traditional litigation between individuals in a number of respects. A wide range of persons may be affected by the case. The emphasis will often not only be backward-looking, in the sense of redressing past wrongs, but also forward-looking, to ensure that the future exercise of public power is in accordance with the principle of legality. All this speaks against a narrow interpretation of the rules of standing.

In this case a number of applicants, whose disability grants under social legislation had been cancelled or suspended, sought a declaration that the suspension or cancellation was unlawful. The same relief was claimed by the applicants on behalf of any other persons in the same position as themselves. Froneman J emphasised the conditions of poverty in the Eastern Cape in holding that there was evidence that many people in similar circumstances as the applicants were unable individually to pursue their claims through poverty, did not have access to legal representation, and would have difficulty in obtaining legal aid. They were thus effectively unable to act in their own name.[3]

The Court therefore held that the applicants had standing under s 38*(b)* on the ground that they were acting on behalf of others who could not act in their own names. The Court also held that the applicants had standing on the basis that they were members of a class of persons (s 38*(c)) and were acting in the public interest (s 38(d)*).

The finding that the applicants had standing on the basis that they were members of a class was upheld on appeal by the Supreme Court of Appeal.[4] In the course of his judgment Cameron JA emphasised that the class of applicants were

[1] AAA Investments (supra) at para 27.
[2] 2001 (2) SA 609 (E), 2000 (12) BCLR 1322 (E) ('Ngxuza') at 619 and 1327, respectively.
[3] Ngxuza (supra) at 622–623.
[4] Permanent Secretary. Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape & Others v Ngxuza & Others 2001 (4) SA 1184 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1039 (SCA)('Ngxuza SCA')(It was unnecessary for the SCA to decide on the other grounds of standing as the applicants had subsequently chosen to proceed with a class action.)

drawn from a poor community, their claims were small and they were widely spread. Cameron JA therefore remarked that the situation 'seemed pattern-made for class proceedings'.[1]

63.9 Substantive relief

A detailed discussion of the remedies available in administrative law falls beyond the scope of this chapter.[2] Nevertheless, a significant issue, which raises fundamental questions in relation to the separation of powers, is the circumstances in which a court has the competence to grant substantive relief in an administrative review. In other words, when will a court substitute the decision of the administrator, rather than granting the normal remedy of setting aside the decision and referring it back to the relevant decision-maker? Under our common law, the courts were generally reluctant to substitute the decision of the original decision-maker but did so in what were determined to be exceptional circumstances.[3] This common law position is now reflected in s 8(1)(c)(ii)(aa) of PAJA. Section 8(1)(c)(ii)(aa) provides that 'in exceptional cases' the court may substitute or vary the administrative action or correct a defect resulting from the administrative action.

The emphasis on exceptional circumstances is not surprising, given the fact that the granting of such relief (eg ordering a licensing authority to award a licence to a particular applicant) amounts to a dramatic encroachment by the court into the executive sphere, and also blurs the distinction between review and appeal. In order to preserve the separation of powers, this intervention should only take place where it is warranted by strong countervailing considerations. As Heher JA stated in an important decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal on substantive administrative law relief, 'remittal is almost always the prudent and proper course', because:[4]

[1] Ngxuza (SCA) (supra) at para 11.

[2] Section 8 of PAJA provides that a court of tribunal in proceedings for judicial review of administrative action may grant 'any order that is just and equitable' including, for example, directing the administrator to give reasons, prohibiting the administrator from acting in a particular manner, setting aside the administrative action and remitting it for reconsideration, declaring the rights of the parties, granting a temporary interdict or other temporary relief. In relation to constitutional remedies generally, see M Bishop 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 9.

[3] South Africa is traditionally somewhat divergent in this respect from its usual comparators in the Commonwealth, such as the United Kingdom, where a judicially reviewing court's power to substitute its decision for that of the reviewed administrator is more limited.

[4] Gauteng Gambling Board v Silverstar Development Ltd & Others 2005 (4) SA 67 (SCA) ('Silverstar') at para 29. Silverstar was an exception perhaps proving the rule, as the case saw substantive relief ordered.

> An administrative functionary that is vested by statute with the power to consider and approve or reject an application is generally best equipped by the variety of its composition, by experience, and its access to sources of relevant information and expertise to make the right decision. The court typically has none of these advantages and is required to recognise its own limitations.

The question that then arises is what circumstances are sufficiently exceptional to trigger a substantive remedy? It is likely that our courts will continue to turn to extant common law jurisprudence in seeking to answer this question. In our view, such reliance is generally appropriate. Nevertheless, in line with our adoption of the doctrine of the separation of powers as a lodestar, we would underline the call in Premier, Mpumalanga for reviewing courts to consider and respect fully the separation of powers in this as in other areas of administrative law.

Hiemstra J in Johannesburg City Council v Administrator, Transvaal & Another[1] identified two circumstances in which substantive relief may be appropriate: (a) where the end result is 'a foregone conclusion'; and (b) where the reviewed decision-maker 'has exhibited bias or incompetence to such a degree that it would be unfair to require the applicant to submit to the same jurisdiction again'. To these two circumstances can be added a third and fourth: (c) where further delay would unjustifiably prejudice the subject of the decision;[2] and (d) where a court is as qualified as the administrator to make the decision.[3]

Two points should be made in relation to this list of circumstances. First, they are only considerations to be taken into account (along with all other relevant considerations) in assessing whether substantive relief should be granted. Simply because one or more of (a) to (d) arises does not mean that substantive relief will automatically be granted.[4] The courts have, for example, emphasised that simply because the court may be as well placed as the administrator to make the decision, does not mean that the court should take the decision.[5] Second, whatever other circumstances may exist, a court should not grant substantive relief unless it has

[1] 1969 (2) SA 72 (T) at 76.

[2] Ruyobeza & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2003 (5) SA 51, 65 (C); Reynolds Brothers Limited v Chairman, Local Road Transportation Board, Johannesburg & Another 1985 (2) SA 790, 805 (A).

[3] See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 490–492. For a comprehensive list of the considerations that may play a role in determining whether exceptional circumstances arise, see De Ville Judicial Review (supra) 336–337. In Silverstar (supra) the SCA took the dramatic step, following a successful review, of awarding a casino licence to the applicant. The SCA's decision was based on the apparent inevitability of the award of the licence to the applicant if the matter had been remitted (paras 38–39), the delay had 'reached substantial proportions' (para 40) and the well-founded belief of the applicant that the administrative decision-maker (the Gauteng Gambling Board) had 'lost its objectivity' (ibid). The Court adopted this approach despite acknowledging that the Board held manifest advantages over a court as a decision-maker on this issue (para 38).

[4] The one possible exception is (a). If a court can say with absolute certainty that a particular decision is a 'foregone conclusion', there would seem to be no difficulty with granting the substantive remedy.

[5] University of the Western Cape & Others v Member of the Executive Committee for Health and Social Services & Others 1998 (3) SA 124 (C) at 131; Commissioner, Competition Commission v General Council of the Bar of South Africa & Others 2002 (6) SA 606 (SCA) ('Commissioner, Competition Commission v GCB'); and Baxter Administrative Law (supra) at 684.

adequate information, and the requisite institutional competence, to make the substantive decision. The need for adequate information is reflected in the recent decision in Intertrade Two (Pty) Limited v MEC for Roads and Public Works, Eastern Cape, & Another.[1] In Intertrade, the High Court refused to order that two tenders be awarded to the applicant, despite the fact that the tender process was 'shot through with irregularities',[2] that there had been numerous delays in the tendering process, that the applicant was the only tenderer in respect of the two tenders and that the tenders related to the vital function of maintaining hospital equipment. As Plasket J explained:

> The availability of proper and adequate information and the institutional competence of the Court to take the decision for the administrative decision-maker are necessary prerequisites that must be present, apart from 'exceptional circumstances', before a court can legitimately assume an administrative decision-making function. This, it seems to me, is a minimum requirement of rational decision-making, a fundamental requirement of the rule of law.[3]

In addition to factors (a) to (d) above — and the significant considerations of institutional competence and the separation of powers — fairness also plays an important role in considering whether or not to grant a substantive remedy.[4] As Hefer JA stated in Commissioner, Competition Commission v GCB, 'considerations of fairness may in a given case require the court to make the decision itself provided it is able to do so'.[5]

63.10 THE SUBSTANTIVE PROTECTION OF LEGITIMATE EXPECTATIONS[6]

An issue that has attracted a great deal of academic debate and judicial attention in recent years is the extent to which substantive legitimate expectations enjoy substantive protection.[7] As discussed above in the context of procedural fairness,

[1] 2007 (6) SA 442 (CkHC)('Intertrade').

[2] Ibid at para 36.

[3] Ibid at para 43.

[4] Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 489 and 492. De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 337 describes fairness to all concerned as the 'primary consideration' in assessing substantive relief. De Ville quotes Holmes AJA in Livestock and Meat Industries Control Board v Garda 1961 (1) SA 342 (A) 349: 'although the matter will be sent back if there is no reason for not doing so, in essence it is a question of fairness to both sides'. See also Commissioner, Competition Commission v GCB (supra) at para 14.

[5] Commissioner, Competition Commission v GCB (supra) at para 15.

[6] Although the substantive protection of legitimate expectations is often included in discussions of procedural fairness, it is not in fact an issue of procedural fairness. While the concept of legitimate expectations owes its origin to the application of the right to a hearing, the substantive protection of these expectations falls more appropriately under the headings of legality, reasonableness and administrative remedies. It is for this reason that this complex issue is briefly discussed under this separate heading.

[7] The recent literature on substantive protection of legitimate expectations is voluminous. See, eg, J Campbell 'Legitimate Expectations: The Potential and Limits of Substantive Protection in South Africa' (2003) 120 SALJ 292 ('The Potential and Limits of Substantive Protection'); J Campbell 'Legitimate Expectations: Developments at Home and Abroad' (2004) 121 SALJ 328; G Quinot 'The developing doctrine of substantive legitimate expectations in South Africa administrative law' (2004) 12 SAPL 543; C Forsyth 'The provenance and protection of legitimate expectations' 1988 Cambridge LJ 238; C Forsyth the founding basis of a legitimate expectation can either be procedural (where an affected person has a reasonable expectation of a hearing prior to a decision being taken) or substantive (where one has a reasonable expectation of a benefit or favourable decision).[1] Whichever form the legitimate expectation takes, the traditional approach is that it only entitles one to procedural protection. In other words, a legitimate expectation entitles one to a hearing prior to a decision which might frustrate that expectation.

In recent years, courts in various jurisdictions have gone further and in a few cases have provided substantive protection to substantive legitimate expectations. In other words, courts have protected the substance of the expectation. The effect of this so-called doctrine of substantive legitimate expectations is, by way of example, that where an administrator has promised a particular benefit (such as the grant of a permit or the application of a particular policy), the administrator must comply with that promise (i.e. the permit must be granted or the policy must be applied).

In recent years the doctrine of substantive legitimate expectations has been increasingly considered and to some extent accepted in the United Kingdom and in other, though not all, commonwealth countries.[2] The doctrine has been specifically rejected in Australia.[3] Even where accepted, however, courts and academics have not agreed on the manner in which these expectations are to be protected.[4] One recent judicial authority on substantive legitimate expectations in the UK is the decision of the Court of Appeal in R (Abdi and Nadarajah) v Secretary of State for the Home Department.[5] In R (Abdi and Nadarajah) v Secretary of State for the Home Department, Laws J held, obiter, that a public authority may only 'Wednesbury Protection of Substantive Legitimate Expectations' (1997) Public Law 375; P Craig 'Legitimate expectations: a conceptual analysis' 1992 LQR 79; Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 382–392; and De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 123–135.

[1] See § 63.5*(d)*(ii) supra.

[2] See Campbell 'The Potential and Limits of Substantive Protection' (supra) at 292 and Quinot (supra) at 556–563 (See cases cited). The one court of final appeal that has accepted the notion is in Hong Kong: Ng Sui Tung v Director of Immigration [2002] 1 HKLRD 561.

[3] Re Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs; ex parte Lam [2003] HCA 6, (2003) 214 CLR 1; 195 ALR 502.

[4] For useful discussions of the different approaches, see Campbell 'The Potential and Limits of Substantive Protection' (supra) and Quinot (supra) at 556–63. One approach (promoted by Professor Craig) adopted in the UK is to protect substantive legitimate expectations directly through balancing the person's interest in the expectation against the public or state interest in frustrating the expectation. This approach has been applied in different ways. See R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food; ex parte Hamble (Offshore) Fisheries Limited [1995] 2 All ER 714 (QB); R v North and East Devon Health Authority, ex parte Coughlan (Secretary of State for Health intervening) [2000] 3 All ER 850 (CA)). The second approach in the UK is to protect legitimate expectations where a frustration of the expectation would fall short of the standard of Wednesbury unreasonableness. See, eg, R v Secretary of State for Transport, Ex Parte Richmond-upon-Thames London [1994] 1 WLR 74.

[5] [2005] EWCA Civ 1363.

frustrate a legitimate expectation where it is proportionate to do so, taking into account the competing interests in the matter. He emphasised that holding a public authority to its promises or past practices accords with the principle of good administration.[1] According to the court, the substantive protection of legitimate should only be denied:

> in circumstances where to do so is the public body's duty, or is otherwise … a proportionate response … having regard to the legitimate aim pursued by the public body in the public interest. The principle that good administration requires public authorities to be held to their promises would be undermined if the law did not insist that any failure or refusal to comply is objectively justified as a proportionate measure in the circumstances.[2]

The doctrine of substantive legitimate expectations has, to date, had a mixed reception in South African courts. While substantive protection has been granted in some cases,[3] the doctrine has been rejected in a more recent decision of the High Court.[4] Although the issue has been raised in our highest courts on a number of occasions and has again recently been argued in the Constitutional Court,[5] both that Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal have left open the question as to whether substantive protection may be granted in respect of legitimate expectations.[6]

The reticence to embrace this controversial doctrine arises from what is often seen as a tension at the heart of the substantive protection of legitimate expectations. On the one hand, a failure to fulfill a legitimate expectation is seen as unfair (in the general sense) and as undermining certainty and confidence in the administration.[7] On the other hand, the traditional objections to the substantive protection of substantive legitimate expectations are that to do so: (a) involves courts descending into the merits of administrative decision-making and thus undermines the separation of powers between the executive and judiciary; (b) results in the fettering of administrative decision-making, by holding administrators to their undertakings and current practices or policies; (c) undermines the rule of law, by enabling administrative decision-makers to exceed their powers (ie it creates

[1] R (Abdi and Nadarajah) v Secretary of State for the Home Department (supra) at para 68.

[2] Ibid.

[3] See Campbell 'The Potential and Limits of Substantive Protection' (supra) at 314–315 (Points to the decisions in Traub v Administrator, Transvaal 1989 (2) SA 397 (T) and Minister of Local Government & Land Tenure v Inkosinathi Property Developers (Pty) Ltd 1992 (2) SA 234 (TkA) as examples of the substantive protection of legitimate expectations.)

[4] See Durban Add-Ventures v Premier Kwazulu-Natal (No 2) 2001 (1) SA 389 (N).

[5] See Various Occupants v Thubelisha Homes and Others CCT22/08.

[6] See Premier, Mpumalanga (supra) at para 36; Bel Porto (supra) at para 96; Meyer v Iscor Pension Fund 2003 (2) SA 715 (SCA) at para 27; and Szymanski (supra) at para 15. The question was also left open by the High Court in Putco Ltd v The Minster of Transport for the Republic of South Africa 2003 JDR 0408 (W), referred to in Quinot (supra) at 549–550. But see Bel Porto (supra) at para 212–213 (Madala J)(Appears to accept that substantive protection of legitimate expectations is possible.)

[7] See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 382.

the risk of an administrator, in effect, arrogating to herself a power she does not have, through a promise or other form of conduct); and (d) it discourages changes to administrative decision-making and policy-making, thus undermining the ease with which the administration responds to evolving public interests.[1]

Although it is possible that the direct application of the doctrine of substantive legitimate expectations will find acceptance in our law,[2] we agree with John Campbell that substantive protection should be granted in appropriate cases using the established grounds of review under PAJA. The effect of s 3 of PAJA is that a person whose legitimate expectations are materially and adversely affected by administrative action must be given an opportunity to make representations on the proposed action. As Campbell points out, it would follow from this proposition that the person's expectation (and the past practice, promise or other facts underlying it) would be a relevant consideration in coming to the administrative decision.[3] A failure by the administrator to give due regard to the expectation would thus be reviewable on the ground of a failure to consider a relevant consideration.[4] In addition, and perhaps most significantly, the legitimate expectation would place a thumb on the scales in considering whether the administrative action is reasonable. If the action is unreasonable, then it would fall foul of s 6(2)(h) of PAJA.[5] The effect is that a substantive legitimate expectation cannot be denied where it would be unreasonable to do so. This approach allows the court to take into account all relevant circumstances, including, on the one hand, the impact of a negative decision on the holder of the legitimate expectation and, on the other, the public interest that is served by frustrating that expectation (including the interest in ensuring that public administration is not unduly hampered and that changes in policy can be effected in the public interest). The question is thus: 'could the reasonable administrator have made the decision even though it adversely affected X's legitimate expectation of a substantive benefit?'[6]

[1] See, generally, Pretorius 'Ten years after Traub' (supra) at 531; Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 382; De Ville Judicial Review (supra) at 123–124; Campbell 'The Potential and Limits of Substantive Protection' (supra) at 294–295.

[2] A court could, eg, hold that administrative action may only adversely affect a substantive legitimate expectation where it is proportionate or there is a pressing public interest. On the latter, see Bel Porto (supra) at para 213 (Madala J). If accepted, this test could possibly be accommodated under the ground of review in s 6(2)(i) of PAJA ('The action is otherwise unconstitutional or unlawful'). See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 391.

[3] 'Legitimate expectations are, quintessentially, relevant factors for consideration in [the decision-making] process and can never be ignored. There is no escape from this requirement' (Campbell 'The Potential and Limits of Substantive Protection' (supra) at 311).

[4] Section 6(2)(e)(iii) of PAJA.

[5] If the administrative action is irrational, it would also contravene s 6(2)(f)(ii) of PAJA.

[6] A consideration of legitimate expectations would seem to fall within the broad notion of reasonableness review contemplated in Bato Star. O'Regan J noted that the factors to be taken into account in assessing the reasonableness of administrative action include 'the range of factors relevant to the decision, . . . the nature of the competing interests involved and the impact of the decision on the lives and well-being of those affected'. Bato Star (supra) at para 45. See § 63.6 supra.

This leaves the issue of remedy. Again, the remedial approach inherent within the substantive protection of substantive legitimate expectations can be accommodated within our existing administrative law. Where the expectation is that a current state of affairs will continue (eg an old age home will not be closed or subsidies will continue to be paid), a court upholding that expectation can simply interdict the administrator from changing the status quo. Where, on the other hand, the expectation is that a new benefit will be granted (eg, the issuing of a permit), a court could, in exceptional circumstances, grant a substantive remedy under PAJA (eg, to compel the issuing of a permit).[1]

If the substantive protection of legitimate expectations is construed in the manner we have just suggested, then the main concerns relating to this protection (set out above) are considerably reduced (or removed). Part of this doctrinal security flows from the constitutional context of South African administrative law: it requires that everyone is entitled to lawful and reasonable administrative action. First, substantive protection would take place through the established grounds of review under PAJA, including a failure to have regard to relevant considerations and unreasonableness. Although the latter, to some extent, involves an assessment of the merits of administrative action, the assessment is confined to whether or not the action is reasonable. In this way, respect for the separation of powers is maintained.[2] Second, substantive protection does not mean that an administrator cannot deviate from his or her undertakings or existing policies. It only means that he or she cannot do so unless it is reasonable having regard to all the circumstances, including the impact of frustrating the expectation. We note in this regard that in treating the legitimate expectation as a factor in assessing the reasonableness of the decision, and not as a trump, the distinction between rights and legitimate expectations is maintained.[3] A person's legitimate expectation is protected not because he or she has an entitlement to it, but because the administrative decision-making is 'disciplined by the ordinary rules of administrative law'.[4] Third, as Hoexter points out, substantive protection advances the principles of good administration, and therefore the values of the Final Constitution, through promoting accountability, responsiveness, candour and transparency in public administration.[5]

[1] Section 8(1)(c)(ii)(aa) of PAJA. As to the circumstances in which substitution may be appropriate in this context, see Campbell 'The Potential and Limits of Substantive Protection' (supra) at 314. See also § 63.9 supra.

[2] See § 63.6 supra. Even if our courts were to apply the substantive legitimate expectation doctrine directly, it is unlikely to involve scrutiny of the merits to a greater degree than reasonableness review already contemplates. See De Ville (supra) at 124.

[3] See Campbell 'The Potential and Limits of Substantive Protection' (supra) at 294–6 and 316.

[4] Ibid at 311.

[5] See Hoexter Administrative Law (supra) at 391. See also FC s 195 (Principles of public administration). See, generally, A Bodasing 'Public Administration' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 23A.

We thus support the protection of substantive legitimate expectations, in appropriate cases, to the extent that this relatively new doctrine can be accommodated within the application of the normal rules of administrative law. The bottom line for us is that these expectations cannot be overridden where it is unreasonable to do so and where it is appropriate to grant substantive relief.

64 Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour

Stuart Woolman and Michael Bishop

64.1 Introduction 64–1
64.2 Doctrinal dilemmas 64–2
64.3 Drafting history. 64–5
64.4 Definitions 64–5
(a) Slavery. 64–6
(b) Servitude 64–11
(c) Forced labour. 64–15
64.5 International law obligations 64–18
(a) Customary international law 64–18
(b) General conventions 64–19
(c) Human rights instruments 64–20
64.6 Slavery, servitude and forced labour in context. 64–21
(a) Sexual slavery and human trafficking. 64–21
(b) Marriage and servitude 64–28
(i) Lobola 64–28
(ii) Religious marriages 64–34
(iii) Mine wives 64–35
(c) Farm labour 64–36
(d) Domestic workers. 64–40
(e) Child labour 64–43
(f) Prison labour 64–46
(g) Community service and public works 64–49
(h) Conscription. 64–53

64.1 INTRODUCTION

> No one may be subjected to slavery, servitude or forced labour.[1]

> The state of slavery is of such a nature, that it is incapable of being introduced on any reasons, moral or political, but only [by] positive law, which preserves its force long after the reasons, occasion, and time itself from whence it was created, is erased from memory.[2]

> The truth of the independent consciousness is accordingly the servile consciousness of the bondsman. This, it is true, appears at first outside of itself and not as the truth of self-consciousness. But just as lordship showed that its essential nature is the reverse of what it wants to be, so too servitude in its consummation will really turn into the opposite of what it immediately is; as consciousness forced back into itself; it will withdraw into itself and be transformed into a truly independent consciousness.[3]

Traditional forms of slavery and the positive law that condoned such practices have been almost completely abolished.[4] But given the estimated 200 million people in the world subject to coeval forms of bondage, Hegel's attribution of subjecthood to the slave may seem self indulgent, Lord Mansfield's indictment of the institution quaint.[5] The international trafficking of people for prostitution, prison labour, the sale of women for marriage, and the exploitation of domestic

[1] Section 13 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('FC' or 'Final Constitution').

[2] Sommersett v Steward 99 Eng Rep 499, 510 (KB 1772)(Mansfeld CJ)

[3] GWF Hegel The Phenomenology of Spirit (1807, trans AV Miller, 1977) 117. Hegel was certainly correct to attribute to the slave a 'truly independent consciousness'. The cost of consciousness earned through such labour can be quite high. As Hegel notes, 'if a man is a slave, his own will is responsible'. See GWF Hegel Philosophy of Right (1821) § 57A, 239. Some might demur from a cosmology in which a slave is understood to participate in her enslavement by choosing to submit rather than risk death by resisting. However, as we shall see, deciding when an individual is to be held culpable for her condition is not an academic enquiry.

[4] Despite having committed themselves through municipal law and international convention to the elimination of chattel slavery, Sudan and Mauritania represent two of the most notorious examples of regimes knowingly complicit in the perpetuation of the slave trade. Sudan — up to and through the genocide in Dafur — has been repeatedly remonstrated by UN officials and human rights NGOs for aiding and abetting slavery on a massive scale. See M Kaye Forced Labour in the 21st Century (2002) 3–4 ('In 1999, the United Nations Special Rapporteur on Human Rights in Sudan reported that militias, sometimes with the support of forces directly under the control of the Sudanese authorities, systematically raid villages, torch houses, steal cattle, kill men and capture women and children as war booty. These women and children, whether captured in the course of the civil war or as a result of longer term conflict between communities, are often taken to the North where they are forced to work either for their captors or sold on to other people. Many of the people enslaved in this way have been subjected to physical or sexual abuse . . . In June 2000, the ILO's Committee on the Application of Standards . . . expressed deep concern at continuing reports of abductions and slavery.') See also Report of the Working Group on Contemporary Forms of Slavery (1996) United Nations ESCOR [48th Session] paras 96–100; Preliminary Observations of the Committee on the Rights of the Child (1996) Committee on the Rights of the Child [3rd Session] at para 12. As of 1997, Mauritania was home to 90 000 descendants of slaves. These persons worked without compensation and were not free to marry or to educate their children without the consent of their owners. See E Burkett 'God Created Me To Be A Slave' The New York Times (12 October 1997) 56; 'Mauritania Country Report on Human Rights Practices for 2002' United States Department of State Country Reports on Human Rights (2003).

[5] Y Rassam 'Contemporary Forms of Slavery and the Evolution of Slavery and the Slave Trade under International Customary Law' (1999) 39 Virginia J of IL 303, 305 (Rassam compares the estimated 20 million slaves bartered in the Atlantic slave trade over 350 years with estimates of numbers currently in bondage.)

workers, agricultural workers and children are deeply entrenched, if not ineradicable, features of the South African landscape.

Domestic case law has yet to meaningfully engage these contemporary forms of bondage. However, a spate of recent legislation, the ratification of international instruments and a burgeoning body of foreign case law provide the requisite scaffolding for an emergent constitutional doctrine. This chapter marries this nascent jurisprudence on slavery, servitude and forced labour to recent fieldwork by government departments, academics and CBOs in an attempt to distinguish those economic, social and legal relationships that warrant constitutional censure from those pernicious practices that must be engaged in some other way.

64.2 Doctrinal Dilemmas

The Constitutional Court's corpus of dignity, equality, socio-economic rights, freedom and security of the person and customary law jurisprudence, as well as the foreign and international learning on slavery, servitude and forced labour, provide our exploration of FC s 13 with a substantial amount of traction. The absence of case law that engages FC s 13 directly means that much of our analysis remains speculative.

While the three conditions proscribed by the FC s 13 possess distinct content, the three terms do not lend themselves to the articulation of bright line rules. Each of these three terms can, with enough creativity, be used to challenge many a practice that might fit more comfortably within the ambit of one of the other terms. The concatenation — and the inevitable elision — of these three appellations has its uses. Read together 'slavery, servitude and forced labour' mark an entire spectrum of constitutionally suspect legal, social and economic practices: from those that rob human beings entirely of their physical autonomy to those that conspire to deny human flourishing through more subtle forms of exploitation. This last point suggests that the presence of a clear textual proscription of slavery means that one can, via the proscriptions on servitude and forced labour, attend in a somewhat more nuanced manner to coercive relationships that impair individual dignity even as they offer the illusion of autonomy.

The social practices most apt to satisfy the requisite desiderata for slavery, servitude and forced labour are those in which the state can remedy a problem by 'simply' ensuring that an individual's autonomy is not so readily violated. We are all justifiably naïve enough to believe that the state can eliminate sexual slavery by arresting the traffickers, end the servitude of women by withdrawing state sanction for lobola, and abolish forced labour by denying wardens the power to use work as a tool of prison discipline. But the trajectory of this injunction to free ourselves from the most pernicious forms of physical coercion leads, almost ineluctably, to a desire to rid our society of those practices that constrain us socially, psychologically, economically and emotionally. In short, our understanding of FC s 13 reflects the evolution of our polity from a night watchman state committed to ensuring freedom from undue interference with an individual's autonomy to a social welfare state that provides individuals with the material conditions of freedom to govern themselves and to shape meaningfully their lives.

This evolution of the right's extension creates a number of difficulties.

As we move away from degradation to optimalization, from brute force to more subtle forms of coercion, many state policies meant to further the common good attract constitutional scrutiny. Community service programmes often employ coercive practices that 'force' individuals to work for the common good. The state's emphasis on improving the material conditions of its citizens through such forced labour clashes with quite fundamental concerns about the extent to which the state can use individuals as mere means to further its ends. A right concerned, at bottom, with eliminating physical coercion and rather adamantine structures of domination may yet endorse remedies that rely upon intentional state-sponsored physical coercion. That the very same right can be both the disease and the cure demonstrates the extent to which our understanding of slavery, servitude and forced labour is bound up with contested notions of the common good.[1]

The synonymity and the alterity of the terms slavery, servitude and forced labour generates significant tension in attempts to expand the extension of the [1] Seemingly abstract inquiries as to how much we owe our fellow citizens have a direct bearing on very concrete legal findings with respect to slavery, servitude and forced labour. In the course of her now classic article, 'A Defence of Abortion', JJ Thomson asks us to imagine a world-renowned, but diabetic, violinist who requires the use of your kidneys — as a synechdoche for dialysis — in order to stay alive and to keep filling the world with her beautiful music. (1971) 1 Philosophy & Public Affairs 47. JJ Thomson claims, and I think that most of us would agree, that 'having a right to life does not guarantee having either a right to be given the use of or a right to be allowed continued use of another's body — even if one needs it for life itself.' Ibid at 56. You would be well within your rights to deny her such access. Few people believe human solidarity entitles others — especially strangers — to make this type of demand on our person. Most readers would consider such a coercive relationship to be exactly the kind of state of affairs that FC s 13 forbids. The point of this intuition pump, however, is not to force the reader to reflect upon 'easy' and 'obvious' cases of slavery, servitude and forced labour. Thomson's violinist-kidney-as-dialysis thought experiment is designed to force her readers to reconsider the relationship between a women and the foetus she carries. The thought experiment possesses the obvious virtue of eliminating arguments about whether or when a foetus counts as a person. The only question that remains is whether the foetus can demand, at any moment prior to viability, that the woman continue to carry her to term. A reader who agrees that the violinist has no right to demand use of the reader's kidneys in manner that radically curtails her physical autonomy is now asked to distinguish — if she can — ostensibly similar demands made on her behalf of a foetus with respect to the woman carrying it.

Clever as this institution pump may be, it begs as many important questions as it answers. Sure, criminal sanctions that force a woman to bring a foetus to term does look a lot like 'forced labour'. See § 64.3*(c)* infra. See also A Koppelman 'Forced Labour: A Thirteenth Amendment Defense of Abortion' (1990) 84 Northwestern University Law Review 480 (Argues that State cannot carry burden of justification for infringement of the right to be free of involuntary servitude because the State cannot prove that a foetus possesses the requisite indicia for personhood that would at least serve as the initial foundation for any justificatory exercise.) But what the violinist/ foetus analogy forces us to ask — and cannot answer — is exactly how much we owe to fellow members of our community? Progressive taxation schemes, social welfare programmes and other forms of both public and private insurance mediate the restribution of wealth in a manner that avoids charges of forced labour that direct redistribution would inevitably elicit (Few complain about taxes being used to build toilets; many would complain if they had to dig a pit latrine). With respect to many forms of redistribution — compulsory prison labour, community service requirements qua qualifications for entry into a profession and military conscription — there can be no masking of the coercion required to effect the desired end. To what extent are these programmes the moral and the constitutional equivalent of the provision of a kidney for the violinist and a womb for the foetus? See § 64.5*(f)*, (g) and (h) infra.

three discrete prohibitions beyond their easily cognisable core. Contemporary forms of 'slavery' that do not entirely offend our ethical sensibilities may not seem substantially different from the most pernicious forms of modern 'servitude'. A rather odious form of 'forced labour' may seem experientially equivalent to rather temperate manifestations of 'servitude'. So while we might prefer to plot along a single continuum all of FC s 13's suspect practices, the open texture of these three terms, and our inclination to prescribe the most obviously offensive practices captured by each of the three prohibitions, seems to militate against the creation of any such metric. We may find that FC s 13 produces the somewhat uncomfortable result of proscribing the lesser of two evils.

The economic exigencies of South African life place other kinds of limits on constitutional construction. All South African lawyers know that the language of the Final Constitution only requires that the state undertake reasonable steps to realize progressively various socio-economic rights.[1] Although the language of FC s 13 suggests that similar internal limitations ought not to read into FC s 13, we could still employ Grootboom–like criteria to determine under FC s 36 whether, say, the state had crafted a comprehensive programme to redress the problem of farm worker servitude. The real problem is this: structural employment is so high and so resistant to neo-liberal macro-economic policy interventions that only the most extravagant government programme may be able to manumit farm workers.[2] If this is so — and we do not wish to be misunderstood as maintaining such at this juncture — then it might well constrain our assessment as to whether or not the state has discharged its duty to eliminate all constitutionally suspect forms of slavery, servitude or forced labour. Put somewhat differently, the kinds of social conditions in an advanced western democracy that might lead us to declare unequivocally that a violation of FC s 13 has occurred might not warrant a similar assessment here: not because we are disinclined to view the conditions as morally deficient or constitutionally suspect, but because we lack currently the capacity to alter them.[3]

This last observation — with which some may well differ — is underwritten by a certain modesty that experience imposes upon constitutional lawyers. Much as we might like the courts to be engines of social change in the sevice of ends we believe noble and true, they lack the requisite authority to be bring about — on their own — radical transformation. Courts are good at the resolution of discrete disputes and putting parties on notice that they have not discharged their duties. What we try to

[1] See, eg, S Liebenberg 'Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 33; D Brand 'Food' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005)

[2] See § 64.6*(c)* infra, for an analysis of the conditions of farm workers in terms of FC s 13's prohibition of servitude.

[3] The ethically ambiguous condition of the slave identified by Hegel and Weber is also a central feature of South African liberation discourse. See M Weber 'Politics as Vocation' in HH Gerth & C Wright Mills (eds) Essays in Sociology (1988) 77, 120 ('[A]n ethic of responsibility, . . . [requires] one to give an account of the foreseeable results of one's action.') Consider Nelson Mandela's justification for the armed struggle: 'Without violence there would be no way open to the African people to succeed in their struggle against the principle of white supremacy. All lawful modes of expressing opposition to this principle had been closed by legislation, and we were placed in a position in which we had either to accept a permanent state of inferiority, or to defy the Government' — 'I am Prepared to Die' Statement from the Dock at the suggest in the following account is that many individuals — from prostitutes to prisoners, domestic workers to farm labourers, comfort women to conscriptees — toil in conditions of slavery, servitude and forced labour. Appropriately crafted FC s 13 challenges could put the government on notice that it needs to create comprehensive and coordinated programmes designed to restore the dignity of these individuals.

64.3 Drafting History

Despite the long history of legally-sanctioned physical, social and economic coercion in South Africa, the drafters of the Interim Constitution did not see fit to include a prohibition on slavery. Section 12 of the Interim Constitution read: 'No person may be subject to servitude or forced labour.'[1]

Advocates of a broader prohibition were fortunate to come away with the language of IC s 12.[2] The African National Congress ('ANC') initially proposed placing the above guarantee under the right to dignity.[3] The ANC's preferred rendering would have also carved out a number of express exceptions to 'forced labour'.[4] After much deliberation at the Multi-Party Negotiating Forum, both proposals were dropped.

During the drafting of the Final Constitution, several different formulations of the right were considered by the Constitutional Assembly.[5] The Technical Committee with responsibility for this right eventually decided to add slavery to the list of prohibited activities. That decision was ratified by the Constitutional Assembly.

64.4 Definitions

This section addresses the extension of each of the three terms found in FC

Opening of the Defence Case in the Rivonia Treason Trial, Pretoria Supreme Court (20 April 1964). Mandela's statement ratifies an ethic in which all persons are held accountable and sounds a cautionary note with regard to those who would make the state alone culpable for conditions of slavery, servitude and forced labour. Mandela understands that to do so robs entirely the individual — whether subordinated or subordinating — of the agency upon which any meaningful notion of citizenship is predicated. This account of agency is, it must be said, political, not metaphysical. See S Woolman & L Yu 'The Selfless Constitution: Flourishing & Experimentation as the Foundations of the South African State' (2006) 21 SA Public Law.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or 'Interim Constitution').

[2] Only on the most aridly textual reading would IC s 12's formulation have not prohibited slavery.

[3] See A Bill of Rights for a Democratic South Africa: Working Draft for Consultation (1991) 7 SAJHR 110. The Draft Bill was prepared by the Constitutional Committee set up by the ANC's National Executive Committee.

[4] The enumerated activities were: work carried out during a prison sentence; military or national service by a conscientious objector; services required in an emergency; and work required as part of normal civil obligations. This formulation of the exceptions to forced labour mirrors those exceptions found in many international human rights instruments. See § 64.4*(c)* infra.

[5] Submissions to the Constitutional Assembly by political parties, CBOs and other interested parties are housed at www.law.wits.ac.za.

s 13: 'slavery', 'servitude' or 'forced labour'.[1] Each subsection concludes with a working definition that delineates the ambit of the particular prohibition.

(a) Slavery

Article 1(1) of the Slavery Convention of 1926 reads:

> Slavery is the status or condition of a person over whom any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership are exercised.[2]

This gloss on 'slavery' means that a slave need not be subject to forced labour, or indeed, required to do any labour at all. The definition treats the bundle of entitlements that make up slave ownership much as we would treat any of the [1] However much the concepts of slavery, servitude and forced labour overlap and therefore over-determine the proscription of various practices, the distinction between the terms retains its relevance in times of national emergency. FC s 37(5), States of Emergency, reads in relevant part: 'No Act of Parliament that authorises a declaration of a state of emergency, and no legislation enacted or other action taken in consequence of a declaration, may permit or authorise '(c) any derogation from a section mentioned in column 1 of the Table of Non-Derogable Rights, to the extent indicated opposite that section in column 3 of the Table'. In terms of the table, the rights to be free from slavery and servitude remain non-derogable. Legislation passed in terms of FC s 37 may allow for some forms of forced labour.

Slavery and servitude may, on occasion be non-derogable. But are they non-amendable? The Constitutional Court has intimated that some provisions could be so fundamental, so 'basic' to the Final Constitution, that they may not be removed by constitutional amendment. See Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) at para 204 ('[T]here are certain features of the constitutional order so fundamental that even if parliament followed the necessary amendment procedures, it could not change them'); Premier of Kwa-Zulu Natal & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa 1996 (1) SA 769 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1361 (CC) at para 64 ('[A] purported amendment to the Constitution, following the formal procedures prescribed by the Constitution, but radically and fundamentally restructuring and re-organizing the fundamental premises of the Constitution might not qualify as an 'amendment' at all'); United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC) at para 17 (Basic structure argument foregrounded, but not dispositive.) The 'basic structure argument' poses at least three related formal problems for constitutional analysis: (1) the identification of those first 'principles' deemed so basic to our constitutional democracy that they cannot be altered, but not so basic as to have been declared immutable at the time the Final Constitution was drafted; (2) the presence of rules that can be amended by normal constitutional procedures but which are deemed so inextricably linked to the basic structure of constitutional democracy that they are, simultaneously, immune from amendment; and (3) the legitimacy of a judicial decision in which a court charged with securing compliance with the basic law refuses to enforce a textual provision of the basic law because a deeper non-textual source of basic law precludes it from doing so. For more on the extent to which a commitment to constitutional supremacy inevitably involves a justification for the basic law that goes beyond the text of the basic law, see F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11. For the technical differences between, and the numerical requirements for, the amendment processes established by FC ss 74(1) and 74(2), see S Budlender 'National Legislative Authority' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 17. See also Z Motola & C Ramaphosa Constitutional Law: Analysis and Cases (2002) 96 (Despite the obvious difficulties with the basic structure argument, the authors suggest that if some version of the argument were accepted, then the prohibition of slavery and servitude would be one of the provisions of the Final Constitution immune to amendment.)

[2] Slavery Convention (1926) 60 LNTS 253 (Ratified by South Africa on 18 June 1927).

entitlements of normal property ownership. Neither normal property ownership property nor slave ownership requires that the owner's entitlements be exercised.[1]

The standard notion of property rights as a bundle of discrete entitlements only does so much work with regard to this definition of slavery. The Convention's take on slavery does not contemplate disaggregating the bundle of entitlements in the self into 'slave-entitlements' and 'non-slave entitlements'.[2] It prohibits the ownership of any entitlement in another.[3] Moreover, the Convention's definition embraces those instances where the state of slavery is entered into voluntarily.[4]

The virtue of the Convention's definition is that it does not reduce slavery to 'a relatively limited and technical notion' dependent upon the 'destruction of the juridical personality.'[5] Too many contemporary forms of slavery would elude such a narrow construction.[6]

[1] J Asher 'How the United States is Violating International Agreements to Combat Slavery' (1994) 4 Emory International LR 215, 238-9 ('If the convention was aimed solely at pure slavery, the word 'any' would not have been included since chattel slavery was ownership of humans, pure and simple. The use of the word 'any' is a significant departure from chattel slavery. The word suggests that a person can be held in servitude or slavery so long as the 'employer' engages in any of the typical behaviours common to owners. Such behaviour could be as simple as keeping a person in place against his or her will.')

[2] Slave ownership qua property ownership entails the control of any aspect of a person's right to dispose of herself as she chooses — not just control over movement and commercial usage. C Argibay 'Sexual Slavery and the Comfort Women of World War II' (2003) 21 Berkeley J of IL 375, 375 ('Slavery is often equated with forced labor or deprivation of liberty; however, sexual autonomy is a power attaching to the right of ownership of a person, and controlling another person's sexuality is, therefore, a form of slavery.') See Prosecutor v Kunarac Application Nos IT-96-23-T and IT-96-23/1-T (Appeals Chamber ICTY, 12 June 2002), available at http://0-www.un.org.innopac.up.ac.za/icty/kunarac/appeal/judgement/kun-aj020612e.pdf (accessed on 15 January 2005)(Appeals Chamber of the ICTY considers 'control of sexuality' as a factor to be considered when determining whether the crime of enslavement was committed. The other factors listed are control of movement, control of physical environment, psychological control, measures to prevent escape, force or threat of force, duration assertion of exclusivity, cruel treatment and forced labour.) See also P Bridgewater 'Un/Re/Dis Covering Slave Breeding in Thirteenth Amendment Jurispudence' (2001) 7 Washington and Lee Race and Ethnic Ancestry Journal 11 (The use of people for reproduction constitutes 'involuntary servitude' under US Constitution, 13th Amendment.)

[3] Asher (supra) at 239.

[4] See Argibay (supra) at 379-80:

> Slavery is the antithesis of freedom. As a basic principle of the rule of law, freedom cannot be relinquished. It is not an exercise of paternalism to say that no one can consent to enslavement; it is fundamental to the nature of freedom itself. Freedom and equality under international law are based on a concept of the human being as free and able to fulfil his or her capabilities. Freedom requires protection of individual autonomy, respect for every person's potential and development, and the presence of enabling economic social and cultural conditions. Consent, to be valid, must be based on knowledge and sustained by reason and the ability to make free and informed choices. Consent is not valid when it is not knowingly and freely given; when there is deceptive or distorted information, or no information at all; when there is coercion, violence, or the threat thereof; when the victim is subject to inhumane and debilitating conditions, kept isolated from social support or denied the means of survival and without access to means of communication, assistance, or redress; or when there is exploitation of the victim's vulnerability. Consent is not free when the victim fears retaliation in the form of physical or mental abuse.

See also Rassam (supra) at 334, fn 141.

[5] M Bossuit Guide to the 'Travaux Preparatoires' of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1987) 167 as cited in Asher (supra) at 246.

[6] MC Bassiouni 'Enslavement as an International Crime' (1991) 23 New York University Journal of Law and Politics 445. Too narrow a definition of slavery also increases the pressure to broaden the meaning of 'servitude'. Bossuit (supra) at 167 ('[S]ervitude [is] a more general idea covering all possible forms of man's domination of man.') The danger with such a failsafe approach to slavery and servitude is that it

The difficulty with the Convention's definition is that it has the potential to draw too many complex relationships — from the workplace to the homestead to the bed — into its orbit. We should be able to say with confidence that control over another person's reproductive capacity or sexual activity reflects an abuse of a normal 'power of ownership', but that such incidental infringements of autonomy as 'curfew' for a teenager are not captured by our definition of slavery.

When then is the exercise of 'entitlements of ownership' of one person by another sufficient to trigger the protection afforded by FC s 13? Justice O' Regan's oft quoted dictum in Dawood provides a useful departure point:

> Human . . . dignity informs constitutional adjudication and interpretation at a range of levels. It is a value that informs the interpretation of many, possibly all, other rights. This Court has already acknowledged the importance of the constitutional value of dignity in interpreting rights such as the right to equality, the right not to be punished in a cruel, inhuman and degrading way, and the right to life. Human dignity is also a constitutional value that is of central significance in the limitations analysis. Section 10, however, makes it plain that dignity is not only a value fundamental to our Constitution, it is a justiciable and enforceable right that must be respected and protected. In many cases however, where the value of human dignity is offended, the primary constitutional breach occasioned may be of a more specific right such as the right to bodily integrity, the right to equality or the right not to be subjected to slavery, servitude or forced labour.[1]

One would like to be able to say that entitlements that would infringe the dignity of those over whom they are exercised (control of reproductive capacity) amount to slavery and those that do not infringe a person's dignity (curfew) do not amount to slavery. Unfortunately, the use of dignity as the linchpin for slavery analysis is not an entirely straightforward matter. The Dawood dictum intimates that it is the infringement of FC s 13 (slavery) that establishes an infringement of FC s 10 (dignity) — and not the other way around. This relationship reflects the first rule of South African dignity jurisprudence. Where a court can identify the infringement of a more specific right, FC s 10 will not add to the enquiry.[2]

However, the Dawood Court's characterization of dignity as a residual right that 'may' give expression to international human rights norms belies the heavy lifting that it actually does. In Ferreira, Justice Ackermann wrote:

> Human dignity cannot be fully valued or respected unless individuals are able to develop their humanity, their 'humanness' to the full extent of its potential. Each human being is seems to diminish the suffering associated with those kinds of bondage classified as servitude rather than those identified with the more invidious term slavery. While this definitional exercise may appear rather academic, its consequences are not. The eradication of contemporary forms of slavery is contingent on the priorities of law enforcement officials. Rassam (supra) at 349 (Arguing for a more inclusive definition that would enable historically disadvantaged groups to challenge oppressive social and economic practices under both domestic and international customary law.) Law enforcement officials tend to devote more time to crime that captures the imagination of politicians and the electorate.

[1] Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) ('Dawood') at para 35.

[2] Ibid.

> uniquely talented. Part of the dignity of every human being is the fact and awareness of this uniqueness. An individual's human dignity cannot be fully respected or valued unless the individual is permitted to develop his or her unique talents optimally. Human dignity has little value without freedom; for without freedom personal development and fulfilment are not possible. Without freedom, human dignity is little more than an abstraction. Freedom and dignity are inseparably linked. To deny people their freedom is to deny them their dignity.[1]

Dignity is meant to secure the space for self-actualisation.[2] (Self-actualisation describes a political and not a metaphysical state.) Dignity as the condition for self-actualisation can inform our understanding of slavery in number of ways.[3] Dignity qua slavery underwrites the proscription of those practices where the exercise of 'entitlements of ownership' in one person by another 'impair substantially' the ability of a person to develop optimally her unique talents.[4] The exercise of entitlements of ownership in the context of a curfew for persons below the

[1] Ferreira v Levin 1996 (1) SA 984, 1013-1014 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira') at para 49.

[2] The majority in Ferreira rejected Justice Ackermann's view that IC s 11(1) and FC s 12(1) contain a residual freedom right. Ibid at paras 170–185. The current Constitutional Court has, however, accepted Justice Ackermann's notion that dignity is meant to secure the space for self-actualisation. It is important to note that self-actualisation is not, on this account, realized through political participation, but rather through a commitment to negative liberty. Ferreira's dignity as freedom is developed in a long line of cases. See, eg, Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC); President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 41 ('[D]ignity is at the heart of individual rights in a free and democratic society'); National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at paras 28–30 (Court, finding the common law criminalization of sodomy a violation of the right to dignity, wrote: '[I]t is clear that the constitutional protection of dignity requires us to acknowledge the value and the worth of all individuals as members of society.' The language echoes Justice Ackermann's emphasis in Ferreira on the inextricable link between dignity and the need for individual freedom from state intervention. Individual freedom — negative liberty — thus becomes the foundation for dignity. Dignity, in turn, becomes the basis for equality.)

[3] The link between dignity and slavery is buttressed by the drafting history of the Final Constitution. See § 64.3 supra.

[4] While this distinction between curfews and concubines is fairly stark, it does not tell us when the exercise of entitlements of ownership in one person by another actually amounts to slavery. Again, the method of analysis that informs the construction of the constitutional norm of dignity can assist us in discriminating between conditions of slavery and non-slavery. Dignity, unlike equality, does not much depend on our ability to identify invidious differentiation between classes of persons. Dignity rests instead on the recognition of a core set of entitlements that are the necessary, if not sufficient, conditions for self-actualisation. For the most part, current South African dignity jurisprudence does not specify those positive goods that a person requires for self-actualisation. See Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)(Court finds violation of FC s 26 and grounds the entitlement to adequate housing in the right to dignity. But while Court describes the entitlements secured through socio-economic rights as essential components of a just political order because they are necessary for self-actualisation, it is loath to tell the government exactly how it should go about making provision of those goods.) Our extant dignity jurisprudence identifies an ever-expanding list of practices that prevent self-actualisation. The Constitutional Court has begun the compilation of this list by identifying those practices that are 'universally' accepted as ethically repugnant. Quite often the universe of these repugnant practices in international human rights documents consists of the aspirational, rather than actual. However, once the Constitutional Court imports a discrete international human rights norm into our municipal law, the stage is then set for the expansion of the list of repugnant practices. The Constitutional Court augments this list of internationally designated age of majority would not impair significantly the development of unique talents. The exercise of entitlements of ownership in the context of sexual trafficking and exploitation would.

Our dignity jurisprudence does more than merely proscribe the constitutionally repugnant practice. It also seeks to purge our legal system of all those rules of law that give aid and comfort to the repugnant practice. In Dawood, the Constitutional Court noted that it was not simply laws that prevented persons from entering into a married relationship that constituted an impairment of individual dignity. The Dawood Court concluded that 'any legislation that significantly impairs the ability of spouses to honour their obligations to one another would also limit that right.'[1] Given that the immigration laws under scrutiny in Dawood made it effectively impossible for the couples in question to cohabit, and that cohabitation forms a central part of a married relationship, immigration laws that significantly impaired the capacity of permanent residents to live with their spouses in South Africa were understood to constitute an unjustifiable limitation of the right to dignity.[2]

Assume that sexual trafficking was deemed to be a violation of the prohibition against slavery.[3] As we show below, where immigration legislation has the consequence of forcing sexual trafficking victims to choose between bondage and deportation, then the provision at issue may violate the prohibition against slavery.[4] To make the prohibition against slavery meaningful under these conditions repugnant — and now constitutionally infirm — practices by identifying analogous practices. So, for example, in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others the Constitutional Court held that statutory provisions that did not accord same-sex partners the same set of entitlements to permanent residence violate the right to dignity. 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC). In Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another, the Constitutional Court found that statutory provisions withholding spousal survivor benefits to the survivors of same-sex relationships were analogous to statutory provisions that did not accord same-sex partners the same set of entitlements to permanent residence. 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC). As a result, the refusal to grant spousal survival benefits to the survivors of same-sex relationships constitutes a violation of the right to dignity.

[1] Dawood (supra) at paras 35–7.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Human trafficking, forced prostitution, debt bondage, forced labour and exploitation of domestic workers are 'obvious candidates for inclusion in the term "modern forms of slavery".' Rassam (supra) at 320. Rassam offers two criteria, consistent with our own, when attempting to determine whether a practice qualifies as a modern form of slavery: (1) extreme direct physical or psychological coercion that gives an individual or the state control over every aspect of another person's life; and (2) the presence of state complicity in the practice or a failure to adequately enforce domestic laws prohibiting the practice. Ibid.

[4] See Bassiouni (supra) at 458–459. As Bassiouni observes, slavery-like practices operating under colour of law are relatively commonplace:

> Traffic in children for adoption, a lucrative operation which has grown significantly over the years, has resulted in a large number of children from Asia and Latin America being brought into North America and Western Europe. The lack of legislation and/or legal controls in the countries of origin or the possibility of evading the law in the destination countries has allowed these practices to continue under some color of law. . . . Technically, the child in this case is not a slave, but since the child has no physical control over his person and, in terms of legal capacity, no control over his treatment, for all intents and purposes such activity is slave-like. The primary reason for these still prevalent manifestations of slavery and related practices is that the basic legal element in international requires that a person prosecuted under immigration laws, after having escaped a slave-like state, possess a reasonably robust form of legal protection.[1]

Definition of Slavery

1. Slavery is the exercise by one person of any or all of another person's rights of ownership in her self. This definition does not contemplate disaggregating the bundle of entitlements in the self into the ownership of slave-entitlements and the ownership of non-slave entitlements. It prohibits the ownership of any entitlement in another.
2. Application of the term 'slavery' should be limited to those practices in which the exercise of entitlements of ownership of one person by another 'impair substantially' the ability of that original owner to pursue the development of 'her unique talents'.
3. A slave need not be subject to forced labour, or indeed, any labour at all to secure the protection of this prohibition.
4. A person may not consent, contra of or enter voluntarily a relationship of slavery. A person who so contracts or consents remains a slave for the purpose of FC s 13.
5. The prohibition of slavery proscribes those rules of law that directly and indirectly support the practice of slavery.

(b) Servitude

The Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade, and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery ('Supplementary Convention') provides a useful departure point for defining servitude.[2] Article 1 identifies the following prohibited practices as servitude (whether or not they are similarly captured in the Slavery Convention):

instruments on slavery is the total physical control by one person over another. Whenever the control is less than total, such as when it is partial and limited in time, it is removed from the system of protections developed by these international instruments.

See Bassiouni (supra) at 458–459.

[1] See § 64.6*(a)* infra (Analysis of the extent to which our immigration laws offend FC s 13.) See also S Drew 'Human Trafficking: A Modern Form of Slavery' (2002) 4 European Human Rights LR 481, 490 ('Organisations frequently state that an approach to human trafficking must be seen as human rights based. What this means in practice is that action against human trafficking must involve not only affirmation and enforcement of its illegality through the criminal law — which law acts to protect the interests of society — but positive protection of the rights of the adults and children who are trafficked. In adopting such a human rights based approach, any strategy to deal with human trafficking must involve legalisation in a number of senses. First, a degree of legalisation of the entry of unskilled labour is required since it is impossible to ignore that there is an association between restricting legal immigration and the recent growth in trafficking.')

[2] Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery (1956) 226 UNTS 3 (Not yet ratified by South Africa)('Supplementary Convention'). Although South Africa has not ratified this convention, it still reflects the international community's understanding of the concept of servitude and thereby informs our process of constitutional interpretation. See FC ss 232 and 233. See also J De Waal, I Currie & G Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (4th Edition, 2001) 265.

(a) Debt bondage, that is to say, the status or condition arising from a pledge by a debtor of his personal services or of those of a person under his control as security for a debt, if the value of those services reasonably assessed is not applied towards the liquidation of the debt or the length and nature of those services are not respectively limited and defined[1];

(b) Serfdom, that is to say, the condition or status of a tenant who is by law, custom or agreement bound to live and labour on land belonging to another person and to render some determinate service to such other person, whether for reward or not, and is not free to change his status;

(c) Any institution or practice whereby:

(i) A woman, without the right to refuse, is promised or given in marriage on payment of a consideration in money or in kind to her parents, guardian, family or any other person or group; or

(ii) The husband of a woman, his family, or his clan, has the right to transfer her to another person for value received or otherwise; or

(iii) A woman on the death of her husband is liable to be inherited by another person;

(d) Any institution or practice whereby a child or young person under the age of 18 years, is delivered by either or both of his natural parents or by his guardian to another person, whether for reward or not, with a view to the exploitation of the child or young person or of his labour.[2]

How does servitude differ from slavery? On our account, slavery consists in the exercise of the entitlements of ownership in a person (the slave) by another (the slave-master) and operates through the overt exercise of force or coercion. Servitude is dominion underwritten by 'law, custom or agreement'.[3] But neither law, nor custom or nor agreement ought to be construed to mean consent by the bondsman to her abject conditions. Consider the caste conditions of an 'untouchable' in India. Members of higher castes do not exercise rights of ownership. The untouchable appears to work 'voluntarily' for all those above her. However, she is not free to change her status as an untouchable because of the nature of the caste system. In sum, servitude is about status.[4]

In Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa, the Constitutional Court held that a provision of the Magistrates Court Act[5] that permitted incarceration

[1] Debt bondage or bonded labour occurs when persons work in conditions of servitude to pay off a debt. That debt is often incurred by another. Worse still, the debt is rarely paid off because of high interest rates charged by the 'lender/owner'. Debt bondage often looks like slavery not only because the debt becomes permanent but because the debt is often passed down to the next generation.

[2] See also Supplementary Convention, Article 7*(b)*: 'A person of servile status [is] a person in the condition or status resulting from any of the institutions or practices mentioned in article 1 of this Convention.'

[3] See W, X, Y & Z v The United Kingdom (1968) 11 Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights 562 (European Commission on Human Rights held that the inability of a minor to leave voluntary military service did not amount to servitude. The Commission did not, however, offer a definition of 'servitude'.)

[4] Ibid (Applicant argued that because servitude deals with the status of a person, objective characteristics such as gender, race and age are relevant to servitude analysis in ways that might not be not relevant when a court must engage in forced labour analysis.)

[5] Act 32 of 1944.

without trial of a civil debtor constituted an unjustifiable infringement of the right to freedom and security of the person.[1] Had the Coetzee Court not had IC s 11(1) upon which to rely, it could have characterized these civil imprisonment provisions as a species of servitude. The debtor was obliged to stay in prison because of his status — his inability to pay off a debt. The debtor's condition was not one in which the incidents of ownership were exercised by another. Moreover, his failure to remain solvent led to a further reduction in status: imprisonment. The Coetzee Court did away with these civil imprisonment provisions largely because incarceration for 'status' — and not crime — is out of step with contemporary mores.[2]

[1] 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC)('Coetzee'). IC s 11(1) read, in relevant part, as follows: '[E]very person shall have the right to freedom and security of the person, which shall include the right not to be detained without trial.'

[2] Ibid at paras 66–67. Sachs J wrote:

> The essence of civil imprisonment, even in its milder forms, has always been that the debtor pays with his or her body. The Afrikaans word gyselaar (hostage) comes from the contract recognised in Roman-Dutch law in terms of which a freeman pledged his person as suretyship for performance. . . . The broad question before us would be whether, in the open and democratic society contemplated by the Constitution, it could ever be appropriate to use imprisonment as a means of ensuring that creditors got paid in full, bearing in mind that the amount to be collected would often fall below the costs of collection, not to speak of the costs to the taxpayer of keeping the debtor in prison. It is evident from the statistical data presented to us that committal to prison is in reality mainly for relatively small amounts and largely for debt in respect of goods purchased, services rendered and money borrowed . . . The persons most vulnerable to committal orders would be precisely those who were unemployed, and thus could not be subject to emoluments orders, and those who did not have any property which could be attached. To penalise the workless and the poor so as to frighten those a little better-off would be exactly the kind of instrumentalising of human beings which the concept of fundamental rights was designed to rebut.

The line taken by the Coetzee Court is consistent with our view that since apartheid was consciously designed to result in both public and private forms of servitude, FC s 13 must, consequently, have as its target the elimination of all public and private manifestations of servitude.

The history of the Thirteenth Amendment of the US Constitution supports such a construction of FC s 13. The 13th Amendment was originally construed, though not necessarily intended, to apply only to state action. See The Slaughter-House Cases (1873) 83 US 36 (Limited 13th Amendment to prohibition of the institution of African slavery); The Civil Rights Cases (1883) 109 US 3, 24 (Court rejects proposition that social or private discrimination was an incident of slavery captured by the 13th Amendment.) According to most American legal historians, however, the drafters of the 13th Amendment understood that free blacks lived under conditions virtually identical to that of slaves. The Amendment was viewed by its proponents as a Declaration of Independence for former slaves — a constitutional guarantee that the emancipation brought about by the Civil War would ensure that all men are not only created equal, but would be treated as such. See J tenBroek 'Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States: Consummation to Abolition and the Key to the Fourteenth Amendment' (1951) 39 Cal L Rev 171, 179–180; D Colbert 'Challenging the Challenge: Thirteenth Amendment as a Prohibition Against the Racial Use of Peremptory Challenges' (1990) 76 Cornell L Rev 1, 33-34. Ultimately the US Supreme Court did extend the reach of the 13th Amendment to some forms of private conduct. See Bailey v Alabama (1911) 219 US 243 (State may not enforce laws that directly or indirectly result in compulsory service; whether a debt is voluntary or involuntary does not effect determination of whether servitude exists); US v Reynolds (1914) 235 US 133 (Statute assessed fines for criminal convictions which could be paid by a 3rd party and that convict was obliged to work for the surety for period determined by that court. US Supreme Court found that the constant threat of arrest and imprisonment for failure to pay timeously the 3rd party debt, turned the obligation to work into compulsory or forced labour designed to satisfy a debt, and thus a violation of the prohibition against servitude.)

Not all courts construe 'servitude' in a manner that engages the social status of a person.[1] In US v Kozminski, the US Supreme Court held that the Thirteenth Amendment prohibited only 'involuntary servitude enforced by the use or threatened use of physical or legal coercion.'[2] Such a cramped definition fails to capture the myriad ways in which social conventions radically constrain individual autonomy.[3] Prohibitions against servitude exist in order to disrupt social arrangements that perpetuate domination without overt resort to legal sanction or physical punishment. Contrary to the holding in Kozminski, the Final Constitution's prohibition against servitude is meant to roll back the quiet occupation of the body.

Definitions of Servitude

1. Broad definition: Servitude is about caste or status. Persons in conditions of servitude occupy a social station that does not allow them to alter the conditions of their existence. Persons in positions of servitude appear to work voluntarily for those above them. Servitude often appears voluntary because this form of dominion of man over man is underwritten by tradition, custom or agreement and not by a particular legal relationship of control of one person over another. Such tradition, custom or agreement refers to social understandings and not necessarily, to any consent by the bondsman to her abject conditions.
2. Narrow definition: Debt bondage occurs whenever a person is compelled to work in order to pay off a debt. However, the concept of involuntary servitude may embrace services rendered for reasons other than indebtedness.

[1] Early on, the United States Supreme Court found the extension of the term 'involuntary servitude' to be broader than that of slavery. See The Slaughter-House Cases (supra) at 69 ('[T]he word servitude is of larger meaning than slavery.') In Plessy v Ferguson, the Court wrote that involuntary servitude encompasses 'the control of the labour and the services of one man for the benefit of another, and the absence of a legal right to the disposal of his own person, property and services.' (1896) 163 US 537, 542.

[2] (1988) 487 US 931. See CM Page 'United States v Kozminski: Involuntary Servitude — A Standard At Last' (1989) 20 U of Toledo LR 1023; Asher (supra) at 252 (Criticizes Kozminski definition for falling short of international standards for servitude and argues for a more expansive definition). See also R Goluboff 'The 13th Amendment and the Lost Origins of Civil Rights' (2001) 50 Duke LJ 1609 (General analysis of 13th Amendment jurisprudence.)

[3] The US Supreme Court originally held that involuntary servitude (or 'peonage') existed only when the worker was forced to work in order to discharge a debt. See, eg, Clyatt v United States (1905) 197 US 207, 215 ('[T]he basic fact of [peonage] is indebtedness. . . . The essence of [peonage] is compulsory service in payment of a debt.') This narrow construction of servitude is consistent with the foundational nature of 'freedom of contract' in the US Supreme Court's jurisprudence at the turn of the 20th Century. See Lochner v New York (1905) 198 US 45. Peons, those labouring under conditions of involuntary servitude, could not contract to alienate freely their labour and enjoyed the protection of the 13th Amendment and the Peonage Act. The definition of 'involuntary servitude' expanded gradually to include services rendered for reasons apart from indebtedness.

(c) Forced Labour

Article 2(1) of the Forced Labour Convention of the International Labour Organization ('ILO') defines forced labour as follows:

> [A]ll work or service which is exacted from any person under the menace of any penalty and for which the said person has not offered himself voluntarily.[1]

FC s 13 prohibits expressly only forced labour. The loose denotation of this term — married to the equally loose constructions of slavery and servitude — might suggest that the extension of forced labour in FC s 13 embraces all forms of non-voluntary labour. That would constitute far too generous a reading. Not all non-voluntary labour is forced labour.

One form of non-voluntary labour that should not be considered forced labour is that which flows from a back-to-work order in the context of an industrial action. In Botswana Railways' Organization v Setsogo, the Botswana High Court held that although s 6(2) of the Botswana Constitution prohibits forced labour, s 6(3)(a) of the Botswana Constitution states that 'forced labour' does not include labour required in consequence of an order of court. As a result, a back-to-work order by a court during an industrial action does not constitute forced labour.[2] The rationale for the holding is as follows. The court is not compelling a party to work. No one has to obey the court order. The court is simply requiring the employer-employee relationship to continue as usual while the negotiations between the parties continue. Should an employee not wish to follow the court's back-to-work order, her behaviour is governed by the normal rules of employment. Should her absence be grounds for dismissal, any consequent termination cannot be attributed to the allegedly coercive background conditions of the court's order.[3]

The centripetal forces at work in Setsogo narrow our construction of 'forced labour'. But as several foreign courts have noted, centrifugal forces generate a broader construction.[4] The European Court of Human Rights ('ECHR Court')

[1] Convention Concerning Forced or Compulsory Labour (1932) ILO No 29, 39 UNTS 55 (Ratified by South Africa on 5 March 1997).

[2] (1995) BLR 758, 764.

[3] See, eg, South African Municipal Workers Union v Jada and Others 2003 (6) SA 294, 305 (W)(A general right to strike does not insulate parties participating in an unauthorized industrial action from the normal ramifications of a refusal to report. Failure to comply with the terms of the Labour Relations Act puts employees in legitimate danger of termination. The offer by the town council to arbitrate — provided the plaintiffs returned to work — and the plaintiffs' rejection of that offer was the ultimate cause for their dismissal.) For a more general discussion of the interaction between constitutional labour rights and the effects of a back-to-work order, see C Cooper 'Labour' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, August 2005) Chapter 53.

[4] In terms of s 48 of the Basic Conditions of Employment Act, forced labour is a criminal offence punishable by a fine and up to three years imprisonment. Act 75 of 1997 (Section 48 read with Section 93). Neither slavery nor servitude is subject to a similar statutory proscription. To the extent that a practice engages a labour relationship — and not a relationship of status — the term 'forced labour' in the Basic Conditions of Employment Act ought to capture incidents of slavery and servitude. The need to broaden the use of the term 'forced labour' in the Basic Conditions of Employment Act to cover incidents of slavery and servitude serves as a reminder that the terms slavery, servitude and forced labour mark a range of exploitative practices and that within this range of repugnant practices, the three terms can often be used interchangeably.

distinguishes forced labour from compulsory labout. That, distinction, however, is a function of the express language of the European Convention itself.[1] For the purposes of FC s 13 analysis, the ECHR's take on compulsory labour informs — or fleshes out — our understanding of forced labour. In Van der Mussele v Belgium, the ECHR Court depicts forced labour as a condition that 'brings to mind the idea of physical or mental constraint.'[2] It characterizes compulsory labour as work done 'against the will of the person' and 'under the menace of any penalty.'[3] Labour — forced or compulsory — is not limited to physical or manual labour. Moreover, forced labour and compulsory labour can be compensated or uncompensated. The mere fact of compensation does not affect the attribution of 'force' or 'compulsion'.[4] Furthermore, work entered into voluntarily but which a person is compelled to continue may amount to forced labour. After establishing these various parameters, the Van der Mussele Court concluded that legislation requiring aspirant attorneys to accept a certain number of pro bono clients as a conditon for entry into the legal profession did not constitute unjustifiable forms of forced labour and compulsory labour.[5]

In W, X, Y & Z v The United Kingdom, the European Commission on Human Rights ('ECHR Commission') became a forum for debate about the degree of degradation associated with slavery, servitude and forced labour. The applicants contended that 'it is wrong to conclude that [either] slavery or servitude constitute a more oppressive condition' than forced.[6] While slavery and servitude are 'condition[s] different conceptually from forced labour, the applicants averred, they 'may or may not be more oppressive.'[7] The ECHR Commission accepted the applicants' argument that it is the lived experience of slavery or forced labour that determines how oppressive the condition is and not its classification. The ECHR

[1] Article 4.

[2] (1984) 6 EHRR 163, 183.

[3] Ibid. The European Commission on Human Rights and the European court on Human Rights have a fairly well-developed forced labour jurisprudence. See, eg, X v Federal Republic of Germany (1978) 17 Yearbook of the European Conventionon Human Rights 148 (Pro bono services required of lawyer); Gussenbauer v Austria (1975) 15 Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights 448 (Pro bono services required of lawyer); Van Droogenbroeck v Belgium (1892) 4 EHRR 443 (Prison labour); W, X, Y & Z v The United Kingdom (supra) (Inability of minors to leave voluntary military service); Grandruth v Federal Republic of Germany (1967) 10 Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights 626 (Refusal of Jehovah to witness to perform community service); Iversen v Norway (1963) 6 European Yearbook of the European Convention of Human Rights 327 (Dentist sent to remote part of country to practice.) See also R Gordon, T Ward & T Eicke The Strasabourg case law: Leading Cases from the European Human Rights Reports (2001) 197–207 and A Naidu 'The Right to be Free from Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour' (1987) 20 *CILSA*108, 111–3.

[4] Van der Mussele (supra) at 173, 177.

[5] For a more detailed discussion of Van der Mussele in the context of community service reqirements for entry into a profession, see § 64.5*(g)* infra.

[6] W, X, Y & Z (supra) at para 9.

[7] Ibid.

Commission also agreed with the applicants' assertion that military service could amount to forced labour.[1]

Similarly, the Indian Supreme Court has noted that forced labour is often a function of other social conditions just as apt to exhaust individual identity as slavery and servitude. In People's Union for Democratic Rights & Others v Union of India & Others, the Indian Supreme Court, in concluding that any work done for less than the minimum wage amounts to forced labour, wrote:

> [I]t may be physical force which compels a person to provide labour or service to another or it may even be compulsion arising from hunger or poverty, want and destitution. Any factor which deprives a person of a choice of alternatives and compels him to adopt a particular course may properly be regarded as 'force' and if labour or service is compelled as a result of such 'force' it would be 'forced labour'.[2]

The virtue of such a broad definition of forced labour under FC s 13 would be that it would enable South African courts to engage effectively such problems as trafficking, child labour, farm labour and domestic labour. The danger is that such a definition of forced labour casts too wide a net and captures labour relations that we would not, as yet, wish to view as constitutionally infirm.

For us the critical heuristic distinction is that limited options and demeaning work alone are necessary, but not sufficient, conditions, for a constitutional finding of forced labour. Forced labour only occurs where the employer uses the existence of limited options and demeaning work to abuse her employees. Objective manifestations of such abuse include sub-minimum wage remuneration and horrific working conditions. So even though a person may enter 'voluntarily' into demeaning work, she may still have her dignity impaired by (a) the demeaning nature of the work and (b) her inability to insist on better conditions or better pay. Conversely, a person forced physically or forced by menace of penalty to do 'good' work on behalf of the commonweal has her dignity impaired when she loses complete control over her labour. The presence of either set of conditions will support a finding of forced labour.

[1] W, X, Y & Z (supra) at 596 ('[A]lthough [servitude and forced labour] must in fact often overlap, they cannot be treated as equivalent.') For all the conceptual overlap of the three terms, the Final Constitution does appear to take slavery and servitude somewhat more seriously than forced labour. See § 64.3 supra (Discussion of non-derogation.) FC s 37 permits forced labour in states of emergency. Slavery and servitude are non-derogable.

[2] [1983] 1 SCR 456, 491 (Workers were paid substantially below minimum wage for their work and were obliged to accept employment). See also Van der Mussele (supra) at 174-5 (ECHR Court found that a person who voluntarily took up a profession could still claim that community service performed in order to secure admittance to the profession constitutes forced labour.)

Definition of forced labour:
1. Forced labour is all work or service: (a) exacted from any person under the menace of any penalty or by dint of physical force and (b) for which the said person has not offered himself voluntarily.
2. Forced labour is not limited to physical or manual labour.
3. Forced labour can be compensated or uncompensated.
4. Work entered into voluntarily, but which a person is forced to continue, may amount to forced labour.
5. Forced labour denotes those labour practices where an employer is able to exploit an employee's radically constrained options in order to induce her to work for pay and in circumstances that fall far below acceptable labour standards. Such unacceptable standards may mean sub-minimum wage pay, or horrific working conditions, or both.
6. FC s 13 contains no internal modifiers with respect to forced labour. All exceptions to the definition of forced labour must be justified. Some generally accepted exceptions include: (a) normal civic obligations; (c) military service; (d) national service by a conscientious objector; (e) community service required in an emergency.

64.4 International Law Obligations

(a) Customary international law

The prohibition of slavery is an obligation erga omnes under international customary law.[1] It may have even acquired the status of jus cogens[2], As Rassam writes:

> [E]very state has illegalized institutionalized slavery and the slave trade and no state dares assert that it does not have an international legal obligation to outlaw slavery and the slave trade.[3]

Slavery, as an international crime, attaches individual criminal liability to private persons irrespective of state involvement or the location of the crime. It also creates the basis for universal jurisdiction.[4] The reach of the enabling legislation for the International Court of Justice[5] and the International Criminal

[1] See Case Concerning the Barcelona Traction Light and Power Company (Belgium v Spain) (1970) ICJ Reports 3.
[2] See J Dugard International Law: A South African Perspective (2nd Edition, 2000) 40.
[3] Rassam (supra) at 311.
[4] Bassiouni (supra) at 454.
[5] See Statute of the International Court of Justic, Article 36 (2)(a)-(c)(Gives the court the power to decide disputes concerning 'the interpretation of a treaty', 'any question of international law' and 'the existence of any fact, which if established, would constitute a breach of an international obligation.')

Court,[1] when read together with FC ss 231 and 232, place South Africa's obligation to enforce FC s 13's prohibition of slavery beyond doubt.[2]

(b) General conventions

The Slavery Convention imposes on South Africa as a state party the positive obligation to 'bring about, progressively and as soon as possible, the complete abolition of slavery in all its forms.'[3]

South Africa recently ratified the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children ('Palermo Protocol').[4] The Palermo Protocol requires all state parties to criminalize trafficking in persons.[5] The Protocol's broad definition of trafficking[6] and the removal of consent of the victim as a bar to prosecution[7] ought to augment our existing taxonomy of slavery, servitude and forced labour.

The International Labour Organization ('ILO') Forced Labour Convention obliges all state parties to abolish forced labour[8] and to criminalize and to prosecute any occurrences of it.[9] The ILO Abolition of Forced Labour Convention requires

[1] Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, Article 7(1)(c), UN Doc. A/CONF.183/9, 2187 UNTS 90 (Ratified by South Africa on 27 November 2000).

[2] FC s 231(4) reads, in relevant part: 'Any international agreement becomes law in the Republic when it is enacted into law by national legislation; but a self-executing provision of an agreement that has been approved by Parliament is law in the Republic unless it is inconsistent with the Constitution or an Act of Parliament.' FC s 232 reads, in relevant part: 'Customary international law is law in the Republic unless it is inconsistent with the Constitution or an Act of Parliament.' For more on the role of international law under the Final Constitution, see K Hopkins & H Strydom 'International Law and Agreements' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2005) Chapter 30.

[3] Slavery Convention (1926) 60 LNTS 253, Article 2 (Ratified by South Africa on 18 June 1927).

[4] Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, Supplementing the United Nations Convention Against Transnational Organized Crime (2000) UN Doc. A/55/383 (Ratified by South Africa on 20 February 2004).

[5] Article 5(1). Article 5(2) further requires the criminalization of (a) attempted trafficking, (b) acting as an accomplice to trafficking, and (c) organizing or directing trafficking. The South African Law Commission's recent report on trafficking anticipates legislative enactment of the Protocol in domestic law within the next few years. South African Law Commission Report Trafficking in Persons (2004) Issue Paper 25, Project 131.

[6] Article 3*(a)* reads as follows: 'For the purposes of this Protocol: (a) 'Trafficking in persons' shall mean the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons, by means of the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, of abduction, of fraud, of deception, of the abuse of power or of a position of vulnerability or of the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person for the purpose of exploitation. Exploitation shall include at a minimum, the exploitation of the prostitution of others or other forms of sexual exploitation, forced labour or services, slavery or practices similar to slavery or the removal of organs.' See § 64.6*(a)* infra for a detailed discussion of sexual slavery and human trafficking.

[7] Article 3*(b)* reads as follows: 'The consent of a victim of trafficking in persons to the intended exploitation set forth in subparagraph (a) of this article shall be irrelevant where any of the means set forth in subparagraph (a) have been used.'

[8] Convention Concerning Forced or Compulsory Labour (1932) ILO No 29, 39 UNTS 55, arts 10, 18 (Ratified by South Africa on 5 March 1997).

[9] Ibid at arts 1, 4, 5, 10, 18 and 25.

states to 'suppress and not to make use of any form of forced or compulsory labour.'[1] Prohibitions on forced labour with respect to children can be found in the Convention on the Rights of the Child[2] and the ILO Convention on the Worst Forms of Child Labour.[3]

(c) Human rights instruments

Most international human rights instruments prohibit both slavery and servitude. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights prohibits slavery[4] and protects everybody's right to 'free choice of employment'.[5] The African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights prohibits slavery and the slave trade.[6] The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights[7], the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms[8] and the Inter-

[1] (1959) ILO No 105, 320 UNTS 291, Article 1 (Ratified by South Africa on 5 March 1997).

[2] (1989) UN Doc A/44/49 (Ratified by South Africa on 16 June 1995). Article 32 requires states to 'recognize the right of the child to be protected from economic exploitation and from performing work that is likely to be hazardous.'

[3] Convention concerning the Prohibition and Immediate Action for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (1999) ILO No 182, 38 ILM 1207 (Ratified by South Africa on 19 November 2000). Article 1 states: 'Each member which ratifies this Convention shall take immediate and effective measures to secure the prohibition and elimination of the worst forms of child labour as a matter of urgency.' (Our emphasis.)

[4] Article 4.

[5] Article 23.

[6] Article 5. The African Commission on Human and Peoples Rights has heard only one such complaint. See SOS Esclaves v Mauritania 198/97 (1997)(Complaint was found to be inadmissible.) The Commission then considered the state of slavery in Mauritania in its Tenth Annual Activity Report. It found that contrary to the contentions of the NGO representing the SOS slaves that there remained only vestiges of slavery and that the government was complying with its obligations to abolish all forms of slavery. 'Tenth Activity Report of the African Commission' in R Murray & M Evans (eds) Documents of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights (2001) 546-50. That account appears inconsistent with other cotemporaneous accounts of slavery in Mauritania. See § 64.1 supra.

[7] Article 8 reads, in relevant part, as follows:

No one shall be held in slavery; slavery and the slave-trade in all their forms shall be prohibited. 2. No one shall be held in servitude. 3. (a) No one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labour; (b) Paragraph 3 (a) shall not be held to preclude, in countries where imprisonment with hard labour may be imposed as a punishment for a crime, the performance of hard labour in pursuance of a sentence to such punishment by a competent court; (c) For the purpose of this paragraph the term 'forced or compulsory labour' shall not include: (i) Any work or service, not referred to in subparagraph (b), normally required of a person who is under detention in consequence of a lawful order of a court, or of a person during conditional release from such detention; (ii) Any service of a military character and, in countries where conscientious objection is recognized, any national service required by law of conscientious objectors; (iii) Any service exacted in cases of emergency or calamity threatening the life or well-being of the community; (iv) Any work or service which forms part of normal civil obligations.

[8] Article 4 reads as follows:

(1) No one shall be held in slavery or servitude. (2) No one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labour. (3) For the purposes of this article the term 'forced or compulsory labour' shall not include: (a) any work required to be done in the ordinary course of detention imposed according to the provisions of Article 5 of this convention or during conditional release from such detention; (b) any service of a military character or, in the case of conscientious objectors in countries where they are recognised, service exacted instead of compulsory military service; (c) any service exacted in case of an emergency or amity threatening the life or well-being of the community; (d) any work or service that forms part of normal civic obligations.'

American Convention on Human Rights[1] all contain similar provisions that prohibit slavery and servitude tout court and most instances of forced labour. The prohibition on forced labour is generally subject to the following exceptions: (a) work done during lawful detention; (b) military service; (c) service in case of emergency or calamity; and (d) normal civic obligations.[2]

64.6 Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour in Context

(a) Sexual slavery and human trafficking

At least 800 000 to 900 000 people are trafficked annually around the globe.[3] Human trafficking stands third on international organized crime's year-end earnings list — after drugs and armaments — at $7 billion.[4]

While hard data on the actual scale of human trafficking for the purposes of

[1] Article 6 reads as follows:

(1) No one shall be subject to slavery or to involuntary servitude, which are prohibited in all their forms, as are the slave trade and traffic in women. (2) No one shall be required to perform forced or compulsory labour. This provision shall not be interpreted to meant that in those countries in which the penalty established for certain crime is deprivation of liberty or forced labour, the carrying out of such a sentence imposed by a competent court is prohibited. Forced labour shall not adversely affect the dignity or the physical or intellectual capacity of the prisoner. (3) For the purposes of this article, the following do not constitute force or compulsory labour: (a) work or service normally required of a person imprisoned in execution of a sentence or formal decision passed by the competent judicial authority. Such work or service shall be carried out under the supervision and control of public authorities, and any persons performing such work or service shall not be placed at the disposal of any private party, company or juridicial person; (b) military service and, in countries in which conscientious objectors are recognised, national service that the law may provide for in lieu of military service; (c) service extracted in time of danger or calamity that threatens the existence or well-being of the community; or *(d)*work or service that forms part of normal civic obligations.

See IACHR Report on the Situation of Human Rights in Panama (1978)(The Inter-American Commission on Human Rights reviews allegations of unfair prison labour.) See also S Davidson 'The Civil and Political Rights Protected in the Inter-American Human Rights System' in DJ Harris & S Livingstone (eds) The Inter-American System of Human Rights (1998) 231-2.

[2] The Constitutional Assembly, in line with these international instruments, considered including these four exceptions. It eventually rejected them in favour of a crisp construction of FC s 13. Although the grounds for not incorporating these internal qualifiers is unclear, this silence should not be read to mean that the Final Constitution regards any of these 'unlisted' practices either as a prima facie abrogation of or a permissible limitation of FC s 13. The drafters' decision to leave FC s 13 open-ended permits the courts to respond to ever-evolving understandings of slavery, servitude and forced labour and the novel exigencies that might demand the relaxation of the section's prohibitions. See § 64.3 supra.

[3] US Department of State 'Trafficking in Persons Report: Trafficking Victims Protection Act of 2000' (2003) 7.

[4] J M Maciej, M Pieczkowski & B van Vuuren-Smyth 'Seduction, Sale and Slavery: Trafficking in Women and Children for Sexual Exploitation in Southern Africa' International Organization for Migration, Regional Office for Southern Africa (3rd Edition, 2003) 16 ('IOM Trafficking Report') quoting FT Miko 'Trafficking in Women and Children: The US and International Response' Congressional Research Service Report 98-649 C (2000), available at www.iom.org.za/Reports/TraffickingReport3rdEd.pdf, (accessed on 25 December 2004).

sexual exploitation in South Africa remains limited,[1] recent reports from the International Organization for Migration ('IOM') and South African Law Commission ('SALC')[2] provide a fairly comprehensive, if grim, picture of South African-based trafficking activities. The IOM and the SALC both note that while South Africa serves as both source and transit hub for sexual trafficking activities, it functions primarily as a final market for tens of thousands of women and children.[3] Terms such as 'source', 'transit hub', 'market' and 'organized crime' mask the brutality of an 'industry' whose one and only good is rape. Moreover, the use of such terms as 'prostitution' shifts responsibility for the repeated rape

[1] South African Police Service Child Protection Unit statistics suggest that some twenty-eight thousand children are trafficked for the purposes of commercial sexual exploitation in South Africa's cities. However, even the SAPS acknowledges the inevitability of underreporting in this setting. See K Fitzgibbon 'Modern Day Slavery: The Scope of Trafficking in Africa' (2003) 12(1) African Security Review 81, 83.

[2] South African Law Commission Report Trafficking in Persons (2004) Issue Paper 25, Project 131 ('SALC Trafficking Paper').

[3] Ibid at 11. Most women and children sold into sexual slavery in South Africa are refugees from around the continent. The remainder of South African sex slaves are sourced primarily from Lesotho, Mozambique, Malawi, Thailand, China; and Eastern Europe. The methods of conniving and coercion employed to 'recruit' women and children to South Africa are as varied as their source. Some are enticed by promises of better jobs or marriage. Others are abducted. But perhaps the most distressing fact of all is that most are sold down the river by members of their family. M Songololo The Trafficking of Children for Sexual Exploitation (2000) 11; IOM Trafficking Report (supra) at 16, 65.

Refugees from other African countries already in South Africa often arrange for close female relatives to join them. Once these women receive asylum-seeker status, their male relatives force them into prostitution. The victims are generally unable to speak the language, do not know the lay of the land and face unsympathetic, if not exploitative, immigration officials. Even when women are able to overcome these impediments, an extensive criminal network often tracks down and recaptures them. The fortunate few able to access the law are then placed in the unenviable position of choosing between deportation to an inhospitable home or remaining 'enslaved' but 'with' their family. Ibid at 20-34. The Lesotho-South Africa slave trade takes the following form. Boys and girls as young as 13 are abducted, or lured, from the streets of Maseru or other border towns. They are taken to private homes in nearby Free State towns where they are repeatedly raped for extended periods. These children are often returned to Lesotho or simply abandoned. The IOM report contends that the brazen nature of this practice reflects high degrees of police and immigration official complicity. Ibid at 34-47. Approximately 1000 Mozambiquan girls and women are trafficked annually in South Africa. Ibid at 63. Some young girls are actively recruited with promises of a lucrative job in a big South African city. Others are picked up at taxi ranks while searching for a lift. After crossing the border illegally, most are subjected to an 'initiation' — rape — at transit houses near the border. The girls are then sold as 'wives' to men on the mines in the West Rand for R650 — see § 64.6*(b)*(ii) infra — or to South African brothels for R1000. Ibid at 47-64. The trafficking of girls and women from Malawi is underwritten by a custom called kuhaha. Ibid at 65. This set of coercive sexual initiation practices — intended to drive young women into early marriage — make young Malawi women particularly vulnerable to South African truckers and Malawian businesswomen who promise them jobs and marriage in South Africa. Most are raped en route. They are then sold to a brothel or retained as personal sex-slaves and rented out to friends. Ibid at 64-7, 85-93. Almost 1000 Thai women and girls are tricked each year into coming to South Africa with promises of high-wage restaurant work. Upon arrival, these women are auctioned off at restaurants for R15 000 to R25 000, have their passports confiscated, kept in closely guarded private homes in Johannesburg and are then forced into sex work to repay their 'debt'. Ibid at 93-108. Chinese Triads bring young women into South Africa to work in exclusive and well-known Chinese clubs. Most of these victims are relatively well-educated and have been convinced that a legitimate market exists for their skills. As with most cases of such bondage, 'debts' of R75 000 make discharge almost impossible. Ibid at 108-123.

of women and children from the criminals engaged in this 'trade' to the women and children themselves.[1] Such legal obfuscation of what would — in times of war — be described as crimes against humanity conceals the high degree of state complicity that makes this most ancient and yet coetaneous form of chattel slavery possible. So while the disturbing prevalence of human trafficking in Southern Africa is variously attributed to extreme poverty, unemployment, war, lack of food[2] and traditional practices that commodify women and make their sale acceptable,[3] such 'causes' are really no more than enabling conditions. They only make trafficking easier. The demand for sex-workers, the existence of organized criminal syndicates and the failure of legal imagination and political will drive the South African market.[4]

S v Jordan & Others evinces just such a failure of legal imagination.[5] In Jordan, the Constitutional Court rejected equality, dignity, privacy and freedom of profession challenges to provisions of the Sexual Offences Act that criminalize prostitution.[6] The majority reasoned as follows:

> If the public sees the recipient of reward as being 'more to blame' than the 'client', and a conviction carries a greater stigma on the 'prostitute' for that reason, that is a social attitude and not the result of the law. The stigma that attaches to prostitutes attaches to them, not by virtue of their gender, but by virtue of the conduct they engage in. That stigma attaches to female and male prostitutes alike. I am not persuaded by the argument that gender discrimination exists simply because there are more female prostitutes than male prostitutes just as I would not be persuaded if the same argument were to be advanced by males accused of certain crimes, the great majority of which are committed by men.[7]

The majority's very strong commitment to a form of metaphysical autonomy that makes all individuals morally and legally culpable for those actions that issue ineluctably from their circumstances fails dramatically the victims of sexual trafficking. Sexual trafficking is about the sale and exploitation of women and female children — of people who have little chance, and no choice, in life's wheel of fortune. Jordan has nothing to say about state complicity in a legal regime that condones institutionalised rape. Perhaps this characterization of Jordan's weltanschauung seems unfair. We think the majority judgment speaks for itself:

[1] See C Argibay 'Sexual Slavery and the Comfort Women of World War II' (2003) 21 Berkeley J of IL 375, 386-7 ('[T]he terms 'prostitute' and 'prostitution' reflect profoundly discriminatory attitudes toward women, the situation of [victims of trafficking] is more accurately termed "sexual slavery" rather than "forced prostitution". "Forced prostitution" reflects the male view; "sexual slavery" reflects the victim's view.')

[2] IOM Trafficking Report (supra) at 15-21.

[3] SALC Trafficking Paper (supra) at 27-28.

[4] See B Balos 'The Wrong Way to Equality: Privileging Consent in the Trafficking of Women for Sexual Exploitation' (2004) 27 Harvard Women's LJ 137. Balos argues that customers buy victims of trafficking mainly as an exercise in power that invariably results in the objectification of the woman involved. Article 9(5) of the Palermo Protocol requires state parties to 'adopt or strengthen legislative or other measures, such as educational, social or cultural measures, including through bilateral and multilateral cooperation, to discourage the demand that fosters all forms of exploitation of persons, especially women and children, that leads to trafficking.' Although such measures can be legislated, whether they can be effectively implemented is unclear.

[5] 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC)('Jordan').

[6] Sexual Offences Act 23 of 1957, s 20(1)(aA).

[7] Jordan (supra) at paras 16-17.

> It was accepted that they have a choice but it was contended that the choice is limited or 'constrained'. Once it is accepted that [the criminalization of prostitution] is gender-neutral and that by engaging in commercial sex work prostitutes knowingly attract the stigma associated with prostitution, it can hardly be contended that female prostitutes are discriminated against.[1]

The minority, although sympathetic, offers more of the same:

> Their status as social outcasts cannot be blamed on the law or society entirely. By engaging in commercial sex work, prostitutes knowingly accept the risk of lowering their standing in the eyes of the community. In using their bodies as commodities in the marketplace, they undermine their status and become vulnerable.[2]

The Jordan majority and minority's approach may hold in the context of some 'voluntary' forms of prostitution. It cannot be applied, without real violence being done to the word 'voluntary', to victims of trafficking and sexual slavery.[3]

The language of many international instruments also obscures the two-fold nature of this crime. Article 3*(a)* of the Palermo Protocol states that trafficking is proscribed when it occurs for one of the following purposes: 'exploitation of

[1] See Jordan (supra) at para 16 (emphasis added)(How and why knowing that stigma attaches to a practice or an event — that takes place under conditions of duress and compulsion — creates culpability remains unclear.)

[2] Ibid at para 66 (Sachs and O'Regan JJ)(emphasis added). As one of the authors has written elsewhere, all of us gainfully employed, constitutional court judges included, commodify our bodies in exchange for remuneration. S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 44.3*(c)*(ix).

[3] A recent judgment hints at a way out of the Constitutional Court's autonomy bind. See Khosa v Minister of Social Development; Mahlaule v Minister of Social Development 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC). In Khosa, the Constitutional Court found unconstitutional, as a violation of both FC s 9 and FC s 27 (1), the exclusion of permanent residents from the classes of person entitled to a variety of social security grants: old age, disability, veterans, child-support and foster care. Mokgoro J writes:

> The exclusion of permanent residents in need of social-security programmes forces them into relationships of dependency upon families, friends and the community in which they live, none of whom may have agreed to sponsor the immigration of such persons to South Africa. . . . Apart from the undue burden that this places on those who take on this responsibility, it is likely to have a serious impact on the dignity of the permanent residents concerned who are cast in the role of supplicants.

Ibid at 76. Mokgoro J could well have added that permanent residents are, as supplicants, not merely dependent on family members, but quite literally at their mercy. Sex slaves — prostitutes — would consider themselves fortunate to be supplicants. They are not just excluded from the protection of the law. Many prostitutes, as we noted above, do not speak the language, do not know the lay of the land, do not have the resources to engage corrupt immigration officials or to escape criminal syndicates. Many are enslaved by their own family. The point is not that sex slaves are excluded from some particular benefit to which another class of persons is entitled. Khosa stands for the broader proposition that FC s 7(2) places the state under an obligation to protect and to fulfil the rights of all persons in South Africa. As the Khosa Court rightly recognizes, legal regimes that offer incentives to become members of the political community but that punish persons who cannot act on such incentives — by withholding benefits or through incarceration — are perverse. These disincentives deny the affected person exactly that which the state is obliged to provide. The Khosa Court indicates that where all meaningful choice is extinguished, the state bears a much greater burden with respect to the entitlements of the persons within its midst. For children, the aged and the disabled, the inability to work underwrites their claim for state support. The current inability of sex slaves to liberate themselves requires the creation of a comprehensive and coordinated state programme designed to realize their emancipation.

the prostitution of others or other forms of sexual exploitation, forced labour or services, slavery or practices similar to slavery, servitude or the removal of organs.'[1] No South African jurist ought to lose sight of the fact that trafficking in persons or their parts is, in itself, a violation of FC s 13.[2] That this sale of human flesh is married to a state-enabled,[3] and thus acceptable, form of rape,[4] simply makes it the most abhorrent form of contemporary slavery.[5]

The IOM and the SALC reports suggest that the conditions of sale of women and children for sexual exploitation in South Africa easily satisfy the criteria for trafficking set out in the Palermo Protocol.[6] However, the Protocol's pre-

[1] See SALC Trafficking Paper (supra) at 18-21 (Identifies adoption, forced marriage and domestic work as practices that could qualify as exploitation.)

[2] See F Gold 'Redefining the Slave Trade: The Current Trends in the International Trafficking of Women' (2003) 11 University of Miami International and Comparative LR 99, 100 (Gold explains the conditions that reinforce this practice in terms of the objectification of the victim: '[The victims] know their own purchase price, and understand that the purchaser demands strict obedience, and will ensure such behaviour through coercive tactics. The height of objectification is illustrated by the women's belief that it is the employer's ultimate right to resell the women at the employer's discretion.')

[3] State complicity may take the form of a failure to adequately enforce domestic laws prohibiting the practice. See Rassam (supra) at 320.

[4] See Argibay (supra) at 375. See § 64.4*(a)* supra (Definition of slavery).

[5] While the nature and the extent of suffering in the sex trade itself may vary, sexual trafficking must be understood in terms of both slavery and rape. No meaningful volition exists. The absence of volition in the context of sex is rape. See NK Katyal 'Men Who Own Women: A Thirteenth Amendment Critique of Forced Prostitution' (1993) 103 Yale LJ 791, 826 ('If forced prostitutes today are not slaves, then neither was half of the Southern black population in 1850.') See also Gold (supra) at 101('[E]ven the term voluntary is contentious because most women who engage in prostitution do so as a result of their own particular financial and societal situations. They may voluntarily choose to engage in prostitution, but external factors leave prostitutes no other option. Furthermore, once they have 'chosen' a life of prostitution, they may fear the threat of violence if they attempt to change their lifestyle.')

[6] Article 3 of the Palermo Protocol defines trafficking as follows:

(a) 'Trafficking in persons' shall mean the recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons, by means of the threat or use of force or other forms of coercion, of abduction, of fraud, of deception, of the abuse of power or of a position of vulnerability or of the giving or receiving of payments or benefits to achieve the consent of a person having control over another person, for the purpose of exploitation.

Exploitation shall include, at a minimum, the exploitation of the prostitution of others or other forms of sexual exploitation, forced labour or services, slavery or practices similar to slavery, servitude or the removal of organs;

(b) The consent of a victim of trafficking in persons to the intended exploitation set forth in subparagraph (a) of this article shall be irrelevant where any of the means set forth in subparagraph (a) have been used;

(c) The recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of a child for the purpose of exploitation shall be considered 'trafficking in persons' even if this does not involve any of the means set forth in subparagraph (a) of this article;

(d) 'Child' shall mean any person under eighteen years of age.

Under the Protocol, the prosecution must establish the presence of 3 elements in order prove a person is a trafficker. First, the trafficker must perform one of the listed actions: namely 'recruitment, transportation, transfer, harbouring or receipt of persons.' These activities embrace all of the component parts of a trafficking operation — save for the client. However, in order to realize fully the right to be free from slavery, a client who knowingly solicits the services of a trafficked and sexually exploited person must be brought to book. Legislation must engage both the demand and the supply. Second, the trafficker must use threat of force, coercion, abduction, fraud, deception, abuse of power or the vulnerability of another person in order to achieve her ends. The Travaux Preparatoires states that 'abuse of occupation with the elimination of trans-national organized crime limits its efficacy as a both a model for and a tool in efforts to eradicate sexual slavery.[1]

FC s 13 can play a dual role in combating human trafficking. Firstly, it can be read to require that the state produce a comprehensive plan to eradicate, to prevent and to punish trafficking.[2] Secondly, it can be read to require that the state 'protect and assist the victims of . . . trafficking, with full respect for their human rights.'[3] Such protection demands: (a) adequate physical security;[4] (b) the power' refers 'to any situation in which the person involved had no real and acceptable alternative but to submit to the abuse involved.' See Travaux Preparatoires (Interpretative Notes) for the Negotiation of the Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, Especially Women and Children, supplementing the United Nations Convention against Transnational Organized Crime, UN Doc A/55/383/Add.1 at para 63. Almost all victims of trafficking — once ensconsed at their ultimate destination — find that they have no means of communicating, no money, no friends, no travel documents, no access to the law. Moreover, the fear of physical punishment and further sexual abuse often creates insuperable barriers to flight. Third, the trafficking must have been undertaken for the purpose of exploitation. Exploitation includes such practices as exploitation of another for the purposes of making money from the sale of another's sexual capacity. This definition of exploitation seems sufficiently elastic to cover such practices as pornography and forced marriages.

[1] For example, the Protocol only applies to trafficking over borders (article 4) by a group of at least 3 people (article 2*(a)*). As Anti-Slavery International observes, these provisions may be necessary to combat international crime, but are irrelevant to a victim who has been trafficked by a single person or within national borders. D Weissbrodt & Anti-Slavery International 'Abolishing Slavery and its Contemporary Forms' for the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights HR/PUB/02/4 (2002) 21. As the IOM and SALC reports note, the proportion of trafficking that occurs within South Africa — especially within existing refugee communities — constitutes a substantial percentage of the total. The efficacy of the Protocol is further undermined by making the articles that deal directly with victims purely discretionary.

[2] Such a programme has several essential features. One facet is detailed legislation criminalizing trafficking in persons. IOM Trafficking Report (supra) at 133. In theory, traffickers can be prosecuted for kidnapping, abduction and rape under the common law and various statutes. Statutory offences include violations of the Sexual Offences Act 23 of 1957, the Immigration Act 13 of 2002 and the Basic Conditions of Employment Act 75 of 1997. But they cannot be punished for the act of trafficking itself. SALC Trafficking Paper (supra) at 54. The proposed legislation should draw on the Palermo Protocol. Indeed, the Children's Bill incorporates the definition of trafficking in the Palermo Protocol and gives the Protocol the force of law. However, a more nuanced piece of legislation aimed specifically at traffickers is required in order to take account of practices unique to the South African sex slave trade and the capacity of existing law enforcement structures. A second aspect is the creation of a national task force on trafficking in persons. See IOM Trafficking Report (supra) at 134. Such a task force has already been established in Gauteng. SALC Trafficking Paper (supra) at 45. A third component is educating communities on the dangers of trafficking. Ibid at 39.

[3] Article 2*(b)* of the Palermo Protocol. Attention to the human rights of victims can also aid in minimising the problem. See J Fitzpatrick 'Trafficking as a Human Rights Violation: The Complex Intersection of Legal Frameworks for Conceptualizing and Combating Trafficking' (2003) 24 Michigan J of IL 1143, 1165 ('Only whenstates commit themselves to tackle human rights violations across the entire spectrum of the traffic, will we begin to see a diminution in this serious human rights violation.')

[4] The nature of this care can be found in article 6(3) of the Palermo Protocol. Article 6(3) requires state parties to 'consider implementing measures to provide for the physical, psychological and social recovery of victims of trafficking in persons, including, in appropriate cases, in cooperation with non-governmental organizations, other relevant organizations and other elements of civil society, and, in particular, the provision of: (a) Appropriate housing; (b) Counseling and information, in particular as regards their legal rights, in a language that the victims of trafficking in persons can understand; (c) Medical, psychological and material assistance; and (d) Employment, educational and training opportunities.' The Law Commission recommends that the services offered to victims of trafficking should include at least 'health care services, shelter, counseling, education and vocational training.' SALC opportunity for victims to seek reparations from their traffickers;[1] and (c) sufficient safeguards in our immigration laws to enable victims to seek asylum.[2] The present legal regime fails to provide such protection[3] and may even exacerbate

Trafficking Paper (supra) at 35. See also Gold (supra) at 132 ('Overall, victims need to feel empowered after a situation in which control was stripped from them. The ability to file private civil actions, obtain proper medical attention, and receive proper repatriation will slowly allow a victim to regain power in her own life.')

[1] The current legal regime governing the victims of trafficking neither affords victims an opportunity to press criminal charges nor allows victims to institute a claim for compensation. SAHRC Lindela: at the Crossroads for Detention and Repatriation (2000) 68 ('SAHRC Lindela Report')(The Human Rights Commission's investigation into the conditions at the Lindela detention centre found that people awaiting deportation there have no opportunity to press civil or criminal charges) The SALC has suggested that in terms of s 300 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 and s 30 of the Organized Crime Act 121 of 1998, a person is found guilty of a crime related to trafficking could have his assets sold to compensate the victim. SALC Trafficking Paper (supra) at 62. However, even the Law Commission recognizes the current inadequacies in these provisions: (1) trafficking is not a crime; (2) they only cover patrimonial loss, not pain and suffering; (3) any patrimonial loss is likely to be lost earnings from prostitution — and a court is unlikely compensate the victim for illegal earnings.

[2] The Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal have handed down a number of judgments recently on the level of constitutional solicitude afforded undocumented persons in the face of singularly inhospitable immigration laws. The Supreme Court of Appeal, in Minister of Home Affairs v Watchenuka, found unconstitutional regulations issued by the Minister and rules emanating from the Standing Committee for Refugee Affairs that visited blanket prohibitions with respect to employment and study on asylum seekers. 2004 (4) SA 326 (SCA), 2004 (2) BCLR 120 (SCA)('Watchenuka'). The Watchenuka Court held that such prohibitions constituted a violation of the right to dignity because the state refused to offer support to asylum seekers and left persons exercising their right to apply for asylum no alternative but to turn to crime, begging or foraging. The Court also held that such prohibitions constituted a violation of the right to education because children lawfully in the country to seek asylum may not be deprived of such resources at critical period of their development. The Watchenuka Court recognizes that a right to asylum only becomes meaningful if immigration laws actually permit a person to seek asylum. In Lawyers for Human Rights & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another, the Constitutional Court construed several provisions of the Immigration Act in a manner that expands the level of due process to which undocumented persons on board ships are entitled. 2004 (4) SA 125 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 775 (CC)('Lawyers for Human Rights'). The Lawyers for Human Right Court described the basis for this expansion as follows:

> [We are] concerned with a delicate issue that has implications for the circumstances in and the extent to which we restrict the liberty of human beings who may be said to be illegal foreigners. The determination of this question could adversely affect not only the freedom of the people concerned but also their dignity as human beings. The very fabric of our society and the values embodied in our Constitution could be demeaned if the freedom and dignity of illegal foreigners are violated in the process of preserving our national integrity.

Ibid at para 20. Read together, the decisions support the dual proposition that our immigration laws must be construed in a manner that permits the actual, and not merely theoretical, exercise of every person's fundamental rights and that our immigration laws cannot be used to exact non-judicial penalties in order to further domestic policies aimed at blunting the influx of illegal immigrants.

[3] The Immigration Act states that all illegal foreigners shall be deported. Act 13 of 2002, s 32(2). Immigration officers are also entitled to arrest an illegal foreigner and cause her to be deported, without a warrant. Section 34(1), reads, in relevant part, as follows: 'Without the need for a warrant, an immigration officer may arrest an illegal foreigner or cause him or her to be arrested, and shall, irrespective of whether such foreigner is arrested, deport him or her or cause him or her to be deported and may, pending his or her deportation, detain him or her or cause him or her to be detained in a manner and at a place determined by the Director-General.' An 'illegal foreigner' is defined in s 1 as 'a foreigner who is in the Republic in contravention of this Act' The Act criminalizes employing and aiding 'illegal foreigners' save for the provision of 'necessary humanitarian aid.' The Act ostensibly makes provision for suspected the dangers to which trafficking victims are exposed.[1] An immigration regime that sanctions automatic deportation places victims in an untenable position: remain a sex slave or face deportation without compensation or protection.[2]

(b) Marriage and servitude

(i) Lobola

Lobolo, or bride-wealth, is an amount paid by the husband or his family to the family of the woman in return for the reproductive capacity of the woman.[3] The Recognition of Customary Marriages Act, which regulates customary marriages in South Africa, does not require lobolo to be paid for a customary marriage to be valid.[4] It does, however, demand that 'the marriage be negotiated and entered into or celebrated in accordance with customary law.'[5] Lobola therefore remains an illegal foreigners to be fairly treated once arrested. Immigation Act, s 34(1)(a)-(e). However, neither the conditions of detention centres such as Lindela nor the legal process to which they are generally subject meet internationally accepted standards. SAHRC Lindela Report (supra) at 20-25. Because most detainees are not addressed in a language they can understand, they have little prospect of making use of the limited due process rights to which they are entitled let alone the benefits of substantive law that might accrue to them. See also SAHRC 'Report into the Arrest and Detention of Suspected Undocumented Migrants' (1999); SALC Trafficking Paper (supra) at 35 (Notes that 85% of victims spoke Portuguese, Swahili, French, an East Asian or Eastern European language. Few could converse in an official South African language.) Almost all are returned to their country of origin where they are once again vulnerable to being trafficked.

[1] Traffickers often use the opportunities afforded by South Africa's asylum regime to coerce their own family members into becoming sex workers. IOM Trafficking Report (supra) at 28.

[2] See § 64.4*(a)* supra. Creating a legal regime to protect and to compensate the victims of trafficking poses significant challenges. The state cannot be expected to investigate and to prosecute every plausible claim of sexual slavery. SALC Trafficking Paper (supra) at 50. The American 'T Visa' system offers one possible solution. See Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000. For a detailed analysis of the T Visa, see T Hartsough 'Asylum for Trafficked Women: Escape Strategies Beyond the T Visa' (2002) 13 Hasting's Women's LJ 77. The T Visa is a category of visa created specifically for victims of trafficking. If these victims are deemed to be persons of 'good moral character' after 3 years, they may even be given permanent residence. The T Visa is a promising concept. However, one of the requirements for T Visa is that the victim must comply with any reasonable request for assistance in the prosecution of the traffickers. This requirement conflates the state's obligation to the victim and its obligation to eradicate trafficking. The fear associated with such confrontations, and trauma visited upon a person repeatedly subject to rape at the hand of the person being charged, diminishes the attractiveness of the T Visa programme. See 'Informal Note by the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights' UN Doc A/Ac.254/16 (1999) 5 ('[I]t is important in this context to note that victim protection must be considered separately to witness protection, as not all victims of trafficking will be selected to act as witnesses in criminal proceedings.')

[3] RM Jansen & AJ Ellis 'The South African Common Law and Lobolo — Another Perspective' (1999) 24(2) J for Juridical Science 41, 42.

[4] Recognition of Customary Marriages Act 120 of 1998 ('Customary Marriages Act').

[5] Section 3(1)(b). But see Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000, s 8*(d)*('Any practice, including traditional, customary or religious practice, which impairs the dignity of women and undermines equality between women and men' may amount to unfair discrimination.)

essential condition for a valid marriage if the customary law of the parties so compels.[1]

Does the practice of lobola infringe a woman's right to be free from slavery, servitude and forced labour?[2] International law censures practices similar to lobola. The Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade, and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery identifies as servitude '[any] institution or practice whereby [a] woman, without the right to refuse, is promised or given in marriage on payment of consideration in money or in kind to her parents.'[3] If we accept the force of the Supplementary Convention's definition, then when a bride has been denied the right to refuse to enter a union and lobolo has been paid, a prima facie violation of FC s 13's prohibition against servitude is established.

The Customary Marriages Act requires both parties' consent for a customary marriage to be valid.[4] The Act thereby avoids the most obvious basis for a FC s 13 challenge. But the requirement of consent and a right of refusal alone should be insufficient to enable the Act and the practise of lobola to escape contestation. First, despite the 'paper law' requiring consent, one must ascertain whether the 'living law' ensures something more than mere acquiescence. Where the consent of a woman is not properly obtained, the paying of lobolo must be deemed a 'practice similar to slavery' that impairs FC s 13.[5] Second, in circumstances under which a woman is unable to exercise meaningful choice — where she

[1] See Mabena v Letsoalo 1998 (2) SA 1068, 1073 (T)('[C]ustomary marriage comprises two distinct legal actions: there is on the one hand the marriage itself. On the other hand there is the lobolo agreement with the handing over of the bride.') See also JG Horn & AM Janse van Rensburg 'Non-Recognition?: Lobolo as a Requirement for a Valid Customary Marriage' (2002) 27(2) J for Juridical Science 170, 176; JG Horn & AM Janse van Rensburg 'Practical Implications of the Recognition of Customary Marriages' (2002) 27(1) J for Juridical Science 54, 59; IP Mathuifi & JC Bekker 'The Recognition of the Customary Marriages Act of 1998 and Its Impact on Family Law in South Africa' (2002) 35 CILSA 182, 187. Customary law normally requires only agreement on the amount of lobolo, and not actual payment, in order for the marriage to be declared valid.

[2] Our courts have not, as yet, been asked to consider the constitutionality of lobola. They have pronounced on the constitutionality of a number of other customary law doctrines. See, eg, Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe')(Succession based upon male primogeniture held by Constitutional Court to be unconstitutional); Mhlekwa v Head of the Western Tembuland Regional Authority & Another 2001 (1) SA 574 (Tk)(Power of Regional Authority Court to apply customary law did not justify limitations of the right to a fair trial and the right to equality. Selective process of applying legislation, and thus customary law, found to be unconstitutional); Mabuza v Mbatha 2003 (4) SA 218 (C), 2003 (7) BCLR 743 (C) ('Mabuza')(Development of customary law in light of the Constitution's commitment to an open and democratic society based upon equality, dignity and freedom means that siSwati custom of ukumekeza (the formal integration of bride into bridegroom's family) can be waived by both parties to marriage and cannot be used to coerce bride.) Cf Jansen & Ellis (supra) at 46 (Authors ask whether lobola 'strengthens the authoritative position of husbands, and [reinforces] the subordination of women.' They conclude that s 6 of the Customary Marriages Act diminishes any deleterious consequences of lobola by ensuring that husband and wife in customary marriages have equal status.)

[3] Article 1*(c)*(i)(Emphasis added).

[4] Section 3(1)(b).

[5] See C Rautenbach 'Some Comments on the Status of Customary Law in Relation to the Bill of Rights' (2003) 14 Stell LR 107 (General discussion on how the Bill of Rights applies to customary law and the difference between the 'paper law' and the 'living law'.)

cannot vote with her feet — more than consent is required. The court must interrogate the contractual environment to determine whether the woman has been coerced into matrimony.

Even with these two provisos, it seems fair to ask whether lobola survives FC s 13 — or FC s 9 or FC s 10 — analysis. Lobola perpetuates the systemic disadvantage to which black South African women have been historically subject and impairs the dignity of the complainant. Ought it to matter that a woman in a traditional community may not experience the exchange of her body for lobolo as an impairment of her dignity? One way to engage the problem of false consciousness is to begin by drawing the line at physical coercion.[1] The South African Law Reform Commission notes that:

> Bride-wealth may have a more concrete effect on individual rights and freedoms by binding women to unwanted marriages. If a wife seeks a divorce, her family is usually obliged to return bride-wealth, and, rather than do so, they may force her to put up with an unhappy relationship.[2]

The Law Commission refuses to draw the logical conclusion: namely, that the exchange of bride-wealth constitutes debt bondage that creates conditions of servitude from which women struggle to escape. Instead it observes that:

> [U]ndue pressure cannot be remedied by legislation. Women have the freedom to end their marriages when they wish, and the law cannot control all economic and social circumstances that might compel or persuade them to remain married.[3]

But it simply does not follow that because the law cannot eliminate subtle forms of coercion, it must endorse institutions that create conditions of servitude. That lobola may continue even when a constitutional or statutory provision is understood to prohibit the practice hardly constitutes an argument in favour of it. The Law Commission itself describes a contemporary system of lobola in which (a) bridewealth represents 'consideration for a wife's reproductive potential' and 'compensates the wife's family for the loss of a daughter'; (b) transfers no longer serve as assurance for the long-term familial security of the wife and her family, but may be used to fund the unrelated needs of family members, such as the purchase of furniture; and (c) requests for a divorce may trigger a demand for repayment of bride-wealth. Some women may feel that a good price for their body enhances their dignity. The fact remains that the practice functions as a real

[1] S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44. See also M Matsuda 'Pragmatism Modified and the False Consciousness Problem' (1990) 63 S Cal L Rev 1763, 1765 (Matsuda notes that structures of subordination both inhibit the very recognition of domination and blunt its expression once that recognition occurs.)

[2] South African Law Commission, Project 90, The Harmonisation of the Common Law and the Indigenous Law, Discussion Paper 74, Customary Marriages (August 1997)('SALC Report on Customary Marriage I') at para 4.3.3.5

[3] Ibid.

constraint on the ability of women to negotiate their own terms of entry and to engineer their own departure.

Despite the obvious physical, legal and economic encumbrances imposed upon women for whom lobolo is paid, the Law Commission asserts that since 'it would be impossible to demonstrate that payment of bride-wealth was the condition precedent to the unfavourable treatment of wives,' lobola neither directly nor indirectly discriminates against women in terms of FC s 9. 'After all', the Commission reasons, 'men have to pay, not women.'

Will the courts accept such tortured logic with respect to FC ss 9, 10 and 13 challenges to lobola? Several recent decisions give us reason to believe that an appropriately chosen attack might result in its removal as a rule of customary law. In Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others, the Constitutional Court found that the customary law rule of male primogeniture — and several statutory provisions that reinforced the rule — unfairly discriminated against the deceased's wife and her two children because the rule and the other impugned provisions prevented the children from inheriting the deceased's estate.[1] The Bhe Court's disabling strategy with respect to this rule of customary rule is instructive.

The Bhe Court begins with the following bromide. While customary law provides a comprehensive vision of the good life for many South African communities, the new-found constitutional respect for traditional practices does not immunize them from constitutional review.[2] The Bhe Court locates any ongoing justification of customary law in the provisions of the Final Constitution. The Bhe Court then goes on to characterize the customary law of succession in terms that validate its spirit without necessitating that the Court be beholden to its letter. The customary law of succession is, according to the Court, a set of rules > designed to preserve the cohesion and stability of the extended family unit and ultimately the entire community . . . . The heir did not merely succeed to the assets of the deceased; succession was not primarily concerned with the distribution of the estate of the deceased, but with the preservation and perpetuation of the family unit. Property was collectively

[1] Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & others 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe').

[2] Ibid at paras 42–46. ('At the level of constitutional validity, the question in this case is not whether a rule or provision of customary law offers similar remedies to the Intestate Succession Act. The issue is whether such rules or provisions are consistent with the Constitution. This status of customary law has been acknowledged and endorsed by this Court.') See also Alexkor Ltd & Another v Richtersveld Community & Others 2004 (5) SA 460 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1301 (CC) ('Richtersveld') at para 51 ('While in the past indigenous law was seen through the common law lens, it must now be seen as an integral part of our law. Like all law it depends for its ultimate force and validity on the Constitution. Its validity must now be determined by reference not to common-law, but to the Constitution'); Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA & Another: In re Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC); 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) at para 44; Mabuza v Mbatha 2003 (4) SA 218 (C), 2003 (7) BCLR 743 (C) at para 32 ('[These rules] provide a setting which contributes to the unity of family structures and the fostering of co-operation, a sense of responsibility in and of belonging to its members, as well as the nurturing of healthy communitarian traditions such as ubuntu. These valuable aspects of customary law more than justify its protection by the Constitution. It bears repeating, however, that as with all law, the constitutional validity of rules and principles of customary law depend on their consistency with the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.') > owned and the family head, who was the nominal owner of the property, administered it for the benefit of the family unit as a whole. The heir stepped into the shoes of the family head and acquired all the rights and became subject to all the obligations of the family head. He inherited the property of the deceased only in the sense that he assumed control and administration of the property subject to his rights and obligations as head of the family unit. The rules of the customary law of succession were consequently mainly concerned with succession to the position and status of the deceased family head rather than the distribution of his personal assets.[1]

By recasting the justification for customary rules of succession in terms of family and community stability, rather than patriarchy and property, the Bhe Court softens its critique of this traditional way of life. It then notes that the conditions of family and community which gave rise to the challenged rules no longer obtain. The Bhe Court writes:

> Modern urban communities and families are structured and organised differently and no longer purely along traditional lines. The customary law rules of succession . . . determine succession to the deceased's estate without the accompanying social implications which they traditionally had. Nuclear families have largely replaced traditional extended families. The heir does not necessarily live together with the whole extended family which would include the spouse of the deceased as well as other dependants and descendants. He often simply acquires the estate without assuming, or even being in a position to assume, any of the deceased's responsibilities. In the changed circumstances, therefore, the succession of the heir to the assets of the deceased does not necessarily correspond in practice with an enforceable responsibility to provide support and maintenance to the family and dependants of the deceased.[2]

Customary law has not, the Bhe Court ruefully observes, evolved to meet the changing needs of the community. It fails African widows because '(a) . . . social conditions frequently do not make living with the heir a realistic or even a tolerable proposition; (b) . . . the African woman does not have a right of ownership; and (c) the prerequisite of a good working relationship with the heir for the effectiveness of the widow's right to maintenance', as a general matter, no longer exists.[3] Again the Court takes care to note that the fault for this arrested development lies outside traditional communities. Ruptures within traditional ways of life — caused by apartheid, the hegemony of western culture and capitalism — have prevented the law's evolution.[4] This aside actually sets the stage for delivery of the Bhe Court's coup de grace: that 'the official rules of customary law of succession are no longer universally observed.'[5] The trend within traditional communities is toward new norms that 'sustain the surviving family unit' without re-inscribing male primogeniture.

[1] Bhe (supra) at para 75.
[2] Ibid at para 80.
[3] See South African Law Reform Commission *The Harmonisation of the Common Law and the Indigenous Law: Succession in Customary La*w Issue Paper 12, Project 90 (April 1998) 6-9. See also TW Bennett Human Rights and African Customary Law under the South African Constitution (1997) 126-7.
[4] See, eg, Richtersveld Community and Others v Alexkor Ltd & Another 2003 (6) SA 104 (SCA) at paras 85–105.
[5] Bhe (supra) at para 84.

By having shown that the spirit of succession lies in its commitment to family cohesion, that the traditional family no longer coheres as it once did, and that the 'distorted' rules of customary law, as frozen in time by apartheid-era statute and case law, that 'emphasise . . . patriarchal features and minimise . . . communitarian ones,' the Bhe Court closes the gap between constitutional imperative and customary obligation.[1] Had customary law been permitted to develop in an 'active and dynamic manner,' it would have already reflected the Bhe Court's conclusion that 'the exclusion of women from inheritance on the grounds of gender is a clear violation of . . . [FC s] 9(3).'[2] Had customary law not been fossilised, traditional communities would have noted how male primogeniture entrenched 'past patterns of disadvantage among a vulnerable group' and endorsed the Bhe Court's reworking of customary understandings of the competence 'to own and administer property' in a manner that vindicates a woman's right to dignity under FC s 10.[3]

Judge Hlophe employs a similar disabling strategy in Mabuza v Mbatha.[4] He recognizes the supremacy of the Final Constitution at the same time as he asserts the protean features of customary law that enable it to conform, as necessary, to the dictates of the Bill of Rights. His nuanced assessment of the role of ukumekeza reconfigures siSwati marriage conventions in a manner that (a) refuses to allow ukumekeza to be used by the groom's family as a means of control over the bride and (b) consciously places the husband and wife on an equal footing with respect to subsequent determinations of whether a valid marriage under siSwati customary law has taken place.

Constitutional challenges to lobola should be able to exploit the schema developed in Bhe and Mabuza. Those familiar with and committed to customary law acknowledge that: (a) the conditions under which lobola served to unite families and create security for women and their children no longer obtain; (b) cash lobolo transactions, which result in the purchase of such transient goods as home furnishings, can hardly be said to benefit the clan or the community; and (c) the present practice of lobola serves the pecuniary interests of a few men. By showing that the spirit of lobola lies in its commitment to family cohesion and that the 'distorted' rules of customary marriage emphasise male domination at the expense of communitarian concerns, a party challenging the centrality of lobola in customary marriages can close the gap between constitutional imperative and customary obligation. Following Bhe, a court can feel confident that in so far as lobolo remains an obstacle either to an exchange of vows or to the disengagement from a failed relationship, the practice constitutes a violation of a woman's rights to equality and dignity. More importantly for our immediate purposes, Bhe supports the proposition that neither the living customary law nor the Final Constitution can be squared with an institution that ultimately reduces to the purchase of a women's reproductive capacity or to compensation for the loss of female labour

[1] Bhe (supra) at para 89.
[2] Ibid at para 83.
[3] Ibid at para 84.
[4] Mabuza (supra) at paras 9–32.

in the father's household. Following Mabuza, a court can ameliorate the burden of lobola by making its legal status as a marker of marriage contingent upon evidence of genuine mutual consent. The requirement of genuine mutual consent introduced by Mabuza means that lobolo can be waived as a condition for recognition of marriage.[1] The Mabuza Court makes clear that traditional institutions such as lobola can only survive as legally binding rites of marriage when shorn of all those asymmetries that reduce women to chattel.[2]

(ii) Religious marriages

Our analysis of religious marital rites largely tracks the analysis of lobola above. Any religious rite that constrains radically the ability of a person to disengage from a failed relationship constitutes a violation of that person's rights to equality, to dignity and to be free from conditions of servitude. Such institutions should

[1] The decisions in both Bhe and Mabuza courts manifest the related virtues of reliance on objective characterizations of the subordinate position of women in traditional communities and avoidance of thorny issues of false consciousness. As one of the authors has written in this work's chapter on Freedom of Association:

> It seems trite, but still worth noting, that when faced with physical coercion, the rights of women to freedom and security of the person, to freedom from servitude, to equality and to dignity all trump any and all benefits that might accrue from sustaining traditional ways of life that re-inscribe such abuse. Female genital mutilation and forced labour are obvious candidates for the trash-heap of history. But polygamy and lobola? It is easy — and in most cases quite right — to identify such practices with the continued subordination of women. . . . The more difficult question is whether such practices can be reconfigured so as to sustain legitimately both intimate familial associations and cultural practices. . . . With adults, one difficulty is the paternalistic presumption that government can substitute its judgment of what is best for that of its citizenry. Inquiries into non-physical coercion of children and adults are united by considerations of exit. One must take great care, however, when we interfere in associational life that we are not too quick to allow attributions of 'false consciousness' to masquerade as concerns about the inability of children or adults to vote with their feet.

S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) §§ 44.3*(c)(ii) and 44.2(d)*. Caution with respect to such attributions does not mean abdication. Where reliable qualitative and statistical analysis can show that lobolo-like exchange correlates closely with lower levels of education, higher incidents of domestic violence, lower wages, higher rates of morbidity and lower levels of life expectancy for women in such relationships than in those without, then the grounds for caution may be overcome.

[2] Even the South African Law Reform Commission recognizes the possibility that 'payment or non-payment of bridewealth' can be removed as a matter of legal consequence when assessing the validity of marriage, the spouses' marital obligations or the custodial rights to children. The Law Reform Commission observes that in customary law, payment of bridewealth is often deferred and the status of a marriage is seldom placed in doubt through failure to pay timeously. SALC Report on Customary Marriage I (supra) at para 4.3.1. It further observes after promulgation of the General Law Fourth Amendment Act husbands lost the traditional marital power they exercised over their wives. Act 132 of 1993, s 29.

only survive as traditions shorn of all asymmetrical legal consequences.[1] The actual analysis of religious rites of marriage, and the extent to which they are entitled to judicial solicitude, is covered at length elsewhere in this work.[2]

(iii) Mine wives

A recent report by the International Migration Organization identifies the sale of illegal immigrants as wives to workers on mines in the East Rand as an especially vital market for human trafficking in South Africa.[3] This selling of wives possesses none of the communitarian virtues associated with such traditional practices as lobola. The wife is chattel property — a slave pure and simple.[4]

[1] The facts and the holding of Republic v Kadhi, Kisumu Ex Parte Nasreen provide a useful departure point for analysis of religious rites of marriage. [1973] EALR 153 (High Court of Kenya). The High Court of Kenya was asked to enforce a Kadhi order that held that Islamic law required the return of a wife to her husband. The High Court rejected the request on the grounds that the 'Kadhi order would . . . subject the [wife] to the effective dominion of the plaintiff to an extent constituting "servitude" . . . and in a manner inconsistent with the intendment of s 73(1) of the [Kenyan] Constitution.' Ibid at 161. While South African courts must treat non-Christian religious rites with a relatively high degree of solicitude, a South African court would, we think, be obliged to reach an identical conclusion under the Final Constitution. Compare Amod v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accidents Fund (Commission for Gender Equality Intervening) 1999 (4) SA 1319 (SCA) and Ryland v Erdos 1997 (2) SA 690 (C), 1997 (1) BCLR 77 (C)(Holding that Muslim religious rites of marriage are not presumptively contra bonos mores) with Ismail v Ismail 1983 (1) SA 1006 (A)(Holding that Muslim religious rites of marriage are contra bonos mores). The Final Constitution reflects the Lockean discomfort with using the profane power of the state to alter what others believe to be the contours of sacred space by subjecting its protection of customary law to FC s 31(2)'s proviso that a rule of customary law inconsistent with a provision of the Bill of Rights is prima facie unconstitutional, but not forcing a rule of religious law protected by FC s 15 to operate under any such disability. See also Taylor v Kurstag [2004] 4 All SA 317 (W)(Court upheld the right of the Beth Din to issue a Cherem — an excommunication edict — against a member of the Jewish community who had violated the terms of the Beth Din's child maintenance order, but refused to enforce the maintenance order itself.)

[2] P Farlam 'Religion' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 41.

[3] J Martens, M Pieczkowski & B van Vuuren-Smith 'Seduction, Sale and Slavery: Trafficking of Women and Children for Sexual Exploitation in Southern Africa' International Organization for Migration, Regional Office for Southern Africa (3rd Edition, 2003) 127-8 available at www.iom.org.za/Reports/TraffickingReport3rdEd.pdf, (accessed on 25 December 2004). The IOM paints the following dispassionate, but still harrowing, account of the provenance and the fate of mine wives on the West Rand:

> [The] victims come from rural and urban backgrounds, from Maputo and Nampula provinces. . . Victims are recruited by Mozambican women, working in partnership with Mozambican and South African men responsible for transportation of victims and exploitation. . . . Upon arrival in Johannesburg, victims who were expecting restaurant jobs are taken to transit houses in Soweto and Lenasia before being sold. Sex worker victims are sold to brothels in Johannesburg central business district (CBD) for ZAR 1000. Victims who were promised restaurant jobs are sold on private order, or sold as 'wives' to mine-workers on the West Rand for ZAR 850. IOM estimates that at least 1000 Mozambican victims are recruited, transported, and exploited in this way every year, earning traffickers approximately ZAR 1 million annually.

[4] See § 64.6*(a)* supra (Analysis of sex slaves and human trafficking.)

The subsequent inability of the 'wife' to alter her status amounts to servitude.[1] Bondage or deportation is Hobson's choice.

In addition, mine wives generally perform both basic domestic labour and much more strenuous non-remunerative work under highly coercive conditions. The wife's powerlessness to contest these conditions and to secure compensation brings this work within the definition of forced labour.[2]

(c) Farm labour

According to s 1 of the Basic Conditions of Employment Act ('BCEA'), a farm worker is:

> An employee who is employed mainly or in connection with farming activities, and includes an employee who wholly or mainly performs domestic work in a home on a farm.[3]

The BCEA provides for a sectoral determination that deals comprehensively with the specific working conditions of farm labourers: Sectoral Determination 8.[4] Sectoral Determination 8 rehearses the constitutional prohibition against forced labour[5] and then adds the following language: '[n]o person may for their own benefit or for the benefit of someone else cause, demand or impose forced labour.'[6] Read together the BCEA and Sectoral Determination 8 provide a comprehensive scheme for farm worker protection.[7] Any farm labour performed at standards significantly below those laid down by the sectoral determination will constitute forced labour.[8]

Forced labour may be the most obvious problem in farm labour. However, the history of farm work in South Africa is a history of servitude. Farm labourers still [1] See § 64.4*(b)* supra, for a definition and a discussion of servitude.

[2] See § 64.4*(c)* supra, for a definition and a discussion of forced labour.

[3] Act 75 of 1997. Sectoral Determination 8: Farm Worker Sector, South Africa GN R1499, Government Gazette 24114 (2 December 2002) ('Sectoral Determination 8') states: 'Without limiting its meaning, 'farming activities' includes primary and secondary agriculture, mixed farming, horticulture, aqua farming and the farming of animal products or field crops excluding the Forestry Sector.'

[4] Sectoral Determination 8. The determination was enacted in terms of the Basic Conditions of Employment Act, s 51. Section 51 allows for the regulation of a specific field of labour. The sectoral determination contains detailed provisions on minimum wages, manner of payment, leave and overtime work.

[5] Sectoral Determination 8, s 25(4).

[6] Sectoral Determination 8, s 25(5). It accords child farm workers a substantially higher degree of solicitude. See Sectoral Determination 8: s 25(1) (no child under 15 or still at school may be employed); s 25(2) (no child may do work that is inappropriate or possibly detrimental); 25(3) (employer must retain records of child's employment); s 25(7)(a) (no work for children between 18h00 and 6h00); s 25(7)(b) (no child may work more than 35 hours a week); and s 25(7)(c) (no child may work with agro-chemicals). It contains terms that criminalize forced labour. Sectoral Determination 8 s 25(6).

[7] See South African Human Rights Commission Inquiry into Human Rights in Farming Communities (2003) ('SAHRC Farming Inquiry') 25-6 (The most common areas of non-compliance with the BCEA are: non-adherence to working hours; overtime (54% of labourers continue work after the day officially ends without compensation); work on Sundays and public holidays; annual leave (92% of male farm workers do not receive any paid annual leave); and maternity benefit provisions.)

[8] See § 64.4*(c)* supra.

often live their entire lives on a farm. The de jure feudal order of farm work under apartheid has given way to de facto serfdom. Even without pass laws, today's farm workers have few options to go elsewhere and do other:

> Farm workers usually live in houses that do not belong to them. A central component of the arrangements on farms is that many workers not only work on the farms but also live there, with housing being either a form of payment in kind, or part of the terms of their contract. Thus, for many farm workers, the loss of their job means the loss of their house. The farmer is able to exercise control over the farm workers' daily bread, as well as over the roof over their heads. This increases farm workers' dependence on the farmer, and contributes significantly to the imbalance of power.[1]

The vast majority of farm workers in South Africa are unable to change their status[2] and thus rather easily satisfy the Supplementary Convention's definition of a serf:

> A tenant who is by law, custom or agreement bound to live and labour on land belonging to another person and to render some determinate service to such other person, whether for reward or not, and is not free to change his status.[3]

[1] A Isaacs 'Trapped Farm Labour: Obstacles to Rights and Freedom' (2003) Development Update 27, 36. The SAHRC Farming Inquiry identifies both the threat and the prevalence of evictions of farm workers as one of the primary problems in the sector. As a result, farm workers worry far less than they ought about changing their status, and far more than they should about maintaining what little security they enjoy on the farms. SAHRC Farming Inquiry (supra) at 9.

[2] In March 2004, Statistics South Africa estimated that there were 930 000 people employed in commercial agriculture. Statistics South Africa Labour Force Survey (2004), available at www.statssa.gov.za. Approximately 914 473 farm workers live with their families on farms. M Wegerif 'Creating Long-Term Security of Tenure for Farm Dwellers' paper Department of Land Affairs' National Land Tenure Conference (Durban 2001) 3. The five to six dependents of each worker have led researchers to conclude that approximately six million people live on farms. See K McKay, 'Farm Workers in the Karoo: Isolation=Exploitation' (23 April 2003)(manuscript on file with authors)('Farm workers earn the equivalent of $100 Canadian per month and support an average of five dependants on that amount . . . Statistics South Africa predicts that the number of dependants will rise due to . . . HIV/AIDS. . . . [F]arm . . . employees are the most destitute and least educated group in South Africa. . . . According to Statistics South Africa, people employed in agriculture are worse off than those in every other major sector of the economy. For black and coloured workers on farms, wages are low, housing is poor, access to education difficult or non-existent, and health indicators are bad.') Although figures vary widely, the SAHRC has estimated that there are around 250 000 labour tenants in South Africa. SAHRC Farming Inquiry (supra) at 13. A labour tenant is defined in s 1 of the Land Reform (Labour Tenants) Act as a person who resides on a farm with a right to sharecropping and provides labour in return and whose parents resided on the farm under a similar agreement. Act 3 of 1996. This definition fits precisely that of a serf. The SAHRC Farming Inquiry concludes that: 'Farming communities are characterised by skewed power dynamics between farm dwellers and farm owners.' SAHRC Farming Inquiry (supra) at 170. The report further asserts that: 'The power of farm owners extends to ownership of land, employment and access to economic and social needs. Farm dwellers are dependent on employers for employment and tenure security, and in some cases, their basic economic and social rights. This pervades all aspects of life resulting in gross power imbalances between parties.' Ibid at 172. See also Isaacs (supra) at 51 (Argues that while government has made an effort to deal with '[t]rapped farm labour . . . legislative changes . . . have not substantially altered conditions on the ground.')

[3] Supplementary Convention on the Abolition of Slavery, the Slave Trade, and Institutions and Practices Similar to Slavery (1956) 226 UNTS 3 Article 1 (Not yet ratified by South Africa).

A prohibition on servitude makes complete sense only against a background in which people are generally free to move and to alienate their labour. But what might it mean under conditions in which alternative employment and housing is scarce, education and skill levels are low, and farms fail to meet statutory standards? Who would bear the burden of vindicating the rights of those millions living in servitude? Everyone. The servitude of most farm workers can no longer be viewed solely through the prism of employer-employee relations. Take the synoptic view and it becomes clear that the problem of farm workers in South Africa is a problem of caste.

Recasting the problem of farm workers in terms of caste makes it slightly less amenable to resolution in the adversarial setting of a court. To remedy this problem of caste one must engage all of the social conditions that reinforce such depridations.[1] It requires a concerted effort to not only enforce basic employment conditions but also to invest in education, to redistribute land and to create jobs. Described thus, this violation of FC s 13's prohibition of servitude turns as much on the state's failiure to provide access to adequate housing, health care, food, education, legal representation and social security, as it does on any given farmer's refusal to abide by the BCEA.[2] Described thus, it is the state — in concert with private parties — that must develop a comprehensive programme designed to realize progressively the manumission of South Africa's farm workers.[3]

[1] Many farmers do not compensate their employees at the rates required nor do they create the work environment contemplated by the BCEA, Sectoral Determination 8 or other applicable legislation. See SAHRC Farming Inquiry (supra) at iv–vi ('[D]espite constitutional provisions and the promulgation of legislation such as ESTA and LTA to protect those whose tenure on land is legally insecure, there is a clear lack of support for the legislation . . . and widespread lack of compliance.')

[2] SAHRC Farming Inquiry (supra) at 7–56. The SAHRC Farming Inquiry details the Government's comprehensive failure to alter the current social, economic and legal status of farm labourers. It notes that workers lack: (a) legal representation when rights are violated; (b) effective child labour structures to eradicate abuses; (c) meaningful protection from violence perpetrated by owners and other members of the community; and (d) access to service delivery from the State and a basic understanding of their entitlements. The SAHRC Farming Inquiry decries the State's abdication of responsibility for service delivery to farm workers and their families. Few housing units have been built in farming communities because both the Department of Land Affairs and the Department of Housing have each decided that the other department must provide housing for farm workers. The Department of Health has not yet devised a comprehensive programme to enable farming communities to secure adequate health-care. The Primary School Nutrition Programme operates nowhere near optimal levels. The Department of Home Affairs bears some responsibility for the inability of farm dwellers to secure social security grants — many farm dwellers do not possess the requisite ID documents and have no idea how to procure them.

[3] Scott's neologism 'diagonality' speaks to circumstances in which both the state and private actors are responsible for creating unconstitutional conditions. In such circumstances, the Bill of Rights will require analysis and may require remedies that address the respective duties imposed upon both state and private actors. See C Scott 'Social Rights: Towards a Principled Pragmatic Judicial Role' (1999) 1 (4) ESR Rev 4, 6 ('There is an important category of cases in which the most effective process would require a joinder of private and state parties in order to facilitate a legal analysis of how to allocate constitutional obligations as between private entities and the State . . . This conceptualisation has considerable potential for promoting a more holistic analysis of human rights violations that are located within a field of overlapping state and non-state power structures.')

This burden is not insuperable. In Grootboom, the Constitutional Court set out the criteria by which it would assess whether the state had discharged its duty to develop a comprehensive programme designed to realize progressively a right.[1] In sum, a state programme to eliminate servitude (1) must ensure that 'the appropriate financial and human resources are available'; (2) 'must be capable of facilitating the realisation of the right'; (3) must be reasonable 'both in their conception and their implementation'; (4) must attend to 'crises'; (5) must not exclude 'a significant segment' of the effected population; and (6) must 'respond to the urgent needs of those in desperate situations.'[2] A state programme that meets these criteria would constitute the remedy appropriate for a violation of FC s 13's prohibition against servitude.[3]

The Grootboom criteria provide a useful rubric for appraising the reasonableness of the government's efforts to amediorate conditions of servitude. However, our use of these socio-economic rights criteria is not meant to suggest that only the state can violate FC s 13. They simply draw our attention to the multi-dimensional nature of the problem of farm worker servitude. Where individual instances of servitude are a consequence of the relationship between private

[1] Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom').

[2] Ibid at paras 39–46, 52, 53, 63–69, 74 83. For a similar analysis in terms of the state's obligations vis-à-vis the right to food, see D Brand 'Food' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 56C.

[3] But what if conditions are such that even a properly conceived and fully executed state programme failed to enable farm labourers to move off the land into employment? This question has more than rhetorical force. Given the high levels of structural unemployment in our economy, it is certainly plausible that well-serviced farm workers and their families might still lack new and meaningful work opportunities. See M Legum 'Livelihoods, Not Employment' (2003) 3 (22) South African New Economics 1 ('First, unemployment is world-wide; and new jobs everywhere, including the US, are casualised, low-paid, low-skilled and often temporary. Second, … with few exceptions, skills are not the problem. More education and more skills means more skilled and educated unemployed people.') See also M Legum 'Does this Explain Rejection of the BIG?' (2003) 3 (23) South African New Economics 1 (Gap between jobs and job-seekers is growing.) We would argue that under such conditions the state would have discharged its duty. For although the farm workers and their families would still 'belong' to the land, the actual improvement in the quality of life would have elevated their status well above that of a serf. The state's first obligation is the dignity of its citizens. A comprehensive programme that addresses the education, health care, physical security and land tenure needs of farm workers would give them that dignity.

That freedom through work cannot be the threshold test for a programme designed to eradicate servitude does not mean that the state ought not to devise public works programmes where possible. See I Friedman 'Basic Income and/or Public Works?' (2003) 3 (24) South African New Economics 1 (Arguing that 'fears that the wages for public works programmes would undermine the struggle for a living wage are unfounded' and that 'public works wages . . . set at the minimum wage . . . establish these as de facto rather than theoretical levels.') It only means that neither the availability of private employment nor the creation of EPWP jobs ought to be the measure of success for a state programme designed to eradicate farm worker servitude.

parties, the private party responsible for creating the conditions of servitude is the party that must bear the burden of setting things right.[1]

(d) Domestic workers

The condition of the roughly one million domestic workers in South Africa bears more than a passing resemblance to that of farm workers.[2] Although the state has made significant efforts to turn this historically inhospitable informal sector of the economy into a substantially more formal and equitable sector, domestic workers are often only notionally 'free' to alter their conditions of employment.[3]

Other jurisdictions have analysed the hostile working environment of domestic servants in terms of slavery and servitude. In United States v Ingalls, a US federal district court extended the accepted definitions of slavery and servitude beyond the specific form of ante-bellum slavery towards which the 13th Amendment had been directed.[4] The Ingalls court wrote:

> There is an abundance of evidence which establishes that the defendant Elizabeth Cocker kept one Dora L Jones, a Negro woman, in her household as a servant during a period in excess of twenty-five years. . . . that . . . said servant was required to . . . perform practically all of the household labour . . . was forbidden to leave the household except for the commission of errands and performed drudgery of the most menial . . . type without compensation. There is evidence that the food furnished to her by the defendant was of a substantially lower quality than that common to servants generally . . . [that] she was denied the right to have friends and was required to send away relative[s] who called upon her.[5]

Combined with threats of imprisonment and institutionalisation, this hostile work environment created conditions that led Ms Jones to believe that she was not free to leave. The Ingalls court likewise concluded that Ms Jones was wholly subject to the will of the defendant, had no freedom of action and lived in a state of enforced compulsory service. As Goluboff notes, the case signals a shift in the

[1] Our use of socio-economic rights' justification criteria is not meant to suggest that an internal limitation ought to be read into FC s 13. The general limitation clause remains the appropriate vehicle for justification of any rule of law that impairs the right. But see New National Party of South Africa v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)(Majority and minority use rationality and reasonableness tests, respectively, to determine whether or not the government had discharged its obligations under FC s 19.)

[2] See Statistics South Africa Labour Force Survey (2004), available at www.statssa.gov.za. Approximately 1 013 000 women work as housekeepers, cooks and nannies. Ibid at v. About 218 000 men work as gardeners and security guards. Ibid at 31. Most of these workers are of African and Coloured descent. Ibid at vi. Domestic workers represent roughly 9% of all formal and informal employment in South Africa. However, they reflect 18.6% of female employment and only 0.6% of male employment. Ibid at v.

[3] Under the Basic Conditions Act, s 1, a domestic worker is 'an employee who performs domestic work in the home of his or her employer and includes — (a) a gardener; (b) a person employed by a household as driver of a motor vehicle; and (c) a person who takes care of children, the aged, the sick, the frail or the disabled.'

[4] 73 F Supp 76, 77–79 (SD Cal 1947).

[5] Ibid at 78.

doctrine of servitude from one anchored in clear manifestations of physical constraint and indebtedness to one focused on the actual lived experience of workers.[1] It also signalled a shift in the role of government — from that 'of policing contracts to one of ensuring labourers their freedom.'[2]

Many domestic workers in South Africa find themselves in an Ingalls-like environment. Their hostile work environment coupled with an absence of alternative employment, limited education and low skills conspire to keep a large number of women in conditions of servitude.

What then should we make of recent econometric research which suggests that the situation of domestic workers may not be as dire as that of farm workers? The government has attempted to improve the labour conditions for domestic workers through BCEA, Sectoral Determination 7.[3] This sectoral determination contains detailed provisions on minimum wages,[4] working hours,[5] leave,[6] and termination of employment.[7] The determination also includes a prohibition on child labour and forced labour.[8] Hertz contends that these regulations benefit many domestic workers and, thankfully, do them very little harm.[9] Wages for domestic work have gone up faster than the CPI and faster than wages in demographically comparable occupational sectors.[10] The regulations, Hertz suggests,

[1] R Goluboff 'The Thirteenth Amendment and the Lost Origins of Civil Rights' (2001) 50 Duke Law Journal 1609.

[2] Ibid at 1667–1668.

[3] Government Notice R1068 Government Gazette 23732 (15 August 2002).

[4] Part B. In November of 2002, a schedule of minimum wages, including time-and-a-half provisions for overtime work, went into effect. As Hertz observes 'The minima were set above the median hourly wages that prevailed at the time, making this a significant intervention in the domestic worker labour market.' T Hertz 'Have Minimum Wages Benefited South Africa's Domestic Service Workers?' African Development and Poverty Reduction Forum Paper 4 (13 October 2004).

[5] Sectoral Determination 7, Part D.

[6] Sectoral Determination 7, Part E.

[7] Sectoral Determination 7, Part G.

[8] Section 23.

[9] Hertz (supra) at 1–22. Hertz traces the effects of multiple changes in the legal regime that governs domestic workers. He notes that:

> [I]n September of 2002 South Africa's . . . domestic workers were granted formal labor market protection, including the right to a written contract with their employers, the right to paid leave, to severance pay, and to notice prior to dismissal. Employers were . . . required to register their domestic workers with the Unemployment Insurance Fund (UIF) and to withhold UIF contributions from their paychecks. In November of 2002, a schedule of minimum wages, including time-and-a-half provisions for overtime work, went into effect. The minima were set above the median hourly wages that prevailed at the time, making this a significant intervention in the domestic worker labour market.

Ibid at 2.

[10] Ibid at 1 ('The regulations do appear to have raised wages: Average nominal hourly wages for domestic workers in September of 2003 were 23% higher than they had been in September 2002, while for demographically similar workers in other occupations the nominal wage increase was less than 5%. Econometric evidence supports the conclusion that the wage increases were caused by the regulations, since the largest increases are seen in places where the greatest number of workers were initially below the minimum wage.') have had a palpable effect on non-wage labour conditions as well. Hertz writes that:

> The proportion of domestics who report having a written contract with their employer rose from 7% in February of 2002 to 25% in September of 2003; and the number who report UIF deductions rose from 3% to 25%.[1]

Even proponents of these minimum standards feared that these laws might have the unintended consequence of driving down both employment figures and real wages for domestic workers. Two years of statistics allay these concerns. While hours of work among domestic workers employed 'fell by about 4%', this change was largely consistent with hours worked in other occupations. Moreover, while domestic worker employment levels also fell by 3%, Hertz concluded that that the decrease was not 'causally connected to the wage changes,' and that the decrease was in line with 'the rate of decline of the employment-to-population ratio for demographically similar workers in other occupations.'[2]

As Hertz concedes, such news is not really all that cheery. Only 25% of workers have a written contract and have UIF deducted. Only 22% receive paid leave. Just over 10% have a pension. Less than 2% have any health insurance. In light of such substantial non-compliance with the statutory and the regulatory framework governing domestic employees, Hertz tells us that we ought to be pleased that conditions for domestic workers are not worse and that the law has not made them so.

Given Hertz's analysis, the crisp question is whether the presence of this regulatory framework is sufficient to discharge the state's obligations under FC s 13. As Brand notes in his analysis of the government's efforts to fulfil its duties under FC s 27, the government must do more than simply craft a reasonable response to a constitutionally suspect set of practices. It must execute effectively its policies.[3] FC s 13 along with the Basic Conditions Act and Sectoral Determination 7 offer some consolation to those individual workers, who, with access to representation, can liberate themselves from their immediate conditions of confinement. But neither FC 13 nor BCEA Sectoral Determination 7 protect the vast majority of domestic workers who lack both access to counsel and meaningful employment alternatives. To discharge its duty to promote and to fulfil the rights of domestic workers, the state must develop a more comprehensive and coordinated programme to realize progressively the manumission of South Africa's domestic workers.[4] [1] Hertz (supra) at 2.

[2] Ibid at 6–9.

[3] See D Brand 'Food' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) § 56.3.

[4] The elasticity of the term 'servitude' tempts us to extend the reach of FC s 13 to hostile work environments in which the woman harassed has no choice but to accept sexual harassment as a deleterious condition of employment. See J Conn 'Sexual Harassment: A Thirteenth Amendment Response' (1995) 28 Columbia J Law & Social Problems 519, 548–556 (Conn argues that the 13th Amendment not only 'freed female slaves,' but also 'forbade the sexual exploitation that accompanied slavery.') See also J McConnell 'Beyond Metaphor: Battered Women, Involuntary Servitude and the

(e) Child labour

According to the law, child labour ought not to exist in South Africa. The Child Care Act, s 52A(1), prohibits any employment of a child under 15 without a special exemption from the Minister.[1] This prohibition is repeated in BCEA, s 43.[2] The soon to be enacted Children's Bill characterises child labour as a form of abuse and exploitation.[3] Section 28(1) of the Final Constitution reads, in relevant part, that '[e]very child has the right (e) to be protected from exploitative labour practices; (f) not to be required or permitted to perform work or provide services that — (i) are inappropriate for a person of that child's age; or (ii) place at risk the child's well-being, education, physical or mental health, or spiritual, moral or social development.'[4] South Africa is also a signatory to a number of international instruments that tightly regulate child labour.[5]

Despite such comprehensive regulation, more than one out of every three Thirteenth Amendment' (1992) 4 Yale J Law & Feminism 207. (Given that Courts have found that 13th Amendment prohibits any practice characteristic of chattel slavery, and sexual exploitation was a characteristic of chattel slavery, severe forms of sexual exploitation are the kinds of practice that the 13th Amendment was designed to eliminate.) One common objection to expanding the ambit of the 13th Amendment to capture sexual harassment is that servitude cannot take place in the context of a voluntary labour environment. A second objection is that the attempt to squeeze sexual harassment into this particular legal category hampers the development of more nuanced understandings of this offence and actually raises the threshold for demonstrating that sexual harassment has occurred.

[1] Act 74 of 1983.

[2] Act 75 of 1997.

[3] Bill 70 of 2003, s 1(1).

[4] For a detailed discussion of FC s 28, see A Friedman & A Pantazis 'Children's Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) Chapter 47. BCEA, s 43 rehearses the prohibitions of FC s 28(1)(f).

[5] See Convention on the Rights of the Child; Convention Concerning the Prohibition and Immediate Action for the Elimination of the Worst Forms of Child Labour (1999)('Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention'). The Worst Forms of Child Labour Convention, Article 3, defines the worst forms of child labour as (a) all forms of slavery or practices similar to slavery, such as the sale and trafficking of children, debt bondage and serfdom and forced or compulsory labour, including forced or compulsory recruitment of children for use in armed conflict; (b) the use, procuring or offering of a child for prostitution, for the production of pornography or for pornographic performances; (c) the use, procuring or offering of a child for illicit activities, in particular for the production and trafficking of drugs as defined in the relevant international treaties; (d) work which . . . is likely to harm the health, safety or morals of children.' For the obligations imposed by these conventions on state parties, see § 64.4*(b)* supra. See also Convention Concerning Minimum Age For Admission to Employment ILO No 138 (Ratified by South Africa on 30 March 2000)('Minimum Age Convention'). Minimum Age Convention, Article 1, obliges South Africa to 'undertake to pursue a national policy designed to ensure the effective abolition of child labour and to raise progressively the minimum age for admission to employment or work to a level consistent with the fullest physical and mental development of young persons.' The number of international instruments regulating child labour is partially explained by the fact that of the 250 million children who work, 60 million children work in 'especially horrific circumstances'. See UNICEF 'Beyond Child Labour: Affirming Rights' (2001), available at www.unicef.org, (accessed on 14 May 2004).

children work.[1] Poverty and adult unemployment are the primary drivers of illegal child labour.[2] Most adults who worked as children do not possess a proper education and cannot command a living wage. Ultimately, they come to rely upon their children to supplement family income. A large pool of child labourers forced by parents to work on the cheap creates incentives for employers in labour intensive industries to hire children.[3]

The social and economic conditions that reinforce this vicious cycle 'require interventions above and beyond [legal prohibitions] directed to the employment context.'[4] Sufficient welfare entitlements would be a start. However, the government currently fails to provide 'social security . . . for children older than six years.'[5] Because the current under-inclusive and under-financed child support entitlements programme supports children financially only until they are six years old but prohibits them from working until they are 15, many children above the age of six are therefore obliged to work illegally and under conditions tantamount to forced labour. Only a more inclusive benefits scheme will diminish the susceptibility of child labourers to exploitation.[6]

[1] South African Law Commission Review of the Child Care Act Discussion Paper 103 (2001)('SALC Review of the Child Care Act') 592 citing Network Against Child Labour and the Child Labour Intersectoral Group 'Child Labour in South Africa' (March 2001). This statistic is somewhat inflated. The definition of 'child labour' used was 'at least three hours per week per child being spent in economic activities, at least seven hours per week in domestic chores, or at least five hours per week in school labour (i.e. cleaning or improvement of school premises).' However, the study found that '551 000 children spent at least 8 hours per week in economic activities. For 95 000 of them, 36 or more hours were spent in such work. For 23 000, time at work exceeded 50 hours per week.' The effect of such work — however limited — ought not to be discounted. It impairs learning. The main sectors for child labour are prostitution — see § 64.6*(a)* supra — commercial agriculture — see § 64.6*(c)* supra — domestic service — see § 64.6*(d)* supra — street trading, the taxi industry and brickyards. See SALC Review of the Child Care Act (supra) at 592. Finally, the Law Commission found that the law does little to control this problem: '[B]oth section 52A of the Child Care Act and section 43 of the BCEA are ignored on a wide scale.' SALC Review of the Child Care Act (supra) at 602.

[2] See J Loffell 'Child Labour: Economic Exploitation as a Form of Child Abuse' (1993) 43 Critical Health 38. See also SALC Review of the Child Care Act (supra) at 591 ('[I]mproving schooling for the poor is often identified as the single most effective way to prevent children from entering abusive forms of work.')

[3] See NGO Group for the CRC Sub-Group on Child Labour 'The Impact of Discrimination on Working Children and on the Phenomenon of Child Labour' (June 2002) 1.

[4] SALC Review of the Child Care Act (supra) at 594.

[5] Ibid at 606. However, according to an announcement by the Department of the Treasury in March 2005, the government will immediately extend benefits to children up to 13 years of age. The Department of Social Development states that the current scheme will be extended, by the end of 2006, to children up to 14 years of age. See Department of Social Development 'Child Grants 2004' (2004), available at www.socdev.gov.za, (accessed on 15 December 2004).

[6] There are two general approaches to the eradication of child labour. The abolitionist school asserts the need for a complete ban of child labour. See SALC Review of the Child Care Act (supra) at 593. See A Bequele 'The Effective Elimination of Child Labour: Challenges and Opportunities' Conference Paper, ISPCAN Congress (Durban 2000) as cited in SALC Review of Child Care Act (supra) at 593 (Argues that some nations advocate a total ban because they are interested in protecting local jobs and markets from the effects of cheap, child-produced goods.) The regulation school recognizes that poverty necessitates child labour and that only a well-conceived regulatory framework can minimise its negative impact. The regulation school advocates flexible school hours to allow children to work and to study, children's trade unions, skills training, and programmes to promote awareness of poverty eradication programmes. SALC Review of the Child Care Act (supra) at 594-5.

As our previous analysis suggests, child labour violates FC s 13 in two distinct ways.[1]

Child labour may amount to forced labour.[2] While a fairly well-developed regulatory framework for child labour places obvious limits on the need for constitutional challenges under the Bill of Rights,[3] an FC s 13 challenge can meaningfully supplement existing statutory remedies. First, enforcement efforts by state officials are plagued by 'gaps or excessive complexity in legislation, inadequate penalties, ignorance of the law and of the hazards of child labour, and problems related to inspectorates as causative factors.'[4] The institutions charged with oversight of child labour laws — the inspectorates — 'tend to have capacity problems; they may lack legal access to sites of child labour; or they may be affected by low motivation, poor pay and/or corruption.'[5] Second, the statutory framework is not as comprehensive as it ought to be. No protection is afforded children who complain to the authorities.[6] No plans exist to prevent children from returning to an exploitative labour environment after they have been removed from it.[7] An FC s 13 forced labour challenge ought to put the state

[1] Some commentators argue that certain forms of child labour are so abusive as to be tantamount to slavery. See A Amar & D Widawsky 'Child Abuse as Slavery: A Thirteenth Amendment Response to Deshaney' (1992) 105 Harvard LR 1359. Child labour is, quite often, a form of child abuse. See Children's Bill, s 1 (Defines 'abuse' as including 'committing an exploitative labour practice in relation to a child.') See also A Bequele 'The Effective Elimination of Child Labour: Challenges and Opportunities' Paper Presented at ISPCAN Congress, Durban (2000)(Suggests that child labour is the most prevalent form of child abuse.) Fieldwork in South Africa, and experiences around the continent, support affording parents of families in difficult straits the freedom to arrange for their children to engage in light work. Moreover, Amar and Widawsky's 13th Amendment slavery argument appears to be motivated primarily by the absence of an express constitutional prohibition on forced labour. Slavery arguments ought to be reserved for those transactions in which the child is transformed into a piece of property to be exploited for the benefit of third parties and is forced into employment that extinguishes most, if not all indicia of individual autonomy. See § 64.4*(a)* supra.

[2] See § 64.4*(c)* supra. Recall that the term 'forced labour' captures work by dint of physical force or menace of penalty. But it also denotes those labour practices where an employer is able to exploit an employee's radically constrained options in order to induce her to work for pay and in circumstances that fall far below acceptable labour standards. The labour standards found in the manifold statutory prohibitions on child labour provide a useful departure point for FC s 13 analysis.

[3] It is trite law to assert that where sufficient statutory or common law remedies exist to address pressing social problems, courts should not resort to the creation of novel constitutional doctrines to effect the same ends. See S v Mhlungu 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 277 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) at para 59 ('[W]here it is possible to decide any case, civil or criminal, without reaching a constitutional issue, that is the course which should be followed.') See also Zantsi v Council of State, Ciskei 1995 (4) SA 615 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1424 (CC) at para 8; I Currie 'Judicious Avoidance' (1999) 15 SAJHR 138. But see SALC Review of Child Care Act (supra) at 608 ('A disadvantage of this approach is that the enforcement of labour regulations does not ipso facto involve action to address the social context of the child in illegal employment and his or her family. Neither does it offer any remedies for the situation of such a child once the employer has been dealt with and the illegal practice ended.')

[4] SALC Review of the Child Care Act (supra) at 604.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid at 604-5.

[7] Ibid at 608 ('Neither does [regulating child labour under labour law] offer any remedies for the situation of such a child once the employer has been dealt with and the illegal practice ended.') on notice that its failure to enforce existing law and to develop policy initiatives to deal with the extant law's inadequacies have risen to the level of a constitutional offence.[1]

Child labour can also be viewed as a form of servitude.[2] The Supplementary Convention extends 'servitude' to:

> Any institution or practice whereby a child or young person under the age of 18 years, is delivered by either or both of his natural parents or by his guardian to another person, whether for reward or not, with a view to the exploitation of the child or young person or of his labour.[3]

The current entitlements regime for children conspires with conditions of poverty and poor law enforcement to create a hostile and a coercive work environment from which poor children cannot extricate themselves. The virtue of identifying child labour as a form of servitude is that it holds both private parties and state actors responsible for the perpetuation of exploitative child labour practices.[4]

(f) Prison labour

Compulsory prison labour raises two issues for the purposes of FC s 13 analysis. Is forced labour a necessary consequence of incarceration? Is there any rehabilitative benefit to forced prison labour?

De Jonge has argued that prison labour should not be compulsory.[5] Despite the now 'conventional wisdom' on the subject,[6] he claims that:

[1] See Grootboom (supra) at 42 (State obliged not simply to devise a comprehensive plan but to execute it); Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape v Ngxuza 2001 (4) SA 1184 (SCA) at paras 14 — 16 (While not the function of courts to criticize construction of social policy by state, the courts are obliged to create adequate remedies where the state 'impede[s] the rightful claims of its citizens.') See also SALC Review of the Child Care Act (supra) at 608 (Noting that the existing set of remedies for exploitative child labour practices constitute too blunt a cudgel, and that a far more polycentric approach to the social, economic and legal conditions that fuel child labour practices is required.)

[2] See § 64.4*(b)* supra.

[3] Article 1*(d)*.

[4] The Child Labour Action Program ('CLAP') illustrates the kind of comprehensive and co-ordinated plan required to eliminate child labour as a form of servitude. See Department of Labour, South African Child Labour Action Programme (6 May 1998). CLAP demands broad public and private participation: it creates distinct roles for government departments, NGO's, trade unions and employer organizations. SALC Review of the Child Care Act (supra) at 602. The Department of Labour, the Department of Education and the Department of Welfare must collectively devise a plan that enhances existing employment law, education policy, access to adequate social security, programmes to alleviate child poverty, and social mobilisation. CLAP is meant to address the very conditions that give rise to and perpetuate exploitative child practices.

Ghana has implemented such a programme. Children's Act of 1998. The carefully calibrated provisions of the Act distinguish appropriate work for children in both formal and informal economies from inappropriate work, and establish minimum age requirements for light work (13), normal work (15), and hazardous work (18). Ibid at ss 89–91. These age limits take seriously the need for some children to engage in the small amount of work required to ensure the survival of the household. Indeed, South Africa's own Children's Bill, s 16, recognises that: 'Every child has responsibilities appropriate to the child's age and ability towards his or her family, community and the state.'

[5] G De Jonge 'Still 'Slaves of the State': Prison Labour and International Law' in D van Zyl Smit & F Dünkel (eds) Prison Labour: Salvation or Slavery (1999) 329.

[6] Ibid at 329.

> A prison sentence means no more and no less than a deprivation of liberty . . . [I]t does not implicitly licence prison administrations to rob the prisoner of his only remaining asset: the value of his labour.[1]

De Jonge's position derives some support from recent case law. Prisoners retain all rights not necessarily removed by incarceration.[2] At a minimum, they possess a prima facie right not to be subject to forced labour. Section 36 of the new Correctional Services Act ('CSA') reads:

> With due regard to the fact that the deprivation of liberty serves the purpose of punishment, the implementation of a sentence of imprisonment has the objective of enabling the sentenced prisoner to lead a socially responsible and crime-free life in the future. [3]

The CSA does not characterize labour as a punishment. The above language from the CSA suggests that labour serves the purposes of incarceration only when it advances rehabilitative ends. In addition, while the correctional services regime in South Africa currently requires all sentenced prisoners to perform labour,[4] the CSA places significant restrictions on the exercise of this power by prison administrators. Sick prisoners may not be forced to work.[5] More importantly for our purposes, prisoners may 'never be instructed or compelled to work as a form of punishment or disciplinary measure.'[6]

The general prohibition on the use of labour as punishment is undercut by CSA s 16. CSA s 16 holds that it is a disciplinary infringement if a prisoner 'fails or refuses to perform any labour or other duty imposed or authorised by this Act.'[7] So although labour itself may not be meted out as punishment, a prisoner may be punished for refusing to do it.[8] By ensuring that prison labour takes place 'under the menace of . . . penalty,' CSA s 16 turns prison labour into a species of forced labour.[9]

---

[1] De Jonge (supra) at 330.

[2] Minister of Justice v Hofmeyr 1993 (3) SA 131 (A); August & Another v Electoral Commission & Others 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC) at para 18 ('It is a well established principle of our common law, predating the era of constitutionalism, that prisoners are entitled to all their personal rights and personal dignity not temporarily taken away by law, or necessarily inconsistent with the circumstances in which they have been placed.' Courts hold that prisoners retain the right to register to vote and the right to exercise franchise); Minister of Home Affairs v Nicro & Others 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC)(Court held that prisoners could not, without compelling justification, be divested of their constitutional rights, generally, and their right to vote, in particular); Thukwane v Minister of Correctional Services & Others 2003 (1) SA 51 (T)(Prisoners retain their right to education, although this right is limited by their circumstances.) See also D van Zyl Smit 'Sentencing and Punishment' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 49.

[3] Act 111 of 1998 ('CSA').

[4] CSA ss 37 and 40(1). CSA s 40(1) reads, in relevant part: 'Sufficient work must as far as is practicable be provided to keep prisoners active for a normal working day and a prisoner may be compelled to do such work.' (Our emphasis). This section recently replaced similar provisions in the Correctional Services Act 8 of 1959, s 77.

[5] CSA s 37(1)(b).

[6] CSA s 40(5).

[7] CSA s 23(1)(d)(Our emphasis.)

[8] Penalties range from a reprimand (CSA ss 24(3)(a) and 24(5)(a)) to a restriction of amenities of up to 42 days (CSA ss 24(3)(c)) and 24(5)(c)) to 30 days solitary confinement (CSA s 24(5)(d)).

[9] Van der Mussele v Belgium (1984) 6 EHRR 163, 173.

[1] See ICCPR, Article 8(3)(c)(i); ECHR, Article 4(3)(a); American Convention on Human Rights

Assume, for the sake of argument, that CSA s 16 was repealed. Would the CSA's compulsory prison labour provisions still infringe FC s 13? Most international human rights instruments that prohibit forced labour make an exception for labour imposed on people detained by an order of court.[1] FC s 13 makes no such exception.[2]

Assume that opponents of prison labour succeed in establishing that the impugned provisions of the CSA constitute a prima facie infringement of FC s 13. Can the impugned provisions be justified by reference to FC s 36? While this is not the space for a detailed analysis of the CSA, we can offer a number of general observations.

Advocates of prison labour generally proffer five justifications for prison labour: (1) rehabilitation; (2) restitution; (3) prison order; (4) prison costs; and (5) the mental and physical well-being of the incarcerated population. Of these, the discipline and the skills needed to survive in the post-prison work-place are said to constitute the strongest justification for compulsory prison labour.[3] In South Africa, this justification has little purchase. For although all prisoners

Article, 6(3)(a) and the ILO Forced Labour Convention, Article 2(1)(c). See, in particular, Van Droogenbroeck v Belgium (1982) 4 EHRR 443 (Belgian prisoner contended that the prison labour system of Belgium violated the Article 4 of the European Convention. The applicant would only be eligible for parole after saving 12 000 Belgian Francs through his prison work. The court dismissed the claim based upon the exception for prison labour found in Article 4(3)(a).)

[2] See D van Zyl Smit & F Dunkel 'Conclusion: Prison Labour Salvation or Slavery' in D van Zyl Smit & F Dunkel (supra) at 337 ('[T]he principle that sentenced prisoners have a formal duty to work is so well established in South Africa that this particular provision of the Constitution is likely to be regarded as subject to an implicit limitation.') But see Van Zyl Smit 'Sentencing' (supra) at 35 (Contends that a challenge to prison labour based on FC s 13 might succeed. The existence of different ends for incarceration — retributive and rehabilitative — and the purpose of different kinds of labour — kitchen work as necessity, rock quarry as punitive — suggests that not every kind of prison labour constitutes a prima facie infringement of FC s 13. Even if a particular form of prison labour is found to fall within the ambit of forced labour, the state may have an opportunity to justify its work programme under FC s 36.) See, generally, S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2005) Chapter 34

[3] See K Hafner & E Zurcher Schweizerische Gefängiskunde (1925) 160-1, as quoted and translated in A Baechtold 'Switzerland' in Van Zyl Smit & Dunkel (supra) at 260:

> Prison labour is no longer a punishment, even if individual prisoners might take it to be practically the same thing. Work and movement are the bases of physical and psychological vitality. Work helps to make discipline more pleasant, promote a sense of security, and improve a prisoner's chances of coping after their release. Its highest goal, however, is to contribute to the improvement of the prisoners; to convey the conviction that it is only hard work which both provides the individual with a basis for personal satisfaction and a livelihood-in other words, his happiness- as well as providing the foundation for the well-being of the nation.

Baechtold himself offers an opposing view of the Swiss commitment to state enforcement of this strict work ethic in prison. He writes:

> [I]ncreasingly, the duty to work as part of a prison sentence is a contradiction in the wider world of work. The ordinary worker, as a result of not only economic but also structurally related unemployment, sees a job as a rare advantage, while the convicted prisoner receives work from the state. This conflicts with the widely accepted criminological viewpoint that the environment inside the prison should reflect the environment outside the prison as much as possible.

Ibid at 265-6.

may be required to work, few are given the opportunity to do so.[1] This absence of work and skills development opportunities in prison may be one of the reasons for the high rate of recidivism in South Africa.[2]

This gulf between ideal and reality with respect to prison job training opportunities raises a related limitations question. Can the state justify a compulsory prison labour programme when only 8.8% of prisoners are offered any kind of employment?[3] The answer should be a qualified yes. Assuming that the state is able to demonstrate a correlation between prison labour and rehabilitation, and assuming that the state is able to show that prison labour is not used as a penalty over and above sentencing, the mere fact that only some prisoners are required to work is not, alone, sufficient to undermine the justification for the state's prison labour initiatives.

(g) Community service and public works

'Normal civic obligations' are generally excluded from most international documents prohibiting forced labour.[4] Despite this exception, the ECHR Court and the ECHR Commission have heard several challenges to compulsory community service programmes. While all of these challenges have failed, the cases have refined our understanding of forced labour in the context of compulsory community service.

In Van der Mussele v Belgium, a pupil avocat challenged legislation that obliged him to represent a certain number of clients without payment or compensation for expenses. The Van der Mussele Court first asked whether the labour was performed under the menace of any penalty and whether it was involuntary.[5] It found that refusal of admittance to a profession amounted to 'any penalty' and [1] See South African Human Rights Commission Report of the National Prisons Project (1997) ('SAHRC Report on Prisons'). As of 31 December 1997, for 100 975 sentenced (able to work) prisoners, only 8 895 (8.8% of sentenced and able to work prisoners) work opportunities per day were offered. Only 1 270 prisoners (1.25%) were involved in vocational training. Only 7 108 prisoners (7.03%) received career-directed skills training. See also Department of Correctional Services 'Statistics' Annual Report on Prisons (1997). Although these statistics are dated, no current exists to suggest any significant improvement.

[2] SAHRC Report on Prisons (supra) at 25 ('The acquisition of adequate skills very often is the key to successful rehabilitation. The problem of recidivism in the SA prison system is exacerbated by the reality that our prisons have simply been unable to prepare prisoners meaningfully for release or to cope in the outside world. The available statistics show a negligible proportion of the prison population as beneficiaries of training.') Many more South African prisoners complain of idleness and lack of work opportunities than of forced labour. Ibid at 24.

[3] Ibid at 9–23.

[4] See ICCPR, Article 8(3)(c)(iv); European Convention of Human Rights, Article 4(3)(d), American Convention of Human Rights, Article 6(3)(d) and the ILO Forced Labour Convention, Article 2(1)(b).

[5] Van der Mussele v Belgium (supra) at 173-4. The ECHR Commission had adopted a somewhat different approach to the case. It held that for labour to qualify as forced labour, it must be performed: (a) against the will of the person; and (b) must be 'unjust', 'oppressive' or constitute an 'unavoidable hardship'. The ECHR Commission followed this approach in X v Federal Republic of Germany (1978) 17 Yearbook of the European Convention on Humann Rights 118; Gussenbauer v Austria (1975) 15 Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights 148; and Iversen v Norway (1963) 6 Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights 327.

that the choice of profession did not amount to consent to perform community service. The Van der Mussele Court then asked whether the burden imposed by the labour was 'so excessive or disproportionate to the advantages attached to the future exercise of that profession that the service could not be treated as having been voluntarily accepted beforehand.'[1] The Van der Mussele Court held that the burden of the labour did not outweigh the benefit of entry into the profession. The community service was, therefore, not forced labour.[2]

Van der Mussele offers a useful model for analyzing community service in terms of forced labour under FC s 13. The first step of a court's enquiry should be to determine whether the community service was involuntary and performed under the menace of any penalty. If so, then the court ought to view the community service programme as a prima facie infringement of FC s 13.[3] Assuming that the community service programme has been effected in terms of a law of general application, the court may then weigh the societal benefits of community service against the burdens imposed upon the person forced to engage in a particular kind of labour.

Community service as a pre-condition for plying a trade is not an abstract issue in South Africa. Community service is required for aspiring doctors[4] and pharmacists.[5] Lawyers may soon be added to the list.[6]

Community services programmes can occur in contexts other than entry qualifications for professions. Community service programmes often feature as part of secondary school education and may even constitute a condition for graduation. These programmes are justified on the grounds that they promote awareness and acceptance of the responsibilities of citizenship.[7]

Objections to such community service programmes as educational tools take two forms. First, these programmes and classes are said to violate the freedom of expression by forcing students to endorse a particular understanding of citizenship. Second, any component of community service programmes that requires students to work for the benefit of others — or the commonwealth — constitutes servitude or forced labour.

[1] Van der Mussele v Belgium (supra) at 175. Requiring a person to do work completely unrelated to his profession (such as requiring a medical student to work on a building site) could constitute a 'disproportionate use' of services.

[2] The ECHR Court did not consider whether, under ECHR, Article 4(3)(d), the community service at issue fell within 'normal civic obligations' exception. It left open the question as to whether labour required only of a specific class of people is still saved by this exception. Ibid at 178.

[3] See § 64.4*(c)* supra.

[4] Health Professions Act 56 of 1974, s 24A.

[5] Pharmacy Act 53 of 1974, s 14A.

[6] Legal Practitioner's Bill [B-00] 2000, s 13*(b)*(i).

[7] One reason a community service programme as part of a civics curriculum is to be preferred to classroom instruction alone is that most studies confirm the commonplace pedagogical verity that learning is most effective where a student is called upon to perform a concrete task. See M Csikszentmihali & I Csikszentmihali (eds) Optimal Experience: Psychological Studies of Flow in Consciousness (1990). Community service is, in this regard, much like laboratory training in one of the natural sciences. Indeed, studies demonstrate that the most effective learning takes place when the community service is followed by a period of disciplined reflection — in class — on the experience. D Rutter & G Newman 'The Potential of Community Service to Enhance Civic Responsibility' (1989) 53 Social Education 371.

A civics programme certainly reflects a particular conception — however thin — of what citizenship requires. Whether participation in the programme constitutes expressive conduct that is transformed into coerced expression by graduation requirements is another question. Our inclination is to view the students' participation in such classes as a symbolic act designed to convey a message to the rest of the community.[1] That such coerced expression constitutes a prima facie violation of FC s 16 does not mean it cannot be justified under FC s 36.

Duties of citizenship constitute notable exceptions to the prohibition against servitude and forced labour. Courts in other jurisdictions regard the duties of citizenship, however burdensome, as inescapable conditions for political liberty.[2] Should community service programmes that constitute part of a civics curriculum be regarded as inescapable conditions for an open and democratic society committed to human dignity, equality and freedom? The United States Supreme Court has suggested as much. In Bethel School District No. 403 v Fraser, the US Supreme Court wrote:

> The role and the purpose of the . . . public school system were well described by two historians, who stated: 'Public education must prepare pupils for citizenship in the Republic. . . . It must inculcate the habits and manners of civility as values in themselves conducive to happiness, and as indispensable to the practice of self-government in the community and the nation.' . . . The process of educating our youth for citizenship in public schools is not confined to books, the curriculum and the civics classes; schools must teach by example the shared values of a civilized social order.[3]

Community service programmes are an effective method — and perhaps the most narrowly tailored means — of teaching students the requirements of citizenship.

The role of community service programmes in secondary school civics classes suggests how the state might justify community service programme requirements for professionals. First, as the Final Constitution makes clear in FC 3(2), all citizens are 'equally subject to the duties and responsibilities of citizenship.' Community service programmes articulate those responsibilities. Second, those

[1] See Spence v Washington (1974) 418 US 405, 410-411(Whether conduct possesses sufficient communicative elements so as to attract constitutional protection is contingent upon '[a]n intent to convey a particular message' and whether 'the likelihood was great that the message would be understood by those who viewed it.') See also Texas v Johnson (1989) 491 US 397, 404. For more on expressive conduct and freedom of expression, see Dario Milo & A Stein 'Expression' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2005) Chapter 42.

[2] See Butler v Perry (1916) 240 US 328, 333 (Upholding compulsory military service and requirements that able-bodied men build public roads. Such burdens are not without limit. Supreme Court granted the state a citizenship exception only for those public activities without which liberty itself could not be secured.)

[3] (1986) 478 US 675, 681, 683.

persons who benefit from the education they receive from the state ought to appreciate that they incur an obligation to the state and their fellow citizens.[1]

Unlike community service requirements for professional qualifications — where the professional retains a high degree of autonomy — state public works programmes that require that welfare grant recipients actually work for their grants come dangerously close to satisfying the conditions for both servitude and forced labour. 'Workfare', writes Bailey, like peonage or debt bondage, 'exacts mandatory labour as satisfaction for a debt, and imposes legal sanctions for non-performance.'[2] In this relationship, the state replaces the 'employer' as the holder of the debt and the debt to be repaid by the workfare recipient is the welfare grant. To put it slightly differently, when a person receives a welfare grant through a mandatory workfare program, the grant is transformed into a debt, and the debt can only be discharged by the recipient if she engages in the work which the programme compels her to undertake. Workfare creates conditions of involuntary servitude because the only choice the recipient has is to work or to starve.

The status of such public works programmes is a live issue in South Africa. In April 2004, the South African Government launched its Expanded Public Works Programme ('EPWP').[3] The rationale for such work is simple. The DPW notes that as of September 2003:

> 4.6 million people were unemployed in terms of the strict definition and 8.3 million in terms of the broad definition ... The unemployment rate has been growing by 1% to 2% per annum, reaching 30.7% by September 2002. To reach government's target of halving unemployment by 2014 (i.e. reducing the unemployment rate from 30% to 15%),

[1] Given that public service, in one form or another, is an essential condition for the maintenance of a truly democratic republic, the state can make a compelling argument that the doctors, lawyers and pharmacists it trains must not only learn what citizenship demands but reflect that learning in the practice of their profession. One rejoinder might be that students who wish to become doctors, lawyers and pharmacists are being singled out from amongst the larger student body. The appropriate riposte is that no student is obliged to become a doctor, lawyer or pharmacist nor is the state precluded from attaching similar conditions for qualification in other professions. The state must take care, however, that an unintended consequence of its actions is not a significant diminution in either the quantity or the quality of professionals made available to the public — especially in those areas that are in greatest need. Such an outcome could not be justified given that these programmes are designed to increase the quantity and the quality of professionals available to serve those in the greatest need.

[2] C Bailey 'Workfare and Involuntary Servitude: What You Wanted to Know But Were Afraid to Ask' (1995) 15 Boston College Third World LJ 285, 316.

[3] See Department of Labour, Ministerial Determination: Special Public Works Programmes, Basic Conditions of Employment Act, 1997, Government Gazette No 23045 (25 January 2002). Under the auspices of the Department of Public Works ('DPW'), the Department of Labour ('DOL'), Department of Social Development ('DSD'), Department of Environmental Affairs and Tourism ('DEAT'), Department of Trade and Industry ('DTI'), Department of Public Enterprises ('DPE') and South African Local Government Association ('SALGA'), the EPWP created almost 38 000 work opportunities during the first quarter of the financial year 2004/05. See Department of Public Works 'Expanded Public Works Programme' (2004) available at www.epwp.gov.za, (accessed on 19 December 2004).

546,000 new jobs would have to be created each year — 276,000 more than has hitherto been the case.[1]

Unlike workfare programmes in the United States, the EPWP is not meant to supplant other forms of government assistance. Nor are persons who might qualify for EPWP work threatened with the termination of existing benefits should they refuse to make themselves available for work. The EPWP provides a mechanism for income transfer to poor households and for skills development for the heretofore unemployed. The conditions under which a workfare programme might create conditions of servitude do not obtain in South Africa under the EPWP.

(h) Conscription

Conscription in South Africa was abolished in 1993 by the Defence Second Amendment Act.[2] However, various constitutional provisions — eg, FC s 37 — anticipate future exigencies that might require re-enactment of a draft.

Most international and regional human rights treaties exclude expressly conscription from the ambit of their forced labour provisions.[3] FC s 13 does not. As with prison labour and community service, this structured silence should not be read as acquiescence. A criminal sanction attached to a failure to heed a call up would qualify conscription as labour performed under the menace of penalty and satisfy the test for forced labour.[4]

[1] See Department of Public Works 'Expanded Public Works Programme' (2004) available at www.epwp.gov.za, (accessed on 19 December 2004). Most of the unemployed — some 59% — have never worked at all. Amongst youth — defined as persons age 16 to 34 — 70% report never having worked. Such high levels of unemployment married to grinding poverty make the EPWP a necessary addition to the government's armoury of poverty alleviation programmes.

[2] Act 134 of 1993. See End Conscription Campaign v Minister of Defence 1992 (1) SA 589 (T)(Court hears challenge to whites-only conscription. The applicant argued that the Population Registration Act Repeal Act 115 of 1991, which removed the definition of 'white person' in s 1 of the Population Registration Act 30 of 1950, necessarily implied the repeal of whites-only military service under Defence Act 44 of 1957, s 2(1). The court rejected this argument. It held that that: (a) a repeal statute did not repeal provisions of the repealed statute incorporated in another statute; and (b) if the legislature had intended to abolish conscription, it would have done so explicitly.) For a general account of the campaign to abolish conscription, see J Sarkin 'Conscription' (1993) 4 SAHR Yearbook 37; R Louw 'Conscription' (1994) 5 SAHR Yearbook 33.

[3] See § 64.5*(c)* supra. Under international law, states retain the power to conscript. E Marcus 'Conscientious Objection as an Emerging Human Right' (1998) 38 Virginia Journal of International Law 507, 510; M Mthombeni 'Forced Recruitment, A Violation of Human Rights?' (1991-2) 17 SA Yearbook of International Law 12, 14. This power is considered necessary in order to preserve the territory and the political sovereignty of the state. See Mthombeni (supra) at 17 (States retain the right to self-defence in terms of UN Charter, s 2(4). Does a rebel force have a right to conscript in order to overthrow the government? Despite the absence of an expression provision in the Charter, Mthombeni argues that a democratic opposition force representing the people derives a right to conscript from the right to self-determination.) This general power is subject to two provisos. Children under fifteen may not be conscripted. See Article 3*(c)* of the Second Protocol to the Geneva Convention. In South Africa, the Basic Conditions of Employment Act prohibits any employment of children under 15. Recruitment into the armed forces may not be arbitrary or discriminatory. See, eg, Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948); International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1967).

[4] See §64.4*(c)* supra (Definition of forced labour.)

When asked to assess the state's justification for its conscription regime, the courts will pay particular attention to the length and the conditions of the military service. In W, X, Y & Z v United Kingdom, the ECHR Commission went so far as to recognize the possibility that significant restrictions on the inability to leave voluntary military service could amount, not simply to forced labour, but to servitude.[1]

Let us assume that, as a general matter, the state's regime of conscription is not so oppressive as to constitute a violation of the right to be free from forced labour. Can a conscientious objector still rely on FC s 13 and its prohibition of forced labour? Under international law, the right to be free from forced labour excludes conscription 'and, in countries where conscientious objection is recognized, any national service required by law of conscientious objectors.'[2] So even if a conscientious objector could make the case that FC s 13 prohibited the forced labour that conscription entails — which is by no means clear — he or she would be hard pressed to rebuff the state's entreaties to spend a comparable period of time working for the betterment of the commonwealth.[3]

[1] See W, X, Y & Z v The United Kingdom (1968) 11 Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights 562.

[2] ICCPR Article 8(3)(c)(ii).

[3] Conscientious objectors are likely to find greater succour in FC s 15 — freedom of religion, belief and opinion. See Marcus (supra) at 514. FC 15 reads: 'Everyone has the right to freedom of conscience, religion, thought, belief and opinion.' See, generally, P Farlam 'Religion, Belief and Opinion' in M Chaskalson , J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, A Stein & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 41. The strength of the FC s 15 claim is contingent upon the basis for the objection. Courts are often predisposed to vindicate claims grounded in accepted religious practice and less inclined towards the protection of identical claims shorn of their religious moorings. As Farlam correctly observes, however, the text of FC s 15 provides cover for both religious and non-religious practices. It privileges neither one nor the other. See Farlam (supra) at 41-13 — 41-15. See also Prince v President Cape Law Society 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (1) SACR 425 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC); Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051) (CC); S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg 1997 (4) SA 1176 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC).

The right to conscientious objection can also be derived from the rights to life, to association, and to expression. Marcus (supra) at 518 — 524. While this freedom was, at international law, initially construed to exclude conscientious objection, the UN Human Rights Committee notes that although '[t]he Covenant does not explicitly refer to a right to conscientious objection, . . . the Committee believes that such a right can be derived from Article 18.' UN Human Rights Committee, ICCPR, General Comment 22, U.N. Doc. HRI/GEN/1/Rev.3 (1997) 11. Conscientious objection is still not recognised under the ECHR. But see D Decker & L Fresia 'The Status of Conscientious Objection Under Article 4 of the European Convention on Human Rights' (2001) 33 NYU J of Int'l Law and Politics 379, 414-6 (Describing moves towards recognition.) For the early position of the UN Human Rights Committee refuses to ground conscientious objection in Article 18, see LTK v Finland Communication No 185 (1984)(Failure to recognize right to conscientious objection not a violation of freedom of religion, belief and opinion); Aapo Järvinen v Finland Communication No 295 (1988)(Longer civil service than military service not a violation of right to freedom from forced labour or right not to be discriminated against). The European Commission on Human Rights trod a similar path in Grandrath v Federal Republic of Germany (1967) 10 Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights 626 (Jehovah's Witness leader not exempted from alternative civilian service); X v Austria Application number 5591/72 (1973)(Roman Catholic required to perform military service). These ECHR Commission's decisions rely on the wording of Articles 8(3)(c)(ii) and 4(3)(b), respectively, to find that conscientious objection falls outside the scope of the right to freedom of religion, belief and opinion. For an excellent summary of the Committee's and Commission's case law on conscription, see M Major 'Conscientious Objection to Military Service: The European Commission on Human Rights and the Human Rights Committee' (2001) 32 California Western International LJ 1. See also H Gilbert 'The Slow Development of the Right to Conscientious Objection to Military Service Under the European Convention on Human Rights' (2001) 5 European Human Rights LR 554.

65 Official Languages and Language Rights

Iain Currie

65.1 Historical context of the official language provisions 65–1
65.2 Official languages 65–4
(a) The eleven languages 65–4
(b) The meaning of 'official language' 65–4
65.3 Relationship between the official languages 65–5
(a) Equitable treatment and parity of esteem 65–5
(b) Non-diminishment of existing rights and status 65–7
65.4 Use of official languages by government 65–9
(a) The National Language Policy Framework 65–9
(b) National and provincial government 65–9
(i) 'Purposes of government' 65–9
(ii) Legislation 65–10
(iii) Administration 65–12
(iv) The margin of appreciation 65–13
(c) Local Government 65–14
65.5 Corrective measures in relation to indigenous languages . . . 65–14
65.6 Use of an official language in judicial proceedings 65–15
65.7 Pan South African Language Board 65–17

Languages

6. (1) The official languages of the Republic are Sepedi, Sesotho, Setswana siSwati, Tshivenda, Xitsonga, Afrikaans, English, isiNdebele, isiXhosa and isiZulu.

(2) Recognising the historically diminshed use and status of the indigenous languages of our people, the state must take practical and positive measures to elevate the status and advance the use of these languages.

(3) (a) The national government and provincial governments may use any particular official languages for the purposes of government, taking into account usage, practicality, expense, regional circumstances and the balance of the needs and preferences of the poulation as a whole or in the province concerned; but the national government and each provincial government must use at least two official languages;

(b) Municipalities must take into account the language usage and preferences of their residents.

(4) The national government and provincial governments, by legislative and other measures, must regulate and monitor their use of official languages. Without detracting from the provisions of subsection (2), all official languages must enjoy parity of esteem and must be treated equitably.

(5) A Pan South African Language Board established by national legislation must

(a) promote, and create conditions for, the development and use of
  (i) all official languages;
  (ii) the Khoi, Nama and San languages; and
  (iii) sign language; and

(b) promote and ensure respect for
  (i) all official languages commonly used by communities in South Africa, including German, Greek, Gujarati, Hindi, Portugese, Tamil, Telugu, and Urdu; and
  (ii) Arabic, Hebrew, Sanskrit and other languages used for religious purposes in South Africa.[1]

65.1 Historical Context of the Official Language Provisions

Constitutional protection of language rights in South Africa can be traced back to the National Convention of 1909. Representatives of the former Transvaal and Free State Republics, fearing continued discrimination against Dutch speakers by a government under British supervision and dominated by English speakers, insisted on provisions in the Union Constitution that guaranteed the equality of the Dutch language.[2] Both English and Dutch were recognized as official languages of the Union: speakers possessed the same rights and privileges; public documents were printed in both languages. More importantly, the entrenchment of these provisions meant that any legislation that might affect or alter the equal

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('FC' or 'Final Constitution').

[2] Despite the provisions of the Treaty of Vereeniging (1902) permitting the teaching of Dutch in schools in the former Transvaal and Free State colonies, an official policy of Anglicisation saw Dutch treated merely as a medium for teaching English between 1902 and 1910. See David Brown 'Language and Social History in South Africa' in Robert K Herbert (ed) Language and Society in Africa: The Theory and Practice of Sociolinguistics (1992) 71, 74. Some of the history behind the recognition of Dutch as an official language is recounted in Ex parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995. 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC) at para 46 (Sachs J).

status of the two languages required special procedures and majorities.[1] The 1961 and 1983 Constitutions preserved this protection.[2]

The constitutional protection of language rights was accompanied by discrimination against speakers of non-official languages. African languages were undervalued and neglected. While mother-tongue education in primary school served the apartheid aim of promoting ethnic identity, proficiency in the official languages became a principal determinant of subsequent progress in secondary and tertiary education and of access to employment.[3] Official bilingualism in a multilingual country came to symbolise white political domination.[4] During apartheid, Afrikaans, imposed on an unwilling population of learners as a language of instruction, was, in turn, vilified as the 'language of the oppressor'.[5]

The language provisions of the Interim Constitution were a bold attempt to end the linguistic discrimination practiced by the apartheid state.[6] Three fundamental rights vouchsafed linguistic freedom and equality. IC s 8(2) prohibited unfair discrimination on the grounds of language. IC s 31 guaranteed a right to use a language of choice. IC s 32*(b)* contained a right to education in

[1] Section 137 of the South Africa Act (1909). See HR Hahlo & Ellison Kahn The Union of South Africa: The Development of its Laws and Constitution (1960) 125. See also Harris v Minister of the Interior 1952 (2) SA 428 (A)(Legislation passed by ordinary procedures removing entrenched rights declared invalid); Swart NO & Nicol NO v De Kock & Garner 1951 (1) SA 589, 601–602 (A)(The constitutional entrenchment of the equality of the official languages entitles an individual to call on the courts to resist any legislative or executive action offending against the entrenchment.)

[2] Afrikaans was included in the definition of Dutch by the Official Languages of the Union Act. Act 8 of 1925. Section 119 of the Republic of South Africa Constitution Act defined Afrikaans as including Dutch. Act 32 of 1961. Section 99(2) of the Republic of South Africa Constitution Act required special procedures and majorities for legislation infringing the equal status of English and Afrikaans. Act 110 of 1983. No mention was made of Dutch. Commentators have suggested that Dutch remained an official language of South Africa, since the special procedures first detailed in the South Africa Act were not followed to demote it. See Julien Hofman 'Official Languages for a New South Africa: Article 5 of the ANC's Bill of Rights' (1991) 3 Stellenbosch LR 328. This mild controversy over the status of Dutch was resolved by the passage of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or 'Interim Constitution'). The exclusion of Dutch from the list of official languages was validated by the use of the procedures required by s 99(2) of the 1983 Constitution to enact the Interim Constitution.

[3] See Brown (supra) at 86 (The emphasis on vernacular instruction 'led to an enforced trilingualism in African education, with equal time being given to the official languages regardless of region'. This was 'an unusually onerous prescription, even in harsh colonial contexts'.) See also Neville Alexander Language Policy and National Unity in South Africa/Azania (1989) 38–9 ('Black students, generally, were placed at a disadvantage educationally because they came from economically and culturally deprived family and community backgrounds and because the imperialist and racist language policies followed by the NP government placed one more hurdle in their collective path.')

[4] The 1991 census figures show 21 sizeable home languages in South Africa. Fourteen of these languages are spoken as a home language by groups of more than 100 000 people. See South African Institute of Race Relations Race Relations Survey 1993/94 (1994) 86–7.

[5] Robert K Herbert 'Language in a Divided Society' in Herbert (supra) at 1, 8. See also Alexander (supra) at 39.

[6] IC s 3 read:

(1) Afrikaans, English, isiNdebele, Sesotho sa Leboa, Sesotho, siSwati, Xitsonga, Setswana, Tshivenda, isiXhosa and isiZulu shall be the official South African languages at national level, and conditions shall be created for their development and for the promotion of their equal use and enjoyment.

(2) Rights relating to language and the status of languages existing at the commencement of this Constitution shall not be diminished, and provision shall be made by an Act of Parliament for rights relating to language and the status of languages existing only at regional level, to be extended nationally in accordance with the principles set out in subsection (9).

a language of choice where reasonably practicable. In addition, eleven of the principal languages spoken in South Africa were granted the status of official languages. The users of these eleven languages possessed additional rights and the state incurred a duty to promote their development, equal use and enjoyment.

Constitutional Principle CP XI shaped the language rights and the official language provisions of the Final Constitution: 'The diversity of language and culture shall be acknowledged and protected, and conditions for their promotion shall be encouraged.' As a result of CP XI, the Final Constitution prohibits both public and private discrimination on the basis of language (FC ss 9(3) and (4)), accords an individual right to use a language of choice (FC s 30), protects the rights of linguistic minorities (FC s 31) and ensures that all learners have a right to receive, where reasonably practicable, an education in the official language of their

(3) Wherever practicable, a person shall have the right to use and to be addressed in his or her dealings with any public administration at the national level of government in any official South African language of his or her choice.

(4) Regional differentiation in relation to language policy and practice shall be permissible.

(5) A provincial legislature may, by a resolution adopted by a majority of at least two- thirds of all its members, declare any language referred to in subsection (1) to be an official language for the whole or any part of the province and for any or all powers and functions within the competence of that legislature, save that neither the rights relating to language nor the status of an official language as existing in any area or in relation to any function at the time of the commencement of this Constitution, shall be diminished.

(6) Wherever practicable, a person shall have the right to use and to be addressed in his or her dealings with any public administration at the provincial level of government in any one of the official languages of his or her choice as contemplated in subsection (5).

(7) A member of Parliament may address Parliament in the official South African language of his or her choice.

(8) Parliament and any provincial legislature may, subject to this section, make provision by legislation for the use of official languages for the purposes of the functioning of government, taking into account questions of usage, practicality and expense.

(9) Legislation, as well as official policy and practice, in relation to the use of languages at any level of government shall be subject to and based on the provisions of this section and the following principles:

(a) The creation of conditions for the development and for the promotion of the equal use and enjoyment of all official South African languages;

(b) the extension of those rights relating to language and the status of languages which at the commencement of this Constitution are restricted to certain regions;

(c) the prevention of the use of any language for the purposes of exploitation, domination or division;

(d) the promotion of multilingualism and the provision of translation facilities;

(e) the fostering of respect for languages spoken in the Republic other than the official languages, and the encouragement of their use in appropriate circumstances; and

(f) the non-diminution of rights relating to language and the status of languages existing at the commencement of this Constitution.

(10) (a) Provision shall be made by an Act of Parliament for the establishment by the Senate of an independent Pan South African Language Board to promote respect for the principles referred to in subsection (9) and to further the development of the official South African languages.

(b) The Pan South African Language Board shall be consulted, and be given the opportunity to make recommendations, in relation to any proposed legislation contemplated in this section.

(c) The Pan South African Language Board shall be responsible for promoting respect for and the development of German, Greek, Gujerati, Hindi, Portuguese, Tamil, Telegu, Urdu and other languages used by communities in South Africa, as well as Arabic, Hebrew and Sanskrit and other languages used for religious purposes.

choice (FC s 29).[1] FC s 6 identifies eleven official languages and makes provision for legislative and administrative measures to regulate their use.

65.2 The Official Languages

(a) The eleven languages

FC s 6(1) names eleven languages as 'the official languages of the Republic'. The languages are: Sepedi, Sesotho, Setswana, siSwati, Tshivenda, Xitsonga, Afrikaans, English, isiNdebele, isiXhosa and isiZulu. There is one change to the Interim Constitution's list. Sesotho sa Leboa (sometimes called Northern Sotho) is now described by its more correct name: Sepedi.

Though the list aims to be as inclusive as possible, during the first certification hearings the Constitutional Court heard argument that some of the Indian languages spoken in South Africa deserved official status.[2] The Court rejected this argument on the grounds that the object of CP XI was to provide protection for the diversity of languages, not the official recognition of any particular language. Decisions about the actual content of South Africa's official language policy fell entirely within the purview of the Constitutional Assembly. The protection of non-official languages, and thus diversity in its fullness, was accommodated by the specific measures provided for in FC ss 6(2) to (5).[3] These measures include the requirement that the Pan South African Language Board 'promote and ensure respect for' the principal Indian languages spoken in South Africa.[4]

(b) The meaning of 'official language'

The right of an individual to 'speak the language of his or her choice' (FC s 30) and the rights of linguistic communities to use their language (FC s 31) protect individual use of a language (any language — official or not) in private communication and in public fora such as the media, schools, public meetings and organisations.[5] By

[1] Language rights are engaged in a number of other chapters in this text. See Cathi Albertyn & Beth Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constituional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 35; Iain Currie 'Community Rights: Language, Culture and Religion' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constituional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 58; Stuart Woolman & Michael Bishop 'Education' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constituional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, August 2006) Chapter 57; Stuart Woolman & Julie Soweto-Aullo 'Commission for the Promotion and the Protection of the Rights of Religious, Linguistic and Cultural Communities in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constituional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 24F.

[2] These Indian languages include Urdu, Tamil and Hindi. Some 900 000 people are speakers of Indian languages in South Africa. Raymond G Gordon (ed) Ethnologue: Languages of the World (15th Edition 2005), available at http://www.ethnologue.com (accessed on 15 September 2005). By comparison, Tshivenda, an official language, has about 1 million speakers. See Statistics South Africa Census in Brief (2001).

[3] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 210.

[4] FC s 6(5)(b)(i).

[5] See Iain Currie 'Community Rights: Language, Culture and Religion' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constituional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 58.

contrast, the term 'official language' is usually understood to mean a 'language used in the business of government — legislative, executive and judicial'.[1] Such a gloss appears to have been placed on the phrase by South African courts prior to the new dispensation.[2]

No immediate or practical consequences follow from the mere declaration of a language as an official language.[3] Legal content is given to official language policy through regulation of the following forms of state action:[4]

1. the use of a language in a court of law;
2. the use of a language when communicating with government (filling in forms, dealing with officials and the like);
3. the use of a language in public notices (such as street signs, public information and the like);
4. the use of a language in government reports, documents, hearings, transcripts and other official publications intended for public distribution;
5. the use of a language in legislation, and in the proceedings and records of the legislature.[5]

65.3 Relationship Between the Official Languages

(a) Equitable treatment and parity of esteem

The 1909 Constitution and its successors demanded that the two official languages 'be treated on a footing of equality', and declared that they were to 'possess and enjoy equal freedom, rights and privileges'. The courts interpreted these two requirements to mean that official use of one language would be as effective as the use of the other. It did not mean that official action (other than that specifically regulated by the 1909 Constitution: ie, Parliamentary legislation,

[1] UNESCO The Use of Vernacular Languages in Education (1953) 46. But see Francesco Capotorti Study on the Rights of Persons Belonging to Ethnic, Religious and Linguistic Minorities (1991) 75.

[2] See Swart NO & Nicol NO v De Kock & Garner 1951 (1) SA 589, 600 (A)(1909 Constitution conveys an instruction to all three branches of government to treat both languages equally); Madikizela v State President, Republic of Transkei 1986 (2) SA 180, 185H-J (Tk)(Any of the three official languages of Transkei may be used 'for official purposes'.)

[3] See Société des Acadiens du Nouveau-Brunswick v Association of Parents for Fairness in Education (1986) 27 DLR (4th) 406 (SC)(Canadian Supreme Court holds that constitutional recognition of official languages does not in itself guarantee a right to any type of service in either official language.) But see Fernand de Varennes Language, Minorities and Human Rights (1996) 174 (Argues that an official language declaration does at least 'signal that the use of such language in a state is provided by law; however the exact scope of a right to use an official language can always be subjected to various limitations and considerations'.)

[4] According to the Québec Superior Court, the declaration of French as the official language of Québec 'has little concrete meaning'. To give substance to the declaration, 'laws must be enacted which attach specific legal effects to the . . . proclamation . . . recognizing the use of the language, or allowing for the legal effects of its use in a variety of areas.' Bureau Métropolitain des Ecoles Protestantes de Montréal v Ministre de l'Education du Québec [1976] 1 CS 430, 452 (as translated in Gilbert A Beaudoin & Edward Ratushny The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (2nd Edition, 1989) 661.)

[5] See Manfred W Wenner 'The Politics of Equality Among European Linguistic Minorities' in Richard P Claude (ed) Comparative Human Rights (1976) 184, 193.

proceedings and records and central government publications) had to take place in both languages to be effective.[1]

By contrast, the Interim Constitution did not require all eleven official languages to be treated equally. The opening statement of IC s 3(1) identifying the official languages at national level was declaratory. The balance of the section identified the consequences of this declaration: the state was required to create conditions for the development of the languages, and for 'the promotion of their equal use and enjoyment'. Rather than create an immediate obligation to treat all official languages equally, equality of the official languages became an aspiration. IC s 3(9) confirmed this interpretation: it enjoined the state to create the necessary 'conditions for the development and for the promotion of the equal use and enjoyment of all official South African languages.'[2]

The Final Constitution similarly avoids any language that might give rise to a claim that the official languages must be treated equally. Moreover, it does not even repeat the Interim Constitution's promise of prospective equality. Instead FC s 6(4) simply requires that 'all official languages must enjoy parity of esteem, and must be treated equitably'. 'Equitable' treatment is clearly not the same as 'equal' treatment. Equitable treatment is treatment that is just and fair in the circumstances. Those circumstances include a history of official denigration and neglect of indigenous languages. Equity may therefore require that the languages that FC s 6(2) terms 'historically diminished' in use and status receive particular attention from and support from the state. It might mean that historically undiminished languages (ie, English and Afrikaans) are treated with relative inattention.

In any event, there is no hard and fast requirement that the national or provincial governments use more than two of the official languages 'for the purposes of government'. The national government may decide that only its communications in two of the official languages have legal validity, while those in any other language do not. Such legislation must reflect a good faith assessment that usage, practicality, expense and the other factors mentioned in FC s 6(3)(a) require such a measure.

As for 'parity of esteem', this awkward phrase probably has little legal significance. 'Parity' is possible only where there is a legal prescription that the official languages are treated equally and that they all have the same rights and status. But as we have seen, the Final Constitution does not insist on actual substantive equality. Instead, some languages may, for reasons of expense and practicality, end up enjoying greater rights and status than others. What then is the purpose of requiring the eleven languages to be treated with 'parity of esteem'? In a multilingual state, an official language policy can have the practical aim of designating a single language in which the business of government will be conducted. This has been the approachof a number of post-colonial African states that have given official status solely to the former colonial language.[1] On the other hand, an official language policy may have political and cultural objectives, rather than practical aims. Like the 1909 Union Constitution, the adoption of eleven official languages in the Final Constitution blunts the force of criticism that one language, rather than another, has become the language of government. At the same time, according a language official status encourages its speakers to participate in political life and to press for the use of their language, where practicable, in the business of government. It enriches the cultural wealth of the nation through the invigoration of languages heretofore ignored. In short, while parity of esteem does not ensure the equal treatment of all eleven official languages, it does oblige the state to take all eleven languages seriously.

[1] See Ex parte Suid Afrikaanse Nasionale Trust en Assuransie Maatschappij Bpk 1918 CPD 207, 209 (De Villiers AJ)('When the Act of Union provides that the two languages shall have equal rights and privileges, it means that these two modes of expressing thoughts may be used equally; a person may use the one or the other.') See also R v Schaper 1945 AD 716 (Promulgation of a by-law in English only would not offend against the equality requirement.)

[2] IC s 3(9)(a).

(b) Non-diminishment of existing status and rights

The official language policy of the Interim Constitution increased the number of official languages and the rights relating to those languages. At the same time, it sought to preserve the existing rights and status of the pre-1994 official languages: English and Afrikaans. To that end, the Interim Constitution contained a provision stipulating that 'the rights relating to language and the status of languages as they existed at the time of the commencement of this Constitution shall not be diminished.'[2] Similar provisions relating to the non-diminishment of the existing status and rights of languages were contained in IC s 3(5)(non-diminishment at regional level) and IC s 3(9)(f)(the use of languages at any level of government).

What was the practical effect of the non-diminishment provisions at national level? Parliament could not amend the Interim Constitution to remove English or Afrikaans from the list of official languages. To do so would have diminished the pre-constitutional status of those languages. Parliamentary bills and legislation, the record of proceedings of Parliament, and government notices of general public interest and importance had to continue to be published in English and Afrikaans. Section 89(2) of the 1983 Constitution had required that 'all . . . laws . . . issued by the government of the Republic' be in both official languages. This meant that delegated legislation issued by the post-1994 national administration had to be published in English and Afrikaans in order to comply with the non-diminishment requirements.

Additional rights relating to the 1983 Constitution's provisions regarding official languages were grounded in statute. IC s 232(1)(d) provided that:

> [u]nless it is inconsistent with the context or clearly inappropriate, a reference in a law [in force] . . . to an official language or to both official languages, shall be construed, with due regard to section 3, as a reference to any of the official South African languages under this Constitution.

The effect of the section, read with IC s 3(2), was that where legislation in force granted rights to English and Afrikaans, it could be read to grant the other

[1] See, eg, Article 3(1) of the Namibian Constitution and Article 5 of the Constitution of Mozambique, respectively, designating English and Portuguese as the official languages in those countries.

[2] IC s 3(2).

nine official languages the same rights, but could not be read to withdraw rights from English and Afrikaans and grant those rights to any other language.[1]

At provincial level, the non-diminishment provisions had the potential to require the executive authorities of the new provinces to issue delegated legislation and public notices in English and Afrikaans. Where the new provinces contained the re-incorporated TBVC states, the rights and status of the former official languages of these territories could not be diminished by re-incorporation into a unitary South Africa. Instead those languages retained whatever rights and status they once enjoyed, but now only at a 'regional level'. This probably meant that in those 'regions' or parts of a province formerly occupied by self-governing territories or by one of the TBVC states, the provincial government could not demote a former official language, or remove any rights that a language enjoyed in that region.

IC s 3 and the non-diminution requirements, though binding on Parliament during the operation of the Interim Constitution, were not binding on the Constitutional Assembly. The Constitutional Assembly could have, consistent with Constitutional Principle XI, substantially revised the state's official language policies in the Final Constitution. In the end, however, the most substantial change was the dropping of the non-diminution requirement. During the certification hearings, the Constitutional Court heard argument that the status of Afrikaans had been 'diluted' in the Final Constitution. The argument was rejected. According to the Constitutional Court, no Constitutional Principle required that Afrikaans be given a special status in the Final Constitution. The Court also observed that the Final Constitution > does not reduce the status of Afrikaans relative to the [Interim Constitution]. Afrikaans is accorded official status in terms of s 6(1). Affording other languages the same status does not diminish that of Afrikaans.[2]

The absence of a non-diminution requirement does, however, mean a loss of the constitutional rights enjoyed by these two languages since 1910. FC s 6(3)(a) provides that 'national government and provincial governments may use any particular official languages for the purposes of government.' The languages chosen need not include English and Afrikaans. This makes it constitutionally (if not practically or politically) possible for the business of national and provincial government to be transacted in languages other than English or Afrikaans for the first time since Union.

[1] IC s 232(1)(d)'s mention of 'an official language or . . . both official languages' appeared to exclude legislation of the former TBVC and self-governing territories that granted rights to official languages other than or in addition to the two official languages of the 1983 Constitution. (My emphasis).

[2] Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 212; Ex parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature re: In Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC) at para 74 (Discussion of non-dimunition).

65.4 Use of Official Languages for the Functioning of Government

(a) The National Language Policy Framework

The National Language Policy Framework, government's policy on the achievement of the goals of the Final Constitution's official language provisions, was adopted by the cabinet in 2002.[1] The policy is the result of a lengthy drafting process conducted by the Language Plan Task Group ('LANGTAG') established by the national Department of Arts and Culture in 1995.[2] The aims of the policy are to promote the equitable use of the official languages at all levels of government; to facilitate equitable access to government services, knowledge and information; to ensure redress for the previously marginalised official indigenous languages; to initiate and to sustain a vibrant discourse on multilingualism with all language communities; to encourage the learning of indigenous languages in order to promote national unity, as well as linguistic and cultural diversity; and to promote good language management for efficient public service administration.[3]

As part of the implementation of the policy, a draft South African Languages Bill has been prepared by the Department.[4] In the description of the current law on the use of the official languages that follows, reference will be made to the reforms proposed by the Framework and the draft Bill.

(b) National and provincial government

(i) The 'purposes of government'

The South Africa Act and its successors required that records, journals and proceedings of Parliament were kept in both the official languages. All bills, laws and notices of general public importance or interest issued by the government were required to be in both official languages. Provinces were obliged to legislate and to conduct administration in English and in Afrikaans. Section 90 of the 1983 Constitution required that all 'records, journals and proceedings of a provincial council shall be kept in both official languages.' The same requirements applied to all 'draft ordinances, ordinances and notices of public importance or interest issued by a provincial administration.'

The Final Constitution contains no similar set of obligations. Instead, FC s 6(3)(a) is permissive:

> The national government and provincial governments may use any particular official languages for the purposes of government taking into account usage, practicality, expense,

[1] National Language Policy Framework (2002), available at http://www.info.gov.za/gazette/otherdocs/2002/langpolicy.pdf (accessed on 15 September 2005)('National Framework').

[2] See 'Towards a National Language Plan for South Africa: Final Report of the Language Plan Task Group (8 August 1996)('LANGTAG Final Report'), available at http://www.dac.gov.za/reports/langtag_report/langtag_report.htm (accessed on 15 September 2005). For a useful review of the Report, see LT du Plessis & JL Pretorius 'The Structure of the Official Language Clause. A Framework for its Implementation' (2000) 15 SA Public Law 504.

[3] LANGTAG Final Report (supra) at para 2.1.

[4] The South African Languages Bill (24 April 2003), available at http://www.dac.gov.za/legislation_policies/bills/sa_language_bill.doc (accessed on 15 September 2005).

regional circumstances and the balance of the needs and preferences of the population as a whole or in the province concerned.

However, both national and provincial government must use at least two of the official languages 'for the purposes of government'. Both the national and provincial governments are obliged by FC s 6(4) to regulate and to monitor their use of the official languages by means of legislative and other measures.

The phrase 'purposes of government' encompasses the various activities of government. The effect of language on two such activities — legislation and administration — warrants closer inspection.

(ii) Legislation

Legislation creates rights and duties throughout the jurisdiction of the legislature, and ought to be intelligible to the people to whom it applies.[1] Legislation at national level should, in principle, be published in all of the principal languages of the state. Similarly, legislation at provincial level should be published in the principal languages spoken in the province.[2]

Similar obligations apply to the languages employed during the legislative process. Parliamentary debate should take place in all the principal languages of the state. Members of a provincial legislature should be able to use the languages of the province in their deliberations.[3] Failure to observe this principle will leave speakers of unaccommodated languages feeling that they are not represented in the legislative process. Members of Parliament will face the burdensome obstacle of communicating in languages that are not their mother tongue. This may make them less effective debaters, or may inhibit them from entering Parliament in the first place. IC s 3(7) provided an unqualified right to members of Parliament to address Parliament in the official South African language of their choice.[4] There is no corresponding right in the Final Constitution. This means that the languages

[1] Julien Hofman 'Official Languages for a New South Africa: Article 5 of the ANC's Bill of Rights' (1991) 3 Stellenbosch LR 328, 333.

[2] See Universal Declaration of Linguistic Rights (10th draft, International PEN Committee for Translation and Linguistic Rights and Centre Internacional Escarré per les Minories Etniques i les Nacions, Barcelona 1995), available at http://www.linguistic-declaration.org (accessed on 15 September 2005)('Universal Declaration of Linguistic Rights'). Article 19 of the draft declaration proposes that:

1. All language communities have the right for laws and other legal provisions which concern them to be published in a language specific to the territory.
2. Public authorities who have more than one territorially historic language within their jurisdiction must publish all laws and other legal provisions of a general nature in each of these languages, whether or not their speakers understand other languages.

[3] According to Article 20 of the Universal Declaration of Linguistic Rights:

1. Representative assemblies must have as their official language*(s)* the language*(s)* historically spoken in the territory they represent.
2. Supraterritorial representative assemblies, which cover a larger territory with more than one territorially historic language, must have all such languages as official languages.

[4] See Gilbert A Beaudoin & Edward Ratushny The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (2nd Edition, 1989) 678 (Discussion of provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Constitution Act 1867 that are, or were, comparable to IC s 3(7)). In practice, Parliamentary proceedings were simultaneously translated, but only into English and Afrikaans. Debates of the National Assembly (31 August 1994) 2197.

legislation used for and by legislators is, in terms of FC ss 6(3) and (4), left largely to the discretion of the legislature.

Recognising these principles, the National Language Policy Framework proposes the use of all the official languages in 'all legislative activities' as a matter of right, though in provincial legislatures the incidence of use of the languages in the region can be taken into account.[1] The phrase 'all legislative activities' clearly encompasses both the publication of legislation and the conduct of legislative proceedings.

The South Africa Act and its successors required the two official languages to be placed on an equal footing. For this reason both English and Afrikaans were considered to be the languages of enactment of legislation. This meant that either version of a statute was as authentic as the other and that the meaning of the statute was to be found by consulting the two versions and reconciling the contents of both.[2] Only in the event of an irreconcilable interpretative conflict between the two versions would the signed version of the legislation be treated as authoritative.[3]

As we have already seen, there is no longer a constitutional requirement that the official languages be treated equally. This makes it difficult to decide which version of an Act is to be considered authoritative in the event of an interpretative conflict. The task of consulting and reconciling as many as eleven versions of a statute would be overwhelming, if not impossible. FC s 82 may provide a solution to this problem. It reads: 'the signed copy of an Act of Parliament is conclusive evidence of the provisions of that Act.'[4] The section ought to be read to mean that where multiple versions of an Act exist, the signed copy should be taken to be authoritative for purposes of interpretation. A similar provision existed in the Interim Constitution, and FC s 82 should, for purposes of convenience, be treated as its successor.[5]

[1] National Framework (supra) at para 2.4.4. Some provinces have already legislated in this regard. See, eg, Northern Province Language Act 7 of 2000 (Provincial official languages are Sepedi, Afrikaans, English, Tshivenda, Xitsonga and Isindebele; any official language can be used in legislative proceedings and legislation must be published in two languages); The Constitution of the Western Cape, 1997, s 5 (Designates Afrikaans, English and isiXhosa as official languages for the province.) The Western Cape Provincial Languages Act provides for the use of these languages by the legislature and requires all legislation to be published (but not necessarily simultaneously) in Afrikaans, English and isiXhosa. Act 13 of 1998.

[2] New Union Goldfields v CIR 1950 (3) SA 392, 405–406 (A). See Hofman (supra) at 335; George Devenish 'Statutory Bilingualism as an Aid to Construction in South Africa' (1990) 107 SALJ 441, 442–446.

[3] Section 35 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 110 of 1983. The practice was for the State President to sign an Act in one language and the following Act in the other language. This practice was continued for a time after 1994. More recently, the practice is to sign Acts in English only.

[4] There is a similar provision for provincial legislation: FC s 124.

[5] IC s 65 required Acts of Parliament to be enrolled of record at the Appellate Division 'in such official South African languages as may be required in terms of section 3'. In the event of multiple versions being enrolled, IC s 65(2) provided that in cases of conflict between versions, the version signed by the President would prevail.

(iii) Administration

In contrast to legislation, the activities of the administration affect limited sections of the population, and do so at different times. This allows greater flexibility in the formulation of a language policy appropriate to a particular region, a section of the population or an administrative function.[1] The government should, in principle, be able to respond to communications from the public in the principal languages of a region and be able to offer public services in those languages.[2]

Some guidance on the content of the government's obligations to provide multilingual administrative services was provided by the Interim Constitution. IC s 3(3) read: 'Wherever practicable, a person shall have the right to use and to be addressed in his or her dealings with any public administration at the national level of government in any official South African language of his or her choice.' IC s 3(6) contained a similar right to communicate with a provincial administration in the official languages declared for the province.[3] The section imposed a duty on government institutions to implement measures enabling them to communicate in all official languages. Such measures would obviously entail employment of officials conversant with the official languages and the provision of translation services. The aim of the measures should have been to provide service of equal quality to the public in any of the official languages. However, given the qualification that the right was available only 'where practicable' and that equality between the official languages was a matter of aspiration rather than obligation, the government was in effect required only to attempt to provide the best possible services in all official languages.

FC s 6 does not repeat the prescriptions of IC s 3(3). The language in which administrative services are provided is instead left as a matter for regulation by [1] A similar distinction is made between the official languages of the European Union for purposes of legislation and administration. There are 21 'official languages and the working languages' of the institutions of the Union. Regulations and documents of general application must be in all official languages. Documents sent directly by a member state or a citizen of the Union to the Union's institutions may be in any of the official languages. The reply must be in the language in which the communication was sent. Documents sent by an institution or official of the Union to a citizen of a member state must be in the language of the state or the language of the citizen. Failure by an institution to communicate or to transmit a document in the proper official language selected in terms of these rules constitutes an irregularity capable of affecting the validity of that document. See Chemiefarma v Commission [1970] ECR 661, 686–7.

[2] Fernand de Varennes Language, Minorities and Human Rights (1996) 176. De Varennes notes that failure by the government to communicate in the language of its citizens might have discriminatory effects:

> In addition to the fewer opportunities for employment in the state bureaucracy, non-native speakers with a lower proficiency in the official or majority language as compared to native speakers may experience disadvantages in the area of public services such as delays in obtaining appointments and interviews with bilingual public servants, the cost of paying another person to act as an interpreter during interviews and to assist with the completion of forms and consequent delays, the inability or varying level of difficulty to communicate information in order to be eligible for public benefits, decisions or privileges involving public authorities, the unintentional communication of incorrect information by untrained family members and friends acting as interpreters, the inability to accurately communicate medical information to public health authorities and employees, additional costs such as family members' travel expenses and absences from work in order to interpret.

[3] The ambit of the right was dependent on the declaration of official languages by the province. However, there was no constitutional obligation on a province to declare official languages.

legislation and policy. The National Language Policy Framework requires that official correspondence must be in the official language of the recipient's choice. Oral communication must take place in the preferred official language of the target audience.[1] Government documents must be in all eleven languages when 'the effective and stable operation of government at any level requires comprehensive communication of information', or in all of the official languages of a province. In cases where it is not necessary to make documents available in all eleven languages, they should be published in six languages.[2] The policy also requires each government structure to agree to use one or more working languages and languages of record for the purposes of intra- and inter-departmental communication.[3] The draft National Languages Bill proposes legislation to enforce these requirements.

(iv) The margin of appreciation

Whatever the government's obligations in principle, in practice its official language policy may be qualified by a number of considerations: 'usage, practicality, expense, regional circumstances and the balance of the needs and preferences of the population'. The first of these — 'usage' — presumably refers to the objective demographic incidence of use of a language in a particular region. The incidence of use of the eleven official languages is not uniform throughout South Africa.[4] In some regions there may be too few speakers of a particular language to justify measures protecting and encouraging the use of that language.[5] This fact would clearly justify the use by a provincial government of only the principal languages used in that province for purposes of legislation and administration.[6] It would also justify the national government's formulation of a policy in which only the principal languages of a region were employed for the provision of administrative services in that region.

The other limiting considerations — 'practicality, expense, regional circumstances and the balance of the needs and preferences of the population' — confer

[1] National Framework (supra) at para 2.4.6.2.

[2] The six must embrace one of the four Nguni languages, one of the three Sotho languages, Tshivenda, Xitsonga, English and Afrikaans. The Nguni and Sotho languages are to be used in rotation. Ibid at para 2.4.6.5.

[3] Ibid at 2.4.6.1.

[4] See, generally, E Grobler, KP Prinsloo & IJ Van der Merwe (eds) Language Atlas of South Africa: Language and Literacy Patterns (1990).

[5] Cf Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe European Charter for Regional or Minority Languages (Adopted 1992)(Reprinted in Hurst Hannum (ed) Documents on Autonomy and Minority Rights (1993) 86.) The Charter requires States to implement measures protecting and encouraging the use of regional and minority languages in 'the geographical area in which the said language is the mode of expression of a number of people justifying the adoption of the various protective and promotional measures provided for in this convention.' Article 1*(b)*.

[6] This has been the approach of those provinces that have developed official language policies. The Constitution of the Western Cape, 1997 s 5 (Designates Afrikaans, English and isiXhosa as official languages for the province). The ill-fated Constitution of KwaZulu-Natal designated Zulu, English and Afrikaans as official languages. See Ex parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature: in re Certification of the KwaZulu-Natal Constitution 1996 (4) SA 1098 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1419 (CC)(Denying certification, but not on grounds of official language.)

a considerable margin of appreciation on the government. While 'regional circumstances' sounds like it covers the same ground as 'usage', it presumably must mean something different. The term may refer to conditions in a region which impact on administration and which influence the provision of services in multiple languages. For example, the absence of translation facilities in a particularly undeveloped region might qualify as a 'regional circumstance' justifying a restriction on the provision of multilingual services. As for 'practicality' and 'expense', these considerations recognise that, however noble the intentions behind the Final Constitution's recognition of eleven official languages, the constraints inhibiting the translation of intention into practice are considerable. It will all too often be practically and financially impossible to provide every type of government service in each of the official languages.

(c) Local government

When passing measures or taking action in relation to the languages employed by local government, municipalities 'must take into account the language usage and preferences of their residents'.[1] There are two significant differences between the constitutional language requirements for national and provincial governments and the constitutional language requirements for municipalities. First, there is no requirement that a municipality use at least two official languages. Second, rather than the long list of factors qualifying the obligation to provide multilingual services, municipalities are given a great deal less discretion: they may consider only usage and the preferences of their residents.

We have seen that 'usage' refers to objective demographic factors. International practice suggests that a 'sliding scale' is the most appropriate measure for determining the reasonableness of an official language policy for local or regional government. The greater the concentration of speakers of a language in a particular municipal area, the greater the obligation to provide municipal services in that language. Where there are fewer speakers of a language in the area, the municipality might be justified in providing fewer of its services in that language or even none at all.[2]

'Preference' refers to the fact that, in a multilingual state, individuals may be happy to communicate in languages other than their mother tongue. Where a municipality argues that its failure to provide services in a particular language is in accordance with the preferences of its residents, it must be able to demonstrate some evidence of these preferences.

65.5 Corrective Measures in Relation to Indigenous Languages

Notwithstanding the wide margin of appreciation conferred on the state in

[1] The Interim Constitution's official language provisions (IC s 3) bound only the national and provincial levels of government. See Louw v Transitional Local Council of Greater Germiston 1997 (8) BCLR 1062 (W)(No obstacle in Interim Constitution to a decision of council that English only be used in all official communications and proceedings.)

[2] See de Varennes (supra) at 177–8.

implementing its official language policy, FC s 6(2) requires the state to promote the use of indigenous languages: 'Recognising the historically diminished use and status of the indigenous languages of our people, the state must take practical and positive measures to elevate the status and advance the use of these languages.' The corrective measures required by the subsection may obviously include, but are not confined to, the use of languages by government. Expense and practicality aside, the government should, in the elaboration of its official language policy, actively promote use of the 'historically diminished' languages in legislation and administration.[1]

Is Afrikaans an 'indigenous language of our people'? Afrikaans is a creole language, a variant of the Dutch of the 17th century colonists, with some lexical and syntactic borrowings from Malay, Bantu languages, Khoisan languages, Portuguese, and other European languages.[2] While its origins might qualify it for the label 'indigenous', it is unlikely that Afrikaans qualifies for the corrective measures required by FC s 6(2). The language was the beneficiary of decades of active promotion by the National Party government and can hardly be considered 'historically diminished' in use and status.

65.6 Use of an Official Language in Judicial Proceedings

The 1909 official language provisions and their successors did not require use of the official languages by the judiciary. Nevertheless, a practice developed that judicial proceedings could be conducted in either official language. Provision was also made for interpretation of criminal proceedings at state expense to accused persons who could speak neither official language.[3] In civil proceedings, neither the parties nor the witnesses possessed a right to the interpretation of evidence at state expense: though a court was required to call for interpretation where necessary.[4] The language of record of the courts was English or Afrikaans, and any part of criminal or civil proceedings not in these languages would be

[1] Besides official language measures, positive measures to promote indigenous languages would include the provision of education at all levels in a language, subsidising the production of dictionaries, textbooks and literature in that language and requiring the use of the language by the public broadcasting media.

[2] Raymond G Gordon (ed) Ethnologue: Languages of the World (15th Edition 2005), available at http://www.ethnologue.com (accessed on 15 September 2005).

[3] Section 6 of the Magistrates Court Act codified the rule of practice followed in the Supreme Court. Act 32 of 1944. Subsection 1 provided: 'Either of the official languages may be used at any stage of the proceedings in any court and the evidence shall be recorded in the language so used'. Subsection 2 provided for interpretation of evidence to an accused person who is not sufficiently conversant in the language in which that evidence is given. If, in the opinion, of a judicial officer an accused was not sufficiently conversant with the language being used in criminal proceedings, that judicial officer had a duty to provide for interpretation into a language the accused could understand.

[4] Rule 61 of the Uniform Rules of Court requires interpretation where evidence is given in a language with which the court or a party is not sufficiently conversant. Where the services of an interpreter are employed in any proceedings, the costs (if any) of interpretation are, unless the court otherwise orders, costs in the cause. Where the interpretation of evidence given in one of the official languages of the Republic is required by a party, such costs are at that party's expense. Section 5(2) of the Small Claims Courts Act is more generous. Act 61 of 1981. If evidence is given in a language with which one of the parties is not sufficiently conversant, an interpreter may be called by the court to interpret that evidence into a language with which that party appears to be sufficiently conversant, irrespective of whether the language in which the evidence is given is one of the official languages.

conducted through an interpreter and translated into and recorded in either English or Afrikaans.[1]

The Final Constitution contains measures aimed at allowing any person, whether a speaker of one of the official languages or not, to understand the criminal proceedings in which he or she participates. In criminal matters, FC s 35(3)(k) provides that, as part of the fundamental right to a fair trial, an accused person has the right 'to be tried in a language which the accused person understands or, if that is not practicable, to have the proceedings interpreted in that language.'[2] According to FC s 35(4), detained, arrested and accused persons have the right to be given information about the reasons for their detention, their right to remain silent and their right to legal representation in a language that they understand.

There are no similar provisions in respect of civil matters.[3] Arguably, the right to have civil proceedings conducted in a language of choice forms part of the right to have disputes decided 'in a fair public hearing before a court.'[4] Court proceedings can hardly be considered fair if they are not intelligible to the parties.

It is, however, not clear whether the cost of provision of interpretation services should be borne by the state or by the litigant who requires those services. FC s 35(3)(k) is phrased as a fundamental right of an accused to the interpretation of judicial proceedings, and should be interpreted as placing a duty on the state to [1] This practice continues even in the case of proceedings where all participants are conversant with an official language other than English or Afrikaans. See S v Matomela 1998 (3) BCLR 339 (Ck)(Nothing in the Final Constitution prevents the use of any official language for the purpose of conducting court proceedings where all participants are conversant with the language. However conduct of court proceedings in languages other than English or Afrikaans will entail inconvenience, delay and the additional expense of translation of the record in the event of a review or appeal.) See also S v Damoyi 2004 (2) SA 564 (C)(Conducting of court proceedings in Xhosa out of necessity when no interpreters were available and when all participants were Xhosa-speaking not a reviewable defect in the proceedings.) For criticism of these decisions on the grounds that they fail to live up to the Final Constitution's goals of multilingualism, see John Hlophe 'Official Languages and the Courts' (2000) 117 SALJ 690. For arguments that a single language of record (English) should not be adopted, see JJ Malan 'Die gebruik van Afrikaans vir die Notulering van Hofverrigtenge Gemeet aan Demokatiese Standaarde' (2003) 28 J for Juridical Science 36 (Removal of Afrikaans as a language of record would be contrary to official language provisions and, moreover, inefficient); S v Pienaar 2000 (2) SACR 143 (NC). But see Damoyi (supra) at para 18 (English ought to be treated as the language of record).

[2] The subsection does not confer a right to be tried in a language of choice but merely a language that the accused understands. See Mthethwa v De Bruin NO 1998 (3) BCLR (N). See, further, PJ Schwikkard 'Arrested, Detained and Accused Persons' in I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 737, 787; Frank Snyckers & Jolandi Le Roux 'Criminal Procedure: Arrested, Detained and Accused Persons' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 51.

[3] The Final Constitution contains no provision equivalent to IC s 107(1). IC s 107(1) read: '[a] party to litigation, an accused person and a witness may, during the proceedings of a court, use the South African language of his or her choice, and may require such proceedings of a court in which he or she is involved to be interpreted in a language understood by him or her.'

[4] FC s 34. See Iain Currie 'Access to Courts' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 60.

provide interpretation.[1] Such a duty was assumed by the state prior to the Interim Constitution in terms of the common law right to a fair trial, and it seems unlikely that the Bill of Rights would seek to alter this position.[2]

As for the provision of interpretation in the case of civil litigants and witnesses, the previous practice was for the parties to civil litigation to bear the cost of interpretation for any language other than English or Afrikaans. This practice is likely to continue, though certainly the state should attempt to provide court services in all official languages. As with criminal proceedings, a witness or civil litigant wishing to address a court in any of the official languages should be able to do so, and a court not sufficiently conversant with that language should be required to have such evidence interpreted at state expense.

65.7 Pan South African Language Board

IC s 3(10) required the Senate to establish an independent Pan South African Language Board ('PANSALB'). PANSALB was designed to 'promote respect for … and to further the development of the official languages.' The Interim Constitution further required that PANSALB be consulted and given the opportunity to make recommendations in relation to any proposed legislation relating to the official languages.[3]

PANSALB currently consists of no fewer than 11 and no more than 15 members — appointed by the Minister of Arts and Culture after consultation with the Parliamentary Portfolio Committee on Arts and Culture — who are experts in the fields of language planning, translation, interpreting, lexicography, language teaching, literacy, language legislation and language matters. Under the Final Constitution, PANSALB is, in addition, charged with promoting respect for and the development of a list of languages 'used by communities in South Africa' that have not been designated as official languages,[4] as well as 'Arabic, Hebrew and Sanskrit and other languages used for religious purposes'.

[1] Such an interpretation accords with international practice. See Bruno de Witte 'Linguistic Equality: A Study in Comparative Constitutional Law' (1985) 3 Revista de Llengua i Dret 43, 105:

> Practically all countries provide for the assistance of an interpreter to the persons who do not have a sufficient knowledge of the language used by the [criminal] court; such aid is usually provided without cost for the accused … this guarantee is only indirectly linked to the general principle of equality and more closely to the more specific constitutional principles of 'fair trial, 'equality of arms', or, in the United States, 'due process'.

[2] The right of an accused to provision of interpretation at state expense was essential for a fair trial, and could not be lawfully waived by the accused. See Mackessack v Assistant Magistrate, Empangeni 1963 (1) SA 892 (N); Geidel v Bosman NO 1963 (4) SA 253 (T); Ohanessian v Koen 1964 (1) SA 663 (T). FC s 39(3) reads, in relevant part: 'The Bill of Rights does not deny the existence of any other rights or freedoms that are recognised or conferred by common law, customary law or legislation, to the extent that they are consistent with the Bill.'

[3] Pan South African Language Board Act 59 of 1995.

[4] These languages are German, Greek, Gujerati, Hindi, Portuguese, Tamil, Telegu and Urdu. See FC s 6 and IC s 3.

Item 20 of Schedule 6 provides that the Pan South African Language Board created under the Interim Constitution continues to function under the Final Constitution. FC s 6(5) amplifies PANSALB's obligations and requires that PANSALB promotes the official languages, as well as Khoi, Nama, San, and sign language.

66 Freedom of Movement and Residence

Jonathan Klaaren

66.1 Introduction 66-1
(a) Application and scope of FC s 21 66-1
(i) Beneficiaries of the right 66-1
(ii) Criterion of territoriality 66-2
(iii) Criterion of South African nationality 66-3
(iv) Criterion of legality 66-4
(b) Content of FC s 21. 66-5
(i) Purpose of the Right to Freedom of Movement and Residence 66-5
(ii) Everyone has the right to freedom of movement . . 66-7
(iii) Everyone has the right to leave the Republic 66-9
(iv) Every citizen has the right to enter the Republic. . . 66-10
(v) Every citizen has the right to remain in the Republic 66-10
(vi) Every citizen has the right to reside anywhere in the Republic. 66-11
(vii) Every citizen has the right to a passport 66-11
(c) Policy issues relevant to the Right to Freedom and Movement and Residence 66-11
(d) Relationship of freedom of movement and residence to other constitutional rights. 66-12
(i) Dignity. 66-12
(ii) Equality 66-13

Freedom of movement and residence

21. (1) Everyone has the right to freedom of movement.

(2) Everyone has the right to leave the Republic.

(3) Every citizen has the right to enter, to remain in and to reside anywhere in, the Republic.

(4) Every citizen has the right to a passport.[1]

66.1 INTRODUCTION

(a) Application and Scope of FC s 21

The application and the scope of FC s 21 are two significant issues analytically prior to the determination of the extent of the protection of the right. The content and the interpretation of the right to freedom of movement and residence are intricably linked to general issues of application and more specific questions about citizenship.[2]

(i) Beneficiaries of the Right[3]

Textually, FC s 21's protection is given in some cases to 'everyone' and in other cases only to 'every citizen'. FC ss 21(1) and (2) are granted to 'everyone'. FC ss 21(3) and (4) are granted to 'citizens'. This distinction between citizens and non-citizens serves only to restrict the protection of the rights to enter the Republic, to remain in the Republic, and to reside anywhere in the Republic. On a straightforward textual interpretation, it is only the criterion of citizenship and not those of territoriality, nationality, or legality that determine FC s 21's application. Nonetheless, because these three latter criteria often drive the meaning of citizenship, they warrant further discussion.

As noted below, 'everyone' as used in FC s 21(1) and (2) means everyone and will apply to non-citizens. By contrast, the application of FC s 21 (3) and (4) is limited to South African citizens.

Where do juristic persons fit within this scheme? That juristic persons are able to possess the attributes of territoriality, nationality, and legality suggests that they ought to be able to secure some of the benefits of FC s 21.

That said, a distinction ought to be drawn between the first two sub-clauses of FC s 21 and the last two. The first two, certainly insofar as they comprise the freedom of locomotion, are presumably restricted to natural persons.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Act 108 of 1996)('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[2] While the application of other clauses in the Bill of Rights is limited to citizens, the limited coverage of the last two sub-clauses in FC s 21 flows from a very specific intervention by the Constitutional Assembly. For a discussion of this intervention, see Jonathan Klaaren 'Contested Citizenship' in Penelope Andrews & Stephen Ellmann The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 304, 308-9.

[3] For a general discussion of the different classes of beneficiaries of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights, see Stu Woolman 'Application' in Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux, Jonathan Klaaren, Anthony Stein, Matthew Chaskalson & Michael Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 31.3.

With respect to dual nationals, such persons, whether juristic or natural, should likewise be able to benefit from their South African nationality. Indeed, at international law, a person may have more than one nationality. South Africa's domestic legislation is relatively tolerant of dual nationality and clearly envisages persons with a nationality in addition to their South African nationality.

(ii) The Criterion of Territoriality

Territoriality is intimately bound up with the right to freedom of movement within the Republic. The Constitutional Court has, over several cases, articulated a relatively restrictive, though somewhat incoherent, territory-based approach to the application of the Bill of Rights.[1]

In Lawyers for Human Rights v Minister of Home Affairs, the Minister of Home Affairs argued for the non-application of the Bill of Rights to foreign nationals on the borders and without formal entry.[2] The Court rejected this contention and applied the constitutional rights to persons at South Africa's borders. Lawyers for Human Rights thus granted protection of the right of freedom and security of the person and the right of arrested, detained and accused persons to foreign nationals not yet formally granted permission to enter the country. However, the Court charted a relatively cautious course with respect to the application of the Bill of Rights in similar situations:

> It is neither necessary nor desirable to answer the general question as to whether the people to whom s 34 of the [Immigration] Act applies are beneficiaries of all the rights in the Constitution. It is apparent from this judgment that the rights contained in s 12 and s 35(2) of the Constitution are implicated. The only relevant question in this case therefore is whether these rights are applicable to foreign nationals who are physically in our country but who have not been granted permission to enter and have therefore not entered the country formally. These rights are integral to the values of human dignity, equality and freedom that are fundamental to our constitutional order. The denial of these rights to human beings who are physically inside the country at sea- or airports merely because they have not entered South Africa formally would constitute a negation of the values underlying our Constitution. It could hardly be suggested that persons who are being unlawfully detained on a ship in South African waters cannot turn to South African courts for protection, or that a person who commits murder on board a ship in South African waters is not liable to prosecution in a South African court.[1]

[1] For a slightly different interpretation of the Court's position on extraterritoriality, see Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.6.

[2] Lawyers for Human Rights v Minister of Home Affairs 2004 (4) SA 125 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 775 (CC)('Lawyers for Human Rights').

Once it is accepted that persons within our territorial boundaries are entitled to constitutional protection, there is no reason why 'everyone' in FC s 12(2) and FC s 35(2) should not be given its ordinary meaning. When the Final Constitution intends to confine rights to citizens it says so.

Lawyers for Human Rights turns on a reading of the Bill of Rights that limits its protection to persons within the territorial boundaries of the Republic. Indeed, the Lawyers for Human Rights Court did not clearly rule out the use of the criterion of South African nationality in considering the application of other rights. Of even greater concern, the Court may also be understood to be leaving open the door to the 'entry doctrine'. That doctrine treats persons without regularised migration status within the country as if they remained outside its territory. Following Lawyers from Human Rights, when read with both Mohamed and Kaunda, the Court's position can be articulated as follows: A substantive provision of the Bill of Rights will be strongly presumed to operate within the territory of the Republic; however, the extra-territorial application of a substantive provision of the Bill of Rights will have to be demonstrated clearly.

What bearing does this position have on the content of FC s 21? It would seem that FC s 21 (1) and FC s 21(2) apply to all persons within the territory. FC s 21 would also seem to possess at least some extra-territorial dimensions. For instance, the protection afforded to every citizen of a right to a passport must have some application to the activity of South African embassies or consulates. Furthermore, the protection afforded to enter and to leave the country would not be meaningful without at least some extra-territorial protection. Still, as Lawyers for Human Rights suggests, the extra-territorial application of FC s 21 is not to be presumed, and is likely to be limited to its specific purposes. Finally, FC s 21 (3) and FC s 21(4) would appear to possess little by way of extra-territorial application.

(iii) The Criterion of South African Nationality

The term 'everyone' in FC s 21 (1) and FC s (2) should be interpreted as affording coverage to all natural persons, whether or not they hold South African nationality.[2] Constitutional Court authority and the text of FC s 21 (3) and FC s (4) support this proposition.[3]

This state of play was not always so clear. The application of various substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights to the Aliens Control Act was hotly contested

[1] Lawyers for Human Rights (supra) at paras 26-27. The Court further noted: 'It is not necessary in this case to answer the question whether people who seek to enter South Africa by road at border posts are entitled to the rights under our Constitution if they are not allowed to enter the country.' Ibid at para 27.

[2] See Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.3.

[3] The drafting history also supports this conclusion.

in the lower courts under the Interim Constitution.[1] Despite the trend of court decisions against its position, the Minister and the Department of Home Affairs continued to insist that persons without South African nationality could not benefit from the Bill of Rights.[2]

As I have already noted, the Constitutional Court lent some succor to this position in Lawyers for Human Rights by refusing to state, categorically, that all persons would enjoy all provisions of the Bill of Rights.[3] The Lawyers for Human Rights Court was careful to leave open the question of whether the rights of freedom and security of the person and the rights of arrested, detained, and accused persons applied to persons arriving by road at the borders of the Republic.

However, in Khosa, the Court stated emphatically that the criterion of South African nationality would not be applied in determining the application of the Bill of Rights within the territory of the Republic. Writing for the majority, Mokgoro J contrasted the right to social security granted to 'everyone' in FC s 27 with the right of access to land in FC s 25(5) granted to 'citizens'. Mokgoro J confirmed that 'everyone' would be given its ordinary meaning and would apply to non-citizens — and in particular permanent residents — claiming the benefits of access to social security.[4]

(iv) The Criterion of Legality

Intertwined in the debate over the application of the Bill of Rights (and perhaps especially so in the policy areas of movement and residence) is the question of legality.[5] While lower courts have not always been explicit on this point, whether a

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC'). See Jonathan Klaaren 'So Far Not So Good: An Analysis of Immigration Decisions Under the Interim Constitution' (1996) 12 SAJHR 605; Anton Katz 'Immigration and the Court: From Xu to Ruyobeza' in Max du Plessis & Steve Pete (eds) Constitutional Democracy in South Africa: 1991-2004 (2004). Our constitutional doctrine has thus departed from pre-Bill of Rights cases. See Cabinet for the Territory of South West Africa v Chikane & Another 1989 (1) SA 349 (A)(Fundamental rights are often restricted to nationals of states with charters of human rights; restrictions on aliens' rights to enter and to move could not contravene the rights to equality or due process); Lewis v Minister of Internal Affairs & Another 1991 (3) SA 628 (B)(Since it was never the intention of the legislature in promulgating the Bophuthatswana Bill of Rights to allow individual rights to prevail over the interests of the state or public safety, an alien may not contest a Minister's decision on the grounds that he was denied a hearing, reasons for his deportation, or treated unequally.)

[2] For more on the relationship between nationality and children, see Adrian Friedman & Angelo Pantazis 'Children's Rights' in Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux, Jonathan Klaaren, Anthony Stein, Matthew Chaskalson & Michael Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2004) Chapter 54.

[3] This case-by-case approach may have been a result of the unusual procedural circumstances of the case. The case which required, effectively, abstract review of parts of the Immigration Act.

[4] Khosa v Minister of Social Development; Mahlaule v Minister of Social Development 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC) at paras 46-47.

[5] For the constitutional doctrine of legality, as opposed to the meaning of the term under immigration legislation, see Frank Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality, and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux, Jonathan Klaaren, Anthony Stein, Matthew Chaskalson & Michael Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11. Indeed, the constitutional doctrine of 'legality' suggests that the immigration doctrines of 'legality' may well be unconstitutional.

person is 'legal' or 'illegal' has often counted heavily in the determination of fundamental rights protection. This is true both at the level of doctrine, and perhaps more significantly, at how the law is applied on the streets.

What the criterion of 'legality' entails in these debates over application is usually understood as a regularized status in terms of migration legislation. Before 2002, the applicable legislation was the Aliens Control Act. As of 2002 the Aliens Control Act was supplanted by the Immigration Act.[1]

In present day South Africa, migration status is, however, more a matter of bureaucratic practice than it is of judicial interpretation. Furthermore, more than ten years after the coming into effect of South Africa's constitutional framework, migration status still bears the readily apparent effects of apartheid. The Aliens Control Act afforded state bureaucrats under apartheid the discretion to determine rights of movement and residence. Despite the replacement of the Aliens Control Act by the Immigration Act in 2002, the bureaucracy has remained wedded to the discriminatory ways of the Aliens Control Act. As we shall see, however, the doctrine of constitutional supremacy may warrant a finding that the immigration legality doctrine offends any number of substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights.

According to the drafting history of FC s 21, the issue of immigration legality was specifically touched upon by the Constitutional Assembly. The Panel of Constitutional Experts addressed the issue of immigration legality and argued that migration status was appropriate for limitations enquiry and not for rights protection or application concerns.[2] After consideration of this opinion, the final text adopted by the Assembly granted the right of residence only to citizens. Thus, the Assembly used the criterion of South African nationality and not that of legality in delineating the scope of application of FC s 21. This drafting history strongly suggests that FC s 21 — where it applies to everyone — applies to all persons present in the territory of the Republic regardless of the criterion of legality. In addition, the drafting history supports the contention that persons challenging their citizenship status or the right to a passport can rely upon FC s 21.

(b) The Content of FC s 21

(i) Purpose of the Right to Freedom of Movement and Residence

Any constitutional interpretation of the right to freedom of movement and residence must acknowledge the apartheid history of restrictions on those rights.[3] Pass laws were a defining feature of apartheid. They were among the earliest and

[1] Act 13 of 2002.

[2] Jonathan Klaaren 'Contested Citizenship' in Penelope Andrews and Steven Ellmann (eds) The Post-Apartheid Constitutions: Perspectives on South Africa's Basic Law (2001) 304, 308-9.

[3] John Dugard Human Rights and the South African Legal Order (1978) 137-141 (Discusses the power to restrict movement in terms of the Riotous Assemblies Act, the Internal Security Act, and the Bantu Administration Act.)

one of the most hated of apartheid restrictions on the rights of black South Africans. A common phrase of the anti-apartheid struggle was that black persons had no place to rest.[1]

This deep national concern with rights of movement and residence — along with their inclusion in international instruments[2] — resulted in FC s 21. The prominence of rights — and the denial of rights — to movement and residence in South Africa resonates profoundly with contemporary concerns about migration and national policy towards foreign nationals (non-South African nationals)[3] and ought to inform our interpretation of FC s 21. The courts have already demonstrated that they are alive to the purpose of FC s 21 and are committed to not permitting history to repeat itself.[4]

A historical inquiry would also show how the freedom of movement relates to the freedom of residence. Because of an overriding concern with granting rights to 'illegals', South Africa's Final Constitution does separate the two rights. This bifurcation of the rights suggests that the state possesses greater latitude with respect to the right to residence than with respect to the right to movement.

A further purpose of the right is the promotion of liberty. Where foreign constitutional courts recognize an implicit right to freedom of movement, it is often grounded in an express right to personal liberty.[5]

Where the freedom of movement has been expressly enumerated in constitutional texts, it has often been linked to the right of economic activity. This relationship suggests a final purpose of the right: the construction of a Republic as a free trading area. The drafters of the Final Constitution did not expressly follow this trend.[6] However, while the core of the right of freedom of movement may be

[1] Christina Murray & Catherine O'Regan No Place to Rest: Forced Removals and the Law in South Africa (1990).

[2] Beyond its specifically South African roots, the right of the freedom of movement has a venerable international pedigree. Indeed, the right to freedom of movement is contained explicitly in many of the international human rights instruments. See, eg, art 13 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, art 12 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and art 12 of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights.

[3] The Constitutional Court prefers the term 'foreign national' over that of 'alien'. See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) n 11.

[4] Victoria & Alfred Waterfront (Pty) Ltd & Another v Police Commissioner of the Western Cape & Others 2004 (4) SA 444 (C), [2004] 1 All SA 579, 584 (C)('Victoria' & Alfred Waterfront')('I may add that in the light of the unfortunate recent history of this country where millions of people were denied access to towns, cities and other public places, the practice of excluding people from parts of a city, albeit for limited periods, may appear repugnant and not pass constitutional muster.')

[5] Indian case law suggests that the right may be interpreted in this fashion. See Penuell Maduna 'Movement and Residence' in Halton Cheadle, Dennis Davis, and Nicholas Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 321 citing Paul Sieghart The International Law of Human Rights (1983). The right of freedom of movement has also been used in the construction and interpretation of other rights. See The Attorney-General v Dow 1994 (6) BCLR 1 (Botswana Court uses freedom of movement to flesh out understanding of geneder equality).

[6] Lourens du Plessis & Jacque de Ville 'Personal Rights: Life, Freedom and Security of the Person, Privacy and Freedom of Movement' in David Van Wyk, John Dugard, Bertus de Villiers, and Dennis Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 212, 254-263 (Notice that the Kempton Park negotiators opted for 'the German rather than the Canadian approach.').

located in the right of individual locomotion,[1] the right of freedom of movement inevitably establishes the territory of the Republic as one where free movement, and thus free economic activity and trade, may occur.[2]

(ii) Everyone has the right to freedom of movement

The pass laws of apartheid offer perhaps the most obvious and egregious example of a violation of the right to freedom of movement. The use of border posts to regulate inter-provincial travel within South Africa would, likewise, be deemed constitutionally infirm under our basic law.

The content of the right of freedom of movement in post-apartheid South Africa clearly extends beyond preventing the reintroduction of pass law legislation.[3] Random checks of identity documents would likely not pass constitutional muster.[4] Indeed, the right may now be deemed to operate not only between the state and its citizens, but in the 'so-called' private domain.[5]

For example, in Victoria & Alfred Waterfront (Pty) Ltd & Another v Police Commissioner of the Western Cape the High Court was obliged to assess the relative value of the applicants' property rights — including an obvious right to protect their custom and business interests — and the respondents' right to freedom of movement — where they engaged in the practice of begging — at a popular Cape

[1] It is sometimes suggested that the freedom of movement right also includes a right to be free from surveillance. See Maduna (supra) at 321—322 (Citing Kharak Singh v State of Uttar Pradesh [1964] 1 SCR 332 (Subha Rao J for the minority).) The placing of a person under surveillance may constitute a restriction with a lower degree of control than a detention that would trigger the right of freedom and security. Nevertheless, surveillance constitutes a degree of control of personal liberty that ought to attract the attention of our courts. However, it would seem that the right to privacy and the right of access to information would be better suited to provide a location for defending the individual or a juristic person against unjustifiable surveillance. See David McQuoid-Mason 'Privacy' in Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux, Jonathan Klaaren, Anthony Stein, Matthew Chaskalson & Michael Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 38; & Jonathan Klaaren & Glen Penfold 'Access to Information' in Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux, Jonathan Klaaren, Anthony Stein, Matthew Chaskalson & Michael Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2002) Chapter 62.

[2] For related views on the relationship between conflicts of law and free economic activity, see Victoria Bronstein 'Conflicts' in Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux, Jonathan Klaaren, Anthony Stein, Matthew Chaskalson & Michael Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 16.

[3] Victoria & Alfred Waterfront (supra) at 585 ('With regard to freedom of movement (section 21 of the Bill of Rights) Mr de Waal submitted that the core of the right is to prevent the reintroduction of the pass laws which prevented people from moving freely from one place to another during the apartheid era. It may be that the effect of the section is to prohibit such legislation. However, the section is not limited to those circumstances. It is broadly stated. There is no reason to limit it so as to bring it in line with the common law; rather, the converse applies.')

[4] See Elliot v Commissioner of Police, Zimbabwe 1998 (1) SA 21 (ZS).

[5] Victoria & Alfred Waterfront (supra) at 585 ('The right to exclude is further limited by the fact that exclusions will be a limitation of the constitutional right of freedom of movement of the second and third respondents.') See also South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Others 2003 (3) SA 239, 255 (T), 2003 (9) BCLR 1054 (T)('SANDU')(Discusses the right of free movement.) But see SANDU & Another v Minister of Defence & Others; In re SANDU v Minister of Defence & Others 2004 (4) SA 10 (T), [2003] 3 All SA 436 (T)(Criticizes the Constitutional Court's earlier judgment in SANDU in this regard.)

Town mall.[1] The decision turned in part on the character of this mall. The Court wrote:

> The Waterfront is somewhat different from other shopping malls and appears to be private property of a particular kind. It is 123 hectares in extent and consists of a vast array of shops, restaurants, offices and places of public entertainment. It also includes public roads, hotels and access to the sea. People wishing to visit Robben Island are obliged to board the boat or ferry transferring them to the island at the Waterfront. Moreover, a post office and a police charge office are located on the property. It has the distinctive character of private property to which members of the public have routine access and which the public are invited to visit whether or not they intend to conduct any business on the property. It is for all practical purposes a suburb of Cape Town.[2]

It may make some difference where in the territory of the Republic the restrictions on movement are levied. For instance, the police and the military may legitimately exercise greater powers of search and seizure within a certain proximity of the nation's borders. Likewise, reasonable restrictions on movement after natural disasters or in the immediate environs of a police investigation are likely to be found justifiable.

An infringement of the freedom of movement is conceptually distinct from an infringement of the right of freedom and security of the person.[3] One way to state the distinction between these two rights is that a restriction of the freedom of movement is a restriction that does not amount to a detention. It may be a condition on access or egress. A restriction on movement would embrace a mandatory exclusion from a certain area (such as exclusion from a military base), rather than a mandatory inclusion (detention). As a general rule, a restriction on the freedom of movement does not entail the same degree of control as does a detention.

The general right to freedom of movement may apply to the right to international travel. Such a right would, in part, be contingent upon the Court's recognition of FC s 21's extraterritorial application. However, one can imagine a FC s 21 challenge where an international speaker is refused a visa to South Africa or persons within the country are denied the ability to travel to hear a speaker on a controversial topic.

The right of freedom of movement may also be influential in respect of decisions regarding deportation. For instance, the right of freedom of movement was employed in a pre-Immigration Act matter declaring invalid the deportation from [1] For a general discussion of rights of assembly and movement in quasi-public spaces such as shopping malls, see Stu Woolman 'Freedom of Assembly' in Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux, Jonathan Klaaren, Anthony Stein, Matthew Chaskalson & Michael Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 43.

[2] Victoria & Alfred Waterfront (supra) at 582. Cf Landvreugd v Netherlands 36 EHRR 56 (A 14-day banning of beggars from an area of Amsterdam was upheld.)

[3] For a detailed analysis of the right to freedom and security of the person, see Michael Bishop & Stu Woolman 'Freedom & Security of the Person' in Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux, Jonathan Klaaren, Anthony Stein, Matthew Chaskalson & Michael Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 40.

South Africa of a foreign national married to a South African citizen.[1] Section 34 of the Immigration Act now regulates the deportation and detention of 'illegal foreigners' and, at least in respect of deportation, must comply with the right of freedom of movement and residence.

The right of freedom of movement in FC s 21(1) likely protects the rights of lawful resident foreign nationals in a similar manner to FC s 21(3). In short, lawful resident foreign nationals should possess the same rights to enter, remain in and to reside anywhere in the Republic.[2] That said, it may be easier for the government to justify regulation of, for instance, the right to enter the Republic with respect to foreign nationals than with respect to citizens.

Residency requirements may impact upon the freedom of movement as well as upon the freedom of residence. Disproportionate requirements of residency may interfere with the freedom of movement. For instance, if the hospitals of Gauteng were to limit the availability of their services to residents of Gauteng, this limitation might require justification in terms of FC s 36.[3]

(iii) Everyone has the right to leave the Republic.

The laws of apartheid-era South Africa regulated the right of persons to leave the Republic.[4] Currently, most Southern African countries have only procedural requirements for departure from their territory. However, some countries substantively regulate the right of persons to leave their territory.[5]

Procedural regulations regarding departure would clearly fall within the ambit of FC s 21(2). They would, however, in most cases be deemed constitutional.[6] Such procedural regulations are usually not intrusive and certainly yields benefits of information to the state in its efforts to promote development and, at least in the case of its nationals, to protect their rights beyond the borders of the territory.

[1] Patel &Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another [2000] 4 All SA 256 (D).

[2] In this respect, the thrust of the interpretation offered by a former Minister of Home Affairs, Penuell Maduna, is instructive:

> Though the words used in section 21(3) of the Constitution are clear, it is unimaginable that the intention of the makers of our Constitution (all of whom were inspired by the noble ideal of democracy founded on basic core values encapsulated in the Constitution) was consciously to take away the rights of foreigners lawfully abiding with the national territory of our country. In terms of section 6(2) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, these rights are enjoyed by all persons lawfully within any democratic country. It is, thus, safer to assume that a foreigner lawfully within the Republic has a right to enter, reside and remain in any province, city, town or community with generally the same mobility rights as a South African citizen.

Penuell Maduna 'Movement & Residence' Halton Cheadle, Dennis Davis & Nicholas Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 299.

[3] In this respect, it is probably worth noting that the constitutional position of the provinces is derivative of the national territory rather than the reverse. In this respect, the South African position on residency would presumably be even stronger than the protection afforded by the US Constitution.

[4] John Dugard Human Rights and the South African Legal Order (1978) 141-143.

[5] For instance, the African Emigration and Immigrant Workers Act 1 of 1954 (Malawi) apparently remains in effect.

[6] Section 9 of the Immigration Act 13 of 2002 regulates the departure of persons from the territory requiring a passport, that such departure be done at a port of entry, that the departure is recorded by an immigration officer, and that such departing person may be examined by an immigration officer.

For example, in the current global market for services and skilled professionals, medical professionals trained in South Africa will want to exercise the right to leave the Republic to work in other countries.

FC s 21(2) differs from the rights contained in FC s 21(3) most obviously (apart from its content) by its extension to 'everyone' as opposed to every 'citizen'. As noted above, FC s 21(2) is most likely applicable only to natural persons.

(iv) Every citizen has the right to enter the Republic[1]

The procedures that the state uses to verify claims of entrance based on citizenship at the border would be implicated by this right.[2] One substantive obligation imposed by the right is that a state must accept a citizen deported to it.

(v) Every citizen has the right to remain in the Republic

Most of the litigation regarding the right to remain in the Republic is concerned with the legislative provisions allowing for extradition.[3] Comparative constitutional case law suggests that extradition laws do not violate the right of freedom of movement.[4] Despite the wording of FC s 21(3), the current policy of the Republic is that the citizenship of the person to be extradited is not relevant. The Constitutional Court has found no reason to query this policy determination.[5] Nonetheless, in the view of the Geuking Court, FC s 21(3) could well be relevant to 'the exercise of the discretion conferred on the Minister by the Act.'[6] To be safe, the Minister ought to at the least consider the citizenship of the person in the exercise of the Extradition Act's provisions regarding orders or refusals of surrender to a foreign state.

The language of FC s 21(3) suggests that certain forms of punishment are no longer permissible. For example, FC s 21(3) should bar the state from exiling a citizen.[7]

[1] One relevant international instrument is the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Article 12(4) provides: 'No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of the right to enter his own country.'

[2] Section 9 of the Immigration Act 13 of 2002 regulates admission requiring a passport, that such admission be done at a port of entry, that the entry is recorded by an immigration officer, and that such entering person may be examined by an immigration officer.

[3] Extradition Act 67 of 1962. Other constitutional challenges to extradition proceedings have implicated other provisions of the Final Constitution. See Harksen v President of the Republic of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 825 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 578 (CC)(FC s 231); Director of Public Prosecutions: Cape of Good Hope v Robinson 2005 (2) BCLR 103 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 103 (CC)(FC s 39(2)).

[4] Re Federal Republic of Germany and Ruaca (1983) 145 DLR (3d) 638.

[5] Geuking v President of the Republic of South Africa 2003 (3) SA 34 (CC), 2004 (9) BCLR 895 (CC)('Geuking') at para 28 ('The President is therefore entitled to adopt a policy that it is in the interests of the Republic to consent to a request for extradition proceedings against a person, regardless of his or her citizenship.')

[6] Ibid.

[7] Although it did not explicitly use the right to movement and residence, Mohamed v President of the Republic of South Africa concerned the conditions of leaving the Republic where the person in question has been detained by the state. 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC) The Mohamed Court interpreted the right to life and the right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment to require assurances from a receiving state that a death penalty would not be used upon a person being removed from South Africa.

(vi) Every citizen has the right to reside anywhere in the Republic

Residence means an acknowledged or a sanctioned place of residence. It does not refer to the substantive aspects of residence. The right to shelter is catered for by FC s 26, the right to adequate housing.

It has been argued that the term 'anywhere in the Republic' restricts the powers of the provincial legislatures to prevent persons from other provinces from taking up residency.[1] For example, any provincial law or policy requiring occupancy in a province for more than a year before providing particular medical benefits or even treatment would be constitutionally suspect.[2] FC s 21(3) may well protect a person's right to determine where they receive their post.

That the benefits of FC s 21(3) extend only to citizens has certain repercussions for non-citizens. Any challenge to a residency requirement by a non-citizen (for instance asylum seekers) would need to proceed in terms of FC s 21(1).

(vii) Every citizen has the right to a passport

Since the issues that this subsection raises are closely connected with the status, rights, and duties of citizenship, this aspect of the right to freedom of movement and residence is discussed, along with such closely related provisions as FC s 3 and FC s 20, in the chapter on citizenship.[3]

(c) Policy issues relevant to the Right to Freedom of Movement and Residence

The courts have deployed the right of freedom of movement and residence in a number of decisions where the right itself was not actually at issue. In criminal law, the right has been used as a partial justification for the length of a sentence.[4] In matrimonial property law, the right has been cited as part of the justification for a spoliation order to return marital property taken from a residence.[5] In prisons law, the right was considered 'widely' relevant in a decision denying internet access for study purposes.[6] In some evictions cases before the Land Claims Court, the right has been said to be of little or no avail.[7] In respect of civil procedure, the right was invoked in support of an order requiring release of [1] Maduna (supra) at 315.

[2] Ibid at 320.

[3] See Jonathan Klaaren 'Citizenship' in Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux, Jonathan Klaaren, Anthony Stein, Matthew Chaskalson & Michael Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, April 2007) Chapter 67 (Discusses the provisions of the South African Citizenship Act 88 of 1995 and the South African Passports and Travel Documents Act 4 of 1994).

[4] Mfingwa & Others v S [2001] JOL 8933 (Tk)(Two year sentence for kidnapping of a woman and a child and forcible ejection from their homestead.)

[5] Mans v Mans (born Maddock) [1999] 3 All SA 506 (C).

[6] Thukwane v Minister of Correctional Services & Others [2005] JOL 13467 (T).

[7] Portion 608 New Belgium CC v Monyiki & Another [2003] JOL 10995 (LCC)(Little avail); Swanevelder & another v Mpedi & others [2002] JOL 9913 (LCC)(No avail).

the passport and the travel documents of a person arrested in terms of an arrest tamquam suspectus de fuga.[1]

The Constitutional Court has considered two challenges based on the right of freedom of movement and residence to certain aspects of a health care providers licensing scheme. In Affordable Medicines Trust & Others v Minister of Health of RSA & Another, the licensing scheme at issue linked the license to dispense medicines to a particular premises.[2] The Constitutional Court dismissed the freedom of movement and residence challenge in the following terms:

> The applicants contended that the requirement to apply for a new licence whenever a medical practitioner is moving to new premises interferes with the freedom of movement. I think that it can be accepted that the right to practise a profession includes the right to decide where one will practise one's profession. This being a right relating to the practice of a profession, it is subject to regulation under section 22. The requirement of a licence does not take away the right to choose where to practise medicine. But what it does is merely to require that if the practice is to involve compounding and dispensing of medicines, this should be done from premises in respect of which a licence to dispense medicines has been issued. This does not infringe the right to freedom of movement as contemplated in section 21 of the Constitution. There is nothing in the regulations to suggest that medical practitioners will be prevented from practising their profession from wherever they choose.[3]

The Affordable Medicines Trust Court thus preferred to view the matter in terms of the right to practice a profession rather than the right of freedom of movement and residence.[4] Similarly, in Coetzee v Comitis, a challenge to restraint of trade, worded at times in the language of the freedom of movement, was ultimately decided by the Cape High Court in terms of the right to practice one's profession.[5]

(d) The relationship of freedom of movement and residence to other constitutional rights

(i) Dignity

In Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs, the right to dignity was understood to encompass a right of spouses to live together.[6] An immigration regulation requirement that an application for permanent residence had to be made from outside the country would have forced spouses to choose between leaving South Africa or separating from one another. The Court held such a choice to be a

[1] Alliance Corporation Ltd v Blogg: In re Alliance Corporation Ltd v Blogg & Others [1999] 3 All SA 262 (W)(Detention of person's travel documents and limitation on freedom of movement not justified once conditions for an internationally enforceable judgment have been satisfied.)

[2] 2006 (3) SA 247 (CC), 2005 (6) BCLR 529 (CC)('Affordable Medicines Trust').

[3] Ibid at paras 102-103.

[4] Ibid at para 134 (Related challenge to a regulation on the basis of the right of freedom of movement and residence was also dismissed.)

[5] Coetzee v Comitis & Others 2001 (1) SA 1254 (C), 2001 (4) BCLR 323 (C), [2001] 1 All SA 538 (C)(Declared invalid a restraint of trade clause that limited a football player's movement from one club to another.)

[6] 2000 (1) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC). See also Booysen v Minister of Home Affairs 2001 (4) SA 485 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 645 (CC)(Extended Dawood to further classes of migration regulation.)

violation of the right to intimate association protected by FC s 10.[1] In Minister of Home Affairs v Watchenuka,[2] the Supreme Court of Appeal used the right to dignity to strike down an official policy barring 'asylum seekers — people who claim to be taking refuge in this country from persecution or conflict elsewhere — from being employed and from studying while they are waiting to be recognised as refugees.'[3]

(ii) Equality

In National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs, gay and lesbian persons challenged an immigration regulation that did not extend the same benefits to same-sex life partners as it did to opposite-sex life partners.[4] The Constitutional Court ultimately ordered that permanent residence permits be made available to persons in same-sex life partnerships.

In Khosa v Minister of Social Development, the Constitutional Court struck down a legislative scheme that limited the right to social benefits to South African nationals.[5] The Court held that permanent residents — in this case former refugees from Mozambique — were entitled to equal treatment and equal access to social assistance.

However, refugees and foreign nationals are not always accorded equal treatment under our basic law. In Union of Refugee Women, a majority of the Constitutional Court found that a bar on refugees being employed as security service providers did not violate the refugees' right to equality.[6]

[1] The South African approach differs from the Zimbabwean approach to this issue. See Rattigan & Others v Chief Immigration Officer & Others 1994 (2) ZLR 54 (S); Salem v Chief Immigration Officer & Another 1994 (2) ZLR 287 (S); and Kohlhaas v Chief Immigration Officer & Another 1997 (2) ZLR 441 (S).

[2] 2004 (4) SA 326 (SCA), 2004 (2) BCLR 120 (SCA).

[3] Ibid at para 1.

[4] 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC)(The right of freedom of movement had been argued as an alternative basis for the ruling in the lower court.) See also National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 1999 (3) SA 173 (C), 1999 (3) BCLR 280 (C), [1999] 1 All SA 643 (C).

[5] Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Another v Min of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC).

[6] Union of Refugee Women & Others v The Director: The Private Security Industry Regulatory Authority & Others CCT 39/06 (as yet unreported decision of 12 December 2006).

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA

TABLE OF CASES

(up to and including Revision Service 4, March 2012.)

Note: References given in this Table are to section numbers in chapters, not page numbers

SOUTHERN AFRICA

A

AAA Investments v Micro Finance Regulatory Council and Another 2007 (1) SA 343 (CC), 2006 (11) BCLR 1255 (CC) ..... 3.4*(a), 9.4(b)(i), 12.3(d)(iii), 17.5(e)(i) & (iii), 18.3(f)(ii), 32.5(b),* 40.1*(b)(i), 63.3(b)*, 63.8

ABBM Printing and Publishing (Pty) Ltd v Transnet Limited 1998 (2) SA 109 (W), 1997 (1) BCLR 1429 (W), [1997] 4 All AC SA 94 (W) 25.8, 62.7

ABSA Bank Ltd t/a Bankfin v Stander t/a CAW Paneelklopppers 1998 (1) SA 939 (C) ..... 32.5*(b)*

ABSA Bank Ltd v Amod [1999] 2 All SA 423 (W) ..... 55.6*(b)*(ii)

AD & Another v DW & Others (Centre for Child Law as Amicus Curiae; Department for Social Development as Intervening Party) 2008 (3) SA 183 (CC), 2008 (4) BCLR 359 (CC) ..... 32.5*(b)*, 47.1

AK Entertainment CC v Minister of Safety and Security and Others 1995 (1) SA 783 (E), 1994 (4) BCLR 31 (E) ..... 31.3*(d), 36.4(f)*, 38.4, 54.4

AM Moola Group Ltd and Others v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service and Others 2003 (6) SA 244 (SCA) ..... 32.5*(c)*

Abrahamse v East London Municipality and Another; East London Municipality v Abrahamse 1997 (4) SA 613 (SCA) ..... 32.3*(a)*

Abrams v Allie NO and Others 2004 (4) SA 534 (SCA), 2004 (9) BLLR 914 (SCA), [2004] 2 All SA 99 (SCA) ..... 24F.2, 48.8*(c)*(ii), 58.2

Abt v Registrar of Supreme Court (1899) 16 SC 476 ..... 42.9*(c)*

Acting Superintendent-General of Education of KwaZulu-Natal v Ngubo 1996 (3) BCLR 369 (N) ..... 9.5*(c)(iii), 43.3(a)*

Adbro Investment Co Ltd v Minister of Interior and Others 1961 (3) SA 283 (T) ..... 9.5*(b)*(ii)

Administrator, Natal and Another v Sibiya 1992 (4) SA 532 (A) ..... 63.3*(b)*

Administrator, Transvaal and Others v Traub and Others 1989 (4) SA 731 (A) ..... 63.5*(d)*

Administrator, Transvaal and Others v Zenzile and Others 1991 (1) SA 21 (A) ..... 63.3*(b)*

Administrator, Transvaal v Brydon 1993 (3) SA 1 (A) ..... 9.2*(b)*(i)

Advance Mining Hydraulics v Botes NO 2000 (1) SA 815 (T), 2000 (2) BCLR 119 (T) ..... 36.3*(a), 36.3(d)*

Afdelingsraad van Swartland v Administrateur, Kaap 1983 (3) SA 469 (C) . 7.3*(b)*

Affordable Medicines Trust and Others v Minister of Health and Others 2006 (3) SA 247 (CC), 2005 (6) BCLR 529 (CC) ..... 3.6, 4.3*(d)(ii), 17.5(e)(i), 17.5(f)(ii), 32.5(b), 50.4(h)(ii)(hh), 63.4, 66.1(c)*

Affordable Medicines Trust v Minister of Health 2004 (6) SA 387 (T) ..... 36.4*(f)*

Africa Christian Action v Marie Stopes South Africa (Advertising Standards Authority of South Africa Final Appeal Committee, 22 April 2004) 37.11

African Charcoal (Pty) v Ndlovu [2002] 2 ALL SA 19 (LCC) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)

African Christian Democratic Party v Electoral Commission and Others 2006 (3) SA 305 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 579 (CC) ..... 1.3, 9.4*(b)(ii), 10.3(b), 10.4(b), 10.5(c), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 32.3(b), 32.3(c), 32.5(c)*

African National Congress and Another v Minister of Local Government and Housing, KwaZulu-Natal and Others 1998 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1998 (4) BCLR 399 (CC) ..... 6.2*(d), 26.5(d)*

African National Congress and Others v United Democratic Movement and Others (Krog and Others Intervening) 2003 (1) SA 533 (CC), 2003 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ..... 4.3*(a)(ii), 17.1(c), 19.1(c)*

African National Congress (Border Branch) v Chairman, Council of State, Ciskei 1992 (4) SA 434 (Ck), 1994 (1) BCLR 145 (Ck) ..... 32.1*(a), 43.2(b)(ii), 43.3(b)*(iv)

African National Congress v Inkatha Freedom Party [1999] 3 All SA 47 (W) ..... 42.9*(a)*

African Political Organisation and the British Indian Association v Johannesburg Municipality 1906 TS 962 ..... 7.3*(b)*

Afrika v Metzler 1997 (4) SA 531 (NmH) ..... 38.2*(b)(i), 38.2(b)(iii), 38.3(b)(i), 42.9(a)*

Afrox Healthcare Bpk v Strydom 2002 (6) SA 21 (SCA) ..... 11.2*(a), 11.3(b), 14.5(d)(ii)(cc), 31.1(c), 31.2(d)(vi), 31.4(a)(v), 31.4(c)(ii), 31.4(e)(x), 31.7(c), 32.5(b), 36.4(f), 56C.3(b)*(ii)

Ahmadiyya Anjuman Ihaati-Islam Lahore (South Africa) and Another v Muslim Judicial Council (Cape) and Others 1983 (4) SA 855 (C) ..... 7.2*(b), 7.2(c)*(v)

Airconditioning Design & Development (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Public Works, Gauteng Province 2005 (4) SA 103 (T) ..... 59.4*(a)*(iv)

Airoadexpress v LRTB, Durban 1986 (2) SA 663 (A) ..... 4.3*(b)*(vii)

Alexkor Ltd and Another v The Richtersveld Community and Others 2004 (5) SA 460 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1301 (CC) ..... 4.3*(a), 4.3(d)(iii), 9.5(b)(ii), 24F.2, 32.3(c), 36.5(c), 48.4, 48.5, 48.8(c)(ii), 48.8(c)(iii), 58.1(b), 58.2, 64.4(b)*(i)

Alfred Mc Alpine & Son (Pty) Ltd v Transvaal Provincial Administration 1974 (3) SA 506 (A) ..... 32.3*(b)*

All the Best Trading CC t/a Parkville Motors v S N Nyagar Property Development and Construction CC 2005 (3) SA 396 (T) ..... 50.4*(b)*

Alliance Corporation Ltd v Blogg: In re Alliance Corporation Ltd v Blogg and Others [1999] 3 All SA 262 (W) ..... 66.1*(c)*

Allsop v McCann 2001 (2) SA 706 (C), [2000] 3 All SA 475 (C) ..... 41.4*(c), 47.3(a)*

Amalgamated Engineering Union v Minister of Labour 1949 (3) SA 637 (A) ..... 3.4*(b)*

Amalgamated Packaging Industries Ltd v Hutt 1975 (4) SA 943 (A) 53.5

American Natural Soda Ash Corp and Another v Competition Commission and Others 2005 (6) SA 158 (SCA) ..... 3.5*(b)*

Amod v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accidents Fund 1998 (4) SA 753 (CC), 1998 (10) BCLR 1207 (CC) ..... 5.3*(e)(ii), 11.3(b), 24D.5(e), 31.4(e)(ii), 31.4(e)(iv), 32.5(b)*

Amod v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accidents Fund (Commission for Gender Equality Intervening) 1999 (4) SA 1319 (SCA) ..... 4.3*(d)(i)(aa), 11.3(b), 24D.5(e), 24F.4(e)(i), 41.4(a), 41.6, 64.6(b)*(ii)
Amod v S 2001 (4) All SA 13 (E) ..... 52.10*(d)*
Antonie v Governing Body, Settlers High School and Others 2002 (4) SA 738 (C) ..... 47.1, 57.2*(a)(i)(bb)(x), 57.2(a)(ii)(aa)(y)*(bbb)(xx)
Aquafund (Pty) Ltd v Premier of the Province of the Western Cape 1997 (7) BCLR 907 (C), [1997] 2 All SA 608 (C) ..... 25.8, 50.3*(b)(ii)(aa)(u)*, 62.7
Areff v Minister van Polisie 1977 (2) SA 900 (A) ..... 38.3*(a)*(iv)
Argus Printing and Publishing v Esselen's Estate 1994 (2) SA 1 (A) ..... 36.4*(b)(iii), 42.9(a)* Armbruster and Another v Minister of Finance and Others 2007 (6) SA 550 (CC), 2007 (12) BCLR 1283 (CC) ..... 4.4, 59.4*(a)*(i)
Arnold v Race Classification Appeal Board 1967 (2) SA 267 (C) ..... 17.3*(f)*
Association of Amusement and Novelty Machine Operators and Another v Minister of Justice and Another 1980 (2) SA 636 (A) ..... 32.5*(c)*
Association of Chartered Certified Accountants v Chairman, Public Accountants' and Auditors' Board 2001 (2) SA 980 (W) ..... 25.8, 31.4*(f), 31.4(f)(ii), 63.3(b), 63.3(c)*
Attorney-General, Eastern Cape v Blom and Others 1988 (4) SA 645 (A) . 6.2*(d)*
Attorney-General, Eastern Cape v D 1997 (1) SACR 473 (E), 1997 (7) BCLR 918 (E) ..... 51.1*(b)(iv), 51.5(f), 51.5(e)*(i)
Attorney General, Namibia, Ex parte: In re Corporal Punishment by Organs of State 1991 (3) SA 76 (NmS) ..... 40.7*(a)(i), 40.7(a)(ii), 40.7(c)(i), 49.2(d), 49.2(d)*(ii)
Attorney-General, Namibia, Ex Parte: In re the Constitutional Relationship between the Attorney-General and the Prosecutor-General 1995 (8) BCLR 1070 (NmS) ..... 17.5*(d)*
Attorney-General of Lesotho and Another v Swissborough Diamond Mines (Pty) Ltd and Others 1997 (8) BCLR 1122 (CA) ..... 30.4*(d)*
Attorney-General of the Transvaal v Additional Magistrate for Johannesburg 1924 AD 421 ..... 47.7*(a)*
Attorney-General v Moagi (1982) (2) BLR 124 (CA) ..... 32.1*(b), 51.4(b)(ii), 51.5(j)*(ii)
August and Another v Electoral Commission and Others 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC) ..... 2.1, 8.3*(g), 9.2(b)(i), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 9.6(c)(ii)(bb), 10.3(b), 10.4(b), 10.5(c), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 17.5(b), 29.2(b), 33.12, 34.7(a), 34.7(c)(i), 34.8(e)(ii), 36.2(d), 38.3(b)(ii), 40.7(c)(i), 49.3(a), 55(c), 57.2(b)(ii)(bb), 64.6(f)*
Avril Elizabeth Home for the Mentally Handicapped v Commission For Conciliation, Mediation & Arbitration and Others (2006) 27 ILJ 1644 (LC) ..... 59.4*(c)*(vi)
Azanian People's Organisation (AZAPO) and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 1996 (4) SA 671 (CC), 1996 (8) BCLR 1015 (CC) ..... 30.1*(b)(i), 30.2(b), 32.4(a), 32.5(c), 48.4, 49.1, 51.5(m)*, 59.5

Azanian People's Organisation (AZAPO) and Others v Truth and Reconciliation Commission and Others 1996 (4) SA 562 (C) ..... 51.5*(m)*

B

B v M 2006 (9) BCLR 1034 (W) ..... 47.3*(a), 47.3(b)*
B v S 1995 (3) SA 571 (A) ..... 47.3*(a), 47.3(b)*
B v S 2003 (9) BCLR 955 (E) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i) BAWU v Asoka Hotel (1989) 10 ILJ 167 (IC) 53.6
BTR Industries SA (Pty) Ltd and Others v Metal and Allied Workers' Union and Another 1992 (3) SA 673 (A) ..... 63.5*(g)*
Bacela v MEC for Welfare (Eastern Cape Provincial Government) [1998] 1 All SA 525 (E) ..... 56D.4*(b)*
Bafokeng Tribe v Impala Platinum Ltd and Others 1999 (3) SA 517 (B), 1998 (11) BCLR 1373 (B) ..... 7.2*(c)(i), 7.2(c)(iii), 59.4(a)*(iii)
Bagnall v The Colonial Government (1907) 24 SC 470 ..... 7.2*(b)*
Baldeo v Minister of Safety and Security for the Republic of South Africa 1997 (12) BCLR 1728 (D) ..... 59.4*(a)*(ii)
Balmoral Investments (Edms) Bpk v Minister van Mineraal- en Energiesake en Andere 1995 (9) BCLR 1104 (NC) 62.7
Baloro and Others v University of Bophutathswana 1995 (8) BCLR 1018 (B) ..... 32.3*(a), 32.4(c)*
Baloro and Others v University of Bophuthatswana and Others 1995 (4) SA 197 (B), 1995 (8) BCLR 1018 (B) ..... 11.2*(b)(i), 31.3(a)(i), 31.4(f)*
Banana v Attorney-General 1999 (1) BCLR 27 (ZS) ..... 42.9*(c), 51.5(e)*(ii)
Bangindawo and Others v Head of the Nyanda Regional Authority and Another; Hlantlalala v Head of the Western Tembuland Regional Authority and Others 1998 (3) SA 262 (Tk), 1998 (2) SACR 16 (Tk), 1998 (3) BCLR 314 (Tk) ..... 26.6*(c)(i), 51.5(e)(i), 51.5(h), 59.2(b)*
Bannatyne v Bannatyne (Commission for Gender Equality, as Amicus Curiae) 2003 (2) SA 363 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 111 (CC) ..... 4.3*(g)(ii), 5.3(a)(ii), 6.2(a), 8.3(g), 24D.5(e), 24F.4(e)(i), 31.4(b)(iii), 35.1(d)(iii), 35.5(g)(ii), 47.10(b), 47.3(b)*, 49.1
Baramoto and Others v Minister of Home Affairs and Others 1998 (5) BCLR 562 (W) ..... 51.3*(g), 59.2(b), 59.4(c)*(iv)
Bareki NO v Gencor Ltd & Others 2006 (1) SA 432 ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(bb)*(x)(3)
Barkhuizen v Napier 2007 (5) SA 323 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 691 (CC) ..... 3.3*(a), 4.3(d)(i)(aa), 4.3(d)(i)(aa), 9.2(c)(iii)(bb), 32.1(c), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 59.2(b), 59.2(a)(ii), 59.4(a)(i), 59.4(a)*(ii)
Barnard v Santam Bpk 1999 (1) SA 202 (SCA) ..... 40.8*(b)*
Basson and Others v City of Johannesburg Metropolitan Municipality and Others and Eskom Pension and Provident Fund v City of Johannesburg Metropolitan Municipality and Others 2005 JDR 1 ..... 22.3*(b)*(v)
Bate v Regional Magistrate, Randburg 1996 (7) BCLR 974 (W) ..... 31.2*(d)(v), 51.2, 51.4(c), 51.5(f)*
Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Others 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC) ..... 1.3, 3.3*(c), 4.3(d)(ii), 4.3(d)(iii), 11.1(b), 11.2(b)(iii), 11.3(a), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa), 13.2(a), 13.5(a), 22.5(d)*,

26.6*(c)(iii), 32.3(a), 32.3(c), 35.1(d)(ii), 35.4(a), 35.4(d)(iii), 48.4, 50.3(b)(i)(z), 50.3(b)(ii)(bb)(y), 56B.3(b)(i), 63.1, 63.6(a), 63.6(b), 63.6(d)*

Beck v Kopanong Local Municipality, unreported (OFS) Case No 3773/2002 ..... 22.4*(b)*

Beedle & Co v Bowley (1895) 12 SC 401 ..... 32.5*(c)*

Beinash v Ernst and Young 1999 (2) SA 116 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 125 (CC) ..... 5.2, 6.2*(b)(iii), 34.1(b), 34.3(b), 34.8(c)(ii), 43.3(a), 52.6(a)(i), 54.5, 59.2(b), 59.3(b), 59.4(a)(vi), 59.4(b)*(iii), 59.5

Beja and Others v Premier, Western Cape and Others (Unreported), Western Cape High Court Case No.21332/10, 29 April 2011 ..... 56B.5*(b)*(ii)

Bekker and Another v Jika 2002 (4) SA 508 (E), [2002] All SA 156 (E) ..... 13.5*(a), 24C.3(c)*(ii)

Bekker v Jika [2001] 4 All SA 573 (SE) ..... 55.6*(b)(ii), 56C.3(b)*(ii)

Belli, Ex Parte 1914 CPD 742 ..... 30.2*(a)*

Bellocchio Trust Trustees v Engelbrecht NO and Another 2002 (3) SA 519 (C) ..... 34.7*(a), 59.4(a)*(iv)

Bel Porto School Governing Body and Others v Premier of the Province, Western Cape and Another 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC) ..... 4.3*(d)(ii), 9.2(c)(i)(bb), 9.2(c)(iv), 6.2(a), 6.2(d), 11.1(b), 11.1(c), 11.3(c)(iii), 17.5(f)(i), 31.4(c)(ii), 31.4(c)(iii), 31.4(d)(i), 32.3(b), 34.5(b)(ii), 35.3(a)(ii), 35.3(e)(i), 35.5(g)(i), 35.5(h), 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y), 59.4(b)(i), 63.5(a), 63.6(b), 63.7(b)*, 63.10

Bennett v Minister of Safety and Security 2006 (1) SACR 523 (T) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)

Benson v Robinson and Co 1967 (1) SA 420 (A) ..... 38.2*(c)*(i)

Berg v Prokureur-Generaal, Gauteng 1995 (2) SACR 623 (T) ..... 51.5*(f), 51.5(g)*

Bernstein and Others v Bester and Others NNO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC) ..... 4.3*(c)(ii), 12.3(c)(ii), 12.3(d)(iv), 17.5(d), 32.3(b), 32.4(c), 34.3(b), 34.8(c)(iii), 36.4(e), 38.1, 38.2, 38.2(a)(i), 38.2(a)(iii), 38.3, 38.3(a), 38.3(a)(i), 38.3(a)(ii), 38.4, 38.5(b), 40.2(a), 40.3(b), 40.3(c)(i), 40.3(d), 51.1(a)(v), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.4(b)(iii), 51.5(b), 52.2(b), 59.3(a)(iv), 59.4(b), 59.4(b)(ii), 62.8(a)*

Bertie Van Zyl (Pty) Ltd & Another v Minister for Safety and Security & Others 2010 (2) SA 181 (CC), 2009 (10) BCLR 978 (CC), [2009] ZACC 11 ..... 17.5*(f)*(ii)

Besserglik v Minister of Trade, Industry and Tourism and Others (Minister of Justice Intervening) 1996 (4) SA 331 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 745 (CC) ..... 5.3*(d), 59.3(a)(iv), 59.3(b)*
Bester v Calitz 1982 (3) SA 864 (O) ..... 38.2*(c)*(ii)
Bester v Commercial Union Versekeringsmaatskappy van SA Bpk 1973 (1) SA 769 (A) ..... 40.8*(b)*
Betta Eiendomme (Pty) Ltd v Ekple-Epoh 2000 (4) SA 468 (W) ..... 32.4*(a), 33.11(c), 55.3(b), 55.6(a), 55.6(b)(ii), 56C.3(b)*(ii)
Beukes v Krugersdorp Transitional Local Council and Another 1996 (3) SA 467 (W) ..... 7.2*(c), 7.2(c)*(iii)
Beyers v Director of Public Prosecutions, Western Cape, and Others 2003 (1) SACR 164 (C) ..... 51.5*(h), 52.4(c)*(i)
Beyers v Elf Regters van die Grondwetlike Hof 2002 (6) SA 630 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1001 (CC) ..... 4.2*(b), 5.3(e)*(i)
Bezuidenhout v Bezuidenhout 2003 (6) SA 691 (C) ..... 31.4*(e)*(v)
Bhe and Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha, and Others (Commission for Gender Equality as Amicus Curiae); Shibi v Sithole and Others; South African Human Rights Commission and Another v President of The Republic of South Africa and Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ..... 5.3*(a)(ii), 5.3(d), 9.2(b)(ii)(bb), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.3, 9.4(d)(iii), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 13.1, 13.2(a), 24C.3(c)(ii), 26.3, 26.5(b)(ii), 26.6(a), 31.4(e)(ix), 32.3(c), 34.1(a), 34.7(a), 34.8(c)(i), 34.8(c)(ii), 34.8(e)(ii), 35.1(b), 35.1(d)(i), 35.5(g)(i), 35.5(g)(ii), 35.5(g)(iv), 35.5(g)(vi), 35.5(g)(viii), 35.5(g)(ix), 35.5(h)(i), 36.3(c), 36.4(a), 36.4(d)(ii), 36.5(a)(ii), 36.5(c), 37.4, 47.1, 48.4, 48.5, 57.3(b), 57.4(c)(ii)(cc), 58.1(b), 58.1(c), 58.5(a), 58.6, 64.4(b)*(i) Bhe and Others v The Magistrate, Khayelitsha and Others (unreported, CPD Case No 9489/02, 25 September 2003) 41.6
Bhika v Minister of Justice 1965 (4) SA 399 (W) ..... 38.3*(a)*(iv)
Binga v Administrator-General, South West Africa and Others 1984 (3) SA 949 (SWA) ..... 30.1*(b)(i) Binga v Cabinet for South West Africa and Others 1988 (3) SA 155 (A) ..... 12.3(d)*(iii)
Biowatch Trust v Registrar Genetic Resources & Others 2009 (6) SA 232 (CC) , 2009 (10) BCLR 1014 (CC), [2009] ZACC 14 ..... 50.4*(h)(ii)(hh)*
Blaauwberg Meat Wholesalers CC v Anglo Dutch Meats (Exports) Ltd 2004 (3) SA 160 (SCA) ..... 31.4*(e)*(x)
Bleazard v Argus Printing and Publishing Co Ltd (1983) 4 ILJ 60 (IC) 53.5
Bloem and Another v State President 1986 (4) SA 1064 (O) ..... 2.2(i)(v), 17.7*(a)*
Blore v Standard General Insurance Co Ltd 1972 (2) SA 89 (O) ..... 40.5*(b)*(ii)
Bock and Others v Duburoro Investments (Pty) Ltd 2004 (2) SA 242 (SCA) ..... 59.4*(a)(i) Boesak v Chairman, Legal Aid Board 2003 (2) SACR 181 (T) ..... 51.5(g)*
Boesak v Minister of Home Affairs 1987 (3) SA 665 (C) ..... 41.1*(a)*

Bogoshi v National Media Ltd and Others 1996 (3) SA 78 (W) ..... 42.9*(a), 42.9(b)*
Bolofo and Others v Director of Public Prosecutions 1997 (8) BCLR 1135 (Lesotho CA) ..... 51.4*(d)*
Boltman v Kotze Community Trust (Unreported Land Claims Court Case No LCC 5/99, 11 August 1999) ..... 48.8*(c)*(ii)
Bongopi v Chairman, Ciskei Council of State and Others 1993 (3) SA 494 (CkA) ..... 32.1*(a)* Bongopi v Chairman of The Council of State, Ciskei and Others 1992 (3) SA 250 (CkGD) ..... 32.1*(a)*
Bongoza v Minister of Correctional Services 2002 (6) SA 330 (TkH) ..... 31.4*(e)(ii), 31.4(e)(iv), 59.4(c)(v), 59.4(c)*(vi)
Bookworks (Pty) Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1999 (4) SA 799 (W) ..... 31.4*(e)(x), 59.4(a)*(viii)
Booysen and Others v Minister of Home Affairs and Another 2001 (4) SA 485 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 645 (CC) ..... 4.3*(c)(i), 5.3(c), 9.4(e)(i)(cc), 31.3, 31.3(a)(i), 31.3(b), 36.3(a), 36.4(b), 36.5(b), 44.3(c)(ii), 47.3(b), 66.1(d)*(i)
Borgin v de Villiers 1980 (3) SA 556 (A) ..... 38.2*(c)(i) Boswell v Minister of Police 1978 (3) SA 268 (E) ..... 40.8(b)*
Botha and Another v Mthiyane and Another 2002 (1) SA 289 (W), 2002 (4) BCLR 389 (W) ..... 42.9*(a)*
Botha (now Griessel) v Finanscredit (Pty) Ltd 1989 (3) SA 773 (A) ..... 31.4*(c)*(ii)
Botha v Botha 1972 (2) SA 559 (N) 52.9
Botha v Minister van Veiligheid en Sekuriteit 2003 (6) SA 568 (T) ..... 40.5*(b)(i) Botha v Minister van Wet and Orde 1990 (3) SA 937 (W) ..... 59.4(b)(v), 42.9(c)*
Botha v Morobane (unreported, LCC Case No 35R/04, 30 April 2004) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Botswana Railways' Organisation v Setsogo (1995) BLR 758 ..... 64.4*(c)*
BP Southern Africa (Pty) Ltd v MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment and Land Affairs 2004 (5) SA 124 (W) ..... 31.4*(b)(iii), 31.4(b)(v), 31.4(e)(iii), 50.3(b)(i), 50.3(b)(i)(aa), 50.3(b)(i)(dd), 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(w), 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(y)(1), 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(z), 50.3(b)(ii)(bb), 50.4(e), 50.4(g)*
Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) ..... 4.3*(c)(i), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 32.3(b), 32.4(c), 32.5(b), 32.5(c), 34.8(c)(v), 35.1(b), 35.1(d), 35.2, 35.4, 35.5(b), 35.5(e), 35.5(f), 35.5(g)(ii), 35.5(g)(iii), 35.5(h)*(i), 37.4
Brisley v Drotsky 2002 (4) SA 1 (SCA), 2002 (12) BCLR 1229 (SCA) ..... 4.3*(d)(i)(aa), 13.3, 31.4(c)(ii), 33.11(c), 36.4(f), 55.6(a), 56C.3(b)*(ii)
Broude v McIntosh 1998 (3) SA 60 (SCA) ..... 40.11*(b)*
Bruce and Another v Fleecytex Johannesburg CC and Others 1998 (2) SA 1143 (CC), 1998 (4) BCLR 415 (CC) ..... 3.4*(d), 4.3(b), 5.3(d), 32.5(b), 59.4(a)*(iv)
Brummer v Gorfil Brothers Investments (Pty) Ltd 1999 (3) SA 389 (SCA) 31.4*(c)*(ii)
Brummer v Gorfil Brothers Investments (Pty) Ltd and Others 2000 (2) SA 837 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 465 (CC) ..... 5.3*(e)(i), 6.2(c), 31.8(a)*

Buffalo City Municipality v Gauss and Another 2005 (4) SA 498 (SCA), 2006 (11) BCLR 1314 (SCA) ..... 63.5*(e)*
Bullock NO v Provincial Government, North West Province 2004 (5) SA 262 SCA ..... 63.3*(b), 63.3(c), 63.5(d)*
Burchell v Johncom Media Investments Ltd (unreported, (EC) Case No 1092/2004 ..... 42.9*(a)* Bushbuck Ridge Border Committee v Government of the Northern Province 1999 (2) BCLR 193 (T) ..... 14.3*(c)(i), 17.8(a)*
Bushula and Others v Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape Provincial Government 2000 (2) SA 849 (E), 2000 (7) BCLR 728 (E) ..... 56D.4*(a)* Business South Africa v Congress of South African Trade Unions and Another (1997) 18 ILJ 474 (LAC) 53.6
Buthelezi v Labour for Africa (1991) 12 ILJ 588 (IC) ..... 53.2*(b)*, 53.5
Buthelezi v Poorter 1974 (4) SA 831 (W) ..... 38.2*(c)(i) Buthelezi v SABC 1997 (12) BCLR 1733 (D), [1998] 1 All SA 147 (D) ..... 38.2(c)(i), 38.3(a)(i), 42.9(a)* Buthulezi v Poorter and Others 1975 (4) SA 608 (W) ..... 38.2*(b)(i) Bux v Officer Commanding, Pietermaritzburg Prison, and Others 1994 (4) SA 562 (N), 1994 (4) BCLR 10 (N) ..... 51.3(g)*

C

C & Others v Department of Health and Social Development, Gauteng & Others [2012] ZACC 1 ..... 56D.5*(c)*(iv)
CCII Systems (Pty) Ltd v Fakie NNO and Others 2003 (2) SA 325 (T) ..... 24A.4*(b)(ii), 24B.3(b)*
CC Maynard et alii v the Field Cornet of Pretoria (1894) 1 SAR 214 ..... 32.5*(c)*
CDA Boerdery (Edms) Bpk and n' ander v Nelson Mandela Metropolitaanse Munisipaliteit en Andere [2006] 4 All SA 56 (SE) ..... 22.5*(c)*
CDA Boerdery (Edms) Bpk and Others v The Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality and Others 2007 (4) SA 276 (SCA) ..... 22.1*(a), 22.1(f), 22.3(b)(vi), 22.5(d), 22.5(e)*
Cabinet for the Territory of South West Africa v Chikane and Another 1989 (1) SA 349 (A) ..... 31.3*(a)(i), 32.1(a), 41.1(a), 66.1(a)*(iii)
Cabinet of the Transitional Government for the Territory of South West Africa v Eins 1988 (3) SA 369 (A) ..... 7.2*(b), 7.3(b), 7.5, 32.1(a)*
Campus Law Clinic, University of KZN Durban v Standard Bank of SA Ltd and Another 2006 (6) SA 103 (CC), 2006 (6) BCLR 669 (CC) 34.6
Cape Explosives Works Ltd v South African Oil and Fat Industries Ltd 1921 CPD 244 ..... 4.3*(h)(ii)(bb)*
Cape Killarney Property Investments v Mahamba and Others 2000 (2) SA 67 (C) ..... 32.4*(a), 33.11(c), 55.6(b)*(ii)
Cape Metropolitan Council v Metro Inspection Services (Western Cape) CC and Others 2001 (3) SA 1013 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1026 (SCA) .. 18.3*(f)(i), 25.2(c)(iii), 31.4(f), 62.7, 63.3(b)*
Cape Metropolitan Council v Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development and Others 1999 (11) BCLR 1229 (T) ..... 14.3*(b)(i), 14.3(c)(i), 14.3(c)*(ii)
Cape Town Municipality v Abdulla 1976 (2) SA 370 (C) ..... 26.6*(d)*(iii)
Cape Town Municipality v Butters 1996 (1) SA 473 (C) ..... 40.5*(b)*(ii)
Capital Motors CC v Shell SA Marketing (Pty) Ltd Unreported decision (T), Case No. 3016/05 (18 March 2005) ..... 50.4*(b)*
Carephone (Pty) Ltd v Marcus NO and Others 1999 (3) SA 304 (LAC), 1998 (10) BCLR 1326 (LAC) ..... 23A.4, 31.4*(f), 59.4(c)(ii), 63.6(a), 63.6(b)*

Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2003 (2) SA 656 (C), 2002 (10) BCLR 1100 (C) ..... 9.5*(a)(i), 31.4(e)(ii), 36.4(c)*(i), 40.5

Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security and Another (Centre for Applied Legal Studies Intervening) 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2002 (1) SACR 79 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC) ..... 1.3, 3.3*(e), 4.2(a), 4.3(c)(ii), 4.3(d)(i), 4.3(d)(I)(aa), 4.3(h)(i)(aa), 9.2(f)(ii), 9.5(a)(i), 11.2(a), 11.2(b)(i), 11.2(b)(iii), 11.4(c), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa), 13.3, 23B.3(c)(iii), 24D.5(e), 25.9(e), 31 Appendix(3)(a), 31 Appendix(3)(b), 31.2(a)(ii), 31.2(d)(vi), 31.4(b)(iii), 31.4(c)(ii), 31.4(e)(ii), 31.4(e)(iv), 31.4(e)(v), 31.4(e)(viii), 31.6(a), 32.1(c), 32.4(c), 32.5(b), 34.7(c)(i), 35.5(g)(ii), 36.3(d), 36.4(c)(i), 38.3(b)(i), 38.3(b)(v), 39.6, 40.5, 40.5(b)*(i), 49.1

Carr v Jockey Club of South Africa 1976 (2) SA 717 (W) ..... 44.1*(c)*(vi)

Cary v Cary 1999 (3) SA 615 (C), 1999 (8) BCLR 877 (C) ..... 35.3*(c)*

Case and Another v Minister of Safety and Security and Others; Curtis v Minister of Safety and Security 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 587 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC) ..... 9.4*(c), 9.4(d)(i), 10.4, 31 Appendix (3)(a), 34.1(b), 34.2(c), 34.7(c)(ii), 34.8(c)(i), 34(c)(iii), 36.4(e), 36.4(h)(i), 38.1, 38.2(c)(i), 38.3, 38.3(a)(i), 38.5(a), 39.5(b), 42.4, 42.5(a), 42.5(c), 42.7(b), 42.9(e), 43.3(a)(i), 44.1(b)*(i)

Cash Paymaster Services (Pty) Ltd v Eastern Cape Province and Others 1999 (1) SA 324 (CkH), [1997] 4 All SA 363 (CkH) ..... 18.3*(f)(i), 25.1, 25.3(a), 25.3(d), 25.5(b), 25.9(b)*

Castell v De Greeff 1994 (4) SA 408 (C) ..... 37.6, 39.4, 40.11*(b)*

Catholic Commission for Justice and Peace in Zimbabwe v Attorney-General, Zimbabwe and Others 1993 (4) SA 239 (ZS), 1993 (2) SACR 432 (ZS) 49.3

Cekeshe v Premier, Eastern Cape 1998 (4) SA 935 (Tk) ..... 31.4*(f)*

Cele v South African Social Security Agency 2009 (5) SA 105 (D) ..... 56D.1, 56D.4*(b)*

Centre for Child Law and Others v MEC for Education, Gauteng, and Others 2008 (1) SA 223 (T) ..... 47.1, 47.4*(e), 56D.5(c)(iii)(aa)*

Centre for Child Law v MEC for Education, unreported (TPD), Case No 19559/06 (30 June 2006) ..... 9.6*(c)(i), 9.6(c)*(v)

Centre for Child Law v Minister of Home Affairs 2005 (6) SA 50 (T) ('Lindela') ..... 47.4*(e), 47.8, 56D.4(d), 56D.5(c)(iii)(aa)*

Centre for Child Law v Minister of Justice and Other 98/08 [2009] ZACC 18 ..... 47.7*(a)*

Cerebos Food Corporation Ltd v Diverse Foods SA (Pty) Ltd 1984 (4) SA 149 (T) ..... 59.4*(b)*(v)
Chairman: Board on Tariff and Trade and Others v Brenco Inc and Others 2001 (4) SA 511 (SCA) ..... 63.5*(e)*
Chairman of the Public Service Commission v Zimbabwe Teachers Association 1997 (1) SA 209 (ZS), 1996 (9) BCLR 1189 (ZS) ..... 46.3*(c)*
Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly, Ex Parte: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [1996] ZACC 26 ..... 15.3*(a)(i), 15.3(b), 16.4(a)(iii), 16.4(b)(ii), 17.2(b)(ii), 17.3(a), 20.4(b)(ii), 23A.6, 23B.2, 24A.3(a), 24B.2, 26.4, 26.5(c), 42.9(g), 45.2(b), 54.2, 58.2(b), 58.4(a)(vii), 61.3(a)*
Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly, Ex Parte: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC), [1996] ZACC 26 ..... 10.3*(b), 13.1, 14.3(a), 14.3(c)(i), 14.5(d)(ii)(aa), 15.2(b), 15.2(c), 15.2(d), 15.3(a)(i), 15.3(b), 15.3(c)(vi), 16.4(a)(iii), 16.4(b)(ii), 16.5, 16.7, 17.2(b), 17.2(b)(i) & (ii), 17.2(c), 17.7(b)(i), 19.3(a)(i), 20.3(g), 20.4(a)(ii), 20.4(a)(iv), 20.4(b), 20.4(b)(ii), 21.2(a), 21.2(b), 21.4(a), 21.5, 23A.8, 23B.2, 23B.6(b)(ii) & (iii),24A.1, 24A.3(a), 24B.1, 24B.2, 24C.4(b), 24C.4(f), 24E.2(b), 26.4, 26.5(d), 26.6(c)(i), 27.3(f), 27.6(a), 29.3(f), 31 Appendix (4)(c), 31.3, 31.3(d), 31.5, 33.2(b), 33.4(a), 34.8(e)(i), 41.1(b), 45.2(b), 46.3(b), 46.3(c), 47.3(b), 50.3(a), 51.1(a)(ii), 51.1(b)(i), 51.1(b)(iv), 51.4(d), 53.5, 53.6, 53.6(a), 55.3(b), 56A.4(f)(ii), 56D.3(a), 58.8(b)(iii), 62.1, 62.2(a), 65.2(a), 65.3(b)*
Chawanda v Zimnat Insurance Co Ltd 1990 (1) SA 1019 (ZHC) 41.6
Chetty v Naidoo 1974 (3) SA 13 (A) ..... 55.6*(a)* Chevron Engineering (Pty) Ltd v Nkombule and Others 2004 (3) SA 495 (SCA) ..... 31.4*(f)*
Chief Family Advocate and Another v G 2003 (2) SA 599 (W) ..... 34.7*(a)* Chief Lesapo v North West Agricultural Bank and Another 2000 (1) SA 409 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1420 (CC) ..... 3.3*(b), 3.7(b)(ii), 9.4(d)*(i),

17.5*(b), 40.1(b)(i), 59.3(a)(v), 59.4(a)*(i), 59.5

Chirwa v Transnet Limited and Others 2008 (4) SA 367 (CC), 2008 (3) BCLR 251 (CC) ..... 4.2*(b), 9.7, 18.3(f)(i), 63.3(a), 63.3(c)*

Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 1999 (2) SA 83 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1449 (CC) ..... 3.4*(e), 4.3(b), 32.5(b)*

Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC) ..... 31 Appendix (3)(b), 31.3*(c), 34.1(b), 34.3(b), 34.8(c)(i), 34.8(e)(ii), 36.4(c)(iii), 36.4(d)(i), 36.5(c), 40.5(b)(i), 40.7(a)(ii), 41.1(c)(iii), 41.2(a), 41.2(c), 41.3(a), 41.3(b), 41.4, 41.4(b), 41.4(c), 43.3(a), 44.2(d), 44.3(a)(i), 44.3(c)(ii), 44.3(c)(viii), 47.5(b), 52.11, 57.2(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(ccc), 58.1(b), 58.4(a)(i), 58.4(a)(v), 58.4(a)(vii), 58.5(a), 58.6, 58.7(a), 59.3(a)(v), 64.6(b)*

Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC) ..... 32.4*(c), 36.3(d)*

Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education of the Government of the Republic of South Africa 1999 (4) SA 1092 (SE), 1999 (9) BCLR 951 (SE) ..... 5.3*(d), 35.5(g)(viii), 41.3(a), 41.3(b), 47.5(b), 49.2(d)(ii), 58.1(a), 59.4(b)*(i)

Christian Lawyers Association of SA and Others v Minister of Health and Others 1998 (4) SA 1113 (T), 1998 (11) BCLR 1434 (T) ..... 24D.5*(e), 31.3(a)(iii), 36.4(c)(ii) 37.2, 39.3, 40.9(a), 47.1, 47.11(a)*

Christian Lawyers Association v Minister of Health and Others (Reproductive Health Alliance as Amicus Curiae) 2005 (1) SA 509 (T), 2004 (10) BCLR 1086 (T) ..... 31.3*(a)(iii), 35.5(g)(vi), 36.4(c)(ii), 37.5, 37.6, 39.3, 40.9(a), 40.11(b)*, 47.1

Christian League of Southern Africa v Rall 1981 (2) SA 821 (O) ..... 37.2, 7.2*(b)*, 39.3

Church of Scientology in SA Incorporated Association Not for Gain v Readers' Digest Association SA (Pty) Limited 1980 (4) SA 313 (C) ..... 41.3*(a)*

Church of the Province of Southern Africa, Diocese of Cape Town v Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration 2002 (3) SA 385 (LC), [2001] 11 BLLR 1213 (LC) ..... 41.4*(c)*

Ciki v Commissioner of Correctional Services and Another; Jansen v Commissioner of Correctional Services and Another 1992 (2) SA 269 (E) ..... 63.5*(g)*

City Council of Pretoria v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) ..... 6.2*(a), 22.1(a), 27.2(d), 35.1(b), 35.1(d)(i), 35.1(d)(ii), 35.2, 35.3(a)(ii), 35.4(a), 35.4(e), 35.5(b), 35.5(c), 35.5(g)(i), 35.5(h), 35.5(h)*(i),

35.5*(h)(ii), 35.5(j), 45.10(b)(i), 50.3(b)(ii)(aa)(u), 56B.4(g)*
City Deep Ltd v Silicosis Board 1950 (1) SA 696 (A) ..... 32.3*(a), 32.5(c)*
City of Cape Town v Premier, Western Cape and Others 2008 (6) SA 345 (C) ..... 14.5*(c)(iii), 56B.4(a)*
City of Cape Town and Another v Robertson and Another 2005 (2) SA 323 (CC), 2005 (3) BCLR 199 (CC) ..... 4.3*(d)(ii), 5.3(c), 11.1(b), 22.3(b)(ii), 22.5(c), 22.5(d)* 22.3*(b)*(ii)
City of Cape Town v AD Outpost (Pty) Ltd and Others 2000 (2) SA 733 (C), 2000 (2) BCLR 130 (C) ..... 42.4, 42.9*(f), 54.2(a)*
City of Cape Town v Rudolph and Others 2004 (5) SA 39 (C), 2003 (11) BCLR 1236 (C) ..... 9.6*(c)(ii)(bb), 33.12, 55.4(b)(iv), 56C.3(b)(i), 56C.3(b)(ii), 55.4(b)*(iv)
City of Cape Town v Unlawful Occupiers, Erf 1800, Capricorn (Vrygrond Development) and Others 2003 (6) SA 140 (C), 2003 (8) BCLR 878 (C) ..... 7.2*(c)*(iii)
City of Johannesburg & Others v Mazibuko & Others 2009 (3) SA 592 (SCA), 2009 (8) BCLR 791 (SCA) ..... 56B.3*(b)(iii)(aa), 56B.4(f)*(ii)
City of Johannesburg Metropolitan Municipality v Blue Moonlight Properties 39 (Pty) Ltd and Another [2011] ZACC 33 ..... 56D.5*(c)*(i)
City of Johannesburg Metropolitan Municipality v Gauteng Development Tribunal and Others 2010 (6) SA 182 (CC) , 2010 (9) BCLR 859 (CC), [2010] ZACC 11 ..... 50.3*(b)*(iii)
City of Johannesburg v Rand Properties (Pty) Ltd and Others 2007 (6) BCLR 643 (SCA) ..... 9.6*(c)(ii)(bb)*
City of Pretoria v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) ..... 22.4*(e)*(iv)
Claase v Transnet 1999 (3) SA 1012 (T) ..... 31.4*(f)*
Clarke v Hurst NO and Others 1992 (4) SA 630 (D) ..... 39.2, 39.4, 40.10*(b)*
Claude Neon Limited v Germiston City Council and Another 1995 (3) SA 710 (W), 1995 (5) BCLR 554 (W) ..... 25.8, 38.3*(b)*(v)
Clinton-Parker v Administrator, Transvaal; Dawkins v Administrator, Transvaal 1996 (2) SA 37 (W) ..... 40.8*(b)*
Coetzee and Others v Attorney-General, KwaZulu-Natal, and Others 1997 (1) SACR 546 (D), 1997 (8) BCLR 989 (D) ..... 51.1*(b)(ii), 51.5(b), 51.5(f)*
Coetzee v Comitis and Others 2001 (1) SA 1254 (C), 2001 (4) BCLR 323 (C) ..... 7.2*(c), 34.8(c)(iii), 36.3(d), 36.4(f), 36.5(b), 44.3(c)(iv), 54.4, 63.3(b), 66.1(c)*
Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others 1997 (3) SA 527 (CC), 1997 (4) BCLR 437 (CC) ..... 9.4*(e)(i)(bb)*
Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa; Matiso and Others v Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison, and Others 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC) ..... 1.3, 3.3*(c), 4.3(c)(ii), 9.4(c), 9.4(d)(i), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 10.3(c), 30.3, 32.3(b), 32.3(c), 34.3(b), 34.8(c)(iii), 36.4(c)(iii), 40.1(b)(i), 40.3(c)(ii), 40.3(d), 43.3(a)(i), 52.2(b), 52.4(a)(ii), 64.4(b)*

Coetzee v National Commissioner of Police & Minister of Safety and Security 2011 (2) SA 227 (GNP) ..... 23B.3*(c)(iii)(cc)*
Coetzee v Nel 1972 (1) SA 353 (A) ..... 38.2*(c)(i) Coin Security Group (Pty) Ltd v SA National Union for Security Officers and Other Workers and Others 1998 (1) SA 685 (C) ..... 9.7, 32.3(a)*
Collet v Priest 1931 AD 290 ..... 32.5*(b)*
Collins v Minister of Interior 1957 (1) SA 552 (A) ..... 2.2*(b), 2.3(g), 32.1(a)*
Colonial Development (Pty) Limited v Outer West Local Council 2002 (2) SA 262 (N) ..... 63.3*(b)*
Combrink and Another v Minister of Correctional Services and Another 2001 (3) SA 338 (D) ..... 49.3*(b)*(ii)
Commercial Farmers Union v Minister of Lands, Agriculture and Resettlement, Zimbabwe and Others 2001 (2) SA 925 (ZS), 2001 (3) BCLR 197 (ZS) ..... 44.1*(d)*
Commissioner, Competition Commission v General Council of the Bar of South Africa and Others 2002 (6) SA 606 (SCA) 63.9
Commissioner for Customs and Excise v Container Logistics (Pty) Ltd; Commissioner for Customs and Excise v Rennies Group Ltd t/a Renfreight 1999 (3) SA 771 (SCA), 1999 (8) BCLR 833 (SCA) ..... 4.3*(d)(ii), 11.3(b), 32.3(c), 32.5(b), 63.2(c)*
Commissioner, South African Police Service and Others v Maimela and Another 2003 (5) SA 480 (T) ..... 63.7*(d)*
Commissioner, South African Revenue Service v Executor, Frith's Estate 2001 (2) SA 261 (SCA) ..... 32.3*(a)*
Commissioner, South African Revenue Service v Hawker Air Services (Pty) Ltd; Commissioner, South African Revenue Service v Hawker Aviation Partnership and Others 2006 (4) SA 292 (SCA) 23A.4
Compass Motors Industries (Pty) Ltd v Callguard (Pty) Ltd 1990 (2) SA 520 (W) ..... 40.5*(b)*(ii)
Compass Waste Services (Pty) Ltd v The Head of Department, Department Agriculture and Environmental Affairs of the Province Kwa-Zulu Natal & Others unreported case (N) Case No: 2280/2003 ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(bb)(y), 50.4(h)(ii)(aa)*
Concerned Land Claimants Organisation of PE v PE Land and Community Restoration Association and Others 2007 (2) SA 531 (CC), 2007 (2) BCLR 111 (CC) ..... 4.2*(b)*
Congress of Traditional Leaders of South Africa v Minister for Local Government, Eastern Cape, and Others 1996 (2) SA 898 (Tk) ..... 7.2*(d)*
Conjwayo v Minister of Justice, Legal and Parliamentary Affairs and Others 1992 (2) SA 56 (ZS) ..... 49.3*(a)*
Connock's (SA) Motor Co Ltd v Pretorius 1939 TPD ..... 8.1*(b)*
Conradie v Hanekom and Another 1999 (4) SA 491 (LCC), [1999] 2 All SA 525 (LCC) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Contract Forwarding (Pty) Ltd v Chesterfin (Pty) Ltd 2003 (2) SA 253 (SCA) ..... 31.4*(e)*(x)
Corium (Pty) Ltd v Myburgh Park Langebaan (Pty) Ltd 1995 (3) SA 51 (C) ..... 50.3*(c)*(ii)
Crawford v Albu 1917 AD 102 ..... 38.2*(c)(i) Cronje v United Cricket Board of South Africa 2001 (4) SA 1361 (T) ..... 44.1(c)(iii), 44.1(c)(vi), 44.3(c)(ix), 57.4(c)(ii)(cc)(i)(bb), 58.5(a), 58.7(a), 63.3(b)*
Crooks and Company v Agricultural Co-operative Union Ltd 1922 AD 423 ..... 30.2*(a)*
C v Minister of Correctional Services 1996 (4) SA 292 (T) ..... 38.2*(a)(ii), 38.2(a)(iii), 38.3(a)(i), 40.11(b), 49.3(a)*

D

D v K 1997 (2) BCLR 209 (N) ..... 38.2*(a)*(iii)
DVB Behuising (Pty) Ltd v North West Provincial Government and Another, Bophuthatswana High Court, Case No 308/99 (27 May 1999) ..... 15.3*(a)(i), 15.3(a)*(iii)
Dabalorivhuwa Patriotic Front and Another v Government Employees Pension Fund and Another (unreported, SCA Case No 553/04, 30 November 2005) ..... 24A.4*(a)*(iii)
Dabalorivhuwa Patriotic Front and Another v Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others (Unreported, Transvaal High Court Case Number 25439 / 02, 10 August 2004) ..... 24A.4*(a)*(iii), 24A.6
Dabelstein and Others v Hildebrandt and Others 1996 (3) SA 42 (C) ..... 51.4*(b)(i), 51.4(b)*(iii)
Dadoo Ltd and Others v Krugersdorp Municipal Council 1920 AD 530 .... 32.3*(a)*
Dalrymple and Others v Colonial Treasurer 1910 TS 372 ..... 7.2*(b)*
Daniels v Campbell NO and Others 2003 (9) BCLR 969 (C), [2003] 3 All SA 139 (C) ..... 4.3*(c)(i), 4.2(b), 4.3(d)(i)(bb), 11.2(b)(i), 32.3(c)*, 41.6
Daniels v Campbell NO and Others 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC) ..... 4.3*(h)(ii)(aa), 9.4(b)(ii), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 11.2(b)(i), 13.2(a), 31.4(a)(v), 32.5(b), 34.8(e)(ii), 35.5(g)(iii), 35.5(g)(viii), 36.1(c), 36.3(a), 63.2(a)*
Davis v Additional Magistrate, Johhanesburg 1989 (4) SA 299 (W) 52.9
Davis v Tip NO and Others 1996 (1) SA 1152 (W), 1996 (6) BCLR 807 (W) ..... 51.1*(b)(iii), 51.4(b)*(iii)
Dawnlaan Beleggings (Edms) Bpk v Johannesburg Stock Exchange and Others 1983 (3) SA 344 (W) ..... 12.3*(d)(iii), 63.3(b)*
Dawood and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Others; Shalabi and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Others; Thomas and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC), [2000] ZACC 8 ..... 3.3*(d), 4.3(c)(i), 7.2(c), 9.2(c)(iii)(cc), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 9.4(d)(ii), 9.4(d)(iii), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(i)(cc), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 12.3(d)(iii), 13.2(a), 17.5(b), 17.5(e)(i), 32.4(c), 47.3(b), 50.3(b)(ii)(aa)(w), 56B.4(c)(i), 63.4, 66.1(d)(i) Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (1) SA 997 (C), 2000 (3) BCLR 331 (C) ..... 7.2(c), 13.2(a), 36.4(b), 60.5(a)*
De Beer NO v North Central Local Council and South Central Local Council and Others (Umhlatuzana Civic Association Intervening) 2002 (1) SA 429 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1109 (CC) ..... 8.2, 59.4*(b)*(iv)
De Beer v Die Raad vir Gesondheidsberoepe van Suid-Afrika 2004 (3) BCLR 284 (T) ..... 3.3*(b), 31.4(b)*(iii)
De Beer v Keyser 2002 (1) SA 827 (SCA) ..... 31.4*(c)*(ii)
De Beer v Sergeant 1976 (1) SA 246 (T) ..... 40.5*(b)*(ii)
De Fourd v Council of Cape Town (1898) 15 SC 399 ..... 38.2*(a)(iii), 38.3(a)*(i)

De Freitas and Another v Society of Advocates of Natal 2001 (3) SA 750 (SCA), 2001 (6) BCLR 531 (SCA) ..... 11.2*(a), 44.1(d), 44.3(c)*(iv)
De Freitas and Another v Society of Advocates of Natal (Natal Law Society Intervening) 1998 (11) BCLR 1345 (CC) ..... 31.4*(e)(ii), 44.1(d), 44.3(c)*(iv)
De Gree and Another v Webb and Others (Centre for Child Law as Amicus Curiae) 2007 (5) SA 184 (SCA) ..... 47.10*(b)*
De Gree and Another v Webb and Others (Centre for Child Law, University of Pretoria, Amicus Curiae) (2006) (6) SA 51 (W) ..... 47.10*(b)*
De Klerk and Another v Du Plessis and Others 1995 (2) SA 40 (T), 1994 (6) BCLR 124 (T) ..... 31.2*(a)(i), 31.2(c), 32.3(b), 32.4(a)*, 42.2
De Kock and Others v Van Rooyen 2005 (1) SA 1 (SCA) ..... 31.4*(f)*
De Kock en 'n Ander v Prokureur-Generaal van Transvaal 1994 (2) SACR 113 (T) ..... 51.3*(g)*
De Kock v Minister of Water Affairs and Forestry 2005 (12) BCLR 1183 (CC) ..... 5.2, 9.2*(b)*(iv)
De Kock v Struik Publishing (Pty) Ltd (unreported, (TPD) Case No 54066 /2007, 9 January 2008) ..... 42.9*(b)*
De Lange v Commissioner of Correctional Services, Eastern Cape 2002 (3) SA 683 (SE), 2002 (2) SACR 185 (SE) ..... 49.3*(b)*(ii)
De Lange v Costa 1989 (2) SA 857 (A) ..... 38.2*(a)*(i)
De Lange v Smuts NO and Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) ..... 9.4*(d)(ii), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 12.2(b), 12.3(b)(ii), 12.3(c)(I), 12.3(c)(ii), 12.3(d)(i)(aa), 12.3(d)(iv), 24B.2, 26.6(c)(i), 32.3(a), 32.4(c), 32.5(b), 34.2(c), 34.8(c)(v), 40.2(a), 40.2(b), 40.3(c)(i), 40.3(c)(ii), 40.4, 40.4(a), 40.11(b), 42.7(d), 51.1(a)(ii), 51.1(a)(iii), 51.1(a)(iv), 51.2, 51.4(c), 51.5(e)(i), 52.2(b), 59.3(b), 59.4(b)(iii), 63.3(b), 63.5(b)*
De Lille and Another v Speaker of the National Assembly 1998 (3) SA 430 (C), 1998 (7) BCLR 916 (C) ..... 4.3*(c)(i), 4.3(c)(ii), 10.3(d)(i), 17.7(a), 17.7(c), 18.3(j), 19.7(c), 24C.4(f), 31.4(b)(iii), 31.4(b)(iv), 31.5, 34.7(c)(i), 34.7(c)(ii), 34.9 42.10, 44.3(c)(i), 51.1(a)(iv), 59.4(c)(iii), 63.3(b), 63.5(g)*
Democractic Alliance v Masondo 2003 (2) SA 413 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 128 (CC), [2002] ZACC 28 ..... 10.3*(a), 10.3(d)(ii), 10.5(c), 17.2(a), 17.2(b)(ii), 17.7(b)(i), 22.2(c)(ii), 22.2(c)(iii), 34.8(e)(ii), 22.2(c)(ii), 22.2(c)*(iii)
Democratic Alliance v ANC and Others 2003 (1) BCLR 25 (C) ..... 10.3*(b), 10.3(d)(ii), 10.5(c), 22.2(c)*(i)
Democratic Alliance Western Cape v Western Cape Minister of Local Government and Another [2006] 1 All SA 384 (C) 23A.3

Democratic Party and Others v Brakpan Transitional Local Council and Others 1999 (4) SA 339 (W), (1999) (6) BCLR 657 (W) ..... 10.3*(d)*(ii)
Democratic Party v Government of RSA and Others 1999 (3) SA 254 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 607 (CC) 2.1
Democratic Party v Minister of Home Affairs 1999 (3) SA 254 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 607 (CC) ..... 29.2*(a)* Dendy v University of the Witwatersrand 2005 (5) SA 357 (W) ..... 36.3, 42.9*(a)*
Denleigh Farms and Another v Mhlanzi and Others 2000 (1) SA 225 (LCC) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Deo Volente Rusoord BK v Shongwe and Others 2006 (2) SA 5 (LCC) ..... 48.6*(b)*(i)
Department of Land Affairs and Others v Goedgelegen Tropical Fruit (Pty) Ltd 2007 (6) SA 199 (CC), 2007 (10) BCLR 1027 (CC) ..... 4.3*(d)*(iii)
Department of Land Affairs v Witz: In re Various Portions of Grassy Park 2006 (1) SA 86 (LCC) ..... 48.8*(b)(ii), 48.8(c)*(ii)
De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division and Others 2002 (6) SA 370 (W) ..... 7.2*(c)*(i), 34.6
De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division and Others 2003 (3) SA 389 (W), 2002 (12) BCLR 1285 (W), [2003] 1 All SA 449 (W) ..... 43.3*(a)(iii), 47.10(b), 47.10(c)*
De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division, and Others 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 445 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC) ..... 3.7*(b)(i), 4.4, 5.3(e)(i), 9.4(d), 10.4(a), 13.1, 31.1(c), 31.4(a)(v), 34.1(a), 34.7(a), 34.8(c)(ii), 34.8(c)(iii), 34.8(e)(ii), 35.3(a)(ii), 36.2(d), 36.3(d), 36.4(e), 36.4(h)(i), 40.7(c)(ii), 42.3, 42.4, 42.5, 42.7(a), 42.7(b), 42.7(c), 42.7(e), 42.9(e), 42.9(h), 44.2(b), 47.10(b), 47.5(d)*
Deutschmann NO and Others v Commissioner for the South African Revenue Service; Shelton v Commissioner for the South African Revenue Service 2000 (2) SA 106 (E) ..... 34.7*(a)*
De Waal v Ziervogel 1938 AD 112 ..... 38.2*(c)*(i)
De Wit v May (unreported Land Claims Court No LCC 45R / 03, 12 June 2003) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Dews and Another v Simon's Town Municipality 1991 (4) SA 479 (C) ..... 50.4*(h)(ii)(ff)*
Dhladhla and Others v Erasmus 1999 (1) SA 1065 (LCC) ..... 56B.4*(a)*(iv)
Die Minister van Justisie, Ex Parte, In re S v Van Wyk 1967 (1) SA 488 (A) ..... 39.5*(a)* Diepsloot Residents' and Landowners' Association v Administrator, Transvaal 1994 (3) SA 336 (A) ..... 46.3*(b)*
Die Spoorbond and Another v South African Railways; Van Heerden and Others v South African Railways 1946 AD 999 ..... 42.9*(a)*
Dikoko v Mokhatla 2006 (6) SA 235 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [2006] ZACC 10 ..... 3.2, 3.6, 4.3*(d)(iv), 4.3(g)(ii), 4.3(h)(i)(aa), 4.3(h)(ii)(aa), 4.3(h)(ii)(dd), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.5(a)(ii)(cc), 9.5(a)(iii), 17.7(c), 22.2(c)(ii), 42.5, 42.9(a)*, 42.10
Diko v Nobonogoza 2006 (3) SA 126 (C) ..... 22.2*(b)*(iii)

Dilokong Chrome Mines (Edms) Bpk v Direkteur-Generaal, Department van Handel en Nywerheid 1992 (4) SA 1 (A) ..... 63.3*(b), 63.3(a)*(iv)
Dilworth v Reichard [2002] 4 All SA 677 (W), 2003 (4) BCLR 388 (W) ..... 40.7*(a)*(i)
Director, Mineral Development, Gauteng Region and Sasol Mining (Pty) Ltd v Save the Vaal Environment and Others 1999 (2) SA 709 (SCA), 1999 (8) BCLR 845 (SCA) ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(cc), 50.3(b)(i)(dd)(x)(2), 50.3(b)(i)(dd)(y), 50.3(b)(ii)(bb), 50.3(b)(ii)(bb)(y), 50.4(c), 63.3(c)*
Director of Education v McCagie and Others 1918 AD 616 ..... 7.2*(b)*
Director of Public Prosecutions and Another v Lebona 1998 (5) BCLR 618 (LesCA) ..... 51.5*(f)*
Director of Public Prosecutions, Cape of Good Hope v Bathgate 2000 (2) SA 535 (C), 2000 (1) SACR 105 (C), 2000 (2) BCLR 103 (C) ..... 10.3*(a), 31.4(f), 36.4(e), 38.5(b), 46.5(b)*, 46.6
Director of Public Prosecutions, Cape of Good Hope v Robinson 2005 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2005 (1) SACR 1, 2005 (2) BCLR 103 (CC) ..... 4.4, 5.3*(e), 5.3(e)(iv), 66.1(b)*(v)
Director of Public Prosecutions, KZN v P 2006 (1) SACR 243 (SCA), 2006 (3) SA 515 (SCA), [2006] 1 All SA 446 (SCA) ..... 47.7*(a)* Director of Public Prosecutions, KZN v Regional Magistrate, Durban and Another 2001 (2) SACR 463 (N) ..... 51.5*(f)*
Director of Public Prosecutions, Natal v Magidela 2000 (1) SACR 458 (SCA), [2000] 2 All SA 337 (A) ..... 52.4*(b)*(ii)
Director of Public Prosecutions, Transvaal v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development and Others 2009 (4) SA 222 (CC) ..... 47.5*(d)*
Director of Public Prosecutions, Transvaal v Viljoen 2005 (1) SACR 505 (SCA), [2005] 2 All SA 355 (SCA) ..... 52.4*(b)(ii), 52.10(e)*
Director of Public Prosecutions (Western Cape) v Midi Television (Pty) Ltd t/a e-TV 2006 (1) SACR 574 (C), [2006] 2 All SA 286 (C) ..... 42.9*(c)*
Directory Advertising Cost Cutters v Minister for Posts, Telecommunications and Broadcasting 1996 (3) SA 800 (T), [1996] 2 All SA 83 (T) ..... 12.3*(d)(iii), 31.4(f)(i), 31.4(f)(ii), 62.6, 62.7, 63.3(b)*
Dispersion Technology (SA) (Pty) Ltd t/a Pelp Healthcare v State Tender Board and Another [2007] ZAGPHC 175 ..... 9.5*(a)(i) Ditedu v Tayob 2006 (2) SA 176 (W) ..... 59.4(a)*(ii)
Divisional Commissioner of SA Police Witwatersrand v SA Associated Newspapers Ltd 1966 (2) SA 503 (A) ..... 38.3*(a)*(iv)
Dladla v Administrator, Natal 1995 (3) SA 769 (N) ..... 63.5*(e)*
Dlamini and Another v Joosten and Others 2006 (3) SA 342 (SCA) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Dlomo v Dlomo 4 NAC 181 (1922) ..... 26.6*(d)*(i)
Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly and Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC) ..... 2.1, 4.2*(a), 4.3(b), 4.3(b)(ii)(aa), 4.3(b)(ii)(bb), 4.3(b)(iii), 4.3(b)(v), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(i)(cc), 10.3(d)(iii), 12.3(c)(ii), 12.3(d)(i)(aa), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc),17.2(b)(ii), 17.2(d)*, 17.4,

17.4*(a)* & (b), 17.5*(d), 17.6(a)* & (a)(i), 17.6*(a)(ii)(aa)*, (bb) & (cc)(1), 17.6*(a)(iii), 17.6(b)(ii), 18.3(e,), 22.7(d), 23C.2, 32.2(d), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 32.5(c), 42.5(b), 63.5(b)*

Dodd v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accidents Fund 1997 (2) SA 763 (A) ... 32.3*(a)*

Donono v Minister of Prisons 1973 (4) SA 259 (C) ... 38.3*(a)*(iv)

Doornfontein Gold Mining Co Ltd v National Union of Mineworkers and Others (1994) 15 ILJ 527 (LAC) ... 53.5

Dormehl v Minister of Justice and Others 2000 (2) SA 987 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 471 (CC) ... 4.3*(b), 5.3(d), 32.5(b), 59.4(a)*(iv)

Dotcom Trading 121 (Pty) Ltd t/a Live Africa Network News v King NO and Others 2000 (4) SA 973 (C) ... 24A.4*(b)(ii), 42.9(c), 62.2(a)*

Drumearn (Pty) Ltd v Wagner and Others 2002 (6) SA 500 (LCC) ... 48.7*(b)*(iv)

Du Bois v Stompdrift-Kamanassie Besproeiingsraad 2002 (5) SA 186 (C).. 25.8, 63.5*(e)*

Dudley v City of Cape Town and Another 2005 (5) SA 429 (CC), (2004) 25 ILJ 991 (CC), 2004 (8) BCLR 805 (CC) ... 5.3*(e)(i), 5.3(e)*(ii)

Dulabh and Another v Department of Land Affairs 1997 (4) SA 1108 (LCC), [1997] 3 All SA 635 (LCC) ... 32.3*(a), 32.4(a), 48.8(c)*(ii)

Duncan v Minister of Law and Order 1986 (2) SA 805 (A) ... 51.2

Dunlop South Africa Ltd v Metal and Allied Workers Union and Another 1985 (1) SA 177 (D) ... 42.8*(b)*

Dunscombe v Willies 1982 (3) SA 311 (D) ... 41.4*(c)*

Du Plessis and Others v De Klerk and Another 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC) ... 4.3*(d)(i)(aa), 4.3(h)(i)(aa), 7.4(c), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 11.3(b), 11.4(c), 13.3, 26.1, 31 Appendix, 31 Appendix(1), 31 Appendix(2), 31 Appendix(4)(a), 31 Appendix(4)(b), 31 Appendix(4)(c), 31.1(a), 31.1(b), 31.1(c), 31.2(a), 31.2(a)(i), 31.2(a)(ii), 31.2(b)(i), 31.2(b)(ii), 31.2(c), 31.2(d), 31.2(d)(i), 31.2(d)(iii), 31.2(d)(iv), 31.2(d)(v), 31.2(d)(vi), 31.4(a)(iii), 31.4(a)(v), 31.4(b)(ii), 31.4(c)(ii), 31.4(c)(iii), 31.4(e)(ii), 31.4(f)(i), 31.7(b), 31.8(a), 32.1(c), 32.3(a), 32.3(b), 32.3(c), 32.4(a), 33.1, 32.4(b), 32.4(c), 32.5(c), 34.7(a), 40.1(b)(i), 42.2, 42.6(b), 50.4(c), 51.3(f)*

Du Plessis v Road Accident Fund 2004 (1) SA 359 (SCA), 2003 (11) BCLR 1220 (SCA) ... 31.2*(d)(vi), 31.4(d)*(i),

31.4*(e)(iii), 31.4(e)(iv), 32.5(b), 35.5(g)(v), 36.4(a)*

Du Plooy v Minister of Correctional Services and Others [2004] 3 All SA 613 (T) ..... 32.3*(c)*

Du Preez and Another v Truth and Reconciliation Commission 1997 (3) SA 204 (A), 1997 (4) BCLR 531 (A) ..... 63.3*(b), 63.5(e)*

Du Preez v Attorney-General of the Eastern Cape 1997 (2) SACR 375 (E), 1997 (3) BCLR 329 (E) ..... 51.2, 51.5*(f)*

Du Preez v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development and Others 2006 (5) SA 592 (EqC) ..... 35.4*(d)*, 35.8

Durban Add-Ventures v Premier KwaZulu-Natal (No 2) 2001 (1) SA 389 (N) 63.10

Durban City Council v Association of Building Societies 1942 AD 27 ..... 9.5*(b)*(ii)

Du Toit and Another v Minister of Welfare and Population Development and Others (Lesbian and Gay Equality Project as Amicus Curiae) 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1006 (CC) ..... 3.7*(b)(i), 9.4(d)(iii), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 34.6, 35.5(g)(iii), 35.5(g)(v), 36.4(b), 47.1, 47.3(a), 47.8, 47.10(b), 47.10(c)*

Du Toit en Andere v Direkteur van Openbare Vervolging, Transvaal: In re S v Du Toit en Andere 2004 (2) SACR 584 (T) ..... 51.5*(c)*

Du Toit v Kruger (1905) 22 SC 234 ..... 30.2*(a)*

Du Toit v Minister of Transport 2003 (1) SA 586 (C) ..... 31.4*(e)(vi), 46.2(a), 46.3(a), 46.8(b)*(i)

Du Toit v Minister of Transport 2006 (1) SA 297 (CC), 2005 (11) BCLR 1053 (CC) ..... 4.2*(b), 4.3(g)(ii), 4.4, 9.2(e)(i), 18.2(b), 32.5(b), 34.7(a)*

Du Toit v Minister of Welfare and Population Development 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC) ..... 44.3*(c)*(ii)

E

EN and Others v Government of RSA and Others 2007 (1) BCLR 84 (D) ..... 9.6*(c)(ii)(bb), 50.4(h)(ii)(bb)(ẓ), 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y)*

Eagles Landing Body Corporate v Molewa NO and Others 2003 (1) SA 412 (T) ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(bb)(y), 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(ẓ), 50.4(h)(ii)(bb)*

Earthlife Africa (Cape Town) v Director-General: Department of Environmental Affairs and Tourism and Another 2005 (3) SA 156 (C) .. 50.3*((b)(i)(ẓ), 50.3(b)(ii)(bb)(y), 50.4(h)(ii)(aa), 63.5(e)*

Eastern Cape Provincial Government and Others v Contractprops 25 (Pty) Ltd 2001 (4) SA 142 (SCA) ..... 25.5*(d), 25.9(b)*

Eastern Metropolitan Substructure v Peter Klein Investments (Pty) Ltd 2001 (4) SA 661 (W) ..... 23A.4, 31.4*(e)(ii), 31.4(e)(iv), 63.3(c)*

East Rand Gold and Uranium Co Ltd v NUM (1989) 10 ILJ 683 (LAC) .... 53.2*(b)*

Eastwood v Shepstone 1902 TS 294 ..... 4.3*(d)(i)(aa)*

East Zulu Motors (Pty) Ltd v Empangeni/Ngwelezane Transitional Local Council and Others 1998 (2) SA 61 (CC), 1998 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ..... 3.3*(d), 9.2(c)(iii)(ff), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 31.3(d), 35.3(a)*(ii)

Ebrahim v Minister of the Interior 1977 (1) SA 665 (A) ..... 32.3*(a)* Eggersgluz and Another v Trayishile Kethese and Others (unreported, LCC Case No 13R/99, 6 April 1999) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Ehrlich v CEO, Legal Aid Board 2006 (1) SACR 346 (E)..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
Eikenbosch Farm (Pty) Ltd v Matthews 2003 (4) SA 283 (LCC) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Eisenberg and Associates v Minister of Home Affairs 2003 (5) SA 281 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 838 (CC)..... 7.2*(c)*(i)
Eke v Sugden 2001 (2) SA 216 (E)..... 59.4*(a)*(iv)
Elliot v Commissioner of Police and Another 1997 (2) SACR 315 (ZS), 1998 (1) SA 21 (ZS)..... 51.2, 66.1*(b)*(ii)
Ellish en Andere v Prokureur-Generaal, Witwatersrandse Plaaslike Afdeling 1994 (4) SA 835 (W), 1994 (2) SACR 579 (W), 1994 (5) BCLR 1 (W) ..... 51.1*(b)(iv), 51.4(d)*
Ellis v Viljoen 2001 (4) SA 795 (C), 2001 (5) BCLR 487 (C)..... 33.11*(c), 56C.3(b)*(ii)
Els E v Bruce; Els J v Bruce 1923 EDL 295..... 40.8*(b)*
Els v Media 24 (Pty) Ltd [2008] ZAGPHC 39..... 42.9*(a)*
Els v Minister of Safety and Security 1998 (2) SACR 93 (NC), 1998 (4) BCLR 434 (NC) ..... 51.5*(c), 52.6(d)*
End Conscription Campaign v Minister of Defence 1993 (1) SA 589 (T)... 64.6*(h)*
Engelbrecht v Road Accident Fund and Another 2007 (6) SA 96 (CC), 2007 (5) BCLR 457 (CC) ..... 9.2*(b)(i), 9.2(b)(ii)(bb), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.4(b)(ii), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(cc)* 59.4*(a)*(ii)
Epstein v Epstein 1906 TH 87 ..... 38.2*(a)(iii), 38.2(b)*(ii)
Equisec (Pty) Ltd v Rodrigues and Another 1999 (3) SA 113 (W) ..... 52.2*(b)*
Ernst and Young v Beinash and Others 1999(1) SA 1114 (W) 54.5
Esack No and Another v Commission on Gender Equality 2001 (1) SA 1299 (W), 2000 (7) BCLR 737 (W)..... 24B.1, 24C.2*(b)*
Eskom v Hiemstra NO 1999 (11) BCLR 1320 (LC)..... 35.4*(c)*
Esop v Union Government (Minister of Interior) 1913 CPD 133 ..... 41.1*(a)* Esselen v Argus Printing and Publishing Co Ltd and Others 1992 (3) SA 764 (T) ..... 42.9*(a)*
Estate Geekie v Union Government and Another 1948 (2) SA 494 (N)..... 63.4
Evans v Llandudno Houtbay Transitional Metropolitan Substructure 2001 (2) SA 342 (C)..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(bb)(y), 50.4(h)(ii)(aa)*
Executive Council of the Province of the Western Cape v Minister for Provincial Affairs and Constitutional Development and Another; Executive Council, KwaZulu-Natal v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2000 (1) SA 661 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC), [1999] ZACC 13..... 4.3*(b)(i), 6.2(a), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 10.3(b), 10.3(d)(i), 2.3(b)(iii), 12.3(c(ii), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 12.3(d)(iii), 14.3(b)(ii), 14.3(c)(i), 14.3(c)(ii), 17.5, 17.5(g), 17.5(e)(i), 17.7(b)(i), 18.2(b), 19.3(a)(i), 19.4(b), 22.2(a), 22.2(a)(iii), 22.2(c)(iii), 22.2(b)(i), 22.2(c)(i), 22.3(b)(iv), 29.6, 32.3(b), 32.4(a), 32.4(c), 32.5(c)*

Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC); 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC) ..... 3.3*(d), 9.4(e), 9.4(e)(i)(ee), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 12.3(b)(i), 12.3(c)(ii), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 12.3(d)(iii), 15.3(c)(ii), 16.4(b)(ii), 17.5(e)(i), 18.3(l), 19.4(a), 19.4(b), 21.2(b), 22.1(c), 23C.5, 24E.3(f), 25.4(c)(i), 28.2(a), 28.2(a)(i), 28.2(a)(ii), 28.3, 32.1(c), 32.3(a), 32.3(b), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 34.7(c)(ii), 40.1(b)*(i), 64.4

Ex Parte Cabinet for the Interim Government of South West Africa: In Re Advisory Opinion in terms of s 19(2) of Procl R101 of 1985 (RSA) 1988 (2) SA 832 (SWA) ..... 32.1*(a)*

Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1997 (2) SA 97 (CC), 1997 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ..... 2.5*(a), 2.5(b), 22.1(c), 22.2(a)(ii), 22.2(a)(iii), 22.2(c)(i), 22.3(b)(i), 22.6(d), 32.1(c), 32.2(a)*,

Ex Parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) ..... 2.5*(c), 4.2(a), 12.2(b), 12.3, 12.3(a)–(b)(iii), 12.3(c)(i)–(ii), 12.3(d)(i)(bb), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 14.3(a), 14.3(c)(i), 14.5(b), 14.5(d), 17.2(b)*, (b)(i) & (ii), 17.2*(c), 17.7(b)(i), 18.2(b), 22.1(c), 22.2(a)(ii), 22.2(c)(i), 22.3(b)(i), 22.3(b)(vi), 22.3(d), 22.4(e), 22.4(e)(ii), 22.5(d), 22.6(a), 32.1(c), 32.2(a), 32.3(b), 32.4(c), 32.5(c), 42.6(a), 63.2(a)*

Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature. In re: Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC) ..... 32.4*(c), 32.5(c)*

Ex Parte Minister of Safety and Security and Others: In re S v Walters and Another 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC) ..... 9.2*(b)(ii)(bb), 9.2(b)(iii), 9.2(c)(iii)(aa), 9.2(e)(iv)(bb), 9.2(f)(ii), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 14.5(d)(ii)(cc), 23B.3(c)(i), 32.2(b), 32.5(b)*

Ex Parte: Minister of Social Development and Others 2006 (4) SA 309 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 604 (CC), [2006] ZACC 3 ..... 4.3*(h)(ii)(aa), 9.2(c)(iii)(aa)*,

9.4*(e), 9.4(e)(i)(aa), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(i)(ee), 56D.3(f)*(i)

Ex Parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal 1996, 1996 (11) BCLR 1419 (CC), 1996 (4) SA 1098 (CC) ..... 32.5*(c)*

Ex Parte Speaker of the National Assembly: In Re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the National Education Policy Bill 83 of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC) ..... 14.1, 14.3*(a)*

Ex Parte the President of the Republic of South Africa: In re Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ..... 4.3*(b)(ii)(aa), 4.3(b)(ii)(bb), 14.3(a), 14.3(c)(i)(cc), 17.3(f)(i), 17.6(b)(i) & (ii), 18.2(b), 32.4(a), 32.5(b), 32.5(c)*

Ex Parte the President of the Republic of South Africa: In re Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) 1.3, 2.1

Ex parte Van Niekerk and Another: In re Van Niekerk v Van Niekerk (Unreported Transvaal High Court Case No 34054 / 03, 20880 / 02, 13 July 2004) 47.1, 47.8

Ex Parte: Western Cape Provincial Government and Others: In re DVB Behuising (Pty) Limited v North West Provincial Government and Another 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347 (CC) ..... 14.3*(a), 22.3(b)*(iii)

Ex Parte Women's Legal Centre: In re Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council 2001 (4) SA 1288(CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC) ..... 9.4*(e)(ii)(bb)*

F

Farjas (Pty) Ltd and Another v Regional Land Claims Commissioner, KwaZulu-Natal 1998 (2) SA 900 (CC), 1998 (5) BCLR 579 (LCC) .....

Farrar's Estate v Commissioner for Inland Revenue 1926 TPD 510 ..... 32.3*(a)*

Farr v Mutual & Federal Insurance Co Ltd 2000 (3) SA 684 (C) ..... 35.5*(g)*(v)

FAWU v Sam's Foods (Grabouw) (1991) 12 ILJ 1324 (IC) 53.5

FAWU v Spekenham Supreme (2) (1988) 9 ILJ 628 (IC) ..... 53.2*(b)*, 53.5

Federal Convention of Namibia v Speaker of the National Assembly of Namibia 1994 (1) SA 177 (NmHC) ..... 17.6*(d)*

Federal Mogul Aftermarket Southern Africa (Pty) Limited v Competition Commission & Another 2005 (6) BCLR 613 (CAC) ..... 3.3*(a)*

Fedics Group (Pty) Ltd and Another v Matus and Another 1998 (2) SA 617 (C), 1997 (9) BCLR 1199 (C) ..... 38.3*(a)(ii), 38.3(a)(iii), 38.3(b)(iv), 52.10(f)*

Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd and Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council and Others 1998 (2) SA 1115 (SCA), 1998 (6) BCLR 671 (SCA) ..... 4.3*(d)(ii), 11.3(b), 31.8(b), 7.2(b)*

Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd and Others v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council and Others 1999 (1) SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458 (CC), [1999] ZACC 21 ..... 1.3, 2.1, 3.3*(d), 4.3(a)(i), 4.3(b)(i), 4.3(d)(ii), 6.2(a), 10.5(a), 11.1(b), 11.1(c), 11.2(b), 11.2(b)(i), 11.2(b)(ii), 11.2(b)(iii), 11.3(b), 11.3(c), 11.3(c)(ii), 11.3(c)*(iii), 11.4,

12.3*(c)(ii), 12.3(d)(i)(bb), 14.3(a), 14.3(b)(i), 17.5(f), 18.2(b), 22.1(a), 22.1(c), 22.2(c)(iv), 22.1(f), 22.5(c), 22.5(e), 22.6(a)–(b), 22.6(e), 23B.6(b)(iii), 24A.4(a)(iii), 25.9(b), 26.6(c)(iii), 27.2(d), 27.4(a), 27.6(b), 27.6(c), 31.1(c), 31 Appendix (4)(c), 31.2(a)(ii), 31.4(a)(v), 31.4(b)(iv), 31.4(e)(iv), 31.8(b), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 32.5(c), 40.1(b)(i), 46.5(c), 56B.4(g), 63.1, 63.3(a), 63.3(b), 63.3(c)*, 63.4

Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Wolfaardt 2002 (1) SA 49 SCA ..... 9.2*(a), 9.7, 14.5(d)(ii)(aa)*

Feedmill Developments (Pty) Ltd and Another v Attorney-General, KwaZulu-Natal 1998 (9) BCLR 1072 (N) ..... 51.5*(f)*

Fei Lui and Others v Commanding Officer, Kempton Park and Others 1999 (3) SA 996 (W) ..... 32.3*(a)*

Feni v Head of the Western Tembuland Regional Authority and Another 2001 (1) SA 574 (Tk) ..... 34.7*(c)*(ii)

Ferreira v Levin NO 1996 (2) SA 621 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 441 (CC) ..... 6.2*(a), 6.2(b)*(i)

Ferreira v Levin NO and Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ..... 3.1, 3.7*(a)*

Ferreira v Levin NO and Others; Vryenhoek and Others v Powell NO and Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ..... 3.4*(a), 5.3(a)(i), 6.2(a), 6.2(b)(i), 7.1, 7.2(c), 7.2(c)(i), 7.2(c)(iii), 7.2(c)(iv), 7.3(c)(i), 8.1(b), 9.4(c), 9.4(d)(ii), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 10.3(c), 12.3(d)(i)(aa), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 31.2(d)(v), 31.4(a)(v), 32.3(a), 32.3(b), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 32.5(c), 34.1(b), 34.3(b), 34.5(b)(ii), 34.6, 34.7(c)(ii), 34.8(c)(ii), 36.2(c), 36.3(c), 36.5(a)(ii), 37.5, 38.5(b), 40.1(b)(i), 42.5, 43.3(a), 44.3(a)(i), 45.2(f), 45.5(b), 49.2(c)(i), 51.1(a)(ii), 51.1(a)(iv), 51.1(b)(ii), 51.1(b)(iv), 51.2, 51.3(e), 51.4(b)(i), 51.4(b)(iii), 51.5(b), 51.5(I), 52.2(b), 52.8, 52.11, 54.3, 63.8, 64.4(a)*

Fidelity Guards Holdings (Pty) Ltd t/a Fidelity Guards v Pearmain 2001 (2) SA 853 (SE), 1997 (10) BCLR 1443 (SE) ..... 31, 34.7*(a), 34.7(c)(i), 36.4(f)*, 54.4, Appendix (1)

Fihla v Pest Control Tvl Pty (Ltd) (1984) 5 ILJ 165 (IC) ..... 53.2*(b)*

Financial Mail (Pty) Ltd and Others v Sage Holdings Ltd and Another 1993 (2) SA 451 (A) ..... 4.3*(d)(i)(aa), 38.2(a)(i), 38.2(a)(iii), 38.2(c)(i), 38.3(a)(i), 38.4, 38.2(b)(ii), 42,2, 42.9(b)*
Financial Mail (Pty) Ltd v Registrar of Insurance 1966 (2) SA 219 (W) ..... 42.9*(c)*
Financial Services Board and Another v Pepkor Pension Fund and Another 1999 (1) SA 167 (C) ..... 63.5*(d)*
Findevco (Pty) Ltd v Faceformat SA (Pty) Ltd 2001 (1) SA 251 (E) ..... 59.4*(a)*(i)
First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service and Another 2001 (3) SA 310 (C) 63.4
First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service and Another, First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC) ..... 4.3*(d)(i), 4.3(d)(i)(aa), 50.3(b)(ii)(aa)(z)*
First National Bank of South Africa Ltd v Land and Agricultural Bank of South Africa and Others: Sheard v Land and Agricultural Bank of South Africa and Another 2000 (3) SA 626 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 876 (CC) ..... 9.4*(d)(i), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 34.8(c)(i), 59.4(a)*(i)
First National Bank of South Africa Ltd v Myburgh 2002 (4) SA 176 (C) .. 9.2*(a), 14.5(d)*(ii)
Foodcorp (Pty) Ltd v Deputy Director General Department of Environmental Affairs and Tourism: Branch Marine and Coastal Management and Others 2006 (2) SA 191 (SCA) ..... 63.6*(d)*
Former Highland Residents, Ex Parte; In re: Ash v Department of Land Affairs [2000] 2 All SA 26 (LCC) ..... 46.8*(b)(i) Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC), [1997] ZACC 6 ..... 5.3(a)(ii), 9.2(b)(i), 9.2(b)(ii)(aa), 9.2(c)(i)(bb), 9.2(c)(i)(dd), 9.2(c)(iv), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.2(e)(i), 9.2(e)(iii)(bb), 9.2(e)(iv)(aa), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 9.2(e)(iv)(dd), 9.2(f)(i), 9.3, 9.4(c), 9.5(a), 9.5(a)(ii), 9.5(a)(ii)(bb), 9.5(c)(iii), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 24C.3(c)(ii), 31 Appendix(3)(b), 31 Appendix(4)(b), 31.4(c)(ii), 32.4(c), 32.5(c), 33.12, 38.2, 38.2(b)(I), 38.3(b)(i), 40.6(a), 42.9(a), 50.4(h)(ii)(gg), 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y), 59.4(b)(i), 59.4(d)*
Foulds v Minister of Home Affairs and Others 1996 (4) SA 137 (W) ..... 63.5*(d)*
Fourie v Minister of Home Affairs 2005 (3) SA 429 (SCA), 2005 (3) BCLR 241 (SCA) ..... 8.4*(c), 8.5, 36.4(d)(i), 57.3(b), 58.1(a), 58.4(a)(i) Fourways Mall (Pty) Ltd v South African Commercial Catering 1999 (3) SA 752 (W) ..... 43.1, 43.3(a)*(i)

Fraser v ABSA Bank Limited 2007 (3) SA 484 (CC), 2007 BCLR 219 (CC) ..... 4.2*(b), 4.3(a), 4.3(a)(ii) 4.3(d)(i)(bb), 4.3(g)(ii), 4.3(h)(i)(aa)*

Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North, and Others 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC) ..... 3.7*(b)(ii), 9.2(b)(ii)(bb), 9.2(b)(iii), 9.2(e)(iv)(aa), 9.4(d)(i), 9.4(d)(ii), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(i)(cc), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 13.5(a), 31.3(c), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 36.4(b), 44.3(c)(ii), 47.3(a), 35.5(g)(ii), 35.5(g)(iii), 35.5(g)*(viii)

Fraser v Naude and Others 1999 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1998 (11) BCLR 1357 (CC) ..... 5.3*(e)(i), 5.3(e)*(iii)

Fredericks v MEC for Education and Training, Eastern Cape and Others 2002 (2) SA 693 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 113, (2002) 23 ILJ 81 (CC) ..... 4.2*(b), 31.4(b)(v), 53.1(a)(ii), 59.2(b), 63.3(b)*

Freedom Front v South African Human Rights Commission 2003 (11) BCLR 1283 (SAHRC) ..... 24C.3*(c)(ii), 36.4(b)(ii), 42.4, 42.8, 42.8(c)*

Freedom of Expression Institute and Others v President, Ordinary Court Martial, and Others 1999 (2) SA 471 (C), 1999 (3) BCLR 261 (C) ..... 24A.3*(b), 24B.2, 40.4(a), 51.5(e)*(i)

Friedman v Glicksman 1996 (1) SA 1134 (W) 39.2

Fripp v Gibbon and Co 1913 AD 354 ..... 6.2*(k)*

Fuel Retailers Association of Southern Africa v Director General Environmental Management, Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment Mpumalanga Province and Others 2007 (6) SA 4 (CC), 2007 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC), [2007] ZACC 13 ..... 4.3*(a)(i), 4.3(d)(iii), 50.1, 50.3(b)(i), 50.3(b)(i)(aa), 50.3(b)(i)(dd), 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(zz), 50.3(b)(ii)(aa)(v), 50.4(b), 50.4(f)*

Fullimput 221 CC t/a Hawk Molaba Luxury Tours v Sono and Another: In Combination with Fullimput 221 CC t/a Hawk Molaba Tours v Minsiter of Safety and Security and Others 2006 (10) BCLR 1202 (T) ... 9.5*(c)*(iii)

Fundstrust (Pty) Ltd (in liquidation) v Van Deventer 1997 (1) SA 710 (A) . 32.3*(a)*

F v F 2006 (3) SA 42 (SCA) ..... 47.3*(a)*, 47.8

G

G v Superintendent, Groote Schuur Hospital, and Others 1993 (2) SA 255 (C) 37.2, 39.3

Gaboetloeloe v Tsikwe 1945 NAC (C and O) 2 ..... 26.6*(d)(i), 26.6(d)*(iii)

Galago Publishers (Pty) Ltd Erasmus 1989 (1) SA 276 (A) ..... 42.7*(c)*

Gamevest (Pty) Limited v Regional Land Claims Commissioner, Northern Province and Mpumalanga, and Others 2003 (1) SA 373 (SCA) ..... 63.3*(a)*

Garces v Fouche and Others 1998 (9) BCLR 1098 (Nm) ..... 51.4*(c), 51.4(d)*

Garden Cities Incorporated Association Not for Gain v Northpine Islamic Society 1999 (2) SA 268 (C) ..... 31.7*(a), 41.3(b), 41.4(d)*

Gardener v Whitaker 1995 (2) SA 672 (E), 1994 (5) BCLR 19 (E) ..... 32.3*(b), 34.6, 38.2, 38.2(a)(i), 38.2(c)(i), 38.5(b), 42.5(a), 42.5(c), 42.9(a)*

Gardener v Whitaker 1996 (4) SA 337 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 775 (CC)..... 11.2*(a), 31.8(a)*
Gasa v Regional Magistrate for the Regional Division of Natal 1979 (4) SA 729 (N)..... 51.5*(o)*
Gauteng Gambling Board v Silverstar Development Ltd and Others 2005 (4) SA 67 (SCA)..... 63.9
Gauteng Provincial Legislature, Ex Parte: In re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC)..... 4.3*(b)(ii)(aa), 4.3(b)(ii)(bb), 4.3(b)(iii), 6.2(a), 6.2(g), 24F.2, 33.8, 34.5, 35.5(g)(viii), 36.4(d)(ii), 36.5(c), 44.3(c)(iii), 57.2(a)(i)(bb), 57.3(b), 57.3(c)(i), 57.3(c)(vi), 57.3(c)(vii), 58.1(c), 58.3(a), 58.4(a)(i), 58.4(a)(iii), 58.7(a), 65.1, 65.3(b)*
Gauteng Provincial Legislature v Kilian 2001 (2) SA 68 (SCA), 2001 (3) BCLR 253 (SCA)..... 4.3*(b)(iii), 17.2(a), 17.3(f)*(ii)
Geekie v Union Government and Another 1948 (2) SA 494 (N)..... 63.4
Geidel v Bosman NO 1963 (4) SA 253 (T)..... 65.6
Geldenhuys v Minister of Safety and Security 2002 (4) SA 719 (C)..... 1.3, 13.3, 31.4*(e)(viii), 40.5(b)*(i)
General Council of the Bar South Africa v Van der Spuy 1999 (1) SA 577 (T)..... 44.1*(d), 44.3(c)*(iv)
George and Others v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism 2005 (6) SA 297 (EqC)..... 35.8
Gerber and Others v Member of the Executive Council for Development Planning and Local Government, Gauteng, and Another 2003 (2) SA 344 (SCA), [2002] 4 All SA 518 (SCA)..... 22.5*(d), 27.2(d)*
Gerber v Voorsitter: Komitee oor Amnestie van die Kommissie vir Waarheid en Versoening 1998 (2) SA 599 (T)..... 7.2*(c)*
Gerhardt v State President 1989 (2) SA 499 (T)..... 49.3*(b)*(ii)
Gero v Linder 1995 (2) SA 132 (O)..... 44.3*(c)*(iv)
Geuking v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2003 (3) SA 34 (CC), 2003 (1) SACR 404 (CC), 2004 (9) BCLR 895 (CC)..... 12.3*(d)(i)(aa), 40.2(a), 66.1(b)(v), 52.2(b), 59.3(a)(iii), 59.4(c)(i), 63.3(b)*
Geuking v President of the RSA 2002 (1) SA 204 (C), 2001 (11) BCLR 1208 (C)..... 60.6
Geyser and Another v Msunduzi Municipality and Others 2003 (5) SA 18 (N), 2003 (3) BCLR 235 (N)..... 22.4*(e)(v), 46.1, 46.3(b), 46.4, 46.5(b)*
Geyser en 'n Ander v Pont 1968 (4) SA 67 (W)..... 38.2*(c)(i), 38.2(c)*(ii)
Gibson v Berkowitz and Another 1996 (4) SA 1029 (W)..... 40.8*(b)*
Giddey NO v JC Barnard and Partners 2007 (5) SA 525 (CC), 2007 (2) BCLR 125 (CC)..... 3.1, 4.3*(d)(iv), 9.4(b)(i), 59.4(a)(iv), 59.4(a)*(viii)
Gili Greenworld Holdings (Pty) Ltd v Shisonge (unreported, Land Claims Court Case No LCC 19 / 02, 11 June 2002..... 48.7*(b)(iv) Glen Anil Development Corp Ltd v Secretary for Inland Revenue 1975 (4) SA 715 (A)..... 32.3(a)*
Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others [2008] ZAGPHC 143..... 23B.6*(b)*(iv)

Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2009 (1) SA 287 (CC), 2009 (2) BCLR 136 (CC), [2008] ZACC 19 ..... 17.4*(a), 17.8(b), 23B.1, 23B.6(b)(ii), 23B.6(b)*(iii)

Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2011 (3) SA 347 (CC), [2011] ZACC 6..... 17.4*(a), 17.5(b), 17.6(b)(i), (ii)(cc)(5), 17.8(b), 23B.1, 23B.6(b)(ii), 23B.6(b)(iii), 23B.6(b)*(iv)

Glenister v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others [2009] ZAWCHC 1 ..... 23B.6*(b)*(iii)

Goldberg and Others v Minister of Prisons 1979 (1) SA 14 (A) ..... 49.3*(a)*

Goldberg NO v PJ Joubert Ltd 1960 (1) SA 521 (T)..... 32.3*(a)*

Gold Circle (Pty) Ltd and Another v Premier, Kwazulu-Natal 2005 (4) SA 402 (D)..... 35.5*(g)*(viii)

Goodman Brothers (Pty) Ltd v Transnet Ltd 1998 (4) SA 989 (W), 1998 (8) BCLR 1024 (W), [1998] All SA 336 (W) ..... 25.2*(c)(i), 25.3(c), 31.4(f), 50.3(b)(ii)(aa)(u)*, 62.6, 62.7

Goodman v Von Moltke 1938 CPD 153 ..... 38.2*(a)*(iii)

Gool v Minister of Justice 1955 (2) SA 682 (C)..... 7.3*(b)*

Gooprushad v R 1914 35 NLR 87..... 52.4*(c)*(ii)

Gory v Kolver NO and Others (Starke and Others intervening) 2007 (4) SA 97 (CC); 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC)..... 3.7*(a), 4.3(e), 6.2(b)(vi), 6.2(b)(vii), 9.2(a), 9.2(b)(ii)(bb), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.2(e)(ii), 9.2(e)(iv)(aa), 9.4(d)(iii), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 14.5(d)(ii)(aa), 35.5(g)*(v)

Gosschalk v Rossouw 1966 (2) SA 476 (C) ..... 38.2*(a)*(iii)

Gouda Boedery v Transnet Limited [2004] ZASCA 85 ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(ee)(y)*

Govender v Minister of Safety and Security 2000 (1) SA 959 (D), 1999 (5) BCLR 580 (D) ..... 23B.3*(c)(i)(aa)*

Govender v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 273 (SCA), 2001 (11) BCLR 1197 (SCA), 2001 (2) SACR 197 (SCA) ..... 9.4*(e)(ii)(bb), 23B.3(c)(i)(aa), 23B.3(c)(i)(cc), 31.4(e)(vi), 32.3(b), 32.5(b), 36.4(c)(iii), 39.5(a), 40.5(c), 43.2(b)*(ii)

Governing Body of Mikro Primary School v Western Cape Minister of Education [2005] 2 All SA 37 (C)..... 58.4*(a)*(vii)

Government of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal v Ngwane 1996 (4) SA 943 (A) ..... 26.6*(a)*

Government of the Province of the Eastern Cape v Frontier Safaris (Pty) Ltd 1998 (2) SA 19 (SCA)..... 50.4*(b)(ii)(ee)*

Government of the Republic of Bophuthatswana v Segale 1990 (1) SA 434 (BA) ..... 32.1*(a), 32.1(c)*

Government of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Government of Kwazulu and Another 1983 (1) SA 164 (A) ..... 14.5*(d)(ii)(cc)*

Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others v Grootboom and Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC), [2000] ZACC 19 ..... 3.3*(c), 4.2(a), 4.3(c)(ii), 4.3(h)(ii)(bb), 8.2, 9.2(c)(iii)(bb), 9.2(c)(iii)(ee), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 9.6(a), 9.6(c), 10.3(a), 10.4(b), 10.4(c)*,

11.3*(c)(iii), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 14.3(a), 14.3(b)(i), 16.4(b)(ii), 17.5(b), 19.3(c), 22.4(b), 22.4(c), 24C.3(c)(ii), 24C.3(d)(ii), 30.3, 31.2(d)(ii), 32.3(b), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 32.5(c), 33.1, 33.10(a), 33.10(b), 33.11(a), 33.11(b), 33.11(c), 33.12, 33.13, 33.2(c)(ii), 33.3, 33.4(a), 33.4(b), 33.4(c), 33.5(a), 33.5(b), 33.5(c), 33.5(d), 33.5(e)(i), 33.5(e)(ii), 33.5(e)(iii), 33.5(e)(iv), 33.5(f)(ii), 33.5(f)(iii), 33.5(f)(iv), 33.5(g), 33.5(g)(i), 33.5(g)(ii), 33.5(h), 33.6, 33.7, 33.9, 34.1(b), 34.5(a), 34.5(b)(ii), 34.6, 34.8(e)(ii), 35.1(b), 35.1(d)(i), 35.4(f), 36.2(e), 36.4(i), 44.3(c)(ii), 47.3(b), 47.4(a), 47.4(b), 47.4(c), 47.4(e), 48.1, 48.3, 48.4, 48.6(a), 48.6(c), 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(w), 55.1, 55.3(a), 55.3(b), 55.3(c), 55.4(a), 55.4(b)(i), 55.4(b)(ii), 55.4(b)(iii), 55.4(b)(iv), 55.4(b)(v), 55.5(a), 55.5(b), 55.(d), 56A.2(a), 56A.2(b)(v), 56A.2(b)(vi), 56A.2(b)(vii), 56A.2(c), 56A.3(f), 56A.4(d), 56B.1, 56B.3(a), 56B.3(b)(i), 56B.3(b)(v), 56B.4(b), 56B.4(c)(ii), 56B.4(g), 56C.3(a), 56C.3(b)(ii), 56C.3(b)(iii), 56D.1, 56D.3(b)–(d), 56D.5(b), 56D.6, 56D.6(b), 64.4(a), 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y), 59.2(c), 64.4(c), 64.4(e)*

Government of the Republic of South Africa v Malevu 1995 (8) BCLR 995 (D) 28.3

Government of the Republic of South Africa v Sunday Times Newspaper and Another 1995 (2) SA 221 (T), 1995 (2) BCLR 182 (T) ..... 31.3*(d), 42.5(b), 42.7(c), 42.7(d), 42.9(h)*

Graham v Ker (1892) 9 SC 185 ..... 42.9*(a)*

Graham v Ridley 1931 TPD 476 ..... 33.11*(c), 55.6(a), 56C.3(b)*(ii)

Grand Mines (Pty) Ltd v Giddey NO 1999 (1) SA 960 (SCA) ..... 50.4*(h)(ii)(ee)*

Grand Slam Entertainment Centre v Minister van Veiligheid en Sekuriteit 1996 (2) BCLR 213 (O) 54.3

Grand Valley (Edms) Bpk v Nkosi (unreported, LCC Case No 73/99, 25 June 1999) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Greeff v Protection 4 You (Pty) Ltd (unreported TPD 9 March 2007) ..... 42.9*(b)*
Greenfield Manufacturers (Temba) (Pty) Ltd v Royton Electrical Engineering (Pty) Ltd 1976 (2) SA 565 (A) ..... 59.4*(b)*(iii)
Greys Marine Hout Bay (Pty) Ltd and Others v Minister of Public Works and Others 2005 (6) SA 313 (SCA), [2005] 3 All SA 33 (SCA), 2005 (10) BCLR 931 (SCA) ..... 18.2*(b), 23A.1, 63.2(a), 63.3(a), 63.3(b), 63.3(c), 63.5(d)*
Grinaker LTA Limited and Another v Tender Board (Mpumalanga) and Others [2002] 3 All SA 336 (T) ..... 25.3*(d), 25.4(c)(v), 25.5(b), 25.8, 25.9(b), 25.9(d)*
Groenewald v Minister van Justisie 1973 (3) SA 877 (A) ..... 38.3*(a)*(iv)
Grootboom v Oostenberg Municipality and Others 2000 (3) BCLR 277 (C) ..... 9.6*(c)(ii)(bb), 33.12, 33.3, 33.5(f)(ii), 33.5(f)(iv), 33.7, 44.3(c)(ii), 47.4(a), 47.4(b), 47.4(c), 50.4(i)(bb), 55.7, 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y)*

H

Hack v Venterspost Municipality and Others 1950 (1) SA 172 (W) ..... 63.3*(c), 63.5(g)*
Hadebe v Minister of Home Affairs (Unreported Durban and Coast Local Division Case No 15715 / 05, 14 December 2006) ..... 47.2*(a)* Hallowes v The Yacht 'Sweet Waters' 1995 (2) SA 270 (D) ..... 59.3*(a)*(i)
Hall v Weltz and Others 1996 (4) SA 1070 (C) ..... 42.9*(a)*
Hamata and Another v Chairperson, Peninsula Technikon Internal Disciplinary Committee 2002 (5) SA 449 (SCA), 2002 (7) BCLR 756 (SCA) ..... 51.1*(a)(iv), 52.4(c)(i), 63.5(e)*
Hamata and Another v Chairperson, Peninsula Technikon Internal Disciplinary Committee and Others 2000 (4) SA 621 (C) ..... 51.1*(a)(iv), 51.5(e)(i), 51.5(h)*
Hansen v Regional Magistrate, Cape Town and Another 1999 (2) SACR 430 (C) ..... 51.1*(a)*(v)
Hardaker v Phillips 2005 (4) SA 515 (SCA) ..... 36.4*(h)*(iii)
Hardy Ventures CC v Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality 2004 (1) SA 199 (T) ..... 14.3*(c)(i), 31.4(b)*(iv)
Harksen v Attorney General Cape 1999 (1) SA 718 (C) ..... 52.6*(a)(i) Harksen v Lane NO and Others 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) ..... 3.3(d), 9.2(c)(iii)(bb), 11.3(c)(ii), 32.3(a), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 32.5(b), 33.5(e)(iii), 33.5(f)(i), 34.1(b), 34.5(b)(ii), 35.1(d)(i), 35.2, 35.3(a), 35.3(a)(ii), 35.5(a), 35.5(b), 35.5(e), 35.5(g), 35.5(g)(i), 35.5(g)(ii), 35.5(g)(iii), 35.5(h), 35.5(h)(i), 35.5(h)(ii), 35.5(h)(iii), 35.5(i), 35.5(j), 36.4(a), 37.4, 38.3(a)(i), 40.3(c)(ii), 42.7(d), 44.2(b), 46.7, 50.3(b)(ii)(aa)(u), 56B.4(g), 56D.5(c)(ii), 57.4(c)(ii)(aa)*

Harksen v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2000 (2) SA 825 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 478 (CC) ..... 6.2*(e), 30.2(b), 30.4(e), 36.3(b), 66.1(b)*(v)

Harper v Morgan Guarantee Trust Co of New York, Johannesburg 2004 (3) SA 253 (W) ..... 31.4*(e)*(x)

Harris and Others v Minister of the Interior and Another 1952 (2) SA 428 (A) ..... 32.1*(a), 32.3(a), 45.2(a), 59.2(a)*, 65.1

Harris v Dönges NO and Another 1951 (4) SA 707 (C) ..... 32.1*(a)*

Harris v Minister of Education 2001 (8) BCLR 796 (T) ..... 2.2*(h), 2.3(g), 31.3(c), 35.5(g)(vi), 47.10(c), 57.2(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(bbb)(xx), 57.4(b)*

Hartman v Chairman, Board of Religious Objection 1987 (1) SA 922 (O) ..... 41.2*(b)(i), 41.3(a)*

Hartzenberg v Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipal (Despatch Administrative Unit) 2003 (3) SA 633 (SE) ..... 36.4(i)

Hayes and Another v Minister of Finance and Development Planning, Western Cape 2003 (4) SA 598 (C) ..... 63.3*(b)*

Hayes and Another v Minister of Housing, Planning and Administration, Western Cape and Others 1999 (4) SA 1229 (C) ..... 22.7*(d)*

Haynes v Commissioner for Inland Revenue 2000 (6) BCLR 596 (Tk) 38.1

Hay v B and Others 2003 (3) SA 492 (W) ..... 39.4, 39.8, 40.10*(b), 47.10(b)*

Hazis v Transvaal and Delagoa Bay Investment Co Ltd 1939 AD 372 ..... 27.5*(c)*

Head of Department: Mpumalanga Department of Education and Another v Hoërskool Ermelo & Another 2010 (2) SA 415 (CC) , 2010 (3) BCLR 177 (CC), [2009] ZACC 32 ..... 50.4*(h)(ii)(bb)(z)*

Heatherdale Farms (Pty) Ltd v Deputy Minister of Agriculture and Another 1980 (3) SA 476 (T) ..... 63.5*(e)*

Heffron International Society for Krishna Consciousness 452 US 640 (1981) ..... 43.3*(b)*(i)

Hekpoort Environmental Preservation Society and Another v Minister of Land Affairs and Others 1998 (1) SA 349 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1537 (CC) ..... 5.3*(d), 59.4(a)*(iv)

Henri du Plessis Trust v Kammies (unreported, LCC Case No 77R/01, 3 September 2001) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)

Hermansberg Mission Society v Commissioner for Native Affairs and Another 1906 TS 135 ..... 26.6*(c)*(iii)

Heynes v Venter 2004 (3) SA 200 (T) ..... 42.9*(a)*

Heystek v Heystek 2002 (2) SA 754 (T), [2002] 2 All SA 401 (T) ..... 47.3*(a), 47.3(b)*

Hichange Investments (Pty) Ltd v Cape Produce (Pty) Ltd t/a Pelt Products and Others 2004 (2) SA 393 (E) ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(bb)(x)*(3)

High School Ermelo and Another v Head of Department Mpumalanga Department of Education and Others [2007] ZAGPHC 232 (17 October 2007) ..... 57.3*(c)(ii), 57.3(c)*(vi)

Highveldridge Residents Concerned Party v Highveldridge Transitional Local Council and Others 2002 (6) SA 66 (T), 2003 (1) BCLR 72 (T) .... 7.2*(c)(ii), 7.2(c)(v), 7.2(d), 34.6, 56B.4(c)*(i)

Hindry v Nedcor Bank Ltd and Another 1999 (2) SA 757 (W) ..... 63.5*(e)*

Hira and Another v Booysen and Another 1992 (4) SA 69 (A) ..... 63.4, 59.4*(c)*(ii)

Hix Networking Technologies v System Publishers (Pty) Ltd 1997 (1) SA 391 (A), [1996] 4 All SA 675 (A) ..... 9.5*(c)(i), 38.2(b)(ii), 42.9(a)*

Hlantlalala v Dyanti NO 1999 (2) SACR 541 (SCA) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)

Hlatshwayo and Another v Hein 1999 (2) SA 834 (LCC), 1998 (1) BCLR 123 (LCC) ..... 59.4*(a)*(vii)
Hleka v Johannesburg City Council 1949 (1) SA 842 (A) ..... 32.3*(a), 32.5(c)*
HL&H Timber Products (Pty) Ltd v Sappi Manufacturing (Pty) Ltd 2001 (4) SA 814 (SCA) ..... 50.4*(b)(ii)(ff)*
Hlophe v Constitutional Court of South Africa and Others 2009 (2) BCLR 161 (W) ..... 9.2*(c)(iii)(ff), 9.5(b)(i), 9.5(b)(ii), 63.2(a)*
HMBMP Properties (Pty) Ltd v King 1981 (1) SA 906 (N) ..... 59.4*(a)(ii), 32.5(c)*
Hoërskool Ermelo en 'n Ander v Departmentshoof van die Mpumalanga Onderwysdepartement (unreported, TPD Case No 3062/07, [2007] ZAGPHC 4 (2 February 2007) ..... 58.7*(b), 57.3(c)*(vi)
Hoërskool Victoria-Wes en Andere v Die Departementshoof, Departement van Onderwys, Noord-Kaapse Provinsiale Regering (unreported, Northern Cape Division Case No 357/2004) ..... 57.3*(c)*(vi)
Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC) ..... 2.2*(a), 5.3(a), 8.1(b), 8.1(c), 8.2, 25.2(c)(i), 9.2(e)(i), 9.2(e)(ii), 9.2(e)(iii)(bb), 9.5(c)(iii), 31.4(f), 31.4(f)(i), 31.4(f)(ii), 34.7(c)(i), 35.1(b), 35.1(d), 35.5(e), 35.5(g)(vii), 35.5(h)(i), 35.5(h)(iii), 35.5(i), 35.7, 36.4(a), 40.8(a), 48.4, 52.8, 53.2(c), 56D.5(c)(ii), 56D.6(f), 62.6, 63.3(b)*
Hofmeyr v Minister of Justice 1992 (3) SA 108 (C) ..... 18.2*(b)*
Hoho v The State [2008] ZASCA 98 ..... 42.9*(a)* Holi v Tyantyaza (1923) 5 NAC 206 ..... 26.6*(a)* Holomisa v Argus Newspapers Ltd 1996 (2) SA 588 (W), [1996] 1 All SA 478 (W), 1996 (6) BCLR 836 (W) ..... 31.2*(d)(vi), 31.4(e)(x), 32.4(c), 34.8(c)(i), 38.2(c)(i), 38.3(a)(i), 42.4, 42.5(b), 42.5(c), 42.7(d), 42.9(a)*, 43.1
Holomisa v Khumalo and Others 2002 (3) SA 38 (T) ..... 31.4*(a)(i), 31.4(a)(v), 31.4(d)(i), 36.4(b)(iii), 42.5(c), 42.9(a)*
Holtzhauzen v Roodt 1997 (4) SA 766 (W) ..... 52.7*(b)*
Howells v S [1999] 2 All SA 233 (C) ..... 47.3*(b)*
Howe v Mabuya 1961 (2) SA 635 (N) 52.9
Howick District Landowners Association v uMgeni Municipalilty (Unreported Natal High Court Case No 7366 / 04, 7 December 2004) ..... 22.5*(e)*
HTF Developers (Pty) Ltd v the Minister & Others 2006 (5) SA 512 (T) ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(bb)(y), 50.4(e)*
HTF Developers (Pty) Ltd v the Minister of Environmental Affairs 2007 (5) SA 438 (SCA) ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(bb)(y), 50.4(e)*
Hugo v President of the Republic of South Africa and Another 1996 (4) SA 1012 (D), 1996 BCLR 876 (D), [1996] 1 All SA 454 (D) ..... 49.3*(b)*(ii)
Hugo v President of the Republic of South Africa and Another 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) ..... 9.5*(b)*(i)
Human and Rousseau Uitgewers (Edms) Bpk v Snyman NO 1978 (3) SA 836 (T) ..... 41.1*(a)*

Human Rights Commission of South Africa v SABC 2003 (1) BCLR 92 (BCCSA) ..... 42.8*(c), 42.9(h)*
Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd v Smith NO 2000 (1) SACR 503 (T), 2000 (2) SA 934 (T), [2000] 1 All SA 259 (T) ..... 38.5*(b)*

I

IMATU v MEC Local Government, Mpumalanga 2002 (1) SA 76 (SCA) .. 22.6*(b)*
Independent Electoral Commission v Langeberg Municipality 2001 (3) SA 925 (CC), 2001 (9) BCLR 883 (CC) ..... 12.3*(b)(iii), 14.3(b)(i), 14.3(b)(ii), 14.3(c)(i), 14.3(c)(iii), 22.2(a), 22.3(b)(vi), 24B.2, 24C.4(a), 24C.4(b), 24E.2(b), 24F.4(c), 25.2(c)(i), 29.7(c), 31.4(f), 32.4(c), 62.6, 7.2(c), 7.4(c)*
Independent Municipal & Allied Trade Workers Union & another v City of Cape Town (2005) 26 ILJ 1404 (LC), [2005] 11 BLLR 1084 (LC) ..... 35.5*(g)*(vii)
Independent Newspapers Holdings Ltd and Others v Suliman [2004] 3 All SA 137 SCA ..... 42.9*(a)*
Independent Newspapers (Pty) Ltd v Minister for Intelligence Services; Freedom of Expression Institute In re: Masetlha v President of the Republic of South Africa and Another 2008 (5) SA 31 (CC), 2008 (8) BCLR 771 (CC), [2008] ZACC 6 ..... 23B.1, 23B.5*(c)(ii)(bb), 23B.5(3)(b)(iv), 42.4, 42.9(c), 42.9(g), 59.4(b)(v), 63.2(b), 63.3(c)*
Ingledew v Financial Services Board: In re Financial Services Board v Van der Merwe and Another 2003 (4) SA 584 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 825 (CC) ..... 4.2*(b), 4.3(d)(iii), 4.4, 5.3(e), 18.2(b),31.1(c), 31.4(a)(v), 34.7(a), 40.7(c)(ii), 43.2(b)*(ii)
Ingram v Minister of Justice 1962 (3) SA 225 (W) ..... 38.3*(a)*(iv)
Inhoek Varkboerdery (Edms) Bpk v Kok (unreported, LCC Case No 03R /05, 4 February 2005) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Inkatha Freedom Party v Truth and Reconciliation Commission 2000 (3) SA 119 (C), 2000 (5) BCLR 534 (C) ..... 31.2*(d)(ii), 31.4(f), 31.4(f)(i), 62.5(a)*, 62.6, 62.7
In re Certain Amicus Curiae Applications: Minister of Health and Others v Treatment Action Campaign and Others 2002 (5) SA 713 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1023 (CC), [2002] ZACC 15 ..... 5.3*(a)(ii), 8.3(c), 8.3(g)*
In re Chikweche 1995 (4) SA 284 (ZS), 1995 (4) BCLR 533 (ZS) ..... 41.2*(b)(i), 41.3(a), 47.5(b)*
In re Chinamasa 2001 (2) SA 902 (ZS), 2001 (1) SACR 278, 2000 (12) BCLR 1294 (Z) ..... 42.7*(c), 42.9(c), 51.1(a)(iii), 51.5(e)(i), 52.4(a)*(ii)
In re Constitutionality of the Mpumalanga Petitions Bill, 2000 2002 (1) SA 447 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1126 (CC) ..... 4.3*(b)(ii)(aa), 4.3(b)(ii)(bb), 5.3(b)(i), 10.3(d)(i), 19.2(c), 19.6, 20.2(b)*
In re Former Highlands Residents: Sonny v Department of Land Affairs 2000 (2) SA 351 (LCC) ..... 32.3*(a), 32.3(b)*
In re Kranspoort Community 2000 (2) SA 124 (LCC) ..... 48.8*(c)(ii), 56C.3(b)(i), 56C.3(b)*(ii)
In re Mlambo 1992 (4) SA 144 (ZS), 1992 (2) SACR 245 (ZS) ..... 51.2, 51.5*(f)*

In re Munhumeso and Others 1995 (1) SA 551 (ZS) , 1994 (1) ZLR 49 (SC), 1995 (2) BCLR 125 (ZS) ..... 43.1, 43.2*(b)(ii), 43.3(b)(ii), 43.3(b)*(iv)
In re Muskwe 1993 (2) SA 514 (ZH) ..... 51.5*(e)(i) Institute for Democracy in South Africa and Others v African National Congress and Others 2005 (5) SA 39 (C), 2005 (10) BCLR 995 (C), [2005] ZAWCHC 30 ..... 6.3(a), 17.8(a), 23A.4, 24A.4(a)(i), 31.4(e)(vii) Appendix(4)(a), 45.3, 45.4, 45.8, 63.3(b)*
Institute for Security Studies: In re S v Basson 2006 (6) SA 195 (CC), 2006 (2) SACR 350 (CC) ..... 8.3*(c), 8.3(d), 8.3(e), 59.4(b)*(ii)
Inter-Science Research and Development Services (Pty) Ltd v Republica Popular de Mocambique 1980 (2) SA 111 (T) ..... 30.4*(c)*
Intertrade Two (Pty) Limited v MEC for Roads and Public Works, Eastern Cape and Another 2007 (6) SA 442 (CkHC) 63.9
Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences and Others v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd and Others: In re Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd and Others v Smit NO and Others 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (2) SACR 349 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC). ..... 3.3*(e), 4.3(d)(i), 6.2(e), 9.4(b)(i), 9.4(b)(ii), 24A.4(b)(iii), 24B.3(b), 31.3, 31.3(d), 31.4(b)(v), 31.4(e)(v), 32.3(b), 32.5(b), 34.8(c)(ii), 34.8(c)(iii), 36.4(e), 38.1, 38.3(a)(i), 38.3(a)(ii), 38.4, 46.2(a), 46.2(b), 59.3(a)(i), 63.2(a)* Investments (Pty) Ltd v Micro Finance Regulatory Council and Another 2007 (1) SA 343 (CC), 2006 (11) BCLR 1255 (CC) ..... 32.4*(c)*
Isaacs v Independent Newspaper Group (Pty) Ltd (unreported WLD 3 November 2000) ..... 42.9*(a)*
Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC) ..... 4.4, 5.3*(e)(i), 5.3(e)(ii), 9.4(d)(ii), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 10.3(a), 10.4(a), 34.7(a), 34.8(c)(i), 36.4(h)(ii), 42.3, 42.4, 42.7(c), 42.7(d), 42.7(e), 42.7(g), 42.8, 42.8(c), 43.3(b)(iii), 57.4(c)(ii)(aa)*
Islamic Unity Convention v Minister of Telecommunications and Others (Unreported WLD Case No 3431/06, 26 April 2007) ..... 12.3*(d)(iv), 59.4(c)*(vi)
Ismail v Ismail 1983 (1) SA 1006 (A) ..... 11.3*(b), 41.1(a), 41.6, 64.4(b)*(ii)

J

J v M Ltd (1989) 10 ILJ 755 (IC) ..... 40.8*(b)*
J and Another v Director General, Department of Home Affairs and Others 2003 (5) SA 605 (D) ..... 47.3*(a)*
J and Another v Director General, Department of Home Affairs and Others 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC), [2003] ZACC 3 ..... 3.7*(b)(i), 9.4(a), 9.4(d), 9.4(d)(iii), 9.4(e)(i)(bb)*,

9.4*(e)(i)(cc), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 17.5(b), 34.6, 35.5(g)(iii), 35.5(g)(v), 36.4(a), 36.4(b), 47.10(c), 47.3(a)*

JD van Niekerk en Genote Ing v Administrateur, Transvaal 1994 (1) SA 595 (A) ..... 6.2*(l)*(ii)

JR 1013 Investments CC and Others v Minister of Safety and Security and Others 1997 (7) BCLR 950 (E) ..... 54.2*(a)*

JT Publishing (Pty) Ltd and Another v Minister of Safety and Security and Others 1997 (3) SA 514 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1599 (CC) ..... 3.4*(a), 38.3(b)(v), 7.4(c)*

Jacobs en 'n Ander v Waks en Andere 1992 (1) SA 521 (A) ..... 7.2*(b)*

Jacobs v Department of Land Affairs (unreported, LCC Case No 3/98, 28 February 2000) ..... 48.8*(c)*(ii)

Jaco Hough Boerdery Trust v Smith (unreported, LCC Case No 15R/04, 3 March 2004) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)

Jacot-Guillarmod v Provincial Government, Gauteng, and Another 1999 (3) SA 594 (T) ..... 43.3*(a)*(iv)

Jaftha v Schoeman and Others; Van Rooyen v Stoltz and Others 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC), [2004] ZACC 25 ..... 6.2*(a), 9.2(c)(iii)(cc), 9.4(d)(iii), 10.3(c), 34.5(b)(ii), 34.8(c)(i), 34.8(e)(ii), 55.5, 55.6, 56B.4(c)(i), 56C.3(a), 56C.3(b)(ii), 56D.3(a), 56D.6, 57.2(a)(i)(bb), 57.2(b)(ii)(bb), 59.3(a)(v), 59.4(a)*(iv)

Jaga v Dönges NO and Another; Bhana v Dönges NO and Another 1950 (4) SA 653 (A) ..... 32.3*(a), 32.5(c)*

Jaipal v S 2005 (4) SA 581 (CC), 2005 (5) BCLR 423 (CC) ..... 9.6*(c)(ii)(bb)*

Jajbhay v Cassim 1939 AD 537 ..... 4.3*(d)(i)(aa)*

Jamalodien v Ajimudien 1917 CPD 293 ..... 51.1*(b)(iii), 51.4(b)(iii), 55.6, 55.6(d)*

Jamiat-Ul-Ulama of Transvaal v Johncom Media Investment Ltd and Others [2006] ZAGPHC 12 ..... 9.2*(b)(iv), 42.9(b)*

Janit v Motor Industry Fund Administrators (Pty) Ltd 1995 (4) SA 293 (A) ..... 38.3*(a)*(iii)

Jansen van Vuuren and Another NNO v Kruger 1993 (4) SA 842 (A) ..... 34.8*(e)(ii), 36.1(b), 38.2(a)(ii), 38.2(a)(iii), 38.2(c)(i), 38.3(c), 42.9(b)*

Jansen van Vuuren en Andere v Van der Merwe en Andere 1992 (1) SA 124 (A) ..... 50.4*(a)*

Janse van Rensburg NO and Another v Minister of Trade and Industry NNO and Another 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC) ..... 5.3*(a)(ii), 5.3(c), 7.4(c), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.4(d)(ii), 9.4(e)(i)(cc), 9.5(c)(ii), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 24A.4(b)(iii), 34.7(c)(ii), 34.8(c)(iii), 54.3, 56B.4(c)(i), 63.4, 63.5(b), 63.5(c)*

Janse van Rensburg NO v Minister van Handel en Nywerheid en 'n Ander 1999 (2) BCLR 204 (T) ..... 17.5*(e)(i), 24B.3(b), 38.3(a)(ii), 38.3(b)(iii), 38.5(b), 46.5(b)*, 46.6, 54.3

Jayiya v MEC for Welfare, Eastern Cape, and Another 2004 (2) SA 611 (SCA), 2004 (8) BCLR 821 (SCA) ..... 56D.3*(f)(ii), 59.4(d)*
Jeeva and Others v Receiver of Revenue, Port Elizabeth and Others 1995 (2) SA 433 (SE) ..... 34.7*(a)*
Jeftha v Williams 1981 (3) SA 678 (C) ..... 38.2*(c)*(ii)
Jerpis Trading (Pty) Ltd v Westsun Hotel (Pty) Ltd and Others 1984 (2) SA 431 (D) ..... 63.3*(b)*(vii)
Johannesburg City Council v Administrator, Transvaal, and Another 1969 (2) SA 72 (T) 63.9
Johannesburg City Council v Television and Electrical Distributors ((Pty) Ltd 1997 (1) SA 157 (A) ..... 50.4*(h)(ii)(ff)*
Johannesburg Consolidated Investment Company Ltd v Johannesburg Town Council 1903 TS 111 ..... 6.2*(l)*(ii), 63.1
Johannesburg Country Club v Stott and Another 2004 (5) SA 511 (SCA) ..... 39.5*(a)*
Johannesburg Municipal Pension Fund and Others v City of Johannesburg and Others 2005 (6) SA 273 (W) 23A.3, 23A.4
Johannesburg Stock Exchange and Another v Witwatersrand Nigel Ltd and Another 1988 (3) SA 132 (A) ..... 63.3*(b)*
Johnson v Beckett 1992 (1) SA 762 (A) ..... 38.2*(c)(i) Johnson v Jockey Club of South Africa 1910 W.L.D. 136 ..... 44.1(c)*(vi)
Johnson v Minister of Home Affairs 1997 (2) SA 432 (C) ..... 36.4*(c)*(iii)
Johnson v Rand Daily Mails 1928 AD 190 ..... 38.2*(c)(i) Jooste v Botha 2000 (2) SA 199 (T), 2000 (2) BCLR 187 (T) ..... 47.3(a), 47.3(b)*
Jooste v Score Supermarket Trading 1999 (2) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 139 (CC) ..... 3.3*(d), 5.2, 35.2(a)(ii), 59.3(a)(v), 59.4(d)*
Joseph & Others v The City of Johannesburg & Others 2010 (4) SA 55 (CC), 2010 (3) BCLR 212 (CC), [2009] ZACC 30 ..... 56B.4*(c), 56B.5(b)*
Joubert and Others v Van Rensburg and Others 2001 (1) SA 753 (W) ..... 34.7*(c)(ii), 48.3, 48.6(a), 48.7(b)(iv), 48.7(c)*
Joubert v Venter 1985 (1) SA 654 (A) ..... 38.2*(c)(i) Juglal NO and Another v Shoprite Checkers (Pty) Ltd t/a OK Franchise Division 2004 (5) SA 248 (SCA) ..... 31.4(e)(iii), 59.4(a)(i) Julies and Others v Speaker of the National Assembly and Others 2006 (4) SA 13 (C), [2006] 4 All 457 (C) ..... 22.2(b)*(iii)

K

K v Minister of Safety and Security 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC) ..... 4.3*(a)(i), 4.3(d)(i)(aa), 4.3(h)(i)(aa), 9.2(f)(ii), 9.5(a)(i), 9.5(a)(iii), 23B.3(c)(iii), 31.4(e)(x), 34.1(c), 32.5(b), 32.5(c), 34.7(c)(i), 40.5(b)*(i)
K v The Regional Court Magistrate NO and Others 1996 (1) SACR 434 (E) ..... 51.5*(g), 52.6(a)*(ii)
Kaffraria Property Co (Pty) Ltd v Government of the Republic of Zambia 1980 (2) SA 709 (E) ..... 30.2*(a)*
Kahn v Louw NO and Another 1951 (2) SA 194 (C) ..... 41.1*(a)*
Kalamazoo Division (Pty) Ltd v Gay 1978 (2) SA 184 (C) ..... 42.7*(c)*
Kalla and Another v The Master and Others 1995 (1) SA 261 (T), 1994 (4) BCLR 79 (T) ..... 32.1*(c), 41.1(a), 41.6, 44.3(c)*(iii)
Kanhym Bpk v Oudtshoorn Munisipaliteit 1990 (3) SA 252 (C) ..... 32.3*(a)* Katekwe v Muchabaiwa 1984 (2) ZLR 112 (SC) 41.6

Kate v MEC for Welfare, Eastern Cape 2005 (1) SA 141 (SE), [2005] 1 All SA 745 (SE) ..... 9.5*(a)(ii), 23A.4, 56D.3(f)*(ii)
Kauesa v Minister of Home Affairs 1995 (1) SA 51 (Nm) ..... 34.1*(c), 36.4(h)*(iii)
Kaunda and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2005 (1) SACR 111 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC) ..... 3.7*(c), 5.3(a)(ii), 9.2(b)(i), 9.2(c)(iii)(bb), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 9.5(c)(iii), 10.3(a), 11.4, 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 13.2(a), 13.3, 13.5(a), 13.7(b), 18.3(j), 18.3(k), 23C.1, 23C.3(c), 23C.4, 30.2(a), 30.4(d), 31.3(a)(i), 31.6, 31.6(a), 31.6(b), 32.4(c), 32.5(c), 39.5(a), 39.7, 40.7(c)(ii), 47.2(b), 59.4(d), 60.2, 60.3, 60.6, 61.3(a), 63.3(c), 66.1(a)*(ii)
Kekane v Mokgoko 1953 NAC 93 (NE) ..... 26.6*(c)(iii), 26.6(d)*(iii)
Kergeulen Sealing and Whaling Com Ltd v Commissioner of Inland Revenue 1939 AAD 487 ..... 4.3*(h)(ii)(bb)*
Kerzner v Jonathan Ball Publishers (Pty) Ltd (unreported WLD Case No 97/29966 10 December 19997) ..... 42.9*(c)*
Key v Attorney General, Cape Provincial Division, and Another 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC), 1996 (2) SACR 113 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 788 (CC) ..... 31.8*(a), 32.4(c), 38.3(a)(ii), 51.1(b)(ii), 51.1(b)(iv), 51.3(f), 51.4(b)(ii), 51.4(b)(iii), 51.5(b), 51.5(j)(ii), 51.5(m), 52.2(a), 52.2(b), 52.10(b), 52.10(g)*
Khala v Minister of Safety and Security 1994 (4) SA 218 (W), 1994 (2) BCLR 89 (W) ..... 32.3*(b), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 34.7(a), 51.5(c), 62.1, 52.6(d)*
Khosa and Others v Minister of Social Development and Others; Mahlaule and Others v Minister of Social Development and Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC), [2004] ZACC 11 ..... 3.7*(a), 3.7(b)(i), 4.3(b)(iii), 5.3(c), 9.4(d)(iii), 10.4(c), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 13.5(a), 17.4(c), 17.6(a)(ii)(aa), 34.1(b), 34.5(b)(ii), 34.6, 34.8(e)(ii), 35.1(d)(i), 35.1(d)(iii), 35.4(f), 35.5(e), 35.5(g)(iv), 35.5(g)(ix), 35.5(h)(i), 35.5(h)(iii), 35.5(i), 35.7, 36.2(e), 36.3(d), 36.4(g), 36.4(i), 36.5(a)(ii), 36.5(b), 39.8, 42.6(a), 47.1, 47.4(b), 47.10(b), 55.2(b), 55.3(b), 55.3(c), 56A.2(a), 56A.2(b)*(vi),

56A.2*(b)(vii), 56A.2(c), 56B.3(b)(i), 56C.3(a), 56C.3(b), 56C.3(b)(iii), 56D.3(e), 56D.3(f)(i), 57.2(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(bbb)(xx), 60.3, 64.6(a), 66.1(a)(iii), 66.1(d)*(ii)

Khosa and Others v Minister of Social Development and others (unreported, TPD Case No 25455/02) ..... 56D.3*(f)*(i)

Khumalo and Others v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC) ..... 3.3*(a), 3.6, 5.3(e), 5.3(e)(i), 9.2(f)(iiI), 9.5(a)(i), 10.4(a), 11.2(a), 11.2(b)(i), 13.6, 31.1(a), 31, Appendix, 31 Appendix(1), 31 Appendix(2), 31 Appendix(3)(a), 31 Appendix(3)(b), 31 Appendix(4)(a), 31.1(b), 31.1(c), 31.2(b)(ii), 31.2(d)(v), 31.3, 31.3(d), 31.4(a), 31.4(a)(ii), 31.4(a)(iii), 31.4(a)(iv), 31.4(a)(v), 31.4(b)(i), 31.4(b)(ii), 31.4(b)(iii), 31.4(b)(iv), 31.4(b)(v), 31.4(c)(i), 31.4(c)(ii), 31.4(c)(iii), 31.4(d)(i), 31.4(d)(ii), 31.4(e)(i), 31.4(e)(ii), 31.4(e)(iii), 31.4(e)(x), 31.4(f)(i), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 34.1(a), 34.5(b)(ii), 34.8(c)(ii), 36.3(d), 36.4(h)(iii), 38.2(a)(ii), 38.2(a)(iii), 38.2(c)(i), 38.3(c), 42.3, 42.4, 42.5, 42.5(b), 42.6(b), 42.7(d), 42.9(a), 43.3(a)(iv), 44.3(a)(i), 46.2(a), 52.4(a)(ii), 53.1(a)*(i)

Khumalo NO v Minister of Land Affairs and Another 2005 (2) SA 618 (LCC) ..... 48.8*(c)*(iii)

Khumalo v Potgieter [2000] 2 B All SA 456 (LCC) ..... 46.8*(b)*(i)

Kidson v SA Associated Newspapers Ltd 1957 (3) SA 461 (W) ..... 38.2*(a)(ii), 38.2(a)(iii), 38.2(b)(i), 38.2(c)(i), 38.2(c)*(ii)

Kilian v Gauteng Provincial Legislature 1999 (2) BCLR 225 (T) ..... 19.1*(d)*(ii)

Kilian v Geregsbode, Uitenhage 1980 (1) SA 808 (A) 6.1

Kiliko and Others v Minister of Home Affairs and Others 2007 (4) BCLR 416 (C) ..... 9.6*(c)(ii)(bb), 9.6(c)(v), 50.4(h)(ii)(bb)(z)*

King and Others v Attorneys Fidelity Fund Board of Control and Another 2006 (1) SA 474 (SCA), 2006 (4) BCLR 442 (SCA) ..... 4.3*(b)(v), 10.3(d), 10.3(d)(ii), 32.3(c), 32.5(b)*

King v Dykes 1971 (3) SA 540 (RA) ..... 50.4*(f)*

King William's Town Transitional Local Council v Border Alliance Taxi Association (BATA) 2000 (3) BCLR 295 (E) ..... 63.3*(b)*
Kirkpatrick v Bezuidenhout 1934 TPD 155 ..... 38.2*(c)*(ii)
Kiva v Minister of Correctional Services (2007) 28 ILJ 597 (E) ..... 63.3*(c), 63.7(b)*
Kleingeld v Heunis and Another 2007 (5) SA 559 (T) ..... 47.3*(a)*
Klein v Attorney-General, WLD 1995 (3) SA 848 (W), 1995 (2) SACR 210 (W) ..... 38.3*(a)(i), 51.1(b)*(iii)
Klein v Dainfern College and Another 2006 (3) SA 73 (T) ..... 63.2*(c)*
Klink v Government of Republic of South Africa and Others 1997 (10) BCLR 1453 (E) ..... 9.5*(c)*(iii)
Klink v Regional Court Magistrate NO and Others 1996 (3) BCLR 402 (E) ..... 51.1*(b)(iv), 51.5(e)(ii), 51.5(g), 51.5.(i), 51.5(k)*
Kloppenberg v Minister of Justice 1964 (4) SA 31 (N) ..... 51.3*(b)*
Knox D'Arcy Ltd and Another v Shaw and Another 1996 (2) SA 651 (W), 1995 (12) BCLR 1702 (W) ..... 36.4*(f), 41.4(d), 44.3(c)*(iv), 54.4
Kohlhaas v Chief Immigration Officer and Another 1998 (3) SA 1142 (ZS), 1997 (2) ZLR 441 (ZS), 1998 (6) BCLR 751 (ZS) ..... 66.1*(d)(i) Kolbatschenko v King NO and Another 2001 (4) SA 336 (C), 2003 (3) BCLR 288 (C) ..... 63.3(b)*
Komani v Bantu Affairs Administration Board, Peninsular Area 1980 (4) SA (A) ..... 2.3*(g)*
Kommissaris van Korrektiewe Dienste v Malaza 1996 (1) SA 1143 (W) ..... 49.3*(b)*(ii)
Konyn and Others v Special Investigating Unit 1999 (1) SA 1001 (Tk) ..... 32.3*(a)* Koortzen and Others v Prosecutor-General and Others 1997 (10) BCLR 1478 (Nm) ..... 51.5*(c)*
Korf v Health Professions Council of South Africa 2000 (1) SA 1171 (T), 2000 (3) BCLR 309 (T) ..... 31.2*(d)(ii), 31.4(f)(i), 31.4(f)*(ii), 62.6
Kotze, Ex parte 2004 (3) SA 74 (B) ..... 47.11*(b)*
Kotze v Genis (Edms) Bpk en 'n Ander v Potgieter en Andere 1995 (3) SA 783 (C), 1995 (3) BCLR 349 (C) ..... 36.4*(f), 44.3(c)*(iv), 54.4
Kotze v Kotze 2003 (3) SA 628 (T) ..... 41.4*(c), 41.4(d), 47.10(b)*
Kotze v Minister of Health and Another 1996 (3) BCLR 417 (T) ..... 63.6*(a)* Kritzinger v Perskorporasie van Suid-Afrika (Edms) Bpk 1981 (2) SA 373 (O) ..... 38.2*(b)(iii), 38.3(b)*(v)
Kruger v Johnnic Publishing (Pty) Ltd and Another 2004 (4) SA 306 (T) ... 24B.3*(a)* Kruger v Le Roux 1987 (1) SA 866 (A) ..... 50.4*(a)*
Kruger v President of the Republic of South Africa 2009 (1) SA 417 (CC), 2009 BCLR 268 (CC), [2008] ZACC 17 ..... 17.3*(e), 63.3(b)*
Kruger v The Minister of Correctional Services and Others 1995 (2) SA 803 (T), 1995 (1) SACR 375 (T) ..... 49.3*(b)*(ii)
Kuena v Minister of Native Affairs 1955 (4) SA 281 (T) ..... 26.6*(d)*(iii)
Kutumela v Member of the Executive Committee for Social Services, Culture, Arts and Sport in the North West Province (unreported, BPD Case No 671/ 2003, 23 October 2003) ..... 56C.3*(b)*(iii)

L

LS v AT and Another 2001 (2) BCLR 152 (CC) ..... 6.2*(f), 34.8(c)(ii), 34.8(c)*(iii)
Lady Agasim-Pereira v Johnni Publishing Eastern Cape (Pty) Ltd and Orhwea [2003] 2 All SA 416(SE) ..... 42.9*(a)* Laerskool Middelburg en 'n Ander v Departementshoof, Mpumalanga Departement van Onderwys, en Andere 2003 (4) SA 160 (T), [2002] 4 All SA 745 (T) ..... 36.4*(d)(ii), 44.3(c)(iii), 47.10(c), 57.3(c)(vi), 58.7(b)*

La Grange v Schoeman and Others 1980 (1) SA 885 (E) ..... 38.2*(a)(iii), 38.2(b)(ii), 38.2(c)(i) Landbounavorsingsraad v Klaasen 2005 (3) SA 410 (LCC) ..... 48.7(b)*(iv)
Landman and Another v Ndlozi; Landman and Another v Gama 2005 (4) SA 89 (LCC) ..... 48.6*(b)*(i)
Lane and Fey NNO v Dabelstein and Others 2001 (2) SA 1187 (CC), 2001 (4) BCLR 312 (CC) ..... 4.3*(a)(i), 4.3(g)(ii), 11.2(b)(i), 59.4(b), 59.4(d)*
Langemaat v Minister of Safety and Security and Others 1998 (3) SA 312 (T), 1998 (4) BCLR 444 (T) ..... 32.4*(b), 35.5(g)*(v)
Lappeman Diamond Cutting Works v MIB Group Ltd 1997 (4) SA 908 (W) ..... 31.2*(d)(vi), 59.4(a)*(viii)
Larbi-Odam and Others v Member of the Executive Council for Education (North-West Province) and Another 1998 (1) SA 745 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1655 (CC) ..... 6.2*(a), 9.4(c), 34.7(a), 35.1(d)(i), 35.5(e)*
Lasky & Another v Showzone CC & Others 2007 (2) SA 48 (C) ..... 50.3*(b)*(i)(x)(1)
Laubscher v Laubscher 2004 (4) SA 350 (T) ..... 52.4*(a)*(ii)
Laubscher v Native Commissioner, Piet Retief 1958 (1) SA 546 (A) ..... 63.3*(c)*
Laugh It Off Promotions CC v SAB International (Finance) BV t/a Sabmark International (Freedom of Expression Institute as Amicus Curiae) 2006 (1) SA 144 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 743 (CC) ..... 6.2*(a), 10.4(a), 31.3(d), 32.5(b), 34.8(c)(i), 42.4, 42.7(c), 42.7(g), 42.9(c), 42.9(d), 42.9(g), 59.3(a)(i) Laugh It Off Promotions CC v SA Breweries International (Finance) BV t/a Sabmark International 2005 (2) SA 46 (SCA), [2004] 4 All SA 151 (SCA) ..... 42.7(g), 42.9(d)*
Law Society of South Africa v Minister for Transport and Another 2011 (1) SA 400 (C), 2011 (2) BCLR 150 (C), [2010] ZACC 25 ..... 56D.2, 56D.3*(f)*(i)
Law Society of the Transvaal v Machaka and Others (No 2) 1998 (4) SA 413 (T) 54.5
Law Society of the Transvaal v Tloubatla 1999 (11) BCLR 1275, [1999] 4 All SA 59 (T) ..... 44.1, 44.1*(d), 44.3(c)*(iv)
Lawyers for Human Rights and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Another 2003 (8) BCLR 891 (T) ..... 34.8*(c)(iv), 40.3(c)(i), 40.3(d), 40.4(a), 52.2(b)*
Lawyers for Human Rights and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Another 2004 (4) SA 125 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 775 (CC) ..... 5.3*(c), 9.2(e)(iv)(aa), 9.4(b)(ii), 9.4(d)(iii), 31.3(a)(i), 40.2(a), 40.3(c)(i), 51.2, 51.3(b), 51.3(c), 51.3(e), 64.6(a), 66.1(a)(ii), 66.1(a)*(iii)
Lebowa Granite (Pty) Ltd v Lebowa Mineral Trust and Another 1999 (4) SA 375 (T), 1999 (8) BCLR 908 (T) .....
Lebowa Mineral Trust Beneficiaries Forum v President of the Republic of South Africa 2002 (1) BCLR 23 (T) ..... 46.3*(b), 46.3(c), 46.5(a)*
Lebowa Mineral Trust v Lebowa Granite (Pty) Ltd 2002 (3) SA 30 (T) 24B.1
Lees Import and Export (Pvt) Ltd v Zimbabwe Banking Corporation Ltd 1999 (4) SA 1119 (ZS), 1999 (10) BCLR 1181 (ZS) ..... 59.3*(a)*(i)
Legal Aid Board (Ex Parte) v Pretorius and Another [2007] 1 All SA 458 (SCA) ..... 59.4*(b)*(i)
Legal Aid Board v Msila and Others 1997 (2) BCLR 229 (E) ..... 51.1*(a)(iv), 51.5(g), 51.5(h), 59.4(b)*(i)
Legal Aid Board v R and Another 2009 (2) SA 262 (D) 47.8

Leibman v Attorney-General 1950 (1) SA 607 (W) ..... 51.4*(d)*
Lenco v Holdings Ltd and others v Eckstein and Others 1996 (2) SA 693 (N) ..... 38.3*(a)(iii), 52.10(f)*
Le Roux v Direkteur-Generaal van Handel en Nywerheid 1997 (4) SA 174 (T), 1997 (8) BCLR 1048 (T) ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(aa)(u)*, 62.7
Le Roux v Provincial Administration (OFS) 1943 OPD 1 ..... 32.3*(a)* Lesapo v North-West Agricultural Bank 2000 (1) SA 409 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1420 (CC) ..... 17.3*(b), 34.2(c), 34.8(c)(ii), 34.8(c)(iii), 34.8(c)(iv), 34.8(c)*(v)
Levack v Regional Magistrate Wynberg 2003 (1) SACR 187 (SCA) ..... 52.4*(c)*(ii)
Levak and Others v Regional Magistrate, Wynberg 2003 (1) SACR 187 (SCA) ..... 51.4*(b)(iii), 51.5(j)*(ii)
Lewis v Minister of Internal Affairs and Another 1991 (3) SA 628 (B) ..... 31.3*(a)(i), 32.1(a), 66.1(a)*(iii)
Lewis v The State [2007] SCA 3 RSA ..... 42.9*(c)*
LF Boshoff Investments (Pty) Ltd v Cape Town Municipality 1969 (2) SA 256 (C) ..... 50.4(i)(bb)
Lieberthal v Primedia Broadcasting (Pty) Ltd 2003 (5) SA 39 (W) ..... 42.9*(a)*
Lifestyle Amusement Centre (Pty) Ltd and Others v The Minister of Justice and Others 1995(1) BCLR 104 (C) ..... 7.2*(c)*(iii)
Lingwood and Anther v The unlawful occupiers of R/E pf Erf 9 Highlands 2008 (3) BCLR 325 (W) ..... 9.6*(c)*(vi)
List v Jungers 1979 (3) SA 106 (A) ..... 27.5*(c)*
Livestock and Meat Industries Control Board v Garda 1961 (1) SA 342 (A) 63.9
Lloyd Chaduka and Morgenster College v Enita Mandizvidza, Judgment No SC 114/2001, Civil Appeal No 298/2000) (Zimbabwe Supreme Court) 37.4
Lodi v MEC for Nature and Conservation and Tourism, Gauteng, and Others 2005 (3) SA 381 (T), 2005 (1) SACR 556 (T) ..... 51.5(i), 52.4*(a)*(iii)
Logbro Properties CC v Bedderson NO and Others 2003 (2) SA 460 (SCA), [2003] 1 All SA 424 (SCA) ..... 25.8, 63.3*(b)*
Loggenberg and Others v Robberts and Others 1992 (1) SA 393 (C) ..... 63.5*(g)*
Lone Creek River Lodge & Others v Global Forest Products & Others [2007] ZAGPHC 307, Unreported decision (T), Case No. 1994/2005 (6 November 2007) ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(bb)(x)(1), 50.4(h)(ii)(bb)(z)*
Lonrho v Salisbury Municipality 1970 (4) SA 1 (R) ..... 32.5*(c)*
Lotus River, Ottery, Grassy Park Residents Association v South Peninsula Municipality 1999 (2) SA 817 (C), 1999 (4) BCLR 440 (C) ..... 13.6, 27.2*(d), 34.6, 35.5(i) Louw and Others v Long 1990 (3) SA 45 (E) ..... 50.4(h)(ii)(ff)*
Louw v Transitional Local Council of Greater Germiston 1997 (8) BCLR 1062 (W) ..... 65.4*(c)*
Luitingh v Minister of Defence 1996 (2) SA 909 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 581 (CC) ..... 4.3*(c)(i), 5.3(d)*
Lyon v Steyn 1931 TPD 247 ..... 38.2*(c)*(i)

M

M en Andere v Streeklanddros, Middelburg, Transvaal, en Andere 1995 (2) SACR 709 (T) ..... 51.5*(h)*
M v R 1989 (1) SA 416 (O) ..... 38.2*(a)*(iii)
MAWU v Natal Die Casting Co (Pty) Ltd (1986) 7 ILJ 520 (IC) ..... 53.2*(b)*, 53.5
MEC, Department of Agriculture, Conservation and Environment and Another v HTF Developers (Pty) Ltd 2008 (2) SA 319 (CC), 2008 (4) BCLR 417 (CC), [2007] ZACC 25 ..... 4.3*(d)(iii), 9.4(b)*(i),

	9.4*(b)(ii), 50.3(b)(i)(bb)(y), 50.4(e)*
MEC, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape v Kate 2006 (4) SA 478 (SCA), [2006] ZASCA 49, [2006] All SA 455 (SCA)	9.2*(e)(iv)(cc), 9.2(f)(ii), 9.5(a)(ii), 9.5(a)(ii)(aa), 9.5(b)(ii), 56D.1, 56D.3(f)(ii), 59.4(d)*
MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment and Land Affairs v Sasol Oil (Pty) Ltd & Another 2006 (5) SA 483 (SCA)	50.3*(b)(i)(dd)(y)*
MEC for Agriculture, Conservation, Environment & Land Affairs v Sasol Oil Pty Ltd & Bright Suns Development CC [2005] ZASCA 76	50.3*(b)(i)(z), 50.4(e), 50.4(h)(ii)(aa)*
MEC for Education, KwaZulu-Natal and Others v Pillay 2008 (1) SA 474 (CC), 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC), [2007] ZACC 21	4.3*(d)(iii), 9.2(b)(ii)(aa), 9.3, 9.5(b)(ii), 9.6(b), 9.7, 32.3(c), 32.4(a), 32.4(c), 32.5(b), 42.4, 42.5, 42.5(d), 47.1, 47.8, 50.3(b)(ii)(aa)(v), 56B.3(b)(i), 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(x), 57.2(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(bbb)(xx), 57.2(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(bbb)(yy), 57.2(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(ddd), 57.3(c)(vi), 57.4(c)(ii)(cc)*, 57.5
MEC for Health, KwaZulu-Natal v Premier, KwaZulu-Natal: In re Minister of Health and Others v Treatment Action Campaign and Others 2002 (5) SA 717 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1028 (CC)	5.3*(e)(ii), 14.3(c)(i), 14.3(c)(ii), 31.4(f), 16.1(b), 16.4(b)*(ii)
MEC for Health, Mpumalanga v M-Net 2002 (6) SA 714 (T)	36.2*(e), 36.4(b)(iii), 42.9(b)*
MEC for Local Government, Mpumalanga v Independent Municipal and Allied Trade Union (IMATU) 2002 (1) SA 76 (SCA)	14.3*(a), 14.3(b)(ii), 22.5(b)*
MV Golden North Governor and the Company of the Bank of Scotland v Fund Constituting the Proceeds of the Judicial Sale of the MV Golden North (Maritime Technical Co Ltd Intervening) 1999 (1) SA 144 (D)	32.3*(a)*
MV Snow Delta Serva Ship Ltd v Discount Tonnage Ltd 2000 (4) SA 746 (SCA)	4.3*(b)(ii)(aa)*
MWU v East Rand Gold and Uranium Co Ltd (1990) 11 ILJ 1070 (IC)	53.2*(b)*
MWU v East Rand Gold and Uranium Co Ltd (1991) 12 ILJ 1221 (A)	53.5
Maas Transport BK v Beukes (Unreported, Land Claims Court Case No LCC 38R / 02, 27 May 2002)	48.7*(b)*(iv)
Mabaso v Law Society, Northern Provinces, and Another 2005 (2) SA 117 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 129 (CC)	3.4*(a), 5.2, 5.3(e)(iv), 9.4(d)(iii), 35.5(g)(i), 35.5(g)*(iv)
Mabena v Letsoalo 1998 (2) SA 1068 (T)	64.4*(b)*(i)
Mabuza v Mbatha 2003 (4) SA 218 (C), 2003 (7) BCLR 743 (C)	31.4*(e)(ix), 36.4(d)(ii), 36.5(c), 41.6, 58.1(b), 57.3(b), 64.4(b)*(i)
Macadamia Finance Ltd en 'n Ander v De Wet en Andere 1991 (4) SA 273 (T)	40.5*(b)*(ii)
Mackessack v Assistant Magistrate, Empangeni 1963 (1) SA 892 (N)	65.6
Macsteel (Pty) Ltd v NUMSA (1990) 11 ILJ 995 (LAC)	53.2*(b)*, 53.5

Madikizela v State President, Republic of Transkei 1986 (2) SA 180 (Tk) ... 65.2*(b)*
Magajane v The Chairperson, North West Gambling Board 2006 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2006 (2) SACR 447 (CC), 2006 (10) BCLR 1243 (CC) ..... 9.4*(c), 9.4(d)(i), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 40.3(b)*
Magano and Another v District Magistrate, Johannesburg, and Others (1) 1994 (4) SA 169 (W), 1994 (2) BCLR 125 (W) ..... 32.4*(c), 51.4(d)*
Magidimisi and Others v MEC and Others (Unreported, SECLO Case No 2180/04, 13 April 2006) ..... 18.3*(c), 59.4(d)*
Magidimisi NO v Premier of the Eastern Cape (unreported, ECD Case No 2180/04, 25 April 2006) ..... 8.3*(g), 20.2(b), 20.3(b), 20.3(c), 20.3(d), 56D.3(f)*(ii)
Magna Alloys and Research (SA) (Pty) Ltd v Ellis 1984 (4) SA 874 (A) ..... 4.3*(d)(i)(aa), 36.4(f)*, 54.4
Magodi and Others v Van Rensburg [2001] 4 All SA 485 (LCC) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Mahambehlala v MEC for Welfare, Eastern Cape, and Another 2002 (1) SA 342 (SE), 2001 (9) BCLR 890 (SE) ..... 31.4*(c)(ii), 38.3(b)(v), 56D.3(f)(ii), 56D.4(b)*
Maharaj and Others v Rampersad 1964 (4) SA 638 (A) 53.6
Mahlangu v S 2004 (2) All SA 652 (NC) ..... 51.5*(o)*
Mahomed v National Director of Public Prosecutions 2006 (1) SACR 495 (W) ..... 52.4*(c)(i) Maisel v van Naeren 1960 (4) SA 836, 840 (C) ..... 38.2(c)*(ii)
Majiet v Santam Ltd [1997] 4 All SA 555 (C) ..... 40.8*(b)*
Makambi v The Member of the Executive Council, the Department of Education, Eastern Cape Province (unreported, SCA Case No 638/06, 29 May 2008) ..... 63.3*(b)*
Makhathini v Road Accident Fund 2002 (1) SA 511 (SCA), [2002] 1 All SA 413 (A) ..... 52.6*(a)*(i)
Makinana and Others v Minister of Home Affairs and Another; Keelty and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Another 2001 (6) BCLR 581 (C) ..... 34.8*(c)(ii), 34(c)*(iii)
Maluleke v MEC, Health and Welfare, Northern Province 1999 (4) SA 367 (T) ..... 7.2*(c)(ii), 7.2(c)(iii), 56D.4(b)*
Maluleke v Minister of Internal Affairs 1981 (1) SA 707(B) ..... 30.1*(b)(i) Mandel and Another v Johncom Media Limited; Johncom Media Limited v Mandel and Others [2008] ZAGPHC 36 ..... 9.2(e)(iv)(bb), 42.9(c)*
Mandela v Falati 1995 (1) SA 251 (W), 1994 (4) BCLR 1 (W) ..... 36.4*(h)(iii), 38.2(b)(ii), 42.5, 42.9(h)*
Mangope v Asmal and Another 1997 (4) SA 277 (T) ..... 42.9*(a)* Mankatshu v Old Apostolic Church of Africa and Others 1994 (2) SA 458 (TkA) ..... 41.3*(a)* Manqele v Durban Transitional Metropolitan Council 2002 (6) SA 423 (D) ..... 56B.3*(b)(iv), 56B.4(c)(i) Mans v Mans (born Maddock) [1999] 3 All SA 506 (C) ..... 66.1(c)*
Manusamy v Hefer NO 2004 (5) SA 112 (O) 52.9
Manyasha v Minister of Law and Order 1999 (2) SA 179 (SCA) ..... 32.3*(a)* Manyatshe v Mail & Guardian Ltd (unreported WLD, 21 September 2006) ..... 42.9*(a)* Mapochsgronde Action Group v Eagles Quarries (Pty) Ltd and Others (unreported, TPD Case, 2002) ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(aa)*
Maqoma v Sebe NO and Another 1987 (1) SA 483 (Ck) ..... 22.7*(d)*
Marais v Democratic Alliance 2002 (2) BCLR 171 (C) ..... 17.8*(a), 63.3(c)*
Marais v Groenewald en 'n Ander 2001 (1) SA 634 (T), [2001] 2 All SA 578 (T) ..... 36.4*(h)(iii), 38.2(a)(ii), 38.2(c)(ii), 42.9(a)*
Marais v Richard 1981 (1) SA 1157 (A) ..... 38.2*(c)*(i)

Marievale Consolidated Mines Ltd v President of the Industrial Court and Others 1986 (2) SA 485 (T) ..... 7.2*(b)*
Marlin v Durban Turf Club and Others 1942 AD 112 ..... 63.2*(c)*
Marlin v Jockey Club of South Africa 1951 (4) SA 638 (T) ..... 44.1*(c)*(vi)
Masamba v Chairperson, Western Cape Regional Committee, Immigrants Selection Board and Others 2001 (12) BCLR 1239 (C) ..... 34.5*(b)*(ii)
Masenya v Seleka Tribal Authority and Another 1981 (1) SA 522 (T) ..... 26.6*(d)*(iii)
Masetlha v President of the Republic of South Africa and Another 2008 (1) SA 566 (CC), 2008 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [2007] ZACC 20 ..... 4.3*(d)(ii), 9.2(c)(iii)(aa), 18.2(c)(i), 18.3(a), 23B.5(b)(iv), 42.9(c), 63.2(b), 63.3(a), 63.3(b), 63.3(c), 63.5(b), 63.5(c)*
Masetlha v The President of the Republic of South Africa and Another [2006] ZAGPHC 107 ..... 23B.5*(b)*(iv)
Mashavha v The President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2005 (2) SA 476 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1243 (CC), [2004] ZACC 6 ..... 9.4, 9.4*(e), 9.4(e)(i)(ee), 16.4(a)(i), 16.4(a)(iii), 16.4(b)(ii), 19.3(a)(ii), 23A.8, 32.1(c), 56C.3(b)(i), 56D.3(e), 56D.3(f)*(i), 56D.5
Masiya v Director of Public Prosecutions, Pretoria and Others (Centre for Applied Legal Studies and Another as Amici Curiae) 2007 (5) SA 30 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 ..... 4.3, 9.2*(b)(ii)(bb), 9.2(c)(iii)(aa), 9.2(c)(iii)(bb), 9.2(e)(iv)(aa), 9.4(b)(i), 9.4(d)(iii), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 32.1(c), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 32.5(b), 35.5(g)*(ii), 47.5
Masuku and Another v State President and Others 1994 (4) SA 374 (T) ..... 7.4*(b)*
Matatiele Municipality and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others (No 1) 2006 (5) SA 47 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 622 (CC), [2006] ZACC 2 ..... 3.7*(a), 4.3(a)(ii), 4.3(b)(i), 4.3(b)(iv), 10.3(b), 10.3(d), 10.3(d)(iii), 10.5(c), 12.3(b)(iii), 14.3(b)(ii), 14.5(d)(i), 17.3(a), 17.5(g), 22.2(a)*, 42.10
Matatiele Municipality and Others v The President of the Republic of South Africa and Others (No 2) 2007(6) SA 477 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC) ..... 2.1, 4.3*(b)(iv), 5.2, 9.2(c)(iii)(aa), 9.2(c)(i)(dd), 9.4(e), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(i)(cc), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 17.5(g), 17.6(a)(i), 17.6(a)(ii)(bb), 17.6(a)(ii)(cc)(2), 17.6(a)(iii), 22.1(e), 22.7(d), 23C.2, 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 32.5(c), 34.9, 42.5(b), 45.1, 45.5(b), 45.6, 45.7, 63.5(b)*

Mateis v Plaaslike Munisipaliteit Ngwathe and Andere 2003 (4) SA 361 (SCA) ..... 22.5*(b)*
Mathebe v Regering van die RSA en Andere 1988 (3) SA 667 (A) 26.2
Mathee en 'n Ander v Lerm 1980 (3) SA 742 (C) ..... 50.4*(a)*
Mathew Shunmugam and Others v Newcastle Local Munipality and Others [2007] ZAKZHC 1 (4 December 2007) ..... 22.2*(b)*(iii)
Mathews v Young 1922 AD 492 ..... 38.2*(b)*(i) Mathiba v Du Toit 1926 TPD 126 ..... 26.2
Mathibe v Tsoke 1925 AD 105 ..... 26.6*(c)*(iii)
Matinkinca v Council of State, Ciskei 1994 (4) SA 472 (Ck), 1994 (1) BCLR 17 (Ck) ..... 34.1*(b)*
Matiso and Others v Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison, and Another 1994 (3) SA 899 (E), 1994 (3) BCLR 80 (E) ..... 7.2*(c)(iii), 32.1(b), 32.3(b), 51.3(g)*
Matlou v Makhubedu 1978 (1) SA 946 (A) ..... 23B.3*(c)(i) Matukane and Others v Laerskool Potgietersrus 1996 (3) SA 223 (T), [1996] 1 All SA 468 (T) ..... 35.5(g)(viii), 36.4(d)(ii), 44.3(c)(iii), 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(x), 57.2(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(bbb)(xx), 57.3(c)(vi), 58.7(b)*
Mayfair South Townships v Jhina 1980 (1) SA 869 (T) ..... 32.5*(c)*
May v Udwin 1981 (1) SA 1 (A) ..... 38.2*(c)(i), 59.4(b)*(iii)
May v Union Government 1954 (3) SA 120 (N) ..... 38.3*(a)*(iv)
Mazibuko and Others v City of Johannesburg and Others 2010 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2010 (3) BCLR 239 (CC), [2009] ZACC 28 ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(aa)(y), 56B.1, 56B.3(a), 56B.3(b)(i), 56B.3(b)(ii), 56B.3(b)(iii), 56B.3(b)(iv), 56B.4(c)(i), 56B.4(c)(ii), 56B.4(g), 56B.5(b), 56D.3(d), 56D.3(f)(i), 56D.6(b)*
Mazibuko and Others v The City of Johannesburg and Others [2008] 4 All SA 471, [2008] ZAGPHC 128 (30 April 2008) ..... 22.4*(b), 56D.3(b)(iii)(aa)*
Mbambo v Minister of Defence 2005 (2) SA 226 (T) ..... 51.1*(b)*(iii)
Mbanga v MEC for Welfare, Eastern Cape and Another 2002 (1) SA 359 (SE) ..... 38.3*(b)(v), 56D.3(f)*(ii)
Mbatha v Vleissentraal Co-operative Ltd (1985) 6 ILJ 333 (IC) ..... 53.2*(b)*
Mbebe and Others v Chairman, White Commission and Others 2000 (7) BCLR 754 (Tk) ..... 59.4*(c)*(v)
Mbelu and Others v MEC for Health and Welfare Eastern Cape and Others 1997 (2) SA 823 (Tk) 53.6
Mbuli v Mehlomakulu 1961 NAC 68 ..... 59.2*(a)* McBride v The Citizen 1978 (Pty) Ltd (unreported WLD Case No 03/15780, 6 February 2008) ..... 42.9*(a)*
McCall v McCall 1994 (3) SA 201 (C) ..... 47.8*(b)*
McCarthy and Others v Constantia Property Owners' Association and Others 1999 (4) SA 847 (C) ..... 7.2*(c)*
McCarthy v Additional Magistrate, Johannesburg 2000 (2) SACR 542 (SCA) ..... 51.5*(f)*
McDonald and Others v Minister of Minerals and Energy and Others 2007 (5) SA 642 (C) ..... 18.2*(b)*
McDonald's Corp v Joburgers Drive-Inn Restaurant (Pty) Ltd; McDonald's Corp v Dax Prop CC; McDonald's Corp v Joburgers Drive-Inn Restaurant (Pty) Ltd & Dax Prop CC 1997 (1) SA 1 (A) ..... 52.6*(a)*(i)

McIntyre and Others v Pietersen NO and Another 1998 (1) BCLR 18 (T) ..... 51.1*(b)*(iii)
McKay v Editor City Press and Another [2002] 1 All SA 538 (SE) ..... 42.9*(a)*
McKenzie NO and Another v Lukas and Others (unreported, LCC Case No 11R/04, 22 April 2004) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Mc Nally v M&G Media Limited and Others 1997 (4) SA 267 (W), 1997 (6) BCLR 818 (W) ..... 42.9*(a)*
Media 24 Ltd and Another v Grobler 2005 (6) SA 328 (SCA) ..... 40.5*(b)(ii), 40.8(b)*
Member of the Executive Committee for Development Planning and Local Government, Gauteng v Democratic Party 1998 (4) SA 1157 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 855 (CC) ..... 5.3*(e), 5.3(e)(i), 5.3(e)(ii), 10.5(c), 18.2(b), 19.6, 31.4(a)(v), 32.3(a), 32.4(a), 34.1(b)*, 34.6
Member of the Executive Council for Local Government, Mpumalanga v Independent Municipal and Allied Trade Unions and Others 2002 (1) SA 76 (SCA) ..... 14.3*(a), 14.3(b)(i), 14.3(c)*(ii)
Mendes and Another v Kitching NO and Another 1996 (1) SA 259 (E), 1995 (2) SACR 634 (E) ..... 51.4*(b)(ii), 52.10(d)*
Merafong Demarcation Forum and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2008 (5) SA 171 (CC), 2008 (10) BCLR 969 (CC), [2008] ZACC 10 ..... 17.2*(b)(ii), 17.3(a), 17.5(g), 17.6(a)(ii)(cc)(c), 17.6(a)(iii), 17.7(b)(i)4., 17.8(b), 22.7(d), 23C.2, 32.3(b), 42.5(b)*
Mercer and Another, Ex parte: 2003 (1) SA 203 (CC) ..... 50.3*(b)(i), 50.3(b)(ii)(aa)(u)*
Metal and Allied Workers Union v State President 1986 (4) SA 358 (N) ..... 17.3*(f)*
Metcash Trading Ltd v Commissioner for the SA Revenue Service and Another 2000 (2) SA 232 (W), 2000 (3) BCLR 318 (W) ..... 59.4*(a)(i) Metcash Trading Ltd v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service, and Another 2001 (1) SA 1109 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ..... 4.3(d)(ii), 4.3(g)(ii), 12.3(d)(iv), 31.2(d)(vi), 31.4(b)(iii), 31.4(e)(iv), 34.8(c)(ii), 34.8(c)(iii), 59.2(b), 59.4(a)(i), 59.4(c)*
Metlika Trading v South African Revenue Service 2005 (3) SA 1 (SCA) ..... 31.6*(a), 31.6(b)*
Metro Projects CC and Another v Klerksdorp Local Municipality and Others, 2004 (1) SA 16 (SCA) ..... 25.2*(c)(i), 25.3(b), 25.8, 25.9(b)*
Meyer v Iscor Pension Fund 2003 (2) SA 715 (SCA) 63.10
Mfingwa and Others v S (unreported Transkei High Court Case No A 58 / 2001, 10 August 2001) ..... 66.1*(c)*
Mfolo and Others v Minister of Education, Bophuthatswana 1992 (3) SA 181 (B), 1994 (1) BCLR 136 (B) 37.4
Mgcina v Regional Magistrate, Lenasia, and Another 1997 (2) SACR 711 (W) ..... 51.3*(f), 51.5(h), 52.4(c)(i) Mgijima v Eastern Cape Appropriate Technology Unit 2000 (2) SA 291 (TkH) ..... 9.7, 31.4(f)*
Mhlekwa v Head of the Western Tembuland Regional Authority; Feni v Head of the Western Tembuland Regional Authority and Another 2001 (1) SA 574 (Tk), 2000 (2) SACR 596 (Tk), 2000 (9) BCLR 979 (Tk) ..... 26.6*(c)(i), 26.7, 34.7(c)(ii), 51.1(a)*(iv),

	64.4*(b)(i), 51.5(e)(i), 52.4(c)(i), 58.5(a)*, 60.4
Mhlongo v Bailey and Another 1958 (1) SA 370 (W)	38.2*(a)(ii), 38.2(a)(iii), 38.2(b)*(i)
Micro Finance Regulatory Council v AAA Investments (Pty) Limited and Another 2006 (1) SA 27 (SCA)	17.5*(e)(iii), 63.3(b)*
Midi Television (Pty) Ltd t/a E-TV v Director of Public Prosecutions (Western Cape) 2007 (5) SA 540 (SCA)	42.4, 42.7*(a), 42.7(d), 42.9(a), 42.9(c), 42.9(g), 42.9(h)*
Midi Television (Pty) Ltd t/a e-TV v Downer (D&CLD Case No 15927/04, 12 October 2004)	42.9*(c)*
Milani and Another v South African Medical and Dental Council and Another 1990 (1) SA 899 (T)	7.2*(b)*
Mineworkers Investment Co (Pty) Ltd v Modibane 2002 (6) SA 512 (W)	38.2*(b)(iii), 38.3(b)(v), 42.9(a), 43.2(b)*(ii)
Minister for Provincial and Local Government v Unrecognised Traditional Leaders, Limpopo Province (Sekhukhuneland) 2005 (2) SA 110 (SCA), [2005] 1 All SA 559 (SCA)	26.6*(a)*
Minister of Correctional Services and Others v Kwakwa and Another 2002 (4) SA 455 (SCA), 2002 (1) SACR 705 (SCA), [2002] 3 All SA 242 (A)	36.4*(c)(iii), 49.3(a), 49.3(b)(i), 51.3(c)*
Minister of Correctional Services v Ngubo 2000 (2) SA 668 (N)	43.3*(a)*(iv)
Minister of Defence and Others v Dunn 2007 (6) SA 52 (SCA)	63.3*(c)*
Minister of Defence and Others v South African National Defence Union; Minister of Defence and Others v South African National Defence Union and Another 2007 (1) SA 422 (SCA)	23B.3*(d), 23B.4(d)*
Minister of Defence, Namibia v Mwandinghi 1992 (2) SA 355 (NmS)	32.1*(b)*
Minister of Defence v Potsane and Another; Legal Soldier (Pty) Ltd and Others v Minister of Defence and Others 2002 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1137 (CC)	5.3*(a)(ii), 23B.4(c), 32.5(c)*
Minister of Education and Another v Syfrets Trust Ltd NO and Another 2006 (4) SA 205 (C), 2006 (10) BCLR 1214 (C)	35.5*(g)*(viii), 35.6
Minister of Education v Harris 2001 (4) SA 1297 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1157 (CC)	31.3*(c), 32.5(b), 57.2(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(bbb)(xx), 57.4(b)*
Minister of Education, Western Cape, and Others v Governing Body, Mikro Primary School, and Another 2006 (1) SA 1 (SCA), 2005 (10) BCLR 973 (SCA)	35.5*(g)(viii), 57.3(c)(vi), 58.1(c), 58.4(a)(i), 58.4(a)(vii), 58.7(b)*
Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism and Another v Scenematic Fourteen (Pty) Ltd 2005 (6) SA 182 (SCA)	18.2*(b)*
Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism and Others v Phambili Fisheries (Pty) Ltd; Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism and Others v Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd 2003 (6) SA 407 (SCA)	63.7*(d)*
Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism v George [2006] SCA 57 (RSA)	35.8
Minister of Finance and Another v Van Heerden 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC), 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC)	32.4*(c), 34.7(a), 35.1(a), 35.1(d)(ii), 35.1(d)(iii), 35.2, 35.4(a), 35.4(b), 35.4(c), 35.4(c)(i), 35.4(c)(ii), 35.4(c)(iii), 35.4(d)*,

35.4*(d)(i), 35.4(d)(ii), 35.4(d)(iii), 35.4(e), 35.4(f), 35.5(h), 35.5(h)(ii), 36.4(a), 51.1(b)(iv), 57.2(b)(ii)(bb), 58.7(b)*

Minister of Finance and Others v Gore NO 2007 (1) SA 111 (SCA)..... 9.5*(a)*(i)

Minister of Finance v Van Heerden and Another (unreported, CPD Case No 7067/01, 12 June 2003)..... 35.4*(c)*

Minister of Forestry v Quathambla (Pty) Ltd 1973 (3) SA 69 (A)..... 40.5*(b)*(ii)

Minister of Health and Another NO v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd and Others (Treatment Action Campaign and Another as Amici Curiae) 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC), 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ..... 3.3*(c), 4.3(d)(iv), 6.2(b)(ii), 6.2(h), 17.5(e)(i), (iii) & (iv), 18.2(b), 23A.1, 27.4(b), 32.3(c), 32.4(a), 32.4(c), 32.5(b), 48.4, 56A.3(b), 56A.4(e), 63.1, 63.2(a), 63.3(a), 63.3(c), 63.5(c), 63.5(e), 63.6(b)*

Minister of Health and Others v Treatment Action Campaign and Others (No 1) 2002 (5) SA 703 (CC) ..... 5.3*(e)(i), 5.3(e)*(v)

Minister of Health and Others v Treatment Action Campaign and Others (No 2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC), [2002] ZACC 15 ..... 4.2*(a), 4.3(c)(ii), 4.3(h)(ii)(bb), 9.2(c)(iii)(bb), 9.2(c)(iii)(ee), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 9.5(c)(i), 9.6(a), 9.6(c)(ii), 10.4(c), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 14.1, 16.1(b), 22.4(b), 30.3, 31.4(b)(v), 32.3(b), 33.1, 33.11(b), 33.12, 33.3, 33.4(a), 33.4(b), 33.5(b), 33.5(e)(ii), 33.5(e)(iii), 33.5(e)(iv), 33.5(f)(iii), 33.5(f)(iv), 33.5(g)(i), 33.5(h), 33.7, 34.6, 36.4(i), 39.8, 40.1(b)(i), 45.5(a), 47.4(b), 47.4(c), 48.3, 48.6(a), 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(x), 55.3(b), 56A.2(a), 56A.2(b)(v), 56A.2(b)(vii), 56A.2(c), 56A.3(a), 56A.3(d), , 56B.3(b)(i), 56B.3(b)(iii)(bb), 56B.4(g), 56C.3(a), 56C.3(b)(iii), 56D.3(d), 56D.6, 56D.6(b), 57.2(a)(i)(bb)*(y)

Minister of Health and Welfare v Woodcarb (Pty) Ltd and Another 1996 (3) SA 155 (N) ..... 7.2*(c)(iii), 31.3, 50.3(b)(i)(bb)(x)(1), 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(y)(8), 50.4(h)(ii)(bb)(x)*

Minister of Home Affairs and Another v American Ninja IV Partnership and Another 1993 (1) SA 257 (A) ..... 18.3*(f)*(i)

Minister of Home Affairs v Eisenberg and Associates: In re Eisenberg and Associates v Minister of Home Affairs and Others 2003 (5) SA 281 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 838 (CC) ..... 6.2*(a), 31.4(a)(v), 34.6, 63.3(b), 63.3(c)*

Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie (Doctors for Life International and Others, Amici Curiae); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project and Others v Minister of Home Affairs 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC) ..... 2.1, 3.7*(b)(ii), 4.3(h)(ii)(bb), 5.3(a)(ii), 5.3(d), 9.2(b)(ii)(bb), 9.2(c)(iii)(bb), 9.2(c)(iii)(dd), 9.2(d)(ii), 9.2(e)(i), 9.2(e)(iii)(bb), 9.2(e)(iv)(bb), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 9.4(b)(ii), 9.4(c), 9.4(d)(iii), 9.4(e), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(i)(cc), 10.2(c), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 32.3(c), 34.8(c)(i), 34.8(d)(i), 34.8(e)(ii), 35.1(d)(i), 35.5(g)(iii), 35.5(g)(v) 35.5(g)(viii), 35.5(h)(i), 36.2(d), 36.4(a), 36.4(b), 36.4(d)(i), 36.5(a)(i), 42.5(d), 57.3(b), 57.3(c)(vi), 57.4(c)(ii)(cc), 57.5, 58.1(a), 58.1(c), 58.4(a)(i), 58.4(a)(iii), 58.4(a)(v), 58.4(a)(vii), 58.7(a)*

Minister of Home Affairs v Liebenberg 2002 (1) SA 33 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1168 (CC) ..... 4.3*(c)(i), 5.3(c), 18.3(c)*

Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Reintegration of Offenders (NICRO) and Others 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC), [2004] ZACC 10 ..... 1.3, 3.3*(b), 9.2(e)(i), 9.2(e)(iv)(aa), 9.4(d)(i), 9.5(a)(i), 9.6(c)(ii)(bb), 10.3(c), 10.4(a), 10.5(a), 10.5(c), 11.1(c), 11.4, 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 13.4, 13.6, 17.5(b), 23A.4, 23B.6(b)(iii), 29.2(b), 31 Appendix (3)(a), 31.1(b), 31.4(e)(iii), 34.8(c)(i), 35.1(a), 36.2(d), 36.3(d), 45.4, 45.5(b), 45.10(b)(iii), 52.11, 59.4(a)(iv), 64.6(f)*

Minister of Home Affairs v Watchenuka 2004 (4) SA 326 (SCA), 2004 (2) BCLR 120 (SCA) ..... 31.3*(a)(i), 57.2(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(bbb)(xx), 57.2(b)(ii)(bb), 60.3, 64.6(a), 66.1(d)*(i)

Minister of Justice, Ex parte: In re Pillay 1945 AD 653 ..... 52.6*(d)*

Minister of Justice, Ex parte: In re R v Matemba 1941 AD 75	52.4*(c)*(ii)
Minister of Justice, Transkei v Gemi 1994 (3) SA 28 (TkA)	63.5*(d)*
Minister of Justice v Hofmeyr 1993 (3) SA 131 (A)	38.2*(a)(ii), 38.2(a)(iii), 38.3(a)(iv), 49.3(a), 64.6(f)*
Minister of Justice v Language (unreported, DCLD Case No 14181/2005, 20 March 2006)	35.8
Minister of Justice v Ntuli 1997 (3) SA 772 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 677 (CC)	3.7*(b)(ii), 6.2(f), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(i)(ee), 24.3(c)(ii), 32.4(c)*
Minister of Land Affairs v Slamdien 1999 (4) BCLR 413 (LCC)	32.3*(b), 32.4(a), 48.8(c)(ii), 48.8(c)*(iii)
Minister of Law and Order, KwaNdebele, and Others v Mathebe and Another 1990 (1) SA 114 (A)	51.2, 51.3*(c)*
Minister of Law and Order v Hurley 1986 (3) SA 568 (A)	38.3*(a)(iv), 59.2(a)*
Minister of Law and Order v Kader 1991 (1) SA 41 (A)	51.3*(b)*
Minister of Law and Order v Parker 1989 (2) SA 633 (A)	51.3*(b)*
Minister of Local Government and Land Tenure and Another v Sizwe Development and Others: In re Sizwe Development v Flagstaff Municipality 1991 (1) SA 677 (Tk)	24B.
Minister of Local Government and Land Tenure v Inkosinathi Property Developers (Pty) Ltd 1992 (2) SA 234 (TkA)	63.10
Minister of Native Affairs and Another v Buthelezi 1961 (1) SA 766 (D)	26.6*(a)*
Minister of Public Works and Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association and Another (Mukhwevho Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC), [2001] ZACC 19	4.3*(a)(i), 4.3(d)(ii), 5.3(a)(i), 5.3(e)(ii), 8.1(c), 11.2(b)(ii), 11.3(c)(ii), 11.3(c)(iii), 23B.5(b)(iv), 25.8, 31.2(d)(ii), 32.3(b), 33.6, 40.1(b)(i), 50.3(b)(i)(dd)(x)(2), 50.3(b)(ii)(aa)(x), 55.4(b)(i), 56B.4(c)(ii), 56C.3(b)(ii), 62.1, 63.1, 63.3(c), 63.5(c), 63.5(d), 63.5(e)*
Minister of Safety and Security v F [2011] ZASCA 3	23B.3*(c)(iii)(bb)*
Minister of Safety and Security and Another v Gaqa 2002 (1) SACR 654 (C)	23B.3*(c)(ii),40.10(a), 51.4(b)(iii), 51.5(j)(iii), 52.4(c)*(ii)
Minister of Safety and Security and Another v Hamilton 2004 (2) SA 216 (SCA)	9.5*(a)(i), 23B.3(c)(iii)(bb), 40.5(b)*(i)
Minister of Safety and Security v Venter [2011] ZASCA 42	23B.3*(e)*(ii)
Minister of Safety and Security and Another v Xaba 2003 (2) SA 703 (D), 2004 (1) SACR 149 (D)	23B.3*(c)(ii), 34.7(c)(i), 40.5(c), 40.10(a), 51.4(b)(iii), 52.4(c)*(ii)
Minister of Safety and Security and Others, Ex Parte: In re S v Walters and Another 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 105 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC), [2002] ZACC 6	3.7*(b)(ii), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 23B.3(c)(i), 10.3(c), 11.2(a), 17.3(e), 23B.3(c)(i), 31.1(c), 31.4(a)(v), 31.4(e)*(x),

34.8*(c)(i), 34.8(c)(iii), 36.4(c)(iii), 39.5(a), 40.5(c), 43.2(b)(ii), 51.1(b)*(iv), 51.2

Minister of Safety and Security v Carmichele 2004 (3) SA 305 (SCA), 2004 (2) BCLR 133 (SCA) ..... 9.5*(a)(i), 36.4(c)*(i), 39.6, 40.5

Minister of Safety and Security v Hamilton 2001 (3) SA 50 (SCA) ..... 3.3*(a), 3.5(b)*

Minister of Safety and Security v Luiters 2006 (4) SA 160 (SCA) ..... 9.5*(a)(i), 23B.3(c)*(iii)

Minister of Safety and Security v Luiters 2007 (2) SA 106 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 287 (CC) ..... 4.2*(b), 4.3(d)(i)(aa), 4.3(g)(i), 4.3(g)(ii), 4.3(h)(ii)(cc), 9.5(a)(i), 23B.3(c)(iii), 32.5(b)*

Minister of Safety and Security v Van Duivenboden 2002 (6) SA 431 (SCA), [2002] 3 All SA 741 (SCA) ..... 4.3*(d)(i)(aa), 13.3, 13.5(a), 23B.3(c)(iii)(bb), 32.5(b), 36.4(c)(i), 39.6, 40.5(b)(i), 42.5(b)*

Minister of Safety and Security v Van Duivenboden 2003 (1) SA 389 (SCA) ..... 9.5*(a)*(i)

Minister of Safety and Security v Van Niekerk 2007 (10) BCLR 1102 (CC) ..... 4.3*(g)(i), 4.3(h)(i)(aa)*

Minister of Social Development and Others, Ex Parte 2006 (4) SA 309 (CC), 2006 (5) BCLR 604 (CC), [2006] ZACC 3 ..... 3.7*(b)(ii), 16.4(b)(ii), 56D.3(f)*(i)

Minister of the Interior and Another v Harris and Others 1952 (4) SA 769 (A) ..... 2.2*(h), 2.3(g), 9.2(b), 21.2(a), 32.1(a), 45.2(a), 59.2(b)*

Minister of the Interior v Lockhat and Others 1961 (2) SA 587 (A) ..... 32.3*(b)*

Minister of the Interior v Machadadorp Investments (Pty) Ltd and Another (1957) (2) SA 395 (A) ..... 32.5*(c)*

Minister of Welfare and Population Development v Fitzpatrick and Others 2000 (3) SA 422 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 713 (CC) ..... 9.4*(e)(i)(bb), 34.6, 36.4(b), 44.3(c)(ii), 47.10(a), 47.10(b)*

Minister van Justisie, Ex Parte: In re S v Grotjohn 1970 (2) SA 355 (A) 39.4

Minister van Polisie v Ewels 1975 (3) SA 590 (A) ..... 40.5*(b)*(ii)

Minister Van Wet en Orde v Matshoba 1990 (1) SA 280 (A) ..... 3.4*(d)*

Mistry v Interim National Medical and Dental Council of South Africa and Others 1998 (4) SA 1127 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 880 (CC) ..... 9.4*(b)(i), 9.4(b)(ii), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(i)(dd), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 24A.4(b)(iii), 24B.3(b), 34.8(c)(iii), 38.3(a)(i), 38.3(a)(ii), 38.3(b)*(iii)

Mitchell and Another v Hodes and Others NNO 2003 (3) SA 176 (C), 2003 (1) SACR 524 (C) ..... 51.4*(b)(iii), 52.2(b)*

Mitchell's Plain Town Centre Merchants Association v McLeod and Another 1996 (4) SA 159 (A) ..... 57.4*(c)(ii)(cc)(ii), 58.4(a)(v), 58.7(a)*

Mittalsteel South Africa Ltd v Hlatshwayo 2007 (1) SA 66 (SCA) ..... 63.3*(b)*

Mkangeli and Others v Joubert and Others 2001 (2) SA 1191 (CC), 2001 (4) BCLR 316 (CC) ..... 5.3*(e)(ii), 34.7(c)(ii), 48.3, 48.7(b)(iv), 48.7(c)*

Mkangeli v Joubert 2002 (4) SA 36 (SCA) ..... 48.7*(c)*
Mketsu and Others v African National Congress and Others 2003 (2) SA 1 (SCA), 2002 (4) All SA 205 (SCA) 29.1, 29.8
Mkhatshwa v Mkhatshwa and Another 2002 (3) SA 441 (T)..... 63.3*(b)*
Mkhize v Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration 2001 (1) SA 338 (LC) ..... 31.4*(f), 31.4(f)*(ii)
Mkontwana v Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality and Another; Bissett and Others v Buffalo City Municipality and Others; Transfer Rights Action Campaign and Others v MEC, Local Government and Housing, Gauteng and Others (Kwazulu-Natal Law Society and Msunduzi Municipality as Amici Curiae) 2005 (1) SA 530 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 150 (CC), [2004] ZACC 9..... 4.3*(b), 5.3(d), 11.3(c)(i), 11.3(c)(ii), 22.4(b), 22.4(e)(v), 32.3(c), 34.7(a),56B.5(b)*
Mkontwana v Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality; Bisset v Buffalo City Municipalit' ('Mkontwana') (unreported, SECLD Case Nos 1238/02 and 903/02 (Judgment of Kroon and Leach JJ)..... 46.5*(b)*, 46.6
Mlokoti v Amathole District Municipality & Another 2009 (6) SA 354 (E)..... 17.6*(a)*(iii)
Mnguni v Minister of Correctional Services 2005 (12) BCLR 1187 (CC).... 5.2, 9.2*(b)*(iv)
Moafrika Newspaper re: rule nisi (R v Mokhantso and Others) 2003 (5) BCLR 534 (LesH) ..... 42.9*(c)*
Mobunram and Another v National Director of Public Prosecutions and Another (Law Review Project as Amicus Curiae) 2007 (4) SA 222 (CC), 2007 (6) BCLR 575 (CC) ..... 4.3*(g)(ii), 4.3(h)(ii)(dd)*
Mocumi v S (Unreported Northern Cape Division Case No CA&R 2 / 05, 30 May 2006..... 47.7
Modderfontein Squatters, Greater Benoni City Coucil v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (AgriSA and Legal Resources Centre, Amici Curiae); President of the Republic of South Africa and Others v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (AgriSA and Legal Resources Centre, Amici Curiae) 2004 (6) SA 40 (SCA), 2004 (8) BCLR 821 (SCA)..... 8.5, 9.2*(d)(i)(aa), 11.1(c), 11.2(b)(iii), 31 Appendix (3)(b), 31.4(c)(ii), 31.6(a), 32.4(c), 40.1(b)(i), 55.6(b)*(ii)
Modderklip Boerdery (Edms) Bpk v President van die Republiek van Suid-Afrika [2003] 1 All SA 465 (T), 2003 (6) BCLR 638 (T)..... 8.4*(c), 9.5(a)(ii)(aa), 46.2(a)* Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd v Modder East Squatters and Another 2001 (4) SA 385 (W) ..... 40.1*(b)*(i)
Modise v Steve's Spar, Blackheath 2001 (2) SA 406 (LAC)..... 43.3*(a)*(iv)
Moeketsi v Attorney-General, Bophuthatswana, and Another 1996 (1) SACR 675 (B), 1996 (7) BCLR 947 (B) ..... 51.1*(b)(iii), 51.1(b)(iv), 51.2, 51.5(f)*
Mogale and Others v Seima 2008 (5) SA 637 (SCA)..... 42.9*(a)*
Mogale v Engelbrecht and Others 1907 TS 836..... 26.6*(c)*(iii)
Mohamed and Another v Jassiem 1996 (1) SA 673 (A)..... 58.4*(a)(i) Mohamed and Another v President of the Republic of South Africa (Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty in South Africa and Another Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC).. 6.2(a), 6.2(d), 9.2(b)(ii)(aa), 9.2(e)(iv)(bb), 9.5(b)(ii), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 13.5(a), 18.2(a), 18.2(b), 18.3(k), 30.4(e), 31.3(a)(i), 31.4(b)(v), 31.6, 31.6(a)*,

31.6*(b), 31.7(a), 32.5(c), 34.8(c)(i), 39.3, 39.5(a), 39.7, 40.6(b)(ii) 40.7(a)(i), 49.2(d)(i), 66.1(b)*(v)

Mohamed NO and Others v National Director of Public Prosecutions and Another 2002 (4) SA 366 (W), 2002 (2) SACR 93 (W) ..... 59.4*(b)*(iv)

Mohamed NO and Others v National Director of Public Prosecutions and Another 2003 (1) SACR 286 (W) ..... 52.2*(b)*

Mohlomi v Minister of Defence 1997 (1) SA 124 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1559 (CC) ..... 9.2*(b)(ii)(bb), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(cc), 34.8(c)(iii), 34.8(c)(v), 51.5(n)(ii), 51.5(o), 59.4(a)*(ii)

Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council: Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development Intervening (Women's Legal Centre as Amicus Curiae) 2001 (4) SA 491 (CC), 2001 (8) BCLR 765 (CC) ..... 3.7*(a), 3.7(b)(i), 5.3(a)(ii), 5.3(c), 8.2, 9.4(c), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(cc), 10.3(c)*, 34.6, 52.11

Mokhatle and Others v Union Government 1926 AD 71 ..... 26.6*(d)*(iii)

Moldenhauer v Du Plessis and Others 2002 (5) SA 781 (T) ..... 31.4*(f)*

Moletsane v Premier of the Free State and Another 1996 (2) SA 95 (O), 1995 (9) BCLR 1285 (O) ..... 63.7*(d)*

Mondi Paper v Paper Printing Wood and Allied Workers Union and Others (1997) 18 ILJ 84 (D) ..... 43.3*(a)*(iv)

Monete v Setshuba 1948 NAC (C&O) 22 ..... 26.6*(b)*

Monnakale and Others v Republic of Bophythatswana and Others 1991 (1) SA 598 (B) ..... 32.1*(a)*

Mönnig and Others v Council of Review and Others 1989 (4) SA 866 (C) ..... 63.5*(g)*

More v Minister of Co-operation and Development and Another 1986 (1) SA 102 (A) ..... 17.5*(d)*

Mort NO v Henry Shields-Chiat 2001 (1) SA 464 (C), [2002] 2 All SA 515 (C) ..... 4.3*(d)(i)(aa), 36.4(f)*

Mosehla v Sancor CC 1999 (1) SA 614 (T) ..... 48.6*(b)*(i)

Moseneke and Others v The Master and Another 2001 (2) SA 18 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 103 (CC) ..... 5.3*(c), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(i)(cc), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 26.3, 32.3(b), 34.8(c)(i), 34.8(c)(ii), 34(c)(iii), 35.1(b), 35.3(g)(i), 35.3(g)(iv), 36.1(c), 36.3(a)*

Moses v Minister of Safety and Security 2000 (3) SA 106 (C) ..... 40.5*(b)*(i)

Mosetlhanyane & Matsipane v The Attorney General Case No CACLB-074-10 (27 January 2011) ..... 56B.2*(d)*(iii)

Motala and Another v University of Natal 1995 (3) BCLR 374 (D) ..... 31.2*(b)(ii), 35.4(c), 35.4(d), 35.4(d)(i), 57.2(b)(ii)(bb)*

Motan and Another v Joosub 1930 AD 61 ..... 31.4*(e)(iii), 31.4(e)*(x)

Mothibeli v Western Vaal Metropolitan Substructure (2000) 5 LLD 114 (LC) 24A.6

Mothlasedi v New Africa Investments Ltd (unreported, WLD 29 March 2007) ... 42.9*(a)*
Motor Industry Fund Administrators Pty Ltd v Janit 1994 (3) SA 56 (W) ... 52.10*(f)*
Motsepe v Commissioner for Inland Revenue 1997 (2) SA 898 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 692 (CC) ... 3.6, 6.2*(a), 6.2(b)(v), 32.5(b), 43.2(b)*(ii)
Mpande Foodliner CC v Commissioner for the South African Revenue Service and Others 2000 (4) SA 1048 (T) ... 63.5*(d)*
Mpanga v MEC for Welfare 2002 (1) SA 359 (SE) ... 56D.4*(b)*
Mpange and Others v Sithole [2007] ZAGPHC 202 ... 9.5*(d)*
Mpedi and Others v Swanevelder and Another 2004 (4) SA 344 (SCA) ... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Mphahlele v First National Bank of SA Ltd 1999 (2) SA 667 (CC), 1999 (3) BCLR 253 (CC) ... 3.3*(d), 4.2(b), 4.3(d)(ii), 4.3(d)(iv), 31.4(b)(iii), 35.3(e)(i), 59.4(a)*(v), 62.7
Mphela and Others v Haakdoornbult Boerdery CC and Others 2008 (4) SA 488 (CC), 2008 (7) BCLR 675 (CC) ... 4.3*(d)*(iii)
Mphele v Government of Republic of South Africa 1996 (7) BCLR 921 (Ck) ... 18.2*(a), 18.3(a)*
Mpongwana v Minister of Safety and Security 1999 (2) SA 794 (C) ... 40.5*(b)(i), 43.2(b)*(ii)
Msila v Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others 1996 (3) BCLR 362 (C) ... 51.1*(b)(ii), 52.4(c)(i) Msiza and Others v Uys and Others 2005 (2) SA 456 (LCC) ... 48.6(b)*(i)
Msomi v Attorney-General, Natal, and Others 1996 (8) BCLR 1109 (N) ... 51.1*(a)(ii), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.1(b)(iv), 51.3(f), 51.4(b)(iii), 52.4(c)*(iii)
Mtati v Minister of Justice 1958 (1) SA 221 (A) ... 40.5*(b)*(ii)
Mthembi-Mahanyele v Mail and Guardian Ltd and Another 2004 (6) SA 329 (SCA), 2004 (11) BCLR 1182 (SCA) ... 24B.3*(a), 36.4(h)(iii), 42.4, 42.5(b), 42.9(a)*
Mthembu v Letsela 2000 (3) SA 867 (SCA) ... 31.8*(a)* Mthethwa v De Bruin NO 1998 BCLR (3) 336 (N) ... 51.5*(l)*, 65.6
Mthetwa and Others v Diedericks and Others 1996 (4) SA 381 (N), 1996 (7) BCLR 1012 (N) ... 59.4*(a)*(viii)
Mtshamba & Others v Boland Houtnywerhede (1986) 7 ILJ 563 (IC) ... 53.2*(b)*
Muller v President of the Republic of Namibia 2000 (6) BCLR 655 (NmS) ... 38.2*(a)*(iii)
Muller v SA Associated Newspapers Ltd 1972 (2) SA 589 (C) ... 38.2*(c)*(ii)
Mulundika v The People (1996) 1 BHRC 199 (SC Zambia) ... 42.9*(h)*
Munusamy v Hefer NO and Others 2004 (5) SA 112 (O) ... 42.7*(d)*
Murray v SA Tatters'll's Subscription Rooms 1910 TH 35 ... 58.4*(a)(v), 58.7(a)*
Mutasa v Makombe NO 1998 (1) SA 397 (ZS), 1997 (6) BCLR 841 (ZS) ... 17.6*(c), 17.6(d)*
Mwelase and Others v Hiltonian Society 2001 (4) SA 100 (LCC) ... 48.6*(b)(i) Myburgh Park Langebaan (Pty) Ltd v Langebaan Municipality and Others, 2001 (4) SA 1144 (C) ... 50.4(h)(ii)(bb)(y), 50.4(h)(ii)(dd), 51.1(a)*(iv)

N

NK v Minister of Safety and Security 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC) ... 13.2*(a), 36.3(d), 36.4(c)*(i), 39.6
NM and Others v Smith and Others [2005] 3 All SA 457 (W) ... 36.4*(h)(iii), 40.8(b)*
NM and Others v Smith and Others (Freedom of Expression Institute as Amicus Curiae) 2007 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC) ... 4.3*(g)(i), 4.3(g)(ii), 4.3(h)(i)(aa), 9.2(c)(iii)(bb), 9.2(e)(iv)(aa), 9.5(a)*(i),

9.5*(a)(iii), 32.1(c), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 42.5(c), 42.9(a), 42.9(b), 59.4(a)*(vii)

NUMSA and Others v Bader Bop (Pty) Ltd and Another 2003 (3) SA 513 (CC), (2003) 24 ILJ 305 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 182 (CC) ..... 3.3*(e), 17.5(b), 43.1, 53.1(a)(ii), 53.2(b)*, 53.4, 53.5, 53.6

NUMSA v Vetsak Co-operative Ltd and Others 1996 (4) SA 577 (A)..... 53.2*(c)*

NUM v Goldfields of SA Ltd & Others (1989) 10 ILJ 86 (IC) 53.5

Naboomspruit Munisipaliteit v Malati Park (Edms) Bpk 1982 (2) SA 127 (T) ..... 32.3*(a)*

Naidenov v Minister of Home Affairs 1995 (7) BCLR 891 (T)..... 31.3*(a)(i), 51.2, 51.3(a)*

Naidoo and Others v National Director of Public Prosecutions and Others [2003] 4 All SA 380 (C) ..... 51.5*(f)*

Namibian National Students' Organisation and Others v Speaker of the National Assembly for South West Africa and Others 1990 (1) SA 617 (SWA) ..... 32.1*(a)*

Namunjepo and Others v Commanding Officer Windhoek Prison and Another 2000 (6) BCLR 671 (NmS) ..... 49.3*(a)*

Napier v Barkhuizen 2006 (4) SA 1 (SCA), 2006 (9) BCLR 1011 (SCA), [2006] 2 All SA 469 (SCA) ..... 59.4*(c)*(ii)

NAPTOSA and Others v Minister of Education, Western Cape, and Others 2001 (2) SA 112 (C), 2001 (4) BCLR 388 (C) ..... 31.4*(f), 32.4(a), 32.5(b)*

Nasionale Suiwelkoöperasie Bpk v FAWU (1989) 10 ILJ 712 (IC)..... 53.5

Natal Fresh Produce Growe'rs' Association and Others v Agroserve (Pty) Ltd and Others 1990 (4) SA 749 (N) ..... 7.2*(b), 7.2(c)*(v)

Natal Indian Congress v State President and Others 1989 (3) SA 588 (D).. 63.4, 63.1, 63.4

Natal Newspapers (Pty) Ltd v State President of the Republic of South Africa 1986 (4) SA 1109 (N) ..... 2.2(i)(iii), 43.2*(a)*

Natal Provincial Administration v South African Railways and Harbours 1936 NPD 643..... 14.5*(d)(ii)(cc)*

National and Overseas Modular Construction (Pty) Ltd v Tender Board, Free State Provincial Government and Another 1999 (1) SA 701 (O) .... 7.2*(c)(i), 34.6, 59.3(a)*(v)

National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality and Another v Minister of Justice and Others 1998 (2) SACR 102 (W), 1998 (6) BCLR 726 (W), [1998] 3 All SA 26 (W) ..... 24C.3C.3*(c)(ii), 40.10(b)*

National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality and Another v Minister of Justice and Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 556 (CC)..... 2.1, 4.3*(c)(i), 9.2(c)(iii)(bb), 9.2(c)(i)(ee), 9.2(e)(i), 9.3, 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(cc), 10.3(c), 24C.3(c)(ii), 24F.4(a), 31 Appendix(1), 31 Appendix(3)(a), 31 Appendix(3)(b), 31.1(c), 31.4(a)(iv), 31.4(a)(v), 31.4(e)(ii), 31.4(e)(iii), 31.4(e)(viii), 32.3(b), 32.3(c), 34.6, 34.8(b), 35.1(d)(i), 35.1(d)(ii), 35.1(d)(iii), 35.2, 35.3(a)(i), 35.3(a)(ii), 35.3(e)(i), 35.4(a), 35.4(b)*,

35.4*(e), 35.5(a), 35.5(f), 35.5(g)(v), 35.4(h)(iii), 36.2(c), 36.3(c), 36.4(a), 36.4(b), 36.4(f), 36.5(a)(ii), 36.5(b), 37.4, 38.2(a)(iii), 38.3(a)(i), 38.3(a)(ii), 38.5(a), 40.8(a), 42.9(g), 44.1(a), 44.1(b)(i), 44.3(a)(i), 44.3(c)(ii), 44.3(c)(x), 50.3(c)(ii), 56D.5(c)(ii), 58.1, 64.4(a)*

National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality and Others v Minister of Home Affairs and Others 1999 (3) SA 173 (C), 1999 (3) BCLR 280 (C) ..... 13.5*(a), 13.6, 66.1(d)*(ii)

National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality and Others v Minister of Home Affairs and Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC). 6.2*(h), 7.2(cI)(i), 7.3(c)(i), 7.3(c)(iii), 7.4(a), 9.2(e)(iv)(aa), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 9.4(b)(i), 9.4(b)(ii), 9.4(d), 9.4(d)(i), 9.4(d)(ii), 9.4(d)(iii), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 11.2(b)(i), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 17.5(b), 24D.5(e), 31 Appendix(4)(a), 31.4(a)(v), 31.4(e)(iii), 31.4(e)(v), 31.4(e)(vi), 31.4(e)(vii), 32.3(c), 32.5(b), 34.1(b), 34.6, 34.8(c)(i), 34.8(e)(i), 35.1(d)(i), 35.5(b), 35.5(f), 35.5(g)(iii), 35.5(g)(v), 35.5(h)(iii), 36.4(a), 36.4(b), 36.4(f), 36.4(g), 40.1(b)(i), 44.1(b)(i), 44.3(c)(ii), 44.3(c)(x), 52.8, 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y), 63.2(a), 64.4(a), 66.1(b)(i), 66.1(d)*(ii)

National Director for Public Prosecutions v Mohamed 2008(1) SACR 309 (SCA), [2008] 1 All SA 181 (SCA) ..... 9.2*(b)(ii)(aa), 9.2(c)(iii)(bb), 9.2(c)(iii)(dd)*

National Director of Public Prosecutions v Mohamed NO 2003 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 476 (CC) ..... 4.3*(g)(ii), 9.4(b)(i), 9.4(d), 9.4(d)(ii), 5.3(a)(i), 31.4(e)(x), 34.2(c), 34.8(c)(iii), 51.1(a)(v), 59.4(b)*(iv)

National Director of Public Prosecutions v Phillips and Others 2002 (4) SA 60 (W), 2002 (1) BCLR 41 (W) ..... 3.3*(b), 52.4(a)(ii), 63.5(d)*

National Director of Public Prosecutions v Phillips and Others 2005 (5) SA 265 (SCA) ..... 4.3*(g)*(ii)

National Director of Public Prosecutions v Rebuzzi 2002 (2) SA 1 (SCA) 2002 (1) SACR 128 (SCA) ..... 52.2*(b)*

National Education Crisis Committee v State President of the Republic of South Africa Case No 16736/86 (unreported, 9 September 1986, WLD) ..... 7.2*(b)*
National Education Health and Allied Workers Union v University of Cape Town and Others 2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), (2003) 24 ILJ 95 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 154 (CC), [2002] ZACC 27 ..... 3.3*(c), 4.2(b), 4.3(c)(i), 4.3(d)(i)(bb), 4.3(d)(iii), 4.3(h)(i)(aa), 4.3(h)(ii)(dd), 5.3(e), 5.3(e)(i), 5.3(e)(vi), 11.2(b)(i), 17.5(b), 31.4(d)(iii), 31.4(e)(vii), 34.1(c), 34.8(e)(i), 43.1, 48.4, 53.1(a)(ii), 53.2(c)*, 53.5
National Entitled Workers Union v CCMA (2003) 24 ILJ 2335 (LC) ..... 53.2*(c)*
Nationale Vervoerkommissie van Suid-Afrika v Salz Gossow Transport 1983 (4) SA 344 (A) ..... 32.3*(a)* National Fresh Produce Growers Association v Agroserve (Pty) Ltd 1990 (4) SA 749 (N) ..... 50.4*(h)(i) National Gambling Board v Premier of KwaZulu-Natal and Others 2002 (2) SA 715 (CC), 2002 (2) BCLR 156 (CC) ..... 4.3(b)(i), 4.3(b)(vii), 5.3(d), 9.2(f)(i), 14.3(b)(ii), 14.3(c)(i), 14.3(c)(ii), 14.3(c)(iii), 14.5(b), 14.5(d)(ii)(aa), 16.1(b), 31.4(f)*
National Media Ltd and Another v Jooste 1996 (3) SA 262 (A) ..... 34.8*(e)(ii), 36.1(b), 38.1, 38.2(a)(i), 38.2(a)(iii), 38.2(c)*(i)
National Media Ltd and Others v Bogoshi 2004 (1) SA 58 (C) ..... 4.3*(d)(i)(aa), 31.4(e)*(x)
National Media Ltd v Bogoshi 1998 (4) SA 1196 (SCA), 1999 (1) BCLR 1 (SCA), [1998] 4 All SA 347 (A) ..... 31.1*(c), 31.4(a)(i), 31.4(a)(ii), 31.4(a)(v), 32.5(b), 36.4(h)(iii), 38.2(a)(ii), 38.2(c)(i), 38.2(c)(ii), 38.3(c), 42.9(a), 43.2(b)*(ii), 62.9
National Police Service Union and Others v Minister of Safety and Security and Others 2000 (4) SA 1110 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 775 (CC) ... 3.7*(a)*
National Transport Commission andd Another v Chetty's Motor Transport (Pty) Limited 1972 (3) SA 726 (A) ..... 63.6*(a), 63.6(a)*
National Union of Metalworkers of South Africa and Others v Bader Bop (Pty) Ltd and Another 2003 (3) SA 513 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 182 (CC) ..... 4.3*(d)(iii), 5.3(e)*(i), 48.4
National Union of Metalworkers of South Africa and Others v Gearmax (Pty) Ltd 1991 (3) SA 20 (A) ..... 42.8*(b)*
National Union of Metalworkers of South Africa v Fry's Metals (Pty) Ltd 2005 (5) SA 433 (SCA), 2005 26 ILJ (SCA) ..... 3.5*(b), 4.3(c)(i), 59.3(a)*(iv)
National Union of Mineworkers v East Rand Gold and Uranium Co Ltd 1992 (1) SA 700 (A); (1991) 12 ILJ 221 (A) ..... 53.2*(b)*
National Union of Mineworkers v Free State Consolidated Gold Mines (Operations) Ltd (1988) 9 ILJ 804 (IC) ..... 53.2*(b)*
National Union of Mineworkers v Free State Consolidated Gold Mines (Operations) Ltd 1989 (1) SA 409 (O) ..... 7.2*(b)*
National Union of Mineworkers v Henry Gould (Pty) Ltd (1988) 9 ILJ 1149 (IC) ..... 53.2*(b)*

National Union of Mineworkers v Marievale Consolidated Mines Ltd (1986) 7 ILJ 123 (IC) ..... 53.2*(b)*
Naude en Andere v Heatlie en Andere; Naude en Andere v Worcester-Oos Hoofbesproeiingsraad en Andere 2001 (2) SA 815 (SCA) ..... 50.4*(a)*
Ndebele-Ndzundza Community v Farm Kafferskraal No 181 JS 2003 (5) SA 375 (LCC), [2003] 1 All SA 608 ..... 48.8*(c)*(ii)
Ndlovu v Ngcobo; Bekker v Jika 2003 (1) SA 113 (SCA) ..... 55.6*(b)(ii), 56C.3(b)*(ii)
Ndlwana v Hofmeyr NO 1937 AD 229 ..... 2.2*(g)*
Nduli v Minister of Justice 1978 (1) SA 893 (A) ..... 30.2*(a)* Nedbank Ltd v Mortinson 2005 (6) SA 462 (W) ..... 55.6*(a)*
Nedcor Bank Limited v BeharIn 2000 (1) SA 307 (C) ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk in Afrika (OVS) en 'n Ander v Verenigende Gereformeerde Kerk in Suider-Afrika 1999 (2) SA 156 (SCA) ..... 57.4*(c)(ii)(cc)(ii), 58.4(a)(v), 58.7(a)* Neethling v du Preez, Neethling v The Weekly Mail 1994 (1) SA 708 (A) ... 38.2*(c)(i), 38.2(c)(ii), 42.2, 42.7(d), 42.9(a)*
Nell, Ex Parte 1963 (1) SA 754 (A) ..... 7.4*(b)*
Nell v Nell 1990 (3) SA 889 (T) ..... 38.2*(a)*(iii)
Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipality and Others v Greyvenouw CC and Others 2004 (2) SA 81 (SE) ..... 5.3*(a)(i) Nel v Le Roux NO and Others 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC) ..... 6.2(b)(ii), 38.3(a)(i), 40.2(a), 40.3(c)(ii), 40.3(d), 40.4(a), 42.7(d), 51.1(a)(ii), 51.1(a)(iv), 51.1(b)(i), 51.1(b)(ii), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.2, 51.3(e), 51.4(b)(iii), 51.5(b), 51.5(e)(i), 51.5(e)(ii), 51.5(n)(ii), 52.2(b), 52.9, 59.4(c)(v), 63.3(a), 63.3(b), 63.3(c)*
Nephawe v Premier, Limpopo 2003 (5) SA 245 (T), 2003 (7) BCLR 784 (T) ..... 63.3*(b)*
Neugebauer and Co Ltd v Hermann 1923 AD 564 ..... 6.1
New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd v Tshabalala-Msimang and Another NNO; Pharmaceutical Society of South Africa and Others v Minister of Health 2005 (2) SA 530 (C), [2005] 1 All SA 196 ..... 11.3*(c)(iii), 56A.4(e), 63.3(b)*
New Mines Ltd v Commissioner forIalnd Revue 1938 AD 455 ..... 32.5*(c)*
New National Party of South Africa v Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC), [1999] ZACC 5 ..... 2.1, 3.3*(d), 4.3(d)(ii), 9.2(c)(iii)(bb), 10.4(b), 10.5(c), 11.3(c)(ii), 12.3(b)(iii), 16.4(b)(ii), 17.5(b), 17.5(d), 17.5(f)(i), 18.2(b), 24A.3(b), 24B.1, 24B.2, 24C.4(a), 24C.4(b), 24C.4(c), 24E.2(b), 24E.3(b), 24F.3, 24F.4(e)(ii), 27.2(d), 29.2(a), 29.7(a), 29.7(c), 32.4(c), 35.3(e)(i), 35.4(d)(i), 36.2(d), 38.3(b)(ii), 42.4, 45.4, 45.5(b), 45.5(c), 45.7, 45.9, 64.4(c)*

New Union Goldfields v CIR 1950 (3) SA 392 (A) ..... 65.4*(b)*(ii)
Nextcom (Pty) Limited v Funde NO and Others 2000 (4) SA 491 (T) ..... 23A.4, 24B.3*(b), 25.2(c)(i), 62.1, 62.6, 63.3(c)*
Ngcobo and Others v Salimba 1999 (2) SA 1057 (SCA), 1999 (8) BCLR 855 (SCA) ..... 17.5*(b)*
Ngcobo v Van Rensburg 1999 (2) SA 525 (LCC), [1997] All SA 537 (LCC) ..... 48.6*(a), 48.6(b)(i) Ngqumba v Staatspresident en Andere; Damons v Staatspresident en Andere; Jooste v Staatspresident en Andere 1988 (4) SA 224 (A) ..... 51.3(b)*
Ngwenya v Gungubele 1950 NAC 198 (S) ..... 26.6*(a)* Ngxuza and Others v Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape and Another 2001 (2) SA 609 (E), 2000 (12) BCLR 1322 (E) ..... 7.1, 7.2*(c)(iii), 24A.6, 24C.3(c)(ii), 32.3(a), 32.3(b), 32.5(b), 56D.4(c)*, 63.8
Nhlabathi v Fick [2003] 2 All SA 323 (LCC) ..... 34.6, 46.1, 46.2*(a), 46.3(b), 46.4, 46.6, 46.7, 46.9, 48.7(b)(iv), 48.7(c)*
Nieuwoudt en Andere v Prokureur-Generaal van die Oos-Kaap 1996 (3) BCLR 340 (SE) ..... 51.4*(d), 51.5(c)*
NISEC (Edms) Bpk v Western Cape Provincial Tender Board and Others 1998 (3) SA 228 (C), 1997 (3) BCLR 367 (C) 62.7
Njongi v Member of the Executive Council, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape 2005 JDR 0718 (SE) ..... 56D.4*(a)*
Njongi v Member of the Executive Council, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape 2008 (4) SA 237 (CC), 2008 (6) BCLR 571 (CC), [2008] ZACC 4 ..... 56D.3*(f)(i), 56D.3(f)*(ii)
Nkonkobe Municipality v Water Services South Africa (PTY) Ltd & Others [2001] ZAECHC 3 ..... 56B.4*(d)*(i)
Nkosi and Another v Bührmann 2002 (1) SA 372 (SCA), 2002 (6) BCLR 574 (SCA) ..... 41.1*(b), 41.3(b), 48.7(b)*(iv)
Nkuzi Development Association v Government of the Republic of South Africa and Another 2002 (2) SA 733 (LCC) ..... 48.6*(b)(i), 48.7(b)(iv), 59.4(b)*(i)
Nokotyana & Others v Ekurhuleni Metropolitan Municipality 2010 (4) BCLR 312 (CC), [2009] ZACC 33 ..... 56B.1, 56B.3*(b)(iii)(bb), 56B.3(b)(iv), 56B.4(c)(i), 56B.4(g), 56B.5(b), 56D.3(f)(i) Nomala v Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare and Another 2001 (8) BCLR 844 (E) ..... 63.7(d)*
Nomthandazo Chagi v Singisi Forest Products (LCC 13/05) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Nontembiso Norah Kate v Member of the Executive Council for the Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape 2005 (1) SA 141 (SE), [2005] All SA 745 (SE) ..... 11.2*(a), 11.3(c)(i), 11.3(c)(ii), 56D.3(f)*(ii)
North Central Local Counci and South Central Local Council v Roundabout Outdoor (Pty) Ltd and Others 2002 (2) SA 625 (D) ..... 42.4, 42.9*(f)*
Northern Province Development Corporation v Attorneys Fidelity Fund Board of Control 2003 (2) SA 284 (T) ..... 31.8*(a)* Nortje and Another v Attorney-General (CI) and Another 1995 (2) SA 460 (C) ..... 34.6, 34.7*(a)*, 62.7

Nortje en 'n Andere v Minister van Korrektiewe Dienste 2001 (1) SACR 514 (HHA), 2001 (3) SA 472 (SCA), [2001] 2 All SA 623 (A) ..... 49.3*(b)(i), 63.5(d)*
Norton v Ginsberg 1953 (4) SA 537 (A) ..... 38.2*(b)*(iii)
Norvartis SA (Pty) Limited and Others v Competition Commission and Others (CT 22/CR/B/Jun 01, 2.7.2001) ..... 63.3*(c)*
Noupoort Christian Care Centre v Minister of National Department of Social Development anInother 2005 (10) BCLR 1034 (T) ..... 9.5*(c)*(iii)
Nourse v Van Heerden NO and Others 1999 (2) SACR 198 (W) ..... 40.9*(a)* Ntamo and Others v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (1) SA 830 (Tk) ..... 39.5*(a)* Ntenteni v Chairman, Ciskei Council of State and Another 1993 (4) SA 546 (Ck), 1994 (1) BCLR 168, 182 (Ck) ..... 59.4*(a)*
Ntsabo v Real Security CC (2003) 24 ILJ 2341 (LC) 37.7
Ntshangase v The Trustees of the Terblanche Gesin Familie Trust (Unreported Land Claims Court Case No LCC 27 / 02, 26 September 2002) ..... 56C.3*(b)*(ii)
Nwamitwa v Phillia and Others 2005 (3) SA 536 (T) ..... 9.5*(b)(ii), 34.7(a)*
Nxele v Chief Deputy Commissioner, Corporate Services, Department of Correctional Services [2006] 10 BLLR 960 (LC) ..... 63.3*(b)*
Nyamakazi v President of Bophuthatswana 1992(4) SA 540 (B) ..... 42.2, 42.6*(a)*
Nyathi v MEC for Department of Health, Gauteng and Another (Unreported, TPD Case No 26014/2005, 30 March 2007) ..... 3.7*(a), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.6(c)(iv), 37(c), 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y), 59.4(d)*
Nyathi v MEC for Health, Gauteng and Others 2008 (5) SA 94 (CC), 2008 (9) BCLR 865 (CC), [2008] ZACC 8 ..... 9.2*(b)(iv), 9.2(e)(iv)(aa), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 9.3, 9.4(d)(ii), 9.6(c)(iv), 22.5(b), 56D.3(f)*(ii)
Nyembezi v LaIoceity Ntal 1981 (2) SA 752 (A) ..... 32.5*(c)*
Nzama v Nzama 1942 NAC (N&T) 8 ..... 26.6*(d)(i) Nzimande v Nzimande and Another 2005 (1) SA 83 (W), [2005] 1 All SA 608 (T) ..... 55.4(b)*(iv)

O

O v O 1995 (4) SA 482 (W) ..... 38.2*(c)(i) Occupiers of 51 Olivia Road Berea Township and 197 Main Street, Johannesburg v City of Johannesburg and Others 2008 (3) SA 208 (CC), 2008 (5) BCLR 475 (CC) ..... 4.2(b), 4.3(d)(iii), 9.6(c)(i), 9.6(c)(vi), 22.4(b), 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y)*
Ocean Commodities Inc and Others v Standard Bank of SA Ltd and Others 1984 (3) SA 15 (A) ..... 6.2*(l)*(ii)
Oelofse and Others v SuthIand and Others 2001 (4) SA 748 (T) ..... 22.2*(c)(ii) Oertel v Direkteur van Plaaslike Bestuur 1983 (1) SA 354 (A) ..... 32.3(a)* Ohanessian v Koen 1964 (1) SA 663 (T) 65.6
O'Keeffe v Argus Printing and PIishing Co Ltd and Another 1954 (3) SA 244 (C) ..... 38.2, 38.2*(a)(i), 38.2(a)(ii), 38.2(a)(iii), 38.2(b)(i), 38.2(c)(i) Olitzki Property Holdings v State Tender Board and Another 2001 (3) SA 1247 (SCA), 2001 (8) BCLR 779 (SCA) ..... 9.2(f)(ii), 9.5(a)(i), 25.2(a), 25.8, 25.9(e), 32.5(c), 40.5(b)*(i)
Olivier v AECI Plofstowwe and Chemikalieë, Bethal (1988) 9 ILJ 1052 (IC) ..... 53.2*(b)*

Omar, Ex Parte 2006 (2) SA 284 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1087 (CC) ..... 5.3*(d)*
Omar v Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others (Commission for Gender Equality, Amicus Curiae) 2006 (2) SA 289 (CC), 2006 (2) BCLR 253 (CC) ..... 6.2*(a), 35.5(g)(ii), 40.2(a), 40.3(c)(i), 40.3(d), 40.5(b)(i), 52.2(b), 59.4(b)*(iv)
Omar v Minister of Law and Order and Others; Fani v Minister of Law and Order and Others; State President and Others v Bill 1987 (3) SA 859 (A) ..... 51.3*(b)*
Oostelike Gauteng Diensteraad v Transvaal Munisipale Pensioenfonds en 'n Ander 1997 (8) BCLR 1066 (T) ..... 12.3*(d)(iii), 31.3, 44.3(c)*(iv), 62.6
Oosthuizen Transport (Pty) Limited and Others v MEC, Road Traffic Matters, Mpumalanga, and Others 2008 (2) SA 570 (T) ..... 63.3*(c)*
Oosthuizen v Homegas (Pty) Ltd 1992 (3) SA 463 (O) ..... 40.5*(b)*(ii)
Optimal Property Solutions CC, Ex Parte 2003 (2) SA 136 (C) ..... 34.7*(a)* Oranje Vrystaatse, Vereniging vir Staatsondersteunde Skole en 'n Ander v Premier Provinsie Vrystaat en Andere 1998 (3) SA 692 (CC), 1998 (6) BCLR 653 (CC) ..... 6.2*(a)*
Osman and Another v Attorney-General of Transvaal 1998 (1) SACR 28 (T), 1998 (2) BCLR 165 (T) ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii)
Osman v Attorney-General, Transvaal 1998 (4) SA 1224 (CC), 1998 (11) BCLR 1362 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 493 (CC) ..... 31.2*(d)(v), 51.1(a)(iii), 51.4(a), 51.4(b)(i), 51.4(b)(iii), 51.5(j)(ii), 52.4(a)(iii), 52.4(b)(i) Oudekraal Estates (Pty) Ltd v City of Cape Town and Others 2004 (6) SA 222 (SCA) ..... 3.4(a), 11.1(a)*

P

PSA v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development and Others (2001) 22 ILJ 2303 (LC) 53.6
Pakendorf and Andere v De Flamingh 1982 (3) SA 146 (A) ..... 42,2, 42.9*(a)* Paltex Dyehouse (Pty) Ltd v Union Spinning Mills (Pty) Ltd 2000 (4) SA 837 (BHC) ..... 32.3*(a)*
Pan American World Airways Incorporated v SA Fire and Accident Insurance Co Ltd 1965 (3) SA 150 (A) ..... 30.1*(b)(i) Paola v Jeeva NO 2002 (2) SA 391 (D) ..... 31.4(e)(v), 31.4(e)(vi), 50.3(b)(i)(bb)(y), 50.3(b)(ii)(aa)(u)*
Paola v Jeeva NO and Others 2004 (1) SA 396 (SCA) ..... 50.3*(c)(i), 50.3(c)*(ii)
Paper Printing Wood and Allied Workers Union v Pienaar and Others 1993 (4) SA 621 (A), (1991) 12 ILJ 308 (A) 53.5
Paper Printing Wood and Allied Workers Union v SA Printing and Allied Industries Federation (1990) 11 ILJ 345 (IC) 53.5
Parbhoo and Others v Getz NO and Another 1997 (4) SA 1095 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1337 (CC) ..... 3.4*(b), 52.2(b)*, 52.8
Parekh v Minister of Home Affairs 1996 (2) SA 710 (D) ..... 31.3*(a)*(i) Pareto Ltd and Others v Mythos Leather Manufacturing (Pty) Ltd 2000 (3) SA 999 (W) 55.6
Park-Ross and Another v Director:Office for Serious Economic Offences 1995 (2) SA 148 (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 198 (C) ..... 24A.4*(b)(iii), 31.2(d)(v), 32.4(a), 34.6, 38.3(a)(ii), 38.3(b)(iii), 38.5(b)*, 51.2,

51.4*(a), 51.4(b)(i), 51.4(b)*(iii), 52.5
Park-Ross v Director:Office for Serious Economic Offences 1998 (1) SA 108 (C) ..... 63.3*(c)*
Patcor Quarries CC v Issroff and Others 1998 (4) SA 1069 (SE), 1998 (4) BCLR 467 (SE) ..... 63.3*(a)(v), 59.4(c)*(ii)
Patel and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Another 2000 (2) SA 343 (D), [2000] 4 All SA 256 (D) ..... 31.3*(a)(i), 47.3(b), 56D.3(f)(i), 66.1(b)*(ii)
Patz v Greene and Co 1907 TS 427 ..... 7.2*(b)*
Peck v Katz 1957 (2) SA 567 (T) ..... 38.2*(c)*(ii)
Pedro v Greater George Transitional Council 2001 (2) SA 131 (C) ..... 31.4*(f)*
Pennington v The Minister of Justice 1995 (3) BCLR 270 (C) ..... 52.4*(c)(i), 52.6(b)*
Penny v Walker 1936 AD 241 ..... 6.1
Penrice v Dickinson 1945 AD 6 ..... 59.4*(b)*(iii)
Pepcor Retirement Fund and Another v Financial Services Board and Another 2003 (6) SA 38 (SCA) ..... 63.2*(b)*
Permanent Secretary, Department of Welfare, Eastern Cape Provincial Government and Another v Ngxuza and Others 2001 (4) SA 1184 (SCA), 2001 (10) BCLR 1039 (SCA) ..... 7.2*(c)(iii), 7.3(c)(i), 14.3(c)(i), 23A.4, 31.4(f), 32.5(b), 34.6, 56D.3(f)(ii), 56D.4(c), 63.8, 64.4(e)*
Permanent Secretary of the Department of Education and Welfare, Eastern Cape and Another v Ed-U-College (PE) (Section 21) Inc 2001 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 118 (CC) ..... 24A.4*(a)(iii), 63.3(b), 63.5(c), 63.5(d)*
Petersen v Maintenance Officer, Simon's Town Maintenance Co Ltd and Others 2004 (2) SA 56 (C), 2004 (2) BCLR 205 (C), [2004] 1 All SA 117 (C) ..... 9.5*(b)(ii), 31.3(c), 31.4(d)(i), 31.4(e)(iii), 31.4(e)(x), 34.8(b), 34.8(c)(iii), 35.5(g)(ix), 36.3(a), 47.1, 47.10(b), 47.3(a)*
Petho v Minister of Home Affairs, Zimbabwe, and Another 2003 (3) SA 131 (ZS) ..... 7.2*(c)*(iii)
Petro Props (Pty) Ltd v Barlow and Another 2006 (5) SA 160 (W) ..... 42.9*(a), 50.3(b)(ii)(bb)*(x)
Pharboo and Others v Getz NO and Another 1997 (4) SA 1095 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1337 (CC) 5.2
Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA and Another: In re Ex Parte Application of the President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 1999 (4) SA (T) ..... 17.3*(e)*
Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA and Another: In re Ex Parte Application of the President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC), [2000] ZACC 1 ..... 1.3, 3.2, 3.3*(d), 4.2(a), 4.3(b)(i), 4.3(c)(i), 4.3(d)(ii), 4.3(d)(iii), 4.3(h)(i)(aa), 5.3(c), 10.5(a), 12.3(b)(ii), 12.3(c)(ii), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa),17.3(e), 17.5(f)(i), 18.2, 18.2(b), 23A.4, 23B.6(b)(iii), 24A.4(a)(iii), 24C.4(f), 25.9(b), 26.6(c)*(iii),

31 Appendix(4)(c), 31.1*(c), 31.2(a)(ii), 31.4(a)(v), 31.4(b)(iii), 31.4(e)(iv), 32.3(b), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 32.5(b), 34.1(c), 34.7(a), 35.3(e)(i), 40.1(b)(i), 9.2(a), 49.3(b)(i), 50.4(b)(ii)(aa), 63.1, 63.2(c), 63.3(b), 63.4,, 63.6(b), 64.4(b)*(i)

Pharmaceutical Society of South Africa v Tshabalala-Msimang and Another; New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Health 2005 (3) SA 238 (SCA), 2005 (6) BCLR 576 (SCA) ..... 4.3*(d)(ii), 11.3(c)(iii), 56A.4(e), 59.3(a)(iv), 63.3(b)*

Pharo's Properties CC and Others v Kuilders and Others 2001 (2) SA 1180 (LCC), [2001] 2 All SA 309 (LCC) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)

Phato v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape, and Another; Commissioner of the South African Police Services v Attorney General, Eastern Cape, and Others 1995 (1) SA 799 (E), 1994 (5) BCLR 99 (E) ..... 32.3*(c), 34.7(a)*

Phillips and Another v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division, and Others 2003 (3) SA 345 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC) ..... 3.7*(b)(i), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 10.3(c), 10.4(a), 17.3(f), 34.2(c), 34.6, 34.8(c)(ii), 34(c)(iii), 36.4(h), 42.3, 42.4, 42.5, 42.7(e), 42.9(e), 51.5(c)*, 52.11

Phillips and Others v National Director of Public Prosecutions 2003 (4) All SA 16 (SCA) ..... 51.5*(o)*

Phillips and Others v National Director of Public Prosecutions 2006 (1) SA 505 (CC), 2006 (1) SACR 78 (CC), 2006 (2) BCLR 274 (CC) ..... 4.3*(g)(ii), 4.4, 5.3(e), 5.3(e)*(i)

Phoebus Apollo Aviation CC v Minister of Safety and Security 2003 (2) SA 34 (CC), 2003 (1) BCLR 14 (CC) ..... 1.2*(b)(i), 4.2(b), 4.3(a)(i), 4.3(d)(i)(aa), 4.3(g)(ii), 4.3(h)(ii)(cc), 9.5(a)(iii), 11.2(b)(ii), 11.2(b)(iii), 11.4(c), 32.5(b), 46.2(a)*

Phumela Gaming and Leisure Ltd v Gründlingh and Others 2007(6) SA 350 (CC), 2006 (8) BCLR 833 (CC) ..... 1.3, 4.3*(d)(i)(aa), 32.5(b)*

Pillay and Others v S 2004 (2) BCLR 158 (SCA) ..... 51.5*(b), 52.10(a)*

Pillay, Ex parte (unreported, LCC Case No 1/99, 13 September 2004) ..... 48.8*(c)*(ii)

Pillay v KwaZulu-Natal MEC of Education and Others 2006 (6) SA 363 (EqC), 2006 (10) BCLR 1237 (N) ..... 35.5*(g)*(viii), 35.8

Pinchin and Another NO v Santam Insurance Co Ltd 1963 (2) SA 254 (W) 37.2

Pitout v Mbolane [2000] 2 All SA 377 (LCC) ..... 55.6*(b)*(ii)

Pizani v Minister of Defence 1987 (4) SA 592 (A) ..... 59.4*(a)*(ii)

Podlas v Cohen and Bryden NO and Others 1994 (4) SA 662 (T), 1994 (3) BCLR 137 (T) ..... 38.5*(b), 63.3(c)*

Pogrund v Yutar 1967 (2) SA 564 (A) ..... 38.2*(c)*(i)

Police and Prisons CiviI Rights Union and Others v Minister of Correctional Services and Others No 1 2008 (3) SA 91 (E), [2006] 2 All SA 175 (E) ..... 63.3*(b), 63.5(b), 63.5(c), 63.5(e)*

Police and Prisons CiviI Rights Union v Minister of Correctional Services and Others (2006) 27 ILJ 555 (E), 2006 (8) BCLR 971 (E) ..... 9.5*(c)(iii), 63.3(b)*
Police and Prison Unions v Minister of Correctional Services [2006] 2 All SA 175 (E) 23A.1, 23A.4
Poovalingham v Rajbansi 1992 (1) SA 283 (A) 42.10
Port Elizabeth Municipality v Peoples Dialogue on Land and Shelter 2001 (4) SA 759 (E) ..... 31.4*(f)*
Port Elizabeth Municipality v Peoples Dialogue on Land and Shelter and Others 2000 (2) SA 1074 (SE) ..... 32.3*(a), 55.6(b)*(ii)
Port Elizabeth Municipality v Various Occupiers 2005 (1) SA 217 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1268 (CC) ..... 4.2*(b), 4.3(d)(iii), 9.2(e)(i), 11.4(b), 32.4(c), 36.2(e), 36.4(I), 40.6(b), 48.4, 48.7(b)(iv), 55.6, 55.6(b)*(ii)
Port Elizabeth Municipality v Prut NO and Another 1996 (4) SA 318 (E), 1996 (9) BCLR1240 (E) ..... 7.1, 7.2*(c)(i), 7.2(c)*(iv), 34.6
Portion 608 New Belgium CC v Monyiki and Another (Unreported Land Claims Court, Case No LCC 62 / 98, 3 September 2002) ..... 66.1*(c)*
Poverty Alleviation Network & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2010 (6) BCLR 520 (CC), [2010] ZACC 5 ..... 17.5*(g), 17.6(a)(ii)(cc), 17.6(a)(iii), 17.8(b)*
Posts and Telecommunications Corporation v Modus Publications (Pty) Ltd 1998 (3) SA 1114 (ZS) ..... 42.9*(a), 42.9(c)*
Poswa v Member of the Executive Council for Economic Affairs, Environment and Tourism, Eastern Cape 2001 (3) SA 582 (SCA), 2001 (6) BCLR 545 (SCA) ..... 32.3*(a), 34.1(b)*, 54.5
Potgieter and Another v Kilian 1996 (2) SA 276 (N), 1995 (11) BCLR 1498 (N) ..... 32.3*(a), 42.9(a)*
Potgieter v Lid van die Uitvoerende Raad: Gesondheid, Provinsiale Regering, Gauteng 2001 (11) BCLR 1175 (CC) ..... 9.4*(e)(ii)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(cc), 34.6, 52.11, 59.4(a)*(ii)
Premier, Eastern Cape v Cekeshe 1999 (3) SA 56 (Tk) ..... 24B.1, 46.2*(a)*
Premier, Free State and Others v Firechem Free State (Pty) Limited 2000 (4) SA 413 (SCA), [2000] 3 All SA 247 (SCA) ..... 25.3*(b), 25.5(d)*
Premier, KwaZulu-Natal, and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 1996 (1) SA 769 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1561 (CC), [1995] ZACC 10 ..... 13.4, 17.3*(a), 17.5(g)*, 31.5, 64.4
Premier, Mpumalanga and Another v Executive Committee, Association of State-Aided Schools, Eastern Transvaal 1999 (2) SA 91 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 151 (CC) ..... 63.2*(b), 63.2(c), 63.3(c), 63.5(c), 63.5(d), 63.5(e)*, 63.10
Premier of the Province of the Western Cape v The Electoral Commission 1999 (11) BCLR 1209 (CC) ..... 29.3*(b)*
Premier, Provinsie Mpumalanga en 'n Ander v Groblerdalse Stadsraad 1998 (2) SA 1136 (SCA) ..... 7.4*(c)*
Premier, Western Cape v Faircape Property Developers (Pty) Ltd 2002 (6) SA 180 (C) ..... 13.5*(a), 40.5(b)(i) Premier, Western Cape v Faircape Property Developers (Pty) Ltd 2003 (6) SA 13 (SCA) ..... 9.5(a)(i), 13.5(a)*
Premier, Western Cape v President of the Republic of South Africa 1999 (3) SA 657 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 382 (CC) ..... 4.3*(a)(ii), 4.3(b)(i), 14.3(a), 14.3(b)(i), 14.3(b)(ii), 14.3(c)*(i),

14.3*(c)(ii), 14.5(a), 19.3(c), 20.3(d), 22.3(b)(vi), 23A.1, 23A.2, 23A.4, 23A.6, 23A.8, 31.4(f)*

President of the Ordinary Court Martial and Others v Freedom of Expression Institute 1999 (4) SA 682 (CC), 1999 (11) BCLR 1219 (CC) ..... 4.3*(c)(i), 7.4(c)*

President of the Republic of Bophuthatswana and Another v Milsell Chrome Mines (Pty) Ltd and Others 1995 (3) BCLR 354 (B) ..... 28.2*(a)*(ii)

President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) ..... 4.3*(d)(ii), 9.2(c)(iii)(bb), 11.1(b), 11.2(b)(i), 11.3(c)(ii), 11.4, 13.6, 12.3(b)(i), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 17.6(d), 18.2, 18.2(b), 18.2(d)* 24F.4*(a), 26.1, 31 Appendix(4)(c), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 33.5(e)(iii), 34.5(b)(ii), 34.7(a), 34.7(c)(ii), 34.8(e)(ii), 35.1(b), 35.1(d)(i), 35.2, 35.5(b), 35.5(f), 35.5(g)(ii), 35.5(h), 35.5(h)(i), 35.5(h)(ii), 35.5(h)(iii), 35.5(i), 36.2(b), 36.2(c), 36.3(c), 36.4(a), 36.4(f), 36.5(a)(ii), 37.4, 44.2(b), 44.3(a)(i), 49.3(b)(ii), 51.1(b)(iv), 56A.5(a), , 56B.4(g), 58.1, 63.3(b), 63.3(a)(iv), 64.4(a)*

President of the Republic of South Africa and Others v Gauteng Lions Rugby Union and Another 2002 (2) SA 64 (CC), 2002 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ..... 3.6, 6.1, 6.2*(l), 6.2(l)(i), 6.2(l)(ii), 6.2(l)*(iii)

President of the Republic of South Africa and Others v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd 2004 (6) SA 40 (SCA), 2004 (8) BCLR 821 SCA ..... 9.2*(d)(i)(aa), 9.2(e)(iv)(bb), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 9.6(c)(ii)(aa)*

President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Quagliani 2009 (4) BCLR 345 (CC), [2009] ZACC 1 ..... 17.2*(b)*(ii)

President of the Republic of South Africa and Others v South African Rugby Football Union and Others 1999 (2) SA 14 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 175 (CC) (SARFU I) ..... 4.2*(b), 4.3(b), 4.3(b)(v), 5.3(c), 17.5(f), 59.4(b)*(iii)

President of the Republic of South Africa and Others v South African Rugby Football Union and Others 1999 (4) SA 147 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 725 (CC) (SARFU II) ..... 4.3*(b), 4.3(d)(iv), 11.3(c)(i), 12.3(b)(ii), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa), 31.4(b)(ii), 31.4(b)(iii), 32.3(b), 59.4(b)(iii), 63.5(g), 63.5(d)*

President of the Republic of South Africa and Others v South African Rugby Football Union and Others 2000 (1) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1059 (CC), [1999] ZACC 11 (SARFU III) ..... 3.3*(d), 4.3(b), 4.3(d)(ii), 6.2(h), 6.2(k), 11.3(c)(ii), 12.3(b)(ii), 18.2, 18.2(b), 18.2(d), 18.2(f), 18.3(d)(i), 18.3(j), 23B.5(b)(iv), 24A.4(a)(iii), 24B.1, 24C.4(d), 26.6(d), 26.6(d)(iii), 31.4(b)(v), 63.10, 63.3(a)(iv), 63.5(a), 63.5(b)(i), 63.6(a), 11.4, 23A.1, 23A.3, 23A.4, 23B.5(b)(iv), 31.4(b)(v), 63.2(b), 63.3(a), 63.3(b), 63.5(d)*

President of the Republic of South Africa, Ex Parte: In re Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) ..... 11.1*(a), 11.1(b), 11.1(c), 11.2(b), 11.2(b)(i), 11.2(b)(ii), 11.2(b)(iii), 11.3(a), 11.3(b), 11.3(c), 11.3(c)(i), 11.3(c)(ii), 11.3(c)(iii), 11.4, 11.4(b), 11.4(c), 11.4(d), 11.4(e), 17.3(f), 57.3(b)*

President of the Republic of South Africa, Ex Parte: In re Constitutionality of the Liquor Bill 2000 (1) SA 732 (CC); 2000 (1) BCLR 1 (CC), [1999] ZACC 15 ..... 3.3*(d), 14.3(a), 14.3(c)(i), 15.1, 15.2(b), 15.3(a), 15.3(a)(ii), 15.3(a)(iv), 15.3(b), 15.3(c)(i), 15.3(c)(vi), 17.3(f)(i), 17.6(b)(i), (ii) & (iii), 19.3(a)(i), 19.3(c), 21.2(a)*

President of the Republic of South Africa v Eisenberg and Associates (Minister of Home Affairs Intervening) 2005 (1) SA 247 (C) ..... 18.3*(d)*(ii)

President of the Republic of South Africa v Modderklip BoerIdery (Pty) Ltd (AgriSA and Others, Amici Curiae) 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC) ..... 1.3, 3.7*(c), 4.2(b), 5.3(a)(ii), 8.5, 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.2(e)(i), 9.2(e)(iv)(aa), 9.2(e)(iv)(bb), 9.5(a)(ii)(aa), 9.6(c)(ii)(aa),13.7(a), 34.3(b), 34.5(b)(ii), 34.7(c)(i), 40.1(b)(i), 45.5(c), 48.4, 48.7(b)(iv), 59.2(b), 55.6(b)(ii), 55.6(c), 59.3(a)(v), 59.3(b), 59.4(d)*

President of the Republic of South Africa v United Democratic Movement (African Christian Democratic Party and Others Intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa and Another as Amici Curiae) 2003 (1) SA 472 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1164 (CC) ..... 4.3*(b), 4.3(b)(ii)(aa), 4.3(b)(vii), 4.3(b)(ii)(aa), 9.5(c)(ii), 17.4, 24C.4(a), 29.3(f)*

President, Ordinary Court Martial, and Others v Freedom of Expression Institute and Others 1999 (4) SA 682 (CC), 1999 (11) BCLR 1219 (CC) 5.3*(c)*

Pretoria City Council v Modimola 1966 (3) SA 250 (A) ..... 46.2*(a)*
Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) ..... 9.2*(b)(ii)(aa), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 9.6(c)(ii), 11.3(c)(iii), 13.5(a), 24D.4, 32.3(b), 32.4(c), 33.12, 34.5, 34.7(a), 36.4(a), 36.5(c), 38.3(b)(ii), 44.2(b), 44.3(c)(iii), 56B.3(c)*(v)
Pretoria Portland Cement and Another v Competition Commission and Others 2003 (2) SA 385 (SCA) ..... 36.4*(e), 63.3(b)*
Pretorius and Others v Minister of Correctional Services and Others 2004 (2) SA 658 (T) ..... 51.5*(g), 51.5(h)*
Pretorius v Beginsel (unreported Land Claims Court, Case No LCC 94R / 01, 13 December 2001) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Price Waterhouse Coopers Inc and Others v National Potato Co-operative Ltd 2004 (9) BCLR 930 (SCA) ..... 59.4*(a)*(ix)
Prince v President, Cape Law Society 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC) ..... 3.7*(b)(i), 41.1(b), 41.2(c), 41.3(a), 41.3(b), 41.4, 41.4(b), 44.1(b)(i), 44.3(c)(viii), 9.4(d)(ii), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa), 35.5(g)(viii), 41.1(b), 41.2(c), 41.3(a), 41.3(b), 41.4, 41.4(b), 44.1(b)(i), 44.3(c)(viii), 52.8, 52.11, 58.4(a)(i), 58.4(a)(iii), 58.4(a)(iv), 58.4(a)(v), 58.6, 59.3(a)*(v)
Prince v President, Cape Law Society and Others 2000 (3) SA 845 (SCA), 2000 (7) BCLR 823 (SCA) ..... 41.2*(c)*
Prince v President, Cape Law Society and Others 2001 (2) SA 388 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 133 (CC) ..... 34.1*(c), 34.3(b), 34.5(b)(i), 34.8(d)(ii), 35.5(g)(viii), 41.2(a), 41.2(c), 52.8, 58.4(a)*(vii)
Principal Immigration Officer v Bhula 1931 AD 323 ..... 32.3*(a)* Principal Immigration Officer v Hawabu and Another 1936 AD 26 ..... 32.3*(a), 32.5(c)*
Prinsloo and Another v Ndebele-Ndzundza Community and Others 2005 (6) SA 144 (SCA) ..... 48.8*(c)(i), 48.8(c)*(ii)
Prinsloo v Bramley Children's Home 2005 (2) SACR 2 (T) ..... 52.5, 52.7*(d)*
Prinsloo v Development Bank of Southern Africa Pension Fund and Another [1999] 12 BPLR 439 (PFA) 24A.6
Prinsloo v Nasionale Vervolgingsgesag En Andere 2011 (2) SA 214 (GNP) ..... 23B.3*(c)(iii)(cc)*
Prinsloo v Newman 1975 (1) SA 481 (A) ..... 38.3*(a)*(iv)
Prinsloo v RCP Media Ltd t/a Rapport 2003 (4) SA 456 (T) ..... 42.9*(b), 42.9(c), 42.9(d), 42.9(h)*
Prinsloo v Van der Linde and Another 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) ..... 1.3, 3.3*(d), 3.7(a), 11.1(c), 11.2(b)(i), 11.3(c)(ii), 31.3(d), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 34.3(b), 34.7(a), 35.1(d)(i), 35.2, 35.3, 35.3(a), 35.3(a)*(ii),

35.3*(e)(i), 35.5(b), 35.5(g)(viii), 36.2(c), 36.3(c), 36.4(a), 36.4(f), 37.4, 40.3(c)(i), 44.3(a)(i), 52.2(b), 52.4(a)(ii), 56B.4(g), 56D.5(c)(ii), 63.2(b), 64.4(a)*

Prison Care and Support Network and Another v Government of the Republic of South Africa (unreported, CPD Case No 9188/05) 55.8

Prize Trade 44 (Pty) Ltd v Isaac Tefo Memane (unreported, LCC Case No 35/01, 21 August 2003) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)

Prokureur-Generaal van die Witwatersrandse Plaaslike Afdeling v Van Heerden en Andere 1994 (2) SACR 469 (W) ..... 51.1*(b)(iv), 51.4(d)*

Prokureur-Generaal, Vrystaat v Ramokhosi 1996 (11) BCLR 1514 (O), 1997 (1) SACR 127 (O) ..... 51.1*(a)(ii), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.2, 51.4(d)*

Prophet v National Director of Public Prosecutions 2006 (1) SA 38 (SCA) ..... 4.3*(g)*(ii)

Prophet v National Director of Public Prosecutions 2007 (2) BCLR (CC) ..... 4.3*(a)(i), 4.3(g)*(ii)

Protea Assurance Co Ltd v Matinise 1978 (1) SA 963 (A) 6.1

Protea Technology Ltd and Another v Wainer and Others 1997 (9) BCLR 1225 (W) ..... 31.4*(b)(iii), 38.3(a)(i), 38.3(a)(iii), 52.10(f)*

Publications Control Board v Gallo (Africa) Ltd 1975 (3) SA 665 (A) ..... 41.1*(a), 41.2(b)*(i)

Public Carriers Association and Others v Toll Road Concessionaries (Pty) Ltd and Others 1990 (1) SA 925 (A) ..... 32.3*(a), 32.3(c), 32.5(c)*

Public Prosecutor v Mail & Guardian [2011] ZASCA 108 ..... 23B.6*(b)*(iv)

Public Servants Association of South Africa and Others v Minister of Justice and Another 1997 (3) SA 925 (T), 1997 (5) BCLR 577 (T) ..... 35.4*(c), 35.4(d)(ii), 51.1(b)*(iv)

Putco Ltd v Minister of Transport for the Republic of South Africa 2003 JDR 0408 (W) 63.10

Q

Qozeleni v Minister of Law and Order and Another 1994 (3) SA 625 (E); 1994 (1) BCLR 75(E) ..... 13.5*(a), 32.3(a), 32.3(b), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 32.5(c), 34.2(c), 35.3(c), 51.5(c)*, 62.1, 62.7

R

R v Adamstein 1937 CPD 331 ..... 52.7*(d)*

R v B 1933 OPD 139 ..... 52.4*(c)*(ii)

R v B 1960 (2) SA 424 (T) ..... 51.4*(b)*(i)

R v Barlin 1926 AD 459 ..... 52.4*(c)*(ii)

R v Blom 1939 AD 188 ..... 51.5(i)

R v Camane 1925 AD 570 ..... 52.4*(c)*(ii)

R v Daniels 1938 TPD 312 ..... 38.2*(a)*(iii)

R v Duetsimi 1950 (3) SA 674 (A) ..... 52.4*(c)*(ii)

R v du Preez 1943 AD 562 ..... 32.5*(b)*

R v Grigoriou 1953 (1) SA 479 (T) ..... 51.4*(d)*

R v Holliday 1927 CPD 395 ..... 38.2*(a)*(iii)

R v Ismail 1952 (1) SA 204 (A) ..... 52.4*(b)*(ii)

R v Jopp and another 1949 (4) SA 11 (N) ..... 17.3*(f), 63.6(a)*

R v Kerr (1907) 21 E.D.C 324 ..... 51.5*(n)*(iii)

R v Kritzinger 1952 (2) SA 401 (W) ..... 52.4*(b)*(iii)
R v Kuzwayo 1949 (3) SA 761 (A) ..... 52.2*(b)*
R v Lionda 1944 AD 348 ..... 30.2*(a)*
R v Machinini and Others (2) 1944 W.L.D. 91 ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii)
R v Maharaj 1960 (4) SA 256 (N) ..... 42.9*(c)*
R v Maharaj 1950 (3) SA 187 (A) ..... 12.3*(d)*(iii)
R v Maleke 1925 TPD 491 ..... 52.4*(c)*(ii)
R v Mashele 1944 AD 571 ..... 52.4*(b)*(ii)
R v Moyage and Others 1958 (3) SA 400 (A) ..... 51.5*(c)*
R v Muzorori 1967 (2) SA 177 (RA) ..... 59.4*(b)*(v)
R v Ndawo 1961 (1) SA 16 (N) ..... 52.6*(a), 52.6(a)*(ii)
R v Patel 1946 AD 903 ..... 51.4*(b)*(ii)
R v R 1954 (2) SA 134 (N) ..... 38.2*(a)*(iii)
R v Ranikolo 1954 (3) SA 255 (O) ..... 52.7*(b)*
R v Sachs 1953 (1) SA 392 (A) ..... 41.1*(a)*
R v Schaper 1945 AD 716 ..... 65.3*(a)*
R v Schoonberg 1926 OPD 247 ..... 38.2*(a)*(iii)
R v Shapiro 1935 NPD 155 ..... 17.3*(f)*
R v Smith 1922 TPD 199 ..... 47.7*(a)*
R v Tebetha 1959 (2) SA 337 (A) ..... 32.5*(c)*
R v Webb 1934 AD 493 ..... 41.1*(a)*
R v Xulu 1956 (2) SA 288 (A) ..... 52.4*(c)*(ii)
RTEAWU v Tedelex (Pty) Ltd (1990) 11 ILJ 1272 (IC) 53.5
Raats Röntgen and Vermeulen (Pty) Ltd v Administrator Cape and Others 1991 (1) SA 827 (C) ..... 32.3*(a)*
Radio Pretoria v Chairperson, Independent Communications Authority of South Africa, and Another 2005 (4) SA 319 (CC), 2005 (3) BCLR 231 (CC) ..... 4.3*(d)(iii), 4.4, 5.3(e), 5.3(e)*(i)
Radio Pretoria v Chairperson of the Independent Communications Authority of South Africa and Another 2003 (5) SA 451 (T), 2003 (4) BCLR 421 (T) ..... 4.3*(a)(ii), 11.2(b)*(i), 35.6
Raik v Raik 1993 (2) SA 617 (W) ..... 41.3*(b)*
Rail Commuters Action Group and Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail and Others 2003 (6) SA 349 (SCA), 2003 (12) BCLR 1363 (SCA) ..... 13.5*(a)*
Rail Commuters Action Group and Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail and Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC) ..... 1.3, 4.3*(e), 4.3(g)(i), 4.3(h)(i)(aa), 4.3(h)(ii)(bb), 6.2(d), 9.2(e)(iv)(aa), 9.2(f)(i), 9.5(b)(i), 9.5(b)(ii), 9.5(c)(i), 9.6(a), 9.6(c)(ii), 10.3(d)(iii), 13.5(a), 24A.4(b)(ii), 24B.1, 32.4(c), 34.7(c)(i), 36.3(d), 39.6, 40.5(b)(i), 42.5(b), 55.(c), 59.4(a)(iv), 63.6(d)*
Rail Commuters Action Group and Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail and Others (No 1) 2003 (5) SA 518 (C), 2003 (3) BCLR 288 (C) ..... 1.3, 7.2*(c)(v), 7.2(d), 9.2(b)(ii)(aa), 9.6(c)(ii)(aa), 13.5(a), 31.4(e)(viii), 37.5, 39.6, 43.2(b)*(ii)
Raloso v Wilson and Others 1998 (4) SA 369 (NC) ..... 39.5*(a)*, 51.2
Rammoko v Director of Public Prosecutions 2003 (1) SACR 200 (SCA), [2001] 4 All SA 731 (SCA) ..... 49.2*(c)(i) Ramothatha v Makhothe 1934 NAC (N&T) 74 ..... 59.2(a)*
Ramsay v Minister van Polisie 1981 (4) SA 802 (A) ..... 38.3*(a)*(iv)

Randall v Minister of Land Affairs; Knott v Minister of Land Affairs 2006 (3) SA 216 (LCC) ... 48.8*(c)*(ii)
Randburg Town Council v Kerksay Investments (Pty) Ltd 1998 (1) SA 98. ... 32.3*(a)* Rangani v Superintendent-General, Department of Health and Welfare, Northern Province 1999 (4) SA 385 (T) ... 56D.4*(a), 56D.4(b)*
Rashavha v Van Rensburg 2004 (2) SA 421 (SCA) ... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2004 (5) SA 545 (C), 2004 (12) BCLR 1328 (C) ... 3.4*(c), 8.4(c), 13.5(a), 22.4(e), 22.4(e)(iii), 22.5(c), 22.5(e), 27.2(d)*
Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2006 (1) SA 496 (SCA) ... 27.2*(d)*
Rathibe v Reid and Another 1927 AD 74 ... 26.2, 26.6*(c)*(iii)
Rattigan and Others v Chief Immigration Officer and Others 1995 (2) SA 182 (ZS), 1994 (2) ZLR 54 (ZS), 1995 (1) BCLR 1 (ZS) ... 66.1*(d)*(i)
Reeves v Marfield Insurance Brokers 1996 (3) SA 766 (A) ... 44.3*(c)*(iv)
Registrar of Banks v Regal Treasury Private Bank (under curatorship) and another (Regal Treasury Bank Holdings Ltd Intervening) 2004 (3) SA 560 (W) ... 63.3*(c)*
Reid-Daly v Hickman and others 1981 (2) SA 315 (ZA) ... 38.2*(a)*(iii)
Reitzer Pharmaceuticals (Pty) Ltd v Registrar of Medicines and Another 1998 (4) SA 660 (T) ... 43.3*(a)*(i)
Remhoogte Boerdery Edms (Bpk) v Mentoor (Unreported Land Claims Court Case No LCC 73R / 01, 11 October 2001) ... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Residents of Bon Vista Mansions v Southern Metropolitan Local Council 2002 (6) BCLR 625 (W) ... 22.4*(e)(v), 33.5(b), 33.9, 34.5(b)(ii), 56B.4(c)*(i)
Residents of the Joe Slovo Community, Western Cape v Thubelisha Homes and others 2010 (3) SA 454 (CC), 2009 (9) BCLR 847 (CC), [2009] ZACC 16 ... 56B.1, 56B.4*(c)*(ii)
Retrofit (Pty) Ltd v Posts & Telecommunications Corp (Attorney-General of Zimbabwe Intervening) 1996 (1) SA 847 (ZS), 1995 (9) BCLR 1262 (Z), 1995 (2) ZLR 199 ... 42.7*(g)*
Reuters Group PLC and Others v Viljoen NO and Others 2001 (12) BCLR 1265 (C) ... 23A.4
Reynolds Brothers Ltd v Chairman, Local Transportation Board, Johannesburg, and Another 1985 (2) SA 790 (W) ... 32.3*(a)*, 63.9
Rhodesian Printing and Publishing Co Ltd v Duggan and Another 1975 (1) SA 590 (RA) ... 38.2, 38.2*(a)(i), 38.2(a)(iii), 38.2(b)*(ii)
Rhodes University College v Field 1947 (3) SA 437 (A) ... 38.2*(c)(i) Ricardo v Jockey Club of South Africa 1953 (3) SA 351 (W) ... 44.1(c)*(vi)
Richardson and Others v South Peninsula Municipality and Others 2001 (3) BCLR 265 (C) ... 63.3*(b)*
Richtersveld Community and Others v Alexkor Ltd and Another 2001 (3) SA 1293 (LCC) ... 32.3*(b), 32.3(c), 32.5(c), 48.7(b)*(v)
Richtersveld Community and Others v Alexkor Ltd and Another 2003 (6) SA 104 (SCA), 2003 (6) BCLR 583 (SCA) ... 4.3*(e), 32.3(c), 36.5(c), 48.8(c)(iii), 58.1(b), 64.4(b)*(i)
Rikhoto v East Rand Administration 1983 (4) SA 278 (W) ... 2.2*(g)*
Ritamor Investments (Pty) Ltd and Others v The Unlawful Occupiers of Erf 62, Wynberg and Others (unreported, WLD case, 27 January 2006) ... 55.6*(b)*(ii)
Ritchie and Another v Government of the Northern Cape Province and Others 2004 (2) SA 584 (NC) ... 24B.3*(a), 31.4(e)(x), 42.9(a)*

Rivett-Carnac v Wiggins 1997 (3) SA 80 (C) ..... 42.9*(a)*
Road Accident Fund v Makwetlane 2005 (4) SA 51 (SCA) ..... 59.4*(a)*(ii)
Road Accident Fund v Van der Merwe (unreported, CCT case 48/05, 30 March 2006) ..... 40.3*(c)(i), 40.5(b)*(i)
Roberts and Others v Minister of Social Development and Others (unreported, TPD Case No 32838/05) ..... 56D.5*(c)(i), 56D.5(c)*(ii)
Robertson v Boss (unreported LCC Case No 6R/98, 30 September 1998) 55.6*(b)*(2)
Robertson v City of Cape Town and Another; Truman-Baker v City of Cape Town, 2004 (5) SA 412 (C), 2004 (9) BCLR 950 (C) ..... 11.3*(c)(ii), 11.3(c)(iii), 22.5(d), 22.5(h), 22.7(d)*
Roberts v Johncom Media Investments Ltd (Unreported Cape High Court Case No 8677 / 04, 8 Janurary 2007) ..... 42.9*(a)*
Robin Consolidated Industries Ltd v Commissioner for Inland Revenue 1997 (3) SA 654 (SCA) ..... 32.5*(b)*
Roman v Williams NO 1998 (1) SA 270 (C), [1997] 4 All SA 210 (C), 1997 (9) BCLR 1267 (C) ..... 49.3*(b)(ii), 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(x), 63.6(b)*
Romero v Gauteng Newspapers Ltd 2002 (2) SA 431 (W) ..... 42.9*(h)*
Roodepoort-Maraisburg Town Council v Eastern Properties (Pty) Ltd 1933 AD 87 ..... 7.2*(b)*
Rootman v President of the Republic of South Africa 2006 JDR 0457 (SCA) ..... 3.7*(c), 18.3(j), 18.3(k), 59.4(d)*
Rossouw v Minister of Mines and Minister of Justice 1928 TPD 741 ..... 7.3*(b)*
Rossouw v Sachs 1964 (2) SA SA 551 (A) ..... 32.3*(b)*
Ross v South Peninsula Municipality 2000 (1) SA 589 (C) ..... 31.4*(c)(ii), 32.4(a), 33.11(c), 55.6(a), 55.6(b)(ii), 56C.3(b)*(ii)
Rudolph and Another v Commissioner for Inland Revenue and Others 1996 (4) SA 552 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 889 (CC) ..... 6.2*(a), 38.3(a)*(ii)
Rustenburg Platinum Mines Limited (Rustenburg Section) v Commission for Conciliation, Meditation and Arbitration 2007 (1) SA 576 (SCA) ..... 63.3*(b)*
Ruyobeza and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Others 2003 (5) SA 51 (C) ..... 31.4*(f)*, 63.9
Ryland v Edros 1997 (2) SA 690 (C), [1996] 413 All SA 557 (C), 1997 (1) BCLR 77 (C) ..... 11.3*(b), 41.1(a), 41.3(c), 41.4(a), 41.6, 64.4(b)*(ii)

S

S v A and Another 1971 (2) SA 293 (T) ..... 38.2, 38.2*(a)(i), 38.2(a)(ii), 38.3(a)*(iii)
S v Abrahams 1997 (2) SACR 47 (C) ..... 51.5*(l)*
S v Abrahams 2002 (1) SACR 116 (SCA) ..... 49.2*(c)*(i)
S v Acheson 1991 (2) SA 805 (NmHC) ..... 13.3, 51.4*(d)*
S v Adams 1979 (4) SA 793 (T) ..... 32.3*(b)*
S v Agnew 1996 (2) SACR 535 (C) ..... 52.2*(b), 52.4(c)*(ii)
S v Aimes 1998 (1) SACR 343 (C) ..... 51.5*(j)(ii), 52.6(b)*
S v A Juvenile 1990 (4) SA 151 (ZS) ..... 49.2*(d), 49.2(d)*(ii)
S v Ambros 2005 (2) SACR 211 (C) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Angula and Others; S v Lucas 1997 (9) BCLR 1314 (Nm) ..... 51.5*(c)*
S v B 1980 (2) SA 946 (A) 52.9
S v B 2006 (1) SACR 311 (SCA), [2005] 2 All SA 1 (SCA) ..... 47.7*(a)*
S v Baloyi (Minister of Justice and Another Intervening) 2000 (2) SA 425 (CC), 2000 (1) SACR 81 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 86 (CC) ..... 17.5*(b), 24D.5(e), 32.3(b), 32.4(c), 32.5(c), 35.5(g)(ii), 36.4(c)(i), 37.5, 40.5(b)*(i),

	51.1*(a)(iv), 51.5(i), 52.4(a)*(ii), 52.9
S v Basson 2005 (1) SA 171 (CC), 2004 (6), BCLR 620 (CC), 2004 (1) SACR 285 (CC)	4.3*(d)(i)(bb), 4.3(d)(iii), 4.3(d)(iv), 4.3(e), 4.3(g)(ii), 5.3(e), 5.3(e)(iv), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.5(n)*(i)
S v Basson 2007 (3) SA 582 (CC), 2007 (1) SACR 566 (CC), 2005 (12) BCLR 1192 (CC)	4.3*(h)(i)(aa), 4.4, 52.10(b), 59.4(b)*(iii)
S v Bequinot 1997 (2) SA 887 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1588 (CC)	7.3*(c)(iii), 32.5(b)*
S v Bhengu 1995 (3) BCLR 394 (D)	51.5*(e)(i), 51.5(o)*
S v Bhoolia 1970 (4) SA 692 (A)	26.2
S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 748 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC)	3.7*(b)(ii), 9.2(b)(ii)(bb), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.2(e)(iv)(aa), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 9.4(b)(i), 9.4(b)(ii), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(cc), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 31.4(e)(vi), 32.5(b), 34.2(c), 34.8(b), 34.8(c)(ii), 34.8(c)(iii), 42.4, 49.2(c)(i), 51.5(i), 52.4(a)(ii), 52.4(a)*(iii)
S v Bierman 2002 (5) SA 243 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1078 (CC)	4.2*(b), 4.3(d)(i)(aa), 4.3(d)(iii), 31.4(e)(ii), 31.4(e)(iv), 32.5(b)*
S v Binta 1993 (2) SACR 553 (C)	52.4*(c)*(ii)
S v Blaauw 2001 (2) SACR 255 (C), [2001] 3 All SA 588 (C)	49.2*(c)*(i)
S v Boesak 2001 (1) SA 912 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 1 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 36 (CC)	4.2*(b), 4.3(a), 4.3(a)(ii), 4.3(d)(i)(aa), 4.3(g)(i), 4.3(h)(i)(aa), 4.3(h)(ii)(cc), 5.3(e), 5.3(e)(i), 9.5(a)(iii), 11.2(a), 11.2(b)(i), 31.4(b)(iii), 31.4(e)(ii), 31.4(e)(x), 40.3(c)(ii), 52.4(a)(ii), 52.4(b)(ii), 52.5, 53.1(a)*(ii)
S v Boshoff and others 1981 (1) SA 393 (T)	38.2*(a)*(iii)
S v Botha en Andere (2) 1995 (2) SACR 605 (W)	51.5(i), 51.5*(f)*(ii)
S v Botha en Andere 1994 (4) SA 799 (W), 1994 (3) BCLR 93 (W)	51.5*(c)*
S v Bresler and Another 2002 (4) SA 524 (T)	42.9*(c)*
S v Brown en 'n Ander 1996 (2) SACR 49 (NC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1480 (NC)	51.1*(b)(iii), 51.3(f), 51.5(f)(ii), 52.4(b)*(ii)
S v Budlender and Another 1973 (1) SA 264 (C)	2.2(i)(iii), 43.2*(a)*
S v Bull and Another; S v Chavulla and Others 2002 (1) SA 535 (SCA), 2001 (2) SACR 681 (SCA), 2002 (6) BCLR 551 (SCA)	31.4*(e)(vi), 40.7(c)(i), 49.2(c)(ii), 49.2(d)*(iv)
S v C 1998 (2) SACR 721 (C)	51.4*(d)*
S v Campbell 1991 (1) SACR 435 (Nm)	52.4*(b)*(iii)
S v Chabalala 2002 (1) SACR 5 (T)	51.1*(b)*(iii)
S v Chabedi 2004 (1) SACR 477 (W)	51.1*(b)*(iii)
S v Chapman 1997 (3) SA 341 (SCA), 1997 (2) SACR 3 (SCA)	36.4*(c)(i), 36.4(c)*(iii)

S v Charles 2002 (2) SACR 492 (E) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Chauke and Another 1998 (1) SACR 354 (V) ..... 51.5*(c), 51.5(l)*
S v Chavulla 1999 (1) SACR 39 (C) ..... 51.5*(b)*
S v Chikunga and Another 1997 (2) SACR 470 (Nms), 1997 (9) BCLR 1321 (NmS) ..... 51.5*(c)*
S v Cloete and Another 1999 (2) SACR 137 (C) ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii)
S v Coetzee and Others 1997 (3) SA 527 (CC), 1997 (4) BCLR 437 (CC) ... 9.4*(e)(ii)(aa), 37.5, 40.1(b)(i), 40.3(c)(ii), 51.1(a)(iii), 51.5(i), 52.4(a)(ii), 52.4(a)*(iii)
S v Collett 1990 (1) SACR 465 (A) ..... 49.2*(c)*(iii)
S v Collier 1995 (2) SACR 648 (C), 1995 (8) BCLR 975 (C) ..... 51.5*(e)(i), 51.5(l)*
S v Conifer (Pty) Ltd 1974 (1) SA 651 (A) ..... 32.3*(a)*
S v Cooper and Others 1976 (2) SA 875 (T) ..... 51.5*(c)*
S v Cornelissen; Cornelissen v Zeelie NO 1994 (2) SACR 41 (W) ..... 42.7*(d)*, 52.9
S v Damons and Others 1997 (2) SACR 218 (W) ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii)
S v Damoyi 2004 (2) SA 564 (C) ..... 13.7*(b)*, 65.6
S v Dangatye 1994 (2) SACR 1 (A) ..... 51.5*(g)*
S v Danster; S v Nqido 2002 (4) SA 749 (C) ..... 51.5*(o)*
S v De Bellocq 1975 (3) SA 538 (T) 39.4
S v De Kock 1997 (2) SACR 171 (T) ..... 40.7*(c)(i), 49.2(d)*(iv)
S v De Villiers 1999 (1) SACR 297 (O) ..... 52.7*(c)*
S v De Vries 1989 (1) SA 228 (A) ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii)
S v Dlamini 1973 (1) SA 144 (A) ..... 52.2*(b)*
S v Dlamini; S v Dladla; S v Joubert; S v Schietekat 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 51 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC) ..... 4.3*(d)(iv), 7.3(c)(iii), 7.4(c), 17.5(d), 31.2(d)(v), 32.3(a), 32.4(a), 32.5(c), 34.6, 34.8(c)(i), 34.8(c)(iii), 40.4(b), 51.1(b)(iv), 51.3(f), 51.4(d), 51.5(c), 51.5(i), 52.2(b), 52.4(a)*(i), 52.5
S v Dodo 2001 (1) SACR 301 (E) ..... 51.5*(e)(i), 51.5(k), 52.6(a)*(i)
S v Dodo 2001 (3) SA 382 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 594 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 423 (CC) ..... 12.2*(b), 12.3(b), 12.3(c)(i), 12.3(d)(i)(bb), 17.5(d), 31 Appendix(4)(c), 32.4(c), 34.2(c), 36.4(c)(iii), 40.7, 40.7(a)(ii), 40.7(c)(ii), 47.7(a), 49.2(c), 49.2(c)(i), 51.5(e)*(i)
S v Domingo 2005 (1) SACR 193 (C) ..... 52.6*(a)*(ii)
S v Dougherty 2003 (2) SACR 36 (W) ..... 39.5*(a)*
S v Dube 2000 (2) SA 583 (N), 2000 (1) SACR 53 (N), 2000 (6) BCLR 685 (N) ..... 36.2*(e), 36.4(c)(iii), 36.4(e), 38.3(a)(iii), 38.3(c), 51.1(b)(ii), 51.1(b)(iii), 52.10(a), 52.10(d)*
S v Du Plessis 1981 (3) SA 382 (A) ..... 32.5*(c)*
S v Du Preez 1975 (4) SA 606 (C) ..... 47.5*(a)*
S v Du Toit and Others 2005 (2) SACR 411 (T) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Du Toit en Andere 2005 (1) SACR 47 (T) ..... 52.6*(d)*
S v Dyani 2004 (2) SACR 365 (E) ..... 52.4*(c)(i), 52.6(b)*
S v Dzukuda and Others; S Tshilo 2000 (4) SA 1078 (CC), 2000 (2) SACR 443 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1252 (CC) ..... 9.2*(a), 14.5(d)(ii)(aa), 32.4(c), 49.2, 51.5(b)*,

	51.5*(f), 52.2(a), 52.4(a)(ii), 52.10(b)*
S v Ebrahim 1991 (2) SA 553 (A)	31.6*(a)*
S v Erasmus 1973 (4) SA 481 (T)	47.5*(c)*
S v F 1999 (1) SACR 571 (C)	51.5*(k), 52.6(a)*(ii)
S v Fani and Others 1994 (3) SA 619 (E), 1994 (1) BCLR 43 (E)	51.5*(c)*
S v Fazzie and Others 1964 (4) SA 673 (A)	17.5*(c), 32.5(c)*
S v Ffrench-Beytagh (1) 1971 (4) SA 333 (T)	32.5*(c)*
S v Gabriel 1971 (1) SA 646 (RA)	51.5*(n)*(iii)
S v Gasa 1998 (1) SACR 446 (D)	52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Gasa and Others 1998 (1) SACR 446 (D)	51.3*(f)*
S v Geiges [2007] ZAGPHC 46	42.9*(c)*
S v Geiges and Others (M&G Media Ltd and Others Intervening) 2007 (2) SACR 507 (T)	42.9*(g)*
S v Geldenhuys 2009 (1) SACR 1 (SCA)	47.5*(d)*
S v Gentle 2005 (1) SACR 420 (SCA)	52.7*(a)(i), 52.7(c)*
S v Gibson 1974 (4) SA 478 (A)	49.2*(c)*(i)
S v Gordon 1962 (4) SA 727 (N)	39.4
S v Gouwe 1995 (8) BCLR 968 (B)	51.5*(h)*
S v Gumede and Others 1998 (5) BCLR 530 (D)	32.1*(b), 32.4(c), 38.3(a)(i), 51.3(f), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v Gwala 1989 (4) SA 937 (N)	52.6*(b)*
S v H 1995 (1) SA 120 (C)	36.4*(b), 44.3(c)*(ii)
S v Halgryn 2002 (2) SACR 211 (SCA)	52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Hammer and Others 1994 (2) SACR 496 (C)	38.2*(a)(iii), 52.10(a)*
S v H and Another 1978 (4) SA 385 (E)	47.7*(a)*
S v Harber and Another 1988 (3) SA 396 (A)	42.4, 42.9*(c)*
S v Hartmann 1975 (3) SA 532 (C)	39.4
S v Hartmann and Another 1984 (1) SA 305 (ZS)	42.9*(c)*
S v Hassen and Another 1997 (2) SA 253 (T), 1997 (3) BCLR 377 (T)	51.1*(b)(iii), 51.5(b), 52.10(d)*
S v Hayes 1998 (1) SACR 625 (O)	52.10*(d)*
S v Hena 2006 (2) SACR 33 (SE)	52.4*(b)(ii), 52.10(a), 52.10(b), 52.10(e)*
S v Henckert 1981 (3) SA 445 (A)	32.5*(c)*
S v Hlalikaya and Others 1997 (1) SACR 613 (SE)	51.2, 51.3*(f), 51.4(b)(iii), 51.5(f)(ii), 52.4(c)*(ii)
S v Hlongwa 1979 (4) SA 112 (D)	51.4*(d)*
S v Hlongwa 2002 (2) SACR 37 (T)	52.4*(b)*(ii)
S v Hoosen 1999 (9) BCLR 987 (N)	51.5(i)
S v Huma and Another 1996 (1) SA 232 (W), 1995 (2) SACR 411 (W)	36.4*(e), 38.3(a)(ii), 40.3(b), 40.7(a)(i), 40.10(a), 51.1(a)(ii), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.4(b)(Iii), 52.4(c)*(ii)
S v I and Another 1976 (1) SA 781 (RA)	38.2*(a)(iii), 38.2(c)*(i)
S v Ismail 2006 (1) SACR 593 (C)	52.6
S v J 1998 (2) SA 984 (SCA), 1998 (1) SACR 470 (SCA), 1998 (4) BCLR 424 (SCA)	51.5.(i)
S v Jaars; S v Williams; S v Jantjies 2002 (1) SACR 546 (C)	51.5*(o)*
S v Jackson 1998 (1) SACR 470	32.5*(b), 52.7(a)*(i)
S v Jafta; S Ndondo; S v Mcontana 2004 (2) SACR 103 (E)	51.5*(o)*
S v Jaipal 2005 (4) SA 581 (CC), 2005 (5) BCLR 423 (CC), 2005 (1) SACR 215 (CC)	51.5*(b), 52.2(a), 63.5(g)*
S v Jama and Another 1998 (4) BCLR 485 (N)	51.5*(i)*
S v James 1994 (3) SA 881 (E), 1994 (1) BCLR 57 (E)	51.5*(c)*
S v J and Others 2000 (2) SACR 310 (C)	47.7*(a)*

S v Jansen 1975 (1) SA 425 (A) ..... 47.7*(a)*
S v January; Prokureur-Generaal, Natal v Khumalo 1994 (2) SACR 801 (A) ..... 52.4*(c)*(ii)
S v Jeniker (2) 1993 (2) SACR 464 (C) ..... 52.6*(b)*
S v Johardien 1990 (1) SA 1026 (C) ..... 41.1*(a)*, 41.6
S v John 2003 (2) SACR 499 (C) ..... 51.1*(b)*(iii)
S v Jonathan en Andere 1987 (1) SA 633 (A) ..... 51.4*(b)*(ii)
S v Joors 2004 (1) SACR 494 (C), [2003] 4 All SA 628 (C) ..... 51.1*(b)(iii), 51.5(b)*
S v Jordan and Others (Sex Workers Education and Advocacy Task Force and Others as Amici Curiae) 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 499 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC) ..... 3.7*(b)(i), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 13.3, 17.5(b), 24C.3(c)(ii), 24D.4, 24F.4(e)(i), 31.4(e)(viii), 34.8(c)(i), 35.1(d)(i), 35.2, 35.3(a)(i), 35.5(b), 35.5(c), 35.5(g), 35.5(g)(ii), 35.5(h), 35.5(j), 36.2(d), 36.3(c), 36.4(b), 36.4(f), 36.4(g), 38.3(a)(i), 38.5(a), 40.3(c)(ii), 40.10(b), 44.1(b)(i), 44.2(d), 44.3(c)(ii), 44.3(c)(x), 58.1(a), 64.6(a)*
S v Julies 1996 (4) SA 313 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 899 (CC), 1996 (2) SACR 108 (CC) ..... 3.7*(b)(ii), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb)*
S v Kampher 1997 (4) SA 460 (C), 1997 (9) BCLR 1283 (C) ..... 36.4*(b), 44.3(c)*(ii)
S v Kandovasu 1998 (9) BCLR 1148 (NmS) ..... 51.5*(c)*
S v Kanyile 1988 (3) SA 795 (N) ..... 51.5*(g)*
S v Katamba 2000 (1) SACR 162 (NmS) 52.8
S v Katoo 2005 (1) SACR 522 (SCA) ..... 52.7*(b), 52.7(d)*
S v Kellerman 1996 (1) SACR 89 (T) ..... 51.5*(e)*(i)
S v Kester 1996 (1) SACR 461 (B) ..... 51.1*(b)(iii), 51.5(b), 51.5(c)*
S v Kgafela 2003 (5) SA 339 (SCA) ..... 31.4*(e)*(x)
S v Kgampe and Others 1998 (2) SACR 617 (W) ..... 51.5*(n)(ii), 51.5(o)*
S v Khan 1997 (2) SACR 611 (SCA) ..... 51.3*(f), 51.4(b)(ii), 51.5(b), 51.5(j)*(ii)
S v Khanyapa 1979 (1) SA 824 (A) ..... 32.5*(c)*
S v Khanyile 1988 (3) SA 795 (N) ..... 51.5*(h), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v Khomunala and Another 1998 (1) SACR 362 (V) ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii)
S v Khoza en Andere 1994 (2) SACR 611 (W) ..... 51.5*(c)*
S v Khulu 1975 (2) SA 518 (N) ..... 49.2*(c)*(iii)
S v Khumalo 2006 (1) SACR 447 (N) ..... 52.2*(a)*
S v Khumbisa and Others 1984 (2) SA 670 (N) ..... 49.2*(c)*(i)
S v Kidson 1999 (1) SACR 338 (W) ..... 38.3*(a)(iii), 52.10(a), 52.10(e)*
S v Kika 1998 (2) SACR 428 (W) ..... 47.3*(b)*
S v Kok 2005 (2) SACR 240 (NC) ..... 52.4*(c)(i), 52.6(a)*
S v Kumalo and Others 1965 (4) SA 565 (N) ..... 49.2*(d)*(ii)
S v Kwalase 2000 (2) SACR 135 (C), [2001] 3 All SA 588 (C) ..... 47.7*(a), 49.2(c)*(i)
S v Langa 1996 (2) SACR 153 (N) ..... 51.5*(g)*
S v Langa and Others 1998 (1) SACR 21 (T) ..... 51.1*(a)(iv), 51.2, 51.4(b)(ii), 52.2(b)*
S v Lavhengwa 1996 (2) SACR 453 (W) ..... 35.3*(c), 35.3(d), 51.1(a)(iii), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.1(b)(iv), 51.4(b)(ii), 51.5(c), 51.5(d), 51.5(e)*(i),

51.5*(h), 51.5(j)(ii), 52.4(b)*(ii)
S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg 1997 (4) SA 1176 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC) ..... 3.3*(d), 8.3(g), 32.3(a), 32.4(c), 34.8(c)(ii), 35.5(g)(viii), 41.1(a), 41.1(b), 41.1(c)(iii), 41.2(b)(ii), 41.2(b)(iv), 41.2(c), 41.2(d), 41.2(e), 41.4(a), 41.5, 44.3(c)(iv), 46.5(b), 52.8, 54.1, 54.5, 58.4(a)(v), 58.6, 64.6(h)*
S v Legoa 2003 (1) SACR 13 (SCA) ..... 49.2, 51.1*(b)*(iii)
S v Legote 2001 (2) SACR 179 (SCA) ..... 52.4*(b)*(iii)
S v Lehnberg 1975 (4) SA 553 (A) ..... 47.7*(a)*
S v Leholoane 2001 (2) SACR 297 (T) ..... 49.3*(b)*(ii)
S v Lekhetho 2002 (2) SACR 13 (O) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Letaoana 1997 (11) BCLR 1581 (W) ..... 51.1*(b)(iii), 51.4(d)*
S v Letsin 1963 (1) SA 60 (O) ..... 51.1*(a)*(ii)
S v Letsoko 1964 (4) SA 768 (A) ..... 52.4*(b)*(ii)
S v Likuwa 1999 (2) SACR 44 (Nm), 1999 (5) BCLR 599 (Nm) ..... 49.2*(c)*(i)
S v Lombard en 'n Ander 1994 (3) SA 776 (T), 1994 (3) BCLR 126 (T) ..... 51.5*(g)*
S v Looij 1975 (4) SA SA 703 ..... 32.3*(a), 32.5(c)*
S v Lottering 1999 (12) BCLR 1478 (N) ..... 52.4*(c)(i), 52.10(a), 52.10(b), 52.10(c)*
S v Lubaxa 2001 (4) SA 1251 (SCA), 2001 (2) SACR 703 (SCA) ..... 40.3*(c)(ii), 51.5(j)(ii), 52.4(b)*(iii)
S v Lubisi: In Re S v Lubisi and Others 2004 (3) SA 520 (T), 2003 (9) BCLR 1041 (T) ..... 31.4*(b)(iii), 31.4(e)(iii), 31.4(e)(iv), 51.1(b)*(iii)
S v Lukhandile 1999 (1) SACR 568 (C) ..... 51.5*(o)*
S v Lungile and Another 1999 (2) SACR 597 (SCA) ..... 51.5*(k)*
S v Lusu 2005 (2) SACR 538 (E) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Lwane 1966 (2) SA 433 (A) ..... 52.2*(b)*
S v M 1999 (1) SACR 664 (C) ..... 51.5*(j)(ii), 51.5(k), 52.7(b)*
S v M 2000 (1) SACR 484 (W) ..... 51.5*(i)*
S v M 2002 (2) SACR 411 (SCA) ..... 52.7*(d), 52.10(a), 52.10(b)*
S v M 2003 (1) SA 341 (SCA) ..... 51.1*(b)(ii), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.5(b)*
S v M [2004] 2 All SA 74 (D) ..... 51.5*(g)*
S v M 2004 (3) SA 680 (O) ..... 31.4*(e)(viii), 40.10(b)*
S v M 2006 (1) SACR 135 (SCA) ..... 47.5*(d), 52.7(a)*(i)
S v M and Another 2005 (1) SACR 481 (E) ..... 47.7*(a)*
S v M (Centre for Child Law as Amicus Curiae) 2008 (3) SA 232 (CC), 2007 (2) SACR 539 (CC), 2007 (12) BCLR 1312 (CC) 47.1
S v Maake 2001 (2) SACR 288 (W) ..... 52.10*(e)*
S v Mabaso and Another 1990 (3) SA 185 (A) ..... 51.5*(g), 51.5(j)*(ii)
S v Machasa 1991 (2) SACR 308 (A) ..... 47.7*(a)*
S v Madiba 1998 (1) BCLR 38 (D) ..... 38.3*(a)(i), 51.1(b)(ii), 52.10(a), 52.10(b), 52.10(c)*
S v Maduna en 'n Andere 1997 (1) SACR 646 (T) ..... 51.1*(b)(ii), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.5(g)*
S v Mafu 1978 (1) SA 454 (C) ..... 51.5*(l)*
S v Maghuwazuma 1997 (2) SACR 675 (C) ..... 51.5*(e)*(i)
S v Mahlangu 2000 (1) SACR 565 (W) ..... 51.1*(a)(iv), 51.2, 52.2(b)*, 52.9

S v Mahomotsa 2002 (2) SACR 435 (SCA), [2002] 3 All SA 534 (SCA) ..... 49.2*(c)*(i)
S v Majavu 1994 (4) SA 268 (Ck), 1994 (2) SACR 265 (Ck), 1994 (2) BCLR 56 (Ck) ..... 34.2*(c), 51.5(b), 51.5(c)*
S v Makiti [1997] 1 All SA 291 (B) 52.5
S v Makoena 2005 (1) SACR 594 (T) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Makofane 1998 (1) SACR 603 (T) ..... 51.1*(b)(ii), 52.4(b)*(iii)
S v Makofane 1998 (1) SACR 603 (T) ..... 51.5(i), 51.5*(j)*(ii)
S v Makwanyane and Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) ..... 1.3, 2.2*(a), 4.2(a), 3.3(c), 3.7(a), 3.7(b)(i), 8.1(b), 8.1(c), 9.2(b)(iv), 9.2(c)(iv), 9.4(c), 9.5(c)(iii), 9.6(c)(iii),10.3(c), 11.3(c)(i), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 13.2(a), 23A.4, 24E.3(b), 30.3, 30.4(a), 31.2(d)(v), 31.7(a), 32.2(a), 32.3(a), 32.3(b), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 32.5(c), 33.3(c), 33.9, 34.1(a), 34.1(b), 34.2(c), 34.3(b), 34.6, 34.7(a), 34.7(c)(ii), 34.8(b), 34.8(c)(i), 34.8(e)(ii), 36.1(b), 36.2(e), 36.4(c)(iii), 37.2, 37.4, 37.8, 38.3(a)(i), 38.5(b), 39.2, 39.5(a), 39.7, 39.8, 40.3(d), 40.5(c), 40.6(a), 40.6(b), 40.7, 40.7(a)(ii), 42.4, 43.3(a), 47.7(a), 48.4, 49.1, 49.2(b), 49.2(c), 49.2(c)(ii), 49.2(d), 49.2(d)(i), 49.2(d)(iv), 49.3(a), 50.3(c)(ii), 51.1(b)(iv), 51.4(d), 52.8, 52.11, 59.2(c), 53.6, 55.2(b)*
S v Malatji and Another 1998 (2) SACR 622 (W) ..... 51.5*(b), 51.5(o), 52.6(a)*
S v Malefo en Andere 1998 (1) SACR 127 (W), 1998 (2) BCLR 187 (W) .... 51.1*(b)(iii), 51.3(f), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v Malgas 2001 (2) SA 1222 (SCA), 2001 (1) SACR 469 (SCA) ..... 12.3*(d)(i)(bb), 31.4(e)(x), 49.2(c)*(i)
S v Mamabolo (E TV and Others Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC) ..... 10.3*(a), 10.4, 10.4(a), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa), 13.6, 31.2(d)(v), 31.4(b)(iii), 32.3(b), 32.4(c), 32.5(c), 34.1(a), 34.1(b), 34.7(a), 34.8(c)(ii), 34.8(c)(iii), 36.4(h), 36.4(h)(iii), 36.5(a)(ii), 42.4, 42.5(a), 42.7(a), 42.9(c), 42.9(g), 43.1, 43.2(b)(ii), 51.1(a)(iii), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.1(b)(iv), 51.5(e)(i), 52.4(a)*(ii)
S v Manale 2000 (2) SACR 666 (NC) ..... 51.5*(g), 52.4(c)*(i)

S v Manamela and Another (DG of Justice Intervening) 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) SACR 414 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC) ..... 7.4*(c), 9.2(c)(iii)(aa), 9.4(d)(iii), 10.3(c), 17.5(b), 34.1(a), 34.2(c), 34.8(b), 34.8(c)(ii), 34.8(c)(iii), 42.9(g), 51.1(b)(iv), 51.5(i), 51.5(j)(ii), 52.4(a)(i), 52.4(b)*(i), 52.11
S v Manguanyana 1996 (2) SACR 283 (E) ..... 51.5*(g), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v Manqaba 2005 (2) SACR 489 (W) ..... 52.6*(a), 52.6(a)*(ii)
S v Mansoor 2002 (1) SACR 629 (W) ..... 52.10*(a)*
S v Manuel 1997 (11) BCLR 1597 (C) ..... 51.5*(b)*
S v Manuel 2001 (4) SA 1351 (W) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Manyonyo 1996 (11) BCLR 1463 (E) ..... 51.1*(a)(ii), 51.5(f)*, 51.5(i)
S v Maphumulo and Another 1996 (2) SACR 84 (N), 1996 (2) BCLR 167 (N) ..... 51.3*(f), 52.4(c)*(ii)
S v Maputle and Another 2003 (2) SACR 15 (SCA) ..... 51.5*(b), 52.10(e)*
S v Maredi 2000 (1) SACR 611 (T) ..... 51.5*(f)*
S v Maritz 1974 (1) SA 266 (NC) ..... 51.4*(b)*(ii)
S v Mark 2001 (1) SACR 572 (C) ..... 52.10*(a), 52.10(c)*
S v Marwane 1982 (3) SA 717 (A) ..... 32.1*(a), 32.1(b)*
S v Marx and Another 1996 (2) SACR 140 (W) ..... 51.3*(f), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v Maseko 1982 (1) SA 99 (A) ..... 49.2*(c)*(iii)
S v Maseko 1996 (2) SACR 91 (W), 1996 (9) BCLR 1137 (W) ..... 51.1*(b)(iii), 51.5(j)*(ii)
S v Masina 1990 (4) SA 709 ..... 32.3*(a)*
S v Masiya (unreported, SHG Case No 94/04, 11 July 2005) (unreported, SHG case no 94/04, 11 July 2005) ..... 3.7*(b)*(ii)
S v Mataboge and Others 1991 (1) SACR 539 (B) ..... 51.4*(d)*
S v Mathebula 1997 (1) SACR 10 (W), 1997 (1) BCLR 123 (W) ..... 34.7*(c)(i), 34.7(c)(ii), 51.1(a)(ii), 51.1(b)(ii), 51.1(b)(iv), 51.3(f), 51.4(b)(iii), 51.5(i), 51.5(j)(ii), 52.2(b), 52.4(b)(iii), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v Mathole 2002 (2) SACR 484 (T) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Matladi 2002 (2) SACR 447 (T) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i), 52.6
S v Matlawe 1989 (2) SA 883 (BG) ..... 51.4*(a)*
S v Matoma 1981 (3) SA 838 (A) ..... 49.2*(c)*(iii)
S v Matomela 1998 (3) BCLR 339 (Ck), [1998] 2 All SA 1 (Ck) ..... 13.7*(b), 51.5(l)*, 65.6
S v Mavuso 1987 (3) SA 499 (A) ..... 51.5*(n)*(iii)
S v May 2005 (2) SACR 331 (SCA) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Mayekiso 1996 (2) SACR 298 (C) ..... 52.10*(a), 52.10(e)*
S v Mazingane 2002 (6) BCLR 634 (W) ..... 51.5*(b)*
S v Mbaba 2002 (1) SACR 43 (E) ..... 51.1*(a)*(iii)
S v Mbambo 1999 (2) SACR 421 (W) ..... 51.3*(f), 51.5(g), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v Mbatha; S v Prinsloo 1996 (2) SA 464 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 371, 1996 (3) BCLR 293 (CC) ..... 3.7*(b)(ii), 5.3(d), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(cc), 10.3(c), 34.1(a), 34.8(c)(i), 34.8(c)(iv), 51.4(a), 51.5(i), 52.4(a)*(iii)
S v Mbeje 1996 (2) SACR 252 (N) ..... 51.5*(b), 51.5(k)*
S v Mbele and Another 1996 (1) SACR 212 (W) ..... 51.4*(d)*
S v Mbolombo 1995 (5) BCLR 614 (C) ..... 51.4*(b)(iii), 51.5(i), 51.5(j)*(ii)
S v Mcasa 2005 (1) SACR 388 (SCA) ..... 52.4*(b)*(i)

S v M (Centre for Child Law as Amicus Curiae) 2008 (3) SA 232 (CC), 2007 (2) SACR 539, 2007 (12) BCLR 1312 (CC) ..... 47.1, 47.3*(b), 47.4(a), 47.10(c)*
S v McIntyre en Andere 1997 (2) SACR 333 (T) ..... 51.5*(n)*(iii)
S v McKenna 1998 (1) SACR 106 (C) ..... 51.3*(f), 51.5(b), 51.5(g), 51.5(h), 51.5(k), 52.4(b)*(iii)
S v Mdau 1991 (1) SA 169 (A) ..... 49.2*(d)*(iv)
S v Meaker 1998 (2) SACR 73 (W), 1998 (8) BCLR 1038 (W) ..... 31.8*(b), 51.1(a)(iii), 51.1(b)(iv), 51.4(a)*
S v Meer en 'n Ander 1981 (4) SA 604 (A) ..... 2.2(i)(iii), 43.2*(a)*
S v Mehlape en Andere 1993 (2) SACR 180 (T) ..... 49.2*(d)*(iv)
S v Melani 1996 (1) SACR 335 (E) ..... 52.4*(c)(i), 52.10(a)*
S v Melani and Others 1995 (4) SA 412 (E), 1995 (2) SACR 141 (E), 1996 (2) BCLR 174 (E) ..... 51.1*(a)(iv), 51.2, 51.3(f), 51.4(b)(iii), 51.5(b), 51.5(b), 51.5(h), 52.10(a)*
S v Mello and Another 1998 (3) SA 712 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 908 (CC) ..... 3.7*(b)(ii), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 34.8(c)(i), 52.4(a)*(iii)
S v Mfazwe and Others (Unreported Cape Provincial Division Case No 07/06, 28 June 2007) ..... 47.7*(a)*
S v Mfene 1998 (9) BCLR 1157 (N) ..... 51.3*(f), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v Mgcina 2007 (1) SACR 82 (T) ..... 52.10*(g)*
S v Mhlakaza and Others 1996 (2) SACR 187 (C), 1996 (6) BCLR 814 (C). 32.1*(c), 51.1(b)(ii), 51.3(f), 51.5(b), 51.5(j)(ii), 52.4(c)(ii), 52.10(e)*
S v Mhlungu and Others 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 277 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) ..... 3.4*(g), 4.3(c)(i), 4.3(h)(ii)(bb), 7.3(c)(iii), 9.2(f)(ii), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(cc), 10.3(a), 19.6, 31 Appendix(2), 32.3(a), 32.3(b), 32.4(a), 32.4(c), 32.5(b), 32.5(c), 34.1(c), 34.8(e)(i), 51.3(f), 57.3(c)(vi), 57.4(c)(ii)(aa), 59.3(a)(i), 64.6(e)*
S v Mkhize 1999 (2) SACR 632 (W) ..... 52.10*(b), 52.10(c)*
S v Mofokeng 2004 (1) SACR 349 (W) ..... 51.5*(h), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v Mogotsi and Another 1982 (1) SA 190 (B) ..... 51.4*(b)*(ii)
S v Mohlobane 1969 (1) SA 561 (A) ..... 47.7*(a)*
S v Moilwa 1997 (1) SACR 188 (NC) ..... 51.1*(b)(iii), 51.5(b), 51.5(h), 51.5(k)*
S v Mokoena and Others 2006 (1) SACR 29 (W) ..... 52.4*(b)*(ii)
S v Mokoena en Ander 1998 (2) SACR 642 (W) ..... 51.3*(f), 51.4(b)(ii), 51.4(b)(iii), 52.4(c)*(ii)
Sv Mokoena; S v Phaswane [2008] ZAGPHC 148 ..... 9.6*(c)(ii)(bb)*
S v Molenbeek en Andere 1997 (12) BCLR 1779 (O) ..... 51.5*(g)*
S v Monyane and Others 2001 (1) SACR 115 (T) ..... 51.1*(b)(iii), 51.2, 51.3(a), 51.3(f), 51.4(b)(iii), 52.4(c)(i), 52.4(c)*(ii)
S v Moos 1998 (1) SACR 372 (C) ..... 51.5*(h), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v Mosoetsa 2005 (1) SACR 304 (T) ..... 51.5*(k)*
S v Mosoinyane 1998 (1) SACR 583 (T) ..... 51.5*(e)*(i)
S v Mothopeng 1978 (4) SA 874 (T) ..... 59.4*(b)*(v)

S v Motloutsi 1996 (1) SA 584 (C), 1996 (1) SACR 78 (C), 1996 (2) (7) BCLR 220 (C)	38.3*(a)(ii), 52.10(a), 52.10(b)*
S v Motsasi 1998 (2) SACR 35 (W)	51.3*(f), 51.5(f)*
S v Motshari 2001 (1) SACR 550 (NC), 2001 (2) All SA 207 (NC)	32.3*(a)*
S v Motsoetsoana 1986 (3) SA 350 (N)	49.2*(d)*(ii)
S v Mpetha (2) 1983 (1) SA 576 (C)	52.2*(b)*
S v Mphala 1998 (1) SACR 388 (W), 1998 (4) BCLR 494 (W)	51.3*(f), 52.10(b), 52.10(c)*
S v Mphala 1998 (1) SACR 654 (W)	52.4*(c)*(ii)
S v Mpofana 1998 (1) SACR 40 (Tk)	51.3*(d), 51.3(e), 51.3(g)*
S v Mseleku 2006 (2) SACR 574 (D)	52.4*(b)*(ii)
S v Msenti 1998 (1) SACR 401 (W), 1998 (3) BCLR 343 (W)	51.5*(e)(i), 51.5(o)*
S v Mshumpa 2008 (1) SACR 126 (E)	47.11*(a)*
S v Msithing 2006 (1) SACR 266 (N)	52.2*(a)*
S v Mthethwa 2004 (1) SACR 449 (E)	51.1*(a)(iv), 52.2(b), 52.10(a)*
S v Mthetwa 1972 (3) SA 766 (A)	52.4*(b)*(ii)
S v Mtyuda 1995 (5) BCLR 646 (E)	51.5*(b)*
S v Muchindu 1995 (2) SA 36 (W)	30.1*(b)*(i)
S v Mukwevho; S v Ramukhuba 1983 (3) SA 498 (V)	26.6*(d)*(iii)
S v Muller 2005 (2) SACR 451 (C)	52.2*(a)*, 52.6
S v Mumbe 1997 (1) SA 854 (W)	50.4*(c)*
S v Mungoni 1997 (2) SACR 366 (V), 1997 (8) BCLR 1083 (V)	51.5*(b), 52.6(b)*
S v Munn 1973 (3) SA 734 (NC)	52.7*(b)*
S v Mvelasi 2005 (2) SACR 266 (O)	52.2*(a)*
S v N 1998 (1) BCLR 97 (Tk)	51.5*(b), 51.5(d)*
S v N 2008 (2) SACR 135 (SCA)	47.7*(a)*
S v Naidoo 1998 (1) SACR 479 (N), 1998 (1) BCLR 46 (D)	31.8*(b), 38.3(a)(i), 38.3(a)(iii), 38.3(b)(iii), 38.3(b)(iv), 51.1(b)(ii), 51.1(b)(iv), 52.10(b), 52.10(c), 52.10(g)*
S v N and Another 2005 (1) SACR 201 (CkH)	47.7*(a)*
S v Naude 2005 (2) SACR 218 (W)	52.5, 52.7*(b), 52.7(c)*
S v Ncube; S v Tshuma; S v Ndhlovu 1988 (2) SA 702 (ZS)	40.7*(a)(i), 40.7(a)(ii), 49.2(d), 49.2(d)*(ii)
S v Ndaba and others 1987 (1) SA 237 (T)	49.2*(d)*(ii)
S v Ndala 1996 (2) SACR 218 (C)	51.5*(l)*
S v Ndhlovu 1997 (12) BCLR 1785 (N)	52.2*(b)*
S v Ndhlovu and Others 2001 (1) SACR 85 (W)	51.4*(b)*(ii)
S v Ndhlovu and Others 2002 (6) SA 305 (SCA), 2002 (2) SACR 325 (SCA)	13.3, 51.1*(b)(iii), 52.6(a)*(i)
S v Ndlangamandla 1999 (1) SACR 391 (W)	51.5*(j)*(ii)
S v Ndlovu 1997 (12) BCLR 1785 (N)	51.4*(b)*(i)
S v Ndlovu 2001 (1) SACR 85 (W)	51.5*(k)*
S v Ndlovu 2001 (1) SACR 204 (W)	52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Ndlovu 2003 (1) SACR 331 (SCA)	49.2
S v Ndlovu; S v Sibisi 2005 (2) SACR 645 (W)	52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Ndou 2006 (2) SACR 497 (T)	52.6*(a)*
S v Ndou and Others 1971 (1) SA 668 (A)	51.5*(n)(i), 51.5(n)*(iii)
S v Nduku 2000 (2) SACR 382 (TkHC)	52.4*(a)*(iii)
S v Nehemia Tjijo (unreported Namibia High Court, 4 September 1991)	49.2*(d)*(iv)
S v Nel 1987 (4) SA 276 (O)	32.3*(a)*
S v Nel 1987 (4) SA 950 (W)	49.2*(c)*(i)
S v Ngcobo 1998 (10) BCLR 1248 (N)	51.3*(f), 52.4(c)(i), 52.10(b), 52.10(c), 52.10(e)*

S v Ngcobo 1999 (3) BCLR 298 (N) ..... 51.5*(e)*(i)
S v Ngubane 1995 (1) BCLR 121 (T) ..... 51.5*(k)*
S v Ngwani 1990 (1) SACR 449 (N) ..... 52.6*(a)*(i)
S v Ngwenya and Others 1998 (2) SACR 503 (W), 1999 (3) BCLR 308 (W) ..... 51.2, 51.3*(f), 51.4(b)(ii), 51.4(b)(iii), 52.2(b), 52.4(c)*(ii)
S v Nichas and Another 1977 (1) SA 257 (C) ..... 51.4*(d)*
S v Niemand 2002 (1) SA 21 (CC), 2001 (2) SACR 654 (CC), 2001 (11) BCCR 1181 (CC) ..... 9.4*(d)(ii), 9.4(d)(iii), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 34.6, 40.7, 40.7(c)(i), 49.2(c)*(ii)
S v Njikaza 2002 (2) SACR 481 (C) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Nkabinde 1998 (8) BCLR 996 (N) ..... 38.3*(a)(iii), 51.5(d), 51.5(e)(i), 51.5(j)*(ii)
S v Nkondo 2000 (1) SACR 358 (W) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Nkosi 2002 (1) SA 494 (W), 2002 (1) SACR 135 (W), [2002] 4 All SA 745 (W) ..... 47.7*(a), 49.2(c)*(i)
S v Nkosi and Another 2003 (1) SACR 91 (SCA) ..... 40.7*(c)(i), 49.2(d)(iii), 49.2(d)*(iv)
S v Nkosi en 'n Andere 1984 (3) SA 345 (A) ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii)
S v Nkosiyana and Another 1966 (4) SA 655 (A) ..... 42.8*(b)*
S v Nocuse and Others 1995 (3) SA 240 (Tk) ..... 34.7*(a)*
S v Nombewu 1996 (2) SACR 396 (E), 1996 (12) BCLR 1635 (E) ..... 51.1*(b)(ii), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.3(f), 51.4(b)(i), 51.5(b), 52.4(c)(i), 52.10(g)*
S v Nortjé 1997 (1) SA 90 (C) ..... 51.1*(b)(ii), 51.5(b)*
S v Ntsele 1997 (2) SACR 740 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1543 (CC) ..... 3.7*(b)(ii), 9.2(b)(ii)(bb), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 34.8(c)(i), 52.4(a)*(iii)
S v Ntshwence 2004 (1) SACR 506 (Tk), [2004] 1 All SA 328 (Tk) ..... 51.1*(a)(iii), 51.5(e)*(i)
S v Ntuli 1993 (2) SACR 599 (W) ..... 52.10*(e)*
S v Ntuli 1996 (1) SA 1207 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 94 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 141 (CC) ..... 3.7*(b)(ii), 9.2(c)(iii)(aa), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 35.3, 35.3(c), 35.3(d)* 35.3*(e)(i), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.5(b), 51.5(o), 52.2(a)*, 52.8
S v Ntuli 2003 (4) SA 258 (W), 2003 (1) SACR 613 (W) ..... 51.5*(h), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v Ntzweli 2001 (2) SACR 361 (C) ..... 52.10*(e)*
S v Nzima 2001 (2) SACR 345 (C) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Odugo 2001 (1) SACR 560 (W) ..... 52.10*(d)*
S v Oosthuizen 1991 (2) SACR 298 (A) ..... 49.2*(d)*(iv)
S v Orrie 2004 (1) SACR 162 (C) ..... 51.4*(b)(iii), 52.4(c)*(ii)
S v Orrie 2005 (1) SACR 63 (C) ..... 51.1*(a)(iv), 51.5(h), 52.2(b), 52.4(c)(i), 52.4(c)*(ii)
S v P 1985 (4) SA 105 (N) ..... 49.2*(c)*(iv)
S v Pennington and Another 1997 (4) SA 1076 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 329 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1413 (CC) ..... 4.2*(b), 11.2(a), 19.6, 31.4(e)(ii), 31.4(e)(iv), 31.8(a), 31.8(b), 36.4(c)(iii), 51.1(a)(v), 51.5(f), 51.5(o), 59.3(a)*(iii)
S v Penrose 1966 (1) SA 5 (N) ..... 30.2*(a)*

S v Petane 1988 (3) SA 51 (C) ..... 30.1*(a)*
S v Petersen en 'n Ander 2001 (1) SACR 16 (SCA) ..... 47.7*(a)*
S v Petrus and Another [1985] LRC (Const) 699 (Botswana CA) ..... 40.7*(c)(i), 49.2(d)*(ii)
S v Phallo and Others 1998 (3) BCLR 352 (B) ..... 51.1*(a)(iii), 51.4(a), 51.4(b)(i), 51.5(e)*(i)
S v Philemon 1997 (2) SACR 651 (W) ..... 51.5*(b), 51.5(g)*
S v Pienaar 2000 (2) SACR 143 (NC), 2000 (7) BCLR 800 (NC) ..... 13.7*(b), 65.6, 51.5(b), 51.5(l)*
S v Pillay 2004 (2) SACR 419 (SCA) ..... 52.10*(b), 52.10(c), 52.10(d)*
S v Pitso 2002 (2) SACR 586 (C) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Pogrund 1961 (3) SA 868 (T) ..... 42.7*(d)*, 52.9
S v Potgieter 1994 (1) SACR 61 (A) ..... 49.2*(c)*(iii)
S v Quandu en Andere 1989 (1) SA 517 (A) 47.7
S v R 1993 (1) SA 476 (A), 1993 (1) SACR 209 (A) ..... 49.2*(a)*(i)
S v R 2000 (1) SACR 33 (W) ..... 38.3*(a)(i), 52.10(b)*
S v Radebe 1968 (4) SA 410 (A) ..... 52.4*(c)*(ii)
S v Radebe 1988 (1) SA 772 (A) ..... 32.3*(a)*
S v Radebe, S v Mbonani 1988 (1) SA 191 (T) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Ralukukwe 2006 (2) SACR 394 (SCA) ..... 52.4*(c)(ii), 52.6(a)*(i)
S v Ramadzanga 1988 (2) SA 816 (V) ..... 47.7*(a)*
S v Ramavhale 1996 (1) SACR 639 (A) ..... 51.5*(b), 51.5(j)(ii), 51.5(k), 52.6(a)*(i)
S v Ramuongiwa 1997 (2) BCLR 268 (V) ..... 51.1*(a)(ii), 51.5(b), 51.5(h)*
S v Reay 1987 (1) SA 873 (A) ..... 49.2*(c)*(iii)
S v Reeding 2005 (2) SACR 631 (C) ..... 52.10*(d)*
S v Rens 1996 (1) SA 1218 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 105 (CC), 1996 (2) BCLR 155 (CC) ..... 32.3*(a), 35.3(c), 35.3(e)(i), 51.5(b), 51.5(e)(i), 51.5(o), 59.3(a)(iv), 59.4(a)*(v)
S v Roberts 1999 (4) SA 915 (SCA) ..... 63.5*(g)*
S v Rudman and Another 1992 (1) SA 343 (A) ..... 51.5*(b)*
S v Rudman and Another; S v Mthwana 1992 (1) SA 343 (A), 1992 (1) SACR 70 100 ..... 52.2*(a), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v S 1999 (1) SACR 608 (W) ..... 51.5*(o)*
S v S 2001 (1) SACR 79 (W) ..... 47.7*(a)*
S v S 2001 (2) SACR 321 (T) ..... 47.7*(a)*
S v Schietekat 1999 (2) BCLR 240 (C) ..... 51.4*(d)*
S v Scholtz 1996 (2) SACR 40 (NC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1504 (NC) ..... 51.1*(b)(iii), 51.5(j)(ii), 52.4(b)*(ii)
S v Scholtz 1997 (1) BCLR 103 (NmS) ..... 51.5*(c)*

S v Sebejan 1997 (1) SACR 626, 1997 (8) BCLR 1086 (W)	51.1*(b)(iv), 51.4(b)(ii), 52.2(b)*
S v Sefadi 1995 (1) SA 433 (D), 1994 (2) SACR 667 (D)	51.5*(c)*
S v Sejaphale 2000 (1) SACR 603 (T)	51.5*(j)*(ii)
S v Sekete 1980 (1) SA 171 (N)	59.4*(b)*(v)
S v Sekoboane 1997 (2) SACR 32 (T)	49.2*(a)*(i)
S v Seseane 2000 (2) SACR 225 (O)	51.4*(b)(ii), 52.10(b)*
S v Shaba en 'n Ander 1998 (1) SACR 16 (T), 1998 (2) BCLR 220 (T)	51.1*(b)(ii), 51.3(f), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v Shackell 2001 (4) SA 1 (SCA)	63.5*(g)*
S v Shaik [2005] 3 All SA 211 (C)	42.9*(c)*
S v Shaik 2007 (1) SA 240 (SCA)	42.9*(c)*
S v Shaik and Others 2008 (2) SA 208 (CC), 2007 (12) BCLR 1360 (CC)	4.3*(d)(i)(bb), 4.3(d)(iii), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.8, 42.9(c)*
S v Sheehama 1991 (2) SA 860 (A)	52.4*(c)*(ii)
S v Shiburi 2004 (2) SACR 314 (W)	51.5*(b), 52.4(c)*(i), 52.5
S v Shikunga 1997 (2) SACR 470 (NmS), 1997 (9) BCLR 1321 (NmS)	51.5*(b)*
S v Shinga 2007 (2) SACR 28 (CC), 2007 (5) BCLR 474 (CC)	9.2*(d)(i)(aa), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(i)(dd), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 23B.5(3)(c)(ii)(bb)*
S v Shongwe 2003 (5) SA 276 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 103 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 858 (CC)	5.3*(d)*
S v Shongwe en Andere 1998 (2) SACR 321 (T), 1998 (9) BCLR 1170 (T)	51.1*(b)(ii), 51.2, 51.3(f), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v Shuping 1983 (2) SA 119 (B)	52.4*(b)*(iii)
S v Sidziya and Others 1995 (12) BCLR 1626 (Tk)	51.5*(j)*(ii)
S v Sikhipha 2006 (2) SACR 439 (SCA)	52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Silvale 1999 (2) SACR 102 (SCA)	49.2*(d)*(iv)
S v Simanaga 1998 (1) SACR 351 (Ck)	51.5*(b), 51.5(g), 51.5(h)*
S v Simxadi 1997 (1) SACR 169 (C)	51.5*(b), 52.6(b)*
S v Singo 2002 (4) SA 858 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 160 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 793 (CC)	34.8*(c)(ii), 51.1(a)(iii), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.5(d), 51.5(i), 52.4(a)(i), 52.4(a)(ii), 52.6(a)*(i)
S v Sishi [2000] 2 All SA 56 (N)	52.6*(b)*
S v Sithebe 1992 (1) SACR 347 (A)	51.5*(j)*(ii)
S v Sithole 2005 (2) SACR 504 (SCA)	52.4*(b)*(ii)
S v Siwela 1981 (2) SA 56 (T)	51.5*(l)*
S v Siyotula 2003 (1) SACR 154	51.5*(l)*
S v Smile and Another 1998 (1) SACR 688 (SCA), 1998 (5) BCLR 519 (SCA)	51.5*(b)*
S v Smith 1996 (1) SACR 250 (E)	49.2*(d)*(iv)
S v Smith and Another 1994 (3) SA 887 (SE), 1994 (1) BCLR 63 (SE)	51.5*(c)*
S v Smorenburg 1992 (2) SACR 389 (C)	39.4
S v Snyman 1968 (2) SA 582 (A)	52.4*(b)*(ii)
S v Sobandla 1992 (2) SACR 613 (A)	49.2*(c)*(iii)
S v Soci 1998 (2) SACR 275 (E), 1998 (3) BCLR 376 (E)	51.3*(a), 51.3(f), 51.5(h), 52.4(c)(i), 52.10(a), 52.10(b), 52.10(c), 52.10(g)*
S v Solo 1995 (5) BCLR 587 (E)	51.5*(g)*
S v Solomons 2004 (1) SACR 137 (C)	51.1*(a)(iii), 51.5(e)(i), 51.5(h), 52.4(b)(iii), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v Sonday and Another 1995 (1) SA 497 (C), 1994 (2) SACR 810 (C), 1994 (4) BCLR 138 (C)	51.1*(b)(iv), 51.5(e)*(i)

S v Spies 2000 (1) SACR 312 (SCA)	52.10*(d)*
S v Staggie 2003 (1) SACR 232 (C)	52.6*(a)*(ii)
S v Stefaans 1999 (1) SACR 182 (C)	51.5*(g), 51.5(k)*
S v Steyn 2001 (1) SA 1146 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 25 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 52 (CC)	9.2*(c)(iii)(aa), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 34.1(c), 34.6, 34.8(c)(i), 51.1(b)(ii), 51.5(o)*
S v Stowitzki 1995 (2) SA 525 (NmHC)	52.6*(b)*
S v Strauss 1995 (5) BCLR 623 (O)	51.5*(b)*, 51.5(i)
S v Tcoeib 1993 (1) SACR 274 (Nm)	40.7*(c)(i), 49.2(d), 49.2(d)(iv), 49.3(b)(ii), 51.1(b)*(iii)
S v Tcoeib 1996 (1) SACR 390 (NmS)	39.5*(b)*
S v Thamaha 1979 (3) SA 487 (O)	51.4*(a)*
S v Thapedi 2002 (1) SACR 598 (T)	52.4*(c)*(ii)
S v Thebus and Another 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 319 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC)	1.3, 4.3*(b)(ii), 13.3, 31 Appendix (1), 31 Appendix (3)(a), 31.1(c), 31.4(a)(v), 31.4(b)(iii), 31.4(c)(ii), 31.4(d)(i), 31.4(e)(ii), 31.4(e)(iii), 31.4(e)(viii), 34.7(a), 36.4(c)(iii), 40.2(a), 51.1(a)(iii), 51.1(b)(i), 51.1(b)(ii), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.1(b)(iv), 51.2, 51.4(b)(ii), 51.5(i), 52.4(b)(i), 52.4(b)*(ii)
S v Thobaglale and Others 1998 (1) SACR 703 (W)	51.5*(o)*
S v Thomas 2001 (2) SACR 608 (W)	52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Thusi 2002 (12) BCLR 1274 (N)	52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Thusi and Others 2000 (4) BCLR 433 (N)	51.5*(j)*(ii)
S v Toms; S v Bruce 1990 (2) SA 802 (A)	32.3*(a), 49.2(c)*(i)
S v Tsanshana 1996 (2) SACR 157 (E)	49.2*(a)*(i)
S v Tshabalala 1998 (2) SACR 259 (C)	51.4*(d)*
S v Tshabalala 1999 (1) SACR 163 (T)	51.5*(c)*
S v Tshidiso 2002 (1) SACR 207 (W)	52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Tsotetsi and Others (1) 2003 (2) SACR 623 (W)	51.5*(g), 51.5(b), 52.10(c)*
S v Tsotetsi and Others (2) 2003 (2) SACR 638 (W)	52.4*(b)*(iii)
S v Tsotetsi and Others (3) 2003 (2) SACR 648 (W)	52.10*(c), 52.10(e)*
S v Tuhadeleni and Others 1969 (1) SA 153 (A)	30.1*(b)*(i)
S v Turrell and Others 1973 (1) SA 248 (C)	43.1, 43.2*(a)*
S v Tusani 2002 (2) SACR 468 (TD)	52.4*(b)*(iii)
S v Twala (South African Human Rights Commission Intervening) 2000 (1) SA 879 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 622 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 106 (CC)	24C.3*(c)(ii), 32.3(b), 51.1(b)*(iii)
S v Tyebela 1989 (2) SA 22 (A)	52.6*(a)*
S v Vakalisa 1990 (2) SACR 88 (Tk)	49.2*(d)*(ii)
S v Van den Berg 1996 (1) SACR 19 (Nm), 1995 (4) BCLR 479 (Nm)	51.5*(e)(i), 51.5(n)*(iii)
S v Van der Merwe 1998 (1) SACR 194 (O), 1997 (10) BCLR 1470 (O)	51.1*(a)(iv), 51.3(f), 51.4(b)(ii), 52.2(b)*
S v Van der Ross 2002 (2) SACR 362 (C)	51.5(i), 52.7*(a)(i), 52.7(b), 52.7(c)*
S v Van der Sandt 1997 (2) SACR 116 (W)	51.5*(k), 52.6(a)*(i)
S v van Heerden en Ander Sake 2002 (1) SACR 409 (T)	52.4*(c)*(i)

S v Van Niekerk 1972 (3) SA 711 (A) ..... 42.4, 42.9*(c)*
S v Van Rooyen and Others 2001 (2) SACR 376 (T), 2001 (4) SA 396 (T) .. 51.5*(e)*(i)
S v Van Rooyen and Others 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC) ..... 2.6*(b), 17.5(d), 17.5(e)*(i)
S v Vermaas 1996 (1) SACR 528 (T) ..... 51.4*(d)*
S v Vermaas; S v Du Plessis 1995 (3) SA 292 (CC), 1995 SACR 125 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 851 (CC) ..... 51.1*(b)(ii), 51.3(f), 51.5(g), 51.5(g), 51.5(h), 52.4(c)*(i)
S v Vilakazi en 'n Ander 1996 (1) SACR 425 (T) ..... 51.1*(a)(ii), 51.4(b)(iii), 52.10(e)*
S v Viljoen 2003 (4) BCLR 450 (T) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Visser 2001 (1) SACR 401 (C) ..... 52.4*(c)*(i)
S v Vries 1996 (2) SACR 638 (Nm), 1996 (12) BCLR 1666 (Nm) ..... 49.2*(c)*(i)
S v Vumase 2000 (2) SACR 579 (W) ..... 51.3*(f)*
S v W 1993 (2) SACR 74 (A) ..... 49.2*(d)*(iv)
S v Walters and Another 2001 (2) SACR 471 (Tk), 2001 (10) BCLR 1088 (Tk) ..... 23B.3*(c)(i)(aa), 34.8(c)*(iii)
S v Western Areas Ltd and Others 2005 (5) SA 214 (SCA), 2005 (1) SACR 441 (SCA) ..... 3.3*(a), 3.5(b)*
S v Williams and Five Similar Cases 1994 (4) SA 126 (C) ..... 49.2*(d)*
S v Williams and Others 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC) .. 3.3*(c), 9.4(d), 10.3(c), 30.3, 31.3(c), 34.7(c), 34.8(c)(i), 34(c)(iii), 36.3(d), 36.4(c)(iii), 39.4, 40.6(a), 40.7, 40.7(a)(ii), 40.7(c)(i), 47.5(a), 47.5(b), 47.7(a), 49.2(b), 49.2(d), 49.2(d)*(ii)
S v Woods 1978 (1) SA 713 (A) ..... 42.7*(d)*
S v Xaba 1997 (1) SACR 194 (W) ..... 51.5*(b), 51.5(c)*
S v Younas 1996 (2) SACR 272 (C) ..... 51.5*(b), 51.5(k), 52.6(b)*
S v Z and 23 similar cases 2004 (4) BCLR 410 (E) ..... 9.6*(c), 9.6(c)(ii)(bb), 47.7(a)*
S v Z en vier ander sake 1999 (1) SACR 427 (E) ..... 47.7*(a)*
S v Zimmerie 1989 (3) SA 484 (C) ..... 52.4*(b)(iii), 52.6(a)*(i)
S v Zingilo 1995 (9) BCLR 1186 (O) ..... 51.5*(b), 51.5(k)*
S v Zondo 1999 (1) SACR 54 (N), 1999 (3) BCLR 316 (N) ..... 51.1*(a)*(iii)
S v Zuba [2004] ZAECHC 3 ..... 9.6*(c)(ii)(bb)*
S v Zuma 2006 (2) SACR 191 (W), 2006 (7) BCLR 790 (W) ..... 52.4*(b)(iii), 52.7(a)(i), 52.7(b), 52.7(d)*
S v Zuma and Others 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC), 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC), 1995 (1) SACR 568 (CC) ..... 3.3*(c), 4.3(c)(ii), 5.3(d), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(cc), 10.3(c), 11.3(c)(iii), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 31.2(d)(v), 31.4(d)(ii), 31.8(a), 32.1(b), 32.3(a), 32.3(b), 32.3(c), 32.5(c), 33.9, 34.1(b), 34.2(c), 34.8(d), 43.3(a), 51.1(a)(ii), 51.1(b)(i), 51.1(b)(ii), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.4(a), 51.4(b)(iii), 51.5(b), 51.5(i), 51.5(j)(i), 52.2(a), 52.4(a)(ii), 52.4(a)(iii), 52.4(b)(iii), 52.10(b)*,

52.10*(g), 53.6, 59.3(a)(i), 59.4(b)*(i)
S v Zwayi 1997 (2) SACR 772 (Ck), 1998 (2) BCLR 242 (Ck), [1998] 1 All SA 569 (Ck) ... 38.2*(a)(iii), 51.3(f), 52.4(b)(ii), 52.4(c)*(ii)
S v Zwezwe 2006 (2) SACR 599 (N) ... 52.4*(b)*(iii)
S and Others v Swanepoel 2000 (7) BCLR 818 (O) ... 51.5*(g), 51.5(h)*
SAAN v Yutar 1969 (2) SA 442 (A) ... 38.2*(b)*(i)
SA Baard Boerdery v Grietjie Pofadder (unreported, LCC Case No 97R/04, 26 October 2004) ... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
SA Bank of Athens Ltd v Van Zyl 2005 (5) SA 93 (SCA) ... 59.4*(a)(i) SAB International t/a Sabmark International v Laugh It Off Promotions [2003] 2 All 454 (C) ... 42.9(d)*
SACCAWU v Irvin & Johnson Ltd (Seafoods Division Fish Processing) 2000 (8) BCLR 886 (CC) ... 32.3*(a)*
SACTWU v Maroc Carpets and Textile Mills (Pty) Ltd (1990) 11 ILJ 1101 (IC) ... 53.5
SACWU v Sasol Industries (Pty) Ltd and Another (2) (1989) 10 ILJ 1031 (IC) ... 53.2*(b)*, 53.5
SAD Holdings Ltd and Another v SA Raisins Pty (Ltd) and Others 2000 (3) SA 766, 775 (I) ... 59.3*(a)*(v)
SA Metal Machinery Co Ltd v Transnet Ltd (unreported, WLD Case, 22 March 1998) ... 62.7
SANTAM Versekeringsmaatskappy Bpk v Roux 1978 (2) SA 856 (A) ... 32.3*(a)*
SA Post Office Ltd v Van Rensburg 1998 (1) SA 796 ... 42.7*(g)*
SAR and H v Estate Saunders 1931 AD 276 ... 40.5*(b)*(ii)
SAUK v O'Malley 1977 (3) SA 394 (A) ... 38.2*(c)*(ii)
SA Union of Journalists v Times Media Ltd (1993) 14 ILJ 387 (IC) ... 53.5
SA Warehousing Services (Pty) Ltd and Others v South British Insurance Co Ltd 1971 (3) SA 10 (A) ... 27.5*(c)*
SAWU v Rutherford Joinery (Pty) Ltd (1990) 11 ILJ 695 (IC) ... 53.6
SEAWU v BRC Weldmesh (1991) 12 ILJ 1304 (IC) ... 53.6
SW v F 1997 (1) SA 796 (O) ... 47.3*(a)*
Sage Holdings and Another v Financial Mail (Pty) Ltd and Others 1991 (2) SA 117 (W) ... 38.2*(a)*(iii)
Sage Holdings and Another v Financial Mail (Pty) Ltd and Others 1993 (2) SA 451 (A) ... 31.3*(d), 38.2(a)*(iii)
Sager v Smith 2001 (3) SA 1004 (SCA) ... 59.4*(b)*(iii)
Salem v Chief Immigration Officer and Another 1995 (4) SA 280 (ZS), 1994 (2) ZLR 287 (ZS), (ZS) 1995 (1) BCLR 78 (ZS) ... 66.1*(d)*(i)
Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 (CC) ... 6.2*(d), 6.2(e), 9.2(c)(i)(bb), 9.2(c)(iii)(aa), 9.2(c)(i)(dd), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.2(e)(i), 9.8, 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 31.4(c)(ii), 31.8(b), 38.3(b)(i), 32.5(c), 43.2(b)(ii), 51.1(b)(i), 51.1(b)(ii), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.5(f), 51.5(i), 52.2(a), 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y), 59.4(b)*(i)
Sanford v Haley NO 2004 (3) SA 296 (C) ... 34.7*(a)* Santam Insurance Ltd v Taylor 1985 (1) SA 514 (A) ... 32.3*(a)*
Santam Ltd v smith 1999 (6) BCLR 714 (D) ... 42.9*(h)*

Santos Prof Football Club v Igesund 2002 (5) SA 697 (C) ..... 36.4*(f)*
Sasfin (Pty) Ltd v Beukes 1989 (1) SA 1 (A) ..... 4.3*(d)(i)(aa), 31.4(c)*(ii)
Sasol Oil (Pty) Ltd and Another v Metcalfe NO 2004 (5) SA 161 (W) ..... 63.3*(c)*
Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC) ..... 5.3*(c), 5.3(d), 9.2(e)(iv)(aa), 9.4(b)(ii), 9.4(d)(iii), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 31.4(e)(vii), 34.6, 34.8(e)(i), 36.4(a), 36.4(b), 36.4(g), 36.5(a)(ii), 37.4, 64.4(a)*
Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa 2003 (4) SA 266 (CC), 2004 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ..... 3.4*(e), 9.4(d)(iii), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 31.4(e)(vii), 34.6, 34.8(e)(i), 35.5(g)(v), 36.4(a), 36.4(b), 36.5(a)*(ii)
Sayed v Editor, Cape Times 2004 (1) SA 58 (C) ..... 13.6, 31.3*(d), 31.4(a)(v), 31.4(e)(x), 36.4(h)(iii), 42.9(a)*
Scagell v Attorney-General of the Western Cape 1997 (2) SA 368 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1446 (CC), 1996 (2) SACR 579 (CC) ..... 9.4*(e)(ii)(bb), 31.2(d)(v), 51.1(a)(iii), 51.1(b)(iv), 51.5(b), 51.5(k), 52.4(a)*(iii)
School Governing Body of Juma Musjid Primary School & Others v Ahmed Aruff Essay & Others [2011] ZACC 13 (CC) ..... 56B.3*(b)(i) Schoonbee and Others v MEC for Education, Mpumalanga and Another 2002 (4) SA 877 (T) ..... 63.6(b)*
Schoon v MEC, Department of Finance, Economic Affairs and Tourism, Northern Province [2003] 9 BLLR 963 (T) ..... 63.5*(e)*
Scott-Crossley and Others v National Commissioner of South African Police Service and Others NO (unreported) ..... 32.3*(c)*
Seapoint Computer Bureau (Pty) Ltd v McLoughlin and Others NNO 1997 (2) SA 636 (W), 1996 (8) BCLR 1071 (W) ..... 51.1*(b)(iii), 51.4(b)*(iii)
Sebenza Forwarding and Shipping Consultancy (Pty) Ltd v Petroleum Oil and Gas Corporation of South Africa (Pty) Limited t/s Petro SA and Another 2006 (2) SA 52 (C) ..... 63.3*(b), 63.3(c)*
Secretary for Inland Revenue v Brey 1980 (1) SA 472 (A) ..... 32.3*(a)*
Secretary for Inland Revenue v Sturrock Sugar Farm (Pty) Ltd 1965 (1) SA 897 (A) ..... 32.3*(a)* Sedgefield Ratepayers' and Voters' Association and Others v Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others 1989 (2) SA 685 (C) ..... 18.3*(f)(i) Seedat's Executors v The Master (Natal) 1917 AD 302 ..... 41.1(a)*, 41.6
Seeiso v Minister of Home Affairs and Others 1998 (6) BCLR 765 (LesCA) 43.1
Seema v Lid van die Uitvoerende Raad vir Gesondheid, Gauteng 2002 (1) SA 771 (T) ..... 40.5*(b)(i) Seetal v Pravitha and Another NO 1983 (3) SA 827 (D) ..... 38.2(a)*(iii)
Sefalana Employee Benefits Organisation v Haslam and Others 2000 (2) SA 415 (SCA) ..... 32.3*(a), 32.5(c)*
Segodi, Miya and Thembelihle Crisis Committee v City of Johannesburg and Minister of Safety and Security (High Court, Witwatersrand Local Division, 26 November 2005) ..... 43.2*(b)(ii), 43.3(b)*(iv)
Sehume v Attridgeville City Council and Another 1992 (1) SA 41 (A) ..... 63.3*(b)*
Sekretaris van Binnelandse Inkomste v Raubenheimer 1969 (4) SA 314 (A) ..... 32.5*(c)*

Selemela and Others v Independent Newspaper Group Ltd and Others 2001 (4) SA 987 (N) ..... 38.2*(c)(i), 42.9(a)* Seluka v Suskin and Salkow 1912 TPD 258 ..... 32.5*(c)*
Sentraal-Wes (Ko-op) Bpk v FAWU (1990) 11 ILJ 977 (LAC) 53.5
Senwes Ltd v Muller 2002 (4) SA 142 (T) ..... 59.4*(a)(i) Seodin Primary School v MEC Education, Northern Cape 2006 (1) All SA 154 (NC), 2006 (4) BCLR 542 (NC) ..... 57.3(c)(vi), 58.7(b)*
Serole v Pienaar 2000 (1) SA 328 (LCC), [1999] 1 All SA 562 (LCC) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Sesana & Others v Attorney General [2006] (2) BLR 633 (HC) ..... 56B.2*(d)*(iii)
Setlogelo v Setlogelo 1914 AD 221 ..... 38.2*(b)*(ii)
Seven Eleven Corporation of SA (Pty) Ltd v Cancun Trading NO 159 CC [2005] 2 All SA 256 (SCA) ..... 32.3*(b)*
Shabalala and Others v Attorney General, Transvaal, and Another 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 761 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC). ..... 31 Appendix(3)(b), 4.3*(d)(i)(aa), 31.1(c), 31.2(a)(ii), 31.2(b)(ii), 31.4(a)(iv), 31.4(a)(v), 32.3(c), 32.4(c), 32.5(c), 34.7(a), 35.3(e)(i), 51.1(a)(ii), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.1(b)(iv), 51.4(d), 51.5(c), 51.5(d)*, 52.5, 52.8
Shabalala v Attorney-General, Transvaal, and Another; Gumede and Others v Attorney-General, Transvaal 1995 (1) SA 608 (T); 1994 (6) BCLR 85 (T) ..... 4.2*(b), 32.2(b)*, 62.7
Shabalala v S 1999 (4) All SA 583 (N) ..... 52.4*(c)(i) Shaik v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development and Others 2004 (3) SA 599 (CC), 2004 (1) SACR 105 (CC), 2004 (4) BCLR 333 (CC) ..... 3.4(c), 5.3(e)(i), 8.4(c), 34.6, 52.2(b)*
Shell SA (Edms) Bpk v Voorsitter, Dorperaad van die OVS 1992 (1) SA 906 (O) ..... 52.10*(f)*
Shelton v Commissioner for South African Revenue Services 2000 (2) SA 106 (E) 38.1
Shepherd v O'Niell and Others 1999 (11) BCLR 1304 (N) ..... 59.3*(a)(iv), 59.4(a)*(viii)
Shepstone and Wylie and Others v Geyser NO 1998 (3) SA 1036 (SCA) ..... 32.3*(a), 59.4(a)*(viii)
Shifidi v Administrator-General for South West Africa and Others 1989 (4) SA 631 (SWA) ..... 7.2*(b)*
Shilubana and Others v Nwamitwa (Commission for Gender Equality as Amici Curiae) 2007 (2) SA 432 (SCA) ..... 9.5*(b)*(ii)
Shilubana and Others v Nwamitwa (National Movement of Rural Women and Commission for Gender Equality as Amici Curiae) 2007 (5) SA 620 (CC) ..... 3.7*(a), 59.4(b)(ii), 59.4(b)*(ii)
Shilubana & Others v Nwamitwa 2009 (2) SA 66 (CC) ..... 9.5*(b)(ii), 22.2(c)*(iv)
Shinga v The State (Society of Advocates, Pietermaritzburg Bar as Amicus Curiae); O'Connell v The State 2007 (4) SA 611 (CC), 2007 (2) SACR 28 (CC), 2007 (5) BCLR 474 (CC) ..... 9.4*(d)(i), 9.4(d)(iv), 23B.5(c)(ii), 59.4(b)(v), 42.9(c)*
Shoba v Minister van Justisie 1982 (2) SA 554 (C) ..... 38.3*(a)*(iv)
Sibasa v Ratsialingwa and Hartman NO 1947 (4) SA 369 (T) 26.1
Sibiya and Others v Director of Public Prosecutions and Others [2005] 1 All SA 105 (W) ..... 40.3*(d), 40.4(a)* Sibiya and Others v Director of Public Prosecutions, Johannesburg and Others 2005 (5) SA 315 (CC), 2006 (1) SACR 220 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 812 (CC) ..... 5.3*(c), 6.2(j), 9.2(b)*(iv),

9.4*(e)(ii)(cc), 52.2(b), 9.6(c)(ii)(bb), 9.6(c)(iii), 50.4(h)(ii)(bb)(z)*

Sibiya and Others v DPP, Johannesburg High Court and Others 2006 (2) BCLR 293 (CC) ..... 9.6*(c)(ii)(bb), 9.6(c)(iii), 50.4(h)(ii)(bb)(z)*

Sidumo and Another v Rustenburg Platinum Mines Ltd and Others 2008 (2) SA 24 (CC), 2008 (2) BCLR 158 (CC) ..... 4.3*(d)(ii), 59.2(b), 59.4(c)(ii), 63.2(a), 63.3(b), 63.3(c), 63.5(g), 63.6(a)*

Sikutshwa v The Member of The Executive Council For Social Development, Eastern Cape Province 2009 (3) SA 47 (TkH), [2005] ZAECHC 18 ..... 56D.4*(a)*

Silva's Fishing Corporation (Pty) Ltd v Mazewa 1957 (2) SA 256 (A) ..... 40.5*(b)*(ii)

Silvermine Valley Coalition v Sybrand Van der Spuy Boerdery and Others 2002 (1) SA 478 (C) ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(ee)(z), 50.4(h)(ii)(hh)*

Simelane and Others NNO v Seven-Eleven Corporation SA (Pty) Limited and Another 2003 (3) SA 64 (SCA), [2003] 1 All SA 82 (SCA) ..... 63.3*(c)*

Simonlanga and Another v Masinga and Another 1976 (4) SA 373 (W) ..... 41.3*(a)*

Sindani v Van der Merwe and Others 2002 (2) SA 32 (SCA) ..... 42.9*(a)*

Skhosana and Others v Roos t/a Roos se Oord and Others 2000 (4) SA 561 (LCC) ..... 32.5*(c), 55.6(b)*(ii)

SLC Property Group (Pty) Ltd & Longlands Holdings (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Economic Development (Western Cape) & Municipality of Stellenbosch unreported decision (C) Case No. 5542/2007 ..... 50.4*(h)(ii)(aa)*

Smith v Attorney-General Bophuthatswana 1984 (1) SA 196 ..... 32.1*(a), 32.3(c)*

Smith v Die Republikein (Edms) Bpk en 'n Ander 1989 (3) SA 872 (SWA) ..... 38.2*(b)*(i)

Smith v Mutasa and Another NNO 1990 (3) SA 756 (ZS) ..... 17.6*(c), 17.6(d)*

Smith v Mutual & Federal Insurance Co Ltd 1998 (4) SA 626 (C) ..... 59.4*(b)*(i)

Smit v Van Niekerk NO 1976 (4) SA 293 (A) 52.9

S Moila and Another 2006 (1) SA 330 (T) ..... 42.9*(c)*

Smyth v Ushewokunze and Another 1998 (3) SA 1125 (ZS), 1998 (2) BCLR 170 (ZS) ..... 51.5*(e)(i), 51.5(f)*

Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, Standerton v Nel and Others 1988 (4) SA 42 (W) ..... 50.4*(b)*

Society of Advocates of Natal v De Freitas and Another 1997 (4) SA 1134 (N) ..... 44.1*(d), 44.3(c)*(iv)

Sojo (Pty) Ltd v Tuckers Land and Development Corp (Pty) Ltd 1981 (3) SA 314 (A) ..... 32.3*(a), 32.5(c)*

Sokhulu v New Africa Publications Ltd and Others 2001 (4) SA 1357 (W) ..... 42.9*(a)*

Soller No v G and Another 2003 (5) SA 430 (W) 47.1, 47.8

Soller v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2005 (3) SA 567 (T) ..... 59.4*(a)*(iv)

Sonderup v Tondelli and Another. 2001 (1) SA 1171 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 152 (CC) ..... 34.7*(a), 37.5, 47.10(b), 47.10(c)*

Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC), 1997 ZACC 17 ..... 4.2*(a), 9.2(c)(iii)(bb), 10.3(a), 10.4(c), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 13.2(a), 32.3(b), 32.4(c), 33.3, 33.4(a), 33.4(b), 33.4(d)*,

33.5*(c), 33.5(f)(i), 33.5(f)(ii), 33.5(f)(iv), 33.5(h), 33.9, 34.5(b)(ii), 36.4(i), 39.8, 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(x), 55.3(b), 55.3(c), 56A.2(a), 56A.2(b)(v), 56A.2(b)(vi), 56A.2(b)(vii), 56A.2(e)(i), 56A.2(e)(ii), 56A.3(a), 56A.3(d), 56A.4(c)(i), 56A.4(f)(i), 56A.4(f)(ii), 56A.5(a), 56B.3(a), 56B.4(e), 56B.4(g), 56C.3(a), 56D.1, 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y)*

South African Associated Newspapers Ltd and Another v Estate Pelser 1975 (4) SA 797 (A) ..... 42.9*(a)*

South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath and Others 2000 (10) BCLR 1131 (T) ..... 12.3(c(ii)

South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath and Others 2001 (1) SA 883 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 77 (CC) ..... 3.3*(d), 7.2(c)(v), 9.4(d)(i), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 10.5(a), 12.2(b), 12.3(b)(ii), 12.3(c)(i)–(ii), 12.3(d)(i)(aa), 24B.1, 24B.3(b), 26.1, 31 Appendix(4)(c), 32.3(b), 32.4(c), 34.6, 38.3(a)*(ii)

South African Broadcasting Corporation and Others v The Public Protector and Others 2002 (4) BCLR 340 (T) ..... 24A.4*(b)(ii), 42.9(c), 62.2(a)*

South African Broadcasting Corporation Limited v National Director of Public Prosecutions [2006] ZASCA 90, [2006] SCA 89 (RSA) ..... 42.9*(c)*

South African Broadcasting Corporation Limited v National Director of Public Prosecutions and Others 2007 (1) SA 523 (CC), 2007 (2) BCLR 167 (CC), [2006] ZACC 15 ..... 23B.5*(c)(ii)(bb), 42.7(b), 42.7(d), 42.9(c), 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y), 59.4(b)*(v)

South African Broadcasting Corporation v Thatcher [2005] 4 All 353 (C) .. 42.9*(c)*

South African Commercial Catering and Allied Workers Union and Others v Irvin and Johnson Ltd 2002 (3) SA 250 (LAC) ..... 43.3*(a)*(iv)

South African Commercial Catering and Allied Workers Union and Others v Irvin & Johnson Ltd (Seafoods Division Fish Processing) 2000 (3) SA 705 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 886 (CC) ..... 4.3*(d)(iv), 6.2(a), 63.5(d), 59.4(b)(iii), 63.5(g)*

South African Defence Union v Minister of Defence and Another 1999 (2) SA 735 (T), (1999) 20 ILJ 299 (T), 1999 (3) BCLR 321 (T) ..... 43.3*(a)(i)(bb), 53.3(a)*

South African Defence Union v Minister of Defence and Another 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC) ..... 23B.3*(d), 23B.4(d), 23C.1, 43.3(a)(i), 53.3(a)*

South African Defence Union v Minister of Defence and Others 2007 (5) SA 400 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 863 (CC) ..... 9.4*(e)(i)(bb), 9.7, 23B.3(d), 23C.1, 56B.3(b)*(i)

South African Heritage Resources Agency v Arniston Hotel Property (Pty) Ltd 2007 (2) SA 461 (C) ..... 63.3*(c)*

South African Human Rights Commission v SABC 2003 (1) BCLR 92 ..... 36.4*(h)*(ii)

South African Liquor Traders Association and Others v Chairperson, Gauteng Liquor Board and Others 2009 (1) SA 565 (CC), 2006 (8) BCLR 901 (CC), [2006] ZACC 7 ..... 3.7*(a), 6.2(i), 9.4(d)(i), 9.4(d)(iii), 9.4(e)(i)(cc), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 17.5(f)*(ii)
South African Municipal Workers Union v Jada and Others 2003 (6) SA 294 (W) ..... 64.4*(c)*
South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence Unreported, TPD Case No 15790/2003 (14 July 2003) ..... 23B.4*(d)*
South African National Defence Union and Another v Minister of Defence and Others 2004 (4) SA 10 (T), 2003 (9) BCLR 1055 (T), 24 ILJ 2101 (T) ..... 23B.3*(d), 23B.4(d), 24A.3(b), 24B.2, 31.4(b)(v), 34.7(c)(ii), 43.1, 43.3(b)(iii), 53.1, 53.2(b), 53.3(b), 53.5, 66.1(b)*(ii)
South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence and Others 2003 (3) SA 239 (T), 2003 (9) BCLR 1054 (T) ..... 66.1*(b)*(ii)
South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence and Another 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), (1999) 20 ILJ 2265 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC) ..... 9.4*(d)(i), 9.4(d)(ii), 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 10.4, 31 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), Appendix (3)(b), 23B.3(d), 23B.4(d), 31.4(a)(v), 32.3(b), 34.1(b), 34.3(b), 34.8(c)(ii), 34.8(c)(iii), 34.8(e)(ii), 42.5, 42.5(d), 42.9(e), 43.1, 43.3(b)(iii), 43.3(b)(iv), 44.3(a)(i), 44.3(c)(vii), 53.1(a)*(ii), 53.6
South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence and Others 2007 (5) SA 400 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 863 (CC) ..... 32.4*(a), 32.5(b)*
South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence and Others; Minister of Defence and Others v South African National Defence Union and others 2007 (1) SA 402 (SCA) ..... 23B.3*(d), 23B.4(d)*
South African Optometric Association v Frames Distributors (Pty) Ltd 1985 (3) SA 100 (O) ..... 7.2*(c)*(v)
South African Police Service v Public Servants Association 2007 (3) SA 521 (CC), 2007 BLLR 383 (CC) ..... 9.2*(b)(ii)(aa), 9.5(b)*(ii)
South African Police Union and Another v National Commissioner of the SA Police Services and Another (2005) 26 ILJ 2403 (LC) ..... 63.3*(b)*
South African Police Services v Police and Prison Civil Rights Union (2007) 28 ILJ 2611 (LC) ..... 23B.3*(d)*
South African Police Services v Police and Prison Civil Rights Union & Another [2010] 12 BLLR 1263 (LAC), [2010] ZALAC 17 ..... 23B.3*(d)*
South African Post Office Ltd v Chairperson of Western Cape Provincial Tender Board and Others 2001 (2) SA 675 (C), 2001 (5) BCLR 500 (C) ..... 25.1, 25.3*(e)*
South African Post Office Ltd v Van Rensburg and Another 1998 (1) SA 796 (E), 1997 (11) BCLR 1608 (E) ..... 54.2*(b)*, 54.3
South African Railways v Kemp 1916 TPD 174 ..... 14.5*(d)(ii)(cc)*
South African Roads Board v Johannesburg City Council 1991 (4) SA 1 (A) ..... 63.3*(b), 63.5(f)*
South African Shore Angling Association and Another v Minister of Environmental Affairs 2002 (5) SA 511 (SE) ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(bb)(y)*

South African Veterinary Council and Another v Syzmanski 2003 (4) SA 42 (SCA), 2003 (4) BCLR 378 (SCA) ..... 63.5*(d)*
South Durban Community Environmental Alliance v Head of Department: Department of Agricultural and Environmental Affairs, Kwazulu-Natal, & Others 2003 (6) SA 631 (D) ..... 50.4*(h)(ii)(aa)*
South Peninsula Municipality v Malherbe NO 1999 (2) SA 966 (C) ..... 46.2*(a)*
Sparrow v Morementsi (unreported, LCC Case No 116R/03, 25 February 2004) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature, Ex Parte: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal 1996 1996 (4) SA 1098 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1419 (CC) ..... 3.3*(e), 4.3(a)(ii), 4.3(b)(vi), 16.3(c), 19.3(b), 21.2(a), 21.2(b), 21.2(c)* 21.2*(d), 21.2(e), 21.3, 21.4(a), 21.5, 26.5(e), 29.3(b), 65.4(b)*(iv)
Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature, Ex Parte: In re KwaZulu-Natal Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Amendment Bill of 1995; Ex parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature: In re Payment of Salaries, Allowances and Other Privileges to the Ingonyama Bill of 1995 1996 (4) SA 653 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 903 (CC) ..... 4.3*(b)(ii)(aa), 6.2(g), 15.3(a), 15.3(a)(iii), 16.3(b), 17.6(b)(i), 26.5(c), 38.3(a)*(ii)
Speaker of the National Assembly, Ex Parte: In re Dispute Concerning The Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the National Education Policy Bill 83 of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC); 1996 (4) BCLR 518 (CC), [1996] ZACC 3 ..... 4.3*(b)(ii)(aa), 14.1, 14.3(a), 15.1, 15.3(c)(iii), 16.3(a), 17.3(f)(ii), 17.5(e)(ii), 19.3(a)(ii), 19.4(a), 20.2(a), 20.3(b), 21.2(a), 21.4(a), 21.5, 38.3(b)(v), 45.10(a)*(iii)
Speaker of the National Assembly v De Lille and Another 1999 (4) SA 863 (SCA), 1999 (11) BCLR 1339 (SCA) ..... 10.3*(d)(ii), 10.4(a), 12.3(b)(i), 17.2(a), 17.7(a), 17.7(c)*, 31.5, 34.9, 42.10
Speaker of the National Assembly v Makwetu and Others 2001 (3) BCLR 302 (C) ..... 17.1*(c), 19.1(c), 29.3(c)*
Speaker of the Western Cape Provincial Legislature, Ex Parte: In re Certification of the Amended Text of the Constitution of the Western Cape 1997 1998 (1) SA 655 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1653 (CC) ..... 4.3*(a)(ii), 4.3(b)(vi), 19.3(b), 21.4(b), 29.3(b)*
Speaker of the Western Cape Provincial Legislature, Ex Parte: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Western Cape, 1997 1997 (4) SA 795 (CC), 1997 (9) BCLR 1167 (CC) ..... 4.3*(a)(ii), 10.3(b), 19.1(a), 19.3(b), 20.2(a), 20.3(b), 21.2(a), 21.2(b), 21.2(c), 21.4(b), 29.3(b), 41.1(c)(i), 45.10(a)*(iii)
Special Investigating Unit v Ngcinwana and Another 2001 (4) SA 774 (E), 2001 (4) BCLR 411 (E) 24A.2
Spies v Mahlangu (unreported, LCC Case No 19R/00, 22 March 2000) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Staatspresident and 'n Ander v Lefuo 1990 (2) SA 679 (A) 26.2

Staatspresident en Andere v United Democratic Front en 'n Ander 1988 (4) SA 830 (A) 63.4
Standard Bank Investment Corporation Ltd v Competition Commission and Others; Liberty Life Association of Africa Ltd v Competition Commisssion and Others 2000 (2) SA 797 ..... 32.3*(a)* Standard Bank of Bophuthatswana Ltd v Reynolds NO and Others 1995 (3) BCLR 305 (B) ..... 63.6*(b)*
Standard Bank of South Africa Ltd v Oneanate Investments (Pty) Ltd (In Liquidation) 1998 (1) SA 811 (A) ..... 9.2*(a), 14.5(d)(ii)(aa)*
Stanfield v Minister of Correctional Services and Others 2004 (4) SA 43 (C), 2003 (12) BCLR 1384 (C) ..... 36.4*(c)(iii), 51.3(c), 51.3(g)*
Steele v South Peninsula Muncipal Council 2001 (3) SA 640 (C) ..... 63.3*(b)*
Steenkamp NO v Provincial Tender Board of the Eastern Cape 2007 (3) SA 121 (CC), 2007 (3) BCLR 300 (CC) ..... 4.3*(d)(i)(aa), 9.2(b)(ii)(bb), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 9.2(f)(i), 9.2(f)(ii), 9.5(a)(i), 9.5(c)(iii), 23A.1, 23A.4, 63.3(a), 63.3(c)*
Steinberg v South Peninsula Municipality 2001 (4) SA 1243 (SCA) 46.7
Stellenbosch Farmers' Winery Ltd v Distillers Corp (SA) Ltd and Another 1962 (1) SA 458 (A) ..... 32.3*(a)* Stopforth v Minister of Justice and Others; Veenendaal v Minister of Justice and Others 2000 (1) SA 113 (SCA) ..... 32.3*(a)*
Strydom v Afrox Healthcare [2001] 4 All SA 618 (T) ..... 31.4*(c)*(ii)
Strydom v Minister of Correctional Services and Others 1999 (3) BCLR 342 (W) ..... 9.6*(c)(ii)(bb), 9.8, 33.12, 33.8, 49.3(a), 49.3(b)(i), 50.4(h)(ii)(bb)(ẓ), 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y)*
Student Representative Council of Molepolole College of Education v Attorney General [1995] (3) LRC 447 (Botswana Court of Appeal) 37.4
Suid Afrikaanse Nasionale Trust en Assuransie Maatschappij Bpk, Ex Parte 1918 CPD 207 ..... 65.3*(a)* Suliman v Minister of Community Development 1981 (1) SA 1108 (A) ..... 32.3*(a)* Swanepoel v Minister van Veiligheid en Sekuriteit 1999 (4) SA 549 (T), 1999 (2) SACR 284 (T), [1999] 3 All SA 285 (T) ..... 38.2*(a)(iii), 52.6(d)*
Swanevelder and Another v Mpedi and Others (Unreported Land Claims Court Case No LCC 16 / 01, 28 June 2002) ..... 66.1*(c)*
Swartbooi and Others v Brink and Another 2006 (1) SA 203 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 502 (CC), [2003] ZACC 25 ..... 6.2*(d), 17.7(c), 22.2(c)*(ii)
Swartbooi v Brink 2003 (5) BCLR 502 (CC) ..... 17.6*(c)*
Swart NO and Nicol NO v De Kock and Garner 1951 (3) SA 589 (A) ..... 65.1, 65.2*(b)*
Swart v Minister of Law and Order and Others 1987 (4) SA 452 (C) ..... 51.3*(e)*
Swissborough Diamond Mines Ltd v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1999 (2) 279 (T) ..... 30.4*(d), 31.6(b), 52.6(c), 59.4(a)*(iv)

T

T v M 1997 (1) SA 54 (A) ..... 47.3*(b)*
TS Masiyiwa Honding (Pty) Limited and Another v Minister of Information Posts and Telecommunications 1998 (2) SA 755 (ZS), 1997 (2) BCLR 275 (ZS) ..... 42.7*(g)*
Tap Wine Trading CC v Cape Classic Wines (Western Cape) CC 1999 (4) SA 194 (C), [1998] 4 All SA 86 (C) ..... 38.3*(a)(iii), 52.10(e)*
Taylor v Kurtstag NO and Others 2005 (1) SA 362 (W), 2005 (7) BCLR 705 (W), [2004] 4 All SA 317 (W) ..... 34.7*(a), 34.7(c)(i), 36.4(a)*,

57.3*(c)(vii), 57.4(c)(ii)(cc)(i)(aa), 57.4(c)(ii)(cc)(i)(bb), 58.4(a)(i), 58.4(a)(v), 58.5(a), 58.7(a), 59.3(a)(v), 64.6(b)*(ii)

Tecmed (Pty) Limited v Eastern Cape Provincial Tender Board and Others 2001 (3) SA 735 (SCA) ..... 25.9*(b)*

Telcordia Technologies Inc v Telkom SA Ltd 2007 (3) SA 266 (SCA) ..... 59.4*(b)(v), 63.3(b)*

Telkom SA Limited v The Competition Commission of South Africa and Another (unreported, TPD Case No 44239/04, 20 June 2008) ..... 63.3*(c)*

Telkom SA Limited v The Independent Communications Authority in South Africa and Others (unreported, TPD Case No 1904/2000, 2000) ..... 24E.3*(e)*

Terblanche NO v Flippies and Others (Unreported Land Claims Court Case No LCC 36 R / 01, 25 May 2001) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)

Tergniet and Toekoms Action Group & Thirty Four Others v Outeniqua Kreosootpale (Pty) Ltd & Others [2009] ZAWCHC ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(ee)(y)(8), 50.4(b)*

Terry v Botes and Another [2002] 3 All SA 798 (C) ..... 63.3*(b)*

Tettey and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Another 1999 (3) SA 715 (D), 1999 (1) BCLR 68 (D) ..... 56D.3*(f)*(i)

Thatcher v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development and Others 2005 (4) SA 543 (C), 2005 (1) SACR 238 (C), [2005] 1 All SA 373 (C) ..... 18.3*(k), 51.1(b)(iii), 51.4(b)(iii), 51.5(j)(ii), 52.2(b)*

The Attorney-General v Dow 1994 (6) BCLR 1 (Botswana) ..... 66.1*(b)*(i)

Thebus and Another v S 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC) ..... 32.1*(c)*

The City of Johannesburg v Rand Properties (Pty) Ltd and Others 2007 (1) SA 78 (W), [2006] 2 All SA 240 (W) ..... 55.6*(b)*(ii)

Theewaterskloof Holdings (Edms) Bpk, Glaser Afdeling v Jacobs en Andere 2002 (3) SA 401 (LCC) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)

The Government of the Republic of South Africa v Thabiso Chemicals (Pty) Ltd 2009 (1) SA 163 (SCA) ..... 63.3*(b)*

Thembisile v Thembisile 2002 (2) SA 209 (T) 41.6

The Merak S: Sea Melody Enterprises SA v Bulktrans (Europe) Corporation 2002 (4) SA 273 (SCA) ..... 8.1*(a)*

Thermo Radiant Oven Sales (Pty) Ltd v Nelspruit Bakeries (Pty) Ltd 1969 (2) SA 295 (AD) ..... 4.3*(b)(ii)(aa)*

Theron en Andere v Ring van Wellington van die NG Sendingkerk in Suid-Afrika en Andere 1976 (2) SA 1 (A) ..... 63.2*(c), 63.6(a)*

Thint (Pty) Ltd v National Director of Public Prosecutions and Others; Zuma and Another v National Director of Public Prosecutions and Others 2009 (1) SA 1 (CC) ..... 9.2*(b)(ii)(aa), 9.2(b)(iii), 9.2(c)(i)(dd), 9.2(d)(i)(aa), 9.5(b)(i), 9.8, 42.9(a)*

Thoroughbread Breeders' Association v Price Waterhouse 2001 (4) SA 551 (SCA) ..... 32.3*(a), 32.5(c)*

Thukwane v Minister of Correctional Services and Others 2003 (1) SA 51 (T) ..... 57.2*(b)(ii)(bb), 64.6(f)*

Thukwane v Minister of Correctional Services and Others (Unreported Transvaal High Court Case No 16304 / 04, 21 April 2005) ..... 66.1*(c)*

Times Media Ltd v Franki Africa (Pty) Ltd (unreported WLD Case No 20027/99, 2 August 2000) ..... 42.9*(a)*

Tirfu Raiders Rugby Club v SA Rugby Union 2006 JDR 0034 (C), [2006] 2 All SA 549 (C) ..... 18.2*(b), 63.3(b), 63.3(c)*
Tobacco Institute of Southern Africa v Minister of Health 1998 (4) SA 745 (C), 1999 (1) BCLR 83 (C) ..... 17.4*(b)*, 62.7
Todt v Ipser 1993 (3) SA 577 (A) ..... 38.2*(a)*(ii)
Tongoane & Others v National Minister for Agriculture and Land Affairs & Others 2010 (6) SA 214 (CC), 2010 (8) BCLR 741 (CC), [2010] ZACC 10 ..... 17.6*(b)*(i), (ii) & (iii)
Tongoane & Others v National Minister for Agriculture and Land Affairs & Others 2010 (8) BCLR 838 (GNP) [2009] ZAGPPHC 127 ..... 17.6*(b)*(i), (ii) & (iii)
Total South Africa (Pty) Ltd v Bekker NO 1992 (1) SA 617 (A) ..... 57.4*(c)(ii)(cc)(ii), 58.4(a)(v), 58.7(a)*
Total Support Management (Pty) Ltd v Diversified Health Systems (SA) (Pty) Ltd 2002 (4) SA 661 (SCA) ..... 59.4*(b)(v), 59.4(c)(ii), 63.3(b)*
Townsend-Turner and Another v Morrow 2004 (2) SA 32 (C), [2004] 1 All SA 235 (C) ..... 47.3*(a)*
Transkei Public Servants Association v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1995 (9) BCLR 1235 (Tk) ..... 46.3*(c)*
Transnet Limited v Goodman Brothers (Pty) Limited 2001(1) SA 853 (SCA), 2001 (2) BCLR 176 (SCA) ..... 18.3*(f)(i), 25.2(c)(i), 25.2(c)(iii), 25.8, 31.7(a), 34.7(c)(i), 62.7, 63.3(b), 63.7(b)*
Transnet Ltd T/A Metrorail v Rail Commuters Action Group and Others 2003 (6) SA 349 (SCA), 2003 (12) BCLR 1363 (SCA) ..... 1.3, 13.3, 31.4*(e)(viii), 40.5(b)(i) Transnet Ltd v Chirwa 2007 (2) SA 198 (SCA), (2006) 27 ILJ 2294 (SCA) . 18.3(f)*(i), 23A.4
Transvaal Agricultural Union v Minister of Agriculture and Land Affairs and Others 2005 (4) SA 212 (SCA) ..... 24B.1, 48.8*(b)*(i)
Transvaal Agricultural Union v Minister of Land Affairs and Another 1997 (2) SA 621 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1573 (CC) ..... 3.4*(d), 5.3(d), 6.2(b)*(iv)
Transvaal Chronicle and Another v Roberts 1915 TPD 188 ..... 42.9*(c)*
Transvaal Coal Owners Association v Board of Control 1921 TPD 447 .... 7.3*(b)*
Transvaal Consolidated Land and Exploration Co Ltd v Johannesburg City Council 1972 (1) SA 88 (W) ..... 32.5*(c)*
Traub v Administrator, Transvaal 1989 (2) SA 396 (T) 63.10
Treatment Action Campaign and Others v Government of Republic of South Africa and Others [2006] ZAKZHC 9 ..... 9.6*(c)*(v)
Treatment Action Campaign and Others v Minister of Health and Others 2002 (4) BCLR 356 (T) ..... 33.5*(f)(iii), 33.5(h)*
Treatment Action Campaign and Others v Minister of Health and Others (No 2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC) ..... 14.1, 32.3*(c)*
Treatment Action Campaign v Minister of Health 2005 (6) SA 363 (T) 23A.4
Treatment Action Campaign v Rath and Others 2007 (4) SA 563 (C) ..... 42.9*(h)*
Trend Fashions (Pty) Ltd v Commissioner for SARS and Another 2006 (2) BCLR 304 (C) 23A.4
Trustees for the Time Being of the Biowatch Trust v the Registrar: Genetic Resources & Others 2005 (4) SA 111 (T) ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(bb)*(x)
Trustees, Brian Lackey Trust v Annandale 2004 (3) SA 281 (C) ..... 34.7*(a)* Trust Sentrum (Kaapstad) (Edms) Bpk v Zevenberg 1989 (1) SA 145 (C).. 52.9
Tseleng v Chairman, Unemployment Insurance Board 1995 (3) SA 162 (T), 1995 (2) BCLR 138 (T) ..... 63.5*(e)*
Tsenoli v State President of the Republic of South Africa 1992 (3) SA 37 (D) ..... 17.3*(f), 30.1(b)(i) Tshabala-Msimang v Makhanya 2008 (6) SA 102 (W) ..... 42.9(b)*

Tshona and Others v Regional Magistrate, Uitenhage and Another 2001 (8) BCLR 860 (E) ..... 51.5*(b), 52.6(a)*(ii)
Tshwete v Minister of Home Affairs 1988 (4) SA 586 (A) ..... 30.1*(b)(i) Tsichlas and Another v Touch Line Media (Pty) Ltd 2004 (2) SA 112 (W).. 42.9(a)* Tsotetsi v Mutual & Federal Insurance Co Ltd 1997 (1) SA 585 (CC), 1996 (11) BCLR 1439 (CC) ..... 5.3*(d), 31.8(a)*
Tsung and Another v Industrial Development Corporation of South Africa Limited and Another 2006 (4) SA 177 (SCA) ..... 9.2*(b)(ii)(aa)*
Turner v Jockey Club of South Africa 1974 (3) SA 633 (A) ..... 63.2*(c)*
Tussentydse Regering vir Suidwes-Afrika en 'n Ander v Katofa 1987 (1) SA 695 (A) ..... 32.1*(a)* Tutu v Minister of Internal Affairs 1982 (4) SA 571 (T) ..... 41.1*(a)* Tyelinzima v Sangqu NAC 375 (1920) ..... 26.6*(a)*

U

Uitenhage Transitional Local Council v South African Revenue Service 2004 (1) SA 292 (SCA), 2003 (4) All SA 37 (SCA) ..... 51.5*(o)*
Umfolozi Transport (Edms) Bpk v Minister van Vervoer en Andere [1997] 2 All SA 548 (SCA) ..... 25.8, 63.5*(g)*
Uncedo Taxi Service Association v Maninjwa and Others 1998 (3) SA 417 (E), 1998 (6) BCLR 683 (E), 1998 (2) SACR 166 (E) ..... 51.1*(a)(ii), 51.1(a)(iii), 51.1(a)(iv), 51.5(c), 51.5(i), 52.4(a)*(ii)
Union Government (Minister of Finance) v Mack 1917 AD 731 ..... 32.5*(c)*
Union Government (Minister of Mines and Industries) v Union Steel Corporation (South Africa) Ltd 1928 AD 220 ..... 63.6*(a)* Union Government (Minister of Mines) v Thompson 1919 AD 404 ..... 32.5*(c)*
Union of Refugee Women and Others v The Director: The Private Security Industry Regulatory Authority and Others 2007 (4) SA 395 (CC), 2007 (4) BCLR 339 (CC) ..... 4.2*(b), 4.3(a)(i), 9.2(c)(iii)(cc), 9.6(b), 32.3(c), 35.1(b), 35.1(d)(i), 35.3(a), 35.3(a)(ii), 35.3(e)(i), 35.5(e), 35.5(j), 63.3(c), 66.1(d)*(ii)
United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others (1) 2003 (1) SA 488 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC) ..... 4.3*(b)(iv), 17.5(f)(i) United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others (African Christian Democratic Party and Others Intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa and Another as Amici Curiae) (No 2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1213 (CC), [2002] ZACC 21 ..... 2.6(a), 4.2(a), 4.3(a)(ii), 10.3(b), 10.3(c)(ii), 10.4(a), 10.5(a), 12.2(c), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 13.4, 13.5(a), 14.5(b), 17.2(b)(ii), 17.2(c), 17.3(a), 17.4, 17.5(f)(i), 17.5(g), 17.6(a)(iii), 17.8(b), 19.1(c), 21.2(c), 22.1(e), 23B.6(b)(iii), 29.3(c), 29.3(d), 29.3(f), 29.4, 29.6(b), 31.5, 34.7(a), 34.8(e)(i), 34.8(e)(ii), 34.9, 44.3(c)(i), 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y), 57.3(c)(ii), 59.3(a)(v), 64.4(a)*

United Methodist Church of Southern Africa and Others v Methodist Church of Southern Africa and Others 1991 (2) SA 138 (TkAD) ..... 41.2*(c)*

United Watch and Diamond Company (Pty) Ltd v Disa Hotels Ltd 1972 (4) SA 409 (C) ..... 5.3*(a)*(i)

Universiteit van Pretoria v Tommie Meyer Films (Edms) Bpk 1977 (4) SA 376 (T) ..... 34.8*(e)(ii), 36.1(b), 38.1, 38.2(a)*(iii), 38.4

Universiteit van Pretoria v Tommie Meyers Films (Edms) Bpk 1979 (1) SA 441 (A) ..... 31.3*(d), 38.2(a)*(iii), 38.4

University of Cape Town v Cape Bar Council and Another 1986 (4) SA 903 (A) ..... 32.3*(a)*

University of Cape Town v Ministers of Education and Culture (House of Assembly and House of Representatives) 1988 (3) SA 203 (C) ..... 42.7*(f)*

University of Pretoria v South Africans for the Abolition of Vivisection 2007 (3) SA 395 (O) ..... 42.9*(a)*

University of the Western Cape and Others v Member of the Executive Committee for Health and Social Science Services and Others 1998 (3) SA 124 (C) 63.9

Uthukela District Municipality and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2002 (5) BCLR 479 (N) ..... 9.5*(c)(iii), 22.1(c), 22.5(g)*

Uthukela District Municipality and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others 2003 (1) SA 678 (CC); 2002 (11) BCLR 1220 (CC) ..... 3.4*(f), 5.3(c), 14.3(b)(ii), 14.3(c)(i), 14.3(c)(ii), 14.3(c)(iii), 14.5(d)(ii)(aa), 22.5(d), 31.4(f)*

V

V v V 1998 (4) SA 169 (C) ..... 47.3*(a)*

VRM v Health Professions Council of South Africa and Others 2004 (3) BCLR 311 (T) 8.2

Valley Packers Co-operative Ltd v Dietloff and Another [2001] 2 All SA 30 (LCC) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)

Van Biljon v Minister of Correctional Services (B and Others v Minister of Correctional Services and Others) 1997 (4) SA 441 (C), 1997 (6) BCLR 789 (C) ..... 31.2*(d)(ii), 33.8, 34.5(b)(ii), 49.3(a), 51.3(c), 51.3(g), 55.8, 56A.2(a), 56A.2(c), 56A.3, 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y)*

Van der Berg v Coopers & Lybrand Trust (Pty) Ltd and Others 2001 (2) SA 242 (SCA) ..... 42.9*(a)*

Van der Linde v Calitz 1967 (2) SA 239 (A) ..... 52.6*(c)*

Van der Merwe and Another v Taylor NO and Others 2008 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2007 (11) BCLR 1167 (CC) ..... 4.2*(b), 4.3(g)*(ii)

Van der Merwe v Road Accident Fund and Another (Women's Legal Centre Trust as Amicus Curiae) 2006 (4) SA 230 (CC), 2006 (6) BCLR 682 (CC) ..... 3.3*(d), 6.2(d), 9.2(e)(iv)(aa), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 35.3(a)(ii), 35.3(b), 35.5(g)(ii), 35.5(g)*(iii)

Van der Merwe v The Road Accident Fund 2007 (1) SA 176 (CC), 2006 (6) BCLR 682 (CC) 35.3

Van der Spuy v General Council of The Bar of South Africa (Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development, Advocates for Transformation and Law Society of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 392 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1092 (CC) ..... 5.3*(d)*
Van der Spuy v Minister of Correctional Services 2004 (2) SA 463 (SE)..... 40.5*(b)*(i)
Van der Walt and Others v Lang and Others 1999 (1) SA 189 (LCC) ..... 56B.4*(a)(iv), 56C.3(b)*(ii)
Van der Walt v Metcash Trading Ltd 2002 (4) SA 317 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 454 (CC) ..... 4.2*(b), 4.3(a)(i), 11.2(a), 11.2(b)(i), 11.2(b)(iii), 11.4(c)*
Van der Westhuizen NO v United Democratic Front 1989 (2) SA 242 (A). 2.2(i)(iii), 2.3*(f), 43.2(a)*
Van Duivenboden v Minister of Safety and Security 2001(4) All SA 127 (C) ..... 13.5*(a)*
Van Dyk v Maithuti Case No 4268/2002 (TPD 29 April 2003, Du Plessis J) ..... 23B.3*(d), 43.3(b)(iii), 44.2(c), 44.3(c)*(vii)
Van Eeden v Minister of Safety and Security (Women's Legal Centre as Amicus Curiae) 2003 (1) SA 389 (SCA), 2002 (4) All SA 346 (SCA) ..... 9.5*(a)(i), 23B.3(c)(iii)(bb), 32.5(b), 40.5(b)(i) Van Heerden and Another v Joubert NO and Others 1994 (4) SA 793 (A) ..... 31.3(a)(iii), 32.3(a)*, 37.2
Van Huysteen NO v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism 1996 (1) SA 283 (C) ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(bb)(x), 63.5(d)*
Van Loggerenberg v 94.7 Highveld Stereo 2004 (5) BCLR 561 (BCCSA)... 42.8*(c)*
Van Niekerk v City Council of Pretoria 1997 (3) SA 839 (T) [1997] All SA 305 (T) ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(bb)(x)*, 62.7
Van Rensburg v South African Post Office Ltd, 1998 (10) BCLR 1307 (E) 54.3
Van Rooyen and Others v The State and Others 2001 (4) SA 396 (T), 2001 (9) BCLR 915 (T) ..... 7.1, 7.2*(c), 7.2(c)(i), 7.2(c)(iv), 31.4(f)*, 34.6
Van Rooyen and Others v The State and Others (General Council of the Bar of South Africa Intervening) 2002 (5) SA 246 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 222 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 810 (CC) ..... 4.3*(c)(i), 5.3(c), 7.2(c)(iv), 9.3, 9.4(e)(i)(bb), 9.4(e)(ii)(bb), 12.3(b), 12.3(b)(ii), 12.3(d)(i)(bb), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 17.3(d), 17.3(e)(i), 19.4(b), 20.3(g), 24A.3(a), 24A.3(b), 24B.2, 31.4(f), 32.4(c)*
Van Straaten v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2009 (3) SA 457 (CC), 2009 (5) BCLR 480 (CC), [2009] ZACC 2..... 17.4*(c)*
Van Vuuren v S 2005 (7) BCLR 639 (CC) ..... 4.2*(b)*
Van Wyk v Uys NO 2002 (5) SA 92 (C)..... 14.3*(c)(i) Van Zijl v Hoogenhout 2005 (2) SA 93 (SCA)..... 59.4(a)*(ii)
Van Zyk v Government of the RSA 2008 (3) SA 294 (SCA)..... 18.3*(k)*
Van Zyl and Another v Jonathan Ball Publishers and Others 1999 (4) SA 571 (W) ..... 36.4*(h)(iii), 42.9(a)*
Van Zyl and Others v Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others [2005] 4 All SA 96 (T), 2005 (11) BCLR 1106 (T) ..... 9.5*(c)(iii), 30.4(d)*, 60.6
Van Zyl v New National Party & Others 2003 (10) BCLR 1167..... 17.8*(a)*
Van Zyl NO v Maarman 2001 (1) SA 957 (LCC), [2000] 4 All SA 212 (LCC) ..... 55.6*(b)*(ii)
Various Occupants v Thubelisha Homes and Others (Unreported Constitutional Court Case No CCT 22/08) 63.10

Vaughan and Another v Ford 1953 (4) SA 486 (R) ..... 38.2*(c)*(ii)
Veldman v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) 2007 (3) SA 210 (CC), 2007 (8) BCLR 827 (CC) ..... 9.4*(e)(ii)(bb)*, 9.8.
Venter NO v Claasen en Andere 2001 (1) SA 720 (LCC) ..... 48.6*(a), 48.7(b)*(iv)
Venter v R 1907 TS 910 ..... 32.3*(a), 32.5(c)*
Victoria and Alfred Waterfront (Pty) Ltd v Police Commissioner, Western Cape (Legal Resources Centre as Amicus Curiae) 2004 (4) SA 444 (C) ..... 31.4*(e)(x), 39.8, 66.1(b)(i), 66.1(b)*(ii)
Vikilahle v Zulualiteti (1904) 1 NAC 77 ..... 26.6*(a)* Viljoen v Smith 1997 (1) SA 309 (A) ..... 50.4*(h)(ii)(ff)*
Villiers v Munisipaliteit can Beaufort-Wes 1998 (9) BCLR 1060 (C) ..... 22.2*(b)*(iii)
Visagie v State President and Others 1989 (3) SA 859 (A) ..... 51.3*(c)*
Volks NO v Robinson and Others 2005 (5) BCLR 466 (CC) ..... 9.4*(b)(ii), 9.4(e), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 34.8(e)(ii), 35.5(g)(ii), 35.5(g)(iii), 35.5(g)(v), 35.5(h), 35.5(h)(i), 35.5(j), 36.2(d), 58.4(a)*(iii)
Von Molkte v Costa Areosa (Pty) Ltd 1975 (1) SA 255 (C) ..... 7.2*(b)*
Vooraus Beleggings (Edms) Bpk v Molefe (unreported, LCC Case No 9R/00, 7 March 2000) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Vulindlela Furniture Manufacturers (Pty) Ltd v MEC, Department of Education andCulture, Eastern Cape, and Others 1998 (4) SA 908 (Tk) 7.2*(c)(i) Vumanzonke v Member of the Executive Council for Social Development, Eastern Cape Province; Matitibala v Member of the Executive Council for Social Development, Eastern Cape Province; Matitwane v Member of the Executive Council for Social Development, Eastern Cape Province; Plaatjies v Member of the Executive Council for Social Development, Eastern Cape Province, 2005 (6) SA 229 (SE) ..... 56D.3(f)*(ii)

W

W v W 1976 (2) SA 308 (W) ..... 59.4*(b)*(v)
Wagener v Pharmacare Ltd; Cuttings v Pharmacare Ltd 2003 (4) SA 285 SCA, 2003 (7) BCLR 710 (SCA) ..... 31.4*(e)*(x)
Waks en Andere v Jacobs en 'n Ander 1990 (1) SA 913 (T) ..... 7.2*(b)*
Walele v The City of Cape Town and Others 2008 (6) SA 129 (CC) ..... 63.2*(a), 63.2(c), 63.3(c), 63.5(c), 63.5(d)*
Walker v Stadsraad van Pretoria 1997 (4) SA 189 (T) ..... 3.3*(a)*
Wallach v High Court of South Africa, Witwatersrand Local Division, and Others 2003 (5) SA 273 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC) ..... 5.3*(d)*
Waltons Stationery Co (Edms) Bpk v Fourie en 'n Ander 1994 (4) SA 507 (O), 1994 (1) BCLR 50 (O) ..... 36.4*(f), 44.3(c)*(iv), 54.4
Ward-Jackson v Cape Times Ltd 1910 WLD 257 ..... 38.2*(b)*(iii)
Ward v Cape Peninsula Ice Skating Club 1998 (2) SA 487 (C) ..... 44.1*(c)(iii), 44.1(c)(vi), 44.3(c)(ix), 57.4(c)(ii)(cc)(i)(bb), 58.5(a), 58.7(a)*
Waring and Gillow v Sherborne 1904 (TS) 340 ..... 37.6, 40.11*(b)*
Wary Holdings (Pty) Ltd v Stalwo (Pty) Ltd and the Registrar of Deeds, Cape Town (Trustees of the Hoogekraal Highlands Trust and SAFAMCO Enterprises (Pty) Ltd as amici Curiae; Minister of Africulture and Land Affairs Intervening) 2009 (1) SA 337 (CC) ..... 9.4*(b)(i), 9.4(b)(ii), 32.5(b), 63.2(a)* Wasserman v Union Government 1934 AD 228 ..... 51.5*(f)*

Waste Products Utilisation (Pty) Ltd v Wilkes 2003 (2) SA 515 (W) ..... 52.10*(f)*
Waters v Khayalami Metropolitan Council 1997 (3) SA 476 (W) ..... 23A.4, 45.10*(c)*
Wehmeyer v Lane NO and Others 1994 (4) SA 441 (C), 1994 (2) BCLR 14 (C) ..... 9.5*(c)(ii), 51.3(g)*
Welkom Municipality v Masureik and Herman T/A Lotus Corporation and Another 1997 (3) SA 363 (SCA) ..... 30.2*(c)*
Wells v South African Alumenite Company 1927 AD 69 ..... 31.4*(c)*(ii)
Wendy Orr and Others v Minister of Law and Order and Others (Unreported South Eastern Cape Case No 2507/85) ..... 2.3*(g)*
Wesso v Director of Public Prosecutions, Western Cape 2001 (1) SACR 674 (C) ..... 52.10*(d)*
Western Cape Education Department and Another v George 1998 (3) SA 77 (SCA) ..... 7.4*(c)*
Western Cape Minister of Education v The Governing Body of Mikro Primary School 2006 (1) SA 1 (SCA), 2005 (10) BCLR 973 (SCA) ..... 32.4*(c), 36.4(d)(ii), 57.3(c)(ii), 57.3(c)*(iii)
Western Cape Provincial Government and Others, Ex parte; In re DVB Behuising (Pty) Ltd v North West Provincial Government and Another 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347 (CC) ..... 14.3*(a), 15.1, 15.3(a), 15.3(a)(i), 15.3(a)(iii), 15.3(a)(iv), 15.3(c)(ii), 15.3(c)(iv), 17.6(b)(i), 19.3(c), 19.4(a), 21.2(a), 26.3, 28.1, 28.2(a), 28.2(a)(i), 32.1(c), 32.3(b), 32.4(c), 35.5(g)(i), 55.4(b)*(v)
Western Investments Company (Ltd) v Van Reenen (unreported, LCC Case No 05R/02, 12 February 2002) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Westley v Attorneys Fidelity Fund 2004 (3) SA 31 (C) ..... 31.4*(b)*(iii)
Westminster Produce (Pty) Ltd t/a Elgin Orchards v Simons and Another 2001 (1) SA 1017 (LCC), [2000] 3 All SA 279 (LCC) ..... 48.7*(b)*(iv)
West Rand Estates Ltd v New Zealand Insurance (Co) Ltd 1925 AD 245 .. 32.3*(a)* Whittaker v Roos and Bateman; Morant v Roos and Bateman 1912 AD 92 ..... 34.8*(e)(ii), 36.1(b), 38.3(a)(iv), 49.3(a)*
Wichmann NO and Another v Langa and Others 2006 (1) SA 102 (LCC) . 48.7*(b)*(iv)
Wild and Another v Hoffert NO and Others 1997 (2) SACR 233 (N), 1997 (7) BCLR 974 (N) ..... 51.5*(f)*
Wildlife Society of Southern Africa and Others v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism of the Republic of South Africa and Others 1996 (3) SA 1095 (Tk), 1996 (9) BCLR 1221 (Tk) ..... 7.2*(d), 9.5(c)(iii), 50.3(b)(i)(bb)(y), 50.4(b)*
Wild v Hoffert 1998 (3) SA 695 (CC), 1998 (6) BCLR 656 (CC), 1998 (2) SACR 1 (CC) ..... 31.2*(d)(v), 51.5(b), 51.5(f)*
Wilhelm v Beamish (1894) 11 SC 13 ..... 38.2*(c)*(ii)
Winckler and Others v Minister of Correctional Services and Others 2001 (2) SA 747 (C), [2001] 2 All SA 12 (C) ..... 49.3*(b)*(ii)
Wittmann v Deutscher Schulverein, Pretoria, and Others 1998 (4) SA 423 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T) ..... 31.4*(f)(i), 31.4(f)(ii), 31.7(a), 32.4(b), 35.5(g)(viii), 36.4(a), 36.4(d)(i), 41.4(d), 41.5, 44.1(c)(iii), 44.1(c)(vi), 44.3(c)(iii), 44.3(c)(ix), 57.3(c)(vii), 57.4(c)(ii)(bb), 57.4(c)(ii)(cc), 57.4(c)(ii)(cc)(i)(aa)*,

57.4*(c)(ii)(cc)(i)(bb), 58.4(a)(i), 58.4(a)(v), 58.5(a)*, 58.7

Woerman and Schutte NNO v Masondo and Others 2002 (1) SA 811 (SCA), [2002] 2 All SA 53 (SCA) ..... 48.6*(b)*(i)

Women's Legal Centre, Ex Parte: In re Moise v Greater Germiston Transitional Local Council 2001 (4) SA 1288 (CC) ..... 3.7*(b)(ii), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 59.4(a)*(ii), 8.2

Wood and Others v Ondangwa Tribal Authority and Another 1975 (2) SA 294 (A) ..... 7.2*(b), 7.2(c)*(ii)

Woods v Minister of Justice and Others 1995 (1) SA 703 (ZSC) 42.2

Woolworths (Pty) Ltd v Whitehead (Women's Legal Centre Trust Intevening) 2000 (3) SA 529 (LAC) ..... 8.4*(b), 8.5, 35.5(g)*(ii)

Worcester Muslim Jamaa v Valley and Others 2002 (6) BCLR 591 (C) ..... 41.3*(c)*

X

Xinwa and Others v Volkswagen of SA (Pty) Ltd 2003 (4) SA 390 (CC), 2003 (6) BCLR 575 (CC), (2003) 24 ILJ 1077 (CC) ..... 4.2*(b), 53.1(a)*(ii)

Xu v Minister van Binnelandse Sake 1995 (1) SA 185 (T), 1995 (1) BCLR 62 (T) ..... 31.3*(a)*(i)

Y

Ynuico Ltd v Minister of Trade and Industry and Others 1996 (3) SA 989 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 798 (CC) ..... 17.5*(e)(i), 19.4(b), 32.4(c), 32.5(c)*

Young v Shaik 2004 (3) SA 46 (C) ..... 42.9*(a)*

Yuen v Minister of Home Affairs and Another 1998 (1) SA 958 (C) ..... 63.5*(e)*

Z

Zama v Minister of Safety and Security 1994 (4) SA 699 (D) ..... 28.2*(a)*(ii)

Zantsi v Chairman, Council of State, Ciskei 1995 (2) SA 534 (Ck), 1995 (10) BCLR 1424 (Ck) ..... 32.3*(a), 34.6, 57.4(c)(ii)(aa)*, 63.1

Zantsi v Council of State, Ciskei and Others 1995 (4) SA 615 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1424 (CC) ..... 32.4*(c), 32.5(b), 32.5(c), 64.6(e), 7.1, 7.3(c)*(iii)

Zealand v Mininster of Justice and Constitutional Development and Another 2008 (4) SA 458 (CC), 2008 (6) BCLR 601, 2008 (2) SACR 1 (CC) ..... 9.2*(f)*(ii)

Zimbabwe Township Developers v Lou's Shoes Ltd 1984 (2) SA 778 (SCA) ..... 31.4*(e)*(vi)

Zondi v MEC for Traditional and Local Government Affairs and Others 2005 (3) SA 589 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 347 (CC) ..... 3.3*(c), 3.4(e), 5.3(d), 9.2(e)(i), 9.4(e)(i)(cc), 9.4(e)(i)(ee), 35.1(b), 35.5(g)(i), 35.5(h)(iii), 59.2(b), 59.4(a)(i), 63.2(a), 63.5(b), 63.5(c)*

Zondi v MEC for Traditional and Local Government Affairs and Others 2006 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 423 (CC) ..... 3.7*(b)*(ii)

Zulu v Mbata 1937 NAC (NandT) 6 ..... 26.6*(b)*

Zulu v Van Rensburg 1996 (4) SA 1236 (LCC) ..... 56C.3*(b)*(ii)

Zuma v National Director of Public Prosecutions [2007] ZASCA 139 ..... 9.2*(c)(iii)(bb)*

Zuma v National Director of Public Prosecutions [2008] ZAKZHC 71 .... 9.4*(b)*(ii)

Zuma v National Director of Public Prosecutions (unreported, (NPD) Case No 8652/08, September 2008) ..... 63.2*(a)*

Zweni v Minister of Law and Order 1993 (1) SA 523 (A) ..... 3.3*(a), 3.5(b)*

FOREIGN JURISDICTIONS

Argentina

CEDHA v Provincial State and Municipality of Córdoba,..... 56B.3*(b)(iii)(cc)*
Matanza-Riachuelo File M. 1569. XL, Supreme Court of Argentina (8 July 2008) ..... 56B.2*(d)*(ii)
Quevedo Miguel Angel y otros c/Aguas Cordobesas S.A. Amparo, Cordoba, City, Juez Sustituta de Primera Instancia y 51 Nominacio nen lo Civil y Comercial de la Ciudad de Cordoba (Civil and Commercial First Instance Court), 8 April 2002 ..... 56B.2*(c)*
Valentina Norte Colony, Defensoría de Menores Nro 3V Poder Ejecutivo Municipal s/acción de amparo Expte. 46-99. Acuerdo 5 del Tribunal Superior de Justicia. Neuquen (2 March 1999)..... 56B.2*(d)*(ii)

Australia

A Raptis and Son v State of South Australia (1977) 138 CLR ..... 16.3*(b)*
Adelaide Company of Jehovah's Witnesses v The Commonwealth (1943) 67 CLR 116 (HC)..... 41.2*(b)(i) Amalgamated Society of Engineers v Adelaide Steamship Company (1920) 28 CLR 129 ..... 21.2(a)* Ansett Transport Industries (Operations) Pty Ltd and Another v Wraith and Others (1983) ALR 500..... 63.7*(d)*
Australian Broadcasting Corporation v O'Neill [2006] HCA 46..... 42.9*(a)* Ballina Shire Council v Ringland (1994) 33 NSWLR 680 (New South Wales)..... 42.9*(a)*
Bannon v R (1995) 132 ALR 87 ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii)
Chamberlain v R (2) (1984) 153 CLR 521..... 51.5(i)
Church of the New Faith v Commissioner for Payroll Tax (Vic) (1983) 154 CLR 120..... 41.3*(a), 41.4(b)*
Clyde Engineering Co Ltd v Cowburn (1926) 37 CLR 466 ..... 16.3*(b), 16.3(c), 16.3(d)*(ii)
Cormack and Another v Cope and Others; The State of Queensland and Another v Whitlam and Others [1974] HCA 28; 131 CLR 432..... 17.4*(a)*
Commercial Radio Coffs Harbour Limited v Fuller and Another (1986) 161 CLR..... 47.16.3*(b)*
Council of the Municipality of Botany v Federal Airports Corporation (1992) 175 CLR ..... 16.3*(b)*
Dischem Pharmacies (Pty) Ltd v United Pharmaceutical Distributors (Pty) Ltd 2003 CLR 9..... 31.4*(e)*(x)
Egan v Chadwick [1999] NSWCA 176..... 18.3*(d)*(iii)
Egan v Willis (1998) 195 CLR 424, [1998] HCA 71..... 17.7*(a), 18.3(d)*(i)–(iii)
Environment Protection Authority v Caltex (1993) 178 CLR 477 ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Hinch v Attorney-General (Victoria) (1987) 164 CLR 15..... 42.9*(c)*
Lange v Australian Broadcasting Corporation (1997) 189 CLR 520 ..... 42.9*(a)*
McLean, Ex Parte (1930) 43 CLR 472..... 16.3*(b)*
New South Wales v Commonwealth (1915) 20 CLR 54..... 12.3*(d)*(iv)
Pyneboard (Pty) Ltd v Trade Practices Commission (1983) 152 CLR 328... 51.4*(a)*
R v Astill (1992) 63 A Crim R 148 ..... 51.5*(k)*
R v Daylight (1989) 41 A Crim R 354 ..... 51.5*(k)*
R v Minister for Immigration and Multicultural Affairs; ex parte Lam [2003] HCA 6, (2003) 214 CLR 1; 195 ALR 502..... 63.10
Robinson v State of South Australia (No 2) 1931 AC 704 ..... 52.6*(c)*
Theophanous v Herald and Weekly Times Ltd and Another (1994) 124 ALR 1; (1994) 182 CLR 104..... 10.4*(a), 42.5(b), 42.7(d)*
Victoria Stevedoring Co v Dignan (1931) 46 CLR 73..... 17.5*(e)*(i)

Waterside Workers' Federation of Australia v JW Alexander Ltd (1918) 25 CLR 434 ..... 12.3*(d)*(iv)

Bahamas

Bahamas District of the Methodist Church in the Caribbean and the Americas v Symonette; Poitier v Methodist Church of the Bahamas [2000] JCJ 31, 26 July 2000 (Privy Council) ..... 17.4*(a)*

Belgium

Arrêt n836/98 du 1 Avril 1998, Commune de Wemmel, Moniteur Belge, 24/4/98 ..... 56B.2*(c)*

Canada

A M v Ryan [1997] 1 SCR 157 ..... 42.7*(d)*
Action Travail des Femmes v Canadian National Railway Co 40 DLR (4th) 193 ..... 35.4*(d)*(iii)
Adams Mine, Cliffs of Canada Ltd (1982) Can LRBR (NS) 384 (Ont) 53.4
Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia [1989] 1 SCR 143 (1989) 56 DLR (4th) 1 ..... 31.3*(d), 34.2(c), 35.1(c)*, 37.4
Amendment of the Constitution of Canada, In re (1981) 125 DLR (3d) 1 (SCC) ..... 17.4*(a)*
Association of Professional Engineers of Saskatchewan v SGEU (1992) 91 DLR (4th) 694 ..... 44.1*(d)*
Attorney-General v Lawrence [1985] LRC (Const) 921 (St Christopher and Nevis CA) ..... 46.3*(c)*
Auton v British Columbia (Attorney General) 2004 SCC 78 ..... 35.5*(g)*(vii)
B (R) v Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto [1995] 1 SCR 315, (1995) 122DLR (4th) 1 (SC) ..... 41.4*(c)*
BCGEU v British Columbia (Attorney General) [1988] 2 SCR 214, 53 DLR (4th) 1 ..... 31.4*(b)(iii), 34.2(c)*
BC Securities Commission v Branch [1995] 2 SCR 3 ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Baker v Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) (1999) 174 DLR (4th) (SCC) ..... 63.5*(g)*
Benner v Canada [1997] 1 SCR 358 ..... 34.1*(c)*
Bhindi v British Columbia Projectionists Loc 348 (1986) 4 BCLR (2d) 145, 29 DLR (4th) 47 ..... 53.3*(b)*
Black v Canada (2001) 54 OR (3rd) 215, (2001) 199 DLR (4th) 228 (CA) ..... 30.4*(a)*
Black v Law Society of Alberta [1989] 1 SCR 591, 58 DLR (4th) 3 ..... 17.34.2*(c)*
Blencoe v British Columbia [2000] 2 SCR 307 ..... 40.8*(b)*
Bliss v A-G Canada [1979] 1 SCR 183, (1979) 92 DLR (3rd) 417 ..... 7.4
Borowski v Attorney General of Canada (1987) 39 DLR (4th) 731 (Sask CA) ..... 31.3*(a)*(iii)
Bureau Métropolitain des Ecoles Protestantes de Montréal v Ministre de l'Education du Québec [1976] 1 CS 430 ..... 65.2*(b)*
Burlingham v The Queen (1995) 28 CRR (2d) 244 ..... 52.10*(b)*
Caldwell v Stuart (1984) 56 NR 83 ..... 41.4*(c)*
Canada Assistance Plan (B.C.), In re [1991] 2 SCR 525 ..... 17.4*(a)*
Canada (Attorney General) v JTI-MacDonald Corp 2007 SCC 30 ..... 42.9*(f)*
Canada (House of Commons) v Vaid [2005] 1 SCR 667 (SCC) ..... 17.7*(a)*
Canada (Human Rights Commission) v Taylor [1990] 3 SCR 892 ..... 42.8*(c)*
Canada v Beauregard (1986) 30 DLR (4th) 481 ..... 12.3*(b)*(ii)
Canada v Chiarelli [1992] 1 SCR 711 ..... 40.7*(a)(i) Canada v Schmidt (1987) 39 DLR (4th) 18, [1987] 1 SCR 500 ..... 31.6(b)*, 41.5
Canadian Broadcasting Corp v New Brunswick (Attorney General) 1996 3 SCR 480 ..... 42.9*(c)*

Canadian Civil Liberties Association v Ontario (Min. of Education) (1990) 71 OR (2d) 341 (CA) ..... 41.2*(e)*, 41.5
Canadian Foundation for Children v Canada [2004] 1 SCR 76 ..... 40.7*(a)(i), 47.5(b)*, 47.8
Canadian Newspapers Co v Canada (Attorney-General) [1988] 2 SCR 122, 52 DLR (4th) 690 ..... 34.2*(c),* 42.9*(c)*
Central Hudson Gas v Public Services Commission 447 US 557, 100 SCt 2343 (1980) 42.4
Chamberlain v Surrey School District No. 36 [2002] 4 SCR 710 ..... 41.4*(a)*
Clark v Canadian National Railway Co [1988] 2 SCR 680 ..... 15.3*(c)*(iii)
Committee for the Commonwealth of Canada v Canada [1991] 1 SCR 139, 77 DLR (4th) 385 ..... 34.2*(c), 34.7(a), 34.7(c)(ii), 43.3(a)*
Compagnie Générale des Etablissements Michelin & Cie v National Automobile, Aeropsace, Transprotation and General Workers Union of Canada (CAW-Canada) (TD); Mutual of Omaha Insurance v Novak 836 F 2d 397 (1987) ..... 42.7*(g)*
Connell v University of British Columbia [1990] 3 SCR 451 ..... 31.4*(f)*(ii)
Criminal Code, Reference re (1990) 48 CRR 1 ..... 17.3*(f)*
Cusson v Quan 2007 ONCA 771 ..... 42.9*(a)*
Dagenais v Canadian Broadcasting Corp (1994) 120 DLR (4th) 12 (SCC), [1994] 3 SCR 835 ..... 34.2*(b),* 42.7*(d), 42.9(c)*
Diocese of Southwark v Coker [1998] ICR 140 (CA) ..... 41.4*(c)*
Doucet-Boudreau v Nova Scotia (Minister of Education) [2003] 3 SCR 3 . 9.2*(e)(iii)(bb),* 9.6*(c)*(i)
Douglas College v Douglas/Kwantlen Faculty Association, Attorney-General of Canada et al, Interveners [1990] 77 DLR (4th) 94, 3 SCR 570 ..... 17.5*(b)*
Du Bois v R (1985) 23 DLR (4th) 503 ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii)
Dunmore v Ontario [2001] 3 SCR 1016, (2001) 207 DLR (4th) 193 (SCC) 34.2*(c)*, 53.5
Edmonton Journal v Alberta (AG) [1989] 2 SCR 1326, 64 DLR (4th) 577 . 31.3*(d), 31.1(c),* 42.9*(c)*
Edwards Books and Art Ltd. v The Queen [1986] 2 SCR 713, 35 DLR (4th) 1 ..... 34.2*(c), 41.2(c), 41.2(d), 41.2(e)*
Egan v Canada [1995] 2 SCR 513, (1995) 29 CRR (2d) 79 ..... 35.1*(d)(i), 35.5(f), 36.3(c)*
Eldridge v British Columbia (Attorney General) (1997) 151 DLR. (4th) 577 (SCC) ..... 31.4*(f)(ii), 33.10(b), 33.4(d), 35.5(b), 35.5(g)*(vii)
Ford v Attorney General of Quebec [1988] 2 SCR 712 ..... 42.9*(f)*
Gainers Inc and UFCW (Re) (1986) 14 CLRBR (NS) 191 (Alta) 53.4
Garrod v Rhema Christian School (1991) 18 CHRR 47 ..... 41.4*(c)*
General Motors of Canada Ltd v City National Leasing [1989] 1 SCR 641, 58 DLR (4th) 255 ..... 15.3*(c)*(iii)
Gosselin v Quebec (Attorney-General) 2002 SCC 84 ..... 33.4*(d)*
Gratz v Bollinger 539 US 244 (2003) ..... 57.2*(b)(ii)(bb)*
Grutter v Bollinger 539 US 306 (2003) ..... 57.2*(b)(ii)(bb)*
Haig v Canada 105 DLR (4th) 577 (SCC) ..... 29.2*(b)*
Hodge v The Queen (1883) App Cas 117 ..... 17.5*(e)(i) Husky Oil Operations v Minister of National Revenue [1995] 3 SCR 453 ..... 16.3(c), 19.3(a)*(ii)
Hy and Zel's Inc v Ontario (Attorney-General) [1993] 3 SCR 675 ..... 41.2*(d)*
International Fund for Animal Welfare Inc v R [1989] 35 CRR 359 ..... 62.1
Irwin Toy Ltd v Quebec (Attorney General) (1989) 39 CRR 193 (SCC), [1989] 1 SCR 927, 1989] 58 DLR (4th) 577, 612 (SCC) ..... 34.1*(b), 34.7(a),* 42.5,42.9*(f),* 43.3*(a)*(ii)
Jones v The Queen [1986] 2 SCR 284, 31 DLR (4th) 569 ..... 41.3*(b)*
Kassama v Magat 767 A 2d 348 (Md Spec App 2001) 37.3

Kearley v Pentecostal Assemblies Board of Education (1993) 19 CHRR 473 ..... 41.4*(c)*
Kindler v Canada (1991) 84 DLR (4th) 438 ..... 31.6*(b)*
Kitkatla Band v British Columbia (Minister of Small Business, Tourism and Culture) 2002 SCC, 31 [2002] 2 SCR 146 ..... 15.3*(c)*(iii)
Lavigne v OPSEU (1986) 33 DLR (4th) 174 ..... 44.1*(d)*
Lavigne v OPSEU [1991] 2 SCR 211, 81 DLR (4th) 545 (SCC) ..... 31.2*(d)(ii), 44.2(b), 53.3(b)*
Law v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) (1999) 170 DLR 4th 1 (SCC), [1999] 1 SCR 497 ..... 35.5*(b)*
Little Sisters Book and Art Emporium v Minister of Justice and Attorney-General of Canada [2000] 2 SCR 1120 ..... 9.6*(a), 42.9(e),* 42.9*(h)*
Lucier v R [1982] 1 SCR 28 ..... 51.5*(k)*
Lyons v The Queen (1988) 37 CCC (3d) 1 ..... 49.2*(c)*(ii)
MacBain v Canadian Human Rights Commission et al, MacBain v Lederman et al 22 DLR (4th) 119 (FedCA) ..... 59.4*(c)*(vi)
Manitoba Fisheries Ltd v The Queen (1978) 88 DLR (3d) 462 ..... 46.3*(c)*
McKinney v University of Guelph [1990] 3 SCR 229, 76 DLR (4th) 545 ..... 31.4*(f)(ii), 34.2(c),* 42.7*(f)*
Michelin Tires (Canada) Ltd 80 CLLC 16 009 (NSLRB) 53.4
Minister of Justice of Canada v Borowski (1981) 130 DLR (3rd) 588, [1981] 2 SCR 575 ..... 7.2*(c)(iv), 7.4(a)*
Morin v R [1988] 2 SCR 345 ..... 51.5(i)
Multiple Access Ltd v McCutcheon [1982] 2 SCR 161 ..... 15.3*(c)*(iii)
Named Person v Vancouver Sun 2007 SCC 43 ..... 42.9*(c)*
Nelles v Ontario [1989] 2 SCR 170 ..... 9.2*(b)(I)*
New Brunswick Broadcasting Co v Nova Scotia 100 DLR (4th) 212 (SC), [1993] 1 SCR 319 ..... 17.7*(a)*, 31.5, 34.9
New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v G (J) [1999] 3 SCR 46, 66 CRR (2nd) 267 (1999) ..... 40.8*(b),* 59.4*(b)*(i)
Northern Telecom Ltd v Communications Workers of Canada [1980] 1 SCR115 ..... 15.3*(c)*(iii)
Ontario (Attorney-General) v Dieleman (1994) 117 DLR (4th) 449 ..... 41.3*(b)*
Ontario (Speaker of the Legislative Assembly) v Ontario (Human Rights Commission) 201 DLR (4th) 698 ..... 17.7*(a)*
Osborne v Canada (Treasury Board) [1991] 2 SCR 170 ..... 9.2*(e)(iii)(bb)*
P v S (1993) 108 DLR (4th) 287 (SC) ..... 41.4*(c)*
Papp v Papp [1970] 1 OR 331 ..... 15.3*(c)*(iii)
Peel (Regional Municipality) v Great Atlantic (1991) 78 DLR (4th) 333 (Ont CA) ..... 41.2*(e)*
Phillips v Nova Scotia (Commission of Inquiry into the Westray Mine Tragedy) (1993) 117 NSR (2d) 218 ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Placer Development Ltd (1985) 11 CLRBR (BS) 195 (BC) 53.4
PSAC v Canada (1987) 38 DLR (4th) 249 (SCC) ..... 53.3*(a)*
R v A [1990] 1 SCR 995 ..... 31.6*(a)*
R v Altseimer (1982) 38 OR (2d) 783 (CA) ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
R v Amway Corporation [1989] 1 SCR 21 ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
R v Andres [1990] 3 SCR 870 ..... 42.8*(c)*
R v Beare; R v Higgins [1988] 2 SCR 387 ..... 40.3*(b)*
R v Beauregard (1986) 26 CRR 59 (SCC), 1987 LRC 180 (SCC) ..... 51.5*(e)*(i)
R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd [1985] 1 SCR 295, (1985) 18 DLR (4th) 321 (SCC) ..... 32.1*(b),* 34.8*(c)(i), 41.2(b)(iii), 41.2(c), 41.2(e), 53.6, 58.4(a)*(v)
R v Burlingham [1995] 2 SCR 206 ..... 51.5*(b)*
R v Butler [1992] 1 SCR 452, (1992) 89 DLR (4th) 449 (SCC) ..... 42.9*(e)*
R v Cambridge Health Authority, Ex Parte B [1995] 2 All ER 129, 137 (CA) ..... 56A.2*(a)*

R v Chaulk [1990] 3 SCR 1302, 62 CCC (3d) 193 ..... 34.2*(c), 34.8(c)*(iii)
R v Christie [1914] AC 545 (HL) ..... 51.4*(b)*(ii)
R v Cohn (1984) 13 DLR (4th) 680 ..... 51.5*(e)*(i)
R v Collins (1987) 56 CR 193 (SCC), [1987] 1 SCR 265 ..... 51.4*(b)(iii), 51.5(b),* 52.10*(c),* 52.10*(g)*
R v Cook [1998] 2 SCR 597 ..... 31.6*(a)*
R v Crawford [1995] 1 SCR 858 ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii)
R v Debot [1989] 2 SCR 1140 ..... 51.2
R v Demers [2003] BCJ 75, 2003 BCCA 28 ..... 37.2
R v Dersch [1993] 3 SCR 768 ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
R v Director of Serious Fraud Office, ex parte Smith [1993] AC 1 (HL) ..... 51.4*(b)*(i)
R v Duarte [1990] 1 SCR 30 ..... 38.3*(a)*(iii)
R v Duguay (1989) 1 SCR 93 ..... 40.3*(c)*(i)
R v Finta [1994] 1 SCR 701 ..... 51.5*(f), 51.5(k), 51.5(m)*
R v Genereux (1992) 88 DLR (4th) 110 ..... 51.5*(e)*(i)
R v Glad Day Bookshops Inc (2004) 239 DLR (4th) ..... 42.9*(b)*
R v Goltz [1991] 3 SCR 485, 67 CCC (3d) 481 (1992) ..... 40.7*(c)(ii), 49.2(c)*(i)
R v Greffe [1990] 1 SCR 755 ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
R v Gruenke [1991] 3 SCR 263 ..... 42.7*(d)*
R v Hall [2002] 3 SCR 309 ..... 51.4*(d)*
R v Hebert [1990] 2 SCR 151, 57 CCC (3d) 1 ..... 34.7*(c)(i), 51.2, 51.4(a), 51.4(b)*(ii)
R v Heywood [1994] 3 SCR 761 ..... 40.3*(b)*
R v Hufsky [1988] 1 SCR 621, 40 CCC (3d) 398 ..... 34.2*(c), 40.3(c)*(i), 51.2
R v Jones [1994] 2 SCR 229 ..... 51.4*(a)*
R v Kalanj (1989) 1 SCR 1594 ..... 51.5*(f)*
R v Keegstra [1990] 3 SCR 697, (1990) 3 CRR (2d) 193 ..... 36.4*(b)(ii), 42.4, 42.8, 42.8(c)*
R v Khan [1990] 2 SCR 531 ..... 51.5*(k)*
R v Kopyto (1987) 47 DLR (4th) 213 (Ont CA) ..... 10.4*(a),* 42.9*(c)*
R v Ladouceur [1990] 1 SCR 1257 ..... 40.3*(c)*(i)
R v Latif and Shahzad [1996] 1 WLR 104 (HL) ..... 51.5*(b)*
R v Latimer [2001] 1 SCR 3 ..... 40.7*(c)*(ii)
R v Levogiannis [1993] 4 SCR 475 ..... 51.5*(k)*
R v L (WK) [1991] 1 SCR 1091 ..... 51.4*(c), 51.5(f)*
R v Lyons [1987] SCR 309 ..... 40.3*(c)*(i)
R v McClure [2001] 1 SCR 445, 2001 SCC 14 ..... 42.7*(d)*
R v Mentuck [2001] 3 SCR 442 ..... 42.7*(d)*
R v Miller and Cockeriell [1977] 2 SCR 680 ..... 40.1*(a)*(i)
R v Mills [1986] 1 SCR 863 ..... 9.2*(d)*(i)
R v Morales [1992] 3 SCR 711, 12 CRR (2d) 31 ..... 51.4*(d)*
R v Morgenthaler (No 2) (1988) 44 DLR (4th) 385, [1988] 1 SCR 30 ..... 34.2*(c), 37.12, 37.5, 37.6, 37.8, 41.2(b)(i), 7.4(a), 31.3(a)*(iii) 37.2, 40.9
R v Morrissey [2000] 2 SCR 90, [2000] 191 DLR (4th) 87 ..... 40.7*(b)(ii), 49.2(c)*(i)
R v National Post [2008] OJ No 744, 2008 ONCA 139 ..... 42.7*(d)*
R v Noble (1997) 1 SCR 874, 6 CR (5th) 1 ..... 52.4*(b)*(ii)
R v Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society (1992) 10 CRR (2d) 34 ..... 17.3*(f), 34.7(c)*(ii)
R v Oakes [1986] 1 SCR 103, 50 CR (3d), 24 CCC (3d) 321, 19 CRR 308 (SCC) ..... 34.8*(c)(i), 34.8(d)(ii), 52.10(g)* 52.11
R v Pearson [1992] 3 SCR 665 ..... 51.4*(d)*
R v Potvin [1989] 1 SCR 525 ..... 51.5*(k)*
R v Potvin [1993] 2 SCR 880, 105 DLR (4th) 214 ..... 51.5*(f)*
R v Rahey [1987] 1 SCR 588, 39 DLR (4th) 481 ..... 31.2*(d)*(v)
R v Rahn [1985] 1 SCR 659 ..... 52.2*(b)*

R v Richards; Ex parte Fitzpatrick and Browne (1955) 92 CLR 157 ..... 17.7*(a)*
R v Salituro [1991] 3 SCR 654, (1992) 8 CRR (2d) 173, 189 ..... 31.2*(d)*(vi)
R v Sang [1980] AC 402 (HL) ..... 51.5*(b)*
R v Schmautz [1990] 1 SCR 398 ..... 51.3*(f)*
R v Seaboyer; R v Gayme [1991] 2 SCR 577 ..... 51.5*(k), 52.7(d)*
R v Sharpe 2001 SCC 2, (2001) 194 DLR (4th) 1 ..... 42.9*(e)*
R v Simmons [1988] 2 SCR 495 ..... 51.2
R v Smith [1987] 1 SCR 1045, 40 DLR (4th) 435 ..... 34.2*(c), 40.1(a)(i), 40.7(c)*(ii)
R v Smith [1989] 2 SCR 368 ..... 51.3*(f)*
R v Squires (1992 78 (3d) CCC 97 ..... 42.9*(c)*
R v S (RD) [1997] 3 SCR 484 (SCC), (1997) 118 CCC (3d) 353 ..... 59.4*(b)(iii), 63.5(g)*
R v S (RJ) [1995] 1 SCR 451, 26 CRR (2d) 1 ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
R v Stillman (1997) 42 CRR (2d) 189 ..... 52.4*(c)*(ii)
R v Stinchcombe [1991] 3 SCR 326, (1992) LRC (Crim) 68 ..... 51.5*(c)*
R v Swain [1991] 1 SCR 933 ..... 40.3*(c)(i), 51.1(b)*(iv)
R v Therens [1985] 1 SCR 613, 18 DLR (4th) 655 ..... 34.7*(c)(i), 51.2, 51.4(b)(iii), 52.2(b)*
R v Thomas Fuller Construction Co (1958) Ltd [1980] 1 SCR 695 ..... 15.3*(c)*(iii)
R v Thompson [1990] 2 SCR 1111 ..... 38.3*(a)*(iii)
R v Thomsen [1988] 1 SCR 640, 40 CCC (3d) 411 ..... 34.2*(c), 51.2, 52.2(b)*
R v Trask [1985] 1 SCR 655 ..... 52.2*(b)*
R v Valente (1985) 24 DLR (4th) 161 (SCC) ..... 24B.2, 26.6*(c)(i), 51.5(e)*(i)
R v Wiggins [1990] 1 SCR 62 ..... 38.3*(a)*(iii)
R v Wong [1990] 3 SCR 36 ..... 38.3*(a)*(iii)
R v W (R) (1992) 74 CCC (3d) 134 ..... 52.7*(a)*(ii)
R v Wray [1971] SCR 272 ..... 51.5*(b)*
R v Zelensky [1978] 2 SCR 940 ..... 15.3*(c)*(iii)
Re Clark v Attorney General of Canada (1977) 81 DLR (3d) 33, 55 ..... 42.10
Re Ontario Film and Video Appreciation Society 45 OR (2d) 80 (CA) ..... 34.7*(c)*(ii)
Re Provincial Electoral Boundaries (Saskatchewan) [1991] 2 SCR 158 ..... 10.4*(a)* Re Southam and the Queen (No 2) (1986) OR (2d) 663 CA ..... 42.9*(c)*
Re Vancouver Sun [2004] 2 SCR 332 ..... 42.9*(c)*
RJR-McDonald v Canada [1995] 3 SCR 199, (1995) 127 DLR (4th) 1 (SCC), 31 CRR (2d) 189 ..... 34.2*(c),* 42.9*(e),* 42.9*(f)*
Ramsden v Corporation of the City of Peterborough (1992) 7 CRR 288 ... 42.9*(f)*
Reference re Act to Amend Education Act (Ont) [1987] 1 SCR 1148, (1987) 40 DLR (4th) 18 ..... 31.5
Reference re Manitoba Language Rights [1985] 1 SCR 721, 19 DLR (4th) 1 ..... 4.7*(a)*
Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act (1987) 38 DLR (4th) 161, [1987] 1 SCR 313 ..... 53.3*(a)*, 53.5
Regional Municipality of Peel v MacKenzie (1982) 139 DLR (3d) 14 ..... 15.3*(c)*(iii)
Remai Investment Co (1987) 18 CLRBR (NS) 75 (Sask) ..... 53.3*(b)*
Retail Wholesale and Department Store Union, Local 580 v Dolphin Delivery Ltd (1986) 33 DLR 174, [1986] 2 SCR 573 ..... 31, 31.2*(d)(ii), 43.3(a)*(iv) Appendix(1)
Rocket v Royal College of Dental Surgeons [1990] 2 SCR 232, 71 DLR (4th) 68 (SCC) ..... 34.1*(c),* 42.9*(f)*
Rodriguez v British Columbia (Attorney General) [1993] 3 SCR 519 ..... 40.7*(a)*(i)
Roman Corp Ltd v Hudson Bay Oil Co Ltd (1971) 18 DLR (3d) 134, 138. 42.10
Ross v New Brunswick School District No 15 [1996] 1 SCR 825 ..... 34.2*(c), 41.4(a), 57.2(a)(ii)(aa)(y)*(ccc)
Russow v BC (AG) (1989) 35 BCLR (2d) 29 (SC) 41.5
St Elizabeth Home Society v Hamilton [2008] OJ No 983, 2008 ONC LEXIS 1179, 2008 ONCA 182 ..... 42.7*(d)*
Salvation Army, Canada East v Ontario (A-G) (1992) 88 DLR (4th) ..... 41.3*(b)*

Saskatchewan Human Rights Commission v Kodellas (1989) 60 DLR (4th) 143; [1989] 5 WWR 1 (Sask CA) ... 9.2*(e)(i) Saskatchewan v RWDSU, Locals 544, 496, 635 and 955 (1987) 38 DLR (4th) 277 (SCC) ... 53.3(a)* Sauve v Canada (Chief Electoral Officer) 2002 SCC 68 ... 49.3*(a)* School District No 54 and Bulkley Valley Teachers' Assn (Re) 93 CLLC 16,070 (BCLRB) ... 53.6
Singh v and Minister of Employment and Immigration [1985] 1 SCR 177, 17 DLR (4th) 422 ... 31.3*(a)(i), 33.10(b), 34.8(c)*(ii)
Slaight Communications Inc v Davidson [1989] 1 SCR 1038, (1989) 59 DLR (4th) 416 ... 31.2*(d)*(ii)
Smith v The Queen 34 CCC (3d) 97 (1987) ... 49.2*(c)(i), 49.2(d)*(ii)
Société des Acadiens du Nouveau-Brunswick v Association of Parents for Fairness in Education (1986) 27 DLR (4th) 406 (SC) ... 65.2*(b)*
Solosky v The Queen (1979) 105 DLR (3d) 745 ... 49.3*(a)* Steele v Warden Mountain Institution (1991) 60 CCC (3d) 1 ... 49.3*(b)*(ii)
Stelco Inc v Canada (Attorney General) [1990] 1 SCR 617 ... 40.3*(b)*
Stoffman v Vancouver General Hospital [1990] 3 SCR 483 ... 31.4*(f)*(ii)
Stopforth v Goyer (1978) 87 DLR (3d) 373, 381 ... 17.7*(c)*, 42.10
Strunk v Strunk 445 SW 2d 145 (1969) ... 40.10*(b)*
Suresh v Canada [2002] 1 SCR 72 ... 31.6*(b)*
Switzman v Elbing [1957] SCR ... 10.4*(a)* Tetreault-Gadoury v Canada (Employment and Immigration Commission) (1991) 4 CRR (2d) 12 ... 34.8*(c)*(v)
Texada Mines v AG BC [1960] SCR 713 ... 15.3*(a)*(iii)
Thomson Newspapers Co v Canada (Attorney General) [1998] 1 SCR 877 ... 34.2*(c)*
Thomson Newspapers Co v Canada (Director of Investigation and Research, Restrictive Trade Practices Commission) [1990] 1 SCR 425 ... 40.3*(b), 51.4(a), 51.4(b)*(iii)
Thwaites v Health Sciences Centre (1988) 51 Man R (2d) 196 ... 40.3*(c)(i) Tremblay v Daigle (1989) 62 DLR (4th) 634, [1989] 2 SCR 530 ... 7.4(a)* Turp v Chretien 111 CRR (2003) 184 ... 30.4*(a)*
US v Jamieson [1996] 1 SCR 465 ... 31.6*(b)*
US v Ross [1996] 1 SCR 469 ... 31.6*(b)*
US v Whitley [1996] 1 SCR 467 ... 31.6*(b)*
UCFW, Local 1518 v Kmart Canada [1999] 2 SCR 1083 ... 34.2*(c)*
Union Bank Employees and Bank of Montreal (1985) 10 CLRBR (NS) 129 (Can) ... 53.4
United Rubber Workers of America v Michelin Tires (Canada) Ltd 80 CLLC 14 012 (NSSCTD) ... 53.4
United States v Burns [2001] 1 SCR 283 ... 31.6*(b)*
Valente v The Queen (1985) 24 DLR (4th) 161 ... 12.3*(b)*(ii)
Vriend v Alberta 132 DLR (4th) 595 (Alb CA) (1996) ... 41.4*(c)*
Vriend v Alberta [1998] 1 SCR 493 ... 34.2*(c), 40.7(c)(ii), 41.4(c)*
Walter et al v Attorney-General of Alberta [1969] SCR 83, (1969) 3 DLR (3d) 1 (SCC) ... 41.2*(b)*(iii)
Webster v Solloway Mills and Co [1931] 1 DLR 831 ... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Williams v Deputy Superintendent 18 CRR (2d) 315 ... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Winnipeg Child and Family Services (Northwest Area) v G (DF) [1997] 3 SCR 925 ... 37.2
Winnipeg Child and Family Services v KLW [2000] 2 SCR 519 ... 40.8*(b)*
Young v Young [1993] 4 SCR 3 ... 41.4*(c)*
Zanganeh v Canadian Security Intelligence Service (1988) 50 DLR (4th) 747 ... 62.8*(b)*

Zylberberg v Sudbury Board of Education (1988) 65 OR (2d) 641 (CA), (1988) 52DLR (4th) 577 ..... 41.2*(e)*, 41.5

Commonwealth

Government of Malaysia v Selangor Pilot Association [1977] 2 WLR 901 (PC) ..... 46.3*(c)*
Hall v The Queen [1971] 1 WLR 298 (PC) ..... 51.4*(b)*(ii)
In re Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution and the Provincial Councils Bill [1990] LRC (Const) 1 ..... 17.3*(g)*
Teo Soh Lung v Minister for Home Affairs and Others [1990] LRC (Const) 490 ..... 17.3*(g)*

England / UK

A v B plc [2003] QB 195 (CA) ..... 42.9*(b)*
AT and T Istel Ltd and Another v Tully and Others [1992] 3 All ER 523 (HL) ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Abbasi and Another v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and Another [2002] EWCA Civ 1598 ..... 60.3
Adarand Constructors Inc v Pena 115 SCt 2097 (1995) ..... 51.1*(b)*(iv)
Ahnee v DPP [1999] 2 AC 294 ..... 42.9*(c)*
Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] 1 All ER 821 ..... 40.10*(b)*
Ambard v Attorney-General for Trinidad and Tobago [1936] AC 322 ..... 42.9*(c)*
Ashworth Hospital Authority v MGN Ltd [2002] UKHL 29; [2002] 4 All ER 193, [2002] 1 WLR 2003, 67 BMLR 175 (HL) ..... 42.9*(c)*
Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd v Wednesbury Corporation [1947] 2 All ER 680 (CA), [1948] 1 KB 223 ..... 55.3*(c), 63.6(d)*
Attorney-General v Guardian Newspapers (Ltd) and Others (No 2) [1988] 3 All ER 638 ..... 42.9*(g)*
Attorney-General v Jonathan Cape Ltd [1996] QB 752 ..... 62.5*(b)*
Attorney-General v Times Newspapers Ltd [1973] QB 710 ..... 42.9*(c)*
Attorney-General v Times Newspapers Ltd [1974] AC 273 ..... 42.9*(c)*
Badry v Director of Public Prosecutions of Mauritius [1983] 2 AC 297 ..... 42.9*(c)*
Board of Education v Rice [1911] AC 179 ..... 63.5*(d)*
Boehringer Ingelheim Ltd and Others v Vetplus Ltd [2007] FSR 29 (CA) .. 42.9*(c)*
Bonnard v Perryman [1891] 2 Ch 269, CA ..... 42.9*(a)* Bradlaugh v Gosset (1884) 12 QB 271 ..... 17.7*(a)* British Railways Board v Pickin [1974] AC 765 ..... 17.7*(a)*
British Steel Corporation v Granada Television Ltd [1981] AC 1096 (CA) . 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Buttes Gas and Oil Co v Hammer (No 3) [1982] AC 932 ..... 30.4*(e)*
Camelot Group v Centaur Ltd [1999] QB 124 (CA) ..... 42.7*(d)*
Campbell v MGN Ltd [2004] 2 AC 457 (HL) ..... 42.9*(b)*
Cassell and Co Ltd v Broome and Another [1972] AC 1027 ..... 31.4*(e)*(x)
Chantrey Martin v Martin 1953 (2) All ER 691 ..... 52.9
Chan U Seek v Alvis Vehicles [2004] EWHC 3092 (Ch) ..... 42.9*(c)*
Christie v Leachinsky [1947] AC 567, (HL) (1947) 1 All ER 567 ..... 51.3*(b)*
Congreso del Partido [1983] 1 AC 244 (HL) ..... 30.4*(c)*
Council of Civil Service Unions and Others v Minister of Civil Service [1984] 3 All ER 935 (HL), [1985] AC 374 (HL) ..... 63.5*(d)*
Cream Holding Ltd and Others v Banerjee and Others [2004] WLR 918 (HL) ..... 42.9*(h)*
Davies v Presbyterian Church of Wales [1986] 1 All ER 705 (HL) ..... 41.4*(c)*
Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspaper [1992] 3 All 65, 80 (CA) .. 42.5*(b)*
Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspaper [1993] AC 534 (HL) ..... 42.9*(a)*
Dixon v Harrison 124 All ER 958 ..... 9.2*(b)(i) Doody v Secretary of State for the Home Department and Other Appeals [1994] 1 AC 531 (HL) ..... 63.5(e)*

Douglas v Hello! Ltd (No 2) [2003] EMLR 28 (CA) ..... 42.9*(b)*
Duncan v Cammel Laird [1942] 1 All ER 587 (HL) ..... 52.6*(c)*
Englebert Ncgobo and Others v Thor Chemical Holdings (Pty) Ltd No 1994 N 1212 (UK) reprinted in UNEP Compendium of Judicial Decisions on Matters related to Environment: National Decisions (Volume 1, 1998) 237 ..... 50.4*(a)*
Fraser-Woodward Ltd v BBC and Another [2005] FSR 3 (Ch) ..... 42.9*(d)*
Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech Area Health Authority and Another [1988] All ER 402 (HL) 37.6
Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech Area Health Authority and the DHSS [1985] 3 All ER 403 ..... 47.1
Goldsmith v Bhoyrul [1998] QB 459 ..... 42.9*(a)* Goodwin v The United Kingdom [1996] 22 ECHR 123 ..... 42.7*(d)*
Greene v Associated Newspapers Ltd [2005] QB 972 CA ..... 42.9*(a), 42.9(h)*
Grey v Pearson [1843–60] All ER Rep 21 (HL) 36 ..... 32.3*(a)*
Handyside v United Kingdom (1976) 1 EHRR 737 ..... 42.7*(c)*
Hector v Attorney General of Antigua and Barbuda [1990] 2 All ER 103, 106 ..... 42.5*(b)*
Hubbard v Vosper [1972] 2 QB 84 ..... 42.9*(d)*
In re Poyser and Mills' Arbitration [1964] 2 QB 467 ..... 63.7
In re S (FC) (a child) [2005] 1 AC 593 (HL) ..... 42.9*(c)*
Jameel v Wall Street Journal Europe Sprl [2007] 1 AC 359 (HL) ..... 42.9*(a)*
James Buchanan & Co Ltd v Babco Forwarding and Shipping (UK) Ltd [1977] 1 All ER 518 .....
Janaway v Salford Health Authority [1988] 3 All ER 1079 (HL) 37.7
Kalanke v Freie Hansestadt Bremen [1995] IRLR 660 (ECJ) ..... 51.1*(b)*(iv)
Keary Developments Ltd v Tarmac Construction Ltd and Another [1995] 3 All ER 534 (CA) ..... 59.4*(a)*(viii)
Kelly v Kelly 1997 SLT 896, 1997 SCLR 749 (Scotland) 37.2
Kielley v Carson [1842] EngR 593, [1842] 13 ER 225 (PC) ..... 17.7*(c)*
Kruse v Johnson [1898] 2 QB 91 ..... 63.6*(a)* Lawrie v Muir 1950 SC (J) 19 ..... 52.10*(b), 52.10(c)*
Levi Strauss v Tesco Stores [2002] EWHC 1556 ..... 42.9*(d)*
Lion Laboratories Ltd v Evans and Others [1985] QB 526 (CA) ..... 42.9*(d)*
Loutchansky v Times Newspapers Ltd (No 2) [2002] QB 783 (CA) ..... 42.9*(a)* Magor and St Mellons Rural District Council v Newport Corp 1950 (2) All ER 1226 (CA) ..... 32.3*(a)*
McKennit v Ash [2007] EMLR 113 (CA) ..... 42.9*(b)*
McLay v HM Advocate (1994) SCCR 397 ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii)
Miss Behavin' Ltd v Belfast City Council [2007] 3 All ER 1007 (HL) ..... 42.9*(e)*
Murray v Ireland [1985] IR 532 ..... 34.8*(d)*(i)
(On the application of British American Tobacco and Others) v Secretary of State for Health [2004] EWHC 2493 (Admin) ..... 42.9*(f)*
Paton v British Pregnancy Advisory [1979] QB 276 ..... 37.4
Petition No 2 of the BBC [2000] HRLR 423 ..... 42.9*(c)*
Pro Sieben Media AG v Carlton UK Television Ltd [1999] 1 WLR 605 ..... 42.9*(d)*
R (Abdi and Nadarajab) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2005] EWCA Civ 1363 ..... 63.10
R v Abdroikov; R v Green; R v Williamson [2008] 1 All ER 315 ..... 63.5*(g)*
R v Adams [1997] Crim LR 292 ..... 51.5*(c)*
R v Agar [1990] 2 All ER 442 (CA) ..... 51.5*(c)*
R v Apicella (1985) 82 CR App Rep 295 (CA) ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
R v Barton [1972] 2 All ER 1192 (Cr Ct) ..... 51.5*(c)*
R v Beckford and Dayley [1991] Crim LR 833 ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii)
R v Board of Visitors of Hull Prisoners, Ex parte St Germain [1979] QB 425 ..... 49.3*(a)*

R v Bowden [1999] 1 WLR 823 (CA) ..... 51.4*(b)*(i)
R v Bow Street Metropolitan Stipendiary Magistrate: Ex Parte Pinochet Ugarte (No 3) [1999] 2 All ER 97 (HL) ..... 30.4*(c)*
R v Brophy [1982] AC 476 ..... 51.4*(b)*(i)
R v Cargill 1913 2 KB 271 ..... 52.7*(d)*
R v Chief Constable of Sussex, ex parte International Trader's Ferry Ltd [1999] 1 All ER 120 (HL) ..... 63.6*(d)*
R v Christou and Wright (1992) 95 Cr App R 264 ..... 51.5*(b)*
R v Churchill [1993] Crim LR 285 ..... 51.5(i)
R v Cockcroft 1870 11 Cox CC 410 ..... 52.7*(d)*
R v Commissioner of Police, ex parte Blackburn (No 2) [1968] 2 QB 150. 42.9*(c)*
R v Condron and Condron [1997] 1 Cr App R 185 ..... 51.4*(b)*(ii)
R v Cooke [1995] 1 Cr App Rep 318 ..... 51.4*(b)*(ii)
R v Director of Water Services, ex parte Lancashire County Council, Liverpool City Council, Manchester City Council, Oldham Metropolitan Borough Council, Tameside Metropolitan Borough Council and Birmingham City Council [1999] Env LR 114, [1998] EWHC 213 (QB) ..... 56D.2*(d)(iv), 56B.4(c)(ii), 56B.5(b)*
R v Disciplinary Committee of the Jockey Club: ex parte Aga Khan [1993] 2 All 853 ..... 63.3*(b)*
R v Gilbert [1977] 66 Cr App R 237 ..... 51.4*(b)*(ii)
R v Keane [1994] 2 All ER 478 ..... 51.5*(c)*
R v Littleboy [1934] 2 KB 408 ..... 51.4*(b)*(ii)
R v Maguire and Others [1992] 2 All ER 433 (CA) ..... 51.5*(c)*
R v Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food; ex parte Hamble (Offshore) Fisheries Limited [1995] 2 ALL ER 714 (QB) 63.10
R v Myers [1996] 2 Cr App R 335 ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii)
R v North and East Devon Health Authority, ex parte Coughlan (Secretary of State for Health intervening) [2000] 3 All ER 850 (CA) 63.10
R v Offen; R v McGilliard; R v McKeowen; R v Okwuegbunam; R v S [2001] 1 WLR 253 ..... 49.2*(b)*
R v Panel on Take-overs and Mergers, ex parte Datafin plc [1987] 1 All ER 564 (CA) ..... 63.3*(b)*
R v R [1992] 1 AC 599 ..... 51.5*(m)*
R v Ricketts [1991] Crim LR 915 ..... 51.5.(i)
R v Riley 1987 18 QBD 481 ..... 52.7*(d)*
R v Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, ex parte Everett [1989] 1 All ER 655 (CA) ..... 30.4*(a)*
R v Secretary of State for the Home Department, ex parte McQuillan [1995] 4 All ER 400 ..... 60.4
R v Secretary of State for Transport, Ex Parte Richmond-upon-Thames London [1994] 1 WLR 74 ..... 63.10
R v Sheffield Crown Court, Ex parte Brownlow [1980] QB 530 (CA) ..... 32.3*(b)*
R v Smith [1985] 81 Cr App R 286 (CA) ..... 51.4*(b)*(ii)
R v Smurthwaite; R v Gill [1994] 1 All ER 898 (CA) ..... 51.5*(b)*
R v Sussex Justices, ex parte McCarthy (1924) 1 KB 256 ..... 63.5*(g)*
R v Ward [1993] 2 All ER 577 (CA) ..... 51.5*(c)*
R v Wholesale Travel Inc 1992 8 CR (4th) 145 ..... 52.4*(a)*(iii)
Re F (Minor: Abduction: Jurisdiction) [1990] 3 All ER 97 (CA) ..... 47.10*(b)*
Rank Film Distributors Ltd and Others v Video Information Centre and Others [1981] 2 All ER 76 (HL) ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Raymond v Honey [1983] 1 AC 1, [1981] 2 AII ER 1084 ..... 49.3*(a)*
Regina (Anderson) v Secretary of State for the Home Department [2002] UKHL 46, [2003] 1 AC 837 ..... 49.3*(b)*(ii)
Regina v Lichniak, Regina v Pyrah [2002] UKHL 47, [2003] 1 AC 903 ..... 49.3*(b)*(ii)

Reynolds v Times Newspapers Ltd [2001] 2 AC 127 (HC) ..... 42.9*(a)*
Rio Tinto Zinc Corporation v Westinghouse Electric Corporation [1978] AC 547 (HL) ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Rookes v Barnard [194] AC 1129 (HL) ..... 9.5*(a)(ii)(bb)*
Russel v Duke of Norfolk [1949] 1 All ER 109 ..... 63.5*(e)*
Russel v The Queen (1882) 7 App Cas 829 ..... 17.6*(b)*(i)
Scott v Scott [1913] AC 417 ..... 42.9*(c)*
Seaga v Harper [2008] UKPC 9 ..... 42.9*(a)*
Shaw v Director of Public Prosecutions 1961 (2) All ER 446 (HL) ..... 32.3*(a)*
Sociedade Nacional de Combustiveis de Angola UEE v Lundqvist [1991] 2 QB 310 (CA) ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Sommersett v Steward 99 Eng Rep 499 (KB 1772) 64.1
Theakston v MGN Ltd [2002] EMLR 22 ..... 42.9*(b)*
The Queen on the Application of Comninos v Bedford Borough Council and Others [2003] EWHC 121 ..... 42.9*(a)* Trendtex Trading Corporation v Central Bank of Nigeria [1977] QB 529 .. 30.2*(a)*
Triplex Safety Glass Co Ltd v Lancegay Safety Glass Ltd [1939] 2 KB 395 (CA) ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Woolmington v DPP [1935] AC 462 ..... 51.5(i), 52.4*(a)(i) X Ltd and Another v Morgan-Grampian (Publishers) Ltd and Others [1991] 1 AC 1, [1990] 1 All ER 616, 1990 2 WLR 421 ..... 42.7(d)*

European Court of Human Rights

A v United Kingdom (1999) 27 EHRR 611, [1998] 2 FLR 959 ..... 47.5*(b)*, 49.1
Adolf v Austria (1982) 4 EHRR 313 ..... 51.1*(a)*(v)
Al-Adsani v United Kingdom (2002) 34 EHRR 273 ..... 30.4*(c)*
Amuur v France (1996) 22 EHRR 533 ..... 40.3*(b)*
Autism v France (Complaint No: 13/2002 European Committee of Social Rights (2002)) ..... 35.5*(g)*(vii)
Autronic AG v Switzerland (1990) 12 EHRR 485 ..... 42.7*(g)*
Axen v Germany (1984) 6 EHRR 195 ..... 51.5*(o)*
Barbera, Messegué and Jabardo v Spain (1988) 11 EHRR 360 ..... 51.1*(a)(ii), 51.5(k)*
Barfod v Denmark (1989) 13 EHRR 493 ..... 42.9*(c)*
Blastland v United Kingdom (1988) 10 EHRR 528 ..... 51.5*(b)*
Blume v Spain (2000) 30 EHRR 632 ..... 40.3*(b)*
Bönisch v Austria (1985) 9 EHRR 191 ..... 51.5*(e)(i) Bouamar v Belgium (1988) 11 EHRR 1 ..... 51.1(a)*(ii)
Brogan et al v United Kingdom (1988) 11 EHRR 117 ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Buchberger v Austria (2003) 37 EHRR 13 ..... 59.4*(b)*(ii)
Campbell and Cosans v United Kingdom (1980) 3 EHRR 531 ..... 40.7*(a)*(ii)
Casado Coca v Spain (1994) 18 EHRR 1 ..... 42.9*(f)*
Chahal v United Kingdom (1996) 23 EHRR 413 ..... 40.7*(a)(i) Costello-Roberts v United Kingdom (1993) 19 EHRR 112 ..... 40.7(a)(ii), 47.5(a)*
De Haes v Belgium (1998) 25 EHRR 1 ..... 42.9*(c)*
De Weer v Belgium (1980) 2 EHRR 439 ..... 51.2
De Wilde, Ooms and Versyp v Belgium (1971) 4 EHRR 443 ..... 51.1*(a)(ii), 51.3(e), 51.4(c)*
Dombo Beheer v Netherlands (1994) 18 EHRR 213 ..... 59.4*(b)*(ii)
East African Asians v United Kingdom (1973) 3 EHRR 76 ..... 40.7*(a)(i) Eckle v Germany (Federal Republic) (1985) 5 EHRR 1 ..... 51.5(f)*
Engel and Others v The Netherlands (No 1) (1976) 1 EHRR 647 ..... 40.3*(b)*
Findlay v United Kingdom (1997) 24 EHRR 221 ..... 51.5*(e)(i) Fogarty v United Kingdom (2002) 34 EHRR 302 ..... 30.4(c)*
Foti v Italy (1982) 5 EHRR 313 ..... 51.2, 51.5*(f)*
Fox; Campbell and Hartley v UK (1990) 13 EHRR 157 ..... 51.3*(b)*
Fressoz and Roire v France (2001) 31 EHRR 2 ..... 42.9*(d), 42.9(h)*

Grandruth v Federal Republic of Germany (1967) 10 Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights 626	64.4*(c), 64.6(h)*
Gussenbauer v Austria (1975) 15 Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights 448	64.4*(c), 64.6(g)*
Guzzardi v Italy (1980) 3 EHRR 333	40.3*(b)*
Handyside v United Kingdom (1976) 1 EHRR 737	42.8*(c), 42.9(e)*
Hashman and Harrup v The United Kingdom (2000) 30 EHRR 241	34.7*(c)*(ii)
Ireland v The United Kingdom (1978) 2 EHRR 25	40.6*(a), 40.7(a)*(ii)
Iversen v Norway (1963) 6 European Yearbook of the European Convention of Human Rights 327	64.4*(c), 64.6(g)*
Jacubowski v Poland (1994) 19 EHRR 64	42.9*(f)*
Jersild v Denmark 19 EHRR 1, 28 (1994)	42.8*(c)*
Kalac v Turkey (1999) 27 EHRR 552	34.7*(c)*(ii)
Kalashnikov v Russia (2003) 36 EHRR 34	49.3*(a)*, 55.8
Klass v Federal Republic of Germany (1978) 2 EHRR 214	34.7*(c)*(ii)
Kostovski v Netherlands (1989) 12 EHRR 434	51.5*(b), 51.5(k)*
Krone Verlag GmbH & Co KG v Austria 2003	42.9*(f)*
Landvreugd v Netherlands (2003) 36 EHRR 56	66.1*(b)*(ii)
Lawless v Ireland (No. 3) (1961) 1 EHRR 15	61.3*(b), 61.4(a)*
Leander v Sweden 1987 (9) EHRR 433	62.1
Lingens v Austria (1986) 8 EHRR 407	42.5*(b)*
Litwa v Poland (2000) 33 EHRR 1267	40.3*(b)*
Marckx v Belgium 2 EHRR 330 (1980)	47.2*(a)*
Markt Intern & Beerman v Germany (1990) 12 EHRR 161	42.9*(f)*
Marshall v United Kingdom Application No 41571/98 (10 July 2001)	61.3*(b)*
McElhinney v Ireland (2002) 34 EHRR 322	30.4*(c)*
McVicar v UK (2002) 35 EHRR 22	42.9*(a)*
Minelli v Switzerland (1983) 5 EHRR 554	51.1*(a)*(v)
Monnell and Morris v United Kingdom (1987) 10 EHRR 205	51.1*(a)(v), 51.5(o)*
Müller v Switzerland (1991) 13 EHRR 212	42.9*(e)*
Neumeister v Austria (1968) 1 EHRR 91	51.4*(c)*
Nielsen v Denmark (1988) 11 EHRR 175	40.3*(b)*
Observer and Guardian v UK (1992) EHRR 153	42.9*(b)*
Osman v United Kingdom (2000) 29 EHRR 245	23B.3*(c)(iii), 39.6, 40.5(b)*(i), 49.1
Peck v UK (2003) 36 EHRR 41	42.9*(b)*
Peers v Greece (2001) 33 EHRR 51	49.3*(a)*
Platform Artzte fur das Leben v Austria (1991) 13 EHRR 204	40.5*(c)*
Poltoratskiy v Ukraine (unreported, Case No 38812/97, 29 April 2003)	49.2*(a)*
Prager and Oberschlick v Austria (1995) 21 EHRR	42.9*(c)*
Price v United Kingdom (2002) 34 EHRR 53	49.2*(d)*(iii)
Raimondo v Italy (1994) 18 EHRR 237	40.3*(b)*
Republic of Ireland v United Kingdom 2 EHRR 25 (Series A) (1978) at III (C)	61.3*(b)*
SW v United Kingdom (1995) 21 EHRR 363	51.5*(m)*
Soering v United Kingdom (1989) 11 EHRR 439	49.3
Stafford v United Kingdom (2002) 35 EHRR 32	49.3*(b)*(ii)
Steel & Morris v United Kingdom (2005) 41 EHRR 22	42.9*(d)*
Sunday Times v United Kingdom (No 1) (1979) 2 EHRR 245	34.7*(a), 42.9(c), 51.1(a)*(ii)
Sunday Times v United Kingdom (No 2) (1992) 14 EHRR 229	34.7*(c)*(ii)
Sutter v Switzerland (1984) 6 EHRR 272	51.5*(o)*
Thorgeirson v Iceland (1992) 14 EHRR 843	42.9*(a)*
Thynne, Wilson and Gunnell v United Kingdom (1991) 13 EHRR 666	49.3*(b)*(ii)
Tyrer v United Kingdom (1979-80) EHRR 1	40.6*(a), 40.7(a)(i), 40.7(a)*(ii)
Unterpertinger v Austria (1986) 13 EHRR 175	51.5*(b), 51.5(k)*

Van der Leer (1990) 12 EHRR 567 ..... 51.2
Van der Mussele v Belgium 2 (1984) 6 EHRR 163 ..... 64.4*(c), 64.6(f), 64.6(g)*
Van Droogenbroeck v Belgium (1892) 4 EHRR 443 ..... 64.4*(c), 64.6(f)*
Verlagsgruppe News Gmbj v Austria (No 2) [2007] EMLR 413 ..... 42.9*(d)*
Von Hannover v Germany (2005) 40 EHRR 1 ..... 42.9*(b)*
Weeks v United Kingdom (1987) 10 EHRR 293 ..... 51.3*(e), 51.4(c)*
Worm v Austria (1998) 25 EHRR 454 ..... 42.9*(c)*
W, X, Y and Z v The United Kingdom (1968) 11 Yearbook of the European Convention on Human Rights 562 ..... 64.4*(b), 64.4(c), 64.6(b)*
X v Austria (application no. 5591/72) (1973) ..... 64.6*(b)*

European Court of Justice

Ahmed v United Kingdom [1998] ECHR 76 ..... 43.3*(b)*(iii)
Arrowsmith v UK No 7050/75, 19 DR 5 (1980) ..... 41.3*(b), 41.4(a)* Barthold v Germany (1992) 15 EHRR 244 ..... 42.9*(f)*
Chassagnou v France (2000) 29 EHRR 615 (Application Nos 25088/94) ..... 44.1*(d)*
Christians against Racism and Fascism v The United Kingdom (1980) 21 DR 138 ..... 43.3*(a)(i) Cisse v France [2002] ECHR 400 ..... 43.3(b)*(ii)
Darby v Sweden A 187 (1991) Comm. Rep ..... 41.2*(c)*
Djavit An v Turkey [2003] ECHR ..... 43.3*(a)(ii), 43.3(b)*(iv)
Ezelin v France [1991] EHRR 362 ..... 43.1
G v Germany (1989) 60 DR 256 ..... 43.3*(a)(i) Grandmaison and Fritz v Federal Republic of Germany 53 DR 150 (1987) ..... 41.3(b), 41.4(a)*
H v Austria [1989] EHRR 70 ..... 43.1
Handyside v United Kingdom (1976) 1 EHRR 737 ..... 10.4*(a)*, 43.1
Incal v Turkey [1998] ECHR 48 ..... 43.3*(a)(i) Independent News and Media v Ireland (2006) 42 EHRR 46 ..... 42.9(a)* Kokkinakis v Greece (1994) 17 EHRR 397 ..... 41.2*(c)*
Koplinger v Austria (1966) Application No 1850/63 9 Yearbook 240 ..... 51.4*(c)*
Lingens v Austria (1986) 8 EHRR 57 ..... 42.9*(a)* Maestri v Italy [2004] ECHR 76 ..... 43.3*(b)*(iv)
Open Door and Dublin Well Women and others v Ireland 14234/88 [1992] ECHR 68 ..... 37.11
Otto-Preminger-Institut v Austria (1995) 19 EHRR 34 ..... 41.4*(c)*
Paton v United Kingdom (1981) 3 EHRR 408 ..... 37.4
Plattform 'Ärzte für das Leben' v Austria [1988] ECHR 15 ..... 43.1
Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals ['RSPCA'] v Attorney-General [2002] 1 WLR 448 ..... 44.1*(c)*(vi)
Stankov and the United Macedonian Organisation Ilinden v Bulgaria [2001] ECHR 563 ..... 43.1, 43.3*(a)(i), 43.3(b)*(iii)
Sürek v Turkey (No 1) [1999] ECHR 51 ..... 43.3*(a)(i) Tolstoy Miloslavsky v UK (1995) 20 EHRR 442 ..... 42.9(a)*
VO v France [2004] 2 FCR 577 ..... 37.2
Vogt v Germany (1996) 21 EHRR 205 ..... 44.2*(c)*
Wemhoff v Germany [1968] ECHR 2, (1968) 1 EHRR 55 ..... 51.4*(c), 51.5(f)*
Winterwerp v Netherlands (1979) 2 EHRR 387 ..... 51.1*(a)*(ii)
X v Austria 1753/63 Yearbook VIII (1965) 174 (184) ..... 41.4*(a)*
X v Federal Republic of Germany 24 DR 137 ..... 41.3*(b)*
X v UK 28 DR 5, 27, 38 (1982) ..... 41.4*(a)*
X v UK No. 6886/75 5 DR 100 (1976) ..... 41.4*(a)*
X, Y and Z v Sweden 5 EHRR 47 (1983) ..... 41.4*(c)*
Young, James and Webster v UK (1982) 4 EHRR 38 ..... 44.2*(b), 53.3(b)*

France

François X & the Union Fédérale des Consommateurs d'Avignon v Société Avignonnaise des Eaux, Swiss Tribunal de Grande Instance (District Court) of Avignon, Order No. 1492/95 (12 May 1995) ..... 56D.2*(d)*(iv)
In CISE v Association Consommateurs Fontauliere, Tribunal de Grande Instance (District Court) of Privas, Order No. 9800223 (5 March 1998) ..... 56D.2*(d)*(iv)
Mme Lefevre v Ville d'Amiens, Cour de Cassation, Troisième chambre civile Supreme Court, 3rd Civil Chamber, Arrêt No 1362 (15 December 2004) ..... 56D.2*(d)*(iii)

Germany

BGH (1969) NJW 1770 ..... 43.3*(a)*(i)
BVerfGE A III J2 (1993) 37.2
BVerfGE 44 (2002) ..... 42.9*(c)*
BVerwG 1954 NJW 1947 ..... 44.2*(a)*
BVerw NJW 1008 (1982) ..... 43.3*(b)*(ii)
BVerwGE 39, 1 ..... 32.1*(c)*
BVerwGE 49, 89, 133 ..... 12.3*(d)*(iii)
BVerwGE 67,100 ..... 12.3*(d)(i)(aa)*
BVerwGE 68,1 ..... 12.3*(d)(i)(aa)*
BVerwGE 83,130, 152 ..... 12.3*(d)(ii)(cc)*
BVerwGE 90, 286 ..... 12.3*(d)(i)(aa)*
BVerwGE 95,1 ..... 12.3*(d)(i)(aa)*
1 BVerfGE 300 ..... 14.3*(a)*
2 BVerfGE 225 (1953) ..... 43.3*(a)*(v)
7 BVerfGE 198 (1958) (Luth) ..... 31.2*(d)(ii), 31.4(e)*(viii)
7 BVerfGE 377 (1958) (German Pharmacy) ..... 54.2*(b)*(i)
12 BVerfGE 1 (1960) (Tobacco Atheist) ..... 41.4*(c)*
12 BVerfGE 205 (1961) ..... 14.3*(a), 15.3(a)*
16 BVerfGE 32, 36-37 (1957) ..... 40.1*(a)*(i)
17 BVerf GE 306 (1964) ..... 40.1*(a)*(i)
18 BVerfGE 315 (1965) 317 (Milk and Butterfat) ..... 56C.2, 56C.3*(b)*(ii)
22 BVerfGE 180, 218-220 (1967) ..... 40.1*(a)*(i)
24 BVerfGE 236 (1968) (Rumpelkammer) ..... 41.3*(b)*
25 BVerfGE 269 (1969) ..... 40.1*(a)*(i)
33 BVerfGE 1 (1972) ..... 49.3*(b)*(i)
33 BVerfGE 23 (1972) (Religious Oath) ..... 41.3*(b), 41.3(c)*
33 BVerfGE 303 (1972) (Numerus Clausus) ..... 54.2*(b)*(i)
35 BVerfGE 203 ..... 49.3*(a)*
39 BVerfGE 1 (1975) ..... 13.3, 31.3*(a)*(iii)
39 BVerfGE 334 (Civil Service) ..... 43.3*(b)*(iii)
40 BVerfGE 296 (1975) (Long-Haul Truck-Licensing) ..... 54.2*(b)*(i)
41 BVerfGE 29 (1975) ..... 41.2*(d)*
41 BVerfGE 29 (1976) ..... 41.2*(d)*
45 BVerfGE 187 (1977) ..... 40.1*(a)(i), 40.7(c)(i), 49.2(d)*(iv)
52 BVerfGE 223 (1979) ..... 41.2*(d)*
55 BverfGE 159 (1980) ..... 40.1*(a)*(i)
55 BverfGE 349, 90 ILR 386 (1980) 60.3
69 Bverf GE 315 (1985) (Brokdorf) ..... 43.1, 43.2*(b)*(ii)
72 Bverf GE 155 (1986) ..... 40.1*(a)*(i)
73 BVerfGE 206 (1986) (Mutlangen) ..... 43.3*(a)*(i)
86 BVerfGE 288 ..... 49.2*(d)*(iv)
87 BVerfGE 287 (1992) ..... 54.2*(b)*(i)
88 BVerfGE 203 (1993) ..... 31.3*(a)*(iii)

89 BVerfGE 155 (1993) (Maastricht) ..... 32.5*(b)*

Hong Kong

Rediffusion (Hong Kong) Ltd v Attorney-General of Hong Kong and Another [1970] AC 1136 (Privy Council) ..... 17.4*(a)*
Ng Sui Tung v Director of Immigration [2002] 1 HKLRD 561 ..... 63.10

India

Delhi Water Supply & Sewage Disposal Undertaking & Another v State of Haryana & Others AIR 1996 SC 2992, (1996) 2 SCC 572, [1996] 3 SCR 13 ..... 56B.2*(d)(i) FK Hussain v Union of India OP 2741/1988 (1990/02/26) ..... 56B.2(d)*
Akhtari B v State of Madhya Pradesh AIR 2001 SC 1528 ..... 39.8
Bandhua Mukti Morcha v Union of India AIR 1984 SC 802 ..... 39.8
Communist Party of India (Marxist) v Bharat Khumar 1998 AIR 184 (SC) ..... 44.1*(d)*
Consumer Education and Research Centre v Union of India AIR 1995 SC 636 ..... 39.8
Francis Coralie Mullin v The Administrator, Union Territory of Delhi (1981) 2 SCR 516 ..... 56C.2
Indira Gandhi v Raj Narain AIR 1975 SC 2299 ..... 13.4, 17.3*(g)*
Indra Sawhney v Union of India (1993) AIR SC 477 ..... 35.4*(d)*(i)
Indra Sawhney v Union of India (2000) AIR SC 498 ..... 35.4*(d)*(i) Kapila Hingorani v State of Bihar AIR 2005 SC 980 ..... 39.8
Kerala Vyapari Vavasayi Ekopana Samithi v State of Kerela 2000 AIR 389 (SC) ..... 44.1*(d)*
Kesavananda v State of Kerala AIR 1973 SC 1461 ..... 17.3*(g)*
Kharak Singh v State of Uttar Pradesh [1964] 1 SCR 332 ..... 66.1*(b)*(i) Kranti v Union of India & Others Civil Appeal No. 2681 of 2007, arising out of S.L.P (c) No.4716/2006, decided on 16 May 2007 ..... 56D.2*(b)*(iii)
MC Metha v Union of India AIR 1987 SC 965 ..... 39.8
MC Metha v Union of India AIR 2004 SCW 4033 (B) 39.8
Maneka Gandhi v Union of India AIR 1978 SC 597 ..... 51.1*(a)*(ii)
Minerva Mills v Union of India AIR 1980 SC 1789 ..... 17.3*(g)*
Murli S Deora v Union of India AIR 2002 SC 40 ..... 39.8
Olga Tellis v Bombay Municipal Corporation AIR 1986 SC 180 ..... 39.8
P Rathinam v Union of India AIR 1994 SC 1844 ..... 39.8
Parmanand Katara v Union of India AIR 1989 SC 2039 ..... 39.8
Paschim Banga Khet Mazdoor Samity and Others v State of and Another (1996) AIR SC 2426 ..... 33.4*(d), 33.5(c), 39.8, 56A.2(e)*(ii)
People's Union for Civil Liberties v Union of India Writ Petition [Civil] 196 (Supreme Court of India 2002) ..... 56C.2, 56C.3*(b)*(iii)
People's Union for Democratic Rights and Others v Union of India and Others, [1983] 1 SCR 456 ..... 64.4*(c)*
Ram Arya and Another AIR 2002 SC 2225 ..... 39.8
SP Gupta v President of India AIR 1982 SC 149 ..... 17.3*(g)*
Samatha v State of Andhra Pradesh AIR 1997 SC 3297 ..... 39.8
Secretary, Minor Irrigation and Rural Engineering Services UP v Sahngoo Ram Arya and Another AIR 2002 SC 2225 ..... 39.8
State of Himachal Pradesh v Raja Mahendra Pal AIR 1999 SC 1786 ..... 39.8
State of Punjab V Mohinder Singh Chawla AIR 1997 SC 1225 ..... 39.8
Subhash Kumar v State of Bihar & Others (1991) AIR 420 ..... 56B.2*(d)*
UP Avas Evam Vikas Parishad v Friends Co-op Housing Society AIR 1996 SC 114 ..... 39.8

Indonesia

Judicial Review of the Law No 7 of 2004 on Water Resources, Constitutional Court of the Republic of Indonesia, 058-059-060-063/PUUII/2004 (19 July 2005) ..... 56D.2*(d)(iii), 56D.3(b)(iii)(cc)*

International

Aapo Järvinen v Finland Communication No 295 (1988) ..... 64.6*(h)*
Abbasi v Foreign Secretary 42 ILM 359 (2003) ..... 30.4*(d)*
Amnesty International and Others v Sudan (2000) African Human Rights Law Reports 72 (ACHPR 1995) ..... 58.3*(b)*(iii)
Amnesty International, Comité Loosli Bachelard, Lawyers Committee for Human Right, Association of Members of the Episcopal Conference of East Africa v Sudan Communications 48/90, 50/91, 52/91 and 89/93, 13th Activity Report 1999±2000, Annex V ..... 59.2*(c)*
Arrêt no 36/98 Wemmel Community, Moniteur Belge, 24/4/98 (1 April 1998) ..... 56B.2*(d)*
Barrios Altos 41 ILM (2002) 93 ..... 30.4*(c)*
Belgium v Spain (1970) ICJ Reports 3 (Barcelona Traction Company) ..... 30.1*(b)(iv), 30.4(d)*
Bosnia and Herzegovina v Yugoslavia (1996) ICJ Reports 615 ..... 30.1*(b)*(iv)
Broeks v the Netherlands Comm 172/1984 ..... 33.4*(c)*
Cariboni v Uruguay Communication No 159/1983 HRC 1988 Report (1988) Annex VII.A ..... 40.6*(a)*
Civil Liberties Organisation v Nigeria Communication 129/94, 9th Activity Report 1995–1996, Annex VIII ..... 59.2*(c)*
Columbia v Peru (1950) ICJ Reports 266 ..... 30.1*(b)*(ii)
Constitutional Rights Project, Civil Liberties Organisation and Media Rights Agenda v Nigeria Communications 140/94, 141/94 and 145/95, 13th Activity Report 1999–2000, Annex V ..... 59.2*(c)*
Dr. Mohiuddin Farooque & Others v Bangladesh & Others Supreme Court, High Court Division, Special Original Jurisdiction, Writ Petition No 891 of 1994 (15 July 2001) ..... 56B.2*(d)*(ii)
E Quinteros v Uruguay, UN Doc A/38/40 (1981) ..... 40.6*(a)*
Federal Republic of Germany v Denmark and Federal Republic of Germany v Netherlands ICJ Reports (1969) 3 ..... 30.2*(a)*
Free Legal Assistance Group, Lawyers' Committee for Human Rights, Union Interafricaine des Droits de l'Homme, Les Temoins de Jehovah v Zaire, Communications 25/98, 47/90, 56/91 and 100/93 ..... 50.2*(c), 56B.2(a), 56B.2(b)*
Gabcikovo Nagymaros Project (Hungary v Slovakia) ICJ (1997) (UNEP Compendium of Judicial Decisions on Matters Related to Environment: International Decisions (Vol 1 1998) 255) ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(dd)(x)(1), 50.3(b)(ii)(aa)(v), 50.4(f)*
International Pen, Constitutional Rights Project, Interights on behalf of Ken Saro-Wiwa Jr and Civil Liberties Organisation v Nigeria Communications 137/94, 139/94, 154/96 and 161/97, 12th Activity Report 1998–1999, Annex V ..... 59.2*(c)*
Katangese Peoples Congress v Zaire (2000) African Human Rights Law Reports 72 (ACHPR 1995) ..... 58.3*(b)*(iii)
Kitok v Sweden Communication No 197/1985 (1985) 96 ILR 637 ..... 58.4*(a)(i) Kuwait Airways Corporation v Iraqi Airways Co (Nos 4 and 5) [2002] 2 WLR 1353 ..... 30.4(e)*
LTK v Finland Communication No 185 (1984) ..... 64.6*(h)*
Legality of the Threat or use of Nuclear Weapons (1996) ICJ Reports 226 ..... 30.1*(b)*(ii)

Lovelace v Canada Communication No R.6/24, U.N. Doc. Supp. No. 40 (A/36/40) (1981) ..... 58.4*(a)(i), 58.4(a)(ii), 58.5(a)*
MAB, WAT and J-AYT v Canada (Communication No 570/1993, Inadmissibility decision of April, 1994) 1994 HRC Rep, Vol II ..... 41.3*(a)*
Minors Oposa v Secretary of Department of Environmental and Natural Resources, International Legal Materials (1994) 173 ..... 50.3*(c)(i) Nottebohm (Liechtenstein v Guatemala) 2nd Phase 22 ILR 349 (1955) ..... 47.2(b)*
Prosecutor v Dragon Nikolic, a.k.a. 'Jenki' Nikolic, Case No. IT-94-2 ..... 56B.2*(a)* Prosecutor v Dusko Tadic Case No. IT-94-1-AR72 ICTY Appeal Chamber ..... 56B.2*(a)* Prosecutor v Furundzija (2002) 121 International Law Reports 213 ..... 30.1*(b)*(iv)
Prosecutor v Kunarac Application Nos IT-96-23-T and IT-96-23/1-TICTY Appeal Chamber 12 June 2002 ..... 64.4*(a)*
Prosecutor v. Zejnil Dlalic, Zdravko Mucic a.k.a. 'Pavo', Hazim Delic, Esad Landzo a.k.a. 'Zenga', Case No. IT-96-21-T ICTY Trial Chamber 56.B.2*(a)*
R v Esposito (1985) 49 CR (3d) 193 (Ont CA) ..... 52.4*(b)*(i)
R v Esposito (1985) 53 OR (2d) 356 ..... 52.2*(b)*
Ryan v AG [1965] IR 294, 315 ..... 56B.2*(d)*
Social and Economic Rights Action Centre and the Centre for Economic and Social Rights v Nigeria, Communication 155/96 2001 ..... 50.2*(c), 50.4(e), 56B.2(b), 56C.3(b)(i) SOS Esclaves v Mauritania 198/97 (1997) (African Commission on Human and Peoples Rights) ..... 64.5(c)*
Spain v Canada ICJ Reports (1974) 3 ..... 30.1*(a)*
Supreme Court of Israel: Judgment Concerning the Legality of the General Security Services Interrogation Method (1999) 38 ILM 1471 ..... 40.6*(a)*
Surendra Bhandari & Others v Shree Distillery Private Ltd & Others Writ No 3259 of the Nepali year 2053, reprinted in Supreme Court Judgments on Constitutional Issues (2001) 206 ..... 56B.2*(d)*(ii)
Surya Shama Dhungel v Godavari Marbles Industries, N.K.P. Golden Jubilee Special Issue 2052 at 169 ..... 56B.2*(d)*(ii)
The Social and Economic Rights Action Centre and the Centre for Economic and Social Rights v Nigeria Comm 155/96 October 2001, African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights ('SERAC v Nigeria') ..... 33.2*(c)(ii), 33.4(c)*
Velásques v Honduras 28 ILM (1989) 294 ..... 30.4*(c)*
Zwaan-de Vries v the Netherlands Comm 182/1984 ..... 33.4*(c)*

Ireland

Airey v Ireland (1979) 2 EHRR 305 ..... 59.4*(b)*(i)
Attorney General v X and Others (1992) 15 BMLR 104 ..... 37.2
CM v TM [1988] ILRM 456 ..... 31.2*(e)*
City View Press v An Chomhairle Oiliuna [1980] IR 381 ..... 17.5*(e)*(i)
In re Northern Ireland Human Rights Commission [2002] UKHL ..... 25.8.1*(b)*
Knowles v The Anglican Church Property Trust, Diocese of Bathurst (1999) 89 IR 47 ..... 41.4*(c)*

Japan

Ienaga v Japan No 1428 of 1986 (16 March 1993) ..... 57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(y)*(ccc)
Ienaga v Japan No 1119 of 1994 (29 August 1997) ..... 57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(ccc) Koizumi v Japan 17 Keishu 12 (1963) 2434, translated and reprinted in Hiroshi Itoh & Lawrence W Beer The Constitutional Case Law of Japan. Selected Supreme Court Decisions, 1961–1970 (1963) 80–1 ..... 54.2(b)*(ii)

Kenya

Republic v Kadhi, Kisumu Ex Parte Nasreen [1973] EALR 153 (High Court of Kenya) ..... 64.4*(b)*(ii)

Malaya

Rajah Ramachandran v Perbadanan Bekalan Air Pulau Pinang Sdn Bhd Civil Suit No 22-716-2003 (2 March 2004) ..... 56D.2*(d)*(iv)

Mauritius

Government of Mauritius v Union Flacq Sugar Estates Co Ltd; Government of Mauritius v Medine Shares Holding Co Ltd [1992] WLR 903 (PC) ..... 46.3*(c)*

Societe United Docks v Government of Mauritius; Marine Workers Union v Mauritius Marine Authority [1985] LRC (Const) 801 (PC) ..... 46.3*(c)*

New Zealand

In Re A Case Stated by the Abortion Supervisory Committee [2003] 3 NZLR 87 ..... 37.2

Jennings v Buchanan [2002] 3 NZLR 145 ..... 17.7*(c)*

Mabon v Conference of the Methodist Church of New Zealand [1998] 3 NZLR 513 ..... 41.4*(c)*

Ministry of Transport and Noort Police v Curren [1992] 3 NZLR 260 ..... 34.7*(a)*

Prebble v Television New Zealand Ltd [1994] 3 NZLR 1 (PC) ..... 17.7*(c)*

R v Goodwin [1993] 2 NZLR 153 ..... 52.2*(b)*

Nepal

Bhojraj Aire v Ministry of Population and Environment, Writ No 4193 of the Nepali year 2056, decision dated 058/10/26 ..... 56D.2*(b)*(ii)

Prakash Mai Sharma v Nepal Khanepani Sansthan (Nepal Water Supply Corporation) & Others, Writ No 2237 of the year 2047, decision dated 2057/3/26 ..... 56D.2*(b)*(ii)

Nigeria

Abaribe v The Speaker of the Abia [2000] FWLR (Pt 9) 1558 ..... 18.2*(e)*

Archbishop Anthony Okogie and Others v Attorney-General of Lagos State (1981) 2 NCLR 337 ..... 32.3*(c)*

Asogwa v Chukwu [2004] FWLR (Pt 189) 1204 ..... 18.2*(e)*

Attorney-General of Bendel State v Attorney-General of the Federation and Others (1982) 3 NCLR 1 ..... 32.3*(c)*

Inakoju v Adeleke [2007] All FWLR (Pt 353) ..... 18.2*(e)*

United States of America

Abbott Laboratories v Gardner 387 US 136 (1967) ..... 7.3*(a)*

Abbott v Burke 575 A2d 359, 397 (1990) ..... 57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(x), 57.2(a)(ii)(aa)(y)*(aaa)

Abel v United States 362 US 217, 241, 80 SCt 683 (1960) ..... 38.3*(a)*(ii)

Abington School District v Schempp 374 US 203 (1963) 41.5

Abood v Detroit Board of Education 431 US 209, 97 SCt 1782 (1977) ..... 44.1*(d), 44.2(b), 53.3(b)*

Abrams v United States 250 US 616, 628, 40 SCt 17 (1919) ..... 42.4, 42.5*(a)*

Adamson v California 332 US 46 (1947) ..... 51.1*(a)*(ii)

Adderly v Florida 385 US 39 (1966) ..... 43.3*(b)*(iv)

Advocates for the Arts v Thomson 532 F2d 792, (CA1) (cert denied, 429 US 894, 97 SCt 254, 50 LEd 2d 177 (1976) ..... 42.4*(e)*

Afroyim v Rusk 387 US 253 (1967) ..... 60.5*(a)*

Alabama v Texas 347 US 272 (1954) ..... 42.7*(g)*

Amalgamated Food Employers v Logan Valley 391 US 308 (1968) ..... 43.3*(b)*(i)

American Academy of Paediatrics v Lungren 940 P2d 797 (Cal Sup Ct 1997) ... 37.6
American Communications Assn v Douds 339 US 382, 402 (1950) ... 42.7*(e), 42.7(g)*
American Life League v Reno 855 FSupp 137 (ED Va 1994) ... 41.3*(b)*
Ames v Kansas ex rel/ Johnson 111 US 449, 464 (1884) ... 4.3*(b)*
Arden v Maine 527 US 706 (1999) ... 21.2*(a)*
Armstrong v United States 364 US 40 (1960) ... 46.4, 46.5*(b)*, 46.7
Arnett v Kennedy 416 US 134 (1974) ... 34.7*(c)*(ii)
Ashcroft v Free Speech Coalition 535 US 234 (2002) ... 42.9*(e)*
Ashe v Swenson 397 US 436 (1970) ... 51.5*(n)*(iii)
Assemany v Archdiocese of Detroit 434 NW 2d 233 (Mich App 1988) ... 41.4*(c)*
Austin v United States 509 US 602 (1993) ... 51.5*(n)*(ii)
Bailey v Alabama (1911) 219 US 243 ... 64.4*(b)*
Baker v Carr 39 US 186 (1962) ... 12.3*(d)(ii)(aa)*
Baltimore Department of Social Service v Bouknight 493 US 549 (1989) ... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Bantam Books Inc v Sullivan 72 US 58, 70 (1963) ... 42.9*(b)*
Barbier v Connolly 113 US 27, 5 SCt 357 (1884) ... 49.2*(b)*
Barker v Wingo 407 US 514 (1972) ... 51.5*(f)*
Barnes v Glen Theatre, Inc 501 US 50 (1991) ... 42.9*(e)*
Barney v Eugene 20 Fed Appx 683, 2001 WL 1153441 (9th Cir 2001) ... 43.2*(b)*(ii)
Bay Area Peace Navy v United States 914 F 2d 1224 (9th Cir 1990) ... 43.2*(b)(ii), 43.3(b)*(ii)
Beauharnais v Illinois 343 US 250 (1952) ... 42.8*(c)*
Bella Lewitzky Dance Foundation v Frohnmayer 754 F Supp (CD Cal, 1991) ... 42.4*(e)*
Belle Terre v Boraas 416 US 1, 94 SCt 1536 (1974) ... 38.3*(a)(i) Bellis v United States 417 US 85 (1974) ... 51.4(b)*(iii)
Benton v Maryland 395 US 784 (1969) ... 51.5*(e)(i) Bethel School District No. 403 v Fraser, (1986) 478 US 675 ... 43.3(b)(iii), 43.3(b)(iv), 64.6(g)*
Bivens v Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics 403 US 388 (1971) ... 38.3*(a)*(iv)
Board of Directors of Rotary International v Rotary Club of Duarte 481 US 537, 107 SCt 1940 (1987) ... 44.1*(c)(vi), 44.2(b)*
Board of Education v Dowell 498 (US) 237 (1991) ... 9.2*(c)(iii)(bb)*
Board of Trustees of the State University of New York et al v Todd Fox 492 US 469, 109 SCt 3028 (1989) ... 42.9*(f)*
Bob Jones University v United States 461 US 574 (1983) ... 34.8*(e)(i) Boos v Barry 485 US 312 (1988) ... 43.3(b)*(iv)
Boumediene v Bush 553 US (2008) ... 42.9*(g)*
Bowen v Roy 476 US 693, 106 SCt 2147 (1986) ... 41.2*(c), 41.3(a)*
Bowers v Hardwick 478 US 186, 106 SCt 2841 ... 44.3*(c)*(ii)
Boyd v United States 116 US 616 (1886) ... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Boy Scouts of America v Dale 530 US 640, 120 SCt 2446 (2000) ... 44.1*(c)*(vi)
Brandenburg v Ohio 395 US 444, 89 SCt 1827 (1969) ... 42.8*(b), 42.8(c), 44.2(a)* Branzburg v Hayes 408 US 665, 92 S Ct 2646, 33 L Ed 2d 626 (1972) ... 42.7*(d)*
Braswell v United States 487 US 99 (1988) ... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Braunfeld v Brown 366 US 599, 81 SCt 1144 (1961) ... 41.2*(c), 41.2(d)*
Breard v City of Alexandria 341 US 622 (1951) ... 43.3*(b)(i) Bridges v California 314 US 252 (1941) ... 42.9(c)*
Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen v Virginia 377 US 1, 84 SCt 1113 (1963) ... 44.1*(d)*
Brownfield v Daniel Freeman Marina Hospital 208 Cal App 3d 405 (1989) ... 37.10
Brown v Allen 344 US 443 ... 52.4*(c)*(ii)
Brown v Amenti 247 F 3d 69 (3d Cir, 2001) ... 42.7*(f)*

Brown v Board of Education of Topeka 347 US 483, 493 (1954)	2.3*(g), 9.2(c)(iii)(bb), 57.2(a)(i)(aa), 57.2(a)(ii)(aa)(x)*
Brown v Board of Education of Topeka 349 US 294 (1955)	9.2*(c)(iii)(bb)*
Brown v Louisiana 383 US 131 (1966)	43.3*(b)*(iv)
Brown v Ohio 432 US 161 (1977)	51.5*(n)*(iii)
Brown v United States 12 US (8 Cranch) 110 (1814)	23C.3*(b)*
Buckley v Valeo 424 US 1 (1976)	42.7*(g)*
Burton v Wilmington Parking Authority 365 US 715 (1961)	31.2*(d)*(ii)
Butler v Perry (1916) 240 US 328	64.6*(g)*
Calder v Bull 3 US 386 (1799)	40.1*(a)(i), 51.5(m)*
California v Green 399 US 149 (1970)	51.5*(k)*
Cammarano v United States 358 US 498 (1959)	42.7*(e)*
Campaign for Fiscal Equity Inc v The State of New York 100 NY 2d 893, 86 NY 2d 316	57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(x)*
Campbell v Acuff-Rose Music Inc 510 US 569, 114 S Ct 1164, 127 L Ed 2d 500 (1994)	42.7*(c), 42.9(d)*
Cantwell v Connecticut 310 US 296, 60 SCt 900 (1940)	41.2*(c)*
Carey v Population Services International 431 US 678 (1977)	31.3*(c), 40.1(b)(i), 40.9(c), 42.9(f)*
Carhart v Smith 178 F Supp 2d 1068 (D Neb 2001)	37.3
Carhart v Stenberg 972 F Supp 507 (D Neb 1997)	37.3
Carter v Carter Coal Company 298 US 238 (1936)	21.2*(a)*
Catholic Charities of Sacramento, Inc v The Superior Court of Sacramento County 85 P 3d 67 (Cal 2004)	37.7
Catholic Charities of the Diocese of Albany v Serio RJI No. 01-03-072905 (NY Sup Ct 2003)	37.7
Central Hudson Gas & Electric v Public Services Commission 447 US 557 (1980)	42.9*(f)*
Central Intelligence Agency v Sims 471 US 159 (1984)	40.10*(b)*
Chambers v Mississippi 410 US 284 (1973)	51.5*(k), 52.6(a)*(iii)
Chandler v South Bend Community Corp (1974) 312 NE 2d 915	57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(bbb)(yy)*
Chaplinsky v New Hampshire 315 US 568 (1942)	42.4
Chicago Police Department v Mosely 408 US 92 (1972)	43.3*(b)*(iv)
Chicago Teachers Union v Hudson 475 US 292, 106 SCt 1066 (1986)	44.1*(d)*
Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc v City of Hialeah 508 US 520, 113 SCt 2217 (1993)	41.2*(c)*
Cincinnati Soap Co v United States 301 US 308, 317 (1937)	42.7*(g)*
City of Boerne v Flores, Archbishop of St. Antonio 521 US 507, 117 SCt 2157, 138 LEd 2d 624 (1997)	41.3*(b)*
City of Chicago v Mosley 408 US 92 (1972)	43.2*(b)(ii), 43.3(b)*(ii)
City of Chicago v Tribune Co 307 Ill 595 (1923) (US)	42.9*(a)*
City of Clinton v Cedar Rapids and Missouri River FF Co 24 Iowa (1868)	22.1*(a)*
City of Erie et al v Pap's AM 529 US 277 (2000)	42.9*(e)*
City of Los Angeles and Department of Water and Power v Preferred Communications Inc 476 US 488 (1986)	42.7*(g)*
City of Los Angeles v Lyons 461 US 95 (1983)	7.4*(c)*, 7.5
Civil Rights Cases 109 US 3 (1883)	31.2*(d)(ii), 64.4(b)*
Clark v Community for Creative Non-Violence 468 US 288 (1984)	43.3*(b)(iii), 43.3(b)*(iv)
Clinton v Jones 529 US 681 (1997)	18.2*(f)*
Clyatt v United States (1905) 197 US 207	64.4*(b)*
Coastal States Gas Corp v Department of Energy 617 F2d 854 (DC Cir 1980)	62.8*(c)*
Coates v Cincinnati 402 US 611 (1961)	43.1
Coe v County of Cook 162 F 3d 491 (7th Cir 1998)	37.4

Cohen v California 403 US 15, 25 (1971) ..... 42.7*(e)*
Coker v Georgia 433 US 584, 97 SCt 2861 (1977) ..... 49.2*(c)*(iv)
Collin v Smith 578 F 2d 1197, 1206 (7th Cir 1978) ..... 42.8*(c), 43.3(b)*(iv)
Commissioner v Sullivan 356 US 27, 28 (1958) ..... 42.7*(g)*
Communications Workers of America v Beck 487 US 735, 108 SCt 364 (1986) ..... 44.1*(d)*
Compagnie Générale des Etablissements Michelin & Cie v National Automobile, Aeropsace, Transportation and General Workers Union of Canada (CAW-Canada) (TD); Mutual of Omaha Insurance v Novak 836 F 2d 397 (1987) ..... 42.7*(g)*
Concrete Pipe and Products of California Inc v Construction Laborers Pension Trust for Southern California 124 L Ed 2d 539 (1994) 46.4
Connally v General Construction Co 269 US 385 (1926) ..... 34.7*(c)*(ii)
Connecticut Board of Pardons v Dumschat 452 US 458, 101 SCt 2460 (1981) ..... 49.3*(a)*
Courtemanche v General Services Administration 172 F Supp 2d 251 (DMass 2001) ..... 43.3*(b)*(iv)
Cousins v Wigoda 419 US 477, 95 SCt 541 (1975) ..... 44.2*(c)*
Cox v Louisiana 379 US 536 (1965) ..... 43.3*(b)*(iv)
Coy v Iowa 487 US 1012 (1988) ..... 51.5*(g)*
Curtis Publishing Co v Butts; Associated Press v Walker 388 US 130 (1967) ..... 42.9*(a)*
Dallas Cowboys Cheerleaders Inc v Pussycat Cinema Ltd 604 F2d 200 (1987) ..... 42.7*(g)*
Dean Milk Co v City of Madison, Wis 340 US 349 (1951) 16.9
Deboer v Village of Oak Park 267 F 3d 558 (7th Cir 2001) ..... 43.3*(b)(iii) DeFunis v Odegaard 416 US 312 (1974) ..... 7.4(a)*
De Jonge v Oregon 299 US 353 (1937) ..... 43.3*(a)*(ii)
Democratic Party of the United States v Wisconsin 450 US 107, 101 SCt 1010 (1981) ..... 44.2*(c)*
Dennis v United States 341 US 494 (1951) ..... 34.8*(d)(i) Department of Airforce v Rose 425 US 352 (1977) ..... 62.8(a)*
Department of Revenue of Montana v Kurth Ranch 511 US 767 (1994) ... 51.5*(n)*(ii)
De Shaney v Winnebago Country Department of Social Services 489 US 189 (1988) ..... 40.5*(b)(i) Dickerson v United States 530 US 428 (2000) ..... 31 Appendix (4)(c)*
Dillon v Municipal Court for Monterey-Carmel 49 P 2d 945 (1971) ..... 43.2*(b)*(ii)
Douglas v California 372 US 353 (1963) ..... 51.3*(f), 51.5(b)*
Dowell v City of Tulsa 348 US 912 (1955) ..... 40.10*(a)*
Dr Suess Enterprises v Penguin Books USA Inc 109 F 3d 1394, 1400 (9th Cir) ..... 42.7*(c)*
Dun & Bradstreet Inc v Greenmoss Builders Inc 472 US 749 (1985) ..... 42.9*(a)*
Dunn v Blumstein (1972) 405 US 330 ..... 10.4*(a)*
Dutton v Evans 400 US 74 (1970) ..... 51.5*(k)*
EEOC and McDonough v Catholic University of America (CA DC, No 94-5263, 14/5/96) ..... 41.4*(c)*
EEOC v Pacific Press Publishing Association 676 F2d 1272 (CA 9th Cir 1982) ..... 41.4*(c)*
EEOC v Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary 651 F2d 277 (5th Cir. 1981) ..... 41.4*(c)*
EEOC v Tree of Life Christian School 751 FSupp 700 (SD Ohio 1990) .... 41.4*(c)*
EU v San Francisco County Democratic Central Committee 489 US 214, 109 SCt 1013 (1989) ..... 44.2*(c)*
Edgewood Independent School District v Kirby SW2d 391 (Tex 1991) ..... 57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(y)*(aaa)
Edwards v Aguillard 482 US 578 (1987) ..... 57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(y)*(ccc)
Edwards v Cal Univ of Pa 156 F 3d 488, 491 (3d Cir, 1998) ..... 42.7*(f)*

Edwards v City of Coeur d'Alene (9th Cir 2001) 262 F 3d 856 ..... 43.3*(b)*(iv)
Edwards v South Carolina 372 US 229 (1963) ..... 43.3*(b)*(iv)
Eisenstadt v Baird 405 US 438, 453 (1972) ..... 37.3, 40.1*(b)(i), 40.9(c)*
Ellis v Brotherhood of Railway, Airline and Steamship Clerks 466 US 435, 104 SCt 1883 (1984) ..... 44.1*(d)*
Employment Division Oregon Department of Human Resources v Smith 494 US 872, 110 SCt 1595 (1990) ..... 41.2*(c), 41.3(b), 41.4(b)*
Engel v Vitale 370 US 421, 82 SCt 1261 (1962) ..... 41.2*(b)(iv), 41.2(d)*, 41.5
Epperson v Arkansas 397 US 97 (1968) ..... 57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(ccc) Escobedo v Illinois 378 US 478 (1964) ..... 52.4(c)*(i) Eubanks v Schmidt 126 F Supp 2d 451 (WD Ky 2000) 37.3
Everson v Board of Education 330 US 1, 67 SCt 504 (1947) ..... 41.2*(b)*(iv)
Ewing v California 123 SCt 1179 (2003) ..... 49.2*(c)*
Ex parte Milligan 71 US 2, 78-82 (1866) ..... 23C.3*(c)*
FCC v Pacifica Foundation 438 US 726, 98 SCt 3026, 57 Led 2d 1073 (1978) ..... 42.7*(e)*
Flagg Bros v Brooks 436 US 149, 98 SCt 1729 (1978) ..... 31.2*(d)*(iv)
Fowler v Rhode Island 345 US 67, 73 SCt 526 (1953) ..... 41.2*(c)*
Freedman v Maryland 380 US 51 (1965) ..... 42.9*(h)*
Freeman v Pitts 503 US 467 (1992) ..... 9.2*(c)(iii)(bb)*
Frisby v Schultz 487 US 474 (1988) ..... 43.3*(b)*(iv)
Furman v Georgia 408 US 238, 92 SCt 2726 (1972) ..... 40.7*(a)(ii), 49.2(b)*
Gallagher v Crown Kosher Super Markets of Massachusetts, Inc. 366 US 617, 81 SCt 1122 (1961) ..... 36.4*(c)(iii), 41.2(c), 41.2(d)*
Garcia v San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority 469 US 528, 105 SCt 1005 (1985) ..... 14.2, 21.2*(a)*
Gault, In re 387 US 1 (1967) ..... 31.3*(c)*
Geduldig v Aiello 417 US 484 (1974) ..... 35.1*(c)*, 37.4
General Electric Co v Gilbert 429 US 125 (1976) ..... 35.1*(c)*
Gentile v State Bar of Nevada 501 US 1030 (1991) ..... 42.9*(c)*
Geraci v Eckankar 526 NW 2d 39 (Minn Ct App 1995) ..... 41.4*(c)*
Gertz v Robert Welch Inc 418 US 323 (1974) ..... 42.9*(a)* Gitlow v New York 268 US 652 (1925) ..... 42.5*(a)* Globe Newspaper Co v Superior Court 457 US 596 (1982) ..... 42.9*(c)*
Goldberg v Kelly 397 US 254 (1970) ..... 56B.4*(c)*(ii)
Goldblatt v Town of Hempstead 369 US 590 (1962) 46.7
Goldman v Weinberger 475 US 503, 106 SCt 1310 (1986) ..... 41.4*(a)*
Grady v Corbin 495 US 508 (1990) ..... 51.5*(n)*(iii)
Grayned v City of Rockford 408 US 104, 92 SCt 2294 (1972) ..... 17.3*(f)*
Greenholtz v Inmates of Nebraska Penal and Correctional Complex 442 US 1, 11, 99 SCt 2100 (1979) ..... 49.3*(b)*(ii)
Greer v Spock 424 US 828 (1976) ..... 43.3*(b)*(iv)
Gregory v Chicago 394 US 111 (1969) ..... 43.3*(b)*(iv)
Grider v Abramson 180 F 3d 739 (6th Cir 1999) ..... 43.2*(b)*(ii)
Griffin v California 380 US 609 (1965) ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii)
Griffin v Illinois 351 US 12 (1956) ..... 51.5*(b)*
Griswold v Connecticut 381 US 479, 85 SCt 1678 (1965) ..... 38.3, 40.1*(a)(i), 40.1(b)(i), 40.9(c), 44.2(b), 44.3(c)*(ii)
Gutierrez v Municipal Court 838 F2d 1031 (9th Cir 1988) ..... 58.4*(a)*(vi)
Hague v CIO 307 US 496 (1939) ..... 43.3*(b)*(iv)
Hamdi Hamdan v Rumsfeld 542 US 507 (2004) ..... 30.4*(a)* Hamdi Hamdan v Rumsfeld 548 US 557 (2006) ..... 42.9*(g)*
Harmelin v Michigan 111 SCt 2680 (1991) ..... 49.2*(c)*
Harper & Row v The Nation 471 US 539 (1985) ..... 42.9*(d)*
Harris v McRae 448 US 297 (1980) ..... 37.3, 42.7*(g)*
Harris v New York 401 US 222 (1970) ..... 9.2*(c)(iii)(dd), 52.4(c)*(i)

Hartzell v Connell 679 P2d 35 (Cal 1984) ..... 57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(bbb)(yy)*
Heffron v International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON) 452 US 640 (1981) ..... 41.3*(b), 43.3(b)*(i)
Hill v Colorado 530 US 703 (2000) ..... 43.2*(b)(ii), 43.3(b)*(ii)
Hines v Davidowitz 312 US 52 (1941) ..... 16.3*(c)*
Hobbie v Unemployment Appeals Commission of Florida 480 US 136, 107 SCt 1046 (1987) ..... 41.2*(c)*
Hodgkins v Goldsmith 2000 WL 892964 (SD Indiana 2000) ..... 43.2*(b)(ii), 43.3(b)*(ii)
Hodgson v Minnesota 497 US 417 (1990) 37.3
Hoffman Estates v Flipside, Hoffman Estates Inc 455 US 489, 102 SCt 1186 (1982) ..... 17.3*(f)*
Hoffman v Capital Cities / ABC Inc 255 F 3d 1180 (9th Cir, 2001) ..... 42.9*(d)*
Holt v United States 218 US 245 (1910) ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii)
Holtzman v Schlesinger 484 F2d 1307 (2d Cir, 1973) 23C.5
Hudgens v NLRB 424 US 507 (1976) ..... 31.2*(d)(ii), 43.3(b)(i) Hurley v Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston ['GLIB'] (1995) 515 US 557, 115 SCt 2338 (1995) ..... 36.4(a), 42.7(e), 44.2(a)*
Hutto v Finney 437 US 678 (1978) ..... 9.2*(c)(iii)(cc)*
Idaho v Wright 497 US 805 (1990) ..... 51.5*(k)*
Illinois v Allen 397 US 337 (1970) ..... 51.5*(g)*
Illinois v Vitale 447 US 410 (1980) ..... 51.5*(n)*(iii)
Ingraham v Wright 430 US 651 (1977) ..... 47.5*(a)*
In re Application NBC 635 F2d 945 (2d Cir 1980) ..... 62.2*(a)*
In re Custody of Smith, 969 P2d 21 (Wash 1998) ..... 44.3*(c)*(ii)
In re: Grand Jury Subpoena, Judith Miller 297 F 3d 964 (2005) ..... 42.7*(d)*
In re Primus 436 US 412 (1978) ..... 42.9*(f)*
In re Washington Post 807 F 2d 383 (1986) (CA Fourth Cir) ..... 42.9*(c)*
International Associational Machinists v Street (1961) 367 US 740, 81 SCt 1784 ..... 44.1*(d)*
Jacobsen v Commonwealth of Massachusetts 197 US 11 (1905) ..... 40.10*(a)* Jaffee v United States 663 F 2d 1226 (3rd Cir 1981) ..... 40.10*(b),* 42.7*(e)*
Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v Board of Equalization of California 493 US 378, 110 SCt 688 (1990) ..... 41.2*(c)*
Johnson v Cincinnati 310 F 3d 484 (6th Cir 2002) 43.1
Johnson v Eissentrager 339 US 763 (1950) ..... 31.6*(a)*
Jones v Wolf 443 US 595 (1979) ..... 41.3*(c)*
Joseph Burstyn Inc v Wilson 343 US 495, 510, 72 SCt 777 96 Led 1098 (1952) ..... 42.7*(e)*
Kaplan v California 413 US 115, 119-120, 93 SCt 2680, 37 LEd 2d 492 (1973) ..... 42.7*(e)*
Karlin v Foust 188 F 3d 446 (7th Cir 1999) 37.3
Kastigar et al v United States 406 US 441 (1972) ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
Katz v United States 389 US 347, 88 SCt 507 (1967) ..... 38.3*(a)(ii), 38.3(a)*(iii)
Kedroff v St Nicholas Cathedral 344 US 94 (1952) ..... 41.3*(c)*
Keystone Bituminous Coal Association v De Benedictis 480 US 470 (1987) 46.7
Khademi v South Orange County Community College District 194 F Supp 2d 1011 (CD California 1999) ..... 43.3*(b)*(iv)
Laird v Tatum 408 US 1 (1972) ..... 7.3*(a)*
Lakewood v Plain Dealer Publishing Co 486 US 750 (1988) ..... 43.3*(b)*(iv)
Larson v Valente 456 US 228, 102 SCt 1673 (1982) ..... 41.2*(d)*
Lawrence v Texas (02-102) 539 US 558/2003, 123 SCt 2472, 156 LEd 2d 508 (2003) ..... 44.1*(a), 44.1(c)(vi), 44.3(c)*(ii)
Lebron v National Railroad Passenger Corporation 513 US 374 (1995) ..... 31.4*(ff)*(i)
Lee v Weisman 505 US 577, 112 SCt 2649 (1992) ..... 41.2*(d)*, 41.5

Lehnert v Ferris Faculty Association 500 US 507, 111 SCt 1950 (1991) ..... 44.1*(d)*
Lemon v Kurtzman 403 US 602, 91 SCt 2105 (1984) ..... 41.2*(b)(iv), 41.3(c)*
Lewis v Casey 518 US 343 (1996) ..... 34.8*(e)(i) Lichter v United States 334 US 742, 68 SCt 1294 (1948) ..... 17.5(e)(i) Lindsey v Natural Carbonic Gas Company 220 US 61 (1911) ..... 31.3(d)*
Linkletter v Walker 381 US 618 (1965) ..... 9.4*(e)(ii)(cc)*
Liquormart v Rhode Island 517 US 484 (1996) ..... 42.9*(f)*
Little v Barreme 6 US (2Cranch) 170 (1804) ..... 23C.3*(b)*
Lloyd v Tanner 407 US 551 (1972) ..... 43.3*(b)(i) Lochner v New York 198 US 45 (1905) ..... 33.1, 40.1(b)(i), 64.4(b)*
Lockett v Ohio 438 US 586, 98 SCt 2954 (1978) ..... 49.2*(b)*
Lockyer v Andrade 123 SCt 1166 (2003) ..... 49.2*(c)*
Loretto v Teleprompter Manhattan CATV Corp 458 US 419 (1982) 46.7
Lorillard Tobacco Co v Reilly, Attorney-General of Massachusetts 533 US 525 (2001) ..... 42.9*(f)*
Lovelace v SE Mass Univ 793 F 2d 419, 425 (1st Cir, 1986) ..... 42.7*(f)*
Lovell v Griffin 303 US 444 (1938), 58 SCt 666 (1938) ..... 9.2*(c)(iii)(cc),* 42.9*(h)*
Lujan v Gengler 510 F2d 62 (2d Cir 1975) ..... 31.6*(a)* Lukaszewski v Nazareth Hospital 764 FSupp 57 (ED Pa 1991) ..... 41.4*(c)*
Lyng v Northwest Indian Cemetery 485 US 439, 108 SCt 1319 (1988) ..... 41.3*(b)*
Mackey v US 401 US 667 (1971) ..... 9.2*(e)(iv)(cc)*
Maher v Roe 432 US 464 (1977) ..... 42.7*(g)*
Malnak v Yogi 592 F2d 197 (3d Cir 1979) ..... 41.3*(a)* Mapp v Ohio 367 US 643 (1961) ..... 9.4*(e)(ii)(cc),* 51.3*(f)*
Marbury v Madison 5 US 137 (1803) ..... 2.2*(e), 2.2(h), 9.2(b)(i),* 12.3*(c),* 42.9*(g)*
Marchioro v Chaney 442 US 191, 99 SCt 2243 (1979) ..... 44.2*(c)*
Margaret S v Edwards 488 F Supp 181 (EDLa 1980) 37.10
Marsh v Alabama 326 US 501 (1946) ..... 31.2*(d)(ii), 43.3(b)(i), 43.3(b)*(iv)
Marshall Field & Co v Clark 143 US 649, 12 S.Ct. 495 (1892) ..... 17.7*(a)* Martinez v Santa Clara Pueblo 540 F2d 1039, 1042 (10th Cir 1976) ..... 58.1*(b), 58.5(a)*
Maryland v Craig 497 US 836 (1990) ..... 51.5*(g), 51.5(k)*
Mathews v Eldridge 424 US 319 (1976) ..... 56B.4*(c)*(ii)
Mattel Inc v MCA Records 2996 F 3d 894 (9th Cir, 2002) ..... 42.9*(d)*
Mattel Inc v Walking Mountain Productions 353 F 3d 792 (9th Cir 2003), 2004 US Dist LEXIS 12469 ..... 42.7*(c), 42.9(d)*
McCleskey v Kemp 481 US 279, 107 SCt 1756 (1987) ..... 49.2*(b)*
McClure v Salvation Army 460 F2d 553 (5th Cir 1972) ..... 41.4*(c)*
McCollum v Board of Education 333 US 203 (1948) ..... 41.2*(d)*
McCook v Springer School District 44 Fed Appx 896, 168 Ed Law Rep 710, 2002 WL 1788529 (10th Cir 2002) ..... 43.3*(b)*(iii)
McDaniel v Paty 435 US 618, 98 SCt 1322 (1978) ..... 41.2*(c)*
McGowan v Maryland 366 US 420, 81 SCt 1101 (1961) ..... 41.2*(c), 41.2(d)*
McKevitt v Pallasch 339 F 3d 530 (7th Cir, 2003) ..... 42.7*(d)*
McKoy v North Carolina 494 US 433, 462, 108 Led 2d 369 (1990) ..... 42.7*(d)*
McMillan v City of Jackson 701 So 2d 1105 (Miss 1997) 37.3 Meachum v Fano 427 US 215, 96 SCt 2532 (1976) ..... 49.3*(a)*
Medtronic, Inc v Lohr 518 US 470 (1996) ..... 43.2*(b)*(ii)
Memorial Medical Center v Tatsch Constr Inc 2000 NMSC 30, 129 N.M. 677, 12 P.3d 431 ..... 56B.3*(c)*
Metromedia, Inc v San Diego 453 US 490 (1981) ..... 43.3*(b)(iv), 42.9(f)*
Meyer v Nebraska 262 US 390 (1923) ..... 58.4*(a)*(vi)
Michael H v Gerald D 491 US 110, 09 SCt 2333 (1989) ..... 11.3*(c)(i) Michigan v Long 463 US 1032 (1983) ..... 21.2(a)* Michigan v Tucker 417 US 433, 439 (1974) ..... 9.2*(c)(iii)(dd)*

Miller v California 413 US 15, 24, 93 SCt 2607, 37 Led 419 (1973)	42.7*(e), 42.9(e)*
Miller v United States 125 S Ct 2977, 162 LEd 2d 906 (2005)	42.7*(d)*
Milliken v Bradley 418 US 717 (1974)	9.2*(c)(iii)(bb)*
Milliken v Bradley II (1977) 433 US 267	33.12
Miranda v Arizona 384 US 436 (1966)	9.2*(c)(iii)(aa), 9.2(c)(iii)(dd), 9.4(e)(ii)(cc), 31 Appendix(4)(c), 31.4(e)(vii), 34.8(e)(i), 51.3(f), 51.4(b)(iii), 52.4(c)*(i)
Mississippi v Johnson 71 US (4 Wall) 475 (1866)	18.2*(f)*
Missouri v Jenkins 515 US 70 (1995)	9.2*(c)(iii)(bb)*
Mistretta v US 488 US 361, 109 SCt 647 (1989)	12.3*(d)(i)(aa), 49.2(a)*(ii)
Monroe v Pape 365 US 167 (1961)	38.3*(a)*(iv)
Moore v City of East Cleveland 431 US 494 [, 97] SCt 1932 (1977)	36.4*(b), 38.3(a)(i), 44.3(c)*(ii)
Moose Lodge No 107 v Irvis 407 US 163 (1972)	31.2*(d)*(ii)
Morrissey v Brewer 408 US 471, 92 SCt 2593 (1972)	49.3*(b)*(ii)
Morrow v State Bar of California (1999) 188 F3d 1174	44.1*(d)*
Mozert v Hawkins County Public Schools 827 F2d 1058 (6th Cir 1987)	41.2*(d)*
Mugler v Kansas 123 US 623 (1887)	46.7
Murdoch v Memphis 87 US 590 (1874)	21.2*(a)*
Murdock v Commonwealth of Pennsylvania 319 US 105, 63 SCt 870 (1943)	41.2*(c)*
Murphy v Waterfront Commission 378 US 52 (1964)	51.4*(b)*(iii)
NAACP v Alabama 357 US 449, 78 SCt 1163 (1958)	44.2*(b)*
NAACP v Claiborne Hardware Co 458 US 886 (1982)	43.2*(b)*(ii)
National Endowment for the Arts v Finley 534 US 569, 602, 118 SCt 21668, 141 Led 2d 500 (1998)	42.7*(e)*
National League of Cities v Usery 426 US 833 (1976)	21.2*(a)*
National People's Action v Village of Wilmette 914 F 2d 1008, 1012 (7th Cir 1990)	43.3*(b)(i), 43.3(b)*(iv)
Naunchek v Naunchek 463 A 2d 603 (1983)	51.5*(e)*(i)
Near v Minnesota 283 US 697 (1931)	42.9*(b)*
Nebraska Press Association v Stuart 427 US 539, 96 SCt 2791 (1976)	42.9*(c)(iv)(bb), 42.9(b), 51.5(e)*(ii)
Nevada v Hall 440 US 410 (1979)	21.2*(a)*
New Jersey v TLO (1985) 469 US 325, 369	34.8*(d)*(i)
New York City Commission on Human Rights v United African Movement, No. MPA95-0851/PA95-0031 (NYCCHR June 30, 1997)	44.3*(c)*(v)
New York State Club Association v City of New York 487 US 1, 108 SCt 2225 (1988)	44.1*(c)(vi), 44.2(b)*
New York Times v Gonzales 459 F 3d 160 (2nd Cir, 2006)	42.7*(d)*
New York Times v Sullivan 376 US 254, 265 (1964)	31.2*(e), 42.5(a), 42.5(b), 42.8(c), 42.9(a), 42.9(c)*
New York Times v United States 403 US 713 (1971), 91 W Ct 2140, 29 LEd 2d 822	42.9*(g), 42.9(h), 62.8(b)*
New York v Ferber 458 US 747 (1982)	42.9*(e)*
New York v Quarles 467 US 649 (1984)	52.4*(c)*(i)
New York v United States 505 US 144 (1992)	21.2*(a)*
Nike Inc v Kasky 123 SCt 2554 (2003)	42.9*(f)*
Nishimura Ekiu v US 142 US 651 (1892)	31.3*(a)*(i)
Nixon v Warner Communications Inc 435 US 589 (1978)	42.9*(c)*
Nollan v California Coastal Commission 483 US 825 (1987)	46.7
Norwood v Harrison 413 US 455, 93 SCt 2804 (1973)	44.2*(b)*

Ohio Citizen Action v City of Seven Hills 35 F Supp 2d 575 (ND Ohio 1999) ..... 43.3*(b)*(i)
Ohio v Akron Center for Reproductive Health 497 US 502 (1990) 37.3
Ohio v Roberts 448 US 56 (1980) ..... 51.5*(k)*
Ohralik v State Bar Association 436 US 447 (1978) ..... 42.9*(f)*
Olando v Laird 443 F2d 1039, 1043 (2d Cir, 1970) 23C.4
Olmstead v United States 277 US 438, 48 SCt 564 (1928) 38.1
O'Lone v Estate of Shabazz 482 US 342 (1987) ..... 41.4*(a)*
O'Neil v Vermont 144 US 323, 12 SCt 693 (1892) ..... 49.2*(c)*
Oregon v Elstad 470 US 298 (1985) ..... 9.2*(c)(iii)(dd)*
Oregon v Hass 429 US 714 (1975) ..... 9.2*(c)(iii)(dd)*
Organization for a Better Austin v Keefe 402 US 415 (1971) ..... 42.9*(h)*
Osborne v Ohio 495 US 103 (1990), 110 SCt 1691 (1990) ..... 38.3*(a)(i), 42.9(e)*
Pacific Gas and Electric Co v State Energy Resources Conservation and Development Commission 461 US 190 (1983) ..... 7.3*(b)*
Palko v State of Connecticut 302 US 319, 327 (1937) 42.5
Panama Refining Co v Ryan 293 US 388, 55 SCt 241 (1935) ..... 17.5*(e)(i), 34.7(c)*(ii)
Parate v Isibor 868 F 2d 821, (6th Cir, 1989) ..... 42.7*(f)*
Parents Involved in Community Schools v Seattle School District No 1 551 US_(2007) ..... 9.2*(c)(iii)(bb)*
Pasadena City Board of Education v Spangler 427 US 424 (1976) ..... 9.2*(c)(iii)(bb)*
Pauley v Kelly 255 SE2d 859, 877 (1979) ..... 57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(x)*
Penn Central Transportation Co v City of New York 438 US 104 (1978) ... 46.7
Pennekamp v Florida 328 US 331 (1946) ..... 42.9*(c)*
Pennsylvania Coal Co v Mahon 260 US 393 (1922) 46.7
People v 1988 Mercury Cougar 607 NE 2d 217 (1992) ..... 51.5*(n)*(ii)
People v Woody 61 Cal 2d 716, 394 P2d 813 (1964) ..... 41.2*(c)*
Perez v Brownell 356 US 44 (1958) ..... 40.7*(c)(i) Philadelphia Newspapers Inc v Hepps 475 US 767 (1986) ..... 42.9(a)*
Pierce v Society of Sisters 268 US 510, 45 SCt 571 (1925) ..... 44.3*(c)*(iii)
Pittsburgh Press v Human Relations Commission 413 US 376 (1973) ..... 42.9*(f)*
Planned Parenthood of Cent Missouri v Danforth 428 US 52 (1976) ..... 31.3*(c)*
Planned Parenthood of Rocky Mountains Services, Corp. v Owens 2002 WL 571784 (10th Cir 2002) 37.3
Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v Casey 505 US 833 (1992) 37.3
Plessy v Ferguson, 1896) 163 US 537 ..... 64.4*(b)*
Plyler v Doe 475 US 202 (1982) ..... 31.3*(a)(i) Police Dept of Chicago v Mosley 408 US 92, 95, 92 SCt 2286, 33 Led 2d 212 (1972) ..... 42.7(e)*
Pope v Illinois 481 US 497, 107 SCt 1918, 95 Led 2d 439 (1987) ..... 42.7*(e)*
Posadas de Puerto Rico Associates v Tourism Co of Puerto Rico 478 US 328 (1986) ..... 42.9*(f)*
Powell v Alabama 287 US 45 (1932) ..... 51.3*(f)*
Presbyterian Church in the United States v Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Memorial Presbyterian Church 393 US 440 (1969) ..... 41.3*(c), 47.5(b)*
Press-Enterprise Co v Superior Court 478 US 1 (1986) ..... 42.9*(c)*
Press-Enterprise Co v Superior Court of California 464 US 501 (1984) ..... 42.9*(c)*
Project 80's Inc v City of Pocatello 942 F 2d 635 (9th Cir 1991) ..... 43.2*(b)(ii), 43.3(b)*(ii)
Pruneyard Shopping Centre v Robins 447 US 74 (1980) ..... 21.2*(a), 43.3(b)*(i) Pumpelly v Green Bay and Mississippi Canal Co 80 US (13 Wall) 166 (1871) 46.7
Rakas v Illinois 439 US 128, 99 SCt 421 (1978) ..... 38.3*(a)*(ii)
Rasul v Bush 542 US, 124 SCt 2686 (2004) ..... 31.6*(a)*
RAV v City of St Paul, Minnesota 505 US 377 (1992) ..... 42.8*(c)*
Raymond Motor Transportation, Inc v Rice 434 US 429 (1978) ..... 16.4*(b)*(ii), 16.9

Red Lion Broadcasting Company v Federal Communications Commission et al (No 2) 395 US 367 (1969)	42.7*(e), 42.7(g)*
Regan v Taxation with Representation 461 US 540 (1983)	42.7*(e), 42.7(g)*
Regents of the University of California v Bakke 438 US 265 (1978)	57.2*(b)(ii)(bb)*
Reid v Covert 354 US 1 (1957)	31.6*(a)*
Reno v American Civil Liberties Union 521 US 844 (1997)	42.7*(g)*
Reno v Flores 507 US 292 (1993)	47.10*(c)*
Reynolds v United States 98 US 145, 25 LEd 244 (1878)	41.2*(b)*(iii)
Rhode Island Medical Soc v Whitehouse 66 F Supp 2d 288 (Dis RI 1999)	37.3
Rhode Island v Innis 446 US 291 (1980)	52.4*(c)*(i)
Richmond Newspaper Inc v Virginia 448 US 555 (1980)	42.9*(c), 51.5(e)*(ii)
Riley v City of Chester 162 F 2d 708 (3d Cir, 1979)	42.7*(d)*
Roberts v United States Jaycees 468 US 609, 104 SCt 3244 (1984)	44.1*(a), 44.1(c)(vi), 44.2(b), 44.3(c)(ii), 44.3(c)*(iii)
Rochin v California 342 US 165 (1952)	31.6*(a)*
Roe v Wade 410 US 113, 93 SCt 705 (1973)	7.4*(a), 31.3(a)(iii), 37.2, 37.3, 38.3, 38.3(a)(i), 40.1(a)(i), 40.1(b)(i), 40.9(a)*
Rose v Council for a Better Education 790 SW2d 186 (Ky 1989)	57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(y)*(aaa)
Ross v McIntyre 140 US 453 (1891)	1.6*(a)*
Roth v United States; Alberts v California 354 US 476 (1957)	42.9*(e)*
Rubin v Coors Brewing Co 514 US 476 (1995)	42.9*(f)*
San Antonio Independent School District v Rodriguez 411 US 1, 112 (1973)	57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(x)*
Santa Clara Pueblo v Martinez 436 US 49, 98 SCt 1670 (1978)	44.3*(c)(iii), 58.1(b), 58.5(a)*
Schad v Mount Ephraim 452 US 61, 65 101 SCt 2176, 68 Led 671 (1981)	42.7*(e)*
Schechter Poultry Corp v United States 295 US 495, 55 SCt 837 (1935)	17.5*(e)*(i)
Schenk v United States 249 US 47, 52, 39 SCt 247 (1919)	42.4
Schmerber v State of California 384 US 757 (1966)	51.4*(b)(iii), 52.4(c)*(ii)
School District of Abington Township, Pennsylvania v Schempp 374 US 203 (1963)	41.2*(d)*
Secretary of State of Maryland v J H Munson Co 467 US 947 (1984)	34.1*(b), 34.7(c)*(ii)
Serbian Orthodox Diocese v Milivojevich 426 US 696 (1976)	41.3*(c)*
Serrano v Priest 487 P2d 1241, 1258 (1971)	57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(x)*
Shahar v Bowers (1997) 114 F3rd 1097 (11th Cir 1997)	44.3*(c)*(ii)
Shapiro v Thompson 394 US 618 (1969)	43.1
Shelley v Kraemer 334 US 1 (1948)	31 Appendix (1), 31 Appendix (4)(b), 4.3*(d)(iii), 42.6(b)*
Sherbert v Verner 374 US 398, 83 SCt 1790 (1963)	41.2*(c), 41.3(b)*
Shuttlesworth v Birmingham 394 US 147 (1969)	43.3*(b)*(iv)
Slaughter-House Cases (1873) 83 US 36	64.4*(b)*
Smith v Allwright 321 US 649, 64 SCt 757 (1944)	44.3*(c)*(i)
Smith v Maryland 442 US 735, 99 SCt 2577 (1979)	38.3*(a)(i), 38.3(a)*(iii)
Solem v Helm (1983) 463 US 277	49.2*(c)*
South-Central Timber Dev, Inc v Wunnicke 467 US 82 (1984)	16.9
Southern Pacific Co v State of Arizona ex rel Sullivan 325 US 761 (1945)	16.4*(b)*(ii), 16.9
Speiser v Randall 357 US 513, 78 SCt 1332 (1958)	17.3*(b), 42.7(g)*
Spence v Washington (1974) 418 US 405	64.6*(g)*
Stack v Boyle 342 US 1 (1951)	51.4*(d)*
Stanley v Georgia 394 US 557 (1969)	42.9*(d)*
Stone v Graham 449 US 39 (1980)	41.5
Strauder v West Virginia 100 US 303 (1880)	31.3*(d)*
Street v New York 394 US 576 (1969)	43.3*(b)*(iv)
Stronach v Virginia State University Civil Action 3:07-CV-646-HEH (ED Va, January 15 2008)	42.7*(f)*

Swann v Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education 402 US 1, 26 (1971) ..... 9.2*(c)(iii)(bb)*
Sweezy v New Hampshire 354 US 234 (1957) ..... 42.7*(f)*
Tashjian v Republican Party of Connecticut 479 US 208, 107 SCt 544 (1986) ..... 44.2*(c)*
Taylor v Kurapati 600 NW2d 670 (Mich App 1999) 37.3
Tennessee v Garner 471 US 1 (1985) ..... 40.5*(c)*
Terminiello v Chicago 337 US 1 (1949) ..... 43.3*(b)*(iv)
Terry v Adams 345 US 461, 73 SCt 809 (1953) ..... 44.3*(c)*(i)
Texas v Johnson (1989) 491 US 397 ..... 42.7*(e), 64.6(g)*
The Prize Cases 67 US (2 Black) 635 (1863) ..... 23C.3*(b)*
The Schooner Exchange v McFaddon (1812) 7 Cranch 116 ..... 30.4*(c)*
Thomas v Collins 323 US 516 (1945) ..... 43.3*(a)*(ii)
Thomas v Review Board of the Indiana Employment Security Division 450 US 707, 101 SCt 1425 (1981) ..... 41.2*(c), 41.3(a), 41.3(b), 47.5(b)*
Timmons v Twin Cities Areas New Party (1997) 520 US 351, 117 SCt 1364 ..... 44.3*(c)(i) Tinker v Des Moines Independant Community School District 393 US 503 (1969) ..... 31.3(c)*
Torcaso v Watkins 367 US 488 (1961) ..... 41.2*(c)*
Trammel v United States 442 US 939, 99 S Ct 2879, 61 Led 2d 309 ..... 42.7*(d)*
Troxel v Granville 530 US 57, 120 SCt 2054 (2000) ..... 44.3*(c)*(ii)
Truax v Corrigan 257 US 312, 42 SCt 124 (1921) ..... 49.2*(b)*
Turner Broadcasting System, Inc v FCC 512 US 622, 641, 114 SCt 2445 129 LEd 2d 497 (1994) ..... 42.7*(e)*
Two Guys from Harrison-Allentown, Inc. v McGinley 366 US 582, 81 SCt 1135 (1961) ..... 41.2*(c), 41.2(d)*
US Department of Justice v Reporters Committee for Freedom of Expression et al 489 US 749 (1989) ..... 62.8*(a)*
US v Brown 381 US 437 (1965) ..... 34.7*(a)*
US v Dickerson 530 US 428 (2000) ..... 31.4*(e)(vii), 34.8(e)*(i)
US v Kozminski (1988) 487 US 931 ..... 64.4*(b)*
US v Lee 106 US 196 (1882) ..... 18.2*(f)*
US v Lovett 328 US 303 (1946) ..... 34.7*(a)*
US v Masel 54 F Supp 2d 903 (WD Wisconsin 1999) ..... 43.2*(b)*(ii)
US v Mathews 209 F 3d 338 (4th Cir, 2000) ..... 42.9*(e)*
US v Reynolds (1914) 235 US 133 ..... 64.4*(b)*
US v Seeger 380 US 163, 85 SCt 850 (1965) ..... 41.2*(b)*(i)
US v The Progressive Inc 467 F Supp 990 (1979) ..... 42.9*(h)*
US v Toscanino 500 F2d 267 (2d Cir 1974) ..... 31.6*(a)* US v Verdugo-Uriquidez 494 US 259 (1990) ..... 31.6*(a)*
US v Wade 288 US 218 ..... 52.4*(c)*(ii)
US v Warren 578 F2d 1058 (5th Cir 1978) ..... 31.6*(a)* United Mine Workers v Illinois Bar Association 389 US 217, 88 SCt 353 (1967) ..... 44.1*(d)*
United Public Workers v Mitchell 330 US 75 (1947) ..... 7.3*(a)* United States ex rel Knauf v Shaughnessey 338 US 537 (1950) ..... 31.3*(a)(i) United States in Associated Press v United States 326 US 1 (1945) ..... 42.7(g)*
United States Trust Company of New York, Trustee v New Jersey 431 US 1 (1977) ..... 31.3*(d)*
United States v Ahmed 980 F 2d 161 (1992) ..... 51.5*(n)*(iii)
United States v Ballard 322 US 78 (1944) ..... 41.3*(a), 41.3(c)*
United States v Ballin 144 US 1, 5, 12 SCt. 507 ..... 17.7*(a), 17.7(b)*(i)5
United States v Cotroni [1989] 1 SCR 1469, 48 CCC (3d) 193 ..... 34.2*(c)*
United States v Di Francesco 449 US 117 (1980) ..... 51.5*(n)*(ii)

United States v Doe 465 US 605 (1984) ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
United States v Fisher 425 US 391 (1976) ..... 51.4*(b)*(iii)
United States v Grace 461 US 171 (1983) ..... 43.3*(b)*(iv)
United States v Halper 490 US 435 (1989) ..... 51.5*(n)*(ii)
United States v Inadi 475 US 387 (1986) ..... 51.5*(k)*
United States v Ingalls, 73 F Supp 76 (SD Cal 1947) ..... 64.6*(d)*
United States v Jacobsen 466 US 109, 104 SCt 1652 (1984) ..... 38.3*(a)*(ii)
United States v Lee 455 US 252 (1982) ..... 41.2*(c)*
United States v Lovasco 431 US 783 (1977) ..... 51.4*(c), 51.5(f)*
United States v Marion 404 US 307 (1971) ..... 51.5*(f)*
United States v Matlock 415 US 164, 177, 94 SCt 988 (1974) ..... 38.3*(a)*(ii)
United States v Meyers 95 F3d 1475, 1479 (10th Cir. 1996) ..... 41.3*(a)* United States v Miller 425 US 435, 96 SCt 1619 (1976) ..... 38.3*(a)(i) United States v Munoz-Flores 495 US 385 (1990) ..... 17.7(a)* United States v Nixon 418 US 683 (1974) ..... 18.2*(f)*
United States v Russell 411 US 423 (1973) ..... 51.1*(b)*(iii)
United States v Salerno 481 US 739 (1987) ..... 51.4*(d)*
United States v Stanley 107 SCt 3054 (1987) ..... 40.10*(b)*
United States v Wade 388 US 218 (1967) ..... 51.3*(f)*
United Transportation Union v State Bar of Michigan 401 US 576, 91 SCt 1076 (1971) ..... 44.1*(d)*
Upjohn Co v United States 449 US 383 (1981) ..... 42.7*(d)*
Urbina-Mauricio v INS 989 F 2d 1085 (1993) ..... 51.5*(n)*(ii)
Urofsky v Gilmore 216 F 3d 410 (4th Cir, 2000) ..... 42.7*(f)*
Valentin v Christensen 316 US 52 (1942) ..... 42.9*(f)*
Victoria W v Larpenter 205 F Supp 2d 508 (EDLa. May 21, 2002) 37.3
Village of Belle Terre v Boraas 416 US 1(1973) ..... 36.4*(b), 44.3(c)*(ii)
Virginia Citizens Consumer Council v Virginia Board of Pharmacy 425 US 748 (1976) 42.5
Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v Virginia Citizens Consumer Council 425 US 748 (1976) ..... 42.9*(f)*
Virginia v Black 538 US 343 (2003) ..... 42.8*(c)*
Walker v First Presbyterian Church 22 Fair Empl Prac Cases (BNA) 762 (Cal Superior Ct 1980) ..... 41.4*(c)*
Wallace v Jaffree 472 US 38 (1985) 41.5
Ward v Rock Against Racism 491 US 781 (1989) ..... 42.7*(e), 43.3(b)(iii), 43.3(b)*(iv)
Washington v Glucksberg 521 US 702 (1997) ..... 9.2*(c)*(iv)
Watchtower Bible and Tract Society of New York, Inc v Village of Stratton 536 US 150 (2002) ..... 43.3*(b)*(i)
Webster v Reproductive Health Services 492 US 490 (1989) 37.3
Weems v United States 217 US 349, 30 SCt 544 (1910) ..... 49.2*(c)*
Welsh v United States 398 US 333, 90 SCt 1792 (1970) ..... 41.2*(b)*(i)
West Virginia State Board of Education v Barnette 319 US 624, 87 LEd 1628, 63 SCt 1178 (1943) ..... 41.2*(c), 41.3(b), 44.3(c)*(vi)
Whalen v Roe 429 US 589, 97 SCt 869 (1977) ..... 38.3*(a)*(i)
Whitney v California 274 US 357 (1927) ..... 42.4, 42.5*(a), 42.5(d), 42.8(b)*, 42.10
Whitney v Greater NY Corp of Seventh-Day Adventists 401 FSupp 1363 SDNY (1975) ..... 41.4*(c)*
Widmar v Vincent 454 US 263 (1981) ..... 43.3*(b)*(iv)
Wieman v Updegraff 344 USA 183 (1952) ..... 42.7*(g)*
Winston v Lee 470 US 753 (1985) ..... 40.10*(a), 51.5(j)*(ii)
Wisconsin Action Coalition v City of Kenosha 767 F 2d 1248 (7th Cir 1985) ..... 43.3*(b)*(i)

Wisconsin v Yoder 406 US 205, 92 SCt 1526 (1972) ..... 41.2*(c), 41.3(b), 41.4(b), 44.3(c)*(iii)
Witte v United States 515 US 389 (1995) ..... 51.5*(n)*(ii)
Women's Emergency Network v Bush 323 F 3d 937 (11th Cir 2003) 37.3
Women's Medical Professional Corp v George Volnovich 130 F 3d 187 (6th Cir 1997) 37.3
Wooley v Maynard 430 US 705 (1977) ..... 41.3*(b)*
Wozniak v Conry 236 F 3d 888 (7th Cir, 2001) ..... 42.7*(f)*
Yee v City of Escondido 118L Ed 2d 153 (1992) 46.4
Youngstown Sheet & Tube Co v Sawyer 343 US 579 (1952) 23C.5
Zauderer v Office of Disciplinary Counsel of Ohio 471 US 626 (1985) ..... 42.9*(f)*
Zerilli v Smith 656 F 2d 705 (DC Cir, 1979) ..... 42.7*(d)*
Zorach v Clauson 343 US 306 (1952) ..... 41.2*(d)*

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA

INDEX

Constitutional Law of South Africa Main Contents up to Revision Service 4, 2012

AUDITOR-GENERAL ..... 12.3*(b)(iii), 14.3(b)(ii), 22.5(j)(iv), 24A.4(b)(v), 24B.1-3, 27.4(b)*

ABORTION

- comparative law ..... 7.4*(a)*, 37.2, 37.3, 37.10, 37.11
- conscientious objection of health workers 37.7
- consent, informed 37.6
- criminalisation of 37.2, 37.5
- dignity and ..... 36.4*(c)*(ii), 37.2, 37.8
- equality 37.4
- European Court of Human Rights 37.2, 37.11
- expression, freedom of 37.11
- foetus, legal personality of 37.2, 39.3
- freedom and security of the person ..... 36.4*(c)(ii), 37.5, 40.9(a)*
- health care, access to 37.9
- information, access to 37.10
- life, right to 37.2, 39.3
- medical aid funding of 37.4
- minors ..... 35.5*(g)*(vi), 37.1, 37.6
- mootness issues ..... 7.4*(a)*
- nasciturus fiction 37.2, 39.3
- privacy 37.3
- time limits ..... 37.12, 40.9*(a)*

ACCESS TO COURTS

- administrative action ..... 59.2*(b), 59.4(a)(i), 59.4(c)*(ii) & (vi)
- amnesty 59.5
- 'another … tribunal or forum' ..... 59.4*(c)*
- appeals ..... 59.3*(a)(iv), 59.4(a)*(v)
- arbitration ..... 59.4*(c)*(ii)
- beneficiaries ..... 59.3*(a)*(i)
- champertous agreements ..... 59.4*(a)*(ix)
- comparative law ..... 59.2*(d), 59.3(a)*(i)
- content of right 59.4
- costs ..... 59.4*(a)*(vii)
  - security for ..... 59.4*(a)*(viii)
- criminal law, application to ..... 59.3*(a)*(iii)
- dispute that can be resolved by the application of law ..... 59.3*(a)*(v)
- enforcement of an effective remedy, right to ..... 59.3*(b), 59.4(d)*
- extradition ..... 59.4*(c)*(i)
- fair public hearing ..... 59.4*(b)*
- horizontal application ..... 59.3*(a)(ii), 59.4(b)*(v)
- interference with independence of judiciary ..... 59.2*(a)*
- Interim Constitution ..... 55.4*(d), 59.3(a)(i), 59.3(a)(iv), 59.4(a)*(ii)
- international law ..... 59.2*(c)*
- legal representation ..... 59.4*(b)*(i)
  - equality of arms ..... 35.3*(c), 51.5(b),59.4(b)*(ii)
- limitations, reasonable ..... 34.8*(c)(i), 59.3(a)(v), 59.4(a)*(i), 59.5

notice and hearing requirements ..... 59.4*(b)(iv) ouster clauses ..... 59.2(a), 59.4(a)(i) prescription ..... 59.4(a)(ii) procedural rules ..... 59.4(a)(iv) relationship with other rights ..... 59.2(b), 59.4(c)(ii) res judicata ..... 59.4(a)(iii) self-help ..... 59.4(a)(i) state duties ..... 59.3(b)* statutory alternative fora ..... 59.4*(c)* vexatious litigants ..... 34.3*(b), 59.3(b)*, 59.4(vi)
ACCESS TO INFORMATION PAIA environmental information ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(bb)*(x) exclusions 62.5
grounds for refusal 62.8
public and private bodies 62.6 operations of public bodies ..... 62.8*(c)* political parties ..... 17.8*(a)*, 45.8
public interest override 62.9
relationship with Constitution ..... 62.2*(a)* relationship with other legislation ..... 62.2*(b)*
'required for the exercise or protection of any right' 62.7 rationale 62.1
reproductive rights 37.10
ADMINISTRATIVE LAW
administrative action, just access to courts ..... 59.2*(b), 59.4(a)(i), 59.4(c)*(ii) & (vi) administrative action
constitutional meaning ..... 63.3*(b)* lawful, right to 63.4
PAJA meaning ..... 63.3*(c)* procedurally fair, right to 63.5 reasonable, right to 63.6
written reasons, right to 63.7 arbitration ..... 59.4*(c)(ii), 63.3(b)*(vii) bias 63.5
common law ..... 11.3*(b), 63.2(c)* environmental decisions ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(bb)(y), 50.4(e), 50.4(h)(ii)(aa)* judicial action ..... 63.3*(b)(iv) legality principle ..... 11.3(b), 63.2(b), 63.3(a)* legislative action ..... 17.5*(e)(iv), 63.3(b)*(i) PAJA
administrative action definition ..... 23A.1, 63.3*(c)(i) deprivation v determination theory ..... 63.3(c)(vi), 63.5(d)(ii), 63.7(c)* impact threshold ..... 63.3*(c)(vi) & (vii) legitimate expectations affected by ..... 63.5(d)(i) & (ii) substantive protection of 63.10 nature of action ..... 63.3(c)(ii)-(v) procedurally fair ..... 63.5(d)-(h)* reasonable ..... 63.6*(d)* reasons for adequate ..... 56D.4*(a), 63.7(d)* written ..... 63.7*(c)* & (e) specific exclusions ..... 63.3*(c)*(iv)

class action 63.8
relationship with common law ..... 63.2*(c)*
Constitution ..... 63.2*(a)* other legislation ..... 63.2*(a)(i) & (iii) property, deprivation of ..... 46.5(c)* policy decisions ..... 63.3*(b)*(iii)
political parties ..... 17.8*(a)* President's actions as ..... 18.2*(b)* public procurement 25.8
public v private power ..... 17.8*(a), 23A.1, 63.3(b)(viii) & (ix), 63.3(c)(v) rationality principle ..... 63.2(b), 63.6(b)* regulations as ..... 17.5*(e)(iv), 63.3(b)(vi), 63.3(c)*(ii) relief, substantive 63.9
right to be heard 63.5
standing 63.8
substantive legitimate expectations, protection of 63.10 traditional leaders ..... 26.6*(c)(iii), 26.6(d)(iii) variability ..... 63.3(a)* public administration legislation 23A.3
meaning of 23A.1
public service 23A.8
Public Service Commission ..... 23A.6 & 7
social security decisions ..... 56D.4*(a)* & (b)
ADVOCATE-GENERAL see PUBLIC PROTECTOR
AFRICAN CHARTER ON HUMAN AND PEOPLE'S RIGHTS environment ..... 33.4*(c), 50.2(c)* health ..... 33.4*(c), 50.2(c), 56B.2(b)* minority rights ..... 58.3*(b)(iii) political rights ..... 45.2(d)*
slavery ..... 64.5*(c)*
social security ..... 56D.6*(d)*
socio-economic rights in general ..... 33.4*(c)* AFRICAN CHARTER ON THE RIGHTS AND WELFARE OF THE CHILD (ACRWC) 47.1 armed conflicts 47.9
health, right to ..... 56B.2*(a)* legal representation 47.8
AMICUS CURIAE
Constitutional Court ..... 3.4*(c), 5.3(a)* & (a)(ii), 8.3*(a)-(g)* costs ..... 5.3*(a)* & (a)(ii), 6.4*(e)*, 8.5
High Court ..... 3.4*(c), 8.4(c)* labour courts ..... 8.4*(b)* & (e)
Land Claims Court ..... 8.4*(d)* not intervening party ..... 8.1*(c)* not pro amico ..... 5.3*(a), 8.1(a)* & (b) role and parameters ..... 8.1*(b)*, 8.2
Supreme Court of Appeal ..... 3.4*(c), 8.4(a)*
APPEALS
access to courts ..... 59.3*(a)(iv), 59.4(a)(v) accused, right to ..... 51.5(o)* against cost orders ..... 6.6*(b)* from Labour Appeal Court ..... 4.3*(d)(iii), 5.3(e)(ii)(dd), 5.3(e)(vi), 53.1(b)*
mootness ..... 7.4*(c)*
to the Constitutional Court ..... 3.5*(a), 4.2(b), 5.3(e)(i)-(vi) , 7.4(c), 32.5(b)(iii)(aa)*
to the Supreme Court of Appeal see also SUPREME COURT OF APPEAL ..... 3.5*(b)*

APPLICATION OF CONSTITUTION beneficiaries
juristic persons see also JURISTIC PERSON ..... 31.3*(a)(ii), 31.3(d)* non-citizens ..... 31.3*(a)(i), 31.3(b), 31.6(a), 56D.3(f)(i), 56D.4(d), 66.1(b)*(ii)
Bill of Rights, application to other constitutional provisions 31.5
common law see FC s 39(2)
comparative approaches ..... 31.2*(d)(ii) courts, powers of in constitutional matters ..... 31.4(e)(iii) direct, horizontal application, examples of access to courts ..... 59.3(a)(ii), 59.4(b)(v) environmental rights ..... 50.3(b)(i)(cc), 50.4(c)* equality ..... 35.3*(f), 35.4(d), 35.6 expression, freedom of ..... 42.2, 42.6(b)* labour matters ..... 53.1*(a)(i) life, right to ..... 39.5(a)*, 39.6
movement and residence, freedom of ..... 66.1*(b)*(ii)
political rights 45.3
property rights 46.2
socio-economic rights ..... 33.11*(a)-(c)* extraterritorial effect ..... 31.6*(a)* & (b)
FC s 39(2) ..... 31.4*(e)(i)-(x), 31.Appendix(3)(b), 32.4(c)(i)(dd), 32.5(b)(iii)(bb)* interaction with s 8 ..... 31.4*(e)(iii), 31.Appendix(2), (3)(a), 4(c)* remedies ..... 9.2*(f)(iii), 31.4(c)(iii), 34.4(d)*(ii)
FC s 8(1)
interpretation by academics ..... 31.Appendix(1), (2), (4)(b) interpretation by courts ..... 31.1*(c)* & (e), 31.4*(a)(iv), 31.4(b)(i) objections and preferred reading ..... 31.1(c), 31.4(a)(iv) & (v), 31.4(b)*(i)-(vi)
FC s 8(2)
interpretation by academics ..... 31.Appendix(4)(a) & (c) interpretation by courts ..... 31.1*(c)* & (e), 31.4*(a)(iv), 31.4(c)(i) objections and preferred reading ..... 31.1(c), 31.4(a)(iv), 31.4(c)*(ii) & (iii)
FC s 8(3)
interpretation by academics ..... 31.Appendix(4)(a), (b) & (c) interpretation by courts ..... 31.1*(c)* & (e), 31.4*(a)(iv), 31.4(d)(i) preferred reading ..... 31.4(a)(iv), 31.4(d)(ii) & (iii) foreign and international law ..... 31.6(b)* Interim Constitution ..... 31.1*(b)* & (d), 32.1*(a)-(e)* internal constitutional conflict 31.5 matters pending when Constitution took effect ..... 31.8*(b)* organ of state ..... 31.4*(f)* retrospective application ..... 31.8*(a)* waiver of fundamental rights ..... 31.7, 34.7*(c)(i)(aa)*
ARGENTINA
water, right to ..... 56B.2*(d)(ii), 56B.3(b)(iii)(cc)*
ARRESTED PERSONS, RIGHTS OF see also DETAINED PERSONS and CRIMINAL PROCEDURE bail, right to ..... 51.4*(d)* court appearance rights ..... 51.4*(c)* distinction from accused and detained persons ..... 51.2, 52.2*(c)* illegal arrest litigation, costs ..... 23B.3*(c)(iii)(cc)* lawful arrest ..... 51.4*(a)* self-incrimination, right against compelled ..... 51.4*(b)(iii) silent, right to remain ..... 51.4(b)(ii), 52.4(b)*
ASSEMBLY, FREEDOM OF apartheid legislation ..... 43.2*(a)* assembly, meaning of ..... 43.3*(a)(ii) crowd control ..... 43.2(b)* damage caused by riot or demonstration ..... 43.2*(b)(ii) defence force members ..... 43.3(b)(iii) demonstration ..... 43.3(a)*(iii) expression, freedom of, and 43.1

Goldstone Commission ..... 43.2*(b)*
Interim Constitution ..... 43.3*(a)* lethal force, police use of ..... 39.5*(a), 40.5(c), 43.2(b)* liability, civil ..... 43.2*(b)(ii) limitations ..... 43.3(b)*
notice periods and timing ..... 43.2*(b)(ii), 43.3(b)(iv) peaceful ..... 43.3(a)(i)(aa), 43.3(b)(ii) petition ..... 43.3(a)(v) picketing ..... 43.3(a)(iv) place public space ..... 43.3(b)(iv) shopping malls ..... 43.3(b)*(i) political choice 45.8
public servants ..... 43.3*(b)*(iii)
Regulation of Gatherings Act 205 of 1993 ..... 43.2*(b), 43.3(a)(iii) unarmed ..... 43.3(a)(i)(bb), 43.3(b)*(ii)
ASSOCIATION, FREEDOM OF association forming the self and social life ..... 44.1*(b), 44.3(a)(i) association not protected by right ..... 44.3(a)(ii) autonomy of associations entrance criteria ..... 44.1(c)(i), 44.1(c)(v) expulsion ..... 44.1(c)(iii) fair hearing ..... 44.3(c)(ix) mission and vision ..... 44.1(c)(ii), 44.1(c)(v) banning of associations ..... 44.2(a)* business associations ..... 44.3*(c)(iv) capture ..... 44.1, 44.1(c)* meaning ..... 44.3*(a)(i) constitutional order, association threatening ..... 44.3(a)(ii) contract, freedom of, and ..... 44.1(c)(vi) criminal associations ..... 44.3(a)(ii) cultural associations ..... 44.(3)(c)(iii) defence force members and ..... 44.2(c), 44.3(c)(vii) dignity and ..... 36.4(b)*
dissociate meaning ..... 44.3*(a)(i) right to ..... 44.1, 44.1(d)* empowering associations ..... 44.3*(c)(v) equality and ..... 44.1(c)(vi), 44.2(b)* expulsion, procedural fairness ..... 44.3*(c)(ix) infringement, grounds for 44.2 intimate associations ..... 36.4(b), 44.(3)(c)(ii) labour relations ..... 44.3(c)*(vii), 53.3
limitations ..... 44.2, 44.3*(b)* not to associate, right to ..... 44.1, 44.1*(d)* police force members and ..... 44.2*(c), 44.3(c)(vii) political choice ..... 44.2(c), 44.3(c)(vii), 45.8 political parties enforcing democratic processes in ..... 44.2(c), 44.3(c)(i) prohibiting government employees from direct participation in ..... 23B.3(d), 44.2(c), 44.3(c)(vii) racially exclusive ..... 44.3(c)(i) relationship with other rights ..... 44.1(a), 44.3(a)(i) religious associations ..... 44.3(c)(viii) sexual associations ..... 44.3(c)(x) small social associations ..... 44.3(c)(vi) social capital ..... 44.1, 44.1(c)(iv), 44.3(a)*(i) AUSTRALIA

co-operative government 14.2
delegation of legislative authority ..... 12.3*(d)(iii) legislative conflict ..... 16.3(b)*, (c) & (d)(ii) outsourcing judicial power ..... 12.3*(d)*(iv)
religion, freedom of ..... 41.4*(b)* substantive legitimate expectations doctrine 63.10
BANGLADESH water, right to ..... 56B.2*(d)*(ii)
BELGIUM
water, right to ..... 56B.2*(d)*
BOTSWANA
water, right to ..... 56B.2*(d)*(iii)
BRAZIL
co-operative government 14.2
essential services, right to ..... 56B.2*(d)(iv) local government ..... 22.1(b)*
CANADA
access to courts ..... 59.2*(d), 59.4(b)(i) access to information ..... 62.8(b)* accused, rights of ..... 51.5*(b), 51.5(e)(i), 51.5(j)(iii), 51.5(k)* & (m)
co-operative government 14.2
constitutional interpretation ..... 31.5, 32.1*(b)* defence force, deployment of in breach of international law ..... 30.4*(a)* equality, substantive ..... 35.1*(d)(i) expression, freedom of ..... 57.2(a)(ii)(aa)(y)*(ccc) extraterritorial effect of constitution 31.6
fair trial ..... 51.1*(a)*(iv)
labour relations closed shop agreements ..... 53.3*(b)*
collective bargaining 53.5
legal representation ..... 59.4*(b)(i) legislative competence ..... 15.3(c)(iii) legislative conflict ..... 16.3(c)*
liberty, deprivation of ..... 40.3*(b)*
life, right to 37.2
local government ..... 22.1*(a)* & (b) mootness ..... 7.4*(a)*
organ of state ..... 31.4*(f)*
parliamentary privilege ..... 17.7*(c)* provinces ..... 21.2*(a)* religion, freedom of ..... 41.1*(c)(iii), 41.2(b)(iii), 41.2(e), 41.3(b)* remedies ..... 9.2*(b)(i), 9.2(c)(i)(cc), 9.2(c)(iii)(dd), 9.2(d)(i), 9.2(e)(iii)(bb)* & (cc)
sentencing dignity ..... 49.3*(a)* mandatory minimum sentences ..... 40.7*(b)(ii)(aa), 49.2(c)* preventive sentences ..... 49.2*(c)* socio-economic rights ..... 33.4*(d), 33.10(b)* speech, freedom of commercial speech ..... 42.9*(f)*
contempt of court ..... 42.9*(c)*

hate speech ..... 42.8*(c)*
journalistic privilege ..... 42.7*(d)(ii)(aa)*
Parliamentary privilege 42.10
pornography ..... 42.9*(e)*
sub judice rule ..... 42.9*(c)(iv)(bb)*
vote, right to ..... 45.2*(e)*
CAPITAL PUNISHMENT see SENTENCING, death penalty
CHAPTER NINE INSTITUTIONS see also each institution there appointment and removal ..... 24C.4*(f)* disputes involving ..... 14.3*(b)(ii), 14.3(c)*(iii) general doctrine 24C.4
independence ..... 12.3*(b)(iii), 24C.4(b)*, 24F.3
jurisdiction ..... 24C.4*(e)*
Parliament's obligations ..... 17.4*(d)*
CHILDREN ..... abuse and neglect ..... 47.5*(c), 56D.5(c)(iii)(aa)* & (bb) adoption ..... 32.5*(b)(iii), 35.5(g)(ii)(cc)* & (v)(cc), 37.6, 47.10*(b)*f African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child see AFRICAN CHARTER ON THE RIGHTS AND WELFARE OF THE CHILD (ACRWC) alternative care ..... 47.3, 47.4*(c)* armed conflict, in 47.9
best interests of the child ..... 5.3*(e)(iii), 47.10(a)-(c)* birth registration ..... 47.2*(b), 60.5(b)* child care grants ..... 47.1, 47.4*(b), 56D.5(c)*(iii)
Child Justice Act 38 of 2007 ..... 47.7*(b)* child labour ..... 47.6, 64.5*(b), 64.6(e)* child pornography see PORNOGRAPHY child witness ..... 51.5*(k), 52.6(a)(ii), 52.7(a)(ii), 52.7(b)* citizenship ..... 47.2*(b)*
Convention on the Rights of the Child see CONVENTION ON THE RIGHTS OF THE CHILD (CRC) corporal punishment ..... 47.5*(a)* in school and home ..... 40.7*(a)(ii), 40.7(b)(i)(aa), 44.3(c)(viii), 47.5(b), 57.2(a)(ii)(y)(ccc), 58.1(b), 58.4(a)(i) custody ..... 5.3(e)(iii), 47.10(b)* detention 47.7
education see EDUCATION extra-marital ..... 35.5*(g)(ix), 47.1, 47.3(a)* family care 47.3
foetus see unborn child below
foster care grant ..... 56D.5*(c)(i)(bb)*
Hague Convention proceedings, costs ..... 6.4*(c)* housing see HOUSING and socio-economic rights below in camera proceedings ..... 47.7*(b), 59.4(b)(v) legal representation ..... 47.8, 59.4(b)(i) life, right to ..... 47.10(b)* majority, age of ..... 31.3*(c), 47.11(b)* name, right to a ..... 47.2*(a)* nationality, right to a ..... 47.2*(b)* parental care ..... 47.10*(b), 47.3, 47.4(c)* religion ..... 41.2*(d), 41.4(c)* & (d), 47.3*(a), 47.5(b)*
reproductive rights 37.1, 37.6
sentencing 47.7
socio-economic rights ..... 33.7, 47.4*(a)-(e)* health care ..... 33.7, 47.4*(b)-(d), 56A.2(a), 56A.3(b), 56A.4(b)* & (e) living separately from parents ..... 33.7, 47.4*(e)*

progressive realisation ..... 47.4*(b)* shelter ..... 33.7, 47.4*(a)-(c)*, 55.7
social security ..... 47.1, 47.4*(b), 47-16 fn3, 56D.5(c)(iii), 56D.6(c)* trafficking ..... 40.10*(b), 64.5(b)* unborn child ..... 31.3*(a)(iii), 37.2, 39.3, 47.11(a)* CITIZENSHIP
acquisition of ..... 60.5*(b)*
case law ..... 31.6*(b), 60.3, 60.6 children ..... 47.2(b), 60.5(b)* common 60.4
discrimination on grounds of ..... 35.5*(e)* equal ..... 13.5*(b)*, 60.4
historical background 60.1
interpretation ..... 13.5*(b)*, 60.2 legislation 60.5
loss of ..... 60.5*(a)* non-citizens see IMMIGRATION and APPLICATION, non-citizens right, benefits and privileges 60.6
political rights 45.7
trade, occupation and profession, freedom of 54
vote, right to 45.7
types of 60.3
CLASS ACTIONS see CONSTITUTIONAL LITIGATION
CO-OPERATIVE GOVERNMENT basic principles ..... 14.3*(a)* centralized state with federalist features ..... 14.4*(c), 32.3(e)(iii) comparative concepts of 14.2 disputes between provincial departments ..... 6.2(b)(iv), 14.5(d)(ii)(aa)-(gg)* jurisdiction ..... 3.4*(f), 4.3(b)(i) legislative conflict between national and provincial legislation ..... 4.3(b)(i), 14.5(d)(i), 16.1-16.4 duty to avoid litigation ..... 5.3(e)(ii)(ee), 14.3(c)(i)(ee), 14.3(c)(iii), 14.5(c)(ii), 14.5(d)(ii)(aa)* fiscal relations ..... 14.4*(b)(v)-(xii) Forum for South African Directors-General (FOSAD) ..... 14.4(b)*(iv)
intergovernmental forums ..... 14.5*(c)(i), 14.5(e), 20.4(b)(i), 22.7(d)(v) Intergovernmental Relations Framework Act 13 of 2005 (IGFRA) ..... 14.5(a)-(f)* disputes ..... 14.5*(c)(iii) resolved prior to ..... 14.3(c)(ii) intergovernmental relations, definition ..... 14.4(a), 14.5(b)(ii) intra-governmental relations and disputes ..... 6.2(b)(iv), 14.5(d)(ii)(aa)(-(gg)* local government see LOCAL GOVERNMENT, intergovernmental relations monitoring of ..... 56B.4*(a)* MINMECs ..... 14.3*(c)(iii), 22.7(d)(v) national and provincial executive ..... 14.4(b)(ii), 14.3(c)(iii), 18.4(a)* & (b) national and provincial legislature ..... 14.3*(b)(ii), 14.3(c)(iii), 14.5(d)(i)19.3(c)* no encroachment ..... 14.3*(c)(dd)* organ of state for purpose of Chapter 3 ..... 14.3*(b)*(ii)
President's Co-ordinating Council ..... 14.4*(b)(ii), 22.7(d)(v) structures and statutes ..... 14.4(b)*(i)-(xii) COMMISSION FOR GENDER EQUALITY 24D.1-6, 33.13
COMMON LAW administrative action, just ..... 11.3*(b), 63.2(c)* criminal procedure ..... 51.1*(b)(iii) development of .. 3.3(e), 13.5(a), 31.4(e)(i)-(x), 31.Appendix(3)(b), 32.4(c)(i)(cc), 32.5(b)(iii)(aa)* & (bb) evictions ..... 33.11*(c), 55.6(a)-(c), 56C.3(b)(ii)(bb)* legality principle ..... 11.1*(a),* 11.3*(b), 11.3(c)(iii) jurisdiction ..... 4.3(d)(i) & (i)(aa), 4.3(d)(ii), 11.3(b)* & (c), 31.4*(e)(ii)(bb), 32.5(b)(iii)(aa)*

remedies ..... 9.2*(f)(iii), 31.4(c)(iii), 34.4(d)(ii) expression, freedom of, limitation to ..... 42.9(a)* High Court see HIGH COURT
Interim Constitution, no direct application ..... 31.1*(b), 31.4(e)(vi) privacy, common-law action ..... 38.2(a)-(c)* property, protection of ..... 46.2*(a)* stare decisis ..... 31.1*(c), 31.4(a)(v)(dd), 31.4(e)(x)(aa)-(bb)* statutory interpretation, theories of ..... 32.3*(a)* Supreme Court of Appeal see SUPREME COURT OF APPEAL CONSTITUTION OF THE REPUBLIC OF SOUTH AFRICA, ACT 200 OF 1993 (INTERIM CONSTITUTION) access to courts ..... 55.4*(d), 59.3(a)(i), 59.3(a)(iv), 59.4(a)*(ii) amnesty see Promotion of National Unity … Act below assembly, freedom of ..... 43.3*(a)* common law, no direct application of ..... 31.1*(b), 31.4(e)(vi) application of the Constitution ..... 31.1(b)* & (d), 32.1*(a)-(e)*
Constitutional Assembly ..... 2.5*(a), 2.5(c)*
Constitutional Court ..... 4.1, 4.3*(a)(i), 4.3(b)(ii)(aa)* 4.3*(c)*(i) & (ii)
Constitutional Principles see CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES constitutional history ..... 2.4*(c), 2.5(a)* community rights ..... 58.2*(a)* environmental rights ..... 50.3*(a)* freedom and security of the person ..... 40.1*(a)(i), 40.1(b)(i) labour relations ..... 53.1, 53.1(b)* land rights 48.2
limitation clause ..... 34.2*(a)* local government ..... 22.1*(c)* movement and residence, freedom of ..... 66.1*(a)*(iii)
Postamble ..... 32.3*(c)(iii), 32.4(c)(i)(aa)*
Promotion of National Unity and Reconciliation Act 34 of 1995 ..... 32.3*(c)(iii), 32.4(c)(i)(aa), 32.5(c)(v)(aa), 51.5(m)*, 59.5
public procurement ..... 25.2*(a)* religion, belief and opinion, freedom of ..... 41.1*(c)(i) & (ii) retrospectivity ..... 31.8(a)* separation of powers ..... 12.3*(a), 12.3(d)*(iii)
trade, occupation and profession, freedom of 54.1, 54.4
transitional provisions ..... 19.3*(a)(ii), 28.2(a)* CONSTITUTION OF SOUTH AFRICA, 1996 (FINAL CONSTITUTION) amendment of ..... 2.6*(a)* judicial review ..... 4.3*(b)(iv) power to ..... 17.3(g)* process ..... 17.3*(a)*
application of see APPLICATION OF CONSTITUTION as peace treaty ..... 32.3*(e)(iii) basic structure doctrine ..... 13.4, 17.5(g)*
certification see also CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES
First Certification Judgment ..... 2.5*(b)(i) & (ii), 32.2(a)*
Second Certification Judgment ..... 2.5*(b)*(ii)
Constitution 17th Amendment Bill ..... 2.6*(b)*, 4.5
Constitutional Assembly ..... 2.5*(a), 2.5(c)*
Constitutional Court see CONSTITUTIONAL COURT
Constitutional Principles see CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES constitutional supremacy ..... 3.3*(d), 4.3(d)(ii), 10.5(b), 12.3(b)(ii), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa), 13.5, 23B.6(b)(ii), 31.5, 32.3(e)*(ii) administrative justice and 63.1, 63.4

as value ..... 11.4*(a)*, (b) & (e) evidence and 52.1
foundational values ..... 10.3*(b), 10.4(c), 10.5(a), 11.3(b), 11.4(b), 13.2(a), 13.5(a), 32.4(c)(ii), 35.4(f), 36.3(d), 36.4(i) founding provisions ..... 10.3(b), 13.5(a)-(c), 13.6, 32.3(e)(iii) justiciability of ..... 10.3(b), 13.7(a)* & (b), 31.Appendix(3)(a) history see CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY interpretation see CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION matters pending upon commencement of ..... 31.8*(b)* objective, normative value system ..... 1.3, 4.3*(h)(i)(aa), 11.4(c), 13.3, 32.1(c), 31.4(viii) Postamble ..... 32.3(c)(iii), 32.4(a)(i)(aa)* preamble ..... 10.3*(a)* provincial constitution certification ..... 4.3*(b)(vi) conflict ..... 4.3(b)*(vi), 16.7
retrospectivity ..... 31.8*(a)* transformative nature ..... 4.2*(a), 9.2(c)(iv), 11.3(c)(i) & (iii), 13.2(a), 35.1(a)* & (b)
CONSTITUTIONAL COURT
amicus curiae submissions see also AMICUS CURIAE ..... 3.4*(c), 5.3(a)* & (a)(ii), 6.4*(e)*, 8.1-8.3, 8.5
apex court, general jurisdiction ..... 4.1, 4.3*(h)(i)(cc), 11.2(a)* Constitution 17th Amendment Bill ..... 2.6*(b)*, 4.5
appeals ..... 3.5*(a), 4.2(b), 5.3(e)(i)-(vi), 7.4(c), 32.5(b)(iii)(aa)*
from Labour Appeal Court ..... 4.3*(d)(iii), 5.3(e)(ii)(dd), 5.3(e)(vi), 53.1(b)* avoidance, principle of ..... 3.4*(g), 4.3(h)(ii)(bb), 31.Appendix(2), 32.5(b)(iii) confirmation proceedings ..... 4.3(c)(i), 5.3(c)*
costs see COSTS
direct access ..... 3.4*(e), 4.3(b), 4.4, 5.2, 5.3(d), 59.4(a)(iv) electronic documents and communication 5.2 facts, power to establish ..... 4.3(g)(i) guardian and final interpreter of Constitution ..... 4.2(a), 4.3(b), 12.3(c), 32.2(b)* interventions of parties in proceedings ..... 3.4*(b), 5.2, 5.3(a)(i), 8.1(c)* joinder requirements see intervention of parties jurisdiction
'constitutional matters' distinction is illusory ..... 3.2, 4.3*(h)(i)(aa)* & (bb) functional approach to recreate distinction ..... 4.3*(h)(ii)(aa)-(dd)* final power to determine whether matter is constitutional ..... 4.3*(e), 4.3(f)* interpretation of legislation as ..... 4.3*(d)(i)(bb), 4.3(d)(iii) matters ancillary to ..... 4.3(e)* scope of ..... 3.3*(a), 4.2(b), 4.3(a)(i)-(iii), 4.3(c)(ii), 11.2(a)*, (b) & (c), 12.3*(d)(ii)(aa)*
'interests of justice' ..... 4.2*(b), 4.4 administrative acts ..... 4.3(d)(ii) common law development and review ..... 4.3(d)(i) & (i)(aa), 4.3(d)(ii), 11.3(b)* & (c), 31.4*(e)(ii)(bb), 32.5(b)(iii)(aa)* exclusive jurisdiction ..... 3.4*(e), 4.3(b)(i)-(vii), 4.3(c)(i) fair procedure ..... 4.3(d)*(iv)
Interim Constitution ..... 4.1, 4.3*(a)(i), 4.3(b)(ii)(aa)* 4.3*(c)(i) & (ii) interim relief ..... 4.3(b)(vii) international comparison ..... 4.1, 4.2(a)* labour matters ..... 4.3*(d)(iii), 53.1(b)* lack of merit ..... 4.2*(b), 4.4 limiting, functional approach to ..... 4.3(h)(ii)(aa)-(dd)* notice requirement ..... 3.4*(c), 3.4(f)* public participation ..... 4.3*(b)(v), 17.6(a)(i) political question ..... 4.2(a), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa)* power to determine scope ..... 4.3*(e), 4.3(f)*

unpredictability ..... 4.3*(h)(i)(aa)* reversal ..... 4.3*(h)(ii)(aa)-(dd)* what should not trigger ..... 4.3*(g)(i) & (ii), 4.3(h)(i)(cc)* referral of Acts ..... 4.3*(h)(iii), 4.3(b)(vii), 5.3(b)(ii), 6.4(d)* of Bills ..... 4.3*(h)(ii), 5.3(b)*(i) rules 3.4, 5.1-5.3
separation of powers and ..... 4.3*(b), 12.3(c), 31.4(e)(vii), 34.1(c), 34.8(c)*(v) & (e)(i) judicial review ..... 12.3*(d)(ii)(aa)* & (bb) unrepresented parties ..... 5.2, 8.1*(b)*
CONSTITUTIONAL HISTORY
colonial politics and apartheid ..... 2.2*(a)-(i)*
Final Constitution of 1996
Constitutional Assembly ..... 2.5*(a), 2.5(c)*
First Certification Judgment ..... 2.5*(b)*(i) & (ii)
Second Certification Judgment ..... 2.5*(b)*(ii)
Freedom Charter ..... 2.3*(c)*
Interim Constitution, Act 200 of 1993 ..... 2.4*(c), 2.5(a)* liberation struggle ..... 2.3*(a)-(g), 2.4 Potemkin Constitution ..... 2.1, 2.6(c)*
pre-democratic constitutions
1983 South African Constitution ..... 2.2(vi)
Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 32 of 1961 ..... 2.2*(i)*(i)-(v)
Constitution of 1854 ..... 2.2*(e)*
South Africa Act 1909 ..... 2.2*(e)-(g)*
CONSTITUTIONAL INTERPRETATION common-law development, FC s 39(2) ..... 3.3*(e), 13.5(a), 31.4(e)(i)-(x), 31.4(e)(v), 32.3(h)(i), 32.4(c)(i)(dd), 32.5(b)(iii)(aa)* & (bb) common-law theories of statutory interpretation ..... 32.3*(a)* comparative approaches ..... 32.1*(b), 32.3(b)(i) & (ii), 32.3(c)(i), 32.5(c)(v)(bb)* comparative interpretation ..... 32.5*(c)(v)(aa)* & (bb) concretization as interpretation ..... 32.2*(c)(i), 32.3(d), 32.5(c)*(ii), 32.6
Constitution as law text ..... 32.3*(e)*(i)-(iii) constitutional amendments 31.5
contextualism ..... 32.2*(a), 32.3(a)(iv), 32.5(c)(iv), 32.3(c)(i), 32.5(c)*(ii) direct, horizontal application see also APPLICATION ..... 32.3*(e)(iii), 32.4(c)(i)(dd)* grammatical interpretation ..... 32.5*(c)*(i) harmonization 31.5
historical interpretation ..... 32.2*(a), 32.3(a)(iv), 32.5(c)(iv) intentionalism ..... 32.3(a)(ii) & (iii), 32.3(b)(i), 32.3(c)(i) interpretation aids constitutional drafting process and deliberations as ..... 2.5(b)(i), 32.2(a), 32.3(a)(iv), 32.5(c)(iv) different language versions as ..... 32.4(b)* foreign and international law as ..... 3.3*(e), 13.2(a), 30.3, 32.5(c)(v) & (v)(aa), 33.4(c)* foundational values as ..... 10.3*(b), 13.3, 13.5(a)* operational provisions as ..... 32.1*(a), 32.1(c)* preambles as ..... 32.3*(a)(v), 32.4(a)(i)(aa)* interpretational precedent, First Certification Judgment as ..... 2.5*(b)(i), 32.2(a)* interpretational waymarks application clause ..... 31.4*(b)*, (c) & (d), 32.4*(c)(i)(dd)* basic rights clause ..... 10.3*(c), 32.4(c)(i)(cc)* basic values governing public administration ..... 23A.3-5, 32.4*(c)(i)(hh)* co-operative government ..... 32.4*(c)(i)(gg)* definitions ..... 32.4*(c)(i)(ii) founding provisions ..... 10.3(b), 32.4(c), 32.4(c)(i)(bb)* interpretation clause ..... 10.3*(c), 32.4(c)(i)(ff)* judicial independence ..... 32.4*(c)(ii) limitation clause ..... 10.3(c), 32.4(c)(i)(ee), 34.8(e)(ii) pre- and postambles ..... 32.4(c)(i)(aa)* separation of powers ..... 32.4*(c)(ii) interpretative leitmotifs culture of justification ..... 32.3(c)(iii)(aa)* memorial constitutionalism ..... 32.3*(c)(iii)(bb)* transformative constitutionalism ..... 32.1*(a), 32.3(c)(iv) transitional constitutionalism ..... 32.3(c)(iii)(aa)* & (bb) judicial activism ..... 32.1*(b), 32.3(a)(vi), 32.3(c)(i) linguistic turn thinking ..... 32.3(b)(ii), 32.3(d)* literalism ..... 32.1*(b), 32.3(a)(i) & (iii), 32.3(b)(i), 32.3(c)(i) mischief rule ..... 32.3(a)(v) objectivism ..... 32.3(a)(vi) politics as influencing factor ..... 32.3(b)(iii), 32.3(c)(iv) pre-1994 ..... 32.1(a)* & (b), 32.3*(b)(iii) purposivism ..... 32.1(b), 32.1(c), 32.3(a)(v), 32.3(b)(iv), 32.3(c)(i) & (iii), 32.5(c)(ii) & (iii) reading down or in conformity with the Constitution ..... 31.4(e)(vi), 32.1(d), 32.3(b)(i), 32.5(b)(ii) rights interpretation nature of ..... 32.1(b)* relationship with norm interpretation ..... 32.1*(c)* shared constitutional interpretation ..... 31.4(vii), 32.2, 32.2*(d), 34.1(c), 34.8(e)(i) stare decisis see STARE DECISIS statutes giving effect to constitutional provisions ..... 3.3(e), 32.4(a)* statutory interpretation and, differences and commonalities ..... 32.4*(a)* subsidiarity

as indirect application ..... 32.1*(e)(ii), 32.4(c)(i)(ff), 32.5(b)(iii) for development of existing law ..... 32.5(b)(iii)(bb)* institutional subsidiarity ..... 32.5*(b)*(iii) & (b)(iii)(aa) surplusage ..... 31.4*(a)(v)(cc), 31.4(b)(iii), 31.4(c)(iii), 31.Appendix(2), 32.4(a), 32.5(c)*(iii) systematic interpretation see also contextualism ..... 32.5*(c)*(ii) teleological interpretation see purposivism von Savigny quartet ..... 32.3*(c)(i), 32.5(c)*(i)-(iv)
CONSTITUTIONAL LITIGATION
amicus curiae see AMICUS CURIAE appeals
from Labour Appeal Court ..... 4.3*(d)(iii), 5.3(e)(ii)(dd), 5.3(e)(vi), 53.1(b)*
to the Constitutional Court ..... 3.5*(a), 4.2(b), 5.3(e)(i)-(vi) , 7.4(c), 32.5(b)(iii)(aa)*
to the Supreme Court of Appeal see also SUPREME COURT OF APPEAL ..... 3.5*(b)*
avoidance, principle of ..... 3.4*(g), 4.3(h)(ii)(bb), 31.Appendix(2), 32.5(b)*(iii)
Bill of Rights challenges ..... 3.3*(c)* class actions ..... 7.2*(c)(iii), 32.5(b)(iii)(bb), 56D.4(c)*, 63.8 constitutional matters see also CONSTITUTIONAL COURT, jurisdiction ..... 3.2, 3.3*(a)*
costs see COSTS
form of proceedings ..... 3.4*(d)*
interpretation see INTERPRETATION joinders or intervention ..... 3.4*(b), 3.4(f), 5.2, 5.3(a)(i), 8.1(c)* jurisdiction see CONSTITUTIONAL COURT, jurisdiction legislation giving effect to constitutional rights ..... 3.3*(c)* mootness and ripeness see STANDING, RIPENESS AND MOOTNESS non-chapter 2 litigation ..... 3.3*(d)*
pleading ..... 3.3*(b)*
standing see STANDING, RIPENESS AND MOOTNESS state duties burden of proof to justify infringement ..... 3.7*(b)(i), 34.5(a), 34.6 general ethical duty regarding conduct and openness ..... 3.7(a)* providing evidence regarding effect of suspension or retrospectivity of order ..... 3.7*(b)*(ii)

to comply with and enforce court orders ..... 3.7*(c)*
CONSTITUTIONAL PRINCIPLES ..... 2.4*(c), 2.5(b)*(i) & (ii)
II ..... 37.2, 42.2, 54.2*(a)*
IX 62.1
VI ..... 12.3*(a)*
VIII ..... 45.2*(b)*
X ..... 22.1*(c)*
XI 65.1
XII ..... 41.1*(b)*
XIII.1 & 2 ..... 26.4
XIV ..... 45.2*(b)*
XVII ..... 45.2*(b)*
XXIV ..... 22.1*(c)*
XXIX 24A.3, 24B.2
XXVII 53.2
XXVIII 53.5
XXXIV ..... 24F.3, 58.2*(b), 58.8(b)*(i) & (ii)
XXXI 23B.2
CONVENTION ON THE ELIMINATION OF DISCRIMINATION AGAINST WOMEN (CEDAW) ..... 56A.4*(b), 56B.2(a)* CONVENTION ON THE RIGHTS OF THE CHILD (CRC) 47 child labour ..... 64.6*(e)* child offenders 47.7
child soldiers 47.9
education, right to ..... 57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)* food, right to ..... 56C.3*(b)*
health, right to ..... 56B.2*(a)* inter-country adoption ..... 47.10*(b)*
legal representation 47.8
social security ..... 47.4*(c), 56D.6(c)*
water, right to ..... 56B.2*(d)*(ii)
COSTS
access to courts ..... 59.4*(a)*(vii)
Acts challenged by Members of Parliament ..... 4.3*(b)(iii), 6.4(d)*
amicus curiae ..... 5.3*(a)* & (a)(ii), 6.4*(e)*, 8.5
appeals against cost orders ..... 6.6*(b)* as remedies ..... 23B.3*(c)(iii)(cc)* child abduction cases ..... 6.4*(c)* costs to follow results ..... 3.6, 6.2*(a), 6.2(b)*(iii)
deviations
Acts challenged by MPs ..... 4.3*(b)(iii) conduct of the litigation ..... 3.6, 4.3(b)(iii), 6.3(c), 6.7(a)* & (b), 59.4*(a)(vii) criminal matters ..... 6.2(b)(v) inter-governmental disputes ..... 6.2(b)(iv) partial success ..... 6.3(b)* private party loses against state ..... 3.6, 6.2*(b)(i) & (ii) public interest litigation ..... 6.2(b)(iii), 6.3(a), 59.4(a)(vii) settlement offers ..... 6.5(a), 59.4(a)(vii) illegal arrest litigation ..... 23B.3(c)(iii)(cc)* interlocutory applications ..... 6.4*(a)* lower courts cost orders ..... 6.6*(a)* & (b) matters disposed of on papers or without judgment ..... 6.4*(b)* punitive cost awards ..... 4.3*(b)(iii), 6.3(c), 6.7(a)* & (b), 56D.3*(f)(ii) security for ..... 6.5(b), 59.4(a)*(viii) taxation of 6.8

COURTS see also specific courts access to see ACCESS TO COURTS appeal see APPEALS appointment and removal of judges ..... 12.3*(b)(ii), 12.3(d)(i)(bb)* bias see impartiality below contempt of court ..... 42.4, 42.9*(c)(iv), 51.1(a)(iii), 51.5(e)(i), 56D.3(f)*(ii)
costs see COSTS
evidence see EVIDENCE impartiality ..... 12.3*(b)(ii), 51.5(e)(i), 59.4(b)(iii) recusal, test for ..... 59.4(b)(iii) judicial independence ..... 12.3(b)(ii), 12.3(d)(i)(bb), 32.3(e)(ii), 32.4(c)(ii), 51.5(e)(i), 59.4(b)(iii) Constitution 17th Amendment and Superiour Court Bills ..... 2.6(b)* judiciary, pre-eminent domain of ..... 12.3*(d)(i)(aa)*
jurisdiction
ouster clauses ..... 53.1*(b), 59.2(a), 59.4(a), 63.1, 63.4 separation of power not a ..... 12.3(d)(ii)(aa)* special adjudicative bodies as ..... 12.3*(d)(iv) special adjudicative bodies ..... 12.3(d)*(iv)
standing see STANDING, RIPENESS AND MOOTNESS traditional ..... 26.6*(c)(i), 51.5(e)(i), 59.2(b)*
trial see TRIAL CRIMINAL PROCEDURE see also EVIDENCE accused person discharge at the close of the state case ..... 51.5*(j)(ii) & (iii), 54.2(b)(iii) distinction from accused and detained person ..... 51.2, 52.2(c)* rights ..... 51.5*(b)-(o), 52.1-11 accuser, right to confront one's ..... 51.5(k)* alibi, late disclosure of ..... 51.4*(b)(ii), 52.4(b)(ii) appeal, right to ..... 51.5(o)* arrest for the purpose of interrogation 51.2 arrested person see ARRESTED PERSONS, RIGHTS OF ascertainment of bodily features ..... 40.10*(a), 51.1(a)(ii), 52.4(c)*(iii) autrefois convict and autrefois acquit ..... 51.5*(n)*
bail ..... 51.4*(d)*
record of application for ..... 51.5*(j)(iii), 52.6(b)* charge, right to be informed of ..... 51.5*(c)* common law and Constitution ..... 51.1*(b)(iii) common purpose ..... 13.3, 51.1(a)(iii) conditions of detention consistent with human dignity ..... 51.3(c)* confessions and admissions ..... 51.4*(b)(iii), 51.5(iii), 52.4(c)(ii) counsel, right to ..... 51.1(b)(iii), 54.c(i) accused ..... 51.5(h)*
detainee ..... 51.3*(f)*
court, right to trial before ordinary ..... 51.5*(e)(i) cross-examine, right to ..... 51.5(k), 52.6(a)* cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment ..... 51.1*(a)(ii), 51.3(c)* defence, adequate time and facility to prepare ..... 51.5*(d), 52.5 delay, unreasonable ..... 51.1(a)(ii). 51.4(c), 51.5(f)* detained person, rights of see DETAINED PERSONS, RIGHTS OF detention outside criminal procedure sphere ..... 51.2, 52.2*(c)* docket see police docket
double jeopardy ..... 51.5*(n)*
due process, substantive ..... 51.1*(a)*
'due process wall' ..... 40.2*(c), 51.1(a)* equality of arms ..... 51.5*(b)* evidence see also EVIDENCE evidence, right to challenge or adduce ..... 51.5*(k)*, 52.6

fair trial ..... 51.1*(a), 51.5(b)-(n), 52.2(a)* & (c) FC s 12 and s 35, relationship between ..... 51.1*(a)* fingerprinting see ascertainment of bodily features habeas corpus ..... 51.3*(e)* identity parade ..... 51.3*(f), 52.4(c)(iii) innocence, presumption of ..... 51.4(b), 51.5(i), 52.4 interdictum de libero homine exhibendo ..... 51.3(e)* interpreter, right to ..... 51.5*(l)* judicial independence and impartiality ..... 51.5*(e)(i) language rights ..... 51.5(l)*
legal representation right to ..... 51.3*(f), 51.5(h), 52.4(c)* unrepresented person's right to court assistance ..... 51.5*(b), 51.5(d), 51.5(h)*, 52.6
limitation clause ..... 34.1*(a), 34.8(c)(i), (iii) & (v), 51.1(b)(iv) police docket, access to contents of ..... 51.5(c)*, 52.5
preventative detention see DETAINED PERSONS, RIGHTS OF, detention without trial
punishment see SENTENCING reason for being detained, right to be informed of promptly ..... 51.3*(b)* retroactivity ..... 51.5*(m)* reverse onus ..... 34.8*(c)(iii) & (v), 51.1(a)(iii), 51.5(i), 51.5(j)(iii), 52.4(a)(i)- (iii) review ..... 51.5(o)*
s 205 Criminal Procedure Act procedure ..... 52.2*(b)* search and seizure ..... 51.4*(b)(iii) self-incrimination, right against ..... 51.1(a)(ii), 51.1(b)(iii), 54.c(i) accused ..... 51.5(j)(iii) arrested person ..... 51.4(b)*(iii)
detainee ..... 51.3*(f)*
not to assist the state's case, right to ..... 51.1*(a)(ii), 51.4(b)(iii) silence, right to ..... 51.1(a)(iii), 51.1(b)(iii) accused ..... 51.5(j)(ii), 52.4(b)*
detainee ..... 51.3*(f)*
negative interference from ..... 52.4*(b)(ii) speedy trial, right to ..... 51.1(a)(ii). 51.4(c), 51.5(f)* suspect, rights of ..... 51.1*(a)(iii), 51.2, 52.2(c)* trial, right to public ..... 51.5*(e)(ii), 51.5(k)* tried, right to be present when ..... 51.5*(g)* voir dire ..... 51.5*(j)*(iii)
witness
child witness ..... 51.5*(k), 52.6(a)(ii), 52.7(a)(ii), 52.7(b)* cross-examine, right to ..... 51.5*(k), 52.6(a)* witness statements access to by accused ..... 51.5*(c), 51.5(d)*, 52.5
CULTURAL, RELIGIOUS AND LINGUISTIC COMMUNITIES Commission for the Promotion and Protection of ..... 24F.1-4, 58.8*(b)*(iv)
community rights
Final Constitution ..... 58.2*(b)* association, freedom of ..... 44.3*(c)(iii) & (viii), 58.4(a)(vii) beneficiaries ..... 58.4(a)(i) & (ii) culture, right to enjoyment ..... 58.4(a)(iv) language of choice, right to use ..... 36.4(d)(ii), 57.3(c), 58.4(a)(vi) nature of right ..... 58.4(a)(iii) religion, right to practise ..... 58.4(a)(v) Interim Constitution ..... 58.2(a)* international law 58.3
distinction between ..... 58.1*(c)* individual's rights in relation to other members of community 58.5 limitation clauses ..... 34.5*(b)(i), 58.6 schools advancing the ends of ..... 34.3(b), 34.5(b)*(i), 57.4, 58.7

self-determination 58.8
unfair discrimination ..... 58.1*(a)* & (b)
CUSTOMARY LAW
customary marriage ..... 35.5*(g)(iii), 36.5(c), 58.1(b), 64.6(b)(i) interpretation of ..... 31.4(e)(ix) land rights ..... 48.5, 48.7(b)(v)(cc)* traditional leaders ..... 26.6*(d)(i)-(iv) lobola ..... 64.6(b)(i) succession ..... 35.5(g)(viii)(bb), 36.5(c), 58.1(b)* traditional leaders ..... 26.2, 26.6*(a)*, 26.7
traditional leaders see TRADITIONAL LEADERS ukumekeza ..... 36.5*(c), 58.1(b), 64.6(b)(i) DEMOCRACY basic rights clause and ..... 10.3(c), 32.4(c)(i)(cc)* case law ..... 10.5*(c)*
constitutional democracy ..... 10.2*(d), 10.3(e)* constitutional provisions referring to ..... 10.3*(a)-(e)* counter-majoritarian dilemma ..... 10.2*(d), 10.3(c), 12.3(b)(ii), 32.3(e)(iii) deliberative ..... 10.2(c)(iii) direct ..... 10.2(a)* dominant party democracy ..... 17.8*(b), 23B.6(b)(iii) expression, freedom of, and ..... 10.4(a), 10.5(a)* & (b), 42.4, 42.5*(a)* & (b), 42.7*(d)(i), 42.9(c)(iv)(aa)* fair representation of minority parties ..... 10.3*(d)(ii) founding provisions ..... 10.3(b), 13.5(a)* interpretation clause and ..... 10.3*(c), 32.4(c)(i)(ff)* limitations clause and ..... 10.3*(c), 34.8(b), 34.8(e)(i) & (ii) multi-party ..... 10.3(b), 10.3(d)(ii), 13.4, 13.5(a), 17.2(c), 29.3(c)* participatory ..... 10.2*(c)(ii), 10.3(d)(iii), 17.6(a)(i)-(iii), 45.2(d), 45.6 pluralist ..... 10.2(c)(i) political rights and ..... 10.4(b), 10.5(a)* & (b) principle of democracy derivable from Constitution ..... 10.5*(a)* & (b) representative ..... 10.2*(a)* & (b), 10.3*(d)* socio-economic rights and ..... 10.4*(c), 10.5(a)* & (b), 12.3*(d)(ii)(bb)*, 56D.1
substantive rights integral to democracy 10.4
DETAINED PERSONS, RIGHTS OF see also ARRESTED PERSONS, CRIMINAL PROCEDURE and FREEDOM AND SECURITY OF THE PERSON adequate accommodation ..... 33.8, 51.3*(c), 55.8 awaiting trial ..... 51.3(c)*
bail ..... 51.4*(d)*
communication rights ..... 51.3*(d)* conditions of detention ..... 33.8, 51.3*(c),* 55.8, 51.3*(c), 56B.2(a), 56B.4(c)(i) counsel, right to ..... 51.3(f)* cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment . 36.4*(c)(iii), 40.7(a)-(c), 49.2(c)* & (d)(i)-(iv), 49.3*(a), 51.1(a)(ii), 51.3(c)* damages for unlawful detention ..... 51.3*(g)* debtor's prison ..... 36.4*(c)(iii), 40.3(c)(ii) detained, meaning of ..... 40.4(a), 52.2(c)* detention outside criminal procedure sphere ..... 40.3*(d)*, 51.2
detention without trial ..... 40.4, 51.4*(d), 61.4(c)* distinction from accused and arrested persons ..... 51.2, 52.2*(c)* education, further ..... 57.2*(b)(ii)(bb)*
habeas corpus ..... 51.3*(e)*

language rights ..... 51.3*(a), 65.6 lawfulness of detention, right to challenge ..... 51.3(e), 51.3(f)* medical treatment ..... 33.8, 51.3*(c), 55.8, 56A.2(a)* prison labour ..... 64.6*(f)*
reading material ..... 51.3*(c)* reason for being detained, right to be informed of ..... 51.3*(b)* religion, freedom of ..... 41.4*(a)* remedies ..... 51.3*(g)*
ship detention ..... 51.3*(b)* & (c) states of emergency ..... 64.1*(c)* terminal illness ..... 51.3*(c)* visitation rights ..... 51.3*(d)* vote, right to ..... 29.2*(b), 34.8(c)(ii), 45.10(b)(iii), 49.3(a)* water, right to ..... 51.3*(c), 56B.2(a), 56B.4(c)*(i) DIGNITY abortion see also ABORTION ..... 36.4*(c)*(ii), 37.2, 37.8
actio injuriarum ..... 36.3, 36.4*(h)(iii) as first and second order rule ..... 36.3(a)* & (b) as value ..... 10.3*(c), 10.5(b), 11.1(c), 13.3, 36.3(d)*
children
corporal punishment ..... 36.4*(c)(iii), 36.4(d)(i), 49.2(d)(ii), 58.1(b), 58.4(a)(i) collective good, dignity as ..... 36.2(e)*
cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment . 36.4*(c)(iii), 40.7(a)-(c), 49.2(c)* & (d)(i)-(iv), 49.3*(a), 51.1(a)(ii), 51.3(c)*
customary law
succession ..... 36.5*(c), 58.1(b)* death penalty ..... 36.4*(c)(iii) defamation ..... 36.4(h)(iii), 42.9(a)* environmental rights ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(aa)(w)* equality and ..... 35.1*(d)(i), 36.2(b), 36.3(b)* & (c), 36.4*(a)* & (i), 36.5*(a)(ii) expression, freedom of ..... 10.4(a), 36.4(h), 42.4, 42.8(c)(i), 42.9(a)* freedom and ..... 36.2*(c), 36.5(a)(ii) housing and ..... 34.8(c)(i), 36.4(i), 55.5(a)* imprisonment ..... 36.4*(c)(iii) inherent dignity ..... 36.2(a)* movement and residence, freedom of ..... 66.1*(d)(i) pornography ..... 36.4(e), 36.4(h)(i) privacy ..... 36.4(e), 36.4(h)(iii) prostitution ..... 34.8(e)(iii)(bb), 36.4(f)* & (g) relationship with other rights 36.3, 36.4
slavery ..... 36.2, 36.4*(g), 64.4(a), 36.4(g)* social security ..... 36.3*(d), 36.4(g)* & (i), 56D.3*(e)* & (f) socio-economic rights ..... 36.4(i) theory of ..... 36.2*(a)-(f)* trafficking ..... 34.8*(e)(iii)(bb), 36.4(g)* transformation and 36.5
ubuntu ..... 34.8*(e)(ii)(bb)(x), 36.1, 36.2(e), 36.4(d)(ii), 36.5(c), 48.4 vote, right to ..... 10.3(b)*
DIPLOMATIC PROTECTION see INTERNATIONAL LAW ECONOMIC ACTIVITY see TRADE, OCCUPATION AND PROFESSION, FREEDOM OF ECUADOR
water, right to ..... 56B.2*(d)*
EDUCATION
Adult Basic Education ..... 57.2*(a)(iii) basic education ..... 33.8, 57.2(a)* access, denial of ..... 57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(bbb)(xx)* disabled learners ..... 57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(ddd) free ..... 57.2(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(bbb)(yy)* international & comparative law ..... 57.2*(a)(ii) progressive realization, not subject to ..... 57.2(a)(i)(bb)* school fees ..... 57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(y)(bbb)(yy)* further education ..... 57.2*(b)* affirmative action admission policies ..... 57.2*(b)(ii)(bb)* language received in 57.3, 57.4, 58.7 public educational facilities access to, comparative law ..... 54.2*(b)* schools independent admission and exclusion ..... 35.5*(g)(vi), 57.4, 58.7(a)* furthering ends of cultural, religious or independent community ..... 57.4, 58.7*(a)* primary Primary School Feeding Programme ..... 56C.3*(b)(iii)(bb)* single-medium ..... 58.4*(a)(i), 58.7(b)* independent 57.4

public 57.3
water, right to ..... 56B.4*(c)*(i) ELECTIONS
call for ..... 29.3*(a)*
citizenship 45.7
civil servants ..... 45.10*(c)* deposit requirement ..... 10.3*(b), 45.7, 45.8(a)* Electoral Court 29.8, 45.4
electoral system municipal councils ..... 22.2*(b)(iii), 29.6(a)* national legislature ..... 29.3*(c)* provincial legislature ..... 29.3*(b)* franchise, history of ..... 45.2*(a)* free, fair and regular, right to 29.1, 45.9 gerrymandering ..... 45.10*(b)(i) identification documents ..... 10.4(b), 29.2(a), 45.5(b)*, 45.9
Independent Electoral Commission ..... 45.2*(f), 45.4, 45.5(b), 45.8(a), 45.8(c)(ii), 45.9 composition ..... 29.7(b)* function ..... 29.7*(a), 45.9 independence ..... 12.3(b)(iii), 29.7(c)* nature of ..... 14.3*(b)*(ii)
multi-party democracy ..... 10.3*(b), 13.4, 13.5(a), 17.2(c), 29.3(c)* municipal councils 29.6
national legislature 29.2, 29.3
political party see POLITICAL PARTIES proportional representation see also POLITICAL PARTIES, floor-crossing ..... 22.2*(b)(iii), 29.3(b)*, (c) & (f), 29.6*(a), 45.10(a)(iii) provincial legislature 29.2, 29.3 public office, right to stand for elections to ..... 45.10(c)* review standard in electoral cases ..... 10.4*(b), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 45.5(a)* & (b) secret vote ..... 45.10*(b)(ii) setting aside an election ..... 45.5(c)*
vote, right to active ..... 45.10*(b)* beneficiaries ..... 31.1*(c)*, 45.7
exclusions ..... 45.10*(b)*(iii)
dignity and ..... 10.3*(b)*
equal ..... 45.10*(b)(i) mentally-handicapped citizens ..... 29.2(a), 45.2(d), 45.10(b)(iii) passive ..... 45.10(c)* positive obligations on state ..... 45.5*(b)*

on third parties 45.3
prisoners ..... 29.2*(b), 45.10(b)(iii) voter registration ..... 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 29.2(a), 45.5(b)*, 45.9
ELECTRICITY
basic municipal service, as important ..... 56B.5*(b)(i) comparative law ..... 56B.2(a)* detained persons, right of 33.8
disconnection ..... 56B.4*(c)(i), 56B.5(b)*(i) ENVIRONMENTAL RIGHTS
access to information ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(bb)(x)* acid drainage ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(ee)(y)(3) administrative justice ..... 50.3(b)(ii)(bb)(y), 50.4(e), 50.4(h)(ii)(aa)* African instruments ..... 50.2*(c)* air quality ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(ee)(y)(8), 50.3(b)(iii) beneficiaries ..... 50.3(b)(i), 50(4)(c)* conservation area ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(bb)(y), 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(y)(6), 50.3(b)(ii)(aa)(z)* constitutional rights, related ..... 50.3*(b)(ii) criminal offences ..... 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(z), 50.4(h)(ii)(cc)* damages ..... 50.4*(h)(i), 50.4(h)(ii)(ee), 50.4(h)(ii)(ff)* environment, meaning of ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(aa)* environmental disputes alternative dispute resolution ..... 50.4*(a)* costs ..... 50.4*(h)(ii)(hh)*
remedies ..... 50.4*(b)*
standing ..... 50.4*(b)*
environmental impact assessment ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(dd)(x)(2), 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(z)* foreign law ..... 50.4*(g)* health ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(bb)(x) horizontal application ..... 50.3(b)(i)(cc), 50.4(c)* integrated environmental management ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(ee)(z)* inter-generational and intra-generational equity ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(cc), 50.3(b)(i)(dd)(x) interdicts ..... 50.4(h)(ii)(bb)*
Interim Constitution ..... 50.3*(a)* international law ..... 50.2*(a)-(c), 50.3(b)(i)(dd)(x), 50.4(f)* legislation ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(ee)(y)* legislative competence in respect of ..... 50.3*(b)(iii) limitation ..... 50.4(d)* link to other rights ..... 50.3*(b)*(i) litigation see environmental disputes above
Marine Living Resources Act 18 of 1998 ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(ee)(y)*(4)
National Environmental Management Act 73 of 1998 ..... 50.3*(b), 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(y)(1), 50.4 retrospective effect ..... 50.3(b)(i)(bb)(x) neighbour rights ..... 50.3(b)(i)(bb)*(x)& (y), 50.3*(b)(ii)(aa)(u)* noise pollution ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(bb)(x) reasonableness ..... 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(w)* & (x) socio-economic development ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(dd)* sustainable development, ecologically ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(dd)* traditional leaders and ..... 26.6*(d)(ii) triple bottom line analysis ..... 50.3(b)(i)(dd)(y)* waste ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(ee)(y)(9) water quality ..... 50.3(b)(i)(ee)(y)(3) well-being ..... 50.3(b)(i)(bb)(y)*

EQUALITY
as pre-eminent constitutional value ..... 36.4*(a)* Commission for Gender Equality 24D.1-6, 33.13 dignity and ..... 35.1*(d)(i), 36.2(b), 36.3(b)* & (c), 36.4*(a)* & (i), 36.5*(a)(ii) disadvantaged groups ..... 35.4(d)(i) discrimination, unfair context ..... 35.5(h)*
direct, indirect ..... 35.5*(c)* grounds of intersectional and multiple ..... 35.5*(f)* ito s 9(3) ..... 35.5*(g)(i)-(v) unlisted ..... 35.5(e)*
religion, freedom of ..... 41.4*(c)* test ito s 9(2) ..... 35.4*(d)* test ito s 9(3) ..... 34.5*(b)(ii), 35.5(a)*, (b), (h) & (i), 35.7, 36.4*(a)* application of ..... 35.5*(j)* environmental rights ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(aa)(u)* formal ..... 35.1*(c)*
gender equality see GENDER EQUALITY
horizontal application ..... 35.3*(f), 35.4(d), 35.6 legal process, in the ..... 35.3(c)* & (d) limitation analysis ..... 34.5*(b)(ii), 35.3(b)* & (d), 35.4*(g), 35.5(i) burden of justification ..... 34.5(a)*, 35.6
movement and residence, freedom of ..... 66.1*(d)(ii) Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 (PEPUDA) . 35.8 association, freedom of ..... 44.1(c)(vi), 44.2(b)* hate speech ..... 42.8*(c)(iv)(cc)*
HIV status ..... 35.5*(e), 35.5(g)(vii), 35.5(h)(iii), 35.5(i), 36.4(a)* & (i), 40.8*(a), 53.2(c)* independent school admission policies 57.4 rationality test 35.3
remedial measures 35.4
reproductive rights ..... 35.5*(g)*(ii), 37.4
same-sex relationships see SAME-SEX RELATIONSHIPS social security ..... 56D.3*(e), 56D.7 substantive ..... 35.1(c)* as value ..... 35.1*(d)(ii) remedial measures ..... 35.4(a)* unfair discrimination ..... 35.5*(h)* vote, right to ..... 45.10*(b)(i) water, right to ..... 56B.4(g)*
EUROPEAN CONVENTION FOR THE PROTECTION OF HUMAN RIGHTS AND FUNDAMENTAL FREEDOMS see also EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS accused and or detained, rights of ..... 51.1*(a)(ii) & (iv), 51.2, 51.3(a)*, (c), (g) & (m)
torture 40.6
EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS
abortion 37.2, 37.11
adequately accessible law ..... 34.7*(c)(ii)(dd)* forced labour ..... 64.4*(c), 64.6(g)* & (h)
labour relations
closed shop agreements ..... 53.3*(b)* legal representation, right to ..... 59.4*(b)(i) liberty, deprivation of ..... 40.3(b)*
life, right to ..... 39.6, 49.3*(a)* religion, freedom of ..... 41.3*(b)*
sentencing ..... 49.3*(b)*
cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment ..... 40.7*(a)(ii) death penalty ..... 49.3(a)*

speech, freedom of commercial speech ..... 42.9*(f)*
contempt of court ..... 42.9*(c)*
hate speech ..... 42.8*(c)*
journalistic privilege ..... 42.7*(d)(ii)(aa)*
pornography ..... 42.9*(e)*
sub judice rule ..... 42.9*(c)(iv)(bb)*
state immunity ..... 30.4*(c)* states of emergency ..... 61.3*(b), 61.4(a)* torture 40.6
EVICTION 55.6
common law and ..... 33.11*(c), 55.6(a)-(c), 56C.3(b)(ii)(bb)*
Extension of Security of Tenure Act 62 of 1997 (ESTA) see also LAND RIGHTS ..... 48.7*(b)(iv)(ff)-(hh), 55.6(b)(i), 56C.3(b)(ii)(bb)*
international law ..... 55.6*(d)* labour tenants ..... 48.6*(b)(i)(bb)* legal representation, right to ..... 48.6*(b)(i)(bb), 48.7(b)(iv)(dd)*
Prevention of Illegal Eviction from and Unlawful Occupation of Land Act 19 of 1998 (PIE) ..... 55.6*(a)*, (b)(ii) & (c), 56C.3*(b)(ii)(bb)* food, right to ..... 56C.3*(b)(aa)*
water, right to ..... 56B.3*(a)*
EVIDENCE see also CRIMINAL PROCEDURE
alibi, late disclosure of ..... 51.4*(b)(ii), 52.4(b)*(ii)
Brandeis brief 52.8
cautionary rule ..... 51.5*(i), 52.7(a), 52.7(a)* civil proceedings ..... 52.2*(b), 52.3, 52.4(a)(ii), 52.7(a)* & (b), 52.9, 52.10*(f)* complainant, character of ..... 52.7*(d)*
Constitutional Court Rules, rule 31 ..... 52.8 cross-examination ..... 52.6*(a)* derivative evidence ..... 51.4*(b)(iii), 52.10(b)* entrapment ..... 52.10*(d)*
evidentiary burden ..... 52.4*(a)*(iii) fair trial
beginning of right ..... 52.2*(c)* substantive fairness ..... 52.2*(a)* hearsay ..... 52.6*(a)*(i) limitation 52.11
presumption of innocence 52.4 presumption, mandatory ..... 52.4*(a)(iii) previous consistent statement ..... 52.7(c)* prima facie, uncontradicted ..... 52.4*(b)(ii) privilege informer's ..... 51.5(c), 52.6(d)* professional 52.9
state ..... 52.6*(c)*
reasonable doubt ..... 52.4*(a)*(i)-(iii) sexual offence cases 52.7
trial-within-a-trial ..... 51.10*(e)* unconstitutionally obtained evidence ..... 51.5*(b)*, 52.10
witness access to ..... 52.5, 52.6*(d)* child ..... 51.5*(k), 52.6(a)(ii), 52.7(a)(ii), 52.7(b)* competent ..... 52.7*(b)*
cross-examination ..... 51.5*(k), 52.6(a)* hostile ..... 52.6*(a)(iii) statements, access to ... 51.5(c), 51.5(d)*, 52.5

EXPRESSION, FREEDOM OF
academic freedom ... 42.7*(f)*
access to information ... 23B.5*(c)(ii), 42.9(g)(ii)(dd)*
advertising see commercial speech below artistic creativity, freedom of ... 42.7*(e)* audience autonomy ... 42.5*(b)* beneficiaries ... 42.6*(a)* censorship ... 42.9*(e), 42.9(h)* commercial speech ... 42.4, 42.9*(f)(i) & (ii) common-law limitations to ... 42.9(a)* communication, means of alternative ... 42.7*(g)(ii) monopolies ... 42.7(g)(i) state support for ... 42.7(g)(iii) contempt of court ... 42.9(c)*(iv) copyright see intellectual property below court papers ... 42.9*(c)(i) proceedings broadcasting ... 42.9(c)*(iii)
in camera ... 42.9*(c)(i), 42.9(g)*(iii)
defamation ... 36.4*(h)(iii), 42.9(a)* democracy and ... 10.4*(a), 42.4, 42.5(a)* & (b), 42.7*(d)(i), 42.9(c)(iv)(aa)* dignity and ... 10.4*(a), 36.4(h), 42.4, 42.8(c)(i), 42.9(a)* environmental demonstrations ... 50.3*(b)(ii)(bb)(x) exclusion, s 16(2) closed list ... 42.3 fair dealings, use ... 42.9(d)(ii) fair trial ... 42.9(c)*
Films and Publications Act 65 of 1996 ... 42.8*(a), 42.8(b), 42.8(c)(iv)(bb)*
pornography ... 42.9*(e)*
prior restraint ... 42.9*(h)(ii) freedom to receive ... 42.7(b)* gag orders see prior restraint hate speech ... 10.4*(a), 36.4(h)(ii), 42.8(c)* high value and low value speech ... 42.4, 42.5, 42.9*(e)(iii) horizontal application ... 42.2, 42.6(b)*
ICASA ... 42.7*(g)(iii) ideas and information ... 42.7(c)* incitement of imminent violence ... 42.8*(b)* to cause harm ... 42.8*(c)(ii)(cc)* intellectual property ... 42.7*(c), 42.9(d)* internet access to ... 42.7*(g)(iv) domain name disputes ... 42.7(g)*(iv) journalistic privilege see media below legislature, speech in the ... 42.10 limitation, general clause ... 34.4, 34.8*(c)*(i) & (iii), 42.3, 42.4 marketplace of ideas theory ... 42.5 media see also prior restraint broadcasting of proceedings ... 42.9*(c)*(iii)
defamation ... 36.4*(h)(iii), 42.9(a)* pre- and post-publication relief ... 42.9*(a)(vii) journalistic privilege ... 42.7(d)(ii) privacy ... 38.2, 42.9(b)*

public interest defence
copyright law ..... 42.9*(d)*(ii)
defamation ..... 42.8*(c)(iv)(cc), 42.9(a)(vi) privacy ..... 38.2(c)(i), 42.9(b)(ii) role of ..... 10.4(a), 42.5(b)* press exceptionalism ..... 42.7*(d)(i) national security ..... 23B.5(c)(ii), 42.9(c)(i), 42.9(g)*
nude dancing ..... 42.9*(e)*(v)
open justice principle ..... 23B.5*(c)(ii), 42.9(c)(i) Parliament, in ..... 38.2(c)(i)(dd), 42.4 provincial legislature ..... 19.7(c)* parody ..... 42.7*(c), 42.9(d)(i) political speech ..... 42.5(b), 42.9(a)* pornography see sexually explicit expression below press, freedom of the see media above prior restraint ..... 38.2*(b)(ii), 42.9(a)(vii), 42.9(b)(ii), 42.9(c)(iv)(bb), 42.9(b)* privacy ..... 36.4*(h)(iii), 42.9(b)* court proceedings ..... 42.9*(c)(i) & (iii) propaganda for war ..... 42.8(a)*
public interest defence
copyright law ..... 42.9*(d)*(ii)
defamation ..... 42.8*(c)(iv)(cc), 42.9(a)(vi) privacy ..... 38.2(c)(i)(aa), 42.9(b)(ii) Protection of Information Act ..... 42.9(g)(i)(cc)*
rationale 42.5
reproductive rights 37.11
restrictions 42.9
SABC see also MEDIA ..... 42.7*(g)(iii) broadcasting of proceedings ..... 42.9(c)(iii) scientific research, freedom of ..... 42.7(f)* sexually explicit expression ..... 10.4*(a), 36.4(h)(i), 42.9(e)*
sub judice rule ..... 42.4, 42.9*(c)(iv)(bb)* trademark dilution see intellectual property above truth for the public interest or benefit ..... 38.2*(c)(i), 42.8(c)(iv)(cc), 42.9(a)(vi) proof of in defamation ..... 42.9(a)(v) pursuit of as rationale ..... 42.5(a)*
EXPROPRIATION see PROPERTY
EXTRADITION
access to courts ..... 59.3*(a)(iii), 59.4(c)(i) citizenship ..... 31.6(b)*, 60.6
extraterritorial effect of Bill of Rights ..... 31.6*(a)* & (b) international law ..... 18.3*(k), 30.4(e), 32.5(c)(v)(aa)* movement and residence, freedom of ..... 66.1*(b)*(v) FAMILY see also CHILDREN and SAME-SEX RELATIONSHIPS domestic violence ..... 35.5*(g)(ii)(bb), 37.5, 44.3(c)(ii) family life, right to ..... 47.3(b), 48.7(b)(iv)(dd)* family law, religious ..... 41.1*(c)(i), 41.6, 64.6(b)(ii) meaning and types ..... 35.5(g)(v)(aa)* & (cc), 44.3*(c)(ii) & (x), 47.3(a), 55.4(b)*(iv)
FLOOR-CROSSING see POLITICAL PARTIES FOOD, RIGHT TO accessability ..... 56C.2*(a)* availability ..... 56C.2*(a)* case law ..... 56C.3*(b)(ii)(aa), 56C.3(b)(iii)(bb)* comparative law ..... 56C.3*(b)(iii)(bb)*
environmental right ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(aa)(y)*

eviction and ..... 56C.3*(b)(ii)(bb)*
Final Constitution 56C.3
food security household ..... 56C.2*(a), 56C.3(b)(iii)(bb)* national ..... 56C.2*(a), 56C.3(b)(iii)(bb)* government programmes and grants ..... 56C.3*(b)(iii)(bb)* Integrated Food Security Strategy for South Africa ..... 56C.3*(b)(iii) international law ..... 56C.2, 56C.3(b)* legislation ..... 56C.3*(b)(i)(aa), 56C.3(b)(ii)(aa)* Marine Living Resources Act 18 of 1998 ..... 56C.3*(b)(aa)* relationship with other rights ..... 56C.3*(b)* no access to basic essential levels ..... 56C.3*(b)(iii)(bb)* price regulation ..... 56C.3*(b)(ii)(aa)* progressive realisation and reasonableness ..... 56C.3*(a), 56C.3(b)(iii) retrogressive measures ..... 56C.3(b)(iii)(cc)*
FOREIGNERS see IMMIGRATION and APPLICATION, non-citizens
FRANCE
water, right to ..... 56B.2*(d)*(iii), (iv)
FREEDOM AND SECURITY OF THE PERSON
'due process wall' ..... 40.2*(c), 51.1(a)*
abortion see ABORTION
bodily and psychological integrity, right to 40.8 comparative law ..... 40.1*(a)(i) corporal punishment ..... 40.7(a)(ii), 40.7(b)(i)(aa)* cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment see also DIGNITY ..... 40.7*(a)-(c)* debtor's prison ..... 40.3*(c)(ii) deprivation arbitrary ..... 40.3(c)(i) just cause ..... 40.3(c)(ii) meaning of ..... 40.3(b)* detention without trial ..... 40.4, 52.2*(b)* dignity and ..... 36.4*(c)(i), 40.1(b)(ii) freedom, meaning of ..... 40.1(b)(i) Interim Constitution ..... 40.1(a)(i), 40.1(b)(i) lethal force, police use of ..... 39.5(a), 40.5(c), 43.2(b), 23B.3(c)(i) liberal theory, and ..... 40.1(b)*
liberty, deprivation of ..... 40.3*(b)* liberty, negative ..... 40.1*(b)(i), 40.1(b)(i)(aa)* life imprisonment ..... 40.7*(b)(i)(bb)* mandatory minimum sentences ..... 40.7*(b)(ii)(aa)* medical or scientific experiments, right not to be subjected to 40.11 consent informed ..... 40.11*(b)*
unable to ..... 40.11*(c)*
proportionality ..... 40.3*(c)(ii)(cc)* reproductive rights see also REPRODUCTIVE RIGHTS 37.5, 40.9
s 12(1) and it subsections, relationship between ..... 40.2*(a)-(b)* security in and control over one's body, right to 40.10
sexual violence against women ..... 23B.3(iii) substantive due process doctrine ..... 40.1*(b)(i)(bb)* torture ..... 40.1*(a)(i) & (ii), 40.6(a)* &(b), 40.7*(b)(i)(cc)* violence, right to be free from all forms of vertical application ..... 40.5*(b)* violence, meaning of ..... 40.5*(a)*
GENDER EQUALITY
Commission for Gender Equality 24D.1-6, 33.13

Constitutional Court jurisprudence ..... 35.5*(g)(ii)(dd)* land rights ..... 48.5, 48.7*(b)(v)(dd)* male primogeniture ..... 32.3*(e)(iii), 35.5(g)(viii)(bb), 36.5(c), 58.1(b)* meaning of 24D.4
Muslim law 41.6
Parliament, composition of ..... 32.1*(c)*
SAHRC and ..... 24C.3*(c)(ii) traditional leaders ..... 26.1, 26.5(b)(i), 26.6(a)* women voters ..... 29.3*(c)*
GENEVA CONVENTIONS
non-South African detainees ..... 61.4*(c)*
water, right to ..... 56B.2*(a)*
GERMANY
access to courts ..... 59.2*(d)* assembly, freedom of ..... 43.1, 43.2*(b)(ii), 43.3(a)(i)(aa)-(bb)*
co-operative government 14.2
Constitutional Court
constitutional interpretation ..... 32.3*(c)(i) jurisdiction ..... 4.1, 4.2(a), 4.3(b), 4.3(b)(ii)(aa)* & (bb) constitutional order, rights regarding ..... 45.2*(e)*
delegation of legislative authority ..... 12.3*(d)(iii) food, right to ..... 56C.3(b)(ii)(bb)* fundamental rights theories ..... 32.3*(c)*(i)
labour relations
closed shop agreements ..... 53.3*(b)*
life, right to 37.2
local government ..... 22.1*(b)* movement, freedom of ..... 60.1*(b)(v) objective value system ..... 11.4(c), 13.3 political parties ..... 45.2(e)* religion, freedom of ..... 41.2*(d), 41.3(b)*
sentencing
dignity ..... 49.3*(a)* life sentence ..... 49.2*(d)* proportionality ..... 49.2*(c)* separation of powers ..... 12.3*(d)(i)(aa)* trade, occupation and profession, freedom of ..... 54.2*(b)*
vote, right to ..... 45.2*(e)*
GOVERNMENT see also NATIONAL EXECUTIVE assets, transitional provisions regarding 28.3
executive authority, transitional provisions regarding 28.2 Government of National Unity ..... 18.3*(a)* provinces
interaction with 20.4
public administration see also ADMINISTRATIVE LAW
legislation 23A.3
meaning of 23A.1
public service 23A.8
Public Service Commission ..... 23A.6 & 7 public finance see PUBLIC FINANCE public procurement see PUBLIC PROCUREMENT revenue-raising power ..... 27.2*(b)*
GRANTS see SOCIAL SECURITY HEALTH, RIGHT TO available resources, existing ..... 33.5*(c), 56A.2(a), 56A.2(b)(vi)(bb), 56A.4(f)(ii) beneficiaries ..... 56A.2(c)*

case law 56A.2
critique ..... 33.5*(e)(iii), 56A.3 inefficient remedies ..... 56A.3(f)* no protection of fundamental interests of individuals ..... 33.5*(e)(iii), 56A.3(c)* & (d) children ..... 33.7, 47.4*(b)-(d), 56A.2(a), 56A.3(b), 56A.4(b)* & (e) chronic illnesses, treatment for the purpose of prolonging life ... 33.5*(c), 56A.2(a), 56A.2(b)(vi)(bb), 56A.2(e)(ii) emergency treatment ..... 33.5(c), 56A.2(e)* giving content to ..... 56A.4*(e)*
HIV, anti-retroviral treatment see also HIV ..... 56A.2*(a), 56A.3(a)*, (b) & (f), 56A.5
interdependent rights 56A.2
international law 56A.4
minimum core ..... 33.5*(e)(iii), 56A.4(b)* & (c) limitations ..... 56A.2*(d)* minimum core and pragmatic minimum threshold ..... 33.5*(e)(iii), 56A.4(c)*
and progressive realisation ..... 33.5*(e)(ii), 56A.4(d)*
National Health Act 61 of 2003 ..... 56A.4*(e)* progressive realisation ..... 56A.2*(b)(vi), 56A.4(d)* reasonableness ..... 33.5*(b), 33.5(f)(iii), 56A.2(b)(vii) problems with ..... 33.5(e)(iii), 33.5(f)(iv), 56A.3(a)-(d)*
reproductive rights 37.4, 37.9

HIGH COURT common law development, stare decisis ..... 31.4*(e)(x)(aa)* & (bb) resolving conflicting decisions ..... 7.4*(c)*

HIV/AIDS
as disability ..... 35.5*(g)(vii), 40.8(a), 56D.5(c)*(ii), 56D.7
discrimination on grounds of ..... 35.5*(e), 35.5(g)(vii), 35.5(h)(iii), 35.5(i), 36.4(a)* & (i), 40.8*(a), 53.2(c)* mother to child transmission prevention ..... 32.3*(b)(iii), 33.5(b), 33.5(e(ii), 33.5(f)(iii), 33.5(g), 56A.2(a), 56A.3(a)*, (b) & (f) status, non-consensual disclosure of ..... 40.8*(b)* test, informed consent ..... 40.11*(b)*

HOUSING
access to adequate ..... 33.5*(d), 55.5(a)* available resources ..... 55.3*(b), 55.5(c)* backlog ..... 55.4*(b)(ii) children ..... 33.5(e)(i), 33.7, 47.4, 55.7 dignity and ..... 34.8(c)(i), 36.4(i), 55.5(a)* environmental right ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(aa)(x) Grootboom order ..... 33.5(f)(ii), 55.3(a)* reasonableness criteria ..... 33.5*(f)(ii), 55.3(c), 55.4(a)* Housing Act 107 of 1997 ..... 55.2*(b)*
Housing Code ..... 55.2*(b), 55.4(b)(ii), (iv), (v), 55.5(a)* informal settlements and backyard shacks ..... 55.4*(c)(iii) international law ..... 32.5(c)(v)(aa), 55.5 legislation ..... 55.2, 55.4(b)*
long term viability ..... 55.4*(b)(ii) minimum core ..... 33.5(e)(i), 55.5(d)* policy 55.2, 55.4
reasonableness ..... 55.4*(b)* adopting measures ..... 54.4*(b)(i) balanced and flexible ..... 54.4(b)(iii) clear and efficient assignment of functions ..... 54.4(b)(v) implementation ..... 54.4(b)(ii) not exclude significant segments of society ..... 54.4(b)(iv) private sector involvement ..... 33.5(d), 55.4(c)(ii), 55.2(b), 55.4(d)*

progressive realisation ..... 55.5*(b)*
scope of right 55.3
secure tenure ..... 55.2*(b), 55.4(b)(iii) social housing ..... 55.4(b)(ii), 55.4(d)* subsidy ..... 55.2*(b), 55.4(b)(iii) sustainable human settlements ..... 55.4(c)*
ICASA (Independent Communications Authority of South Africa) 24E.1-4 Broadcasting Monitoring and Complaints Committee ..... 12.3*(d)(iv), 59.4(c)(vi) expression, freedom of ..... 42.7(g)*(iii)
Independent Broadcasting Authority 24E.2
IMMIGRATION immigrants access to courts ..... 59.4*(c)(iv) equality ..... 35.5(e), 51.3(c)* illegal immigrants, detention of ..... 9.4*(b)(ii), 40.2(a), 40.3(c)(ii)(cc), 40.4(c), 56A.2(c), 51.3(b)*, (c) & (e), 64.6*(a)* permanent residents ..... 34.5*(b)(ii), 35.5(e), 56A.2(c), 56D.3(f)(i), 60.3, 66.1(b)*(ii) immigration law, locus standi ..... 7.2*(c)(i) movement and residence, freedom of ..... 66.1(a)(iv) social security ..... 34.5(b)(ii), 56D.3(f)(i), 56D.4(d), 56D.5(c)*(iv)
INDEPENDENT COMMUNICATIONS AUTHORITY OF SOUTH AFRICA see ICASA INDEPENDENT ELECTORAL COMMISSION see ELECTIONS INDIA
basic structure doctrine ..... 17.5*(g)*
co-operative government 14.2
equality, disadvantaged groups ..... 35.4*(d)* food, right to ..... 56C.3*(b)(iii)(bb)* forced labour ..... 64.4*(c)*
life, right to 39.8
local government ..... 22.1*(b)*
socio-economic rights ..... 33.4*(d), 33.5(c), 56B.2(d), 56C.3(b)(iii)(bb)* water, right to ..... 56B.2*(d)*
INDONESIA
water, right to ..... 56B.2*(d)(iii), 56B.3(b)(iii)(bb)*
INTELLIGENCE SERVICES see NATIONAL SECURITY INTERNATIONAL COVENANT ON CIVIL AND POLITICAL RIGHTS (ICCPR)
access to courts ..... 59.2*(c)*
amnesty for acts of torture ..... 30.4*(c)* conscientious objection ..... 64.6*(b)* expression, freedom of ..... 42.2, 42.8*(a)* hate speech ..... 42.8*(c)*(i)
housing ..... 55.5 & 6
life, right to 39.1
minority rights ..... 58.3*(b)(i), 58.4(a)(i) political rights ..... 45.2(d)*
propaganda for war ..... 42.8*(a)* religion, freedom of ..... 41.1*(c)(iii), 41.2(b)(iii) slavery and servitude ..... 64.5(c)* states of emergency ..... 61.3*(b)* vote, right to ..... 45.2*(d)*
water, right to ..... 56B.5*(a)*(iii)
INTERNATIONAL COVENANT ON ECONOMIC, SOCIAL AND CULTURAL RIGHTS (ICESCR) education ..... 57.2*(a)*(ii)

food, right to 56C.2
health, right to ..... 56A.3*(b)*
General Comment 14/minimum core ..... 56A.4*(b)* housing ..... 33.4*(c)*, 55.5
eviction, General Comment 7 ..... 55.6*(d)*
General Comment 3 ..... 55.5*(d)*
General Comment 4 ..... 33.5*(d), 55.5(a)* non-binding interpretative aid ..... 33.4*(c)* progressive realisation ..... 33.4*(c), 56A.2(b)(vi) social security ..... 56D.6(b)*
water, General Comment 15 ..... 56B.2
INTERNATIONAL LABOUR ORGANISATION (ILO) child labour ..... 64.5*(b)* forced labour ..... 64.4*(c), 64.5(b)*
labour relations 53.1-6
social security ..... 56D.2, 56D.6*(a)*
INTERNATIONAL LAW
access to courts ..... 59.2*(c)*
anti-corruption fight and ..... 17.5*(b), 23B.6(b)(iv) application of the Constitution ..... 31.6(b)*
community rights 58.3
customary international law ..... 30.1*(b)(ii), 30.2(a)* definition ..... 30.1*(a)(i) diplomatic protection ..... 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 18.3(k), 30.4(d), 31.6(b), 32.5(c)(v)(aa)*, 60.3, 60.6
education ..... 57.2*(a)(ii) environmental rights and disputes ..... 50.2(a)-(c), 50.3(b)(i)(dd)(x), 50.4(f)* erga omnes obligations ..... 30.1*(b)(iii) eviction ..... 55.6(d)*
extradition see EXTRADITION food, right to ..... 56C.2, 56C.3*(b)* health, right to 56A.4 housing ..... 32.5*(c)(v)(aa), 55.5 immunity diplomatic ..... 30.4(b)*
state officials ..... 30.4*(b)*
International Criminal Court ..... 30.4*(a), 30.4(c)* interpretation aid, as ..... 3.3*(e), 13.2(a), 30.3, 32.5(v) & (v)(aa), 33.4(c)* reciprocal effect ..... 31.6*(b)* jus cogens ..... 30.1*(b)(iii) prohibition on torture ..... 30.4(c), 40.6 national security ..... 30.4(a), 61.3(b)*
political rights ..... 45.2*(d)*
religion, belief and opinion, freedom of ..... 41.1*(c)*(iii) slavery 64.5
social security ..... 56D.6*(a)-(e)* treaties ..... 18.3*(k), 30.1(b)(i), 30.2(b)* UN resolutions ..... 30.2*(c)*
water and sanitation, right to ..... 56B.2, 56B.5*(a)* IRELAND
abortion 37.2, 37.10, 37.11
JAPAN
school textbooks ..... 57.2*(a)(ii)(aa)(y)*(ccc)
trade, occupation and profession, freedom of ..... 54.2*(b)*
JUDICIAL INDEPENDENCE see COURTS
JUDICIAL SERVICES COMMISSION ..... 12.3*(b)(ii) & (iii), 18.2(a)*, (b) & (c)(i), 18.2*(c)(ii), 20.2(b), 24A.49a)(ii), 29.8, 59.4(b)(iii), 63.3(c)*(iv)

JURISDICTION see CONSTITUTIONAL COURT
JURISTIC PERSON
access to courts ... 59.3*(a)(i) environmental rights ... 50.4(c)* equality ... 31.3*(d), 35.5(d)* expression, freedom of ... 31.3*(d), 42.6(a)* labour relations ... 53.1*(a)(ii) movement and residence, freedom of ... 66.1(a)(i) privacy ... 31.3(d), 38.4 property ... 31.3(d), 46.2(b)* some rights not designed to benefit ... 31.3*(d), 60.6 trade, occupation and profession, freedom of ... 31.3(d)*, 54.3
water, right to ... 56B.3*(b)(ii) LABOUR arbitration access to courts ... 59.4(c)(ii) administrative action ... 59.4(c)(ii), 63.3(b)(vii) public hearing ... 59.4(b)(v) CCMA access to courts ... 59.4(c)(ii), (vi) administrative action ... 63.3(b)(vii) community service and public works ... 64.6(g)*
domestic workers ... 64.6*(d)*
farm workers ... 64.6*(c)*
forced see SLAVERY, SERVITUDE AND FORCED LABOUR labour practice right to fair ... 53.2
unfair ... 53.2*(b)*
HIV status ... 35.5*(e), 35.5(g)(vii), 35.5(h)(iii), 35.5(i), 36.4(a)* & (i), 40.8*(a), 53.2(c)*
religion, freedom of ... 41.4*(c)*
labour relations
administrative action ... 63.3*(b)*(v)
association, freedom of ... 53.3
beneficiaries ... 53.1*(a)*(ii)
collective bargaining ... 53.5
employer organisation employer's right to form and join ... 53.3*(a)* organisation's right to organise ... 53.4 horizontal application ... 53.1*(a)(i) Interim Constitution ... 53.1, 53.1(b)* jurisdiction ... 53.1*(b)* legislation ... 53.2*(b)* & (c) picketing ... 43.3*(a)(iv), 43.3(b)(i), 53.6(b)* strikes ... 53.6
essential services ... 23B.3*(d)* lockouts ... 53.5, 53.6*(a)* prohibition from striking ... 23B.3*(d)* trade unions agency fees ... 53.3*(b)* closed shops ... 45.8, 53.3*(b)* minority union ... 53.4, 53.6
SA National Defence Force ... 23B.3*(d), 23B.4(d)* union's right to organise ... 53.4 worker's right to form and join ... 53.3*(a)* LABOUR APPEAL COURT
amicus curiae submissions ... 8.4*(b)* appeals from ..... 4.3*(d)(iii), 5.3(e)(ii)(dd), 5.3(e)(vi), 53.1(b)* interpretation of Labour Relations Act constitutional issue ..... 4.3*(d)*(iii)

LAND REFORM see LAND RIGHTS
LAND RIGHTS
access to land ..... 48.6*(a)* Black Land Act 27 of 1913 ..... 48.1, 48.8*(a)* boundary disputes ..... 26.5*(a)* burial rights ..... 48.7*(b)(iv)(bb)*
Communal Land Rights Act 11 of 2004 ..... 26.5*(a), 26.6(d)(iii) & (iv), 26.7, 48.7(b)*(v)
Communal Property Association Act 28 of 1996 ..... 48.7*(b)(iii) conservation and ..... 50.3(b)(ii)(aa)(zz)* customary law ..... 26.6*(d)(i)-(iv), 48.5, 48.7(b)(v)(cc)*
eviction see EVICTION
expropriation see PROPERTY
Extension of Security of Tenure Act 62 of 1997 (ESTA) aims ..... 48.7*(b)(iv)(aa)* arbitration and mediation ..... 48.7*(b)(iv)(gg)* beneficiaries ..... 48.6*(b)(i)(aa), 48.7(b)(iv)(bb)* evictions see also EVICTION ..... 48.7*(b)(iv)(ee)* & (ff)
food, right to ..... 56C.3*(b)(aa)*
legal representation ..... 59.4*(b)(i) occupier meaning of ..... 48.7(b)(iv)(bb)* rights of ..... 48.7*(b)(iv)(bb)* review ..... 48.7*(b)(iv)(hh)*
water, right to ..... 56B.3*(a)* farm worker , meaning of ..... 48.6*(b)(i)(aa)* Group Areas Act ..... 48.8*(a)*
Interim Constitution 48.2
Interim Protection of Informal Rights Act 31 of 1996 ..... 48.7*(b)(ii) labour tenant acquisition of land ..... 48.6(b)(i)(cc)* meaning of ..... 48.6*(b)(i)(aa)* rights ..... 48.6*(b)(i)(bb)*
Land Claims Court ..... 48.8*(b)*(ii)
Land Reform (Labour Tenants) Act 3 of 1996 ..... 48.6*(b)* aims ..... 48.6*(b)(i) and ESTA ..... 48.6(b)(i)(aa)* beneficiaries ..... 48.6*(b)(i)(aa)* compensation principle ..... 46.8*(b)* expropriation ..... 46.8*(a)* land rights enquiry ..... 48.7*(b)(v)(dd)*
legal representation, right to ..... 48.6*(b)(i)(bb), 48.7(b)(iv)(dd)*
'old order' and 'new order' rights ..... 48.7*(b)*(v)
relationship with other rights 48.4
Provision of Land and Assistance Act 126 of 1993 ..... 48.6*(b)(ii) reasonable measures ..... 48.6(a)* redistribution legislation ..... 48.6*(b)* policy ..... 48.6*(c)*
programme ..... 48.6*(d)*
restitution
Commission on Restitution of Land Rights ..... 48.8*(b)*(i)
Land Claims Court ..... 48.8*(b)(ii) procedure ..... 48.8(c)*
restitution programme ..... 48.8*(d)*

Restitution of Land Rights Act 22 of 1994 ..... 48.8 security of tenure see tenure reform tenure reform evaluation ..... 48.7*(c)*
legislation ..... 48.7*(b)*
Transformation of Certain Rural Areas Act 94 of 1998 ..... 48.6*(b)(iii) ubuntu and ..... 48.4, 48.7(b)(iv)(gg)*
Upgrading of Land Tenure Rights Act 112 of 1991 ..... 48.7*(b)*(i) LANGUAGE see also CULTURAL, RELIGIOUS AND LINGUISTIC COMMUNITIES culture and see CULTURAL, RELIGIOUS AND LINGUISTIC COMMUNITIES discrimination on the basis of ..... 35.5*(g)(viii)(cc)* indigenous, promotion of ..... 13.5*(b)* & (c), 65.5 judicial proceedings ..... 36.3*(a), 65.6 National Language Policy Framework ..... 65.4(a)* official ..... 13.5*(b)*
administrative services ..... 65.4*(b)(iii) authoritative version of Act ..... 65.4(b)(ii) education in ..... 36.4(d)(ii), 57.3(c), 58.7 equitable treatment of ..... 65.3(a)* government local ..... 65.4*(c)*
national and provincial ..... 65.4*(b)* legislative process ..... 65.4*(b)(ii) meaning ..... 65.2(b)*
qualifying considerations ..... 65.4*(b)*(iv)
'of their choice' see CULTURAL, RELIGIOUS AND LINGUISTIC COMMUNITIES
Pan South African Language Board 65.7 rights, non-diminution ..... 65.3*(b)*
LEGAL REPRESENTATION
access to courts ..... 59.4*(b)(i) equality of arms ..... 35.3(c), 51.5(b),59.4(b)(ii) free ..... 59.4(b)*(i)
Legal Aid Board ..... 59.4*(b)(i) LEGALITY PRINCIPLE administrative action ..... 63.2(b), 63.3(a)* anti-domination doctrine ..... 17.8*(b), 23B.6(b)(iii) common law doctrine ..... 11.1(a)* demise of ..... 11.3*(b), 11.3(c)(iii) constitutionalisation of ..... 3.3(d), 11.2(b)(ii), 11.2(b)* & (c), 11.3*(a)-(c)* erroneous judicial decisions not a violation of ..... 4.3*(d)(ii), 4.3(g)(ii) justiciable claim not sourced in specific provision but in entirety of Constitution ..... 11.1(b)* & (c), 40.1*(b)(i)(bb)* legislative authority, as constraint of ..... 17.5*(f)* nulla crimen and nulla poena sine lege ..... 9.4*(e)(ii)(bb)(x), 17.5(f)(ii), 49.2(a), 49.3(b)*, 51.5
rationality or arbitrariness test ..... 3.3*(d), 17.5(f)(i), 18.2(b), 19.3(d), 22.5(c)(ii), 23B.5(b)(iv), 27.2, 32.3(b)(iii), 35.3, 35.3(e)(i), 40.1(b)(i)(bb), 46.5(a)* & (c), 63.1-10 remedies without rights ..... 9.2*(b)(iv) rule of law ..... 2.6(c), 3.3(d), 4.3(d)(ii), 10.3(b), 11.1(c), 11.4(a)* & (b), 13.5*(a), 13.7(a), 17.5(f)(i)-(ii), 18.2(b), 23A.4, 23B.5(e)(iv), 34.7(b)*
LEGISLATIVE CONFLICT between national and provincial legislation ..... 3.3*(e), 4.3(b)(i), 14.5(d)*(i), 16.1-16.4 provincial constitutions 16.7 subordinate legislation 16.6
LIFE, RIGHT TO abortion see also ABORTION 39.3, 39.6
beneficiaries 39.3

child ..... 47.10*(b)* concept 39.2
death penalty ..... 39.5*(a), 49.2(c), 49.2(d), 49.3(a)* extradition to a state which has 39.7 environmental rights ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(aa)(v) euthanasia, active ..... 39.4, 40.10(b)* foetus ..... 39.3, 39.6, 37.2, 47.11*(a)* horizontal application ..... 39.5*(a)*, 39.6
lethal force, police use of ..... 39.5*(a), 40.5(c), 43.2(b), 23B.3(c)(i) liability for negligently causing death ..... 39.5(a)* life sentence ..... 39.5*(b)*
life-saving and life-prolonging treatment ..... 39.4, 39.8, 40.10*(b), 47.10(b), 56A.2(e)*(ii) livelihood, right to a 39.8
positive obligations on state 39.6-9 self-defence, killing in ..... 39.5*(a)* socio-economic right, as 39.8 suicide, assisted 39.4
wrongful life 39.2

LIMITATION CLAUSE burden of justification ..... 3.7*(b)(i), 34.5(a)*, 34.6
comparative law ..... 4.2*(b), 34.7(c)(ii)(cc)* & (dd), 34.8*(c)(ii), 34.8(d)* & (d)(ii) democracy and ..... 10.3*(c), 34.8(b), 34.8(e)*(i) & (ii) dignity and see also DIGNITY ..... 34.8*(a)-(e)* illimitable rights? ..... 13.6, 34.2*(a), 34.8(c)(i) Interim Constitution ..... 34.2(a)* judicial narratives ..... 34.8*(e)(iii) law of general application general application ..... 34.7(c)(ii) legal authority for conduct ..... 34.7(c)(i) meaning ..... 34.7(a)* limitation analysis ..... 34.2*(b), 34.7(c)(ii)(cc)* & (dd), 34.8*(c)(ii), 34.8(d)* & (d)(ii) preferred reading ..... 34.8*(e)* normative framework taking adequate account of both dignity and democracy ..... 34.8*(e)(ii) proportionality balancing ..... 34.8(b)(i), 34.8(d)(i) & (ii) importance of the purpose of the limitation ..... 34.8(c)*(ii) & (c)(v)(dd) less restrictive means ..... 34.8*(c)(iii), 34.8(c)(v)(aa)-(dd)* means rationally related to objective ..... 34.8*(c)(iv) narrowly tailored ..... 34.8(c)(iii), 34.8(c)(v)(aa)* nature and extent of limitation ..... 34.8*(c)*(iii) & (c)(v)(cc) nature of the rights ..... 34.8*(c)(i) relationship between fundamental rights analysis and limitations analysis 10.3, 34.1(c), 34.3(a)* & (b) internal limitations 34.5
equality ..... 34.5*(b)(ii) property ..... 34.5(b)(iii) religious, cultural and language rights ..... 34.3(b), 34.5(b)(i) socio-economic rights ..... 34.5(b)*(ii) internal modifiers 34.4
shared constitutional interpretation ..... 34.1*(c), 34.8(e)(i) substantive right limitation examples access to courts ..... 34.8(c)(i), 59.3(a)(v), 59.4(a)(i), 59.5 assembly, freedom of ..... 43.3(b)* association, freedom of ..... 44.2, 44.3*(b)* criminal procedure rights ..... 34.1*(a), 34.8(c)(i), (iii) & (v), 51.1(b)(iv) environmental rights ..... 50.4(d)* evidence 52.11

equality ... 35.3*(b)* & (d), 35.4*(g), 35.5(i) expression, freedom of ... 34.4, 34.8(c)(i) & (iii), 42.3, 42.4 health, right to ... 56A.2(d)*
privacy ... 38.5
property ... 46.6, 46.9
religious, cultural and language rights ... 41.2*(c)*, 41.4, 57.4, 58.7
socio-economic rights ... 33.10*(a)* & (b), 56A.2*(d)* two-stage analysis ... 34.1*(b), 34.3(b)* vexatious litigation see VEXATIOUS LITIATION, access to court
LOCAL GOVERNMENT apartheid, under ... 22.1*(a)* certification ... 22.1*(c), 22.2(a)(ii) & (iii) comparative law ... 22.1(b)*
intergovernmental forums ... 14.5*(c)(i), 14.5(e), 20.4(b)(i), 22.7(d)(v) intergovernmental relations national executive ... 18.4(a), 22.6(b)(ii), 22.7(a)-(d)* provinces ... 14.4*(b)(xii), 14.5(c)(i), 14.5(e), 19.3(c), 20.4(b), 22.6(b)(ii), 22.7(a)-(d)*
Interim Constitution ... 22.1*(c)* interventions ... 14.4*(b)(xii), 22.6(c)* & (d)
Local Government Transition Act 209 of 1993 ... 22.1*(c)* municipalities boundaries ... 22.1*(e), 22.2(a)(i) categories ... 22.2(a)(ii) division of powers between ... 22.3(c), 22.5(c)*(iii) finances
borrowing ... 22.1*(e), 22.5(b), 27.5(c)* budgeting principles ... 27.4*(b)*
Division of Revenue Act 1 of 2005 ... 22.5*(j)(i)-(v), 22.5(k), 27.3(d)* & (f) equitable share ... 20.4*(a)(ii), 22.5(j)(i)-(v), 27.3(c)*, (d) & (f) financial crisis and failure ... 22.5*(b), 22.6(f), 27.5(c), 27.6(c)* & (d) fiscal decentralisation & autonomy ... 22.5*(a), 27.8(a)* & (b) functional allocation ... 27.3*(b)* & (g) intergovernmental grants ... 22.5*(j)(i)-(v), 22.5(k), 27.3(c)-(f)* stopping of ... 22.5*(j)(iv), 27.6(a)* Municipal Finance Management Act 56 of 2003 borrowing ... 22.5*(h)(i), 27.5(c)* budgeting ... 27.4*(b)* & (c) debt, guaranteed ... 22.5*(b), 27.5(c)* equitable share ... 22.5*(j)(iv), 27.3(f)* funds, stopping of ... 27.6*(a), 22.5(j)(iv) insolvency and liquidation ... 22.5(b)* primary municipal bank account ... 27.5*(a)* provincial treasury ... 27.6*(b)* tariffs ... 22.4*(e)(i) provincial powers ... 14.4(b)(xii), 20.4(b), 22.6(a)-(e), 27.6(b)* & (c) revenue, raising of ... 22.5*(c)(i)-(v), 27.2(d)* sub-sovereign debt ... 27.5*(c)* unfunded mandates ... 27.3*(g)*
municipal council committees, minority parties, fair representation ... 10.3*(d)(ii) dissolution ... 22.6(d)(v) elections ... 22.2(b)(i)-(iii), 29.6(a)* executive committee ... 10.3*(d)(ii), 22.2(c)(iii) floor-crossing ... 22.1(e), 22.2(b)(iii), 29.6(b)* function and decisions ... 22.2*(c)(ii) membership ... 22.2(b)(iii), 29.6(c)* traditional leaders ..... 22.2*(c)(iv), 26.5(d)* privileges and immunity ..... 4.3*(d)(iv), 22.2(c)(ii) Municipal Demarcation Board ..... 12.3(b)(iii), 22.2(a)(i) & (ii) municipal services ..... 22.4(a)* basic services and socio-economic rights ..... 22.4*(b)* & (c) disconnection ..... 22.4*(e)(v) service fees and tariffs ..... 22.4(e)(i)-(v), 27.2(d)* surcharges ..... 22.5*(f)*

subsidization for poor households ..... 22.4*(e)(iv) official languages ..... 22.2(a)(iv) political structures ..... 22.2(c)*(i)-(iv) procurement 25.6
property rates ..... 22.5*(e)* types ..... 22.2*(a)*(iii)
powers executive ..... 22.3*(b)(i) assigned from national or provincial level ..... 17.5(e)(ii), 19.5, 22.3(d)* legislative ..... 22.3*(a), 22.3(b)(i) scope ..... 22.3(ii)-(v) provincial powers ..... 22.2(a)(iii), 22.3(b)(vi), 22.6(a)-(e)* self-government ..... 22.1*(f), 22.2(a)(ii) supervision ..... 22.6(b)*
traditional leaders and ..... 22.2*(c)(iv), 26.5(d)*
White Paper on Local Government ..... 22.1*(d), 22.4(a)*
MALAYA
water, right to ..... 56B.2*(d)*(iv) MARRIAGE customary see CUSTOMARY LAW
marital status, as ground for discrimination ..... 35.5*(g)(iii) polygamous marriages ..... 35.5(f), 41.1(a)* religious marriages ..... 41.1*(c)(i), 41.6, 64.6(b)(ii) Muslim marriage ..... 9.4(b)(ii), 11.3(b), 35.5(g)(viii)(aa), 41.1(a)* Hindu marriage ..... 41.1*(a)*
same-sex see SAME-SEX RELATIONSHIPS MEDIA see EXPRESSION, FREEDOM OF MOOTNESS see STANDING, RIPENESS AND MOOTNESS MOVEMENT AND RESIDENCE, FREEDOM OF and dignity ..... 66.1*(d)(i) and equality ..... 66.1(d)*(ii)
beneficiaries ..... 66.1*(a)* deportation ..... 66.1*(b)(ii) extra-territorial application ..... 66.1(a)*(ii)
extradition see EXTRADITION
horizontal application ..... 66.1*(b)(ii) infringements ..... 66.1(b)(ii) Interim Constitution ..... 66.1(a)(iii) links to substantive and procedural law ..... 66.1(c)* purpose ..... 66.1*(b)(i) right to a passport ..... 60.6, 66.1(b)(vii) to enter ..... 66.1(b)(iv) to leave ..... 66.1(b)((iii) to remain ..... 66.1(b)(v) to reside ..... 66.1(b)*(vi)
NAMIBIA religion, freedom of ..... 41.1*(c)*(iii)

sentencing dignity ..... 49.2*(d)*
life sentence ..... 39.5*(b), 49.2(d)* mandatory minimum sentences ..... 49.2*(c)*
NATIONAL ASSEMBLY see PARLIAMENT
NATIONAL DEFENCE see NATIONAL SECURITY
NATIONAL EXECUTIVE Cabinet accountability ..... 12.3*(b)(i), 18.3(d)(iii) & (iv), 18.3(e)* appointment and dismissal ..... 18.2*(c), 18.3.(a)* collective responsibility ..... 12.3*(b)(i), 18.3(d)(i) & (ii) powers ..... 18.3(c)*
assignment and delegation ..... 18.3*(l)* financial interests declaration ..... 18.3*(h)* international agreements ..... 18.3*(k)* intervention in provincial affairs ..... 18.4*(a)* & (b) Ministers
co-operative government ..... 14.3*(b)(ii), 14.4(b)(ii) & (iii), 14.5(c)(iii), 22.7(d)(v) individual accountability ..... 12.3(b)(i), 18.3(e)*
MINMECs ..... 14.3*(c)(iii), 22.7(d)*(v)
President
accused, as ..... 12.3*(b)(i), 18.2(f)* as Commander-in-Chief of defence force ..... 18.3*(j), 23B.4(b)* as Head of National Executive ..... 18.2*(a), 18.2(c)*
State ..... 18.2*(a), 18.2(b)*
Bills, signing of ..... 4.3*(b)(ii), 17.3(e), 18.2(b)* decisions record of ..... 18.2*(d)* reviewability of ..... 18.2*(b), 18.2(c)(iii), 18.(j)* election, term and removal ..... 12.3*(b)(i), 18.2(e), 18.3(g), 18.3(b)* failure to fulfil constitutional obligation ..... 4.3*(b), 4.3(b)(v) portfolio allocation ..... 18.2(c)*(ii)
powers appointments ..... 18.2*(a), 18.2(c)(i) requiring countersignature by minister ..... 18.2(d)* dismissals ..... 18.2*(c)(i) President's Co-ordinating Council ..... 14.4(b)(ii), 22.7(d)(v) witness, as compellable ..... 18.2(f)* salaries ..... 20.3*(g)*
subordinate regulatory authority ..... 17.5*(e)(i), (iii) & (iv) votes of no confidence ..... 18.2(e), 18.3(g)*
NATIONAL LEGISLATURE see PARLIAMENT
NATIONAL SECURITY defence force assembly, freedom of ..... 23B.3*(d), 23B.4(d), 43.3(b)(iii) association ..... 23B.3(d), 23B.4(d), 44.2(c), 44.3(c)(vii) command and control of ..... 18.3(j), 23B.4(b)*
conscientious objection ..... 64.6*(b)* conscription ..... 64.6*(b)* employment of in peacekeeping operations 23C.4
state of national defence limitations of rights ..... 23C.3*(c)* parliamentary powers ..... 18.3*(j), 23C.3(b)*, 23C.4, 23C.5
powers granted by declaration of 23C.3

requirements ..... 23C.2, 23C.4, 23C.5, 30.4*(a)* expression, freedom of ..... 23B.4*(d)* function ..... 23B.4*(a)* international law ..... 30.4*(a)* labour relations ..... 23B.3*(d), 23B.4(d), 44.3(c)(vii), 53.1(a)(ii), 53.2(b), 53.3(a)* closed shop agreement ..... 23B.3*(d), 44.3(c)(vii), 53.3(b)* collective bargaining ..... 44.3*(c)*(vii), 53.5 strikes 53.6
military prosecution ..... 23B.4*(c)* ombudsman ..... 23B.4*(b)* political activities, limitations on ..... 23B.4*(d)* trade union membership and activity see labour relations above information access to ..... 23B.5*(c)(ii), 42.9(g), 62.8(b)* freedom to receive ..... 23B.5*(c)(ii), 42.9(c)(i), 42.9(g)* intelligence services
anti-corruption, principle of ..... 23B.6*(b)(iv) communication, infringement of private ..... 23B.5(c)(i), 23B.6(e), 38.3(a)(iii) control and oversight ..... 23B.5(b)* Directorate of Special Operations ('Scorpions') ..... 23B.1, 23B.6*(a)* functions ..... 23B.5*(a)*
Inspector-General ..... 23B.5*(b)*(ii)
Minimum Information Security Standards ..... 23B.5*(c)(ii)(aa), 42.9(g)(i)(bb)*
open justice principle ..... 23B.5*(c)(ii), 42.9(c)(i) Protection of Information Bill ..... 23B.5(c)*(iii) state of emergency 61.1-4
international law ..... 61.3*(b)*
limitations of rights ..... 61.4*(d)* & (e) requirements ..... 23C.2, 61.4*(a)* & (b) rights of detainees ..... 23C.3*(c), 61.4(e)*
NEPAL
water, right to ..... 56B.2*(d)*(ii)
NEW ZEALAND
parliamentary privilege ..... 17.7*(c)*
NIGERIA
constitutional interpretation ..... 32.3*(c)*(i)
local government ..... 22.1*(b)*
OCCUPATION, FREEDOM OF see TRADE, OCCUPATION AND PROFESSION, FREEDOM OF OLD ORDER LEGISLATION see TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS ORGAN OF STATE
definition ..... 31.4*(f)*
executive ..... 18.3*(f)(ii) for purpose of co-operative government ..... 14.3(b)(ii) public procurement ..... 25.2(c)(i), 25.4(c)*(i) PARLIAMENT
Chapter 9 institutions, obligations to ..... 17.5*(d)* committees, minority parties, fair representation of ..... 10.3*(d)(ii) composition of ..... 17.2(a), 29.3(b)*
Constitution, power to amend ..... 17.3*(a), 17.5(g)* disciplinary proceedings ..... 10.3*(b)(i), 17.7(a), 59.4(c)(iii) extraterritorial competence ..... 17.5(c)* failure to fulfill constitutional obligation ..... 4.3*(b), 4.3(b)(v) floor-crossing ..... 10.3(b), 10.4(b), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 13.5(a), 17.2(c), 29.3(d)* & (f), 29.4, 31.5, 45.5*(a), 45.10(a)*(ii)
legislative competence

concurrent ..... 15.2*(a), 17.3(b)*
ss 44(3) and 104(4) incidental power ..... 15.3*(c)(i)-(vi) delegation ..... 15.2(c), 17.5(e)(i)-(iv) delineation testing and tagging ..... 15.3(a)(i)-(iv), 15.3(d), 17.6(b)(i)-(iii) exclusive national ..... 15.2(c), 17.3(c)* exclusive provincial ..... 15.2*(b)* & (d), 17.3*(b)*
s 44(2) override ..... 15.3*(b), 19.3(a)(i) jurisdiction in disputes about ..... 4.3(b)(i) limits ..... 17.5(a)*
legislative conflict see LEGISLATIVE CONFLICT legislative power, delegation of judicial review ..... 12.3*(d)(iii), 17.5(e)(iv) legislative inter-delegation ..... 17.5(e)(ii), 19.4(a)* subordinate regulatory authority ..... 17.5*(e)(i) sub-delegation ..... 17.5(e)*(iii) legislative process
Acts constitutional challenge after being signed but before being in force ..... 4.3*(b)(iii), 4.3(b)(vii), 5.3(b)(ii), 6.4(d), 17.3(f)(ii), 17.4(c)* constitutional challenge by MPs ..... 4.3*(b)(iii), 5.3(b)(ii), 6.4(d), 17.3(f)(ii) proclamation ..... 17.3(e)* publication of ..... 17.3*(e)* rationality doctrine ..... 17.5*(f)(i) vagueness doctrine ..... 17.5(f)*(ii)
Bills affecting the provinces ..... 17.3*(b), 17.6(b)* amending Constitution ..... 17.3*(a), 17.5(g)* assenting to ..... 17.3*(e), 18.2(b)* constitutional challenge after being passed but before being signed ..... 4.3*(b)(ii)(aa), 5.3(b)(i), 17.3(f)(i), 17.4(b)* before being passed ..... 17.4*(a)* by President ..... 4.3*(b)(ii), 5.3(b)(i), 17.3(f)(i) fiscal, requiring consultation ..... 17.6(c)* mixed Bills ..... 17.6*(b)(iii), 17.7(b)*(i)5.
Money Bills ..... 17.3*(d), 18.3(i) not affecting the provinces ..... 17.3(c), 17.6(b)(iii) tagging ..... 17.6(b)(i)-(iii) membership ..... 12.3(a)(i), 17.2(c), 29.3(e), 29.4, 45.10(a)*(ii)
multi-party democracy ..... 10.3*(b), 13.4, 13.5(a), 17.2(c), 29.3(c)*
National Council of Provinces see PROVINCES parliamentary privilege ..... 17.7*(a), 17.7(c), 31.5, 34.7(c)(i)(aa)* & (ii)(aa), 34.9
parliamentary sovereignty ..... 2.2*(d)* & (b), 11.1*(a), 11.3(c)(ii), 12.3(d)(iii), 32.1(b), 42.8(c)(iv)(cc), 63.1 party discipline ..... 17.8(b)* positive and negative obligations re fundamental rights ..... 17.5*(b)* proportional representation see floor-crossing above public participation ..... 17.6*(a)(i)-(iii), 45.2(d)*, 45.6
public sitting and participation ..... 10.3*(d)(iii), 17.6(a)(i)-(iii), 45.2(d), 45.6 relationship with NCOP ..... 17.2(d)* rules and orders of ..... 10.3*(d)(i), 12.3(d)(i)(aa), 17.7(b)(i)-(ii) speech, protection of in ..... 17.7(a), 17.7(c), 38.2(c)(i)(dd)*, 42.10
POLICE
anti-corruption, principle of ..... 23B.6*(b)(iv) community policing forums ..... 23B.3(e)(iii) corruption in ..... 23B.1, 23B.3(c)(ii), 23B.3(e)(iv) Directorate of Priority Crimes ('Hawks') ..... 23B.1, 23B.6(b)* duty to protect the public ..... 23B.3(iii)

human rights violations ..... 23B.2, 23B.3*(c)(ii) illegal arrest litigation, cost order ..... 23B.3(c)(iii)(cc)*
Independent Complaints Directorate ..... 23B.3*(e)(ii) lethal force, police use of ..... 23B.3(c)(i), 39.5(a), 40.5(c), 43.2(b)* mandate ..... 23B.3*(a)* municipal police services ..... 22.4*(a), 23B.3(a)* National Commissioner ..... 20.4*(a)(iv), 23B.3(b)* national secretariat ..... 23B.3*(e)(i) political activities, limitations on ..... 23B.3(d), 44.2(c), 44.3(c)(vii) Portfolio Committee on Safety and Security ..... 23B.3(e)(i) & (ii) provincial powers ..... 20.4(a)(iv), 23B.3(b), 23B.3(e)(i) sexual violence against women ..... 23B.3(iii) striking, prohibition from ..... 23B.3(d)* vicarious liability ..... 23B.3(iii)
POLITICAL PARTIES
admission ..... 29.4, 44.3*(c)(i) and the media ..... 45.8(c)(iii) anti-defection provision ..... 45.10(a)*(ii)
dominant party democracy ..... 17.8*(b), 23B.6(b)(iii) expulsion ..... 44.2(c), 44.3(c)(i) floor-crossing ..... 10.3(b), 10.4(b), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 13.5(a), 17.2(c), 22.1(e), 22.2(b)(iii), 29.6(b), 29.3(d)* & (f), 29.4, 31.5, 45.5*(a), 45.10(a)*(ii) freedom to choose 45.8
funding of by donations 29.5, 45.8
by state ..... 29.5, 45.8*(c)*(ii) merger or subdivision 29.4
multi-party democracy ..... 10.3*(b), 13.4, 13.5(a), 17.2(c), 29.3(c), 10.3(b), 13.4, 13.5(a), 17.2(c), 29.3(c)* nature of ..... 17.8*(a)* proportional representation ..... 45.10*(a)(iii) right to campaign for ..... 45.8(c)* right to form ..... 44.3*(c)(i), 45.8(a)* right to participate in activities of ..... 44.3*(c)(vii), 45.8(b)*
POLITICAL RIGHTS
comparative law ..... 45.2*(e)* democracy and ..... 10.4*(b)*
elections see ELECTIONS
historical development ..... 45.2*(a)* & (b)
horizontal application 45.3
international law ..... 45.2*(d)*
justiciability 45.5
legislation ..... 45.2*(f)* relationship with other rights ..... 45.2*(c)* objective unconstitutionality, doctrine of ..... 45.5*(b)* participate in public affairs, right to ..... 45.2*(d)*, 45.6 political choices, freedom to make 45.8
political party see POLITICAL PARTIES public office, right to stand for ..... 45.10*(c)* public participation, principle of ..... 45.2*(d), 45.6 remedies ..... 45.5(c)* review standards ..... 10.4*(b), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 45.5(b)*
standing 45.4
vote, right to see ELECTIONS
PORNOGRAPHY child pornography ..... 47.5*(d)* children's best interests ..... 47.10*(b)*

dignity ..... 36.4*(e), 36.4(h)(i) expression, freedom of ..... 36.4(h)(i), 42.3, 42.4, 42.7(e)(i), 42.9(e)* limitation analysis ..... 3.7*(b)(i), 34.2(b), 34.7(a), 34.8(c)(ii), (iii) & (v), 34.8(e)(ii)(bb)* possession of ..... 36.4*(e), 36.4(h)(i), 38.3(a)(i)(aa)(A), 42.9(e), 42.9(h)*(iii) PREGNANCY see REPRODUCTIVE RIGHTS termination of see ABORTION
PRESCRIPTION see ACCESS TO COURTS PRISONERS see DETAINED PERSONS, RIGHTS OF PRIVACY see also EXPRESSION, FREEDOM OF access to information ..... 38.3*(a)(i), 62.4, 62.8(a)* actio injuriarum 38.2
common-law action
defences ..... 38.3*(c)*
essentials for liability ..... 38.2*(a)*
remedies ..... 38.2*(b)*
communications, infringement of private ..... 23B.5*(c)(i), 38.3(a)*(iii) constitutional invasion of privacy
defences ..... 38.3*(c)* elements for ..... 38.3*(a)*
remedies ..... 38.3*(b)*
rights in respect of information ..... 38.3*(a)(i)(aa)* personal autonomy ..... 38.3*(a)(i)(bb)* dignity and ..... 36.4*(e), 36.4(h)(iii) expression, freedom of ..... 36.4(h)(iii), 38.2, 42.9(b), 42.9(c)(i) & (iii) invasion of ..... 38.2(a)(iii) juristic persons ..... 34.8(c)*(iii), 38.4
limitation of right to 38.5
pornography, possession of ..... 36.4*(e), 38.3(a)(i)(aa)(A), 42.9(e)(ii) prostitution ..... 38.3(a)(i)(aa)*(C)
reproductive rights 37.3
searches and seizures ..... 38.3*(a)(ii) sexual relationships ..... 34.8(c)(iii), 38.3(a)(i)(aa)(B), 44.3(c)*(ii) PROFESSION, FREEDOM OF see TRADE, OCCUPATION AND PROFESSION, FREEDOM OF PROMOTION OF ACCESS TO INFORMATION ACT 2 OF 2000 (PAIA) see ACCESS TO INFORMATION PROMOTION OF ADMINISTRATIVE JUSTICE ACT 3 OF 2000 (PAJA) see ADMINISTRATIVE LAW, administrative action, just PROMOTION OF EQUALITY AND PREVENTION OF UNFAIR DISCRIMINATION ACT 4 OF 2000 (PEPUDA) see EQUALITY
PROPERTY
beneficiaries of right ..... 46.2*(b)* common law protection ..... 46.2*(a)* compulsory acquisition of see also EXPROPRIATION temporary 46.7
constitutionality test, structure of 46.1 corporeal ..... 46.3*(a)* & (b) deprivation of arbitrary ..... 22.4*(e)(v), 46.5(b)* by general law ..... 46.5*(a)* conservational purpose ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(aa)(z)*
in a procedurally unfair manner ..... 46.5*(c)* meaning 46.4
rates certificate as ..... 22.4*(e)*(v), 46.4
eviction see EVICTION

expropriation burial rights ..... 48.7*(b)(iv)(dd)* compensation, just and equitable ..... 46.8*(b)* conservational purpose ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(aa)(z)*
constructive 46.7
customary law ..... 26.6*(d)*(iii) deprivation amounting to 46.7
deprivation and ..... 46.3*(c)*
Provision of Land and Assistance Act 126 of 1993 ..... 48.6*(b)(ii) public purpose or interest, for ..... 46.8(a)* forfeiture, civil ..... 46.3*(c), 51.5(n)*(ii)
horizontal application 46.2
immovable see also LAND RIGHTS execution against judicial review ..... 56C.3*(b)(ii)(bb), 59.3(a)(v), 59.4(a)(ii), 59.4(a)(iv) incorporeal ..... 46.3(a)* & (c) land rights see LAND RIGHTS limitation analysis ..... 34.5*(b)*(iii), 46.6, 46.9
burden of justification ..... 34.5*(a)*, 35.6
neighbour rights ..... 50.3*(b)(i)(bb)(x)* & (y), 50.3*(b)(ii)(aa)(u)*
'new property' ..... 46.3*(c)* ownership ..... 46.3*(b)* PAJA and ..... 46.5*(c)*
property, meaning of 46.3
real rights ..... 46.3*(b)*
regulatory takings see also EXPROPRIATION 46.7
PROSTITUTION ..... 34.8*(e)(iii)(bb), 36.4(f)* & (g), 38.3*(a)(i)(aa)(C), 40.10(b), 44.3(c)(x), 64.6(a)*
PROVINCES
assets, transitional provisions regarding 28.3
Bill concerning specific province ..... 17.3*(a)* constitution, provincial ..... 21.1-5, 4.3*(b)(vi), 16.7, 19.3(b)*
comparative law ..... 21.2*(a)*
KwaZulu-Natal ..... 21.4*(a), 26.5(e)*
Western Cape ..... 21.4*(b)* disputes between provincial departments ..... 14.5*(d)(ii)(aa)-(gg)*
executive authority
commonalities and differences to national executive 20.1
Executive Councils ..... 20.3*(a)-(g)* local government and ..... 20.4*(b)*
MECs ..... 20.3*(a)-(g)*
MINMECs ..... 14.3*(c)(iii), 22.7(d)*(v)
national executive commonalities and differences 20.1 interaction with ..... 18.4*(a)* & (b), 20.4*(a)(i)-(vi) oversight by provincial legislature ..... 20.3(a), 20.3(e), 20.3(f)* Premier appointment and removal 20.2
assent to Bills ..... 4.3*(b)(ii), 19.2(c), 20.2(b)* powers and functions ..... 14.5*(d)(ii)(aa)* & (bb), 20.2*(b), 20.3(a)* & (b) review of Bills ..... 4.3*(b)(ii), 5.3(b)(i), 19.6, 20.2(b)* transitional provisions .....
finances
borrowing ..... 14.4*(b)(x), 27.5(c)* budgets and Budget Council ..... 14.4*(b)(iii) & (vi), 20.4(a)(ii), 27.4(b)* debt, guaranteed ..... 27.5*(c)*
Division of Revenue Act 1 of 2005 ..... 14.4*(b)(vii), 27.3(d)* & (f)

functional allocation ..... 27.3*(b)* & (g)
intergovernmental grants ..... 27.3*(c)-(f)* stopping of ..... 27.6*(a)* powers regarding municipalities ..... 27.6*(b)* & (c) provincial treasury ..... 27.6*(b)*
raising of revenue ..... 14.4*(b)(ix), 27.2(c)* revenue funds ..... 27.5*(a)*
unfunded mandates ..... 27.3*(g)*
vertical fiscal imbalances ..... 27.3*(c)*
intergovernmental forums ..... 14.5*(c)(i), 14.5(e), 20.4(b)(i), 22.7(d)(v) intra-governmental disputes ..... 14.5(d)(ii)(aa)-(gg)*
legislative conflict see LEGISLATIVE CONFLICT legislatures see PROVINCIAL LEGISLATURES National Council of Provinces (NCOP) committees minority parties fair representation ..... 10.3*(d)(ii) composition ..... 17.2(b)(i) liaison with President ..... 20.3(f)* local government participation in ..... 22.7(iii) mandates ..... 17.2*(b)(ii), 17.3(a)*, 19.8
Mandating Procedures of Provinces Act 52 of 2008 ..... 17.2*(b)(ii) provincial legislature control of ..... 17.2(b)(i) & (ii), 19.8 public sitting and participation ..... 10.3(d)(iii), 17.6(a), 19.7(d)* relationship with National Assembly ..... 14.4*(b)(i), 17.2(d)* role in lawmaking ..... 14.4*(b)(i), 17.2(b)(ii), 20.4(a)(i)-(iii) rules and orders of ..... 17.7(b)(i)-(ii) old order laws, administration of ..... 28.2(a)(ii)(aa)*
President's Co-ordinating Council ..... 14.4*(b)(ii) organs of state ..... 14.3(b)*(ii)
PROVINCIAL LEGISLATURES co-operative government ..... 14.3*(b)(ii), 14.3(c)(iii), 14.5(d)(i), 19.3(c)*
composition of ..... 19.1*(a), 29.3(b)* control of provincial executive ..... 20.3*(a), 20.3(e), 20.3(f)* election and dissolution ..... 19.1*(b), 20.1 floor-crossing ..... 29.3(d)* & (f) immunities and privileges ..... 19.7*(c)* internal proceedings ..... 19.7*(a)* legislative competence
bills on customary law or traditional leadership ..... 26.5*(b)(ii), 26.5(c)* concurrent ..... 15.2*(a), 19.3(a)(ii), 20.3(b)*
ss 44(3) and 104(4) incidental power ..... 15.3*(c)(i)-(vi) delegation ..... 15.2(c), 17.5(e)(ii), 19.4, 19.5, 20.3(b)* judicial review ..... 12.3*(d)*(iii)
delineation testing and tagging ..... 15.3*(a)(i)-(iv), 15.3(d), 17.6(b)(i)-(iii) exclusive ..... 15.2(b), 19.3(a)(i), 20.3(b)*
s 44(2) override ..... 15.3*(b), 19.3(a)(i) jurisdiction in disputes about ..... 4.3(b)(i) provincial constitution ..... 4.3(b)(vi), 15.2(d), 19.3(b), 21.2(b)*
legislative conflict see LEGISLATIVE CONFLICT
legislative process 19.2
membership ..... 19.1*(c), 20.3(a)* NCOP, provincial control of 19.8
review of Bills and Acts 19.6 rules and orders ..... 19.7*(b)* structures ..... 19.1*(d)*

PUBLIC ENTITIES accountability ..... 18.3*(f)(ii) administrative action ..... 23A.4, 63.3(b)(viii) corporatisation ..... 56B.4(d)(i), 63.3(b)(viii) oversight ..... 24A.4(a)(i), 24B.3(a), 27.6(a)* shareholders ..... 18.3*(f)*(ii)
PUBLIC FINANCE see also LOCAL GOVERNMENT and PROVINCES borrowing ..... 27.5*(c)*
budgeting 27.4
contracting see PUBLIC PROCUREMENT Division of Revenue Bill and Act ..... 14.4*(b)(vii), 17.3(d), 20.4(a)(ii), 22.5(j), 27.3(d)* & (f) equitable share ..... 20.4*(a)(ii), 22.5(j), 27.3(c)*, (d) & (f) expenditure assignment 27.3
Financial and Fiscal Commission ..... 14.4*(b)(v), 17.6(c), 22.5(d)(ii), 22.5(j)(ii), 22.7(iv), 27.7(a)*
functional allocation ..... 27.3*(b)* & (g)
intergovernmental grants ..... 27.3*(c)-(f)*
stopping of ..... 27.6*(a)* Minister of Finance ..... 18.3(i)
Municipal Finance Management Act see LOCAL GOVERNMENT
National Treasury, role and powers of ..... 27.6*(a)* Public Finance Management Act 1 of 1999
budgeting ..... 27.4*(b)* & (c) defence budget 26C.5
funds, stopping of ..... 27.6*(a)* future financial commitment ..... 27.3*(f)*
loans and debt ..... 27.5*(c)*
National Treasury ..... 27.6*(a)* public entities see PUBLIC ENTITIES ..... 18.3*(f)(ii) revenue funds ..... 27.5(a)* revenue assignment 27.2
revenue funds ..... 27.5*(a)*
South African Reserve Bank ..... 27.7*(b)*
unfunded mandates ..... 27.3*(g)*
vertical fiscal imbalances ..... 27.3*(c)*
PUBLIC PARTICIPATION legislative process ..... 4.3*(b)(v), 10.3(d)(iii), 17.6(a)(i)-(iii), 32.3(c)(iii)(aa), 45.2(d)*, 45.6
provinces ..... 10.3*(d)(iii), 17.6(a), 19.7(d)*
PUBLIC PROCUREMENT administrative action, as 25.8
contracts for goods or services ..... 25.2*(c)(iii) equal footing ..... 25.3(b)*
Interim Constitution ..... 25.2*(a)* municipal procurement 25.6
organs of state ..... 25.2*(c)(i) preferential procurement ..... 25.4, 27.5(c)*
price ..... 25.3*(d)*
public process ..... 25.3*(c)* public-private partnerships 25.7 remedies ..... 9.2*(b)(ii)(bb), 9.2(b)*(iii), 25.9 tender boards 25.5
PUBLIC PROTECTOR appointment and removal ..... 24A.3*(a)* confidentiality ..... 24A.4*(b)*(ii) constitutional rights violations reports 24A.2
function ..... 12.3*(b)(iii), 14.3(b)*(ii), 24A.2
independence of ..... 12.3*(b)(iii), 14.3(b)(ii), 24A.3(b)* jurisdiction ... 24A.4*(a)* Oilgate ... 23B.6*(b)(iv), 24A.4(a)(i) police leases ... 23B.3(e)(iv)(bb)* powers ... 24A.4*(a)(iii), 24A.4(b)(i) search and seizure ... 24A.4(b)(iii) subpoena ... 24A.4(b)(iv) reporting of investigation outcomes ... 24A.4(b)(v), 24A.5(a)*

PUNISHMENT see SENTENCING
RELIGION, BELIEF AND OPINION, FREEDOM OF see also CULTURAL, RELIGIOUS AND LINGUISTIC COMMUNITIES
abortion ... 37.7
ambit of right ... 41.2*(c)* & (d) apartheid, opposition to ... 41.1*(a)* children ... 41.2*(d), 41.4(c)* & (d), 47.3*(a), 47.5(b)* Christianity ... 41.1*(a)* coercion and ... 41.2*(c)* & (d) community right ... 41.1*(b)* comparative law ... 41.1*(c)(iii), 41.2-6 conscience ... 41.2(b)(i) contraception ... 37.7, 37.10 dignity and ... 36.4(d)(i) discrimination on grounds of ... 35.5(g)(viii)(aa), 41.4(c)* doctrinal entanglement ... 41.3*(c)* drafting history ... 41.1*(c)(i) & (ii) equality, religious ... 41.2(e)* establishment clause ... 41.2*(b)(iv) exercise of ... 41.2(b)(i)-(iii) family law, religious or customary ... 41.1(c)(i), 41.6, 64.6(b)(ii) freedom not to believe ... 41.2(b)(i) Interim Constitution ... 41.1(c)(i) & (ii) international law ... 41.1(c)(iii) limitation of ... 34.5(b)(i), 34.8(c)(i), (iii) & (v), 41.2(c), 41.4 link to other rights ... 41.1(b), 41.2(a)* marriage ... 41.6, 58.1*(a), 58.4(a)(v) neutral measures, facially ... 41.2(c), 41.4(b)* opinion ... 41.2*(b)*(i) & (ii)
political choice ... 45.8
practice ... 41.2*(b)*(i)-(iii)
central to the religion ... 41.3*(b)* Rastafarian use of cannabis ... 34.8*(c)(v), 34.8(e)(ii) & (iii), 36.4(d)(i), 41.2(c), 41.3(a), 44.3(c)(viii), 58.4(a)(i) school prayer ... 41.2(d), 41.5 secular element ... 41.2(b)(i) sincerity of belief ... 41.3(a)* state institutions, religious observances in ... 41.5
separation of church and ... 41.2*(b)(iv), 41.2(d)* substantial burden test ... 41.3*(b)* thought ... 41.2*(b)(i) waiver of right ... 41.4(d)*
REMEDIES
3-step-procedure to choosing a remedy ... 9.2*(e)(iv)(aa)-(dd)* choice of remedy ... 9.2*(e)(i)-(iv) contractual relief ... 9.5(d)* criminal remedies ... 9.8
for detainees ... 51.3*(g)*

unconstitutionally obtained evidence ..... 9.8, 38.3*(b)(iv), 51.3(g), 52.10(a)* damages direct constitutional damages ..... 9.2*(f)(ii), 9.5(a)(ii)(aa)-(cc), 38.3(b)(i), 45.5(c), 56D.3(f)(ii), 9.3(b), 59.4(d)* indirect constitutional damages ..... 9.2*(f), 9.5(a)(i) quantum ..... 4.3(d)(iv), 9.5(a)(iii) declaratory orders ..... 9.2(b)(ii)(aa), 9.5(b)(i) & (ii), 9.5(c)(i), 9.6(a)* definition and meaning ..... 9.2*(a)* discretion ..... 9.2*(b)(ii)(aa), 9.2(c)(i)(aa), 9.2(d)(i) traditional vs constitutional remedies ..... 9.2(d)(i)(bb)* financial impact ..... 9.2*(e)(iv)(cc)(4), 9.4(d)(iii) interdicts ..... 9.5(c)(i)-(iii), 9.6(b), 9.6(c), 38.3(b)(ii) interim orders ..... 9.4(e)(bb)(y), 9.4(e)(cc), 9.5(c)(ii), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc)*
invalidity confirmation of ..... 3.4*(e), 4.3(c)(i), 5.3(c)* full declaration of ..... 9.4*(c)* hierarchy ..... 9.2*(d)(i)(aa), 9.4(a), 9.4(d)* objective unconstitutionality ..... 7.2*(c)(i), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 31.1(c), 31.4(v)(bb), 34.1(b), 34.6, 45.5(b)* retrospective application ..... 3.7*(b)(ii), 9.2(b)(ii)(bb), 9.4(e)(i)(aa)(y), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa)-(cc)* severance ..... 9.4*(d)(ii), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 32.5(b)(ii) severance, notional ..... 9.4(d)(ii) suspension ..... 3.7(b)(ii), 9.2(b)(ii)(bb), 9.4(e)(i)(aa)-(ee), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc)* negotiating a settlement ..... 9.6*(c)(i), 9.6(c)(vi) political rights ..... 45.5(c)* private law remedies ..... 9.2*(f), 9.5(a)(i) public procurement ..... 9.2(b)(ii)(bb), 9.2(b)(iii), 9.5(a)*(i), 25.9
reading difference between the two ..... 9.4*(b)(ii) reading down and indirect application ..... 9.4(b), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa)(x), 31.4(e)(vi), 32.5(b)(ii) reading in ..... 9.4(b)(ii), 9.4(d)(iii), 9.4(e)(i)(cc), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 32.5(b)(ii) relief appropriate ..... 9.2(e)(i)-(iv), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 38.3(b)(v), 59.4(d)* effective ..... 3.7*(c), 9.2(b)(ii)(aa), 9.2(e)(iv)(aa)(1)-(5), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 57.2(a)(i)(bb), 59.3(b)* substantive 63.9
rights and remedies, relationship between ..... 9.2*(c)(i)-(iv) SAHRC monitoring of government compliance ..... 24C.3(d)* separation of powers, balance with 9.2*(b)(iv), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc)(1), 9.4(d)(iii), 9.4(e)(i)(bb)(x), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc)* specialist legislation, ito 9.7
State duty
to comply with and enforce court orders ..... 3.7*(c)*
to provide evidence to court ..... 3.7*(b)(ii) supervisory orders ..... 9.6(c)(i)-(vi), 59.4(d)* ubi jus ibi remedium principle ..... 9.2*(b)(i) deviations ..... 9.2(b)(ii)-(iv) unequal distribution of benefits ..... 9.2(e)(iv)(cc)(4), 9.4(d)(iii), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 31.2(d)*(ii), 31.4(vi) REPRODUCTIVE RIGHTS see also ABORTION
abortion see ABORTION
access to health care 37.9
contraception and religion ..... 37.7, 37.10, 40.9*(c)*
dignity and ..... 36.4*(c)*(ii) discrimination on basis of pregnancy 37.4 reproductive autonomy 37.4
sterilisation ..... 40.9*(b)*
RESTRAINT OF TRADE see TRADE, OCCUPATION AND PROFESSION, FREEDOM OF RIPENESS see STANDING, RIPENESS AND MOOTNESS SABC

broadcasting of proceedings ..... 42.9*(c)*(iii)
former and current role ..... 24E.1 & 2 expression, freedom of ..... 42.7*(g)*(iii)
SAME-SEX RELATIONSHIPS
adoption ..... 35.5(v)(cc) association, freedom of ..... 44.3*(c)*(ii) & (x) custody 47.3
equality ..... 12.3*(d)(ii)(cc), 35.5(g)(v)(aa)-(dd), 42.5(d)* immigration ..... 9.4*(b)(ii), 35.5(g)(v)(aa), 44.3(c)(ii), 66.1(d)(ii) marriage ..... 9.4(d)*(iii)& (e)(i)(bb), 12.3*(d)(ii)(cc), 32.3(c)(iii)(bb), 35.5(g)(v)(dd), 36.5(a)(ii), 40.3(c)(ii) religious ..... 36.4(c)(d)(i), 58.1(a), 57.3(b), 58.4(a)(v) recognition of ..... 9.4(d)(iii), 12.3(d)(ii)(cc), 35.5(g)(v)(aa)* & (bb), 31.4*(e)(vii), 36.5(a)*(ii)
SANITATION, RIGHT TO international law ..... 56B.5*(a)* sewage treatment plants ..... 56B.4*(a)* South African law ..... 56B.5*(b)*
SCHOOL see EDUCATION
SECURITY FORCES see NATIONAL SECURITY, defence force
SECURITY OF THE PERSON see FREEDOM AND SECURITY OF THE PERSON
SECURITY SERVICES see NATIONAL SECURITY and POLICE SENTENCING AND PUNISHMENT
children 47.7
community-based punishment ..... 49.2*(a)(i) corporal punishment ..... 36.4(c)(iii), 36.4(d)(i), 40.7(a)(ii), 40.7(b)(i)(aa), 47.5(a), 49.2(d)* correctional supervision ..... 49.2*(a)(i), 49.3 & 3(b)(ii) courts' discretion in respect of ..... 49.2, 49.2(a)(i)–(ii), 49.2(b), 49.2(c)(i) cruel, inhuman and degrading ..... 36.4(c)(iii), 40.7(a)-(c), 49.2(c)* & (d)(i)-(iv)
'dangerous criminal' ..... 49.2*(c)(ii) death penalty ..... 39.5(a), 36.4(c)(iii), 49.2(c), 49.2(d)(i), 49.3(a)* extradition to a state which has ..... 18.3*(k), 30.4(e), 39.7, 40.7(a)(i) detention ..... 47.7, 49.2(d)* dignity ..... 36.4*(c)(iii), 49.2(d), 49.3(a)* double jeopardy ..... 51.5*(n)*
equality ..... 49.2*(b)*
exemplary sentences ..... 49.2*(c)* fines ..... 49.2*(a)(i) guidelines ..... 49.2(a)* hard labour ..... 29.2*(a)(i), 64.5(c)* imprisonment ..... 36.4*(c)(iii), 49.2(c), 49.2(d)(iii) & (iv), 49.3(a)* & (b)(i) legality defining penalties ..... 49.2*(a)* during imprisonment ..... 49.3*(b)* on release ..... 49.3*(b)* life sentence ..... 39.5*(b), 36.4(c)(iii), 40.7(b)(i)(bb), 49.2(d)* habitual criminal, indefinite incarceration of ..... 40.7*(b)(ii)(bb), 49.2(c)(ii) mandatory minimum sentences ..... 12.3(d)(i)(bb), 40.7(b)(ii)(aa), 49.2(c)* parole ..... 40.7*(b)(i)(bb), 49.2(c)(ii), 49.2(d)(ii) & (iii), 49.3(b)*(ii)
preventive sentences ..... 49.2*(c)* proportionality ..... 49.2*(c)(i)-(iv) rehabilitation ..... 49.2(a)(i), 49.3(a)n separation of powers ..... 12.3(d)(i)(bb)* suspended sentences ..... 49.2*(a)(i) torture ..... 40.1(a)(i) & (ii), 40.6(a)* &(b), 40.7*(b)(i)(cc), 49.2(d), 49.3(a)* SEPARATION OF POWERS between Parliament and National Executive ..... 4.3*(b)(ii), 12.3(b)(i), 12.3(d)(iii) Chapter 9 institutions ..... 12.3(a)(iii), 24C.4(a)* checks and balances ..... 12.2*(a), 12.2(b), 12.3(d)(i)(bb)* delegation of legislative authority ..... 12.3*(d)(iii) extraterritorial effect and ..... 31.6 & 6(a)* federalism as ..... 12.2*(c)* foreign law, applicability in RSA ..... 32.5*(c)(v)(bb)* historical development of the doctrine ..... 12.2*(a)* independent constitutional institutions ..... 12.3*(b)(iii) Interim Constitution ..... 12.3(a), 12.3(d)(iii) judicial review ..... 3.3(d), 12.3(d)(ii)(aa), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 12.3(d)(iii), 14.3(c)(bb)* remedies ..... 12.3*(d)(ii)(cc)* standard ..... 12.3*(d)(ii)(bb)* judiciary ..... 12.3*(b)(ii), 12.3(d)(i)(aa)* & (bb) constitutional and statutory interpretation ..... 32.1*(b), 32.3(d), 32.3(e)(iii), 32.4(c)(ii) shared constitutional interpretation ..... 31.4(vii), 32.2, 32.2(d), 34.1(c), 34.8(e)(i) justiciable claim ..... 12.3(c)(ii) media as the fourth estate ..... 12.2(c)* pre-1994 Constitutions 12.3

pre-eminent domain ..... 12.3*(d)(i) & (i)(aa)* socio-economic rights review and ..... 12.3*(d)(ii)(bb)* South African model of ..... 12.3*(c)(i) special adjudicative bodies ..... 12.3(d)(iv) time limits supporting ..... 12.2(c)* vertical separation of powers ..... 12.2*(c)*
SEXUAL ORIENTATION see also SAME-SEX RELATIONSHIPS and EQUALITY
custody 47.3
dignity ..... 35.1*(d)(i), 36.4(e)* equality ..... 35.5*(g)(v), 44.(3)(c)(ii) privacy ..... 44.(3)(c)*(ii)
SLAVERY, SERVITUDE AND FORCED LABOUR 64.1-6
definitions 64.4
dignity and ..... 36.2, 36.4*(g), 64.4(a)* forms of 64.6
international law 64.5
sexual slavery and trafficking ..... 34.8*(e)(iii)(bb), 36.4(g), 64.6(a), 64.6(b)*(iii)
SOCIAL SECURITY
access to ..... 56D.3*(b)* administrative justice rules applicable ..... 56D.4*(a)* & (b) basic income grant ..... 56D.5*(b)* beneficiaries ..... 56D.3*(e)*
case law ..... 56D.3*(f)*
children ..... 47.1, 47.4*(b)*, 47-16 fn3
child care grants ..... 47.4*(b), 56D.5(c)*(iii)
CRC ..... 56D.6*(c)*
class actions ..... 56D.4*(c)*
corruption and maladministration ..... 56D.3*(f)(ii) delays in deciding grant applications or payment ..... 56D.3(f)(ii), 56D.4(b)* definition 56D.2
dignity ..... 36.3*(d), 36.4(g)* & (i), 56D.3*(e), 56D.3(f)* disability grant ..... 56C.3*(b)(i)(cc), 56D.5(c)*(ii), 56D.7
domestic workers 56D.7
international law 56D.6
minimum core ..... 56D.3*(d)* negative violation ..... 56D.3*(a)* non-citizens ..... 34.5*(b)(ii), 56D.3(f)(i), 56D.4(d), 56D.5(c)(iv) old-age grant ..... 56D.5(c)(i) permanent residents ..... 34.5(b)(ii), 56D.3(d), 56D.3(f)*(i) policy 56D.5

progressive realisation and reasonableness ..... 56D.3*(c)-(f)* retrospective payouts of grants ..... 56D.3*(f)(ii) social relief of distress grant ..... 56C.3(b)(iii)(bb), 56D.5(c)(iii)(bb)*
South African Social Assistance Agency (SASSA) ..... 56D.4*(b), 56D.5(a)* statutory framework ..... 56D.5*(a)* Taylor Commission ..... 56D.3*(d), 56D.5(b)* termination of grants ..... 56D.3*(f)(ii), 56D.4(a)* & (b)
'unable to support themselves' ..... 56D.3*(e)*
SOCIO-ECONOMIC RIGHTS basic services, obligation to provide by municipality ..... 22.4*(b)* & (c)
beneficiaries ..... 56A.2*(c)*
categories of rights ..... 33.2*(c)(i), 56C.3(a), 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y)* negative entitlements .. 33.2*(b), 33.2(c)(i), 33.5(b)* & (c), 55.5, 55.6, 56A.2*(e), 56B.4(c)(i), 56C.3(a), 56D.3(a), 57.2(a)(i)(bb), 57.2(b)(ii)(bb)* qualified rights ..... 33.2*(c)(i), 33.5(a), 55.5, 56B.3(b)(i), 56C.3(a), 56D.3(c), 57.1, 57.2(a)(i)(bb)(y), 57.2(b)(i) unqualified rights ..... 33.2(c)(i), 33.8, 55.7, 55.8, 56C.3(a), 57.2(a)(iii), 57.3(c)(ii) children ..... 33.7, 47.4(a)-(e)*, 55.7
common law development ..... 33.11*(c), 55.6(a)-(c), 56C.3(b)(ii)(bb)* democracy and ..... 10.4*(c), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 56D.1 dignity ..... 33.4(b)*, 36.4(i) environment see ENVIRONMENTAL RIGHTS food see FOOD, RIGHT TO horizontal application ..... 33.11*(a)-(c)* housing see HOUSING
interconnectedness ..... 33.1, 33.4*(b)* international law see also various instruments under their own headings. 30.3, 33.2*(a), 33.4(c), 35.5(c)(v)(aa)* interpretation of access to ..... 33.5*(d), 56B.3(b)(v) available, existing resources ..... 33.2(a), 33.2(c)(i), 33.5(h), 56A.2(b)(vi)(bb), 56A.4(f)(ii) comparative law ..... 33.4(d), 33.5(c), 33.10(b)* limitations ..... 33.10*(a)* & (b), 34.5*(b)(ii), 56A.2(d)*
burden of justification ..... 34.5*(a)*, 35.6
minimum core ..... 33.5*(e)(i)-(iv), 56A.4(b)-(d), 56B.3(iii)(bb)* progressive realisation ..... 3.3, 33.2*(a), 33.2(c)(i), 33.5(g)(i)-(ii), 34.5(b)(ii), 47.4(b), 55.5(b), 56A.2(e)(vi)(aa), 56A.4(d), 56B.2(c), 56B.3(b)(iii)(cc)* & (iv), 57.2*(a)(i)(bb), 57.2(b)(i) reasonableness 12.3(d)(ii)(bb), 22.4(b), 33.5(f)(i)-(iv), 34.5(b)(ii), 56A.2(b)(vii), 55.3(c), 56A.3(c)-(d)* respect, protect, promote and fulfil, duty to ..... 33.2*(c)(ii), 33.5(b), 56B.4(b), 56C.3(a)* rights and duties ..... 55.3*(b)*
subsidiarity principle ..... 56B.3*(b)(iv) justiciability of ..... 33.2(b), 33.4(a), 55.3(a), 56A.2(a)* land see LAND RIGHTS legitimate expectations ..... 31.2*(d)(ii), 56B.4(c)(ii) litigating socio-economic rights ..... 3.3(c), 3.7(b)(i) burden of proof ..... 3.7(b)(i), 33.9, 34.5(a)*, 34.6
remedies ..... 9.2*(c)(iii)(bb)* & (ee), 9.6*(c)*(ii), 33.12
SAHRC and CGE, role of in ..... 24C.3*(d), 33.13 separation of powers influencing judicial review ..... 10.4(c), 12.3(d)(ii)(bb)*
social security see SOCIAL SECURITY SOUTH AFRICAN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION 24C.1-4 SOUTH AFRICAN NATIONAL DEFENCE FORCE see NATIONAL SECURITY SOUTH AFRICAN POLICE SERVICE see POLICE SOUTHERN AFRICAN DEVELOPMENT COMMUNITY (SADC) social security ..... 56D.6*(e)*
SPAIN

local government ..... 22.1*(b)*
STANDING, RIPENESS AND MOOTNESS differentiating between 7.5
mootness abortion ..... 7.4*(a)* concept of ..... 7.4*(a)*
for appeals ..... 7.4*(c)*
pre-1994 understanding ..... 7.4*(b)*
public interest override ..... 3.4*(a), 7.4(c)* ripeness as subsidiarity concept ..... 7.3*(c)*(iii)
concept of ..... 7.3*(a)* failure to exhaust other remedies ..... 7.3*(c)(ii), 23B.6(b)*(ii)
pre-1994 understanding ..... 7.3*(b)* qua premature action ..... 7.3*(c)*(i) standing administrative action 63.8
association acting in interest of members ..... 7.2*(c)(v) broad approach to ..... 3.4(a), 7.2(c)* class actions ..... 7.2*(c)(iii), 32.5(b)(iii)(bb)*
concept of ..... 7.2*(a)* defamation suit ..... 42.9*(a)(i) environmental rights ..... 50.4(b)* land restitution ..... 48.8*(c)(ii)(aa)*
non-chapter 2 litigation ..... 7.2*(d)*
objective unconstitutionality ..... 7.2*(c)(i), 9.4(e)(ii)(aa), 31.1(c), 31.4(v)(bb), 34.1(b), 34.6, 45.5(b)* own interest ..... 7.2*(c)*(i)
political rights 45.4
pre-1994 understanding ..... 7.2*(b)*
public interest ..... 7.2*(c)(iv), 23B.6(b)(ii) public participation ..... 17.6(a)*(i) STARE DECISIS
constitutional interpretation ..... 32.2*(b), 32.5(b)* & (b)(i) common law and ..... 31.1*(c), 31.4(a)(v)(dd), 31.4(e)*(x)
First Certification Judgment ..... 2.5*(b)(i), 32.2(a)* not in international law ..... 30.2*(a)*
STATE OF EMERGENCY see NATIONAL SECURITY
STATE OF NATIONAL DEFENCE s ee NATIONAL SECURITY
SUPREME COURT OF APPEAL ..... 3.5*(b)* common law development jurisdiction ..... 3.5*(b),* 4.3*(d)(i)(aa), 4.3(d)(ii), 11.3(b)* & (c), 31.4*(e)(ii)(bb), 32.5(b)(iii)(aa)*
mootness ..... 7.4*(c)*
stare decisis ..... 31.4*(e)(x)(aa)* & (bb) labour issues, jurisdiction in ..... 53.1*(b)*
SWITZERLAND
co-operative government 14.2
TERRORISM states of emergency ..... 61.1*(b), 61.3(b)*
TRADE, OCCUPATION AND PROFESSION, FREEDOM OF beneficiaries ..... 31.3*(b)*, 54.3
comparative law ..... 54.2*(b)*
contractual freedom ..... 36.4*(f)*
Final Constitution
case law 54.3, 54.4
Interim Constitution 54.1, 54.4
movement and residence, freedom of, and ..... 66.1*(b)(i), 66.1(c)* practice requirements by regulatory bodies ..... 44.3*(c)*(iv) regulated by law 54.3, 54.5

restraint of trade ..... 36.4*(f), 44.3(c)(iv), 54.4, 66.1(c)*
TRADITIONAL LEADERS administrative law ..... 26.6*(c)(iii), 26.6(d)(iii) appointment ..... 26.6(a)*
Bills on traditional leadership ..... 26.5*(b)(ii), 26.5(c)*
Black Administration Act ..... 26.3, 26.6*(a)* colonial and apartheid structure 26.3
Communal Land Rights Act 11 of 2004 ..... 26.5*(a), 26.6(d)*(iii) & (iv), 26.7
Constitutional Principle XIII.2 ..... 26.4 CONTRALESA 26.3, 26.4
environmental rights ..... 26.6*(d)(ii) executive power ..... 26.6(c)(iii) Houses of traditional leaders ..... 26.5(b)* jurisdiction ..... 26.6*(b), 26.6(c)(i) KwaZulu-Natal ..... 26.5(b)(i) & (ii), 26.5(e)* land allotment ..... 26.6*(d)(i) boundary disputes ..... 26.5(a)* common resources ..... 26.6*(d)(ii) expropriation ..... 26.6(d)(iii) local government and ..... 22.2(c)(iv), 26.5(d)* male primogeniture ..... 26.6*(a)*, 26.7
pre-colonial structure 26.2 provincial powers ..... 20.4*(c), 26.5(a)-(d)* removal ..... 26.6*(a)* remuneration ..... 17.6*(c), 26.5(c)* separation of powers ..... 26.1, 26.6*(c)* succession ..... 26.6*(a), 26.7 traditional councils ..... 26.5(a)* traditional courts ..... 26.6*(c)(i), 26.7, 51.5(e)(i), 59.2(b)* women as ..... 26.1, 26.5*(a), 26.5(b)(i), 26.6(a)* TRAFFICKING, HUMAN & SEXUAL ..... 34.8*(e)(iii)(bb), 40.10(b), 64.5(b), 64.6(a), 64.6(b)*(iii)
TRANSITIONAL PROVISIONS
amending of ..... 17.2*(c), 19.1(c)* assets and liabilities 28.3
executive authority
Final Constitution ..... 28.2*(b)*
Interim Constitution ..... 19.3*(a)(ii), 28.2(a)* TRIAL see also CRIMINAL PROCEDURE fair ..... 59.4*(b)*
beginning of right ..... 52.2*(c)* criminal trial ..... 51.1*(a), 51.5(b)-(n)* language requirement 65.6
limitation ..... 34.1*(a), 34.8(c)(i), (iii) & (v), 51.1(b)(iv) press freedom ..... 42.9(c)*
sub judice rule ..... 42.9*(c)(iv)(bb)*
substantive fairness ..... 52.2*(a)* public hearing ..... 51.5*(e)(ii), 51.5(k), 52.3, 59.4(b)*(v)
open justice principle ..... 23B.5*(c)(ii), 42.9(c)*(i) TRUTH AND RECONCILIATION COMMISSION ..... access to information 62.7
organ of state, as ..... 31.4*(f)*(ii), 62.6
Promotion of National Unity and Reconciliation Act 34 of 1995 ..... 32.3*(c)(iii), 32.4(c)(i)(aa), 32.5(c)(v)(aa), 51.5(m)*, 59.5

record function ..... 31.2*(d)(ii), 36.1(a)* retroactivity ..... 51.5*(m)*
UBUNTU ..... 2.2*(a), 13.2(a), 32.3(c)(iii)(bb), 32.4(c)(i)(ff), 34.8(e)(ii)(bb)(x), 36.1, 36.2(e), 36.4(d)(ii), 36.5(c)*, 48.4
UGANDA
water, right to ..... 56B.2*(d)*
UN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMITTEE (UNHRC)
access to courts ..... 59.2*(c)* community rights ..... 58.3*(b)(i), 58.4(a)(i) conscientious objectors ..... 64.6(h)* life, right to ..... 39.5*(a)* right to vote ..... 45.2*(d)*
states of emergency ..... 61.3*(b)*
UNITED KINGDOM
constitutional interpretation ..... 32.1*(b), 32.3(b)(ii) delegation of legislative authority ..... 12.3(d)*(iii)
outsourcing judicial power ..... 12.3*(d)*(iv)
speech, freedom of contempt of court ..... 42.9*(c)*
copyright, fair use ..... 42.9*(d)*(ii)
hate speech ..... 42.8*(c)*
journalistic privilege ..... 42.7*(d)(ii)(aa)*
sub judice rule ..... 42.9*(c)(iv)(bb)*
substantive legitimate expectations doctrine 63.10 water, right to ..... 56B.2*(d)(iv), 56B.4(c)(ii), 56B.4(c)(i) UNITED NATIONS DECLARATION OF HUMAN RIGHTS religion, freedom of ..... 41.1(c)(iii) right to health ..... 56A.4(a)* UNITED STATES
assembly, freedom of 43.1-3
co-operative government 14.2
constitutional interpretation ..... 31.4*(e)(vii), 32.3(b)(i), 32.3(c)(i), 32.5(c)(v)(bb)*
criminal procedure accused, rights of ..... 51.5*(j)*(ii) & (iii), (k) & (m), 54.c(i) arrested person, rights of ..... 51.4*(d), 54.c(i) detainee, rights of ..... 51.3(f), 54.c(i) due process ..... 51.1(a)* delegated governance ..... 18.3*(f)*
education
affirmative action admission policies ..... 57.2*(b)(ii)(bb)* basic ..... 57.2*(a)(ii) public ..... 64.6(g)*
equality ..... 58.1*(b)*
extraterritorial effect of constitution 31.6
jurisdiction
political question ..... 12.3*(d)(ii)(aa)*
labour relations
closed shop agreements ..... 53.3*(b)*
language rights ..... 58.4*(a)*(vi)
legislative conflict ..... 16.3*(c)*
local government ..... 22.1*(b)*
organ of state ..... 31.4*(f)*
Presidential immunity ..... 18.2*(f)*
privacy
information ..... 38.3*(a)(i)(bb)* personal autonomy ..... 38.3*(a)(i)(aa)(C), 38.3(a)(iii) search and seizure ..... 38.3(a)(ii) property, expropriation of (regulatory takings) 46.7 religion, freedom of ..... 41.1(c)(iii), 41.2(b)(iv), 41.3(b), 41.4(b)* remedies ..... 9.2*(c)(ii), 9.2(c)(iii)(aa)*, (bb), (cc) & (dd), 9.2*(c)(iv), 9.2(e)(iv)(cc), 9.6(c)*(i)

reproductive rights abortion 37.2, 37.3. 37.10
contraception 37.7, 37.10 separation of powers ..... 4.2*(a), 12.2(a)* & (c), 12.3*(b)* slavery and servitude ..... 64.4*(b), 64.6(d)* speech, freedom of ..... 10.4*(a), 42.4, 42.5(a)*, (b)
academic freedom ..... 42.7*(f)* artistic creativity ..... 42.7*(e)*
commercial speech ..... 42.9*(f)*
contempt of court ..... 42.9*(c)* copyright ..... 42.9*(d)(ii) defamation ..... 42.9(a)*
hate speech ..... 42.8*(c)* incitement of violence ..... 42.8*(a)* journalistic privilege ..... 42.7*(d)(ii)(aa)* national security ..... 42.9*(g)*(iii)
nude dancing ..... 42.9*(e)*(v)
pornography ..... 42.9*(e)*
prior restraint ..... 42.9*(h)*(iii)
sub judice rule ..... 42.9*(c)(iv)(bb)* standing, ripeness and mootness ..... 7.3*(a), 7.4(a), 7.5 state constitutions ..... 21.2(a)* states of emergency ..... 61.3*(a)* Supreme Court
sentencing ..... 49.2*(b)*
Supreme Court jurisdiction ..... 4.1, 4.3*(b)* vagueness and overbreadth doctrine ..... 34.7*(c)(ii)(cc)*
vote, right to ..... 45.10*(b)(i) VEXATIOUS LITIGATION access to courts ..... 34.3(b), 59.3(b), 59.4(vi) costs ..... 3.6, 4.3(b)(iii), 6.3(c), 6.7(a)* & (b), 59.4*(a)*(vii) WATER, RIGHT TO see also SANITATION, RIGHT TO access to ..... 56B.3*(b)(v) disconnection ..... 56B.4(c)(i), 56B.4(d)(ii) pre-paid meters ..... 56B.4(c)*(ii) affordability
free water policy ..... 56B.4*(f)(ii) full cost recovery principle ..... 56B.4(f)(i) beneficiaries ..... 56B.3(b)(ii) comparative law ..... 56B.2(d)* constitutional provisions recognising right ..... 56B.3*(a)* content of the right ..... duty to promote ..... 56B.4*(e)*
environmental right ..... 50.3*(b)(ii)(aa)(y)* equality considerations ..... 56B4.(g) government duties across different spheres of ..... 56B.4*(a)*, (b)
international law 56B.2
content of the right ..... 56B.2*(b)* respect, protect and fulfil ..... 56B.2*(c)* legislation ..... 56B.2*(a)* minimum core v evidence based minimum ..... 56B.3(iii)(bb) privatisation ..... 56B.2*(c), 56B.3(b)(v), 56B.4(d)*

reasonableness ..... 56B.3*(b)(i), 56B.3(b)(iii)(bb), 56B.3(b)(iv), 56B.4(g)(ii) riparian principle ..... 56B.3(a)* sanitation 56B.5
sewage treatment plants ..... 56B.4*(a)* subsidiarity principle ..... 56B.3*(b)*(iv)
sufficient ..... 56B.3(iii)
Water Services Act 108 of 1997 ..... 56B.2*(a), 56B.3(b)(iii), 56B.4(a), 56B.4(c)(i), 56B.4(f)*
WELFARE see SOCIAL SECURITY
WOMEN
Commission for Gender Equality 24D.1-6, 33.13
Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW) ... 56A.4*(b), 56B.2(a)* customary law see CUSTOMARY LAW family see FAMILY
gender equality see GENDER EQUALITY
HIV/AIDS see HIV/AIDS households headed by ..... 55.6*(b)(ii) housing ..... 55.4(b)(iv) land rights ..... 48.7(b)(v)(dd)* & (c) reproductive rights see REPRODUCTIVE RIGHTS servitude ..... 64.4*(b)*
sexual trafficking ..... 36.4*(g), 34.8(e)(iii)(bb), 64.6(a), 64.6(b)(iii) sexual violence against ..... 36.4(c)(i) by police ..... 23B.3(iii) social security ..... 56D.5(c)*(i)-(iii), 56D.7
traditional leaders, as see TRADITIONAL LEADERS water, right to ..... 56B.2*(a)* & (b), 56B.5*(a)*(i) ZIMBABWE
access to courts ..... 59.3*(a)(i) association, freedom of ..... 44.1(d)*
contempt of court ..... 42.9*(c)* impartial court ..... 51.5*(e)(i) sentencing ..... 49.3(a)*