[2] S v Williams & Others 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC) at para 92 ('I accordingly find that the provisions of s 294 of the Act violate the provisions of ss 10 and 11(2) of the Constitution and that they cannot be saved by the operation of s 33(1) of the Constitution. Although the provision concerned is a law of general application the limitation it imposes on the rights in question is, in the light of all the circumstances, not reasonable, not justifiable and it is furthermore not necessary. The provisions are therefore unconstitutional.') permit the justification of conduct for which no legal authorization exists.[1] The second class of cases encompasses those instances in which the law which purportedly authorizes the conduct found to limit a fundamental right does not qualify as 'law of general application'. In short, FC s 36 only permits the justification of law that possesses four formal attributes. Parties that have relied upon law that does not possess these four formal attributes cannot make use of FC s 36's general justificatory framework.

(i) Law and conduct

Law that fails to meet the 'law' requirement of law of general application falls into roughly two categories. Those categories are: (aa) grant of power to government officials not constrained by identifiable legal standards; and (bb) commissions and omissions. Commissions and omissions that fail to meet the desiderata for 'law of general application' fall into two related categories: (x) conduct carried out under colour of law but beyond the scope of actual legal authority; (y) the failure to discharge constitutional duties.

(aa) Grant to and exercise of power by government officials not constrained by identifiable legal standards

The most obvious instances in which the state may not avail itself of the justificatory framework provided for in FC s 36 are those cases in which it can rely upon no law for authorization of its conduct. In Pretoria City Council v Walker, for example, the applicant challenged a decision by the City Council that differentiated between categories of ratepayer in terms of race.[2] The Court noted that the respondent's challenge under the equality clause, IC s 8, was to the conduct of the council, not to law. Since, as the Court correctly reasoned, that conduct 'was clearly not authorised, either expressly or by necessary implication by law of general application', IC s 33(1), the limitation clause, could not be used to justify the Council's unfair discrimination.[3]

In De Lille & another v Speaker of the National Assembly, the applicant was found guilty of misconduct and suspended by Parliament for an alleged violation of parliamentary etiquette.[4] The High Court found that the punishment limited the applicant's rights under FC ss 16, 33 and 34 — as well as FC s 58 — and that it could not be justified under FC 36. Parliament's actions could not be justified in terms of FC s 36, because, as Hlophe J wrote, they

[1] Whether conduct is, in fact, always authorized by law is a philosophical problem addressed elsewhere in this work. See Stu Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31.

[2] 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC)('Pretoria City Council').

[3] Ibid at para 82.

[4] 1998 (3) SA 430 (C), 1998 (7) BCLR 916 (C)('De Lille').

> did not take place in terms of law of general application. There is no law of general application which authorises such a suspension. It is not authorised by the Constitution, the Powers and Privileges of Parliaments Act of 1963 or the Standing Rules of the National Assembly. The law of Parliamentary privilege does not qualify as a law of general application for purposes of s 36. It is not codified or capable of ascertainment. Nor is it based on a clear system of precedent. Therefore there is no guarantee of parity of treatment.[1]

That no law authorized Parliament's conduct should have been sufficient to justify the De Lille Court's conclusion. However, as the quotation above reflects, Hlophe J felt it important to emphasize that Parliament's actions — even if dressed up as law — could not satisfy the four criteria by which any law of general application must be measured.

The Constitutional Court, the Supreme Court of Appeal and the High Court have all struggled with the problem of how to characterize — in terms of law of general application — contractual or quasi-contractual relationships that limit the exercise of fundamental rights. In two cases, the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal characterized these relationships as conduct ungoverned by law. In a third case, the High Court held the opposite to be true. For reasons that we hope to make clear, only the High Court's analysis makes sense of the problem.

In Hoffmann v South African Airways, South African Airways ('SAA'), a subsidiary of Transnet, and thus an organ of state, was found to have unfairly discriminated against an applicant for employment.[2] SAA's refusal to hire the applicant because he was HIV-positive violated FC s 9. The Constitutional Court held that the state could not, in terms of FC s 36, seek to justify its unfair discrimination, because the discrimination had not been authorized by a law of general application.[3] The Constitutional Court did not even bother to entertain the argument that the extant law of contract, at the time the dispute arose, provided support for SAA's conclusion that it could hire whomever it thought best suited for the position of cabin steward.

The problem of how to understand the nature of state action with respect to contractual arrangements is raised once again in Transnet Ltd v Goodman Brothers (Pty) Ltd.[4] After reaching the conclusion that the terms of a tender constituted a limitation of FC s 33, the right to administrative justice, the Supreme Court of Appeal concluded that those contractual terms did not, themselves, constitute law of general application for the purposes of justification under FC s 36. However, if one grants that such waivers exist — which one of the authors of this chapter has argued strenuously we should not do[5] — then one must ask how waivers come to exist. They come to exist in terms of the law of contract. Thus, if one chooses to

[1] De Lille (supra) at para 37.
[2] 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC)('Hoffman')
[3] Ibid at para 41.
[4] 2001 (1) SA 853 (SCA), 2001 (2) BCLR 176 (SCA)('Transnet')
[5] See Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.7.

recognize the existence of constitutional waivers — which we again warn one should not — then one is committed to the proposition that law of general application — the law of contract — authorizes the waiver. Only when one denies the existence of waiver as a conceptually meaningful entity does it make sense to speak of conduct that cannot be justified by reference to law.[1]

The problems that attend the description of contractual relationships in terms of law of general application are thrown into somewhat sharper relief by disputes between private parties governed by common law. In these disputes, no questions about the legitimacy of the exercise of state power arises.[2] That is to say, the court's view of the underlying basis for the dispute is not obscured by such public law principles as the ultra vires doctrine. For example, in Taylor v Kurtstag NO & Others, the High Court was asked to decide whether the exclusion of the applicant by the respondent from participation in Jewish religious rituals could be justified.[3] The High Court correctly concluded that it could be. The High Court was not, however, entirely clear about the provenance of the law that enabled the exclusion to be justified. Having found that the applicant's FC s 15 and 31 rights had been limited by the respondent, the High Court felt obliged to ask 'whether the internal rules of a religious group … qualify as law of general application'.[4] This, Malan J concludes, is the wrong way to go about solving the problem. Rather, he suggests, the law of general application at issue in the case embraces the body of common law rules that permit individuals and groups to freely associate. It was such law upon which the respondent relied when excluding the applicant from participating in the community's religious rituals, and it was this body of common law that justified the limitations placed upon the applicant's rights of religion and religious practice.[5]

(bb) Commission and omission

(x) Conduct carried out under colour of law but beyond the scope of actual legal authority

Administrative or executive action may be deemed not to satisfy this criterion of 'law' where law enforcement officials act in a manner that infringes fundamental rights without possessing clear legal authority to do so. Such actions might include the failure of the police to inform an arrested person that she has a right to counsel where no statutory provision or rule of common law specifies the [1] Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.7.

[2] See, eg, Fidelity Guards Holdings (Pty) Ltd t/a Fidelity Guards v Pearmain 2001 (2) SA 853 (SE), 1997 (10) SACR 1443 (SE)(Insofar as a restraint of trade clause constitutes a limitation on rights entrenched in FC s 22, the common law rules of contract that sanction such clauses constitute law of general application that comply with the proportionality requirements of FC s 36(1).)

[3] 2005 (1) SA 362 (W), 2005 (7) BCLR 705 (W).

[4] Ibid at 385–386.

[5] Ibid at 387.

conditions under which such a failure to inform could legitimately occur.[1] Likewise, if a law enforcement official were to take a confession without informing the accused of his right to remain silent — in the absence of controlling legal authority — then the action would not be justifiable under the limitation clause.[2] Although such administrative or executive action would lack the four formal attributes of a law of general application — parity of treatment, non-arbitrariness, precision and accessibility — and thus fail the second part of the law of general application test, there seems to be no good reason to allow the analysis to go that far.[3]

Minister of Safety & Security & Another v Xaba offers a paradigmatic example of law enforcement officials acting under colour of law without possessing the requisite legal authority to do so.[4] In Xaba, police officers compelled a suspect to have surgery to remove a bullet that they believed would provide evidence connecting the suspect to a crime he was alleged to have committed. Neither the Criminal Procedure Act nor any other law authorizes surgery without consent. As a result, the exercise of state power to compel surgery of a suspect, in the absence of legal authority,[5] failed to satisfy the 'law' leg of the test for law of general application and

[1] See R v Therens [1985] 1 SCR 613, 18 DLR (4th) 655.

[2] See Frank Snyckers & Jolandi le Roux 'Criminal Procedure: Rights of Arrested, Detained and Accused Persons' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 51. See also R v Hebert [1990] 2 SCR 151, 57 CCC (3d) 1.

[3] But see S v Mathebula 1997 (1) SACR 10 (W), 1997 (1) BCLR 123 (W). In Mathubela, Claasens J's reliance on the notion of waiver results in a critical error in reasoning with regard to whether or not law of general application exists that will permit the state to argue in justification of its limitation of the right to remain silent. The state does not claim that a rule of law — in the form of legislation or common law — exists that permits police officers to extract confessions without informing an arrested person of her right to remain silent. Instead, the state claims that the doctrine of waiver constitutes the rule of law — the law of general application — upon which the state relies as a justification for its infringement of various fair trial rights under IC s 25. The honourable judge concurs. As one of the authors has argued at length elsewhere in this work, both the state and the judge must be wrong. No such thing as waiver exists. If no such thing as waiver exists, then there can be no general law of application upon which the state, in this case, can rely. See Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.7 ('Put pithily, what is at issue in all these cases is not the waiver of a right, but the interpretation of a right. . . . Thus whether we are talking about life, dignity, torture, slavery, religion, expression or property, the question is always the same: does the right permit the kind of activity, relationship or status contemplated at some point in time by the parties before the court. If it does not, then . . . the right bars the law or conduct contemplated and no such thing as waiver can occur. If the right in question permits the kind of activity or agreement in question, then the parties may do as they wish and the question of waiver never arises.')

[4] 2003 (2) SA 703 (D), 2004 (10) SACR 149 (D).

[5] An argument could be made that many of these cases could be brought under the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act ('PAJA'). Were that so, only in cases such as Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC) and K v Minister of Safety and Security 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC) — where no statutory or common-law remedy exists — would there be a need to develop the law and to create an appropriate remedy — in terms of FC s 8(3) — in direct reliance on a constitutional right.

the state could not justify its prima facie limitation of the suspect's FC s 12 right to freedom and security of the person.[1]

(y) The failure to discharge constitutional duties

The class of cases that form this category could be treated as part of the preceding category. One might argue that it does not matter whether the violation of a right occurs through action or inaction, given that for the purposes of 'law of general application' analysis all that matters is that neither the commission nor the omission are authorized by law. However, we believe that the failure to discharge 'constitutional duties' constitutes a unique enough transgression in our constitutional order to warrant separate discussion.

In President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd, the Constitutional Court found that the state had failed to take 'reasonable steps' to discharge its responsibilities — under FC s 34 read with FC s 1*(c)* — to provide Modderklip Boerdery with an effective remedy.[2] Moreover, the state failed to offer any 'acceptable reasons' for this failure to act. Given that no law could be invoked to justify this failure to act, the Court noted that FC s 36 'is not applicable … since no law of general application' actually limited Modderklip's rights.[3] The state's omission amounted to conduct unauthorized by law.

The state found itself in a similar position in August & Another v Electoral Commission & Others.[4] The state had neither created the necessary mechanism that would enable eligible prisoners to register and to vote, nor had it sought to disqualify them through legislation. As a result, once the applicant had established that the state had not taken any steps to make the exercise of the franchise possible, and had thereby violated FC s 19, the state could not then 'seek to [1] There would seem to us to be a host of other cases in which state actors, acting under the colour of law, have been found to be acting outside the scope of their legal authority and in violation of constitutional rights. In many of these cases, however, the courts have chosen not to view the violation as a direct infringement of a fundamental right. Instead, they have described the unconstitutional act as a reflection of a lacuna in the common law or a statute, and have developed the common law or construed the statute accordingly. See K v Minister of Safety and Security 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC); Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC); Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC). Because the court refuses, in these cases, to engage in direct application of the Bill of Rights and the concomitant two-stage analysis, the court never has to ask whether the act in question could be justified by reference to some law of general application.

[2] 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC) at para 51 ('The obligation resting on the State in terms of s 34 of the Constitution was, in the circumstances, to take reasonable steps to ensure that Modderklip was, in the final analysis, provided with effective relief. The State could have expropriated the property in question or provided other land, a course that would have relieved Modderklip from continuing to bear the burden of providing the occupiers with accommodation. The state failed to do anything and accordingly breached Modderklip's constitutional rights to an effective remedy as required by the rule of law, s 1(c), and entrenched in s 34 of the Constitution.')(Emphasis added.)

[3] Ibid at para 52.

[4] 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC)('August').

justify the threatened infringement of prisoners' rights in terms of s 36 of the Constitution as there was no law of general application upon which they could rely to do so'.[1]

(ii) Criteria for law of general application

Assuming that the limitation of a fundamental right takes place in terms of law, the next question a court must ask is whether the law in question is 'law of general application'. A law of general application, rightly described, possesses the following four features: (1) parity of treatment, (2) non-arbitrariness, (3) accessibility or public availability; and (4) precision or clarity.

The case law on this subject remains surprisingly thin. As a result, we use the extant case law and foreign jurisprudence to support a 'preferred reading': namely that a 'law of general application' — grounded in an underlying commitment to the rule of law — must possess the aforementioned four attributes.

(aa) Parity of treatment

The word 'general' in 'law of general application' is a bit of a misnomer. It does not, as many an uninitiated student of constitutional law has concluded, literally mean that the law must apply to everyone.[2]

First, it means that the state — through the legislature, the executive, and the judiciary — must, broadly speaking, treat similarly situated persons the same. In Joubert v Van Rensburg, for example, the court remarked obiter that the state could not justify deprivations of property in terms of the Extension of Security of Tenure Act[3] (ESTA) because ESTA had burdened only agricultural property.[4] For the purposes of satisfying the parity of treatment requirement of the 'law of general application' test, the Joubert court suggested that the apposite provisions of ESTA ought to have applied to all property owners.

[1] August (supra) at paras 22–23.

[2] Mhlekwa v Head of the Western Tembuland Regional Authority & Another; Feni v Head of the Western Tembuland Regional Authority & Another 2001 (1) SA 574, 622B (Tk)('Mhlekwa'). The court held that the Regional Authority Courts Act 13 of 1982 (Tk) is law of general application despite the fact that the law does not apply to all residents of South Africa. The court cites in support of this conclusion the reasoning of the Constitutional Court in Makwanyane. See Makwanyane (supra) at para 32. It quotes, with approval, De Waal and Currie, who write, as follows:

> It would be absurd to suggest that . . . a law of [the] Gauteng legislature cannot qualify as 'law of general application' simply because it does not apply uniformly throughout the Republic. The structure of government established in the Constitution envisages legislation that is limited in its area of application and accordingly provincial legislation will qualify as a law of general application for purposes of s 36.

Johan De Waal, Iain Currie & Gerhard Erasmus Bill of Rights Handbook (4th Edition, 2001) 116 (quoted in Mhlekwa (supra) at 622C–D).

[3] Act 62 of 1997.

[4] Joubert & Others v Van Rensburg & Others 2001 (1) SA 753, 797 (W)('In its content, in the setting of the particular statute, and in the manner in which the Tenure Act handles the situation, the Tenure Act is not 'of general application' in burdening only agricultural property.') The judgment of the High Court in this case was severely criticized by the Constitutional Court in Mkangeli & Others v Joubert & Others. 2001 (2) SA 1191 (CC), 2001 (4) BCLR 316 (CC).

Second, parity of treatment in a constitutional state committed to the rule of law means that the governed and the governors are subject to the same penalties and receive the same privileges. In De Lille, the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal concluded, on different grounds, that Parliament's naked exercise of power with respect to its suspension of MP Patricia de Lille did not satisfy the requirement that Parliament itself must abide by rules that are clearly discernible to all persons in advance of any action that Parliament or that another state actor undertakes.[1] Both courts demanded that Parliament treated the governed — in this case Ms de Lille — as it would treat the governors — itself.

Moreover, both courts seemed to indicate that such laws could not take the form of edicts articulated by relatively transient majorities in the anticipation of the commission of an offence or after the commission of the offence. Language in both judgments suggests that the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal would — were the terminology part of South African law — characterize the sanctions imposed by Parliament upon Ms de Lille as a bill of attainder.

(bb) Non-arbitrariness

Laws of general application must enable citizens to conform their behaviour to a discernible standard. In order for them to do so, the state — whether in the form of the executive or the judiciary — must be able to enforce the law according to a discernible standard. In Case & Curtis, the Constitutional Court held that the definition of 'obscenity' in the Indecent or Obscene Photographic Matter Act[2] was of 'such indeterminate reach' that it could not but result in arbitrary enforcement.[3] The Case & Curtis Court found that the definition of 'obscenity' invariably swept up into the Act's proscriptive net constitutionally protected expression as well as constitutionally unprotected expression. The arbitrariness or standardlessness of the definition led, inexorably, to a finding by the Court that the law was void for overbreadth:

> One need proceed no further to appreciate that the means embodied in s 2(1), read with the definition of obscene or indecent material, which includes within its overbroad compass a vast array of incontestably constitutionally protected categories of expression, are entirely disproportionate to whatever constitutionally permissible objectives might underlie the statute. Such a law is ipso facto not reasonable within the meaning of s 33 (1)(a)(i).[4]

[1] The Cape High Court analyzed the problem in terms of the Bill of Rights. See De Lille v Speaker of the National Assembly 1998 (3) SA 430, 455 (C), 1998 (7) BCLR 916 (C)(Parliament's conduct impaired the exercise of the right to freedom of expression in terms of FC ss 58 and 16. Because Parliament's treatment of parliamentary privilege amounted to conduct not governed by law of general application, it could not be saved by FC s 36.) The Supreme Court of Appeal preferred to analyze the matter in terms of the common law. But it did not overrule or contradict the High Court's findings in the matter. See Speaker of the National Assembly v De Lille & Another 1999 (4) SA 863 (SCA), 1999 (11) BCLR 1339 (SCA)(Court found suspension beyond the scope of Parliament's authority in the absence of legislation or rules that might permit such punishment.)

[2] Act 37 of 1967.

[3] Case & Another v Minister of Safety and Security & Others; Curtis v Minister of Safety and Security & Others 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BLCR 609 (CC)('Case & Curtis') at para 61 n98.

[4] Ibid at para 61.

While the Court was certainly correct in its conclusion that the definition of 'obscenity' in the Indecent or Obscene Photographic Matter Act ('IOPMA') could not satisfy FC s 36, its imprecise use of the term 'proportionality' as a catch-all for all aspects of FC s 36 analysis leads it to confuse substantive questions about the means employed by a law and the objectives of a law with more formal questions about the nature of the law. The definition of obscenity violates the threshold test for a law of general application not because it impairs more than is absolutely necessary our expressive rights, or because it imposes greater costs than benefits. It certainly does both. The definition of obscenity in IOPMA fails the test for law of general application, because it is a standardless standard that vitiates the commitment to the rule of law.[1] That IOPMA's definition of 'obscenity' cannot satisfy the law of general application test means that the Case & Curtis Court should never have had to engage in proportionality analysis.[2]

(cc) Precision or clarity

A third, and closely-related, criterion for law of general application is precision. Whereas the criterion of non-arbitrariness tends to emphasize the potential for poorly-constructed law to result in the abuse of state power, the criterion of precision or clarity emphasizes the need, in a society committed to the rule of law, for individuals to be able to regulate themselves. In a society of autonomous moral agents, and in a state that accords such agents equal dignity and respect, the rightness of actions must be said to flow from the choices of the citizens themselves to conform their behaviour to the law, and not from ex post facto assessments of justice as divined by some leviathan.[3]

[1] See, further, Executive Council, Western Cape Legislature, & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC). The Executive Council, Western Cape Court found that the delegation of authority from Parliament to the President failed to set clear limits on what the executive could and could not do. Although this case turned on the doctrine of separation of powers, the failure of the legislature to articulate non-arbitrary guidelines for the exercise of public power is of a piece with the Court's doctrinal concerns in determining the formal contours of law of general application. See also Janse van Rensburg NO v Minister of Trade and Industry & Another NNO 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC)(Where significant powers of discretion are conferred upon a functionary, the legislature must provide guidance as to the manner in which those powers are to be exercised; the absence of such guidance may render a statutory provision unconstitutional); Panama Refining Co v Ryan 293 US 388 (1935)(Delegation of authority to executive declared unconstitutional because Congress had abdicated responsibility for setting clear policy limits on executive action.)

[2] The Constitutional Court's inclination to describe all aspects of limitations analysis as part of its overarching proportionality assessment does not count as an argument in favour of engaging questions of arbitrariness in what the text strongly suggests, and what we contend, is a subsequent stage of limitations analysis.

[3] See Ferreira v Levin NO 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira') at para 4 (Ackermann J wrote: 'Human dignity cannot be fully valued or respected unless individuals are able to develop their humanity, their "humanness" to the full extent of its potential. Each human being is uniquely talented. Part of the dignity of every human being is the fact and awareness of this uniqueness. An individual's human dignity cannot be fully respected or valued unless the individual is permitted to develop his or her unique talents optimally. Human dignity has little value without freedom; for without freedom personal development and fulfilment are not possible. Without freedom, human dignity is little more than an abstraction. Freedom and dignity are inseparably linked. To deny people their freedom is to deny them their dignity.') See also Stu Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36.

In Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs, the Constitutional Court was asked to address the constitutionality of a legislative provision that provided that an immigration permit could be granted to the spouse of a South African citizen, who was in South Africa at the time, only if that spouse was in possession of a valid temporary residence permit.[1] The legislation provided no guidance, however, as to the circumstances in which it would be appropriate to refuse or to issue a temporary residence permit. Although the Dawood Court stopped short of finding that the section did not constitute law of general application, it took the opportunity to announce that, 'where broad discretionary powers contain no express constraints', and where 'those who are affected by the exercise of the broad discretionary powers [can] … not know what is relevant to the exercise of those powers', questions about whether the law at issue satisfied the law of general application requirement would inevitably be raised.[2]

Dawood reminds us that legislation that grants law enforcement officials unfettered powers fails the law of general application test on two related grounds.[3] As we have already seen, the unfettered grant of power logically entails arbitrary action: the action is arbitrary in the sense that neither norms nor precedents govern or restrict the state's behaviour. The flip-side of this unfettered grant of authority, and more to the point of our analysis of the third criterion, is that it fails to provide the clarity required for individuals who wish to align their behaviour with an identifiable legal standard. In Case & Curtis, the Constitutional Court found that the definition of pornographic material in the Indecent or Obscene Photographic Matter Act was designed to 'hit everything' and made it impossible for persons engaged in expressive conduct to know, in advance, what kind of conduct would be proscribed and what kind of conduct would be permitted.[4]

Similarly, legislation or common law will fail to satisfy this third criterion where the law is impermissibly vague.[5] In South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence, the Constitutional Court held that even a 255-word definition of 'act of

[1] Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others; Shalabi and Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others; Thomas & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC)('Dawood').

[2] Ibid at para 47. See also Janse Van Rensburg NO & Another v Minister of Trade and Industry & Another 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC)(Court holds that the public interest dictates that there should be certainty about the constitutionality of all legislation.)

[3] See, eg, Re Ontario Film and Video Appreciation Society 45 OR (2d) 80 (CA).

[4] Case & Curtis (supra) at para 53 ('[T]he challenged provision includes within its reach material that is constitutionally protected. Ms Fedler, appearing for amici curiae People Opposing Women Abuse et al, conceded that the provision unjustifiably and unreasonably interferes with protected categories of expression. Counsel for the Christian Lawyers Association readily acknowledged that there is no place for a provision that outlaws all depictions of homosexuality and lesbianism. And counsel for the Attorney-General conceded that the Act amounted to a "loaded shotgun" with which the government that promoted the Act intended to "hit everything". Indeed, no one before the Court appeared to be willing to defend the statute in its present form.')

[5] See R v Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society [1992] 2 SCR 606, 93 DLR (4th) 36 (Discussing doctrine of vagueness in Canadian Charter litigation); Connally v General Construction Co 269 US 385 (1926)(Discusses vagueness doctrine in US constitutional law.)

public protest' was impermissibly imprecise because the definition had the potential to sweep up into the Act's proscriptive ambit complaints that could never be accurately described as public protest or partisan political conduct — say, conversations between a member of the military and her husband.[1]

As we have noted above, administrative action will generally fail to satisfy this criterion where law enforcement officials take actions that infringe fundamental rights without possessing clear legal authority to do so. But while it may be true that such conduct fails to satisfy the second leg of the law of general application test — because it lacks the requisite features of parity, non-arbitrariness, precision and accessibility — it is more accurate to say that it lacks the defining features of law simpliciter.[2]

(dd) Accessibility or public availability

The final criterion for a law of general application is that the law must be accessible or publicly available. At a minimum, and perhaps only the minimum is necessary, the law must be published.

The European Court of Human Rights, in Sunday Times v Handyside, defined 'adequately accessible' law as follows.[3] First, law is adequately accessible if a person is given 'an indication [of the reach of a legal rule] that is adequate in the circumstances of … a given case' and that enables him to 'regulate his conduct' accordingly.[4] Second, law is adequately accessible if it allows a person, 'if need be with appropriate advice, … to foresee, to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail'.[5] In President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Hugo, Mokgoro J states that most statutes, regulations and common-law rules will be treated as law of general

[1] 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC)('SANDU') at para 11. For example, a statute may give the police the power to stop individuals of 'questionable moral character' from moving about South Africa, but fail to identify criteria by which a person might determine who qualifies as an individual of questionable moral character. Such a law, while general and public, is far too imprecise, far too vague to place the public on sufficient notice of what the law expects of them. Such a law would probably violate the overbreadth doctrine in US law on the grounds that no sharp line could be drawn between protected and proscribed activity and that constitutionally protected activity would be swept up into its coverage. See Secretary of State of Maryland v Joseph Munson 467 US 947 (1984); Arnett v Kennedy 416 US 134 (1974).

[2] For a discussion of administrative or executive action undertaken under colour of law but without legal authority, see § 34.7 infra. See also S v Mathebula 1997 (1) BCLR 123 (W), 1997 (1) SACR 10 (W).

[3] (1979) 2 EHRR 245 ('Sunday Times'). See also Klass v Federal Republic of Germany (1979) 2 EHRR 214; Hashman and Harrup v The United Kingdom (2000) 30 EHRR 241 at para 43; Kalac v Turkey (1999) 27 EHRR 552 at para 41.

[4] Sunday Times v The United Kingdom (1992) 14 EHRR 229.

[5] Ibid.

application because these forms of law are, generally speaking, 'adequately accessible'.[1]

Hugo raised, but did not clearly decide, a question about the pedigree of another kind of law: 'whether rules emanating from directives or guidelines, issued by government departments or agencies but falling outside the category of officially published delegated legislation, are laws of general application'.[2] Mokgoro J, after surveying the split in Canadian jurisprudence on this very subject, recognized that a certain lack of publicity or accessibility might attach to such rules.[3] She was, however, persuaded that a failure to accord such directives — published, but perhaps not gazetted — the status of law of general application might have deleterious consequences for the structure of constitutional analysis. First, as one of the authors of this chapter has argued elsewhere, the refusal to accord such instances of executive rule-making the status of law of general application may have the unintended consequence of forcing justificatory arguments back into the rights interpretation stage of analysis in order to save the law in question.[4] Second, Mokgoro J suggests that, even if such executive rule-making is not made public or accessible in quite the same way as legislation or common law, the other criteria for 'law of general application' and the other FC s 36 standards developed by the courts for an assessment of proportionality will ensure that such a rule is unlikely to work the particular mischief that led to the challenge in the first place. Finally, one should note that there is a signal difference between the Canadian jurisprudence that has developed around 'prescribed by law' in s 1 of the Charter, and the Bill of Rights jurisprudence that has developed around 'law of general application' in FC s 36. South African courts have expressly recognized

[1] 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC)('Hugo'). When surveying the possible desiderata for adequately accessible law, Mokgoro J suggests that publication satisfies the requirement. She notes that:

> Section 2 of the Interpretation Act defines 'law' as 'any law, proclamation, ordinance, Act of Parliament or other enactment having the force of law', and presumptively applies to the interpretation of every such 'law . . . in force' and of 'all by-laws, rules, regulations or orders made under the authority of any such law'. Delegated legislation must be published. . . . When any by-law, regulation, rule or order is authorised by any law to be made by the President or a Minister . . . such by-law, regulation, rule or order shall, subject to the provisions relative to the force and effect thereof in any law, be published in the Gazette.

Ibid at para 97.

[2] Ibid at para 100.

[3] See Committee for Commonwealth of Canada v Canada [1991] 1 SCR 139, 77 DLR (4th) 385 (Court divided as to whether internal airport rules qualified as law for purposes of s 1 review.) For a relevant discussion of this problem in Canadian jurisprudence, see Stu Woolman & Johan de Waal 'Freedom of Assembly: Voting With Your Feet' in D van Wyk, J Dugard, B de Villiers & D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 292, 308–14. See also Hugo (supra) at para 104 ('I consider it undesirable to take a technical approach to the interpretation of 'law of general application' . . . [A] technical approach unduly reduces the types of rules and conduct which can justify limitations . . . [E]xclusion from section 33(1) may adversely affect the proper interpretation of the scope of rights in Chapter 3.') that all forms of law — legislation, subordinate legislation, regulation, common law and customary law — can be characterized as law of general application. It goes without saying that much of this law has not — as some Canadian jurists would require for s 1 analysis of the Charter — passed through the democratic law-making machinery of the state. In so far as a law in South Africa possesses the four formal hallmarks of the rule of law that we have described — parity of treatment, non-arbitrariness, precision and accessibility — it is law of general application. Although South African courts often tend, in a rather formalistic manner, to emphasize the provenance of a law, this shorthand — when properly unpacked — reveals a commitment to these four formal features of the law.[1]

[4] See Stu Woolman 'Freedom of Assembly' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 43.

34.8 'Reasonable and Justifiable in an Open and Democratic Society Based on Human Dignity, Equality and Freedom'

(a) Introduction

FC s 36 seeks to provide a mechanism for the candid consideration of competing values and interests, and for negotiating the tension between democracy and rights. To give courts some direction when undertaking this candid consideration, FC s 36 states that for a fundamental-rights limitation to pass muster, it must be 'reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom'.

While this phrase may well be the touchstone of Bill of Rights analysis, it is also fraught with interpretive difficulties.[2] Not only is it couched in the broadest possible terms, but it replicates all of the tensions it is supposed to resolve: between democracy and rights, between equality and freedom, between equal treatment and the recognition of diversity, between social justice and individual liberty.

One response — one that might be easiest to square with the existing body of jurisprudence — is that such tensions need not concern us too much. On this account, the purpose of FC s 36 is not to resolve conflicts between such basic values in the abstract, but to provide a rubric for reconciliation of conflicting

[1] Mokgoro J reached a similar conclusion in Hugo. See Hugo (supra) at paras 102–103 ('The need for accessibility, precision and general application flow from the concept of the rule of law. A person should be able to know the law, and be able to conform his or her conduct to the law. Further, laws should apply generally, rather than targeting specific individuals. In my view, those rule of law concerns are adequately met by the Presidential Act. The remaining question about the Presidential Act concerns its origin as executive rule-making rather than as legislation. . . . The origin of the Presidential Act in executive rule-making rather than in a formal legislative process is not fatal to the application of s 33(1). . . . [T]here are numerous instances of delegated legislation drafted by the executive, which legislation would undoubtedly be accepted as "law". The difference between the Presidential Act and standard instances of executive rule-making, in the form of delegated legislation, is the absence of a parent statute in the former case. In standard cases of executive rule-making, therefore, at least the parent statute has undergone the rigours of the legislative process. That difference cannot in my view justify different treatment for the Presidential Act, which represents an exercise of public power derived directly from the Constitution. The legitimacy which attaches to delegated legislation by reason of the parent statute must attach with equal force to rules representing a direct exercise of power granted by the Constitution. The Constitution, after all, was a vigorously negotiated document.') interests in specific contexts. Of course, this sort of reply begs the next question: how does FC s 36 enable us to negotiate conflicts within the context of a particular dispute?

[2] See Denise Meyerson Rights Limited: Freedom of Expression, Religion and the South African Constitution (1997) xxiii.

The very language of FC s 36 offers at least two pointers in this regard. First, the phrase 'justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom' suggests that we can find guidance in the laws, practices and judicial doctrines found in other constitutional democracies. Indeed, FC s 39 directs us towards foreign jurisdictions for hints about how to go about reconciling conflicts between rights, values and interests in concrete cases. Second, FC s 36 lists five factors that may assist us in determining the reasonableness and justifiability of a limitation. But the list itself raises additional questions. If these factors do not, as seems clear, represent a closed list of considerations, what other factors might be relevant in any given limitations inquiry? How, if at all, are the listed factors related to one another? Should they be engaged separately and sequentially, or are they simply subsets of a global inquiry into the 'proportionality' of the limitation under scrutiny?

Our discussion of the reasonableness and justifiability inquiry is structured as follows. First, we describe, in somewhat greater detail than above, what the Court understands proportionality analysis to be. Second, we look at the gloss placed by the Court on the five listed factors in FC s 36(1), as well as its take on the relationship between these factors.

Our discussion then moves from the merely descriptive to the critical and the prescriptive. Our moderately critical appraisal of balancing and proportionality rehearses many of the same concerns we expressed about the lack of analytical rigour displayed by the courts with respect to distinguishing fundamental rights interpretation from limitations analysis. After clearing the ground with this critique of balancing, we offer our own preferred reading of FC s 36 — one that coheres with the text and still makes sense of the case law. We begin with the Court's own understanding of its institutional role, and ask whether and to what extent a doctrine of 'shared constitutional interpretation' might better mediate the conflicting doctrinal requirements of constitutional supremacy and separation of powers. While 'shared constitutional interpretation' provides an institutional framework for limitations analysis, it remains incomplete — and of little use — without a normative theory about how the values that underlie the limitations clause cohere. (In short, while the doctrine of shared constitutional interpretation adumbrates a theory of judicial review, a meaningful standard for such review requires additional content.) To fulfil this second end, we explore the Court's understanding of the phrase 'open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom', and offer an alternative reading of this phrase which we think better coheres with the more general aims of our basic law. Finally, we suggest — consistent with our critique of balancing — that instances of value incommensurability will often arise in the context of limitations analysis. While the Court's conventional morality is sufficient to handle the majority of such conflicts, we believe that in hard cases both analytical rigour and out-groups will be better served by what we call a 'storytelling' approach to judicial opinion writing. This approach does not conflate novels with judicial narratives. It suggests that storytelling simultaneously challenges deeply ingrained theoretical assumptions about the world in which we live and more firmly grounds such challenges by offering better reasons for choosing one way of being in the world over another.

(b) Proportionality

S v Makwanyane offers the Constitutional Court's clearest statement about the relationship between the five basic values and the five explicit factors:[1]

> The limitation of fundamental rights for a purpose that is reasonable and necessary in a democratic society involves the weighing up of competing values, and ultimately an assessment based on proportionality. This is implicit in the provisions of section 33(1). The fact that different rights have different implications for democracy, and in the case of our Constitution, for an 'open and democratic society based on freedom and equality', means that there is no absolute standard which can be laid down for determining reasonableness and necessity. Principles can be established, but the application of those principles to particular circumstances can only be done on a case by case basis. This is inherent in the requirement of proportionality, which calls for the balancing of different interests. In the balancing process, the relevant considerations will include the nature of the right that is limited, and its importance to an open and democratic society based on freedom and equality; the purpose for which the right is limited, and the importance of that purpose to such a society; the extent of the limitation, its efficacy, and particularly where the limitation has to be necessary, whether the desired ends could reasonably be achieved through other means less damaging to the right in question. In the process regard must be had to the provisions of section 33(1), and the underlying values of the Constitution, bearing in mind that, as a Canadian Judge has said, 'the role of the Court is not to second-guess the wisdom of policy choices made by legislators'.[2]

Although Makwanyane was decided in terms of IC s 33, the various considerations mentioned in the quote above were largely cut from Makwanyane, and pasted, with only minor alterations, into the text of FC s 36.[3] In addition, the insistence that limitation analysis involves the balancing of conflicting values, an assessment based on proportionality, and the rejection of an 'absolute' or rigid set of standards in favour of a flexible, context-sensitive form of analysis, have become the leitmotifs of the Court's limitation jurisprudence. In S v Manamela & Another (Director-General of Justice Intervening), the Court wrote that neither it nor

[1] 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC)('Makwanyane').

[2] Ibid at para 149.

[3] See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at para 33 ('Although section 36(1) of the 1996 Constitution differs in various respects from section 33 of the interim Constitution its application still involves a process, described in S v Makwanyane . . . as the "weighing up of competing values, and ultimately an assessment based on proportionality which calls for the balancing of different interests."') lower courts would 'adhere mechanically to a sequential check-list', but were required, instead, to 'engage in a balancing exercise and arrive at a global judgment on proportionality'.[1] The following statement in S v Bhulwana rehearses the same themes:

> [T]he Court places the purpose, effects and importance of the infringing legislation on one side of the scales and the nature and effect of the infringement caused by the legislation on the other. The more substantial the inroad into fundamental rights, the more persuasive the grounds of justification must be.[2]

(c) FC s 36's five factors

(i) Nature of the right

It is not immediately apparent why the nature and the scope of the right that has been limited should form part of the limitation inquiry. In two-stage fundamental rights analysis, the inquiry into the content of the right and whether its exercise has been impaired occurs at the first stage of analysis.

One possible explanation for this repetition is that the drafters decided to replace the dual levels of scrutiny found in the limitations clause of the Interim Constitution with a somewhat more nuanced device that would enable a court to tighten or loosen several of the clause's justificatory requirements according to the importance — the nature — of the right that has been infringed. For example, with respect to infringements of core rights, such as dignity or expression, 'the nature of the right' proviso might require the party relying upon the impugned law to demonstrate that (1) the objective of the law is overwhelmingly important, or (2) the means used to achieve the law's objective are narrowly tailored and trench upon the protected activity no more than is absolutely necessary or (3) the benefits to society realized by the law significantly outweigh the burdens imposed upon the rights-holder. On the other hand, the nature of rights deemed less central to our constitutional project — say trade and occupation — might lighten the justificatory burden on the parties seeking to uphold the limitation.[3]

However, the Constitutional Court has expressly rejected the idea that FC s 36 enjoins the courts to create different levels of scrutiny for different rights. In Christian Education, the appellants argued that the state had to show that the restriction of their freedom of religion served a compelling state interest.[1] The Court held that American doctrines such as 'strict scrutiny' or 'intermediate scrutiny' — from which the notion of 'compelling state interest' derives — have no purchase in South African constitutional law.

[1] 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC)('Manamela') at para 32.

[2] 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC)('Bhulwana') at para 18. See also Petersen v Maintenance Officer, Simon's Town Maintenance Court, & Others 2004 (2) SA 56 (C), 2004 (2) BCLR 205 (C) at para 22 (Court concludes that 'if the importance and purpose of the common-law rule are weighed against the nature and extent of the gross infringement caused by the said rule, there is no justification for the retention of the common-law rule.')

[3] Where, as in the Interim Constitution, such choices were expressly made in the text, this reading of Makwanyane's first question makes less sense. However, this interpretation does make sense where, as in the Final Constitution, express levels of scrutiny do not exist and the courts are required to reach their own conclusions about the relative importance of each right, and the kind of justification the party defending the infringement must offer.

In the Court's view, 'the nature and the importance of the right' forms part of a larger proportionality inquiry. In short, the more important the right is to an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom, the more compelling any justification for the limitation of the right needs to be. One may well ask whether this approach is dramatically different from one based on different levels of scrutiny. The Constitutional Court seems to be of the view that its gloss on FC s 36(1)(a) is more flexible than IC 33(1)'s bifurcated limitations test and that it relieves the courts of the potentially perilous task of ranking constitutional rights.

In actual practice, the rights to life and human dignity — and closely related rights, such as the right to bodily integrity and the right not to be treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way — are deemed central to the society envisaged by the Final Constitution, and only a compelling justification should be advanced for their limitation.[2] Other rights said to be of vital

[1] Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC)('Christian Education') at paras 29–31. See also Prince v President of the Law Society of the Cape of Good Hope 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC)('Prince') at para 128.

[2] See Makwanyane (supra) at para 144 ('The rights to life and dignity are the most important of all human rights, and the source of all other personal rights in Chapter 3. By committing ourselves to a society founded on the recognition of human rights we are required to value these rights above all others.') See also S v Williams & Others 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC) at para 76 ('Very stringent requirements would have to be met by the State' before the right to dignity and the protection against punishments that are cruel, inhuman or degrading can be limited'); Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: In re: S v Walters & Another 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC) at para 28 ('The right to life, to human dignity and to bodily integrity are individually essential and collectively foundational to the value system prescribed by the Constitution. Compromise them and the society to which we aspire becomes illusory. It therefore follows that any significant limitation of these rights, would for its justification demand a very compelling countervailing public interest'); National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC)('NCGLE II') at para 58; Makinana & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Another; Keelty & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2001 (6) BCLR 581 606E-G (C); Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others (Commission for Gender Equality as Amicus Curiae); Shibi v Sithole & Others; South African Human Rights Commission & Another v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe') at para 71.

Because the right to equality is considered foundational for our constitutional order, one would expect that a particularly powerful justification would have to be proffered for any limitation of FC s 9. See, eg, NCGLE II (supra) at para 58*; Moseneke & Others v The Master & Another* 2001 (2) SA 18 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 103 (CC) at paras 22–23 (No open and democratic society would tolerate differential treatment based solely on skin colour); Jordan & Others v S & Others 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC)('Jordan') at para 97 (A powerful justification is required for a criminal prohibition which further entrenches patterns of gender inequality); Bhe (supra) at para 71. Of course, as we have already noted, the test for unfair discrimination makes it unlikely that a court would find a limitation of this right to be justifiable. See § 34.5 supra.

importance to our constitutional democracy include freedom of religion,[1] freedom of expression,[2] the right to vote,[3] the right to access to adequate housing,[4] the right of access to court,[5] and the right to be presumed innocent.[6]

Not everyone agrees that the 'nature of the right' should be taken to refer to its

[1] See Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC); Christian Education (supra) at para 36 ('[R]eligion provides support and nurture and a framework for individual and social stability and growth. Religious belief has the capacity to awake [sic] concepts of self-worth and human dignity which form the cornerstone of human rights.') See also Prince (supra) at para 149 (Sachs J, dissenting, wrote that where religious practices are prohibited by law, but do not involve any violation of the Bill of Rights, 'the Constitution obliges the State to walk the extra mile.') Whether the Court's actual decision-making in the area of religious freedom matches its rhetoric is, however, debatable. For critiques of the Court's freedom of religion jurisprudence, see Irma Kroeze 'God's Kingdom in the Law's Republic: Religious Freedom in South African Constitutional Jurisprudence' in H Botha, A van der Walt & J van der Walt (eds) Rights and Democracy in a Transformative Constitution (2003) 117; Stu Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36; Paul Farlam 'Freedom of Religion' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 41; Stu Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44.

[2] See South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another 1999 (4) SA 469, 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC) at para 7 ('Freedom of expression lies at the heart of a democracy. It is valuable for many reasons, including its instrumental function as a guarantor of democracy, its implicit recognition and protection of the moral agency of individuals in our society and its facilitation of the search for truth by individuals and society generally. The Constitution recognises that individuals in our society need to be able to hear, form and express opinions and views freely on a wide range of matters.') See also Case & Another v Minister of Safety and Security & Others; Curtis v Minister of Safety and Security & Others 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC) at paras 26–27; Holomisa v Argus Newspapers Limited 1996 (2) SA 588, 608G–609A (W), 1996 (6) BCLR 836, 854I-855C (W); S v Mamabolo (E TV & Others Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409, 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC)('Mamabolo') at para 37; Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority & Others 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC)('Islamic Unity') at paras 26–28; Khumalo & Others v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC); 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC) at paras 21–24; Phillips & Another v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) & Others 2003 (3) SA 345 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC) at para 23; De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division & Others 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC)('De Reuck') at paras 46–50; Laugh It Off Promotions CC v SAB International (Finance) BV t/a Sabmark International & Another 2006 (1) SA 144 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 743 (CC) at paras 45–46. However, the Constitutional Court has emphasized on more than one occasion that freedom of expression does not enjoy superior status in our law, and does not automatically trump countervailing interests. See Mamabolo (supra) at para 41; Islamic Unity (supra) at paras 29–30.

[3] See Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention (NICRO) & Others 2005 (1) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC) at para 47.

[4] See Jaftha v Schoeman & Others; Van Rooyen v Stoltz & Others 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC) at para 39 (Emphasizes the link between access to adequate housing and human dignity.)

[5] See Lesapo v North West Agricultural Bank & Another 2000 (1) SA 409 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1420 (CC) at para 22 (Right of access to court is foundational to the stability of an orderly society.)

[6] See S v Ntsele 1997 (2) SACR 740 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1543 (CC) at para 4 ('The fundamental rights bound up with and protected by the presumption of innocence are so important, and the consequences of their infringement potentially so grave, that compelling justification would be required to save them from invalidation.') See also S v Mhatha; S v Prinsloo 1996 (2) SA 464 (CC), 1996 (3) BCLR 293 (CC) para 19; S v Mello & Another 1998 (3) SA 712 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 908 (CC) at para 9; S v Manamela 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC) at para 40.

importance to an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom. Cheadle points out that, unlike the formulation in Makwanyane, FC s 36(1) says nothing about the importance of the right.[1] He argues — from the ostensibly privileged and incorrigible vantage point of a drafter of the final text — that the 'nature of the right' was meant to serve as a threshold requirement, comparable in function to IC s 33's requirement that a limitation may not negate the essential content of a right.[2] Underlying the inclusion of this factor, Cheadle contends, was the recognition that some rights (eg the right not to be tortured or the right not to be unfairly discriminated against) 'by their very nature and the efficacy of the language embodying them, cannot conceivably be limited'.[3] By contrast, other rights tend to 'overlap with other constitutional rights and values' (eg freedom of expression tends to overlap with human dignity and privacy in the context of defamatory speech).[4] According to Cheadle, this threshold requirement does not entail any commitment to finding some rights to be of greater import than others.

Such a position seems hopelessly muddled. To say that a right cannot, on any ground, be justifiably limited is tantamount to saying that no right, no value, no interest, and no good exists that might trump such a right. More importantly, whatever value Cheadle's faux travaux préparatoires may have, they fail to engage the actual practice of the Court. The Constitutional Court does, on occasion, consider whether the nature of a particular right is such that it can meaningfully be limited.[5] Finally, Cheadle flatly contradicts himself.[6] Cheadle states that on his preferred reading of FC s 36, a court 'may accord more weight to a particular right or require greater justification in respect of some aspects of a right as opposed to others'.[7] To accord more weight to one right than another means that it is more important than another right, not that it is fat.

(ii) Importance of the purpose of limitation

The second factor identified in FC s 36(1) is 'the importance of the purpose of the limitation'. This factor requires two discrete assessments: an identification of the purpose of the limitation, and an appraisal of its importance.

[1] See Halton Cheadle 'Limitation of Rights' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 693, 706–07.

[2] Ibid at 707–708.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Ibid at 708.

[5] First National Bank of South Africa Limited v Land and Agricultural Bank of South Africa & Others: Sheard v Land and Agricultural Bank of South Africa & Another 2000 (3) SA 626 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 876 (CC) at para 6 (Only very powerful considerations may justify the limitation of the right to access to court.)

[6] Moreover, it is simply not true, as Cheadle maintains, that 'the main balancing exercise' undertaken by the Court 'is that of balancing the relative importance of the right, on the one hand, and the importance of the purpose of the limiting law, on the other'. Cheadle (supra) at 704. When the Court engages in balancing or a global assessment of proportionality, it actually places the nature of the right and the nature and extent of the limitation on the same 'side' of the scales. The standard of justification required is, in fact, determined by their combined effect. One must wonder then whether it makes sense to speak, as Cheadle sometimes does, about a 'main' balancing exercise and a 'subsidiary' balancing exercise.

[7] Ibid at 709.

With respect to the identification of the objective of the limitation, courts are faced with two difficulties. First, the objective of the limitation is often not apparent or made explicit in the law itself. Courts must then reconstruct the objective from the overall purpose of the Act, the legislative history of the provision and the mischief it was intended to address, or the historical development of the relevant common-law rule.[1] Second, the objective of a limitation can be expressed at different levels of generality. As Peter Hogg explains: 'The higher the level of generality at which a legislative objective is expressed, the more obviously desirable the objective will appear to be.'[2] As it turns out, the formulation of a limitation's objective at a high level of generality often makes it more difficult for the limitation to satisfy the least restrictive means requirement.

When a court is called upon to appraise the purpose of a limitation, it must ensure, at a minimum, that the purpose is not inconsistent with the values of an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom.[3] The following objectives have been found to be at odds with basic constitutional values: retribution;[4] re-inscribing historical patterns of prejudice and disadvantage among racial groups;[5] the enforcement of laws animated by bigotry or intolerance dressed up as morality;[6] and the absence of sufficient guidance in a legislative provision as to how an official ought to exercise the discretion granted her.[7]

A government objective designed expressly to reinforce the values which animate our constitutional project will generally satisfy the requirements of this second factor.[8] The courts have recognized that the following objectives further the general aims of our basic law: the promotion of equality, dignity and national

[1] That said, it is generally the purpose of the impugned provision, and not of the Act, that is at issue. See, eg, Lesapo v North West Agricultural Bank & Another 2000 (1) SA 409 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1420 (CC) at para 23.

[2] Peter Hogg 'Section 1 Revisited' (1992) 1 National Journal of Constitutional Law 1, 5.

[3] See, in the Canadian context, R v Big M Drug Mart [1985] 1 SCR 295, 351 (Compelling the observance of the Christian Sabbath could not justify the limitation of the right to freedom of religion.)

[4] See Makwanyane (supra) at paras 129–131; S v Williams & Others 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC) at para 86.

[5] See Bhe (supra) at para 72.

[6] See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('NCGLE I') at para 37 ('The enforcement of the private moral views of a section of the community, which are based to a large extent on nothing more than prejudice, cannot qualify as a legitimate purpose. There is accordingly nothing, in the proportionality enquiry, to weigh against the extent of the limitation and its harmful impact on gays. It would therefore seem that there is no justification for the limitation.')

[7] See Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others; Shalabi & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others; Thomas & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 934 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) at paras 56, 58.

[8] At the most basic level, those values include openness, democracy, human dignity, equality and freedom. At a more specific level, the values which justify restriction — and which flow from the individual rights themselves — may include tolerance, cultural diversity, a commitment to representative and participatory politics, social justice, and privacy.

unity;[1] the protection of children from the degradation and indignity brought about by corporal punishment[2] and child pornography;[3] the fortification of the judicial process;[4] the insistence that members of the defence force do not prejudice or further the interests of a political party; and the requirement that members of the defence force uphold the disciplined character of the defence force.[5]

Of course, any number of objectives are neither inconsistent with the values that animate the Final Constitution nor directly grounded in them. Whether or not such objectives are sufficiently important to justify a limitation would depend on a number of considerations. First, the further one ventures from the values which animate the Bill of Rights, the less likely one is to satisfy this requirement. Administrative convenience or the saving of costs is unlikely to be considered to be closely linked to the values that animate the Bill of Rights. Second, the objective must relate to concerns which are, in the words of Dickson CJ in R v Oakes, 'pressing and substantial', and not merely trivial.[6] Third, the objective must be directed to 'the realization of collective goals of fundamental importance'.[7]

Among the objectives not clearly grounded in a specific substantive provision of the Bill of Rights but still deemed of sufficient import to justify a limitation are:

[1] See Islamic Unity (supra) at paras 45–46. See also Khumalo v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC) at para 41 ('In deciding whether the common law rule complained of by the applicants does indeed constitute an unjustifiable limitation of section 16 of the Constitution, sight must not be lost of other constitutional values and in particular, the value of human dignity.')

[2] See Christian Education (supra) at paras 39–50.

[3] See De Reuck (supra) at paras 61–67. The Court identified three important objectives served by the prohibition of child pornography, namely 'protecting the dignity of children, stamping out the market for photographs made by abusing children and preventing a reasonable risk that images will be used to harm children'. Ibid at para 67. However, neither of these three justifications were, ultimately, necessary for the finding of invalidity. The impairment of the dignity of all South Africans constituted the sole meaningful justification for the Court's finding.

[4] Beinash & Another v Young & Others 1999 (2) SA 116 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 125 (CC) at para 17 (Right protects bona fide litigants, the processes of the court and the administration of justice against vexatious proceedings); S v Steyn 2001 (1) SA 1146 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 52 (CC) at para 31 (Right prevents the clogging of appeal rolls and ensuring that hopeless appeals do not waste court time); LS v AT & Another 2001 (2) BCLR 152 (CC) at paras 30–31 (Right ensures that custody issues are determined by the court in the best position to do so); Mamabolo (supra) at para 48 (Right vouchsafes the integrity of the judiciary); S v Singo 2002 (2) SA 858 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 793 (CC) at paras 33–35 (Right ensures the effective administration of justice by enabling an accused to be released from custody without bail pending her trial, and by dealing effectively with conduct which strikes at the authority of the courts.)

[5] See South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC) at paras 11, 28 and 32.

[6] [1986] 1 SCR 103, 138–39

[7] Ibid at 136.

taking effective action against crime;[1] maintaining public peace;[2] preventing the abuse of and trade in harmful drugs;[3] reducing the negative consequences of liquor consumption in public places;[4] protecting the institution of marriage;[5] obtaining full and speedy settlement of tax debts;[6] debt recovery;[7] recovery of the assets of a company under liquidation;[8] and protecting the rights of permanent residents to employment opportunities in the country.[9]

Can a limitation ever be justified in the name of administrative convenience or the saving of costs? Although the Canadian Supreme Court has suggested that fundamental-rights guarantees 'would be illusory if they could be ignored because it was administratively convenient to do so', our Constitutional Court has not taken such a hard-and-fast line.[10]

The Constitutional Court was asked to engage this question in Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Re-integration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others. The case turned on the constitutionality of provisions in

[1] See S v Manamela & Another (Director-General of Justice Intervening) 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC) at paras 41–42, 88; Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences & Others v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others: In re Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others v Smit NO & Others 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC) at paras 53–54; S v Dodo 2001 (3) BCLR 279, 293B–C (E); Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: In re: S v Walters & Another 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC) at para 44; National Director of Public Prosecutions & Another v Mohamed NO & Others 2003 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 476 (CC) at paras 14–15, 52. See also S v Dlamini; S v Dladla & Others; S v Joubert; S v Schietekat 1999 (4) SA 623 (CC), 1999 (7) BCLR 771 (CC)('Dlamini') at para 67. The Dlamini Court accepted that the 'deplorable level of violent crime', and the 'deeply destructive' effect it has on 'the fabric of our society', is a pressing and substantial concern, and that the purpose of a provision which requires someone charged with a Schedule 6 offence to adduce evidence which satisfies the court that exceptional circumstances exist which in the interests of justice permit his or her release on bail, is legitimate and important. However, the Court cautioned that: 'Although the level of criminal activity is clearly a relevant and important factor in the limitations exercise undertaken in respect of section 36, it is not the only factor relevant to that exercise. One must be careful to ensure that the alarming level of crime is not used to justify extensive and inappropriate invasions of individual rights.' Ibid. See, further, Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Re-integration of Offenders & Others ('NICRO') 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC) at paras 139–140 and 143–145 (Ngcobo J dissenting)(Provision that deprived prisoners of the right to vote served a legitimate purpose in denouncing crime and promoting a culture of the observance of civic duties and obligations.)

[2] See Dlamini (supra) at paras 55–56.

[3] See S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 288 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC) at para 20; Prince (supra) at paras 52–53, 114.

[4] See Phillips & Another v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC) at paras 24, 46, 48.

[5] See NCGLE II (supra) at para 55.

[6] See Metcash Trading Ltd v Commissioner for the South African Revenue Service & Another 2001 (1) SA 1109 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 60.

[7] See Jaftha (supra) at para 40 (Court added that the importance of the purpose was diminished where the debt is of a trifling nature.)

[8] See Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (2) SA 621 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 126

[9] See Makinana & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Another; Keelty & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2001 (6) BCLR 581, 606G–H (C).

[10] See Singh v Minister of Employment and Immigration [1985] 1 SCR 177, 218–19 (Wilson J).

the Electoral Act that deprived a particular class of convicted prisoner — those serving sentences without the option of a fine — of the right to vote. The state argued that it would put a strain on the logistical and financial resources of the Electoral Commission to make provision for such prisoners to exercise the franchise. The NICRO Court rejected this argument, but stopped short of holding that logistical and cost considerations are entirely or inevitably irrelevant to an inquiry into the limitation of fundamental rights. It rehearsed Ackermann J's contention in Ferreira v Levin[1] that 'problems involving resources cannot be resolved in the abstract "but must be confronted in the context of South African conditions and resources — political, social, economic and human",' and that 'what is reasonable in "one country with vast resources, does not necessarily justify placing an identical burden on a country with significantly less resources".'[2] The NICRO Court then held that:

> Resources cannot be ignored in assessing whether reasonable arrangements have been made for enabling citizens to vote. There is a difference, however, between a decision by Parliament or the Commission as to what is reasonable in that regard, and legislation that effectively disenfranchises a category of citizens.[3]

The NICRO Court's finding that the limitation in question could not be justified by considerations related to logistics and costs rests on three premises. First, the Court stresses that the right to vote is foundational to democracy.[4] Second, while Parliament and the Commission must be given some leeway in deciding how to employ available resources, the disenfranchisement of a category of citizen is the kind of limitation that requires a compelling justification. Third, the state failed to provide any evidence that the exercise of the franchise by this class of prisoner created insuperable logistical problems for the Commission or imposed significant burdens on the fiscus.[5]

Indeed, where such evidence can be adduced, the Court is apt to conclude that the limitation is legitimate. In Lesapo v North West Agricultural Bank & Another, the Constitutional Court found that the saving of time and costs in the recovery of the Agricultural Bank's property constituted a legitimate objective.[6] At the same time, it emphasized that the importance of such measures did not 'detract from the importance of the public interest served by the need for justiciable disputes to be settled by a court of law'.[7]

Despite these findings, the principle that administrative convenience and the saving of costs should not, generally, be allowed to override fundamental rights has been confirmed by other Constitutional Court judgments. In S v Williams & Others, society's alleged need for 'quick justice' fell 'far short of the justification required to entitle the State to override the prohibition against the infliction of

[1] NICRO (supra) at para 133.
[2] Ibid at para 47.
[3] Ibid at para 48.
[4] Ibid at para 47.
[5] Ibid at paras 49-50.
[6] 2000 (1) SA 409 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1420 (CC)('Lesapo') at paras 23–24.
[7] Ibid at para 24.

cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment'.[1] In Mohlomi v Minister of Defence, the logistical difficulties said to beset the state when sued were deemed insufficient justification for a provision that required claims against the defence force to be instituted within a period of six months.[2] Whether or not the state can use administrative convenience or the saving of costs to justify the limitation of a fundamental right in a particular case will depend on the nature of the right in question, the extent of the limitation, and whether or not the state has adduced sufficient evidence in support of its claim.

Another question raised by the 'purpose of the limitation' factor is whether a legislative restriction of fundamental rights whose original purpose is at odds with the values enshrined in the Final Constitution can assume a new, legitimate purpose. In Jordan & Others v S & Others, O'Regan and Sachs JJ accepted that the original purpose of the provisions in the Sexual Offences Act dealing with brothels was to enforce a traditional conception of morality, and that this conception of morality was inconsistent with the values underlying a pluralist constitutional democracy.[3] However, the justices also found that the objective of such provisions was not cast in stone. Given the magnitude of South Africa's legal and social transformation, on the one hand, and the need for some measure of legal continuity, on the other, a legislative provision whose original purpose was incompatible with the Final Constitution may be re-interpreted in a manner that makes it consistent with constitutional values. In Jordan, the Court found that the purpose of the provisions in question could be recast in terms of the more acceptable societal imperative to control commercial sex.[4]

This approach neither falls into the trap of assuming that the legislative purpose is something fixed and static, nor of conflating the purpose of a law with the subjective intent of those who enacted it. The problem with the 'shifting purpose' doctrine, however, is that it may be used to justify measures that are so tainted by the discriminatory or the authoritarian underpinnings of the original enactment that they may continue to entrench harmful stereotypes. The Constitutional Court is alive to these dangers and has rejected attempts to justify overtly racist or sexist provisions in terms of a less offensive objective.[5] However, it must also remain

[1] 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR (CC)('Williams') at para 79.

[2] 1997 (1) SA 124 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1559 (CC)('Mohlomi') at para 16.

[3] 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC)('Jordan') at paras 104–106.

[4] See also S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg 1997 (4) SA 1176 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC) at para 157 (Sachs J quotes approvingly from Lynch, Mayor of Pawtucket v Donnelly 645 US 668 (1984) in which Brennan J wrote: 'While a particular governmental practice may have derived from religious motivations and certain religious connotations, it is nevertheless permissible for the government to pursue the practice when it is continued today solely for secular reasons.')

[5] See Moseneke & Others v The Master & Another 2001 (2) SA 18 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 103 (CC) at paras 20–23 (Holds that the practical advantages flowing from a provision in the Black Administration Act 38 of 1927 which differentiates between the estates of black and white people who die intestate, cannot be delinked from the racially discriminatory purpose and effect of the Act); Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others (Commission for Gender Equality as Amicus Curiae); Shibi v Sithole & Others; South African Human Rights Commission & Another v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 61, 72 (Section 23 of the Black Administration Act 'cannot escape the [racist and sexist] context in which it was conceived' in order to be reinterpreted to give 'recognition to customary law' and to acknowledge 'the pluralist nature of our society'.)

on guard that less overt or pernicious forms of discrimination — or state support for particular traditions, religions or worldviews that marginalize smaller, more vulnerable groups — may be countenanced in the name of a new, ostensibly unproblematic purpose.[1]

(iii) Nature and extent of the limitation

The next factor, the 'nature and extent of the limitation', lies at the core of the Court's approach to balancing and to proportionality. As O'Regan J wrote in Manamela:

> The level of justification required to warrant a limitation upon a right depends on the extent of the limitation. The more invasive the infringement, the more powerful the justification must be.[2]

In appraising the nature and the extent of a limitation, the Court considers a variety of factors.

First, it asks whether the limitation affects the 'core' values underlying a particular right. It has, for example, found that the right to be tried in a hearing presided over by a judicial officer is a core component of the right not to be detained without trial.[3] Similarly, reverse onus provisions are said to strike at the heart of the right to be presumed innocent and therefore require a clear and convincing justification.[4] By contrast, the prohibition of child pornography was found not to implicate the core values of the right to freedom of expression but rather restricted 'expression of little value … found on the periphery of the right'.[5]

Core/periphery analysis has proved to be of particular importance to the Court's privacy jurisprudence. The Constitutional Court conceives of the right to privacy as having an inner core that must be shielded from the corrosive effects of conflicting interests, and a periphery or a penumbra in which the right to privacy may be outweighed by conflicting community interests.[6] At the core of privacy is the right 'to have one's own autonomous identity'.[7] That core

[1] See Henk Botha 'Equality, Dignity, and the Politics of Interpretation' (2004) 19 SA Public Law 724.
[2] Manamela (supra) at para 53.
[3] De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC) at para 89.
[4] Manamela (supra) at para 49
[5] De Reuck (supra) at para 59. In De Reuck, the Court identified the core values that undergird freedom of expression and cited the principles articulated in South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence in support of its finding. See SANDU (supra) at para 7 (The 'instrumental function [of freedom of expression] as a guarantor of democracy, its implicit recognition and protection of the moral agency of individuals in our society and its facilitation of the search for truth by individuals and society generally'.)
[6] See Bernstein & Others v Bester & Others NNO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1994 94 BCLR 449 (CC)('Bernstein') at para 67 ('[I]t is only the inner sanctum of a person, such as his/her family life, sexual preference and home environment, which is shielded from erosion by conflicting rights of the community. … Privacy is acknowledged in the truly personal realm, but as a person moves into communal relations and activities such as business and social interaction, the scope of personal space shrinks accordingly.') embraces the capacity to form and to nurture intimate relationships. In National Coalition v Minister of Justice, a criminal ban on gay sodomy was held to strike at the heart of privacy:
[7] Ibid at para 65.

> The right to privacy recognizes that we all have a right to a sphere of private intimacy and autonomy which allows us to establish and to nurture human relationships without undue interference from the outside community. The way in which we give expression to our sexuality is at the core of this area of private intimacy. If, in expressing our sexuality, we act consensually and without harming one another, invasion of that precinct will be a breach of our privacy.[1, 2]

However, 'once an individual enters into relationships with persons outside this closest intimate sphere', his or her activities 'acquire a social dimension'[3] and the protection afforded to the right diminishes accordingly. In deciding whether a limitation strikes at the inner core of privacy or affects privacy interests that lie at the periphery of the right, the Court looks at factors such as 'the nature and effect of the invasion' and 'whether the subject of the limitation is a natural person or a juristic person'.[4] Even though juristic persons are entitled to the right to privacy, the Court has made it is clear that because they are 'not the bearers of human dignity', their privacy rights 'can never be as intense as those of human beings'.[5] The Court has also found that, while sexual activity for commercial gain is protected by the right to privacy, it lies at the periphery of the right. Given the commercial character of that activity and a prostitute's invitation to the general public to engage in illicit sexual conduct, the Court in Jordan had little difficulty in finding that the prohibition of prostitution was justifiable.[6] By contrast, the Mistry Court had no problem finding unconstitutional, as a violation of privacy, a provision that authorized inspections not only of the business premises of health professionals, but of their homes.[7]

Despite its intuitive appeal, the distinction between the ban on gay sodomy and the prohibition of prostitution on the basis of the core/periphery metaphor suffers from a number of difficulties: (a) its characterization of all non-commercial sex as an expression of one's sexual identity, or as an instance of the right to form intimate relationships, is pap to be expected from the pulpit and not the bench; (b) it presupposes a world in which individuals are equally free to choose their own autonomous identity and to form intimate relationships, and then models personal autonomy and the kind of interpersonal relationships that are worthy of

[1] See NCGLE I (supra) at paras 32, 36.
[2] Ibid at para 32.
[3] Bernstein (supra) at para 7.
[4] Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences & Others v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others: In re Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd & Others v Smit NO & Others 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC)('Hyundai') at para 18.
[5] Ibid.
[6] See Jordan (supra) at paras 27–29.
[7] See Mistry v Interim National Medical and Dental Council of South Africa & Others 1998 (4) SA 1127 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 880 (CC) at para 21.

protection on middle-class morality and the institution of (heterosexual) marriage;[1] and (c) it fails to recognize that all persons engaged in any form of labour for remuneration — including Constitutional Court justices — necessarily engage in the commodification of some body part.[2]

While the current construction of the right to privacy is open to the above lines of criticism, the Court should be applauded for articulating clearly and publicly the grounds for its decisions. More disturbing, perhaps, is the Court's failure to distinguish between the core and the periphery with respect to most of the other rights in Chapter 2. This silence makes it difficult for other actors, in advance of litigation, to be able to distinguish serious infringements of fundamental rights from less serious ones.

Second, the 'nature and the extent' inquiry requires an assessment of the actual impact of the limitation on those deleteriously affected by it. The following limitations have been found to impair significantly the right at issue: (a) the criminalization of gay sodomy constituted a severe limitation of a gay man's rights to equality, privacy, dignity and freedom;[3] (b) reverse onus provisions in which possession of a certain quantity of cannabis was deemed tantamount to dealing,[4] or in which possession of arms or ammunition was deemed sufficient proof to establish a prima facie case for indictment for a crime,[5] were found to constitute a serious infringement of the right to be presumed innocent;[6] (c) the limitation of a debtor's access to court could not be justified because it led, ineluctably, to the deprivation of the person's livelihood;[7] and (d) the sale in execution of people's homes for trifling debts without a judicial hearing was characterized as a severe limitation of the right to access to adequate housing.[8]

Third, the Court sometimes considers the social position of the individuals or group concerned. Whether or not a limitation targets, or has a disproportionate

[1] See Wessel le Roux 'Sex Work, the Right to Occupational Freedom and the Constitutional Politics of Recognition' (2003) 120 SALJ 452, 463; Wessel le Roux 'Bridges, Clearings and Labyrinths: the Architectural Framing of Post-Apartheid Constitutionalism' (2004) 19 SA Public Law 629, 659–660.

[2] See Stu Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44; Stu Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36.

[3] See NCGLE I (supra) at para 36.

[4] See S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1348 (CC) at paras 19, 21.

[5] See S v Mbatha; S v Prinsloo 1996 (2) SA 464 (CC), 1996 (3) BCLR 293 (CC)('Mbatha') at para 20.

[6] The majority and minority disagreed over the nature and extent of the limitation in Manamela, another case concerning the constitutionality of a reverse onus provision. The majority argued that, '[w]here a presumption of guilt is substituted for the presumption of innocence, the limitation of the right is extensive and "the justification for doing so must be established clearly and convincingly."' Manamela, (supra) at para 40. The minority, on the other hand, argued that the statutory offence of the acquisition of stolen goods was not that serious, and that the risk of unfair convictions under the provision was not that high. Ibid at paras 78–81.

[7] See Lesapo (supra) at para 25 (Describes the limitation as 'extremely prejudicial' to the debtors' interests.)

[8] See Jaftha (supra) at para 39.

impact upon, vulnerable sections of the population, such as religious minorities,[1] the poor,[2] or children born out of wedlock,[3] may determine the level of justification required.

Fourth, the Court sometimes asks whether the limitation is permanent or temporary, and whether it amounts to a complete or a partial denial of the right in question. In S v Makwanyane, the Court emphasized the irrevocability of the death penalty, and cautioned that '[t]here is a difference between encroaching upon rights for the purpose of punishment and destroying them altogether'.[4] On the other hand, the Christian Education Court found that the prohibition of corporal punishment in schools was not unduly burdensome because it neither deprived parents of the general right to bring up their children in accordance with Christian beliefs nor prevented them from administering corporal punishment at home. In Metcash, the Court emphasized the fact that, even though a provision in the Value Added Tax Act limited the right of a vendor to challenge the correctness of an assessment made by the Commissioner, its effect was temporary and the vendor was free to submit any dispute with the Commissioner for judicial resolution once she had paid the disputed amount.[5]

Fifth, in measuring the extent of the limitation, the Court often asks whether the limitation is narrowly tailored to achieve its objective. (This question obviously overlaps significantly with the last factor enumerated in FC s 36(1), namely the existence of less restrictive means.) The Court initially asks whether the limitation applies to a narrow or a broad category of cases.[6] In S v Mamabolo (E TV & Others Intervening), the Court found that the crime of scandalizing the

[1] See Prince (supra) at para 51 (Ngcobo J, dissenting, describes the stigmatisation suffered by Rastafari as a result of the criminalisation of cannabis) and at paras 157-163 (Sachs J, dissenting, considers the negative impact of the limitation on Rastafari, given that they are a vulnerable and politically powerless group.)

[2] See Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa; Matiso & Others v Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison & Others 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC)('Coetzee') at paras 8, 66 and 67 (Persons most vulnerable to imprisonment for judgment debts are the poor and unemployed); Manamela (supra) at para 44 (Considering the fact that reverse onus provision at issue would leave the poor, unskilled and illiterate most vulnerable to erroneous conviction); Jaftha (supra) at paras 39 and 43 (Analyzes the impact of a provision authorising the sale-in-execution of people's homes on the indigent.)

[3] See Petersen v Maintenance Officer & Others 2004 (2) SA 56 (C), 2004 (2) BCLR 205 (C) at para 22.

[4] See Makwanyane (supra) at para 143. See also Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: In re: S v Walters & Another 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC) at para 27 (Statutory authorization of the killing of a fleeing suspect amounts to 'a complete denial of the right to life and consequently of all other rights which flow from it.')

[5] See Metcash Trading Ltd v Commissioner for the South African Revenue Service & Another 2001 (1) SA 1109 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Metcash') at paras 38, 51 and 58. See also Lesapo (supra) at para 25 (Court took into account the fact that the limitation of a debtor's right to access to court was not permanent. However, it nevertheless found that the limitation was serious enough — given the extent of the harm — to find it unjustifiable); Dlamini (supra) at para 71 (Temporary nature of awaiting-trial detention weighed against the compelling interest in maintaining public peace); National Director of Public Prosecutions & Another v Mohamed NO & Others 2003 (4) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 476 (CC) at para 52 (Temporary preservation order found to be justifiable); NICRO (supra) at paras 145–146 (Ngcobo J emphasizes, in dissent, that the justifiability of the limitation of a prisoner's right to vote was contingent upon the length of the sentence to be served in prison.)

[6] See Dlamini (supra) at para 74; NICRO (supra) at para 67 (Blanket exclusion of prisoners, sentenced to imprisonment without the option of a fine, from the right to vote found to be unjustifiable.)

court, rightly understood, applied to a narrow category of cases, and that the public interest in maintaining the integrity of the judiciary easily trumped the negative effects of the limitation on the public's freedom of expression.[1] Conversely, Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority & Others held that a clause in a code of conduct which prohibited the broadcasting of material 'likely to prejudice relations between sections of the population' was 'so widely-phrased and so far-reaching that it would be difficult to know beforehand what is really prohibited or permitted'.[2] The inroads made into freedom of expression outweighed any possible justification for the locution of the provision.[3]

In determining whether the extent of the limitation is narrowly tailored, the Court also looks at the breadth of discretion granted by the authorizing legislation and the safeguards in place to limit any deleterious effects. The following considerations are relevant to this inquiry: whether adequate guidance is given to administrative officials as to how they should exercise their discretion;[4] whether the limitation of someone's right must be authorized by a judicial officer (eg whether a warrant must first be issued);[5] whether the extent of the limitation is limited by carefully tailored exemptions;[6] and whether the exercise of the discretion is subject to review by the courts.[7]

Where far-reaching powers are conferred on an administrative official, the legislature must provide clear instructions on how such powers are to be exercised. In Dawood, the Court found that the discretion given to immigration officials in terms of the Aliens Control Act to refuse to issue or to extend the temporary residence permit of the foreign spouse of a person permanently and

[1] 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC)('Mamabolo') at para 48. See also Metcash (supra) at para 54 (Limitation of vendor's right to challenge the correctness of an assessment of the tax payable is narrowly focused, and does not apply to any other possible challenges.)

[2] 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC)('Islamic Unity') at para 44.

[3] Ibid at paras 43, 44 and 48.

[4] See Mistry (supra) at para 22; De Reuck (supra) at para 76.

[5] In Dawood, O'Regan J noted that there is > a difference between requiring a court or tribunal in exercising a discretion to interpret legislation in a manner that is consistent with the Constitution and conferring a broad discretion upon an official, who may be quite untrained in law and constitutional interpretation, and expecting that official, in the absence of direct guidance, to exercise the discretion in a manner consistent with the provisions of the Bill of Rights. Officials are often extremely busy and have to respond quickly and efficiently to many requests or applications. The nature of their work does not permit considered reflection on the scope of constitutional rights or the circumstances in which a limitation of such rights is justifiable.

Dawood (supra) at para 46. See also Mistry (supra) at paras 21, 22 (Power of medical inspectors to enter any place without having to obtain a warrant, found to be unreasonable); Dlamini (supra) at paras 56–57, 74, 76 (Judicial officer's decision to grant or to refuse bail, after considering all relevant circumstances, leads Court to conclude that limitation of the right to bail is narrowly tailored.)

[6] In Coetzee, the Court noted that the lack of adequate procedural safeguards to prevent the imprisonment of judgment debtors who are unable to pay undermined the argument in justification. See Coetzee (supra) at paras 14, 23, 25. See, further, De Reuck (supra) at paras 72–79 (Court concluded, on the basis of an exemption procedure provided for in the Films and Publications Act, that the nature and extent of the limitation is not severe.)

[7] The mere fact that the exercise of discretion may be challenged on administrative grounds does not necessarily support a finding that the limitation is narrowly tailored. See Dawood (supra) at para 48.

lawfully resident in South Africa impaired the human dignity of such spouses. The Court noted that the provisions in question contained little guidance as to the circumstances in which a temporary residence permit may be refused. This unfettered grant of power has serious consequences for the rule of law: a person must be able to understand the basis upon which a decision by a government official may lawfully be taken.[1] O'Regan J castigated the government for its failure to provide adequate guidelines and warned that:

> It is for the legislature to ensure that, when necessary, guidance is provided as to when limitation of rights will be justifiable. It is therefore not ordinarily sufficient for the legislature merely to say that discretionary powers that may be exercised in a manner that could limit rights should be read in a manner consistent with the Constitution in the light of the constitutional obligations placed on such officials to respect the Constitution.[2]

By contrast, the Hyundai Court found that a provision permitting a judicial officer to issue a search warrant to further a preparatory investigation initiated by an investigating director in the office of the National Prosecuting Authority was reasonably capable of an interpretation that requires a 'reasonable suspicion' of the commission of an offence.[3] Read thus, the provision contained 'an adequate and objective basis' to protect the 'privacy' of individuals and constituted a justifiable limitation of that right.[4]

(iv) Relationship between the limitation and its purpose

Once the legitimacy of a limitation's objective has been established, it makes sense to ask whether the means employed to achieve the objective are rationally related to, or reasonably capable of achieving, that objective. For example, the Constitutional Court found in S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso that the prohibition on illegal drugs would not be substantially furthered by a legislative presumption that a person found in possession of 115 grams of dagga was a dealer because there

[1] Dawood (supra) at para 47.

[2] Ibid at para 54. See also Janse van Rensburg NO & Another v Minister of Trade and Industry NO & Another 2001 (1) SA 29 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1235 (CC) at para 25.

[3] Hyundai (supra) at paras 49–52.

[4] Ibid at para 55. See also LS v AT & Another (supra) at paras 32–35. In LS v AT, the Constitutional Court found that provisions of the Hague Convention on the Civil Aspects of International Child Abduction, as incorporated into South African law, were tailored in a manner designed to limit the deleterious effects that they might have upon a child. The Convention provides for a mandatory procedure whereby a child who has been wrongfully removed or retained, is returned to the state of his/her habitual residence. Even though cases could be envisaged in which these provisions might, contrary to FC s 28(2), run counter to the short-term best interests of a child, the extent of the limitation was substantially mitigated by exemptions provided for in the Convention. In Metcash, the Court found that the temporary limitation of a taxpayer's right to challenge the correctness of an assessment made by the Commissioner was ameliorated by the Commissioner's power to suspend the operation of the 'pay now, argue later' principle in appropriate cases. In addition, the exercise of this discretion constituted administrative action subject to review by the courts. See Metcash (supra) at paras 42 and 62.

was no logical connection between such possession and the presumption.[1] Similarly, the Court found in South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another that a provision that prohibited members of the defence force from joining a trade union was not rationally related to maintaining the discipline and efficiency of the defence force.[2] And in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others, the Court held that no rational connection existed between the legitimate object of promoting and protecting the traditional family and the exclusion of permanent same-sex partners from certain benefits to which married couples were entitled. The realization of this legitimate objective, the Court reasoned, would neither be furthered nor diminished by the extension of the benefits at issue to permanent same-sex partners.[3]

(v) Less restrictive means

Assuming that the Court finds both a legitimate objective and a rational connection between the means employed and that objective, it will then consider a fifth factor: whether 'less restrictive means to achieve the purpose' exist. The logic behind this factor is that, if the government or some other party wishes to restrict the exercise of a fundamental right in the service of some other compelling concern, it should attempt to employ means of doing so (laws) which are least restrictive of the right*(s)* being infringed. Other phrases — that a limitation should be narrowly tailored to achieve its purpose, that it should be carefully focused, or that it should not be overbroad — are sometimes used to describe the same inquiry.[4]

[1] 1996 (1) SA 288 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC)('Gwadiso') at paras 20, 22–23. See also S v Mbatha; S v Prinsloo 1996 (2) SA 464 (CC), 1996 (3) BCLR 293 (CC) at paras 21–22 (Court held that presumption that anyone who was present at any premises at which prohibited firearms or ammunition were discovered was in possession of such goods, applied also to instances where there was no logical connection between the presumed fact and the facts proved. Such a presumption was therefore arbitrary.)

[2] 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC).

[3] 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC). A rational relationship between the limitation and its purpose has been found absent in a significant number of cases. See S v Dodo 2001 (3) SA 382 (E), 2001 (3) BCLR 279, 293E–G, 293H–294A (E)(Eastern Cape High Court found no rational relationship between a mandatory sentence of life imprisonment and its alleged purpose — deterrence); Lesapo (supra) at para 26 (Extent to which the limitation achieved its purpose was, at best, minimal); Coetzee v Comitis & Others 2001 (1) SA 1254 (C), 2001 (4) BCLR 323 (C) at para 40 (No rational connection between the restraint of trade in question and the purpose it purported to serve); S v Walters & Another 2001 (2) SACR 471 (Tk), 2001 (10) BCLR 1088 (Tk) at para 29 (No rational connection between the authorization of deadly force to prevent the escape of a suspect, and the purpose of the limitation, namely to bring the suspect before a court of law); Lawyers for Human Rights & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2003 (8) BCLR 891, 902H-I (T)(Neither the arbitrary powers granted immigration officials nor the absence of procedural safeguards in s 34(8) of the Immigration Act alleviated the strain on state resources.)

[4] For judgments in which a limitation of a fundamental right is described as 'overbroad', see Coetzee (supra) at paras 13, 14 and 32; Case & Curtis (supra) at paras 48–63, 93, 97 and 108–12. But see South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC) at paras 17–18 (O'Regan J notes different meanings and uses of the term 'overbreadth'.)

The state has failed the 'less restrictive means' requirement in a number of cases in which the Court deemed it obvious that narrower means existed to achieve the legislative objective.[1] In Coetzee, provisions that authorized the imprisonment of judgment debtors were held to be overly broad because they swept up into their proscriptive net not only debtors who wilfully refused to pay, but also debtors who were unable to pay.[2] In Case & Curtis, a ban on the possession of indecent or obscene photographic matter was held to be unreasonable because the definition of indecent or obscene matter was so broad that it could apply to almost any photograph, film or television programme that contained references to sexual matters.[3] In Manamela, the Court found that the objectives of a reverse onus provision — in terms of which someone who had acquired stolen goods was presumed to be guilty of a statutory offence — could also be achieved by a more narrowly tailored reverse onus provision confined to certain categories of expensive stolen goods (motor cars or expensive equipment).[4]

[1] See Makinana & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Another; Keelty & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2001 (6) BCLR 581, 607A–D (C)(Protection of employment opportunities of South African citizens and permanent residents could be achieved through a provision which did not apply to foreign spouses of South African permanent residents); Prince v President of the Law Society of the Cape of Good Hope & Others 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC) at paras 54–76 and 81 (Ngcobo J, dissenting, wrote that a religious exemption could be granted from the ban on cannabis without undermining the purpose of the provision); Islamic Unity (supra) at paras 50 and 51 (The need to protect dignity, equality and national reconciliation could be achieved by a provision which was 'appropriately tailored and more narrowly focussed.')

[2] See Coetzee (supra) at paras 13, 14 and 32.

[3] See Case & Curtis (supra) at paras 48–63, 91, 93, 97, and 108–112.

[4] S v Manamela & Another (Director-General of Justice Intervening) 2000 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (5) BCLR 491 (CC) at para 43. See also Phillips & Another v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) & Others 2000 (3) SA 345 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC) at paras 26–28. Phillips concerned the constitutionality of a provision which made it an offence for an on-consumption liquor licence holder to allow a person (i) to perform an offensive, indecent or obscene act or (ii) who is not clothed or not properly clothed to perform or to appear on licensed premises where entertainment is presented or to which the public has access. The majority found that the purpose of the limitation — to minimize the harm that may result from the consumption of liquor in public places — could also be achieved by means of a narrowly tailored provision that did not apply to licensed theatres, and which was thus less invasive of freedom of expression.

Less restrictive means were also found to be available where the government had been unable to convince the court that the purpose of a reverse onus provision could not be achieved by means of an evidentiary burden. See Mbatha (supra) at para 26; Manamela (supra) at para 49; S v Singo 2002 (4) SA 888 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 793 (CC) at para 39. Less restrictive means were found to be available where the purpose of deterrence could be achieved by means that were less restrictive of the protection against cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment. See Makwanyane (supra) at para 128 (State could not carry burden of justification under IC s 33(1) because it could not demonstrate that the death penalty was a more effective deterrent than life imprisonment, and life imprisonment least impaired the constitutional rights at issue); S v Williams 1995 (3) SA 625 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC) at paras 62–63 (State could not carry burden of justification under IC s 33(1) because it could not demonstrate that whipping — though an effective deterrent — was a more effective deterrent than other creative sentencing options which are less invasive of the minor's right to human dignity); S v Dodo 2001 (3) BCLR 279, 294B-D (E)(Less restrictive means than prescribed lifelong imprisonment are available: namely the likelihood that offenders will be apprehended, convicted and punished.) Less restrictive means were found to be

The idea that rights should be limited no more than is necessary, and that a limitation will therefore be held to be unjustifiable if it could be achieved by less restrictive means, seems relatively straightforward. Its application presents a number of difficulties. In the first place, whether or not less restrictive means to achieve a given purpose are found to exist will depend, as we have already noted, on the manner in which the purpose of the limitation has been defined. Peter Hogg points out that the purpose can be stated at different levels of generality, and that this may have a significant impact on the less restrictive means inquiry:

> If the objective has been stated at a high level of generality, it will be easy to think of other ways in which the wide objective could be accomplished with less interference with the [fundamental] right. If the objective has been stated at a low level of generality, perhaps simply restating the terms of the challenged law, it will be hard to think of other ways in which the narrow objective could be accomplished with less interference with the . . . right.[1]

This point can be illustrated by reference to the disagreement between the majority and the minority in Manamela.[2] Recall that Manamela concerned the constitutionality of a reverse onus provision, in terms of which a person who acquired stolen property had to prove that he/she had reasonable cause to believe that the goods were not stolen. The majority defined the purpose of the limitation at a fairly high level of generality, as that of 'put[ting] in place effective means to eradicate the market in stolen property'.[3] The majority recognized that the available where the objective of the limitation could be achieved by means of a non-discriminatory provision. See Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 49 (Respondent failed to demonstrate that the same purpose could not be achieved by a provision which does not discriminate against married women); Moseneke & Others v The Master & Another 2001 (2) SA 18 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 103 (CC) at paras 22–23 (Practical advantages of racially discriminatory provision can be accomplished equally well by a non-discriminatory provision). Less restrictive means were found to be available by recourse to ordinary or less invasive procedural arrangements. See Mohlomi v Minister of Defence 1997 (1) SA 124 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1559 (CC) at paras 18–19 (Infringement by s 113 of the Defence Act of the right to access to court, in terms of its running time, deemed to be neither reasonable nor justifiable because means less restrictive of the right and capable of achieving the same objective are readily available); Lesapo (supra) at para 27 (Less invasive remedies, such as an interdict against the alienation of land, available to realise the purpose); Mamabolo (supra) at para 57 (Ordinary mechanisms of criminal justice system could be employed instead of summary procedures.)

[1] Peter Hogg 'Section 1 Revisited' (1992) 1 National Journal of Constitutional Law 1, 5.

[2] The point is also illustrated by the disagreement between the majority and the minority in Prince. In Prince, the minority took the basis for the state's refusal to provide a religious-based exemption from the ban on cannabis to be the prevention of harm to users. They could thus hold that the prohibition went further than necessary, as it targeted both the harmful and non-harmful use of cannabis. By contrast, the majority insisted that the purpose should be defined with greater specificity. In the majority's view,

> The legislation seeks to prohibit the very possession of cannabis, for this is obviously the most effective way of policing the trade in and use of the drug. The question is therefore not whether the non-invasive use of cannabis for religious purposes will cause harm to the users, but whether permission given to Rastafari to possess cannabis will undermine the general prohibition against such possession. We hold that it will.

Prince (supra) at para 141.

[3] Manamela (supra) at para 41.

achievement of this objective was a 'pressing social need',[1] but found the sweep of the means employed to be too great. It held that the same objective could be achieved equally well by means of an evidential burden.[2] By contrast, the minority stated the purpose of the limitation with far greater specificity. In their view, the purpose was to impose an obligation upon members of the public to take care not to participate in a market for stolen goods.[3] This purpose could not be achieved fully through less restrictive means. An evidential burden, as opposed to a reverse onus, would 'diminish the obligation upon members of the public to act vigilantly'.[4]

A second problem concerns the separation of powers between the legislature and the judiciary, and the question as to whether a judicial finding that the lawmaker should have used less restrictive means may amount to a judicial usurpation of legislative power. That the Constitutional Court is alive to this danger is evident in Makwanyane.[5] Chaskalson P restated 'the fundamental problem of judicial review' in the following terms: 'Can, and should, an unelected court substitute its own opinion of what is reasonable or necessary for that of an elected legislature?'[6] He does not answer this question, nor even set out the standards the courts should employ when placed in such an uncomfortable position. Instead, he sets out the parameters of the problem: that 'the role of the Court is not to second-guess the wisdom of policy choices made by legislators'; that the means chosen must impair the right 'as little as is reasonably possible'; and that the courts should allow the legislature some deference in its choices between 'differing reasonable policy options', but should not 'give them an unrestricted licence to disregard an individual's rights'.[7] In Manamela, the Court displays the same awareness of the difficulties associated with determining the availability of less restrictive means, but arrives at a somewhat crisper articulation of the problem: 'The problem for the Court is to give meaning and effect to the factor of less restrictive means without unduly narrowing the range of policy choices available to the Legislature in a specific area.'[8] The Manamela Court later elaborates upon the fear that it may unduly narrow the range of policy choices available to the legislature:

> It will often be possible for a court to conceive of less restrictive means, as Blackmun J has tellingly observed: 'And for me, "least drastic means" is a slippery slope . . . A judge would

[1] Manamela (supra) at para 42.
[2] Ibid at paras 49–50.
[3] Ibid at para 96.
[4] Ibid at para 97.
[5] Makwanyane (supra) at para 107.
[6] Ibid.
[7] Ibid quoting from Reference re sections 193 and 195(1)(c) of the Criminal Code (Manitoba) (1990) 48 CRR 1, 62. See also R v Chaulk (1991) 1 CRR (2d) 1, 30; Tetreault-Gadoury v Canada (Employment and Immigration Commission) (1991) 4 CRR (2d) 12, 26.
[8] Manamela (supra) at para 95 (O'Regan J and Cameron AJ dissenting).

> be unimaginative indeed if he could not come up with something a little less "drastic" or a little less "restrictive" in almost any situation, and thereby enable himself to vote to strike legislation down.'[1]

The concern that judges, in their insistence that the least restrictive means should be adopted, may end up 'annihilat[ing] the range of choices' available to the legislature[2] flows in part from the fact that the question of less restrictive means often raises difficult issues relating to 'cost, practical implementation, the prioritisation of certain social demands and the need to reconcile conflicting interests'.[3] In other words, less restrictive means can often be envisaged, but such means may impose significant administrative burdens on the state, have other substantial cost implications, undermine the state's symbolic objectives or reverse a hierarchy of needs worked out through the political process.

The Court, as we shall see, has contrived an answer of sorts to this challenging problem. That answer appears in its most explicit form in Mamabolo, where Kriegler J writes:

> Where section 36(1)(e) speaks of less restrictive means it does not postulate an unattainable norm of perfection. The standard is reasonableness. And in any event, in theory less restrictive means can almost invariably be imagined without necessarily precluding a finding of justification under the section. It is but one of the enumerated considerations which have to be weighed in conjunction with one another, and with any others that may be relevant.[4]

How the Court actually engages the challenges posed by the 'less restrictive means' requirement — and sometimes fails to finesse the problems it poses — is illustrated by two cases: Prince and Christian Education.

In Prince, the Constitutional Court considered a challenge to the constitutionality of a statutory prohibition on the use and the possession of cannabis. The applicant claimed that the relevant legislation did not provide an exemption for the use or possession of cannabis by Rastafari for bona fide religious purposes. All of the judges agreed that the prohibition limited the religious freedom of Rastafari. They disagreed, quite sharply, however, on the question as to whether an exemption would constitute a less restrictive means of achieving the state's objectives.

The minority found that the achievement of the limitation's purpose did not require a complete ban on all uses of cannabis. In their view, the limitation was too broad. The statutory provisions in question targeted uses of cannabis that

[1] Manamela (supra) at para 94 quoting from Illinois State Board of Elections v Socialist Workers Party 440 US 173, 188-189 (1979). The same point is made elsewhere. See Mamabolo (supra) at para 49; John Hart Ely 'Flag Desecration: A Case Study in the Roles of Categorization and Balancing in First Amendment Analysis' (1975) 88 Harvard LR 1482, 1485–87; Peter Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (4th Edition, 1997) 877– 78; Henk Botha 'Rights, Limitations, and the (Im)possibility of Self-Government' in H Botha, A van der Walt & J van der Walt Rights and Democracy in a Transformative Constitution (2003) 13, 24–25.

[2] Manamela (supra) at para 95.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Mamabolo (supra) at para 49.

posed no risk of harm and that could be effectively regulated by the state. Such regulation could take the form of an exemption administered by means of a permit system.[1]

The majority, however, concluded that a permit system would be difficult to enforce, would impose significant financial and administrative burdens on the state, and would fail to protect the Rastafari themselves from the harm caused by the use of cannabis. The majority was especially troubled by the prospect of placing law enforcement officials in the uncomfortable position of having to determine whether a person found in possession of cannabis is a bona fide Rastafarian or merely masquerading as such, or of having to distinguish between a person's legitimate use of cannabis for religious ends or a person's illegal use of the drug for recreational purposes. For these, and other, reasons, the majority concluded the creation of an exemption for the use of cannabis for religious purposes would substantially impair the state's ability to enforce legislation designed to restrict the use of controlled substances.[2]

In Christian Education, the applicants contended that a ban on corporal punishment in independent religious schools violated their right to religious freedom (FC s 15) and religious community practice (FC s 31). The Court assumed, for the sake of argument, that the law limited the parents' religious rights in terms of FC ss 15 and 31. However, a unanimous Court then found the limitation of these rights to be reasonable and justifiable. It rejected the argument that an exemption would constitute an appropriate 'less restrictive means' on the following grounds:

> The outlawing of physical punishment in the school accordingly represented more than a pragmatic attempt to deal with disciplinary problems in a new way. It had a principled and symbolic function, manifestly intended to promote respect for the dignity and physical and emotional integrity of all children. It might in appropriate cases be easier to carve out exemptions from general measures that are purely administrative, regulatory or commercial in character than from those that have principled foundations and are deliberately designed to transform national civic consciousness in a major way. Even a few examples of authorised corporal punishment in an institution functioning in the public sphere would do more than simply inconvenience the State or put it to extra expense. The whole symbolic, moral and pedagogical purpose of the measure would be disturbed, and the State's compliance with its duty to protect people from violence would be undermined.[3]

Both Prince and Christian Education – two of the Court's more controversial decisions — raise as many questions as they answer about the meaning of 'less restrictive means'. Is a means 'less restrictive' if it is likely to be less effective in achieving the limitation's objective?[1] Should the least restrictive means always be employed, regardless of the additional costs it imposes on the state? Ought a court to insist on less restrictive means in circumstances where it would require the state to reprioritize needs and to allocate more resources to, say, one area of policing at the expense of others? The answer given by a majority of the Court to all of these questions in Prince and Christian Education is 'no'.

[1] Prince (supra) at paras 65–70. Sachs J also suggested the possibility of the decriminalisation of the use of cannabis for sacramental purposes. Ibid at paras 165–169.

[2] Ibid at paras 129–142.

[3] Christian Education (supra) at para 50.

But it would be wrong to conclude from these two cases that the answers will always be so.[2] Aware that a rule that required the state to opt for less restrictive means only if such means would not impose significant additional costs would substantially water down limitations analysis, the Court has sought some middle ground between, on the one hand, dictating the basic law's general normative framework and a detailed script for realizing it ideals, and, on the other, undue deference to the state's objectives and the means it chooses to realize them. The apparent result of this 'balancing' act has been to situate the 'less restrictive means' test within the larger balancing exercise under FC s 36. In terms of this approach, the less restrictive means test is just one of several considerations relevant to limitations analysis. As a result, even where less restrictive means are available, the Court may still find that, on balance, the limitation is reasonable and justifiable.[3] However, although the Court has stated that the 'less restrictive means' requirement 'does not postulate an unattainable norm of perfection' and has located the actual standard for 'less restrictive means' as 'reasonableness' (which together appear to make the factor redundant), it has indicated that there are a number of variables that determine how much weight it attaches to this fifth and final factor.

(aa) Narrowly tailored

In Case & Curtis, Mokgoro J emphasized that, while the courts grant a significant 'margin of appreciation' to the legislature in choosing among different means of

[1] In De Reuck, the appellant argued that the prohibition of child pornography was overbroad because it applied to persons who possessed child pornography for the purposes of making a documentary film about child pornography. Even though the Act permits the executive committee of the Film and Publication Board to grant an exemption for the possession of banned materials for 'bona fide purposes', the appellant argued that the exemption procedure was not the least restrictive means available, and that a 'legitimate purpose' defence should be recognized. The Court rejected this contention, and held that a 'legitimate purpose' defence would be open to abuse, and was therefore 'unlikely to be an effective less restrictive means'. De Reuck (supra) at para 81.

[2] See Prince (supra) at para 155 ('[L]imitations analysis under section 36 is antithetical to extreme positions which end up setting the irresistible force of democracy and general law enforcement, against the immovable object of constitutionalism and protection of fundamental rights. What it requires is the maximum harmonisation of all the competing considerations.')

[3] The idea that the least restrictive measure need not always be chosen by the legislature was also aired during the constitution-making process. Theme Committee Four wrote that when courts compare the limitation in question with other appropriate alternative restrictions, they are not obliged to pick the least restrictive measure: 'Those restricting rights will be left with a discretion to decide on any particular measure within this [acceptable] range; . . . this need not be the least restrictive measure viewed in isolation.' Theme Committee Four Advisors Memorandum to Constitutional Assembly (14 April 1996)(Manuscript on file with authors).

effectuating its goals, this margin does not apply to provisions whose proscriptive sweep is substantially broader than is reasonably required.[1] The Mamabolo Court similarly noted that, where the legislature can choose from amongst a range of reasonable options, to qualify as 'reasonable' a measure must be carefully and narrowly tailored.[2]

(bb) Costs imposed

The Court considers the extent to which less restrictive means would impose an additional administrative burden on the state, lead to problems of implementation, divert valuable resources, unduly narrow the range of policy choices available to the legislature, or otherwise impair the state's efforts to achieve its objectives. Here the state or other party seeking to justify the limitation is obliged to demonstrate that less restrictive means would defeat the state's attempt to achieve its legitimate objectives.

(cc) Extent of the limitation

Where a limitation makes severe inroads into an individual's rights, the Court is more likely to require the state to adopt less restrictive measures, even where such measures would impose substantial additional costs upon the state, or give rise to difficulties of implementation. In Prince, the minority concluded that the state was obliged to 'walk the extra mile' for the appellant because of the deleterious consequences the statutory limitations have on the religious life of the Rastafari.[3]

(dd) Purpose of the limitation

The last question a court will ask is whether the limitation serves a pressing public interest. If the answer to this question is yes, the Court is more inclined to grant the legislature quite a bit of latitude in its choice of means.[4]

[1] Case & Curtis (supra) at para 62.

[2] The Court in Mamabolo emphasized that the offence of scandalising the court is to be narrowly construed and to apply only to speech likely to damage the administration of justice. Mamabolo (supra) at paras 48–50.

[3] Prince (supra) at 149. The minority emphasised the outsider status of the Rastafari, their lack of political influence, and the stigma that flows from the law's treatment of adherents as criminals and drug addicts. Ngcobo J wrote that the prohibition > degrades and devalues the followers of the Rastafari religion in our society. . . . It strikes at the very core of their human dignity. It says that their religion is not worthy of protection.

Ibid at para 51.

[4] Compare Sachs J's judgment for the Court in Christian Education with his dissent in Prince. The key to the different conclusions reached by Sachs J in these two cases seems to lie in his statement in Prince that 'where there are practices that might fall within a general legal prohibition, but that do not involve any violation of the Bill of Rights, the Constitution obliges the State to walk the extra mile.' Prince (supra) at para 149 (emphasis added). This statement must be read together with his statement in Christian Education that '[i]t might in appropriate cases be easier to carve out exemptions from general measures that are purely administrative, regulatory or commercial in character than from those that have principled foundations

(d) Balancing and proportionality

One of the most noteworthy features of the Constitutional Court's limitations jurisprudence is the way it conceives of the relationship between the different factors that need to be considered. The Court understands these factors to be closely interrelated. Far from representing a 'sequential check-list' that can be adhered to 'mechanically', the factors are to be considered within the broader context of a 'balancing exercise' and a 'global judgment on proportionality'.

This approach has taken many commentators by surprise. Prior to the judgment in Makwanyane, it was widely expected that the Court would model its analysis of the reasonableness and justifiability of fundamental-rights limitations on the approach adopted by the Canadian Supreme Court in R v Oakes.[1] However, the approach of the Makwanyane Court represents, in important respects, a significant departure from the Oakes test.[2] The Oakes test proceeds in distinct stages: first, it is asked whether the limitation serves a sufficiently important objective; second, whether the limitation is rationally connected to the said objective; third, whether the limitation impairs the right as little as possible; and fourth, whether the actual benefits of the limitation are proportionate to its deleterious consequences for the rights-holder. The need to consider the second question arises only once the first leg of the test has been satisfied; the third question is addressed only once the first and second questions have been answered in the affirmative, and so on. This sequential exercise is substantially different from an approach grounded in balancing and proportionality.[3] Not only is it more structured, but a 'balancing exercise' is undertaken only at the very end of the inquiry, once it has been established that the limitation does serve an important objective, that it is rationally connected to and are deliberately designed to transform national civic consciousness in a major way.' Christian Education (supra) at para 50. For Sachs J, the crucial difference between the two cases lies in their objectives: while important, the objective of the limitation in Prince is not directly rooted in a constitutional right — an exemption from the ban on cannabis would not, for instance, result in a violation of human dignity, the ban on unfair discrimination or the right not to be subjected to cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment.

[1] See Stu Woolman 'Riding-the Push-Me-Pull-You: Constructing a Test that Reconciles the Conflicting Interests Which Animate the Limitation Clause' (1994) 10 SAJHR 60, 84–90; Gerhard Erasmus 'Limitation and Suspension' in D van Wyk, B de Villers, J Dugard & D Davis Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 629, 649; Azar Cachalia, Halton Cheadle, Dennis Davis, Nicholas Haysom, Penuell Maduna & Gilbert Marcus Fundamental Rights in the New Constitution (1994) 111–115; George Devenish 'An Examination and Critique of the Limitation Provision of the Bill of Rights in the Interim Constitution' (1995) 10 SA Public Law 131, 135–36.

[2] Although the Oakes test featured prominently in the Makwanyane Court's discussion of comparative limitation jurisprudence Chaskalson P was quick to point out that 'there are differences between our Constitution and the Canadian Charter which have a bearing on the way in which section 33 should be dealt with.' Makwanyane (supra) at para 110. He gave no indication of what the relevant differences might be, but simply echoed the words of Kentridge AJ in S v Zuma that 'I see no reason in this case to fit our analysis into the Canadian pattern.' Zuma (supra) at para 35.

[3] Cf Peter Hogg 'Canadian Law in the Constitutional Court of South Africa' (1998) 13 SA Public Law 1, 7 (Noting that while the factors identified in Makwanyane and subsequently listed in FC s 36 'owe a great deal to the language of Oakes, it is clear that a more flexible approach to justification is contemplated'.)

such objective, and that it impairs the right as little as possible. If the limitation fails any of the first three legs, the court need not engage in cost-benefit analysis.

That the Oakes test should be seen as worthy of emulation in South Africa after 1994 is hardly surprising.[1] The test represents a bold attempt to come to terms with the sometimes conflicting doctrines of constitutional supremacy and separation of powers. The Oakes test subjects fundamental-rights limitations to rigorous scrutiny, refuses to lend legitimacy to the limitation of rights in the name of a crass utilitarian calculus, links conceptually the grounds for finding a rights infringement to the grounds for finding that such a limitation is justified, and offers a sophisticated understanding of the proper degree of deference the courts owe the legislature.[2] Finally, the Oakes test promotes analytically rigorous and politically candid judicial reasoning.

(i) Balancing as a bad metaphor

The metaphor of balancing is so deeply embedded in our constitutional discourse that we often use it without giving the actual meaning of the metaphor a second thought.[3] Our purpose over the next several sections is to offer (a) several definitions of balancing, (b) a number of trenchant critiques of the practice; and (c) a good faith reconstruction of the Court's doctrines of balancing and proportionality.

[1] It may also have something to do with the accessibility of Canadian constitutional materials. South African lawyers generally experience far fewer barriers in trying to come to terms with Canadian constitutional law than, say, German law.

[2] See Lorraine Weinrib 'The Supreme Court of Canada and Section One of the Charter' (1988) 10 Supreme Court LR 469 (For an analysis of the normative vision and the understanding of institutional roles which inform the Oakes test.)

[3] See, eg, Johan de Waal 'A Comparative Analysis of the Provisions of German Origin in the Interim Constitution' (1995) 11 SAJHR 1, 26 ('[B]alancing is just another way of limiting rights'); Gerhard Erasmus 'Limitation and Suspension' in D van Wyk, B de Villiers, J Dugard & D Davis Rights and Constitutionalism (1994) 629, 649–50 ('In order to perform this [limitation] function the judiciary will have to do the necessary balancing throughout'); John Casey Constitutional Law in Ireland (1992) 313–14 ('Balancing constitutional rights: On occasion, one person's exercise of his/her constitutional rights will collide heavily with those of others . . . [and] courts will obviously have to weigh . . . the constitutional rights involved . . . to achieve an accommodation'); Paul Sieghart The International Law of Human Rights (1991) 94 ('[Limitations analysis] involves a delicate balance between the wishes of the individual and the utilitarian greater good of the majority'); David Currie The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (1994) 180 ('If the mystical terminology of reciprocal effect sounds peculiar . . . the bottom line of interest balancing does not'); Laurence Tribe American Constitutional Law (1988) 792–93 ('[D]eterminations of the reach of first amendment protections . . . presuppose some form of "balancing" whether or not they appear to do so'). For talk of 'balancing' in our own jurisprudence, see, eg, S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665, 708 (CC)('Makwanyane')(Proportionality 'calls for the balancing of interests'); Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1995 (4) SA 631, 656 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC)(Sachs J, concurring)('[F]aithfulness to the Constitution is best achieved by locating the two-stage balancing process within a holistic, value-based and case-oriented framework.') Philosophers also employ this terminology. See, eg, John Rawls Political Liberalism (1993) 243 (Rawls writes that citizens, like members of the court, must 'be able to explain their vote to one another in terms of a reasonable balance of public political values' (emphasis added).) The language of balancing is an inevitable part of any utilitarian theory. For a critique of 'balancing' in utilitarian theory, see Bernard Williams 'A Critique of Utilitarianism' in JCC Smart & B Williams (eds) Utilitarianism: For and Against (1973) 75.

(aa) Definitions of balancing

Balancing means the 'head-to-head' comparison of competing rights, values or interests. It takes two basic forms.

Sometimes balancing means that one right (or interest or value) will simply 'outweigh' another right (or interest or value). For example, in Makwanyane, the Court held that the applicant's right not to be subject to cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment (informed by the right to life and the right to human dignity) outweighed the state's interest in the death penalty for the sake of retribution and communal catharsis. In purely clinical terms, the death penalty impaired the right not to be subject to cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment and could not be justified in terms of IC s 33.

Sometimes balancing means 'the striking of a balance' between competing rights or interests. No right is asked to pay the ultimate price. In Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie, same-sex life partners contended that their rights to equality and to human dignity were impaired by laws that prevented them from entering into civilly-sanctioned marriages.[1] Leaders of religious and traditional communities contended that the state and the Court had no business demanding that they alter their beliefs or practices to accommodate gay and lesbian unions. The Court split the baby and engaged in this second form of balancing. While acknowledging that the rights of same-sex life partners to equality and to dignity were unjustifiably limited by rules of common law and statutory provisions that prevented them from entering civilly-sanctioned marriages, the Fourie Court went out of its way to note that religious prohibitions on gay and lesbian marriage did not constitute an unjustifiable infringement and that religious officials could legitimately refuse to consecrate a marriage between members of a same-sex life partnership.[2]

(bb) Critiques of balancing

(w) Pluralism, incommensurability and complexity

Some critiques suggest that the discourse of balancing of constitutional rights, values or interests involves terminological confusion. Other critiques contend that 'balancing', in either of the two forms identified above, is an impossible

[1] Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others, Amici Curiae); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)('Fourie').

[2] Ibid at paras 90–98. See also Fourie v Minister of Home Affairs 2005 (3) SA 429 (SCA), 2005 (3) BCLR 241 (SCA) at paras 36–37 (Supreme Court of Appeal also holds that no religious denomination would be compelled to marry gay or lesbian couples.)

undertaking. Our critique targets both the terminological and the theoretical confusion associated with balancing talk.[1]

We do not solely value things in quantitative terms: intensity or utility. We value things in qualitatively different ways. Furthermore, human beings generally do not value just one thing in life. Human beings value a vast array of goods. And we value each good in our own and its own particular way.

This first claim about pluralism and the qualitatively different ways in which we value goods suggests a second claim. Human goods are often incommensurable.[2] It is fair to say that the things we value most in life — friends, lovers, work, beauty, nature, and yes, money — cannot be compared with one another. Put differently, while we may be able to compare the virtues of friends with friends, the virtues of lovers with lovers, the virtues of work with work, the virtues of certain objects of beauty with other objects of beauty, and certainly the virtues of more money with less money, there is no single template against which we can measure claims of friendship, love, work, beauty, nature and money. They may compete with one another. But they compete in a way not easily assessed. Indeed, justice may require us to refrain, in so far as it is possible, from attempts to measure these competing goods by a single yardstick. Michael Walzer puts our second complex claim thus:

> There has never been a universal medium of exchange . . . [T]here has never been a single criterion, or a single set of interconnected criteria for all distributions. Desert, qualification, birth and blood, friendship, need, free exchange, political loyalty, democratic decision: each has had its place, along with many others, uneasily coexisting, invoked by competing groups, confused with one another.[3]

[1] See New Jersey v TLO (1985) 469 US 325, 369 (Brennan J)(Balancing is 'doctrinally destructive nihilism'); Murray v Ireland [1985] IR 532 (Balancing talk is often 'misleading'). See also Cass Sunstein 'Conflicting Values in Law' (1994) 62 Fordham LR 1661; Cass Sunstein 'Incommensurability and Valuation in Law' (1994) 92 Michigan LR 779; ME Blomquist 'Review of Gaurino-Ghezzi and Loughran's Balancing Juvenile Justice' (1997) 7 Law and Politics Book Review 24, 25 ('[T]he authors' call for "balance" and the vision of "balance" they offer (punishment coexisting with accountability, treatment and respect for the youth's constitutional rights) are neither new, enlightening nor particularly helpful. The problem facing the juvenile justice system is not so much that the system is single minded, but that with its myriad goals, the system has difficulty translating and accomplishing these goals in some meaningful ways. [J]ust why 'balance' should be pursued and valued as highly as the authors advocate is far from clear. As a goal, 'balance' appears to be one more buzz word like "rehabilitation" and "accountability" that is part of the . . . lexicon but is not particularly useful because . . . it lacks . . . content.')

[2] Other scholars likewise point out the impossibility of measuring conflicting interests against a single metric of value. See, eg, Ted Aleinikoff 'Constitutional Law in the Age of Balancing' (1987) 96 Yale LJ 943, 972–76; Mark Tushnet 'An Essay on Rights' (1984) 62 Texas LR 1363, 1372–73; Stu Woolman 'Out of Order? Out of Balance? The Limitation Clause of the Final Constitution' (1997) 13 SAJHR 102, 114–19.

[3] Spheres of Justice (1985) 4. See also John Finnis 'On Reason and Authority in Law's Empire' (1987) 6 Law & Philosophy 357, 374 ('[Once one] strips away the veil hiding the problem of the incommensurability of the criteria proposed for identifying a best or uniquely right interpretation, theory or answer [w]e are left with the metaphor: "balance". But in the absence of any metric which could commensurate the different criteria, the instruction to balance can legitimately mean no more than bear in mind, conscientiously, all the relevant factors, and choose.')

From these observations, Walzer draws the following conclusions. First, goods, like people, have shared meanings in a society, because goods, like people, are a product of social, political, economic, educational, religious and linguistic practices which generate meaning. Second, it is the shared meaning of a good which determines, or should determine, its distribution. Third, and perhaps most importantly for Walzer, when the meanings of social goods are distinct, their distributions must be autonomous. That is, for each good there exists a set of criteria and procedures deemed to be appropriate for its distribution.[1]

Walzer's view may need to be qualified. The demands of justice — even in a world of plural and incommensurable goods — are, in fact, far more complex than Walzer's account allows. First, spheres of human activity do overlap and thereby complicate the criteria for the distribution of any particular social good. Second, to the extent that some spheres of activity are inextricably linked, it is inevitable that the distribution of one good will influence the distribution of another. Third, given the spontaneous, evolutionary manner in which most spheres of activity have come into being — meaning they are never the product of a single agent — the criteria for the distribution of a social good are rarely going to be clear or conflict-free. The criteria for distribution are also rarely going to conform to a simple lexical ordering. Fourth, not only may criteria within spheres conflict, the individual criteria within the same sphere may be so indeterminate as not to yield a clear result in a given instance. Fifth, different goods can sometimes be measured along the same metric. We discover on closer analysis, for example, that friendship and military honour share a common value — loyalty — or we find that two different constitutional norms — equality and expression — undergird a third constitutional commitment — democratic participation.[2] Sixth, spheres may not only overlap with one another, or through

[1] Justice, on this account, consists in making sure that a social good is distributed in accordance with the appropriate criteria for that sphere of human activity. Injustice, on the other hand, consists in the use of either inappropriate criteria for the distribution of goods or, more likely, the use of goods accrued in one sphere of social life to determine the distribution of goods in another sphere. For example, the Pope should be selected on the basis of piety, good judgment and knowledge of Catholic dogma, not because he was the son of the previous Pope or has sufficient wealth to renovate the Vatican. Wealth may be an appropriate criterion for the distribution of some goods, but it is not appropriate for ecclesiastical office.

[2] This general account of incommensurability may strike some readers as just a bit too glib. As the fifth point suggests, there are occasions where if we were to think a little more about the nature of the particular values 'at odds', we might make some progress towards resolving the conflict. Values may have either intrinsic worth or instrumental worth or both. If value P is valuable only in its service to Q, then the conflict between P and Q, when it arises, is only apparent. For example, we may believe that democracy (P) is only valuable in so far as it protects individual liberty (Q). Or if P and Q are valuable only in light of their service to R, then when they conflict we may be able to make a clear judgement as to which better serves R. So if we were convinced that democracy (P) and equality (Q) were only valuable in so far as they served the value of community (R), then there might be a way of deciding which of the two goods — P or Q — best served R in a particular instance. In addition, even if our Ps, Qs and Rs are incommensurable, there may be some procedures which are better than others for reconsidering our intuitions about these values. Rawls, for example, uses the original position to generate his two principles and to defend the priority of the liberty principle over the difference principle. As we suggest below, there may be still other ways — storytelling — of constructively reflecting upon the way we choose between and order incommensurable values.

domination effect the unjust distribution of some good, but they may also conflict directly with one another. The internal criteria of two spheres of activity may be such that it is impossible in a given situation to do justice to both. For instance, a commitment to a pristine environment may be completely at odds with a commitment to life, equality and economic development.

Although this account of the relationship between spheres of activity and various goods is somewhat more complex than a pure pluralist account, the fact remains that, in innumerable instances, goods are incommensurable. Hard choices as to which good we pursue have to be made. How do we undertake such decisions? There are, it would appear, three basic options.

One could adopt a strict hierarchy of goods. At one time or another — never all the time — we might pursue any of the goods on our list. However, when recognized goods come into conflict with one another, we would choose to pursue those goods in order of their appearance on some hypothetical list. Neither the Court nor any commentators of whom we are aware advocate this option.

One could choose the preferred good on an ad hoc basis. No good would have primacy of place and each decision as regards a conflict between goods would depend on the exigencies or the particular context of the moment. One critique of the Court's limitations analysis is that it often looks as if it takes place in a rather ad hoc manner. But as the previous descriptive account ought to have made clear, such a charge would be unfair.

One could adopt some combination of the two approaches. One might have a theory of goods which told us which goods were most valued, in what circumstances and why. However, in recognizing the heterogeneity and incommensurability of goods, this theory would not demand a strict hierarchy of goods. For example, if in our theory of goods, egalitarian concerns were privileged over autonomy concerns, we might expect that, where constitutional goods such as equality and expression came into conflict, the former would generally take precedence over the latter. However, because such a theory recognizes the plurality and incommensurability of goods, there would be circumstances in which we might recognize the priority of the latter over the former. Most importantly perhaps, given our recognition of the complexity of the decisions to be made about the just distribution of goods, as well as the tendency of goods to conflict, we must acknowledge that we cannot map out all of our choices in advance. In fact, there may be many instances in which multiple goods press their claims upon us in ways which cannot be easily settled. We are stuck, in such instances, with hard choices.[1]

[1] See John Finnis 'On Reason and Authority in Law's Empire' (1987) 6 Law & Philosophy 357, 375 ('A case is hard, in the sense which interests lawyers, when there is more than one right, ie not wrong, answer.')

How should the Court handle hard choices?

First, the Court must be candid and recognize that there will be situations in which constitutional goods will urge independent and irreconcilable claims upon us: in such situations, we will have to choose between incommensurable goods.[1] Second, the Court must acknowledge that it lacks a set of second-order rules which might tell us how to reconcile competing goods with one another.[2] Most importantly, the Court must not view the choice of one good over another good in hard cases as arbitrary. Instead, it must be candid about the reasons for its choices and hope that its candour about the reasons for its choices ultimately reflects the exercise of good judgement.[3]

(x) Subjectivity and arbitrariness

Some critics of balancing point out that the Final Constitution — like most constitutional texts — provides little or no guidance as to how a court should determine the relative weight to be attached to conflicting rights and interests. One possible result is that the weighting and the ranking of interests are not

[1] See Charles Larmore Patterns of Moral Complexity (1986). Larmore writes in a very similar vein when articulating the following five-fold thesis with regard to the complexity of moral judgement. First, without some external incontrovertible method by which to measure morality, it is inevitable that rational people will not always agree about what decisions to make in a given situation. Secondly, if we recognize the potential for such rational disagreement about what decision to take in given situations, then 'we must reckon with a fundamental heterogeneity of morality. By this I mean that we have an allegiance to several different moral principles that urge independent claims upon us (we cannot plausibly see the one as a means for promoting the other) and so can draw us in irreconcilable directions.' Ibid at 138. Thirdly, given this fundamental heterogeneity of moral values, any ranking of principles is contingent at best. We can expect situations that undermine the ranking and that force us to sacrifice a 'primary' commitment to a 'subordinate' commitment. Fourth, the sacrifice does not mean we simply reverse our order of principles in a given case. There will be many instances in which, as Larmore writes, 'we find that heeding both sorts of ultimate moral commitments is at odds with the way the world is, when we cannot do what they tell us we ought to do, [and that] we cannot entertain revising their authority or suspending judgment. We have to live with the fact that we have [dual] obligations we cannot [simultaneously] honor. Our possibilities in the world are then too narrow for what we know we ought to do.' Ibid at 150. Finally, the application of moral principles requires the capacity to exercise good judgement. The principles do not tell us when they must be applied. The moral situations to which the principles apply do not come to us with labels that we may simply read off. See Laurent Frantz 'Is the First Amendment Law? A Reply to Professor Mendelson' (1963) 51 California LR 729, 748 (The balancer, it is said, attempts to measure the immeasurable and to 'compare the incomparable'.)

[2] Legal rules may be indeterminate in a number of different ways. A first-order rule may be ambiguous or indeterminate. First-order legal rules may conflict with one another. Second-order legal rules, where they exist, may be equally ambiguous and equally apt to conflict with other second-order rules. For a critical take on this view of indeterminacy and legal rules, see Lawrence Solum 'On the Indeterminacy Crisis: Critiquing Critical Dogma' (1987) 54 U Chicago LR 462. See also Anton Fagan 'In Defence of the Obvious: Ordinary Meaning and the Identification of Constitutional Rules' (1995) 11 SAJHR 545; Alfred Cockrell 'Rainbow Jurisprudence' (1996) 12 SAJHR 1, 5. For a brief discussion of indeterminacy in constitutional interpretation, see Stu Woolman 'Review of Du Plessis' and Corder's Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights' (1995) 112 SALJ 711, 714.

[3] For our preferred approach to reason-giving in hard cases, see the discussion of judicial narratives and storytelling at § 34.8*(e)*(iii) infra.

grounded in constitutional interpretation — and extended and reflected engagement with the meaning of the constitutional text — but based, instead, on the subjective preferences of individual judges.[1]

The charge that balancing reinforces non-interpretative tendencies in a bench already loath to make the normative pronouncements that every constitution requires, and creates a mechanism that enables judges to substitute their personal political preferences for the preferences of the democratically-elected branches, inevitably raises important questions about the separation of powers between the legislature and the judiciary. If the mediation of conflicting social interests is understood to be an essentially legislative function, judges ought not to be placed in a position that short-circuits the hurly-burly of the political process.

Realists about the legal process may counter that this argument rests upon a formalist distinction between law and politics (and thus between the legislative function and the judicial function) that never was and never will be an accurate account of what happens in all modern constitutional democracies. What happens, on the realist account, is that politics becomes law, law becomes politics, and politics becomes law in a never-ending cycle of conflict and resolution.

But even realists, among whom we count ourselves, must contend with the spectre of judicial arbitrariness raised by balancing. And, it must be said, we are concerned that this approach to limitations analysis enables judges to skirt the demands that attach to difficult and controversial value-choices by employing the ostensibly neutral, objective or scientific language of balancing.

(y) Incrementalism and conservatism

Balancing is also sometimes associated with a conservative bench. In the United States, balancing got a bad reputation during the McCarthy era, when courts used the language of balancing to validate serious infringements of freedom of expression.[2] Such an account seems to oversimplify the historical record. Balancing has, at various times in history, also been associated with liberal and progressive causes and the extension of constitutional rights and freedoms.[3]

But even if balancing does not necessarily translate into a readiness to sacrifice individual rights and freedoms in the name of collective interests, there may still be something conservative about it. Balancing is, we think, legitimately associated with a cautious, incrementalist approach to constitutionality inspired judicial law-making. The balancer is inclined to restrict her finding to the case at hand, as the next case may, ostensibly, require that a different balance be struck. While there may be advantages to such a judicious approach,[1] which was indeed a hallmark of the Chaskalson Court, there is growing concern within the academy that the case-by-case approach to constitutional analysis, in general, and limitations analysis, in particular, blunts the transformative potential of the Final Constitution.[2]

[1] See Aleinikoff (supra) at 977 ('Balancing — by transforming any interest implicated by a constitutional case into a constitutional interest — is the ultimate non-interpretivism.') See also Loammi Blaauw-Wolf 'The "Balancing of Interests" with Reference to the Principle of Proportionality and the Doctrine of Güterabwägung: A Comparative Analysis' (1999) 14 SA Public Law 178, 198.

[2] See, eg, Dennis v United States 341 US 494 (1951). See also Laurent Frantz 'The First Amendment in the Balance' (1962) 71 Yale LJ 1424.

[3] See Kathleen Sullivan 'Post-Liberal Judging: The Roles of Categorization and Balancing' (1992) 63 Univ Colorado LR 293 ('Post-Liberal')(Describing the dialectical relationship between categorization and balancing.)

(z) Science and silence

Balancing, some critics suggest, encourages judges to resort to 'scientific' language — ie, cost-benefit analysis. The fear here is that such talk invites a new type of formalism which, like all formalist doctrines, tends to eschew dialogue about important moral and political issues. As Aleinikoff puts it:[3]

> Scientifically styled opinions, written to answer charges of subjectivity, make us spectators as the Court places the various interests on the scales. The weighing mechanism remains a mystery, and the result is simply read off the machine. Scientific balancing decisions are neither opinions nor arguments that can engage us; they are demonstrations.

A related critique is that balancing rests upon the assumption that the primary aim of constitutional law is to mediate between pre-existing interests. These interests are thought to be exogenous to the legal process. Such an approach to constitutional conflicts presupposes an underlying coherence in the law and in society that in heterogeneous polities — such as our own — simply does not exist. Moreover, an underlying assumption of value homogeneity tends to work against the belief of many an honest citizen — and quite a few academics — that political truths are more likely to arise out of dialogic modulation and not the reinforcement of their own subjective preferences.[4] The judge's role in this account of balancing is akin to that of a grocer, rather than a facilitator of, and a participant in, normative dialogue.[5]

(ii) Balancing as a benign practice

Why then would the Constitutional Court — which so clearly commits itself to the cause of constitutional supremacy, which so self-consciously seeks to establish

[1] See Iain Currie 'Judicious Avoidance' (1999) 15 SAJHR 138.

[2] See, generally, Robert Nagel 'Liberals and Balancing' (1992) 63 Univ Colorado LR 319. An incrementalist approach is said to characterize the development of the common law. It has also been criticized as being at odds with the constitutional injunction to develop the common law in view of the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. The critique holds that the incrementalist approach leaves many of the conservative assumptions that inform legal rules unchallenged, and thus fails to realise the transformative potential of the Final Constitution. See, eg, André van der Walt 'Tradition on Trial: A Critical Analysis of the Civil-Law Tradition in South African Property Law' (1995) 11 SAJHR 169; André van der Walt 'Dancing with Codes — Protecting, Developing and Deconstructing Property Rights in a Constitutional State' (2000) 118 SALJ 258.

[3] Aleinikoff (supra) at 993.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Sullivan 'Post-Liberal' (supra) at 293.

its own institutional legitimacy,[1] which so earnestly attempts to articulate a principled jurisprudence,[2] and which regularly invokes notions of dialogue and shared constitutional interpretation — embrace a judicial method prone to so many real and potential pitfalls? Does this decade-long embrace reflect a lapse of critical reflection and a sociological fact about how deeply ingrained the metaphor of balancing is in legal discourse? Or, rather, is it indicative of the Court's belief that balancing is an indispensable and ineradicable part of limitations analysis, and that, whatever its drawbacks, balancing can somehow be rehabilitated?

Given the Court's natural reticence with respect to discussing such meta-theoretical issues, it is not surprising that the Court's judgments do not provide direct answers to any of these questions. However, after a full decade's worth of limitations jurisprudence, the Court's paper trail is long enough to draw some fairly uncontroversial conclusions about its rationale for choosing balancing and proportionality over other modes of limitations analysis.

First, as we have already noted in the section on drafting history above, the Oakes test was already in decline in Canada by the time the Constitutional Court heard its first case in 1995. The Canadian Supreme Court had, in a series of judgments, adopted a significantly more deferential approach to legislative enactments which the state sought to justify in terms of s 1 of the Charter. This softening of the Oakes test seems to have gone hand in hand with a growing scepticism within the Court — and within the academy — about the ability of the Oakes test to constrain judicial discretion.[3] Various justices had noted that, with respect to the 'minimal impairment' leg of the test, a 'less restrictive means' of achieving the law's objective could almost always be conjured up. The Supreme Court's subsequent modification of the minimal impairment or less restrictive means leg deprived the Oakes test of much of its vigour and gave rise to the perception in Canada and elsewhere that a step-by-step approach to limitations analysis was not easy to devise and even harder to maintain.

Second, the Constitutional Court's approach seems to be informed by its belief that the FC s 36 factors are so closely intertwined that one cannot consider them in isolation. The Court, as we have seen, maintains that the inquiry into less restrictive means cannot be meaningfully separated from questions about the nature of the right that is limited, the nature and extent of the limitation and the importance of the legislative objective. In the Court's view, a global consideration of these factors helps it to contextualize the inquiry into less restrictive means, and assists it in determining the degree of deference appropriate in a particular case.

[1] See Heinz Klug Constituting Democracy: Law, Globalism and South Africa's Political Reconstruction (2000); Stu Woolman 'Metaphors and Mirages: Some Marginalia on Choudhry's The Lochner Era and Comparative Constitutionalism and Ready-Made Constitutional Narratives' (2005) 20 SAPR/PL 281; Theunis Roux 'Legitimating Transformation: Political Resource Allocation in the South African Constitutional Court' (2003) 10 Democratization 92.

[2] See Sujit Choudhry 'Globalization in Search of Justification: Toward a Theory of Comparative Constitutional Interpretation' (1999) 74 Indiana LJ 819 (Offers an analysis of the way in which the Constitutional Court has sought to ground its jurisprudence in principle.)

[3] See, eg, Christopher Dassios & Clifton Prophet 'Charter Section 1: The Decline of Grand Unified Theory and the Trend towards Deference in the Supreme Court of Canada' (1993) 15 Advocates' Quarterly 289.

Third, the softening and the modification of the Oakes test and the early Constitutional Court's persistent assertion of the interdependence of the FC s 36 factors makes its ultimate conclusion that FC s 36 requires a 'global' judgment based on proportionality and balancing appear more plausible. It is certainly true that the Court's 'global proportionality' approach makes it easier for the Court to demonstrate the appropriate degree of deference to the political branches of government.

Finally, the Constitutional Court seems confident that it can avoid some of the pitfalls commonly associated with a balancing approach. This confidence flows — on the Court's own account — from the manner in which the factors enumerated in FC s 36 actually do structure and constrain the inquiry into the proportionality of impugned measures. That is, the factors do not need to represent a closed list considered in a strict sequence to provide sufficient focus for the Court's inquiry. The Court contends that FC s 36 and its five factors are designed to facilitate a nuanced engagement with the particular factual and legislative setting and not to resolve value conflicts in the abstract. The balancing exercise to be undertaken under FC s 36 should be an exercise in practical reasoning and good judgement.[1] If practical reasoning and good judgement in the Aristotelian sense is what matters most, then the Constitutional Court's notion of balancing has nothing to do with the 'accuracy' of the weights it attaches to conflicting interests, but rather hinges on the extent to which its judgments engage with particular social contexts and offer persuasive accounts of the basis for the outcome.

Assuming the Constitutional Court is correct about the nature of its preferred approach to limitations analysis, the real question is whether the Court lives up to its ideal. Does balancing, as practised by this Court, lead to a nuanced and context-sensitive limitations jurisprudence that promotes candid consideration of conflicting interests and facilitates shared constitutional interpretation with the coordinate branches of government? The most charitable conclusion we can offer is that the Court's current record is inconclusive. Sometimes the Court's balancing and global assessment of proportionality results in a style of judicial reasoning which masks the actual basis for controversial value choices. On other occasions, the Court's use of balancing as a form of practical reasoning would appear to advance open and candid consideration of conflicting interests. In the end, we remain 'balancing' sceptics because the metaphor's open-texture tends to promote closure rather than candour.[1]

[1] See Prince (supra) at para 151 (In the words of Sachs J, the weighing of interests 'does not take place on weightless scales of pure logic pivoted on a friction-free fulcrum of abstract rationality', but has to be done 'in the context of a lived and experienced historical, sociological and imaginative reality.')

(e) A thick(er) conception of limitations analysis

In this section, we offer a preferred reading of FC s 36 — one which we believe will help courts to think more clearly about the demands that limitations analysis places on various actors in our constitutional democracy. This preferred reading does not proffer a 'grand unified theory'. Our account begins, instead, by addressing serious concerns about institutional comity in a constitutional democracy and by articulating what we, and others, have described as the Final Constitution's call for 'shared constitutional interpretation'. After suggesting the contours of a doctrine that would enable the courts to share 'constitutional competence' with other political actors — and thus mediate the competing doctrinal claims of constitutional supremacy and of separation of powers — we ask whether the Constitutional Court's extant jurisprudence provides sufficient normative content to guide lower courts and other actors interested in participating in this shared interpretive endeavour. What we see is, on the one hand, a rather cursory attempt to reconcile the primary values that underlie fundamental rights analysis and limitations analysis — openness, democracy, human dignity equality and freedom — and a more deeply entrenched privileging of the value of human dignity, on the other. We do not deny the centrality of dignity to our constitutional project — our dignity jurisprudence may even be, with the principle of legality, one of our two most important contributions to the larger world of international or comparative constitutional law. We do take issue with the Court's tendency to reduce the other four values to manifestations of dignity, and its record of having little to say about the meaning of 'democracy' in our basic law — something of a surprise given the success of South Africa's transition from fascism to democracy. Having established that our five basic values may well be incommensurable in some sets of circumstances and that balancing does little to address such incommensurability, we end our discussion

[1] Even if it is true that the exercise in balancing favoured by the Constitutional Court allows for an open and candid consideration of conflicting interests and a nuanced engagement with the social and legislative context, it is still not clear whether this approach is adequately understood by the political branches, or has filtered down to the lower courts. This sociological fact raises the question as to whether the sequential inquiry formulated in Oakes would not be more conducive to shared constitutional interpretation. Wouldn't the application of the Oakes test signal far more unequivocally to the legislature what exactly needs to be remedied with respect to a legislative provision found to be unconstitutional? Moreover, wouldn't the more structured Oakes inquiry make it easier for social actors to anticipate what limitations would or would not pass constitutional muster, and to adapt their actions accordingly? In addition, aren't lower courts less likely to make a hash of the more systematic Oakes inquiry? A Constitutional Court that takes some pride in its ability to avoid constitutional issues, and saying no more than is necessary about those issues, is unlikely to produce a corpus of judgments that constrain judicial and non-judicial actors. Roach and Budlender's rather pessimistic analysis suggests that many state actors are either incapable of understanding rules generated by the Constitutional Court (as they are currently constructed) or are wilfully ignoring them. See Kent Roach & Geoff Budlender 'South African Law on Mandatory Relief and Supervisory Jurisdiction' (2005) 122 SALJ 325.

by suggesting a methodology for constructing judicial narratives that may be of some use to courts faced with cases that challenge our ability to accommodate marginal groups or that require other forms of hard choices.

(i) Shared constitutional interpretation[1]

Our approach to limitations analysis in particular, and to constitutional interpretation in general, suggests that Bill of Rights litigation, rightly conceived, ought to reflect a dialogue about the meaning of fundamental rights and the cogency of justifications offered for their limitation.[2] From this perspective, powers of judicial review are best understood, not as part of a battle for ascendancy between courts and legislatures (though they may turn into that), or a means of frustrating the will of the political majority, but, rather, as a shared project of constitutional

[1] See Stu Woolman 'The Selfless Constitution: Flourishing and Experimentation as the Foundations of the South African State' (2006) 21 SA Public Law (forthcoming). As one of the authors has argued elsewhere at length, talk of 'shared constitutional interpretation' is meant to draw our attention to the kinds of institutional arrangements that are most likely to realize the five basic ends of the South African state. First, the radical givenness of the ends of individuals and groups suggests that the South African state is under a constitutional obligation to protect those ways of being in the world that do not vitiate its core commitments to such goods as rough equality, tolerance, dignity and democratic participation. Civil and political rights protect extant ways of being in the world. Second, South Africa's history of radical inequality in resource allocation requires a particular form of redress. The South African state is under a constitutional obligation to ensure that historically marginalized groups have access to the requisite stocks of political and economic capital necessary to sustain preferred sources of the self. Third, consistent with the Final Constitution's core commitments, the South African state must ensure that its citizens are not held hostage by ways of being in the world that diminish individual flourishing. This concern is more about the ability of individuals to exit repressive communities than it is about creating novel conditions for flourishing. But that does not mean that state intervention on behalf of coerced individuals will not have such a knock-on novelty effect. Fourth, state intervention on behalf of such persons may just shake up existing social hierarchies in a manner that creates new ways of being in the world. Similarly, our commitment to experimentalism is predicated upon the notion that existing ways of being will fail both to facilitate the realization of existing ends and to recognize those ends within which happiness truly resides. Fifth, the experimental constitutionalism that gives rise to a doctrine of 'shared constitutional interpretation' is ultimately pragmatic about the means and the ends of life. See Michael Dorf & Charles Sabel 'A Constitution of Democratic Experimentalism' (1998) 98 Columbia LR 267. It holds no end to be beyond criticism and immune to reform. Consistent with its pragmatic roots, it recognizes the reciprocal relationship between means and ends. That is, experimental constitutionalism understands that a change in the way one goes about pursuing the ends of life may ultimately change the ends that one pursues.

[2] See S v Mhlungu 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) at para 129 (Constitutional interpretation takes the form of 'a principled judicial dialogue, in the first place between members of this Court, then between our Court and other courts, the legal profession, law schools, Parliament, and, indirectly, with the public at large.') See also David Beatty 'The End of Law: At Least as We Have Known It' in Robert Devlin (ed) Constitutional Interpretation (1991) 22; Peter Hogg & Allison Bushell 'The Charter Dialogue between Courts and Legislatures (or Perhaps the Charter of Rights Isn't Such a Bad Thing after All)' (1997) 35 Osgoode Hall LJ 75; Henk Botha 'Rights, Limitations, and the (Im)possibility of Self-government' in H Botha, A van der Walt & J van der Walt Rights and Democracy in a Transformative Constitution (eds) (2003) 13, 24–25.

interpretation.[1] What is 'shared constitutional interpretation' exactly? In short, shared constitutional interpretation stands for five basic propositions:

> First. It supplants the notion of judicial supremacy with respect to constitutional interpretation. All branches of government have a relatively equal stake in giving our basic law content. Second. It draws attention to a shift in the status of court-driven constitutional doctrine. While courts retain the power to determine the content of any given provision, a commitment to shared constitutional interpretation means that a court's reading of the constitutional text is not meant to exhaust all possible readings. To the extent that a court consciously limits the reach of its holding regarding the meaning of a given provision, the rest of the judgment should read as an invitation to the co-ordinate branches or other organs of state to come up with their own alternative, but ultimately consistent, gloss on the text. Third. Shared constitutional competence married to a rather open-ended or provisional understanding of the content of the basic law is meant to increase the opportunities to see how different doctrines operate in practice and maintain the space necessary to make revision of constitutional doctrines possible in light of new experience and novel demands. In this regard, the Constitutional Court might be understood to engage in norm-setting behaviour that provides guidance to other state actors without foreclosing the possibility of other effective safeguards for rights or other useful methods for their realization. Fourth. A commitment to shared interpretations ratchets down the conflict between co-ordinate branches and levels of government. Instead of an arid commitment to separation of powers — and empty rhetorical flourishes about courts engaging in legal interpretation not politics — courts are freed of the burden of having to provide a theory of everything and can set about articulating a general framework within which different understandings of the basic text can co-exist. The courts and all other actors have more to gain from seeing how variations on a given constitutional norm work in practice. Fifth. This experimentalist framework ought to reveal 'best practices' with respect to the realization of constitutional objectives. These 'best practices' should, in turn, offer the courts, the political branches and the citizenry regular opportunities to re-think the meaning — and the constraints — of our basic law.[2]

Ackermann J, in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs, gives expression to just the sort of institutional comity we have in mind when he writes that:

[1] Our account of shared constitutional interpretation does not rest upon some fiction that a perfect distribution of institutional roles between the judiciary, the legislature and the executive exists. On the contrary, we recognize that 'shared constitutional competence' can turn into a political battle between the courts and the political branches. Shared constitutional interpretation is best understood as a means of minimizing the potential for such conflict and remaining alive to the limits of constitutional adjudication with respect to hotly contested political questions. We are grateful to Johan van der Walt for his helpful comments in this regard. Johan van der Walt 'Reply to Woolman and Botha on Limitations' in M Bishop, D Brand & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Conversations: Proceedings of the Constitutional Law of South Africa Conference and Public Lecture Series (2007). The original reply is available at www.chr.up.ac.za/closa.

[2] See Stu Woolman 'The Selfless Constitution: Flourishing and Experimentation as the Foundations of the South African State' (2006) 21 SA Public Law (forthcoming). For the original source for this theory of constitutional interpretation, see Michael Dorf & Barry Friedman 'Shared Constitutional Interpretation' (2000) 2000 Sup Ct Rev 61. See also National Education Health and Allied Workers Union v University of Cape Town & Others 2003 (3) SA 1 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 154 (CC) at para 14 (Constitutional Court expressly recognized that the process of interpreting the Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995 in light of the demands of FC ss 39(2) and 23(1) requires an appreciation of the legislature and the courts' shared responsibility for interpreting the Final Constitution.)

> It should also be borne in mind that whether the remedy a Court grants is one striking down, wholly or in part; or reading into or extending the text, its choice is not final. Legislatures are able, within constitutional limits, to amend the remedy, whether by re-enacting equal benefits, further extending benefits, reducing them, amending them, 'fine-tuning' them or abolishing them.[1]

Shared responsibility for interpreting the Final Constitution does have its limits. The legislature must make a good-faith attempt to revisit an issue in a new and constitutionally permissible way. Where, as in Satchwell I and II, Parliament refuses to take seriously a previous finding of constitutional invalidity, the courts are well within their rights to rebuff subsequent attempts to re-enact, in modified form, the offending statutory and regulatory framework.[2]

How then does shared constitutional interpretation inform our general approach to limitations analysis?[3] As we argued in §§ 34.3, 34.4 and 34.5

[1] 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39(CC)('NCGLE II') at para 76.

[2] Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa 2003 (4) SA 266 (CC), 2004 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Satchwell II'); Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC)('Satchwell I'). In Satchwell II, the Constitutional Court was asked to assess the constitutionality of a statutory and regulatory framework almost identical to one that it had declared unconstitutional only a year earlier in Satchwell I. In Satchwell I, the Constitutional Court had declared ss 8 and 9 of the Judges' Remuneration and Conditions of Employment Act 88 of 1989 unconstitutional because they discriminated against homosexual judges' same-sex partners. The Satchwell I Court ordered that the words 'or partner in a permanent same-sex life partnership in which the partners have undertaken reciprocal duties of support' be read into the provisions after the word 'spouse'. Subsequent to the judgment in Satchwell I, Parliament promulgated a new Act, the Judges' Remuneration and Conditions of Employment Act 47 of 2001. This Act took no notice of the Satchwell I Court's order. In Satchwell II, the Constitutional Court refused to accord Parliament any deference, declared the new provisions discriminatory, and read the words 'or partner in a permanent same-sex life partnership in which the partners have undertaken reciprocal duties of support' into the new legislation.

[3] Shared constitutional interpretation is Michael Dorf's inestimably valuable contribution to recent constitutional scholarship. As Michael Dorf and Barry Friedman describe it, the 'invitations' by the US Supreme Court to Congress and state legislatures to share responsibility for giving various constitutional provisions content have been going on for some time. As has been noted elsewhere in this text, Dorf and Friedman use the cases of Miranda and Dickerson to great effect in explaining how shared constitutional interpretation does — and might — work. Miranda v Arizona 384 US 436 (1966)('Miranda'); US v Dickerson 530 US 428 (2000)('Dickerson'). As any viewer of US police dramas knows, Miranda articulated the warnings to persons arrested by the police custody that must precede any custodial interrogation. What few viewers, and perhaps few academics, appreciate is the extent to which most of those warnings were intended as judicial guidelines and not excavations of constitutional bedrock. The Miranda Court, as Dorf and Friedman point out:

> explains that it granted certiorari 'to explore some facets of the problems ... of applying the privilege against self-incrimination to in-custody interrogation, and to give concrete constitutional guidelines for law enforcement agencies and courts to follow.' The Court sets out its 'holding' at the outset, and that holding is only that the prosecution may not use statements made in custodial interrogation 'unless it demonstrates the use of procedural safeguards effective to secure' the privilege. And '[a]s for the procedural safeguards to be employed, unless other fully effective means are devised to inform the accused persons of their right of silence and to assure a continuous opportunity to exercise it' the specific Miranda guidelines are required. The Court then devotes an entire paragraph to encouraging governmental bodies to devise their own ways of safeguarding the right. At least twice more, the Court repeats the holding and re-extends the invitation.

Michael Dorf & Barry Friedman 'Shared Constitutional Interpretation' (2000) 2000 Sup Ct Rev 61, 81–83 citing Miranda (supra) at 441–490. Congress accepted the invitation. But as the judgment in Dickerson reflects, it wilfully misconstrued the nature of the invitation. Congress did not, as the Supreme Court above, the two-part structure of Bill of Rights analysis contains an invitation to non-judicial actors to alter the Constitutional Court's take on the basic law. By explicitly separating out the process of defining the ambit of a right and the process of determining the appropriateness of any limitation, the Bill of Rights avoids creating a world where the outcome of a legal dispute is tied entirely to rights definition. For example, in American constitutional law, once a particular type of conduct is deemed to fall within the protected ambit of a fundamental right, any law limiting the exercise of the conduct concerned is more than likely to be invalidated in terms of a strict scrutiny standard.[1] The two-part structure of Bill of Rights analysis has enabled the Constitutional Court to avoid rigid categories and to acknowledge the role of other state institutions in interpreting the provisions of the Final Constitution.

The two-part structure of Bill of Rights analysis has two further benefits when viewed through the lens of shared constitutional interpretation. First, a relatively precise, if nuanced, approach to limitations analysis creates the space for a fairly fastidious treatment of rights interpretation. Second, the Court is at its best, and its most comfortable, when it speaks to the parameters of the 'constitutional' and is not asked to become an oracle of the 'optimal'.[2]

However, the promise of shared constitutional interpretation will not be fulfilled if the courts continue to rely exclusively on the metaphor of balancing.

suggested, come up with equally effective ways of safeguarding the right to remain silent and not to have statements made in custodial interrogation used by the prosecution unless adequate safeguards have been put in place. Instead, Congress simply enacted as legislation the pre-Miranda test that the voluntariness of a confession would be assessed in terms of a totality of the circumstances. The Miranda-specific warnings were merely included as factors to be taken into account when determining voluntariness. Not surprisingly, the Dickerson Court rejected Congress' 'new' take on the voluntariness of custodial confessions. It did so, as Dorf and Friedman argue, because Congress had failed to take seriously the Court's concern with the 'compulsion inherent in custodial interrogation' and had failed to offer an alternative that could be deemed 'equally effective' in ameliorating this compulsion. Dorf & Friedman (supra) at 71.

While the 34 years between Miranda and Dickerson might have witnessed confusing dicta from the Court regarding the status and the reach of the holding in Miranda, Dorf and Friedman convincingly show that Congress and other government actors did indeed possess significant space to place their own gloss on the Fifth Amendment's protections. What they were not free to do was ignore entirely even the most limited construction of the Court's holding.

[1] For a compelling account of the dilemmas posed by one-stage fundamental rights analysis, see Laurence Tribe & Michael Dorf 'Levels of Generality in the Definition of Rights' (1990) 57 University of Chicago LR 1057.

[2] See, especially, Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 27 ('First and foremost it must be emphasised that the Court has a judicial and not a political mandate. Its function is clearly spelt out in IC 71(2): to certify whether all the provisions of the NT comply with the CPs. That is a judicial function, a legal exercise. Admittedly a constitution, by its very nature, deals with the extent, limitations and exercise of political power as also with the relationship between political entities and with the relationship between the state and persons. But this Court has no power, no mandate and no right to express any view on the political choices made by the CA in drafting the NT, save to the extent that such choices may be relevant either to compliance or non-compliance with the CPs. Subject to that qualification, the wisdom or otherwise of any provision of the NT is not this Court's business.')

Constitutional challenges to public or private practices typically pose the following problems for traditional adjudication: (1) epistemic hurdles in adapting the legal language to render faithfully important facts and ideas from particular communities and contexts;[1] (2) evaluative obstacles when courts need to weigh conflicting values against a background of norms grounded in particular contexts;[2] and (3) the complexity of structuring suitable institutional remedies.[3] Balancing blocks meaningful analysis of the facts in difficult cases because it substitutes an empty image for the more difficult task of information-gathering, norm-setting and remedy creation. It thereby risks increased judicial deference to existing practices and, consequently, the systematic under-enforcement of important rights.

[1] Although courts have the institutional advantage of being able to structure the scope of fact-finding through discovery, they nonetheless face the epistemic problem of translating values and concerns from a specific social context into more generalizable legal terms. This problem is particularly acute for cases involving more insular communities. The insularity of such communities at once places their rights most at risk of infringement and also renders it more difficult to communicate their norms and ideas to an outside audience. As noted earlier, our narrative identities are partially constituted by the norms of our communities. Along with those identities, people inherit a vocabulary to express communal norms. Such a vocabulary may or may not correspond to the legal vocabulary. In commenting on the American Mennonites' amicus curiae brief in Bob Jones University v United States, Robert Cover characterized the Mennonite understanding of the First Amendment as not 'simply the "position" of an advocate.' According to Cover, 'the Mennonites inhabit an ongoing nomos that must be marked off by a normative boundary from the realm of civil coercion, just as the wielders of state power must establish their boundary with a religious community's resistance and autonomy.' Robert Cover '1982 Term Foreword: Nomos and Narrative' (1983) 97 Harvard LR 4, 28 citing Bob Jones University v United States 46 US 574 (1983).

[2] The second challenge for the court is how to evaluate competing norms on complex moral terrain. Jordan provides a good illustration of this two-fold challenge: the norms of gender equality, of private autonomy, of public morality, and of resistance to conformity-inspired policies all exert their pull — and often in opposite directions simultaneously.

[3] A related but more problematic scenario is where courts fail to recognize possibilities for rendering the competing values compatible and structuring solutions acceptable to all parties. There is ground to fear that such errors may be quite common in 'hard' cases on account of the courts' lack of familiarity with the norms at stake. Moreover, as Dorf, Sturm and others have argued, the solution may not be apparent, even to the participants, until they engage in a process of deliberation and adjustment. See Michael Dorf 'The Domain of Reflexive Law' (2003) 103 Columbia LR 384, 399 (Noting that the dynamic nature of deliberation and implementation may create novel solutions to seemingly intractable conflicts because 'reflexivity goes both up and down, local participation always has ingredient in it the prospect of changing the principal norm.') However, the courts' general inability to distinguish a 'hard' case from a genuine 'clash of absolutes' creates a substantial likelihood of more decisions content to err on the side of caution and to opt against finding existing practices to be unreasonable limitations. The standard conservative approach placates legitimate concerns about the limits of judicial expertise at managing institutional reform and a need to preserve the institutional legitimacy of the judiciary. The upshot is, however, that the government or powerful private institutions will not be required to walk that 'extra mile'. See Prince (supra) at para 149 (Sachs J)('I align myself with the position that where there are practices that might fall within a general legal prohibition, but that do not involve any violation of the Bill of Rights, the Constitution obliges the State to walk the extra mile.')

The likelihood of under-enforcement of fundamental rights is further compounded by our courts' typical and justifiable reluctance to wade into the complex regions of institutional reform. Traditionally, courts are confronted with two unpalatable choices when attempting to transform institutions guilty of

To overcome the poverty of the existing approach to limitations analysis, South African courts may be well-served by embracing a more 'experimentalist' approach. Indeed, the open-ended, fact-driven framework of limitations analysis invites litigants — and other stakeholders — to participate more directly in the vetting of possible solutions to the legal problem confronting the court. Such an invitation to the parties to get their hands dirty enables the courts to overcome both their own limited administrative capacity and their often enervating reliance on the good faith of the various parties. More importantly, the invitation to the parties to expand their legal strategies, from competing claims with zero-sum outcomes to more optimal solutions grounded in compromises from which all parties believe they may benefit, enables the courts to reap the problem-solving potential inherent in collective deliberation.

An experimentalist perspective on limitations analysis proceeds from the recognition that the determination of the 'reasonableness' of a limitation and the identification of the best of all possible remedies are interdependent processes. This experimentalist perspective also recognizes how exceedingly difficult it is to discover the 'right' answer — or remedy — from an outsider's perspective.[1] Indeed, the notion of a single 'right' answer in such a complex context — in advance of any attempt to mediate the competing positions — is itself suspect.[2] As Susan Sturm has observed in connection with workplace discrimination, changes in legal doctrine shape people's expectations. The new legal doctrine thereby reconstructs their identities, beliefs and behaviour. Such an evolutionary process — a function systematic rights violations. Either they become involved in the administration of reform and must scrutinize each detail of proposed changes. Or they abstain from active supervision and intervene only to prevent instances of explicit 'bad faith'. The challenges for courts in administering traditional institutional reforms are substantial, both in time, resources and in administrative oversight. See Lewis v Casey 518 US 343, 347 (1996)(The case involved an appeal from a consent degree entered in a piece of prison reform litigation. '[The injunction] specified in minute detail the times that libraries were to be kept open, the number of hours of library use to which each inmate was entitled (10 per week), the minimal educational requirements for prison librarians (a library science degree, law degree, or paralegal degree), the content of a videotaped legal-research course for inmates (to be prepared by persons appointed by the special master but funded by ADOC), and similar matters.') See also Charles Sabel & William Simon 'Destabilization Rights: How Public Law Litigation Succeeds' (2004) 117 Harvard LR 1015, 1021–53 (For other examples of the degree to which federal courts in the United States became involved in the administrative oversight of public institutions like schools, housing, and mental health units.)

[1] See Michael Dorf '1997 Supreme Court Term Foreword: The Limits of Socratic Deliberation' (1998) 112 Harvard LR 4.

[2] This recognition is one of the hallmarks of the sociological concepts of complexity and emergence. To observe that social systems are complex is not tantamount to rejecting the possibility of systematic, scientific understanding. Rather, as Lee McIntyre notes, complexity relates to our knowledge of the world at a particular level of description. It does not rebut the possibility of (social) scientific explanations at another level. See Lee McIntyre 'Complexity and Social Scientific Laws' (1993) 97 Synthese 209–227.

of the law as an experimental feedback mechanism — can gradually transform the nature of the problem as originally perceived.[1]

Confronted with such complexity, the task for the courts is not to undertake Herculean quests for perfect theoretical answers or to retreat into the quietism of deference to administrative decisions and private ordering. Our preferred experimentalist perspective possesses two important advantages. First, by acknowledging the difficulty of finding the 'right' answer, ex ante, courts with a problem-solving perspective must create mechanisms (including legal doctrines) that gather relevant information, generate proposed reforms and relay feedback quickly. Second, given the potential for unintended consequences that flow from adaptive processes triggered by shifting legal principles, a problem-solving perspective implements each set of solutions tentatively and is ready to modify it on the basis of empirical evidence.[2] The experimentalist approach calls for mechanisms that compare the information generated by different proposals and allow for the adoption of successful solutions.[3]

[1] See Dorf 'The Domain of Reflexive Law' (supra) at 399–400 (Observes the dynamic character of social change resulting from new legal protections.) As the partial success of 'rational expectations' theory in macroeconomics demonstrates, some adaptive processes can be modelled very effectively (some of the time). See Steven Sheffrin Rational Expectations (1996). However, there are good reasons for doubting whether models of similar precision can be designed for contexts as diverse and unpredictable as personal intimacy (Jordan) or religious worship (Prince).

[2] See, eg, Michael Dorf, 'Legal Indeterminism and Institutional Design' (2004) 78 New York University LR 875, 920–935 and 960–970.

[3] Another solution conducive to easing the strain of rights analysis is for courts to fashion structural interdicts that create forums for participatory deliberation. That is, instead of shouldering the immense burden of creating both the substantive goals and the procedures for institutional reforms, courts can shift the burden to the various stakeholders. The more limited — but no less important — function would be to play the role of a referee who polices the rules for negotiation between the stakeholders. This approach elicits the tacit knowledge and reflective capacities of the stakeholders in a particular controversy. For only these stakeholders possess the ability to overcome the underlying epistemic and evaluative obstacles that confront the courts. See Jonathan Klaaren 'A Second Look at the South African Human Rights Commission, Access to Information, and the Promotion of Socio-economic Rights' — Human Rights Quarterly — (forthcoming, manuscript on file with author)(Drawing on experimentalist principles in EU regulatory regimes as the basis for advocating that the SAHRC be responsible for gathering and disbursing information regarding the government's progress in fulfilling the promise of socio-economic rights.)

How might this novel approach to limitations analysis (plus structural injunctions) work? Assume that a court is faced with the prospect of undertaking a limitations analysis in a very complex factual and normative dispute. By issuing a temporary interdict, a court can presume — momentarily — the fact of violation and require the parties to adduce further evidence in support of or in opposition to the limitation of the right. In addition, the temporary interdict may enable the parties — and other interested — stakeholders to search for a mutually agreeable remedy. See Susan Sturm 'The Promise of Participation' (1993) 78 Iowa LR 981 (Argues that participation of stakeholders in the negotiation process initiated by a structural injunction offers important benefits.)

The potential benefits of this approach are several-fold. First, the stakeholders are more likely to be familiar with those norms at issue. Their enhanced participation in both the limitations analysis and the construction of remedies eases the strain of translating ideas internal to their way of being in the world into legal parlance. Furthermore, through its injunctive powers, a court can structure the negotiation process in a manner that fosters participation. This court-enforced structure should improve the likelihood of finding solutions to seemingly intractable ethical conflicts. This participatory bubble may

Of course, courts called upon to perform limitations analysis cannot avoid conflicts that are not susceptible to deliberative solutions. Here again experimental constitutionalism offers the additional idea of provisional adjudication. Provisional adjudication puts alternative possible remedies to the test of experience without necessarily elevating such remedies to the level of established doctrine. Provisional adjudication promises two additional benefits. First, it may facilitate compromise. Affected parties may learn from practical experience and adjust their beliefs and conduct accordingly. Second, it gives parties that may have been aggrieved by a final non-provisional outcome the opportunity to experiment with a remedy of their own making.

But suppose that such provisional space fails to yield a desirable — let us say, from the view of the state — outcome. A finding of unconstitutionality generally still leaves the legislature free to pursue the same objectives, but requires it to use means that better fit — in the sense of being more narrowly tailored to — constitutional imperatives. It is, therefore, clear that the courts do not have the final word on the meaning of the constitutional text in two very important respects. First, just as the legislature must pay heed to the Court's reasons for a finding of unconstitutionality when offering a new formulation of a law, so too must the Court demonstrate discernible deference to the legislature's reformulation.[1] The very fact of a limitations clause in our Bill of Rights demands that the courts give the political branches of government ample opportunity to demonstrate that a new and improved law can achieve the desired objectives within the framework established by the Final Constitution.[2] Second, the ability of our transform some parties' perception of the interests at stake or it may elicit compromises that all sides come to regard as fair. Finally, the process of participatory negotiation will alleviate the strain that institutional reforms place upon judicial resources. As Sabel and Simon have argued, such a use of limitations analysis and structural injunctions generates effective and legitimate solutions and replaces, at least partially, the need for constant judicial oversight. See Charles Sabel & William Simon 'Destabilization Rights: How Public Law Litigation Succeeds' (2004) 117 Harvard LR 1015, 1067–82. However, deliberation and participation are not the elixir to all conflicts between constitutional rights and public policy as manifest in law. As social science has documented in countless experiments, placing people in deliberative groups may lead to the polarization of perspectives instead of the universal adoption of a reflexive stance. See Cass Sunstein Designing Democracy: What Constitutions Do (2001)(Discussion of the practical barriers to effective deliberation, especially the phenomenon of group polarization.) Accordingly, institutional mechanisms are required to ensure that the conditions of negotiation are conducive for genuine deliberation. Unless the participatory bubble of a structural injunction ensures the ability of the parties to voice their concerns equally, the court-structured deliberative process may simply become a front for further domination of some parties by others. Shared constitutional interpretation requires structures that encourage those involved in deliberation to adopt flexible attitudes toward the conflicts they confront.

[1] This proposition remains true even where the court remedies the constitutional defect by reading words into the provision. See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) at para 84.

[2] Even where the courts refuse to acquiesce, Parliament possesses the power to amend the Final Constitution. In UDM, the Court struck down, on relatively technical grounds, floor-crossing legislation for Parliament and the provincial legislatures. United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (African Christian Democratic Party & Others Intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Another as Amici Curiae) (No 2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC)('UDM'). The response by Parliament was to pass an amendment to the Final Constitution that yielded the desired result.

elected representatives to amend the basic law itself — so long as they follow the appropriate procedures and do not violate its basic structure — means that the people always have the final word.

(ii) Norms: 'an open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom'

(aa) Intersection, convergence and conflict amongst constitutional values

We have described in the preceding pages an approach to limitations analysis that simultaneously answers 'deep' questions about institutional comity in a constitutional democracy and adumbrates an analytical framework that responds to concerns about judicial usurpation of legislative prerogatives and the alleged inability of courts to resolve polycentric social problems. What we have not described, in even the most superficial way, is how the courts go about determining the 'normative' content of limitations analysis.

That normative content for limitations analysis turns on the phrase 'an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom'. Determining the meaning of this phrase is fraught with interpretive difficulties as old as political theory itself. There are, for starters, the tensions between democracy and rights, between equality and freedom, and the deeply contested nature of each of these terms.[1]

Before turning to the ways in which our courts have attempted to make sense of this complex phrase, a few observations are in order. First of all, FC s 36 — unlike many international human rights instruments[2] and national constitutions[3] — avoids references to national security, the public interest, public order, decency or morality as criteria for the limitation of fundamental rights. Such silence is not surprising given the myriad ways in which notions of national security, the public interest and public morals were used to suppress opposition to the apartheid state. FC s 36 redefines 'the public interest' (from the constellations of interests that served white, male, straight, and Christian South Africans) in terms of the values underlying an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom. No longer can sectarian notions of the public interest be allowed to ride roughshod over fundamental rights. A limitation of a fundamental right that negates plurality or difference in the name of the common good is, generally, unlikely to be deemed reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom.

[1] Consider the meaning of 'openness' in a heterogeneous society. Official recognition of certain customs of traditional or religious communities will be hailed by some as a celebration of openness. It may be derided by others as a form of closure that impedes the life choices of persons who find themselves confined by such communities.

[2] See, eg, art 29(2) of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights; art 31(1) of the European Social Charter; and art 27(2) of the African Charter on Human and People's Rights.

[3] See, eg, Constitution of India ss 19(2)–(6); Constitution of Namibia arts 13(1), 17(2) and 21(2).

Second, FC s 36 requires us to reconsider traditional understandings of the relationship between constitutional rights and the public interest. If the public interest in terms of which fundamental rights may be limited is underpinned by the same values that inform our interpretation of those rights, it makes no sense to view rights and the public interest as being diametrically opposed, the first representing private entitlements and the second state interests. Rather than fitting our two-stage analysis into the traditional, but ultimately facile public/private dichotomy, the Final Constitution requires us to develop a substantive vision of the norms and the values enshrined in the Bill of Rights that, as we argued above, must guide both rights interpretation and limitations analysis. The result is likely to be both a more realistic understanding of the 'private sphere', which recognizes the legitimate role of the state in ordering 'private' relations, and a richer conception of the public interest, which neither equates it with the interests of the governing elite nor reduces it to the sum of private interests.

Third, the Final Constitution does not envisage a neat division of interpretive tasks, in terms of which certain values (say, human dignity, equality and freedom) are considered only or primarily during the first stage of the fundamental rights inquiry, whereas others (say, democracy) feature only during the second stage. Instead, constitutional interpreters must engage with all five values — to the extent that they are relevant — during both fundamental rights interpretation and limitations analysis.[1] Indeed, FC s 39(1), like FC s 36(1), recognizes that a particular right may be underpinned by more than one value. For instance, while freedom of expression certainly serves democracy and freedom, the Constitutional Court jurisprudence also demonstrates how it serves the interests of human dignity and equality.[2] Both FC s 36 and FC s 39 invite us to consider the complex ways in which the values of democracy, openness, human dignity, equality and freedom overlap, converge, intersect, mutually support each other, and clash.

Lastly, the Final Constitution does not view these values as invariably incommensurable. It requires us to attempt first to harmonize them.[3] If this were not the case, the quintet of values enshrined in FC ss 36 and 39 would generate a cacophony of judgments, rather than a recurring set of themes that hold our Court's jurisprudence together. As Sachs J wrote in his dissenting judgment in Prince:

[1] See § 34.3 supra, on the nature of a value-based approached to fundamental rights and limitations analysis, the relationship between the two stages of analysis, and the grounding of both stages of analysis in the interpretation of the phrase 'open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom'.

[2] See, eg, South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC) at para 7 ('Freedom of expression lies at the heart of a democracy. It is valuable for many reasons, including its instrumental function as a guarantor of democracy, its implicit recognition and protection of the moral agency of individuals in our society and its facilitation of the search for truth by individuals and society generally.') See also Stu Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36 (On dignity interests served by freedom of expression.)

[3] Konrad Hesse contends that the principle of proportionality is grounded in the insight that a constitutional order values a variety of often incommensurable goods, and that legislators and judges are obliged to make hard choices about where to draw the line between such goods in a manner which respects the 'unity' of the basic law. See Konrad Hesse Grundzüge des Verfassungsrechts der Bundesrepublik Deutschland (20th Edition, 1999) 28, 142–43 and 146.

> [L]imitations analysis under section 36 is antithetical to extreme positions which end up setting the irresistible force of democracy and general law enforcement, against the immovable object of constitutionalism and protection of fundamental rights. What it requires is the maximum harmonisation of all the competing interests, on a principled yet nuanced and flexible case-by-case basis, located in South African reality yet guided by international experience, articulated with appropriate candour and accomplished without losing sight of the ultimate values highlighted by our Constitution.[1]

The attempt to harmonize conflicting interests also coheres with our commitment to shared constitutional interpretation. It creates room for an inter-institutional dialogue about the best way of resolving the tension, if not outright conflict, between various constitutional goods.[2]

The Final Constitution does not require us to resolve these conflicts, once and for all, or to measure the Court's fidelity to all five values along a single metric. The tensions inherent in the formulation of FC ss 36 and 39 are constitutive of the South African constitutional order.[3] They reflect the complexity of South African society and the fragility of the political compromise that the Final Constitution represents. Any attempt to eradicate these conflicts and to deny the distinctive meaning of each of these values would do real violence to the constitutional text and deny the commitment to openness and to plurality on which it is premised.[4]

[1] Prince (supra) at para 155.

[2] Ibid at para 56 (Sachs J)('The search for an appropriate accommodation imposes a particularly heavy responsibility on the courts to be sensitive to considerations of institutional competence and the separation of powers. Undue judicial adventurism can be as damaging as excessive judicial timidity.')

[3] See Johan van der Walt & Henk Botha 'Democracy and Rights in South Africa: Beyond a Constitutional Culture of Justification' (2000) Constellations 341; Henk Botha 'Democracy and Rights: Constitutional Interpretation in a Post-Realist World' (2000) 63 THRHR 561, 581.

[4] In her critique of the Dworkinian notion of the rational coherence of a legal order, Drucilla Cornell develops the idea of the synchronization of competing rights and community interests. She writes:

> The goal of a modern legal system is rational synchronization and not rational coherence. Synchronization recognizes that there are competing rights situations and real conflicts between the individual and the community, which may not be able to yield a 'coherent' whole. The conflicts may be mediated and synchronized but not eradicated. In Dworkin, rational coherence depends on the community acting as a single speaker. In reality, a complex, differentiated community can never be reduced to a single voice. Synchronization recognizes the inevitable complexity of the modern state.

Drucilla Cornell 'Institutionalization of Meaning, Recollective Imagination and the Potential for Transformative Legal Interpretation' (1988) 136 Univ Pennsylvania LR 1135, 1211.

(bb) Dignity and democracy

(x) Primacy of dignity

As we have already noted,[1] the Constitutional Court regards human dignity as the most important human right and constitutional value. In the view of the Court,

> Human . . . dignity informs constitutional adjudication and interpretation at a range of levels. It is a value that informs the interpretation of many, possibly all, other rights. . . . Human dignity is also a constitutional value that is of central significance in the limitations analysis. Section 10, however, makes it plain that dignity is not only a value fundamental to our Constitution, it is a justiciable and enforceable right that must be respected and protected. In many cases however, where the value of human dignity is offended, the primary constitutional breach occasioned may be of a more specific right such as the right to bodily integrity, the right to equality or the right not to be subjected to slavery, servitude or forced labour.[2]

Given that both the text and the Court tell us that dignity plays a 'central' role in limitations analysis, two questions arise. What role does dignity play? And how central is it to our constitutional project?

The Court's recognition of dignity as, perhaps, the master concept in the Bill of Rights has been dealt with at length elsewhere in this work.[3] The reasons for such recognition range from the direct manner in which dignity answers the 'problem' of apartheid,[4] to the centrality of dignity in the post-war constitutional tradition,[5]

[1] For more on the role of dignity in limitations analysis, see § 34.8*(c)*(i).

[2] Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs; Shalabi v Minister of Home Affairs; Thomas v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) at para 35. For a detailed discussion of how each of the rights in Chapter 2 has been refracted through the prism of human dignity, see Stu Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36. For just a glimpse of the various rights that have been interpreted in the light of human dignity, see, on cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment, S v Williams 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC); on the right to equality, President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 6 BCLR 708 (CC) at para 41; National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 12 BCLR 1517 (CC) at paras 21–26 and 120–29; on freedom of religion, Christian Education of SA v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC) at para 36; on the right to vote, August v Electoral Commission 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC) at para 17, and on the right of access to adequate housing, Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC) at para 83; Van Rooyen v Stoltz 2005 (2) SA 140 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 78 (CC) at paras 2, 27 and 29.

[3] See Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) at 36-1–36-4 (Noting both the endogenous and exogenous sources of 'one of the world's most developed bodies of dignity jurisprudence.')

[4] See Sandra Liebenberg 'The Value of Human Dignity in Interpreting Socio-Economic Rights' (2005) 21 SAJHR 1 (Respect for human dignity requires society to respect the equal worth of the poor by marshalling its resources to redress the conditions that perpetuate their marginalization.)

[5] See Lorraine Weinrib 'Constitutional Conceptions and Constitutional Comparativism' in V Jackson & M Tushnet (eds) Defining the Field of Comparative Constitutional Law (2002) 3. The former Chief Justice of the Constitutional Court has acknowledged South Africa's debt to post-World World II constitutional jurisprudence. See Arthur Chaskalson 'Human Dignity as a Foundational Value of our Constitutional Order' (2000) 16 SAJHR 193, 196 ('The affirmation of human dignity as a foundational value of the constitutional order places our legal order firmly in line with the development of constitutionalism in the aftermath of the second world war.') to the ability of dignity to answer, in a coherent manner, the Court's call for a transformative jurisprudence,[1] to the place dignity occupies in Roman-Dutch law,[2] in traditional understandings of ubuntu[3] and in contemporary discourse on the politics of capability,[4] and, finally, to the manner in which dignity assists courts faced with the practical difficulties of reconciling such 'complementary' values as freedom and equality.[5]

The reason of most immediate import for making sense of limitations analysis is, perhaps, the last. Writing in his personal capacity, Justice Laurie Ackermann claims that the Court's dignity-based equality jurisprudence enables it to [1] The Court attaches five distinct meanings to human dignity, all of which emanate from the same basic Kantian insight that we recognize individuals as ends in themselves capable of self-government. These five 'definitions' or 'dimensions' of dignity are: the individual as end-in-herself, equal concern and equal respect, self-actualization, self-governance, and collective responsibility for the material conditions for agency. See Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) at 36-6–36-19 for an analysis of these five dimensions of dignity.

[2] As a corrective, Justice Ackermann suggests that an historical account of dignity's South African roots must take note of another endogenous source: the Roman-Dutch law of personality. See Laurie WH Ackermann 'The Significance of Human Dignity for Constitutional Jurisprudence' (Lecture, Stellenbosch Law Faculty, 15 August 2005)(Manuscript on file with authors) § 6 (Personality rights include the rights to dignity, life and bodily integrity, physical liberty, autonomy, reputation, feelings, privacy, self-realisation, and identity.) See also J Neethling, JM Potgieter & PJ Visser Neethling's Law of Personality (2nd Edition, 2005) 24-38; WA Joubert Groundslae van die Persoonlikheidsreg (1953); Whittaker v Roos and Bateman; Morant v Roos and Bateman 1912 AD 92, 122; Universiteit van Pretoria v Tommie Meyer Films (Edms) Bpk 1977 (4) SA 376, 381 (T); Jansen van Vuuren & Another NNO v Kruger 1993 (4) SA 842, 849 (A); National Media Ltd v Jooste 1996 (3) SA 262, 272 (A).

[3] Other authors have suggested that the African concept of 'ubuntu' and dignity draw on quite similar moral intuitions. See Yvonne Mokgoro 'Ubuntu and the Law in South Africa' (1998) 4 Buffalo Human Rights LR 15; Drucilla Cornell & Karin van Marle 'Interpreting Ubuntu: Possibilities for Freedom in the New South Africa' (2006) 6 African Human Rights LJ (forthcoming); Drucilla Cornell 'A Call for a Nuanced Jurisprudence' (2004) 19 SA Public Law 661; Marius Pieterse ''Traditional' African Jurisprudence' in Chris Roederer & Darryl Moellendorf (eds) Jurisprudence (2004) 441. See also S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC)('Makwanyane') at paras 224–25 (Langa J)(Ubuntu captures, conceptually, 'a culture which places some emphasis on communality and on the interdependence of the members of a community. It recognises a person's status as a human being, entitled to unconditional respect, dignity, value and acceptance from the members of the community such a person happens to be part of. It also entails the converse, however. The person has a corresponding duty to give the same respect, dignity, value and acceptance to each member of that community. More importantly, it regulates the exercise of rights by the emphasis it lays on sharing and co-responsibility and the mutual enjoyment of rights by all.' (Emphasis added).)

[4] See Amartya Sen Development as Freedom (1999); Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) at 36-65.

[5] In her defence of the Constitutional Court's dignity-based equality jurisprudence, Susannah Cowen argues that equality is a 'comparative concept' and that '[t]o value equality without saying more does not explain what outcome it is that we value. In Amartya Sen's language, it does not answer the question, "equality of what?"' Susannah Cowen 'Can "Dignity" Guide South Africa's Equality Jurisprudence?' (2001) 17 SAJHR 34. Cowen appears to echo Peter Westen's notion that equality is an 'empty concept' and that the right to equality and nondiscrimination necessarily has to be interpreted in the light of a value other than equality itself. See Peter Westen 'The Empty Idea of Equality' (1982) 95 Harvard LR 537.

adjudicate conflicts between equality and freedom in a neutrally-principled manner.[1] Ackermann offers a number of examples of clashes between equality and freedom that, he believes, can be resolved by reference to a neutral conception of dignity. A restrictive covenant in a deed that prevents future sale of the property to a black person constitutes a deep affront to the dignity of prospective black buyers. At the same time, a finding that the provision is constitutionally infirm 'would constitute a mere abstract limitation'[2] of the contractual freedom of the contracting parties and of the right of the original owner to dispose of her property as she pleases. The value of dignity helps us to better understand what is so obviously wrong with such restrictive covenants. Ackermann contrasts this first scenario with another: the owner of a residential property, for racist reasons, wishes to have someone trespassing on his property ejected. In this case, Ackermann argues, the owner can rely on constitutional rights such as privacy and freedom of association, while the trespasser only 'suffers a minor limitation and a limited and unpublic indignity'.[3]

Ackermann's analysis of the mediating role of dignity in conflicts between equality and freedom sheds new light on the perceived role of dignity in proportionality analysis.[4] In his view, a dignity-based approach enables judges to make a principled distinction between instances of private discrimination that constitute a violation of somebody's equal worth, on the one hand, and legitimate exercises of personal and associational freedom, on the other. Dignity, he seems to suggest, is ideally suited to playing such a mediating role because it provides a measure of value that is common to the frequently conflicting imperatives of equality and freedom.

The purpose of Ackermann's two intuition pumps is to convince us that the stronger the dignity interest is on one side of the equality/freedom divide, the weaker it is likely to be on the other. In the example of the restrictive covenant, the discrimination strikes at the heart of the dignity interests of a prospective black buyer, while only marginally disturbing the dignity interests of the property owner. But these — on Ackermann's account — are easy cases. One could well imagine cases in which there are strong dignity/equality interests and dignity/freedom interests on both sides. Consider, for example, a clash between the rights of women who wish to participate equally in traditional or religious communities and the 'autonomy' rights of such religious or cultural communities.[5] In such

[1] See Laurie Ackermann 'Equality and the South African Constitution: The Role of Dignity' (2000) 63 ZaöRV 537. Justice Ackermann develops this claim in the course of a discussion of the direct horizontal application of the Bill of Rights and argues that, in cases involving a claim of unfair discrimination by one individual against another, a dignity-based approach could enable the court to engage in a type of 'proportionality analysis' and 'balancing' that is neutrally principled. Ibid at 551–552.

[2] Ibid at 552.

[3] Ibid at 553 quoting Louis Henkin 'Shelley v Kraemer: Notes for a Revised Opinion' (1962) 110 Univ Pennsylvania LR 473, 498.

[4] Dignity might play such a mediating role in conflicts between equality and freedom, say where a legislative provision in the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act is challenged on the grounds that it violates the right to freedom of association. See Stu Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44.

[5] See, eg, Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha, & Others (Commission for Gender Equality as Amicus Curiae); Shibi v Sithole & Others; South African Human Rights Commission & Another v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 449 (CC).

cases, the discrimination constitutes a serious impairment of the fundamental human dignity of women. At the same time, the religious or cultural practice in question may be so fundamental to the worldview and customs of its adherents that a ruling of unconstitutionality would strike at the very heart of that community's dignity. Dignity does not, in such cases, offer a neutral or a principled way of striking a balance between equality and freedom.

The second problem with dignity as a neutral, mediating principle is that it assumes that a dignity-based reading of the limitations clause adequately captures the various interests served by rights as varied as equality, privacy and association. A number of commentators have argued that something is likely to get lost in the process of translating the right to equality into the language of human dignity.[1] One of their concerns has been that a dignity-based approach to equality focuses primarily on individual moral harm, rather than material disadvantage and structural imbalances of power. While some forms of disadvantage can be expressed quite easily in moral terms, others may not be so readily recognized. This difference may explain why the transformative vision of the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence in the field of sexual orientation has easily outpaced its jurisprudence on discrimination on the grounds of sex and gender. While discrimination against gays and lesbians is usually rooted in moral disapproval and results directly in an affront to their dignity and identity, discrimination on the grounds of sex and gender is often more closely bound up with material disadvantage and systemic discrimination, and is, therefore, more difficult to capture in the language of dignity.[2]

Such a critique may have had real teeth several years ago. However, the Court has, in recent years, embraced an understanding of dignity that recognizes our collective responsibility for creating the material conditions for the actual exercise of agency by all South Africans. Cases such as Bhe, Daniels,[3] Grootboom[4] and Khosa[5] demonstrate that dignity can be used to defend the rights of women, the poor and other vulnerable groups that suffer from material disadvantage and systemic discrimination.[6]

[1] Cathi Albertyn & Beth Goldblatt 'Facing the Challenge of Transformation: Difficulties in the Development of an Indigenous Jurisprudence of Equality' (1998) 14 SAJHR 248; Dennis Davis 'Equality: The Majesty of Legoland Jurisprudence' (1999) 116 SALJ 398; Henk Botha 'Equality, Dignity, and the Politics of Interpretation' (2004) 19 SA Public Law 724('Equality'). But see Susannah Cowen 'Can "Dignity" Guide South Africa's Equality Jurisprudence?' (2001) 17 SAJHR 34.

[2] See Botha 'Equality' (supra) at 748.

[3] Daniels v Campbell NO & Others 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC).

[4] Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC).

[5] Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development; Mahlaule & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 569 (CC).

[6] On the transfomative potential of human dignity, see Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) at 36-62–36-71; Jonathan Barrett 'Dignatio and the Human Body' (2005) 21 SAJHR 525.

These cases buttress our contention that a dignity-based approach to limitations is capable of addressing structural problems associated with poverty and gender. At the same time, however, we must express doubt about the ability of dignity to rescue marginal groups — Rastafarians, prostitutes and unmarried cohabitants — whose ways of being in the world challenge the Court's own assumptions about what is normal and socially acceptable. Indeed, the Court often relies on dignity to justify legal limitations that appear to flow from very traditional, conservative and sectarian concerns.

For example, in De Reuck, the Court found that a total ban on child pornography was justified because child pornography impairs the dignity of all children and, thus, of all members of any society that condones it.[1] By appealing to the dignity of society as a whole, rather than focusing on the dignity of those children who were harmed in the making of pornography, the De Reuck Court was able to fend off the argument that the limitation — which also extended to depictions of imaginary persons — was overbroad and that less restrictive means were available.[2] Invoking the 'dignity' of an entire society can be dangerous when used to justify the restriction of unpopular views or forms of expression. The 'dignity' of the community can easily become shorthand for the institutionalization of the moral views of the majority and the negation of plurality and difference.[3]

On other occasions, judges underestimate the extent to which a limitation impairs the dignity of members of out-groups. Consider, for example, the insistence in Jordan that the stigma associated with prostitution is the result of personal choice and is unrelated to the role of law in apportioning blame and sustaining structural inequality.[4] Or ponder the majority's finding in Volks that the exclusion of the surviving partner of a permanent life partnership from the right of surviving spouses to claim maintenance from the estates of their deceased spouses does not constitute unfair discrimination because the law never prevented them from getting married.[5] These findings — grounded both in traditional mores and rather outré metaphysical views about 'individual freedom' — cast something of a pall over the place of dignity in our limitations jurisprudence.

[1] See De Reuck (supra) at para 63 ('Children's dignity rights are of special importance. The degradation of children through child pornography is a serious harm which impairs their dignity and contributes to a culture which devalues their worth. [T]here is harm to the dignity and perception of all children when a society allows sexualised images of children to be available. The chief purpose of the statutory prohibitions against child pornography is to protect the dignity, humanity and integrity of children.')

[2] Ibid at paras 68–70.

[3] For a critique of De Reuck, see Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) 36-45–36-46.

[4] In rejecting the argument that the criminalisation of the conduct of the prostitute, but not of the patron, constitutes unfair discrimination on the grounds of sex and gender, the majority argued: 'If the public sees the [prostitute] as being "more to blame" than the "client", and a conviction carries a greater stigma on the "prostitute" for that reason, that is a social attitude and not the result of the law. The stigma that attaches to prostitutes attaches to them not by virtue of their gender, but by virtue of the conduct they engage in.' Jordan (supra) at para 16.

[5] Volks NO v Robinson & Others 2005 (5) BCLR 446 (CC).

Do these cases really indicate fundamental problems inherent in a dignity-based approach? Do they suggest that values other than dignity might assist the courts in making better sense of the Final Constitution's commitment to pluralism and the eradication of structural disadvantage?

On the one hand, we are not convinced that a dignity-based approach must of necessity result in the reinforcement of traditional moral views, the continued marginalization of certain out-groups, or the suppression of unpopular views. On the contrary, as Denise Meyerson has persuasively argued, and as the case law largely confirms, dignity can be used to invalidate limitations which seek to impose a particular conception of the good upon autonomous human beings.[1]

On the other hand, we need to ask why, despite its adherence to definitions of dignity that take our capacity for self-actualization and self-governance seriously, the Constitutional Court failed to give adequate effect to dignity in the cases canvassed above. One reason could be that the private-law conception of dignity as dignitas still exerts a powerful hold on the legal imagination.[2] This 'conservative' pre-disposition may explain why dignity qua self-governance is not always given sufficient weight, and why the discourse of dignity sometimes slips into sermons about dignified behaviour.[3]

(y) Democracy and openness

(aaa) Principle of democracy

Cases such as Khosa[4] — which stressed the political community's responsibility to provide non-citizens who find themselves on the margins of that community with the material conditions for agency — and Fourie[5] — which recognized that gays and lesbians have an entitlement to public recognition of their intimate relationships — evince the Constitutional Court's transformation of its dignity-based approach to fundamental rights interpretation and limitations analysis from dignitas and a narrow conception of the public interest to something far more expansive, if not all-embracing. This far more substantive vision of dignity allows us to make sense of a variety of other constitutional values precisely because this conception of dignity embraces such notions as equal concern and equal respect, self-actualization, self-governance, and the collective responsibility for supplying the material means required for the exercise of individual agency.

[1] See Denise Meyerson Rights Limited: Freedom of Expression, Religion and the South African Constitution (1997).

[2] See Barrett 'Dignatio' (supra) at 525.

[3] See Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) at 36-14–36-17.

[4] Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development; Mahlaule & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 569 (CC).

[5] Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others, Amici Curiae); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)('Fourie').

But what the Court has still not done is to give distinctive content to each of the five values enshrined in FC s 36. For the most part, the Court has viewed the four other values through the lens of human dignity. According to the Court, dignity provides a common measure of value which can help bridge the division between equality and freedom, or between negative and positive rights, or between the individual and collective aspects of our autonomy. However, we have also seen that dignity does not adequately address all conflicts nor does a reliance on dignity appear to do justice to those out-groups whose participation in our social and political life remains marginal at best.

It is particularly surprising that the Constitutional Court has not done more to develop the meaning of 'openness' and 'democracy' — two features of our society that clearly demarcate the boundary between apartheid South Africa and post-apartheid South Africa. In our view, a greater elaboration of the meaning of 'an open and democratic society', and a closer connection of these values to dignity (especially dignity qua self-governance), may result in a jurisprudence more inclined to accommodate plurality and difference. Similarly, an engagement with 'democracy' may strengthen our commitment to securing spaces in which 'counter-publics' can challenge dominant ideas. In this section, we consider the possibility of a complementary understanding of the values underlying the Bill of Rights that flows from a greater appreciation for the kind of 'democratic' society to which the Final Constitution commits us.

In United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa, the Constitutional Court issued a challenge of sorts to the academic community: tell us what 'democracy' means, and more importantly, tell us how it ought to inform, in a principled manner, our understanding of various provisions in the text of the Final Constitution.[1] Some South African academics, and in particular, Theunis Roux, have begun to do just that.[2] In the chapter on 'Democracy' found elsewhere in this work, Roux pulls together the political theories out of which our particular South African conception of democracy arises, the textual provisions of the Final Constitution that shape that conception, and the extant case law of our courts to generate a 'principle of democracy'.[3] We will not rehearse Roux's

[1] United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (African Christian Democratic Party & Others Intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa & Another as Amici Curiae)(No 2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC).

[2] See Theunis Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 10.

[3] This principle stated in its clearest form holds:

> Government in South Africa must be so arranged that the people, through the medium of political parties and regular elections, in which all adult citizens are entitled to participate, exert sufficient control over their elected representatives to ensure that: (a) representatives are held to account for their actions, (b) government listens and responds to the needs of the people, in appropriate cases directly, (c) collective decisions are taken by majority vote after due consideration of the views of minority parties, and (d) the reasons for all collective decisions are publicly explained. (2) The rights necessary to maintain such a form of government must be enshrined in a supreme-law Bill of Rights, enforced by an independent judiciary, whose task it shall be to ensure that, whenever the will of the arguments in support of that principle here. We will, however, draw down on several of his arguments, especially those that serve part (2) of his 'principle of democracy'.

The argument that lends the greatest force to our general theory of limitations analysis is Roux's contention that, read together, FC ss 7(1), 36(1), and 39(1) 'structure the way in which the tension between rights and democracy is to be managed in South African constitutional law'.[1] We have argued, over the course of this chapter, that FC ss 36(1) and 39(1) require a value-based approach to fundamental rights analysis and limitations analysis in part because they invoke the same set of values, the same linguistic trope, 'an open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom'. However, Roux's connection of the oft-ignored FC s 7(1) to both fundamental rights interpretation (FC s 39) and limitations analysis (FC s 36) enables us to make four new critical points in this chapter.

First, FC s 7(1) reads: 'The Bill of Rights is a cornerstone of democracy in South Africa. It enshrines the rights of all people in our country and affirms the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom.' Notice that democracy is treated as an independent value. Notice that the values of human dignity, equality and freedom are 'democratic' values. At a minimum, the language of FC s 7(1) should give pause to those interpreters of the basic law who privilege, reflexively, the value of human dignity. One can press this point further and argue that FC s 7(1), in fact, reverses the spin placed by the Constitutional Court on the phrase 'an open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom'. It makes a democratic society, and not dignity, foundational.

Second, it is, we think, unnecessary to read the language of FC s 7(1) in a manner that privileges democracy over dignity. Indeed, FC s 7(1) and Roux suggest that we should be just as wary of such overly simplistic reductions (rights service democracy) as we are chary of claims that rights and democracy stand in majority, expressed in the form of a law of general application, runs counter to a right in the Bill of Rights, the resolution of that tension promotes the values of human dignity, equality and freedom. Roux 'Democracy' (supra) at § 10.5(b)(Author's italics removed.) Although the Court has yet to provide an answer of its own to the question posed in UDM, several justices have articulated accounts of 'democracy' that suggest that Roux's principle is nascent in our Court's jurisprudence. Roux notes that in her powerful dissent in New National Party v Government of the Republic of South Africa, 'O'Regan J stressed the centrality of the right to vote in the consolidation of South African democracy, remarking that: "The right to vote is foundational to a democratic system. Without it, there can be no democracy at all."' 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC) at para 122. O'Regan J's dissent, Roux continues, 'also supports the second element of the principle of democracy . . . . [I]t is integral to the Final Constitution's conception of democracy that rights be capable of trumping the will of the majority where such a result better serves "the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom".' Roux (supra) at § 10.5(c). Roux acknowledges that Sachs J's remarks in Masondo 'articulate many of the elements of the principle of democracy that [this chapter has] argued [are] immanent in the constitutional text.' Roux (supra) at § 10.5*(c)* citing Democratic Alliance & Another v Masondo NO & Another 2003 (2) SA 413 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 128 (CC) at paras 42–43.

[1] Roux (supra) at § 10.3(c).

irreconcilable tension with one another (the counter-majoritarian dilemma). We think that it is enough to suggest, as Roux does, that FC s 7(1) delinks the phrase 'an open and democratic society' from 'human dignity, equality and freedom'. That is, whereas the phrase 'open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom' suggests a miasma of 'big' ideas that, if read jointly and severally, could exhaust the entire universe of modern political theory, delinking the two phrases forces the reader of FC ss 36(1) and 39(1) to stop and attend — for a moment — to the meaning, as well as the desiderata, of an 'open and democratic society'. Even if it does nothing else, by reading FC s 7(1) together with FC s 36(1), we are forced to concede that the principle of democracy is, at least, of equal weight as the value of dignity when it comes to the justification of a limitation of a fundamental right.

Third, Roux's arguments support our contention that scales and balancing are inapt metaphors for limitations analysis. Such metaphors block one from drawing the conclusion to which FC s 7(1) has already alerted us: namely, that rights stand not in opposition to democracy, but that they are, instead, constitutive of it. That is to say, without the rights to equality, dignity, life, belief, expression, assembly, association, voting, political party membership, citizenship, access to information, access to courts, and just administrative action, we would not have a meaningful democracy. These rights are themselves the preconditions for an 'open and democratic society'.

Fourth, the principle of democracy, when taken seriously, gets read back into these rights. And by that we mean that the virtues of belonging, deliberating and participating, identified first and foremost with democracy, attach not just to the political realm, but to an array of associational forms — religious, traditional, linguistic, commercial, labour, intimate, cultural — that are part of, but not identical to the political. So, although Roux does not make this claim, we do.[1] Indeed, it is an appreciation for these 'democratic' values of membership, deliberation and participation that underwrites our defence of pluralism, marginal social groups and 'oppositional counterpublics'.[2] And we value pluralism, and thus marginal social groups and 'oppositional counterpublics', not simply because they serve as reminders of the emancipatory potential of robust democratic discourse, but because these groups, and others like them, are where democracy takes place everyday for the vast majority of us.[3]

Finally, we agree with Roux that 'no South African political system claiming to be democratic would be worthy of that name unless it respected the democratic

[1] See Woolman 'Freedom of Association' (supra) at § 44.1(b).

[2] Kendall Thomas 'Racial Justice' in A Sarat, G Bryant & R Kagan (eds) Looking Back at Law's Century (2002) 78, 87.

[3] The Constitutional Court itself may be slowly coming round to this very position. In its recent judgment in Fourie, the Court remarked that '[t]he hallmark of an open and democratic society is its capacity to accommodate and manage difference of intensely-held world views and lifestyles in a reasonable and fair manner.' Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another (Doctors for Life International & Others, Amici Curiae); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC) at para 95 as cited by Roux (supra) at § 10.3(c).

values which the Bill of Rights affirms.'[1] This view firmly reinforces our own views about the relationship between courts and legislatures in a regime of 'shared constitutional interpretation'. In such a regime, as in the political system contemplated by FC ss 7(1), 36(1) and 39(1), neither the courts nor the political branches of government have a privileged position with regard to the making and the remaking of our basic law.

(bbb) Principle of openness

The dissenting judgment of Sachs J in Prince resonates with Roux's understanding of democracy, and sounds themes similar to our own thoughts about the relationship between democracy and the other values that ought to inform limitations analysis. In his dissent in Prince, Sachs J stressed the need in an 'open and democratic society' faced with seemingly intractable conflicts — between the state and religious communities — for a 'reasonable accommodation' of interests.[2] This accommodation requires mutual recognition and 'a reasonable measure of give-and-take from all sides'.[3] Sachs J, not surprisingly, finds that the majority's refusal to carve out an exemption for bona fide religious use of cannabis offends this very principle. The majority judgment, he writes, 'puts a thumb on the scales in favour of ease of law-enforcement, and gives insufficient weight to the impact the measure will have, not only on the fundamental rights of the appellant and his religious community, but on the basic notion of tolerance and respect for diversity that our Constitution demands for and from all in our society'.[4] The majority's suppression of cultural and religious differences harms not only the individuals and the communities concerned, but society as a whole. He continues:

> [F]aith and public interest overlap and intertwine in the need to protect tolerance as a constitutional virtue and respect for diversity and openness as a constitutional principle. Religious tolerance is accordingly not only important to those individuals who are saved from having to make excruciating choices between their beliefs and the law. It is deeply meaningful to all of us because religion and belief matter, and because living in an open society matters.[5]

For Sachs J, freedom of belief and the freedom to express such belief are fundamental not only to the freedom and the dignity of the believers concerned, but also to the diversity and the openness that are the lifeblood of a democracy. Democracy, Sachs J seems to be saying, presupposes the capability of marginalized and vulnerable minorities to challenge the normative closure into which political communities tend to lapse. A political community can only remain free if it values plurality and difference, and allows out-groups to disturb and to

[1] Roux (supra) at § 10.3(c).
[2] See Prince (supra) at paras 146, 155–156 and 170.
[3] Ibid at para 161.
[4] Ibid at para 147.
[5] Ibid at para 170.

challenge deeply held majoritarian beliefs and practices.[1] For this reason, the critical challenge for our constitutional 'democracy' consists 'not in accepting what is familiar and easily accommodated, but in giving reasonable space to what is "unusual, bizarre or even threatening"'.[2]

Nowhere in his judgment does Sachs J renounce the language of dignity, or question its centrality to the Final Constitution. In fact, his judgment can be read as an endorsement of the constitutional commitment to dignity, and a celebration of dignity's commitment to self-worth, self-actualization and self-governance.[3] What is significant about his judgment, however, is the manner in which the language of dignity is supplemented by a more nuanced account of democracy — a Whitmanian vision of democracy that ties the ability of individuals to re-imagine their own identities to the capacity of the political community for transformation.[4]

Underlying Sachs J's radically democratic vision is an equally egalitarian concern — the demand for equal recognition, as Charles Taylor puts it[5] — for marginal cultures, worldviews and lifestyles.[6] Sachs J emphasizes the political powerlessness of the Rastafari in a manner that recalls the concerns of representation-reinforcing process theory.[7] The continuing disempowerment of the Rastafari unmasks the power relations lurking beneath a veneer of formally equal treatment, and shows how facially neutral laws are conditioned by background assumptions that define 'normality' in terms of conformity to the tenets of mainstream religions. At the same time, it presents the political community with an opportunity to reconsider the ways in which the boundaries of citizenship are being drawn. Of the relationship between the 'romantic-liberal' view of constitutionalism and the struggle of out-groups for recognition, Frank Michelman writes:

> A chief aim of the romantic-liberal constitution must be to free 'the life-chances of the individual from the tyranny of social categories' of 'classes, sexes, and nations'. The benefit accrues not only to the emancipated: it is structural and systemic, and accrues to everyone. Everyone, in the romantic view, has reason to welcome confrontation and challenge of his or her accustomed or habitual ways and values, from all quarters known and unknown. Democracy accordingly becomes not just a procedural but a substantive ideal — a

[1] Prince (supra) at para 147 ('[P]ractical inconvenience and disturbance of established majoritarian mind-sets are the price that constitutionalism exacts from government.')

[2] Ibid at para 172.

[3] Ibid at paras 148 and 151. Moreover, the dissenting judgment of Ngcobo J, in which Sachs J concurred, made much of the way the general prohibition stigmatises Rastafari, and thus 'strikes at the very core of their human dignity'. See Prince (supra) at paras 48–51.

[4] For a fuller elaboration of this understanding of democracy, see Frank Michelman Brennan and Democracy (1999) 68–89; Frank Michelman 'Law's Republic' (1988) 97 Yale LJ 1493.

[5] Charles Taylor The Ethics of Authenticity (1992).

[6] Sachs insists that the case must be seen against the background of the use of cannabis in Africa in pre-colonial times and in the African diaspora. Ibid at paras 152–53. He also draws parallels between the outlawing of cannabis and the prejudice that all other non-Protestant religions have encountered in South Africa. Ibid at para 159. By contrast, the majority regards this history as irrelevant to the constitutionality of the legislation. Ibid at para 105.

[7] John Hart Ely Democracy and Distrust (1981).

> commitment to empower the disempowered and reconnect the alienated. Likewise, freedom of expression figures for the romantic constitutionalist as both an individual right of self-presentation — of efficacious participation or citizenship — and a social-structural provision for imbuing social life with the enrichment, and politics with the knowledge, sparked by frictional contact with human outlooks and sensibilities other than those to which one has grown accustomed.[1]

This constitutional vision is attractive for our account of limitations analysis for a number of reasons. First, it calls for a form of limitations analysis under FC s 36 which does not privilege a single value — say dignity. Our non-reductionist account of the values at play in limitations analysis — and our emphasis on democracy and openness — may counter the tendency to overlook forms of group-based disadvantage not easily captured by the language of dignity.[2] Put slightly differently, FC s 36's commitment to openness ought to underwrite an approach to limitations analysis that challenges any unitary conception of the good. Second, a commitment to openness recognizes that some conflicts may be intractable just as some values are, in given contexts, incommensurable. This commitment, to plurality and to difference, should serve to counter naïve attempts to 'balance' conflicting interests in terms of FC s 36.[3] Third, a commitment to openness helps us to make further sense of FC s 7(1)'s statement that the Bill of Rights 'is a cornerstone of democracy in South Africa'. FC s 7(1)'s vision of democracy presupposes public processes of deliberation and participation that enhance openness, plurality and difference.[4] Although this vision does not resolve the tension between democracy and rights, it enables us to explore the potential of rights litigation to strengthen democracy. Finally, the commitment to a principle of openness in FC s 36 alerts us to the ways in which the lack of access of certain groups to the levers of political power is re-inforced by apparently neutral laws that privilege certain worldviews over others. It reminds us of the emancipatory potential of robust democratic discourse, and the capacity of marginal social groups or 'oppositional counterpublics'[5] to contest dominant notions of normality[6] and to challenge the tendency of the political community to assume its own moral completion.[7]

(iii) Judicial narratives

In the previous two sections, we tried to develop limitations analysis in a manner that makes greater sense both from an institutional perspective and from a

[1] Michelman Brennan and Democracy (supra) at 70– 71.
[2] See Botha 'Equality' (supra) at 746–51.
[3] Sachs J himself states that '[s]ome problems might by their very nature contain intractable elements' and that 'no amount of formal constitutional analysis can in itself resolve the problem of balancing' conflicting goods. Jordan (supra) at para 170.
[4] Ibid at paras 170–171.
[5] Thomas (supra) at 87.
[6] See Botha 'Equality' (supra) 745–746 (Argues that the majority judgment in Jordan rested upon a highly conventional understanding of what constitutes normal sexual relations, and prevented oppositional discourses of sexuality from entering mainstream public discourse.)
[7] Michelman Brennam and Democracy (supra) at 71.

normative perspective. However, just as shared constitutional interpretation does not provide a simple answer to the inevitable political conflicts that arise out of the dual commitment to the doctrines of constitutional supremacy and separation of powers, even a normative framework that takes adequate account of both democracy and dignity is not going to resolve — in an unproblematic fashion — the kinds of conflicts between incommensurable goods that arise in constitutional disputes.

How then are judges engaged in limitations analysis to arrive at an optimal decision when neither considerations of institutional comity nor normative coherence yield a univocal conclusion? A number of authors have, of late, suggested that storytelling may yield significant benefits for hard cases, in general, and hard cases in terms of limitations analysis, in particular. As we shall see, a slightly different spin on the FC s 36 factor 'the impact of a limitation' may result in a very different approach to such questions as whether less restrictive means should have been used, or whether deference should be paid to the legislature's choice of means.

That said, the following account of judicial narrative-making is not meant to supplant conventional limitations analysis undertaken by the Court in terms of conventional morality. The virtues of this approach are, rather, visible in a handful of hard cases. In these hard cases, conventional morality refracted through the prism of constitutional norms tends to re-inscribe the marginalization of many out-groups. The requirements of storytelling may force decision-makers to consider a range of possibilities that would not have otherwise occurred to them and thus to alter the conclusions they ultimately reach. In addition, the difference between storytelling in hard cases and cryptic justifications for hard choices — in terms of FC s 36 — is the difference between a good explanation and a bad explanation for the decisions that we take: the better the explanation, the more persuasive it will be — for those who need persuading; the more persuasive the decision, the more legitimate it will be deemed to be.[1] Denser judicial narratives thus serve a good that we have argued is essential in fundamental rights interpretation and limitations analysis: analytical rigour.[2]

[1] Part of what makes at least some judgments in hard cases persuasive is their candour about the limits of judicial decision-making. See Paul Gewirtz 'On I Know It When I See It' (1996) 105 Yale LJ 1023, 1042–1043. See also Paul Gewirtz 'Narrative and Rhetoric in the Law' in P Brooks & P Gewirtz (eds) Law's Stories: Narrative and Rhetoric in the Law (1996) 2, 11 ('[An] opinion usually ends with the words "It is so ordererd", emphasizing the coercive force that judges wield. But the written justification in the body of the judicial opinion is what gives the order its authority.')

[2] The kind of storytelling mode most conducive to legal storytelling and most consistent with our approach to limitation analysis is the novel. The novel lends itself to the requirements of legal storytelling and constitutional politics because it recognises a plurality of different ways of looking at, understanding, and being in the world.

There are at least two views of the purpose of the novel consistent with this description. Both are excellent descriptions of what a great novel can do. One view serves well the ends of law. The other view stays too true to the novel's comic origins, and perhaps to the absurdity of life, to accommodate the more formal requirements of the law. Salman Rushdie, an advocate of the second view, writes that unlike most religious, political and legal doctrines, > which seek[ ] to privilege one language above all others, one set of values above all others, one text above all others, the novel has always been about the way in which different languages, values and narratives quarrel, and about the shifting relations between them, which are relations of power. The novel does not seek to establish a privileged language, but it insists upon the freedom to portray and analyse the struggle between the different contestants for such privileges.

Salman Rushdie 'Is Nothing Sacred' Imaginary Homelands (1991) 415, 421. The limitations of this view of storytelling with respect to law have to do with a certain level of moral abstinence, a reluctance to make judgments, which attaches to the desire to portray the struggle between competing visions of the world.

A somewhat different approach to the purpose of the novel, and one that has consciously sought to connect the narrative conventions of novels and legal judgments, is offered by Martha Nussbaum. Legal knowledge is, Nussbaum argues, > not simply intellectual grasp of propositions; it is not even simply intellectual grasp of particular facts; it is perception. It is seeing a complex, concrete reality in a highly lucid and richly responsive way: it is taking in what is there, with imagination and feeling.

Martha Nussbaum '"Finely Aware' and Richly Responsible": Literature and Moral Imagination' in Love's Knowledge (1990) 152. See also Martha Nussbaum Poetic Justice: Literary Imagination and Public Life (1996). The novel likewise demonstrates to us that communication between individuals in difficult personal and ethical circumstances, in circumstances that urge conflicting but equally compelling claims on the agents involved > is not simply a matter of the uttering and receiving of general propositions. It partakes both of the specificity and of the emotional and imaginative richness of their individual moral effort. We see [the characters] drawing close in understanding by seeing where they come to share the same pictures.

Nussbaum 'Finely Aware' (supra) at 153. And this, at the risk of oversimplification, is the primary difference between Rushdie and Nussbaum. Rushdie emphasizes his characters' vastly divergent ways of seeing the world and the way in which these ways of seeing ultimately, and irreconcilably, clash. Nussbaum, on the other hand, emphasizes how pictures and stories draw us together, and the manner in which detailed pictures and stories give us the opportunity for shared understanding and mutual transcendence.

Nussbaum does not suggest that painting our pictures and telling our stories offers an easy road to the resolution of conflict and the transcendence of difference. Miscommunication is inevitable. Many moral, political and legal conflicts will remain intractable. Furthermore, the overcoming of such conflict, when it does occur, never occurs without cost:

> There will be times when a confrontation with a new situation may lead the perceiver to revise her standing conception of value, deciding that certain prima facie obligations are not really binding here. But this never takes the form of leaping above or sailing around the standing commitments. And if the perceiver, examining these commitments, decides that they do not in fact bind her, then no free departures will be permitted, and the effort of perception will be an effort of fidelity to all elements of the situation, a tense and laboured effort not to let anyone down.

Nussbaum 'Finely Aware' (supra) at 156. In this last sentence, Nussbaum describes an approach to moral reasoning — and for us, an approach to limitations analysis — which she calls perceptive equilibrium: a basic sense of moral principles that enables us to first see that we have an ethical dilemma and then allows us to work back and forth between our perceptions of a concrete and specific set of events and our rules of thumb until we can finally see what ought to be done. See Martha Nussbaum '"Perceptive Equilibrium" Literary Theory and Ethical Theory' Love's Knowledge (1990) 168. This model of reasoning, and the specificity and concreteness of moral situations, means that morality depends to a large extent on judgment. See Martha Nussbaum 'Poets as Judges: Judicial Rhetoric and Literary Imagination' (1995) 62 Univ Chicago LR 1477. This dependency on judgment means that some individuals will possess better judgment than others. As Wittgenstein has suggested, it is often as important to watch what good people do in particular situations — the way they work through a moral problem — as it is to memorise rules as to what we ought to do generally. Ludwig Wittgenstein Philosophical Investigations (1968) 227 ('Corrector prognoses will generally issue from the judgments of those with better knowledge of mankind. Can one learn from this knowledge? Yes, some can. . . . What one acquires here is not a technique; one learns correct judgments. There are also rules, but they do not form a system, and only people can apply them right.') This then is the connection between storytelling and limitations analysis. Great writers provide us with pictures of what good people ought to do in highly specific and complex fictional situations. Great judges provide us with pictures of what good judges — good government officials and good citizens — ought to do in highly specific and complex legal situations. See Woolman 'Out of Order' (supra) at 116–128. See also Narnia Bohler-Muller Developing a New Jurisprudence of Gender Equality in South Africa (LLD thesis, University of Pretoria, 2005, on file with authors) 59–104.

The following two case studies do not prove that storytelling invariably works for limitations analysis in hard cases. No approach to limitations analysis could carry such a burden. They serve a rather more mundane purpose: to show that judges doing constitutional law, who might otherwise be sceptical of storytelling, not only have the capacity to tell stories, but to do so to brilliant effect.[1]

(aa) Prince

Consider, again, the dissenting judgment of Sachs J in Prince. In Sachs J's view, the idea that the religious freedom of Rastafari must simply give way to the state's interest in law enforcement rests on what he calls the 'hydraulic insistence on conformity to majoritarian standards'.[2] Sachs J challenges the supposed neutrality of this dominant mindset by choosing a narrative perspective that differs fundamentally from that of the majority. Instead of emphasizing law-enforcement, Sachs J tells us a bit about the history of the Rastafari, the centrality of cannabis in their religion, the marginality of the Rastafari in South African life, and their inability to exercise any meaningful influence on the political process. By relocating the limitations inquiry in the 'lived and experienced' reality of the Rastafari, Sachs J's story challenges dominant assumptions about the alleged dangers that certain 'controlled' substances pose for the common good.[3]

[1] It would be disingenuous not to acknowledge that calls for storytelling in law often meet with resistance and scepticism. See Woolman 'Out of Order? (supra) at 128–133 (For an extended discussion of the objections to a storytelling approach.) One reason why lawyers are reluctant to embrace storytelling is that a novel can afford multiple perspectives, contradiction and obscurantism. They may even be integral to the success of a story. A legal judgment, on the other hand, must display the kind of clarity that will enable members of a given society to plan their lives with relative certainty. Furthermore, a legal rule will inevitably impose costs on someone who falls afoul of it. It would, so Judge Richard Posner and Judge Pierre Leval argue, make a mockery of the law to have it written in such a way that financial penalties and prison sentences are meted out in contradictory and arbitrary fashion. Indulging in storytelling courts caprice and inconsistency. See Richard Posner Law and Literature (1988); Pierre Leval 'Judicial Opinions as Literature' in P Brooks & P Gewirtz (eds) Law's Stories: Narrative and Rhetoric in the Law (1996) 206, 207 ('The objectives of the judicial opinion are far different than those of polemics, poetry and narrative forms of literature. The function of the published opinion is to instruct in the meaning of rules of law, indeed in many cases to declare rules of law. Pursuit of literary techniques is more likely to undermine than to reinforce the success of an opinion in meeting its judicial obligations.') A second objection is that the analogy between law and storytelling is misleading: whilst storytelling invites the open play of meaning, legal interpretation is closely linked to the law's quest for certainty, finality and closure. Moreover, law, according to Robert Cover, is inextricably bound up with the authorization of state violence:

> Not only does the violence of judges and officials, the violence of a posited constitutional order, exist. It is generally understood to be implicit in the practice of law and government. Violence is so intrinsic a characteristic of the structure of the activity that it need not be mentioned: Read the constitution. Nowhere does it state the obvious: that the government thereby ordained has the power to practice violence over its people.

Robert Cover 'The Bonds of Constitutional Interpretation: Of the Word, the Deed and the Role' (1986) 20 Georgia LR 815, 819. Cover's insights into the violence countenanced by law are important reminders of the limits of legal storytelling.

[2] Prince (supra) at 156.

[3] Ibid at para 151.

The minority's stated preference for crafting an exemption for Rastafari ritual use of cannabis also dovetails rather neatly with our description of shared constitutional interpretation. For while the Court would, quite naturally, retain the power to set out very general normative guidelines for the religious use of cannabis by Rastafaris, it would remain up to the legislature, law enforcement officials and representatives of the Rastarfari community to work out the details of an exemption that met the needs of all parties concerned.

(bb) Jordan and Khosa

As we have noted elsewhere in this book,[1] the Constitutional Court in S v Jordan & Others falls into an 'autonomy trap'. Falling into this trap leads to a failure of legal imagination that actually drives the South African market in sexual slavery. In Jordan, the Constitutional Court rejected equality, dignity, privacy and freedom of profession challenges to those sections of the Sexual Offences Act that criminalize prostitution.[2] The majority reasoned as follows:

> If the public sees the recipient of reward as being 'more to blame' than the 'client', and a conviction carries a greater stigma on the 'prostitute' for that reason, that is a social attitude and not the result of the law. The stigma that attaches to prostitutes attaches to them, not by virtue of their gender, but by virtue of the conduct they engage in. That stigma attaches to female and male prostitutes alike. I am not persuaded by the argument that gender discrimination exists simply because there are more female prostitutes than male prostitutes, just as I would not be persuaded if the same argument were to be advanced by males accused of certain crimes, the great majority of which are committed by men.[3]

The Court's commitment to a very strong form of metaphysical autonomy — a form of autonomy that makes all individuals morally and legally culpable for actions that issue ineluctably from their circumstances — fails dramatically the large number of prostitutes who are victims of sexual trafficking. The Jordan Court continues in a very similar vein:

> It was accepted that they have a choice, but it was contended that the choice is limited or 'constrained'. Once it is accepted that [the criminalisation of prostitution] is gender-neutral and that by engaging in commercial sex work prostitutes knowingly attract the stigma associated with prostitution, it can hardly be contended that female prostitutes are discriminated against.[4]

First, sexual trafficking is about the sale and the exploitation of women for prostitution. It is about women who have little chance, and no choice, in life's wheel

[1] See Stu Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44; Stu Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36.

[2] See s 20(1)(aA) of the Sexual Offences Act 23 of 1957.

[3] Jordan (supra) at paras 16–17.

[4] Ibid at para 16.

of fortune. Second, how 'knowing' that stigma attaches to an event that takes place under conditions of compulsion makes a prostitute culpable remains unclear. The Jordan Court's approach may hold in the context of some 'voluntary' forms of prostitution. But the Jordan Court's views regarding 'autonomy' makes the manumission of most sexual slaves inconceivable.

A more recent judgment, written by Mokgoro J, hints at a way out of this kind of 'autonomy trap'. In Khosa v Minister of Social Development; Mahlaule v Minister of Social Development, the Constitutional Court found unconstitutional, as a violation of both FC s 9 and FC s 27(1), the exclusion of permanent residents from the class of persons entitled to a variety of social security grants: old age, disability, veterans, child support and foster care. Mokgoro J writes:

> The exclusion of permanent residents in need of social-security programmes forces them into relationships of dependency upon families, friends and the community in which they live, none of whom may have agreed to sponsor the immigration of such persons to South Africa … Apart from the undue burden that this places on those who take on this responsibility, it is likely to have a serious impact on the dignity of the permanent residents concerned who are cast in the role of supplicants.[1]

Mokgoro J could well have added that permanent residents are, as supplicants, not merely dependent on family members, but quite literally at their mercy.

The same story could well be told of the sexual slaves that Jordan necessarily, though never directly, addresses. Many sex slaves would consider themselves fortunate to be supplicants. They are not just excluded from the protection of the law. Many sex slaves do not speak the language, do not know the lay of the land, and do not have the resources to engage corrupt immigration officials or to escape criminal syndicates. Many are enslaved by their own families.[2]

By depicting the permanent residents in Khosa as supplicants, Mokgoro J is able to get us to see that FC s 7(2), read with FC ss 9 and 27, places the state under an obligation to protect and to fulfil the rights of all persons in South Africa. By hammering home the point about turning our neighbours into beggars, Mokgoro J shows us that legal regimes that offer incentives to become members of the political community but then punish persons who cannot act on such incentives — by withholding benefits or by threatening incarceration — are perverse. Mokgoro J shows us how the state's denial of various social security grants to permanent residents extinguishes the material conditions for genuine agency. And, in the end, it is this depiction of Khosa's permanent residents as supplicants — as

[1] Khosa (supra) at para 76.

[2] Richard Rorty 'Human Rights, Rationality and Sentimentality' in S Shute & S Hurley (eds) On Human Rights: The Oxford Amnesty Lectures (1993) 111 (Rorty writes that moral and legal progress is not the result of asking and re-asking the standard philosophical question: 'Why should I be moral?' It is, he argues, a function of asking 'Why should I care about this person, this stranger? And by answering in terms of the sort of long sad story which begins "Because this is what it is like to be in her situation — to be far from home, among strangers" or "Because her mother would grieve for her". Such stories, repeated and varied over centuries, have induced us, the rich, safe, powerful people, to tolerate, and even cherish, powerless people.') beggars — that convinces a majority of the Court that the children, the aged and the disabled permanently resident in South Africa are entitled to their claim for state support. Had a similar story been told in Jordan about the lives of sex slaves, the outcome might well have been different.[1]

34.9 The Purpose of FC s 36(2)

> Except as provided for in subsection (1) or any other provision of this Constitution, no law shall limit any right entrenched in the Bill of Rights.

FC s 36(2) is substantially the same as its predecessor, IC s 33(2).[2] It tells us — for starters — that, in order for a law to limit a right entrenched in Chapter 2, it must satisfy the test set out in FC s 36(1).

However, FC s 36(2) also contains the rather curious proviso that 'any other provision of this Constitution' may provide the grounds for the limitation of a right in the Bill of Rights. The phrase suggests that limitations on fundamental rights may be justified by reference to provisions in the Final Constitution other than FC s 36(1). On one reading, the phrase would appear to permit the override of fundamental rights by other provisions of the Final Constitution without the requirement that they be justified by reference to the test laid out in FC s 36(1).

There is, however, a better reading. Given the primacy of place the Final Constitution accords the Chapter's fundamental rights, and their express purpose of placing clear limits on the exercise of government power, it would be counter-intuitive to subordinate automatically these rights to the exercise of government power. At the very least it should remain an open question as to whether or not the exercise of power expressly provided for by the Final Constitution should be permitted to limit a fundamental right. While we may not want to subject such limitations to the justificatory test set out in FC s 36(1) — because constitutional provisions are not law in the ordinary sense, and probably not the sense contemplated by FC s 36(1) — another kind of justificatory test is warranted. Such a test

[1] Of course, not all prostitutes are sex slaves. Moreover, stories of sexual trafficking are not the only ones worth telling in this context. On the contrary, a storytelling approach accepts that there are multiple stories to be told, and resists the temptation to reduce a class of persons to stereotypical sameness. Drucilla Cornell argues, on the basis of interviews conducted with prostitutes, that for some women, prostitution is 'a representation of [their] sexuate being, a persona that [they have] to live out'. Drucilla Cornell At the Heart of Freedom: Feminism, Sex, and Equality (1998) 55. She continues: '[I]n a world of abuse some women will take on the life of a prostitute in order to work though their incestuous and violent pasts.' Ibid at 56. Even though sex workers are subjected to degradation and alienation, Cornell argues that they have not thereby renounced their right to establish their own autonomous identity. She concludes that '[s]tate-enforced moralism hinders what we as feminists should seek: the psychic, political, and ethical space for women to represent themselves.' Ibid at 58.

[2] IC s 33(2) read: 'Save as provided for in subsection (1) or any other provision of this Constitution, no law, whether a rule of common law, customary law or legislation, shall limit any right entrenched in this Chapter.' There is one noteworthy difference between FC s 36(2) and its predecessor. FC s 36(2) deletes the modifying clause 'whether a rule of common law, customary law or legislation' that followed the phrase 'no law' in IC s 33(2). The drafters appear to have recognized that the purpose of FC s 36 is primarily to set the parameters for limitations of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights and not to establish the application of the Bill.

might legitimately treat the kinds of justification for a constitutional-power-based incursion into a fundamental right differently than FC s 36(1) treats the justifications for statutory, executive, common-law or customary-law infringements of fundamental rights.

The position adumbrated above is consistent with the Canadian jurisprudence on 'internal' constitutional conflicts. No part of the Canadian Constitution is deemed to be superior to any other part. The Charter, therefore, may not be used to invalidate other provisions of the Constitution.[1] The Canadian Supreme Court has crafted a more subtle distinction that permits application of the Charter to acts performed in the exercise of a constitutional power.[2] The test the Supreme Court employs turns on whether acceding to the Charter argument negates or removes a constitutional power (part of the tree itself). If so, the Charter does not apply. If, however, the attack merely engages the exercise of a constitutional power (the fruit of the tree), then a court may hear the Charter argument.[3]

The High Court in De Lille v Speaker of the National Assembly provides some clarity on the South African courts' take on this complex set of issues. In De Lille the applicant was found by Parliament to have violated alleged rules of parliamentary privilege.[4] She was duly punished and suspended. The question for the court was whether the constitutional provisions dealing with the powers of Parliament could justifiably limit the constitutional rights of the applicant: especially the rights to administrative justice, political participation and freedom of expression.

Parliament had taken the position that the rules of parliamentary privilege — which generally involve the power of the National Assembly to order its own affairs — were entirely immune from judicial review. The High Court in De Lille Court rejected this view.

The De Lille court observed that in terms of FC s 2, the Final Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic and that any law or conduct inconsistent with the Final Constitution is invalid. The Court then noted that, according to FC s 8(1), the Bill of Rights applies to all law and binds the legislature, the executive,

[1] See Reference re Act to Amend Education Act (Ont) [1987] 1 SCR 1148, (1987) 40 DLR (4th) 18. With regard to the determination of whether a law is constitutional or not, Peter Hogg argues for the logical priority of the constitutional provisions regulating the legislative process over the rights and freedoms found in the Charter: 'It is impossible for a nation to be governed without bodies possessing legislative powers, but it is possible for a nation to be governed without a Charter. Another point in favour of the logical priority of federalism issues over Charter issues is the presence in the Charter of Rights of the power of override.' Peter Hogg 'Judicial Review on Federal Grounds' Constitutional Law of Canada (4th Edition 2002) 15-2–15-5.

[2] See New Brunswick Broadcasting Co v Nova Scotia [1993] 1 SCR 319, 100 DLR (4th) 212.

[3] Ibid at 373. See Peter Hogg 'Application' Constitutional Law of Canada (4th Edition 2002) 34-9–34-12.

[4] De Lille & Another v Speaker of the National Assembly 1998 (3) SA 430 (C), 1998 (7) BCLR 916 (C)('De Lille'). The decision of the Cape High Court was confirmed by the Supreme Court of Appeal, but on non-constitutional grounds. See Speaker of the National Assembly v De Lille & Another 1999 (4) SA 863 (SCA), 1999 (11) BCLR 1339 (SCA)(Court found suspension unwarranted — ultra vires — in the absence of legislation or rules that might permit such punishment.)

the judiciary and all organs of state.[1] Any rules or legislation regarding privilege inconsistent or incompatible with the Final Constitution — even if drawn from the provisions of the Final Constitution itself — must be found infirm. In De Lille, the High Court found that the power of parliamentary privilege was so inextricably bound up with the exercise of the privilege that the two could not be distinguished. The De Lille court was therefore obliged to hold that the determination of the extent of this privilege must relate to its exercise, and that both must therefore be subject to judicial review. If the High Court had decided otherwise, Parliament would have had a blank cheque to set the limits of its own powers.[2] Most importantly, this specific exercise of judicial review enabled the court to find that Parliament had exercised its powers in breach of the substantive provisions of Chapter 2. De Lille suggests that where another provision of the Final Constitution appears to contemplate a limitation of a fundamental right, no such limit should be permitted without clear and convincing textual evidence.

De Lille also supports the proposition that the exercise of powers sourced from non-Chapter 2 constitutional provisions that impair the exercise of a substantive provision of Chapter 2 cannot — unless authorized by law of general application — be justified by reference to FC s 36. Hlophe J writes:

> The suspension of the first applicant fails the first leg of the limitations test because it did not take place in terms of law of general application. There is no law of general application which authorises such suspension. It is not authorised by the Constitution, the Powers and Privileges of Parliaments Act of 1963 or the Standing Rules of the National Assembly. The law of Parliamentary privilege does not qualify as a law of general application for purposes of s 36. It is not codified or capable of ascertainment. Nor is it based on a clear system of precedent. Therefore there is no guarantee of parity of treatment. It is essentially ad hoc jurisprudence which applies unequally to different parties. . . . Accordingly, the law of privilege fails the 'law of general application' leg of the limitations test.[3]

When can the parliamentary right to free speech afforded by FC s 58, and reinforced by FC s 16, be justified by reference to FC s 36(1)? Beyond its finding that any restrictions on privilege must be justified in terms of law of general application, the De Lille court does not say.[4]

---

[1] De Lille (supra) at 452.

[2] Ibid at 446–447.

[3] Ibid at 455. See also Speaker of the National Assembly v De Lille & Another 1999 (4) SA 863 (SCA), 1999 (11) BCLR 1339 (SCA)(Finding that Parliament acted ultra vires consistent with High Court finding that Parliament did not act in terms of any cognizable law.)

[4] See, further, United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others (African Christian Democratic Party and Others Intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa and Another as Amici Curiae) (No 2) 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC)('UDM'). The Constitutional Court in UDM offers a somewhat different, although ultimately consistent, take on the subject. In June 2002, Parliament passed four Acts that aimed to allow members of national, provincial and local government to change parties without losing their seats. With regard to the constitutional attack on the validity of two constitutional amendments — the First Amendment Act and the Second Amendment Act — the UDM Court was quite clear:

> Amendments to the Constitution passed in accordance with the requirements of s 74 of the Constitution become part of the Constitution. Once part of the Constitution, they cannot be challenged on the grounds of inconsistency with other provisions of the Constitution. The Constitution, as amended, must be read as a whole and its provisions must be interpreted in harmony with one another. It follows that there is little if any scope for challenging the constitutionality of amendments that are passed in accordance with the prescribed procedures and majorities.

Ibid at para 14. The various challenges to the two amendments failed. A normal act of Parliament — even one married to constitutional amendments — is not due such deference. The Membership Act — having failed to comply with the requirements of Item 23A of Annexure A to Schedule 6 to the Final Constitution — suffered the fate of ordinary legislation. It was held to be unconstitutional. But see Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others CCT 73/05 (as yet unreported decision of 18 August 2006)(Constitutional amendment altering provincial boundaries declared unconstitutional because Parliament failed to follow appropriate procedures: namely, adequate consultation with, and participation of, the public.)

Read together, De Lille and UDM provide support for the following propositions: (1) Chapter 2's fundamental rights and freedoms will take precedence over law and conduct authorized by other constitutional provisions; (2) while the primacy of place of fundamental rights in the Final Constitution militates against subordinating fundamental rights to constitutionally articulated government powers, fundamental rights have no automatic claim of priority over constitutionally articulated government powers; (3) accepted canons of constitutional interpretation require that the courts must first attempt to harmonize Chapter 2 and non-Chapter 2 claims; and (4) when harmonizing the rights and freedoms found in Chapter 2 with constitutionally articulated government powers, a court should attempt to cast the constitutionally articulated government powers in a manner that gives greatest effect to the rights and freedoms at stake.

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA

Second Edition

STUART WOOLMAN
BA (Hons) (Wesleyan) JD (Columbia Law) MA (Columbia) LLD (Pretoria)
Professor & Elizabeth Bradley Chair of Ethics, Governance & Sustainable Development, University of the Witwatersrand Graduate School of Business Administration
Co-Director, South African Institute for Advanced Constitutional, Public, Human Rights and International Law
Consultant, Ashira Legal Advisors (Pty) Ltd
Editor-in-Chief, Constitutional Law of South Africa

MICHAEL BISHOP
BA LLB LLM (Pretoria) LLM (Columbia Law)
JSD Candidate, Columbia Law School
Advocate of the High Court of South Africa
Managing Editor, Constitutional Law of South Africa

JASON BRICKHILL
LLB (Cape Town) MSt (Oxon)
Member of the Johannesburg Bar
Counsel, Constitutional Litigation Unit, Legal Resources Centre
Contributing Editor, Constitutional Law of South Africa

Second Edition, Revision Service 4 2012

First floor, Sunclare Building, 21 Dreyer Street, Claremont, 7708, Cape Town, South Africa

ISBN: 978-0-7021-7308-0

Typesetting by AN dtp Services, Cape Town.
Print Management by Print Communications

[2nd Edition, RS 4: 03–12]

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA, 2nd EDITION

Contents

PART I

COURTS, PRINCIPLES OF GOVERNMENT & STRUCTURES OF GOVERNMENT

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
	Volume 1
Structure of Constitutional Analysis
1	A Baedeker to Constitutional Law of South Africa	Stu Woolman, Theunis Roux & Michael Bishop
2	Constitutional History	Stu Woolman & Jonathan Swanepoel
3	Constitutional Litigation	Matthew Chaskalson, Gilbert Marcus & Michael Bishop
Courts
4	Jurisdiction	Sebastian Seedorf
5	Rules & Procedure in Constitutional Matters	Kate Hofmeyr
6	Costs	Michael Bishop
7	Standing, Ripeness & Mootness	Cheryl Loots
8	Amicus	Geoff Budlender
9	Remedies	Michael Bishop
Principles of Government
10	Democracy	Theunis Roux
11	Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution	Frank Michelman
12	Separation of Powers	Sebastian Seedorf & Sanele Sibanda
13	Founding Provisions	Chris Roederer
14	Co-operative Government & Intergovernmental Relations	Stu Woolman & Theunis Roux
15	Legislative Competence	Victoria Bronstein
16	Conflicts	Victoria Bronstein

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
Structures of Government
17	National Legislative Authority	Michael Bishop & Ngwako Raboshakga
18	National Executive Authority	Christina Murray & Richard Stacey
19	Provincial Legislative Authority	Tshepo Madlingozi & Stu Woolman
20	Provincial Executive Authority	Christina Murray & Okyerebea Ampofo-Anti
21	Provincial Constitutions	Stu Woolman
	Volume 2
22	Local Government	Nico Steytler & Jaap de Visser
23A	Public Administration	Anshal Bodasing
23B	Security Services	Stu Woolman
23C	War Powers	Stephen Ellmann
24	Chapter Nine Institutions:
	24A Public Protector	Michael Bishop & Stu Woolman
	24B Auditor General	Stu Woolman & Yolandi Schutte
	24C SA Human Rights Commission	Jonathan Klaaren
	24D Commission for Gender Equality	Cathi Albertyn
	24E Independent Communication Authority of South Africa	Justine White
	24F Commission for the Promotion & the Protection of the Rights of Cultural, Religious and Linguistic Communities	Stu Woolman & Julie Soweto-Aullo
25	Public Procurement	Glenn Penfold & Pippa Reyburn
26	Traditional Leadership	Tom Bennett & Christina Murray
27	Public Finances	Ross Kriel & Mona Monadjem
28	Transitional Provisions	Matthew Chaskalson
29	Elections	Glenda Fick
30	International Law & International Agreements	Hennie Strydom & Kevin Hopkins

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW OF SOUTH AFRICA, 2nd EDITION

Contents

PART II
The Bill of Rights

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
Operational Provisions
31	Application	Stu Woolman
32	Interpretation	Lourens du Plessis
33	Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights	Sandra Liebenberg
34	Limitations	Stu Woolman & Henk Botha

Volume 3

Substantive Provisions
35	Equality	Cathi Albertyn & Beth Goldblatt
36	Dignity	Stu Woolman
37	Reproductive Rights	Michelle O'Sullivan
38	Privacy	David McQuoid-Mason
39	Life	Marius Pieterse
40	Freedom and Security of the Person	Michael Bishop & Stu Woolman
41	Freedom of Religion, Belief and Opinion	Paul Farlam
42	Freedom of Expression	Dario Milo, Glenn Penfold & Anthony Stein
43	Freedom of Assembly	Stu Woolman
44	Freedom of Association	Stu Woolman
45	Political Rights	Jason Brickhill & Ryan Babiuch
46	Property	Theunis Roux
47	Children's Rights	Adrian Friedman, Angelo Pantazis & Ann Skelton
48	Land	Juanita Pienaar & Jason Brickhill
49	Sentencing and Punishment	Dirk Van Zyl Smit

Chapter	Subject Matter	Author(s)
50	Environment	Morne van der Linde & Ernst Basson
51	Criminal Procedure: Rights of Detained, Arrested & Accused Persons	Frank Snyckers & Jolandi le Roux
52	Evidence	PJ Schwikkard
	Volume 4
53	Labour Relations	Carole Cooper
54	Freedom of Trade, Occupation and Profession	Dennis Davis
55	Housing	Kirsty McLean
56	Socio-Economic Rights:
	56A Health	David Bilchitz
	56B Water	Malcom Langford, Richard Stacey & Danwood Chirwa
	56C Food	Danie Brand
	56D Social Security	Mia Swart
57	Education	Stu Woolman & Michael Bishop
58	Community Rights: Language, Culture & Religion	Stu Woolman
59	Access to Courts	Jason Brickhill & Adrian Friedman
60	Citizenship	Jonathan Klaaren
61	States of Emergency	Nicole Fritz
62	Access to Information	Jonathan Klaaren & Glenn Penfold
63	Just Administrative Action	Jonathan Klaaren & Glenn Penfold
64	Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour	Stu Woolman & Michael Bishop
65	Official Languages	Iain Currie
66	Movement and Residence	Jonathan Klaaren

35 Equality

Catherine Albertyn & Beth Goldblatt

35.1 Equality in the Final Constitution 35–1
(a) Introduction 35–1
(b) The meaning of equality 35–3
(c) Substantive equality in law 35–5
(d) Values underlying the equality right 35–8
(i) Dignity 35–8
(ii) Equality 35–13
(iii) Values, substantive equality and institutional boundaries 35–14
35.2 Overview of the Right to Equality 35–14
35.3 FC s 9(1) 35–17
(a) FC s 9(1) as a minimum rationality requirement 35–17
(i) Has there been a differentiation between individuals or groups? 35–18
(ii) Does the differentiation have a rational connection to a legitimate government purpose? 35–19
(b) Can irrationality be justified under FC s 36? 35–22
(c) FC s 36 as a guarantee of equality in the legal process . 35–23
(d) Can inequality in the legal process be justified under FC s 36? 35–25
(e) The future scope of FC s 9(1) 35–26
(i) Beyond rationality? 35–26
(ii) Equality of process as equality of substance and outcome? 35–29
(f) FC s 9(1) and horizontal application 35–29
35.4 FC s 9(2): Positive Measures, Substantive Equality and Equality of Rights 35–29
(a) FC s 9(2) as a statement of substantive equality 35–30
(b) Positive measures 35–31

(c) The relationship of FC s 9(2) to FC s 9(3) and FC s 9(5) 35–32
(i) Fairness 35–32
(ii) A complete defence 35–33
(iii) The place of FC s 9(3) 35–33
(d) Proving the defence: the internal criteria in FC s 9(2) . . 35–33
(i) Does the measure target persons or categories of persons who have been disadvantaged by unfair discrimination? 35–34
(ii) Is the measure designed to protect persons or categories of persons who have been disadvantaged by unfair discrimination? 35–37
(iii) Does the measure promote the achievement of equality 35–38
(e) Applying the FC s 9(2) criteria to the case 35–39
(f) FC s 9(2) as a sword or a shield? 35–40
(g) FC s 9(2) and FC s 36 35–42
35.5 FC s 9(3), (4) and (5): Prohibition Against Unfair Discrimination 35–42
(a) Test for unfair discrimination 35–43
(b) Step 1: Does the differentiation amount to discrimination? 35–43
(c) 'Directly or indirectly' 35–47
(d) 'Anyone' 35–48
(e) 'Including': unspecified grounds 35–48
(f) 'On one or more grounds' 35–51
(g) Grounds of discrimination 35–53
(i) Race and colour 35–54
(ii) Sex, gender and pregnancy 35–55
(aa) Women's property 35–56
(bb) Women's bodies 35–57
(cc) Women, men and children 35–59
(dd) Critical responses to the Court's gender equality jurisprudence 35–59
(iii) Marital status 35–61
(iv) Ethnic or social origin 35–63
(v) Sexual orientation 35–64
(aa) Recognition of same-sex relationships: material benefits 35–65

(bb) Recognition of same-sex relationships: status benefits 35–66
(cc) Recognition of different types of families . . . 35–67
(dd) Marriage 35–67
(vi) Age 35–69
(vii) Disability 35–70
(viii) Religion, conscience, belief, culture, language 35–71
(aa) Discrimination on the basis of religion, conscience and belief 35–71
(bb) Discrimination on the basis of culture 35–72
(cc) Discrimination on the basis of language 35–73
(ix) Birth 35–74
(h) Step 2: Was the discrimination unfair? 35–75
(i) The position of the complainant 35–76
(ii) Nature and purpose of the provision 35–78
(iii) Impairment of the rights or interests of the complainant and dignity 35–79
(i) Step 3: Can the unfair discrimination be justified? 35–80
(j) Evaluation of the application of the FC s 9(3) test. 35–82
35.6 FC s 9(4): Unfair Discrimination by Private Persons 35–83
35.7 FC s 9(5): Presumption of Unfairness 35–84
35.8 The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 35–84

9 Equality

(1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.

(2) Equality includes full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.

(3) The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.

(4) No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.

(5) Discrimination on one or more of the grounds listed in subsection (3) is unfair unless it is established that the discrimination is fair.[1]

35.1 Equality in the Final Constitution

(a) Introduction

The founding provisions describe South Africa as 'one sovereign, democratic state founded on the … values [of] … human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms, non-racialism and non-sexism'.[2] The Bill of Rights includes a detailed and substantive equality right that embraces freedom from unfair discrimination, as well as positive measures to advance equality. In addition, the Bill of Rights as a whole is described as 'a cornerstone of democracy … [that] … affirms the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom'.[3]

The achievement of equality is thus a constitutional imperative of the first order. As the Constitutional Court has put it: '[The] Constitution commands us to strive for a society built on the democratic values of human dignity, the achievement of equality and freedom.'[4] This project is, in turn, part of a broader project aimed at the transformation of South African society:

> Both the Constitutional Court and other courts view the Constitution as transformative. The previous Chief Justice has written that a 'commitment to transform our society lies at the heart of the new constitutional order'. It is clear that the notion of transformation has played and will play a vital role in interpreting the Constitution.[5]

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Act 108 of 1996)('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[2] FC s 1*(a)* (emphasis added). See also FC s 36(1) which permits limitations of the rights guaranteed in the Bill of Rights only where such limitation is 'reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom', and FC s 39(1)(a) which enjoins courts to 'promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom' when interpreting the Bill of Rights.

[3] FC s 7(1). (emphasis added).

[4] Minister of Finance v Van Heerden 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC), 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC) at para 22 (emphasis added).

[5] P Langa 'Transformative Constitutionalism' (2006) 17 Stellenbosch LR 351, 351 (footnotes omitted).

The enormity of this challenge in relation to the achievement of equality is reflected in former Chief Justice Arthur Chaskalson's reminder of the deep inequalities of the past:

> In 1996 when the Constitutional Assembly adopted a Constitution for South Africa we were one of the most unequal societies in the world. We had recently emerged, almost miraculously, from a repressive and undemocratic legal order, and had embraced democracy. The past hung over us and profoundly affected the environment in which we were living. The great majority of our people had been the victims of a vicious system of racial discrimination and repression which had affected them deeply in almost all aspects of their lives. This was seen most obviously in the disparities of wealth and skills between those who had benefited from colonial rule and apartheid and those who had not. In the contrast between those with land, and the millions of landless people; between those with homes and the millions without access to adequate housing; between those living in comfort and the millions without access to adequate health facilities, clean water and electricity, between those with secure occupations and the millions who were unemployed or had limited employment opportunities.[1]

Inequalities in South Africa are deep and pervasive, scarring every aspect of society. The scope and complexity of these inequalities complicate the constitutional task of achieving equality, provide many potential answers to the question 'equality of what?',[2] and pose difficult challenges to courts tasked with enforcing the Final Constitution. Another Chief Justice, Beverley McLaughlin of the Canadian Supreme Court, has called equality 'the most difficult right' — a right that often promises more than it can deliver and tends to trouble the boundary between the judiciary, the legislature and the executive.[3]

This chapter explores this 'most difficult of rights' — equality — as both a value and a right. The constitutional value of achieving equality underwrites broad aspirations about the constitution of a future society. Unfettered by institutional constraints, the value enables a democratic dialogue about the nature and the goals of transformation.[4] Together with other constitutional values — such as dignity, freedom, openness and democracy — equality gives meaning to specific substantive constitutional rights. The right to equality, on the other hand, provides an important mechanism for 'achieving equality', and the Constitutional

[1] 'Equality as a Founding Value of the South African Constitution' Oliver Schreiner Lecture University of the Witwatersrand (February 2001).

[2] It is, perhaps, trite now to say that the idea of equality always entails this question. See A Sen Inequality Re-examined (1992) 23–26.

[3] B McLachlin 'Equality: The Most Difficult Right' (2000) 14 The Supreme Court Law Review 17.

[4] Drawing on the work of Henk Botha and Johan van der Walt, Chief Justice Langa refers to the notion that 'transformation is a permanent ideal — a way of looking at the world that creates a space in which the idea of change is constant'. This enables an ongoing dialogue in which 'new ways of being are constantly explored and created, accepted and rejected'. Langa (supra) at 345 citing H Botha 'Metaphoric Reasoning and Transformative Constitutionalism: Part I' (2002) TSAR 512; H Botha 'Metaphoric Reasoning and Transformative Constitutionalism: Part I' (2003) TSAR 612; and J van der Walt Law and Sacrifice (2006).

Court has used this tool to develop a powerful and progressive jurisprudence. However, because rights give rise to rules and enforceable claims,[1] they are limited in ways values are not: namely, they are constrained by the contours of justiciability and by the role of courts in a constitutional democracy.

The next section explores the meaning of the 'value' of equality, with explicit reference to the nature of inequality in South Africa. It endorses a substantive conception of equality and adumbrates the consequences of a theory of 'substantive equality' for the enforcement of the right to equality. To this end, it focuses particularly on the values underlying the equality right, and the manner in which they shape its application. The following section, § 35.2, provides an overview of the right, FC s 9, followed by a detailed discussion of each of its provisions in §§ 35.3–35.5. The chapter concludes with a brief discussion of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act.

(b) The meaning of equality

The meaning of equality in any jurisdiction is influenced by the historical, socio-political and legal conditions of the society concerned. An important starting point for understanding equality in South Africa is the nature of the inequalities that have characterized its past and still haunt its present. For centuries that past was defined by the extensive and systematic exclusion and subordination of black people in all aspects of political, social and economic life.[2] Under colonialism and apartheid, the colour of one's skin determined whether one could vote or access quality education, where one could own land or live, the services and amenities one could enjoy, and the nature and availability of economic opportunities. These systems produced and reinforced racially-based inequalities that became part of the structure of economic and social relations. Deep-seated racial prejudice and racial disparities in education, health status, income and employment, access to land and housing persist to this day.

South Africa is also a deeply patriarchal society in which women have been subordinated in public and private life. All women live in the shadow of gendered stereotypes that act as obstacles to their full participation in society. In general, women have less access to economic opportunities than men, and are more likely to be poor or dependent upon men to meet their basic needs.[1] At the same time, the gendered division of labour in the household affects the ability of all women to participate fully in the economy.[2] To make matters worse, women are subject to high levels of violence and abuse, especially in the home.[3] Many women live at the confluence of poverty and violence and possess limited access to basic amenities and resources.[4] The majority of these women are black and rural or working class. The strong links between gender, race and class continually reinforce the social and economic subordination of women in South Africa.

[1] Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention and the Re-integration of Offenders (NICRO) & Others 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC) at para 21. See also S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) § 36.3*(d)*(Dignity operates as a first order rule, a second order rule, a correlative right and a grundnorm. As a first order rule, the right to dignity disposes of specific disputes. As a second order rule, the right to dignity shapes the Court's application of another right, say equality, to a specific dispute. As a grundnorm, the value of dignity shapes both the interpretation of specific substantive rights and informs the justifications for limitations of specific substantive rights.)

[2] Several cases have addressed this past: Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 40; Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 263 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) at para 46; Moseneke v Master of the High Court 2001 (2) SA 18 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 103 (CC); Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC); Zondi v Member of the Executive Council for Traditional and Local Government Affairs 2005 (3) SA 589 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 347 (CC).

Although race, class and gender inequalities are particularly visible, our society is also marked by other inequalities that intersect with race and gender. Thus racial discrimination has often masked, reflected or reinforced inequalities based on religion, language, culture, ethnicity and colour. South Africa is also said to be a deeply xenophobic society.[5] Deep-rooted prejudices against gay and lesbian people,[6] stigmatization of persons on the basis of their actual or perceived HIV status[7] and systemic discrimination against disabled persons[8] remain widespread.

All of these inequalities are captured in the protection against unfair discrimination in FC s 9,[9] and addressing them is an important part of the constitutional project of transformation.[10] To do so requires both a strong concept of equality

[1] While the unemployment rate amongst all Africans is 50,2%, it is 57,8% among African women. This exceeds that of coloured (28,6%), Indian (18,7%) and white (6,6%) women. Of those women who are employed, 84% of African women (1 181 897 out of 1 402 338) are in elementary (unskilled) occupations. Only 0,005% of Indian women and 0,014% of white women are in elementary (unskilled) occupations. See Statistics South Africa Census 2001: Census in Brief (2003) 55, 71.

[2] See President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 38.

[3] Official research reveals that 2,1% of women report sexual abuse. Statistics South Africa Quantitative Research Finding on Rape in South Africa (2000). Women's organizations estimate that as few as one in 20 rapes are reported. These levels of gender violence in South African society exist across race and class. Poor women are more vulnerable not only because of their greater economic dependency, but also because of factors such as lack of secure housing, reliance on often-dangerous forms of public transport, and lack of municipal amenities such as street lighting.

[4] 37% of rural women-headed households fall within the poorest group of households, as compared with 23% of rural male-headed households, 15% of urban women-headed households and 5% of urban male-headed households. D Budlender Women and Men (1998) 5 Figure 3. On the problems with the concepts of woman-headed and male-headed households, see D Budlender 'Women and Poverty' (2005) Agenda 30-31.

[5] See, eg, Union of Refugee Women v Director: Private Security Industry Regulatory Authority CCT 39/09 judgment of 12 December 2006 (as yet unreported)('Union of Refugee Women').

[6] For more on sexual orientation and equality, see § 35.5*(g)*(v) infra.

[7] See, eg, Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC).

[8] South African Human Rights Commission Towards a Barrier-free Society: A Report on Accessibility in Built Environments (2002).

[9] FC ss 9(3) and (4) list fourteen grounds of impermissible unfair discrimination. See § 35.5*(g)* below.

[10] The notion of transformative constitutionalism has characterized much of the writing on equality. See K Klare 'Legal Culture and Transformative Constitutionalism' (1998) 14 SAJHR 146. See also C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Facing the Challenge of Transformation: Difficulties in the Development of an Indigenous Jurisprudence of Equality' (1998) 14 SAJHR 248 ('Facing the Challenge of Transformation'); S Liebenberg & M O'Sullivan 'South Africa's New Equality Legislation. A Tool for Advancing Women's Socio-economic Equality?' in S Jagwanth & E Kalula (eds) Equality Law: Reflections from South Africa and and an idea of law as a tool for social change. For many in academia and the Constitutional Court, this combination of concepts is best located in the idea of substantive equality. In a 2006 address at Stellenbosch University, Langa CJ identified substantive equality as one of the key measures of transformation in our society. Here he was referring to the aspirational value of substantive equality: a social and economic revolution in which all enjoy equal access to the resources and amenities of life, and are able to develop to their full human potential.[1] This goal requires the dismantling of systemic inequalities, the eradication of poverty and disadvantage (economic equality) and the affirmation of diverse human identities and capabilities (social equality). It confirms a strong relationship between substantive equality and the achievement of socio-economic rights.[2]

The value of substantive equality does not provide a definitive answer to the question: 'equality of what?' It does, however, suggest that the constitutional answer is, at the very least, a social democratic vision that entails both equality of opportunities and equality of outcomes. Such a vision also embraces the idea of redistribution of power and resources and the elimination of material disadvantage. This is not an uncontested vision, however. Former Constitutional Court Judge Laurie Ackermann has recently argued that the meaning of equality in South Africa is determined solely by the idea of dignity.[3] Several feminist scholars, on the other hand, have criticized the focus on disadvantage within substantive equality: they contend that it ignores the agency and capabilities of human beings.[4]

The aspirational value of achieving equality is capable of an expansive meaning. It is largely unencumbered by more practical considerations manifest in the doctrine of the separation of powers and related concerns regarding institutional competence. However, constitutional rights, as legal entitlements, must be enforced through the courts. How, then, is the idea of substantive equality captured in law, and more particularly, within the equality right?

(c) Substantive equality in law

The best way of understanding the legal idea of substantive equality is to contrast it with the dominant idea of equality in Anglo-American jurisprudence: formal

Elsewhere (2001) 70; P de Vos 'Grootboom, the Right of Access to Housing and Substantive Equality as Contextual Fairness' (2001) 17 SAJHR 258; AJ van der Walt 'A South African Reading of Frank Michelman's Theory of Justice' in H Botha, AJ van der Walt & J van der Walt Rights and Democracy in a Transformative Constitution (2003); S Jagwanth 'Expanding Equality' in C Murray & M O'Sullivan (eds) Advancing Women's Rights (2005) 131; S Jagwanth & C Murray 'No Nation Can Be Free When One Half of It is Enslaved: Constitutional Equality for Women in South Africa' in B Baines & R Rubio-Marin The Gender of Constitutional Jurisprudence (2005) 230; Langa (supra) at 352.

[1] Langa (supra) at 352-53 citing Albertyn & Goldblatt 'Facing the Challenge of Transformation' (supra) at 248.

[2] For a discussion on the relationship between equality and socio-economic rights, see B Goldblatt & S Liebenberg 'Achieving Substantive Equality in South Africa: The Relationship between Equality and Socio-Economic Rights' (forthcoming, 2007).

[3] 'Equality and Non-discrimination: Some Analytical Thoughts' (2006) 22 SAJHR 606.

[4] See, eg, K van Marle 'Equality: An Ethical Interpretation' (2000) 63 THRHR 595; N Bohler-Muller 'The Promise of Equality Courts' (2006) 22 SAJHR 380.

equality. Formal equality is based on the idea that inequality is irrational and arbitrary. It presumes that all persons are equal, and that any differential treatment on the basis of arbitrary grounds, such as race or gender, is almost inevitably suspect and irrational. Formal equality also entails a formal approach to law (legal formalism) in which issues are narrowly defined and abstracted from social life. The actual social and economic differences between individuals and groups are not seen to be essential to the legal enquiry. Formal equality is perhaps best described as the abstract prescription of equal treatment for all persons, regardless of their actual circumstances. It perceives inequalities as irrational aberrations in an otherwise just social order. These aberrations can be overcome by extending the same rights and entitlements to all, in accordance with the same 'neutral' standard of measurement.[1]

As a result, a formal equality approach cannot tolerate differences: affirmative action measures are seen as forms of discrimination, rather than as efforts to further a commitment to equality.[2] Its reliance on 'neutrality' tends to mask forms of judicial bias and also ignores the actual social and economic differences between individuals and groups. The application of standards that appear to be neutral, but which often embody the interests and experiences of socially privileged groups, means that a legal commitment to formal equality may exacerbate the inequality of socially or economically disadvantaged groups.[3]

By contrast, a legal understanding of substantive equality proceeds from the recognition that inequality not only emerges from irrational legal distinctions, but is often more deeply rooted in social and economic cleavages between groups in society. Such inequalities are referred to as 'systemic', as they are rooted in the structures and institutions of society. Legal claims (usually of discrimination) that target such inequalities require an understanding of the underlying social and economic conditions that create and reinforce these inequalities, if such claims are to remedy inequality.

A legal commitment to substantive equality entails attention to context,[4] and that context must encompass the influences of the private sphere on disadvantage and subordination. Equality claims are thus assessed in relation to lived

[1] Formal equality, arguably, underlies the jurisprudence of FC s 9(1). See § 35.3 infra.

[2] In both the US and Canada, this reliance on formal equality led to difficulties in arguing that the failure to accord women maternity benefits was a form of sex or gender discrimination. Courts tended to find that pregnancy was the result of a real (biological) difference and thus differentiation on this basis could not amount to discrimination. Because pregnancy is unique to women, employers could exclude pregnancy from insurance coverage (and thus deny maternity pay). See Geduldig v Aiello 417 US 484, n 21 (1974); General Electric Co. v Gilbert 429 US 125 (1976); Bliss v A-G Canada [1979] 1 SCR 183, (1979) 92 DLR (3rd) 417.

[3] See M Minow 'The Supreme Court 1986 Term Foreword: Justice Engendered' (1987) 101 Harvard LR 10.

[4] A contextual approach was adopted by the Canadian Supreme Court in Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia. [1989] 1 SCR 143. The Andrews Court found that 'to approach the ideal of full equality before and under the law, the main consideration must be the impact on the individual or group concerned'. Ibid at 165. This approach has also been endorsed by the South African Constitutional Court. See § 35.5*(b)* infra.

inequalities. Substantive equality recognizes that it is not the fact of difference that is the problem, but rather the harm that may flow from this. The focus of the legal enquiry is therefore on the impact of the act[1] (rather than on difference per se) and on the nature of the harm that the act creates. Equality can thus be advanced through similar or differential treatment, depending on the context. Difference is regarded as a positive value where it is not linked to harm and disadvantage.[2] Difference is also seen as 'relational' rather than hierarchical. There is no necessary valuing of one group over another. Rather, it is the relationship between groups (including the substantive arrangements that produce or prevent a group's social prosperity or political self-determination) that should be examined.[3]

A legal commitment to substantive equality thus requires a retreat from legal formalism. Importantly, the assessment of context and impact should be guided by the purpose of the right and its underlying values.[4] While an analysis of the context in which the alleged violation occurs enhances a court's understanding of the legal claim, a clear exposition of the purpose of the right to equality, and of the constitutional values that underpin it, provide the court with crucial signposts to a decision most faithful to the Final Constitution. These signposts assist the courts in determining when an impugned differentiation (or failure to differentiate) amounts to a violation of the equality right. Moreover, as discussed below, they provide courts with the flexibility required to negotiate the boundaries of institutional competence.

This flexibility is also required in order to address the multiple and varied legal claims for equality implied by the complex picture of inequality discussed above. Some are claims for consistency — for similar treatment across difference. Others are claims for recognition, for inclusion and acceptance of the status of individuals and groups as full and equal members of society. Yet others have been more redistributive claims, seeking access to economic benefits and resources. In practice, many claims involve aspects of both recognition and redistribution, suggesting the two are often inextricably intertwined in the pursuit of equality, and that the dismantling of systemic inequality is always the goal of effective equality claims.[5]

[1] See § 35.5*(h)* infra

[2] Ibid.

[3] Martha Minow argues that difference does not inhere in the individual or group but in the relation between individuals and/or groups. It is not the characteristics of the individual or the group that are the concern, but the social arrangements that make these differences matter. Minow (supra) at 10; M Minow Making All the Difference: Inclusion, Exclusion and American Law (1990).

[4] See L du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 32.

[5] The distinction between recognition or status and redistribution was first used by Nancy Fraser in Justice Interruptus: Critical Reflection on the 'Postsocialist' Condition (1997). South African writers have used this distinction in relation to socio-economic rights. S Liebenberg 'Needs, Rights and Transformation. Adjudicating Social Rights in South Africa (2006) 17 Stellenbosch LR 5. For a general discussion on this distinction, see S Fredman 'Equality as a Social Right' (forthcoming, 2007) and C Albertyn 'Substantive Equality' (forthcoming, 2007).

(d) Values underlying the equality right

The nature, content and application of the principles and values that underlie the equality right are some of the more disputed issues in substantive equality jurisprudence, especially in the two jurisdictions that have taken the lead in this area: South Africa and Canada. In both countries, the courts have given prominence to dignity as the value that largely defines the right. This priority of dignity has generated debate about the content of dignity as well as its role in determining the ambit of protection of the equality right. It has also raised questions about the role of the other foundational values — especially that of the value of equality in determining the content and scope of the right. In this section we explore the role of both these values in relation to the equality right.

In early debates on substantive equality, many critical and feminist legal scholars argued that the application of equality should be guided by the principles of anti-subordination and anti-disadvantage.[1] This approach fitted with the idea of inequality as systemic — deeply embedded within society, and manifest in group disadvantage through social stigma and stereotypes, material inequality or social and economic forms of exclusion. The purpose of the equality right was to remedy and to overcome this disadvantage and exclusion. In the first unfair discrimination case under the Interim Constitution,[2] Brink v Kitshoff, O'Regan J wrote that the equality clause was adopted > in the recognition that discrimination against people who are members of disfavoured groups can lead to patterns of group disadvantage and harm. Such discrimination is unfair: it builds and entrenches inequality amongst different groups in our society. ... The need to prohibit such patterns of discrimination and remedy their results are the primary purposes of section 8.[3]

(i) Dignity

In President of the RSA v Hugo, the Court identified dignity as a core value and purpose of the right, whilst retaining the idea of remedying disadvantage within the overall assessment of unfair discrimination:

> At the heart of the prohibition of unfair discrimination lies a recognition that the purpose of our new constitutional and democratic order is the establishment of a society in which all human beings will be accorded equal dignity and respect regardless of their membership of particular groups. The achievement of such a society in the context of our deeply inegalitarian past will not be easy, but that that is the goal of the Constitution should not be forgotten or overlooked. In Egan v Canada, Heureux-Dubé J analysed the purpose of (the Canadian right to equality) as follows:

[1] C Pateman 'Equality, Difference, Subordination: The Politics of Motherhood and Women's Citizenship' in G Bock & S James (eds) Beyond Equality and Difference (1992) 17-28; D Rhode 'The Politics of Paradigms' in G Bock & S James (supra) at 149. See also R Colker 'Section 1, Contextuality and the Anti-Disadvantage Principle' (1992) 42 University of Toronto LJ 77.

[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').

[3] Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC)('Brink') at para 42.

> Equality, as that concept is enshrined as a fundamental right . . . means nothing if it does not represent a commitment to recognising each person's equal worth as a human being, regardless of individual differences. Equality means that our society cannot tolerate legislative distinctions that treat certain people as second-class citizens, that demean them, that treat them as less capable for no good reason, or that otherwise offend fundamental human dignity.[1]

The idea of dignity as meaning equal moral worth — the right to be treated with equal concern and respect — derives from the Kantian notion of the equal moral worth of all human beings.[2] Here dignity is closely related to ideas of equality. Amaryta Sen admits that a common feature of being egalitarian 'in some significant way relates to the need to have equal concern, at some level, for all persons involved'.[3] However, it is not necessarily related to ideas of substantive equality. 'Equal concern and respect' based on 'equal moral worth' is a fairly abstract concept that requires further elucidation to determine exactly what it means when a failure to treat people with equal dignity, or equal concern and respect, contravenes the equality right.[4]

In both South African and Canadian jurisprudence, the use of 'dignity' in equality jurisprudence has been criticized for its indeterminism and for its potential to narrow the right. The narrow definition of dignity in Harksen v Lane NO[5] — which turned on the way the applicant felt about the impugned law (did she feel less worthy of respect?)[6] — generated concerns that the use of dignity might reinforce an individualized and abstract conception of equality divorced from actual social and economic disadvantage and the systemic nature of inequality. Some commentators suggested that more content should be given to the value of equality so that the right might better address structural disadvantage and inequalities. Other legal scholars argued that dignity could be interpreted in a way that addressed group-based inequalities and disadvantage.[7]

[1] 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC)('Hugo') at para 41, quoting Egan v Canada [1995] 2 SCR 513 (footnotes omitted). See also Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 41.

[2] For a detailed account of how Kant's variations on the categorical imperative inform both our dignity and our equality jurisprudence, see S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2006) § 36.2.

[3] A Sen Inequality Re-examined (1992).

[4] Dennis Davis has argued that the indeterminate meaning of dignity meant that it was inappropriate as the dominant conceptual tool for interpreting the equality right. 'Equality: The Majesty of Legoland Jurisprudence' (1999) 15 SALJ 398 ('Legoland Jurisprudence'). See also D Davis Democracy and Deliberation (1999) 69–95. For a critique of Davis's position, see Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) at § 36.5.

[5] 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC)('Harksen').

[6] See Albertyn & Goldblatt 'Facing the Challenge of Transformation' (supra) at 24.

[7] S Cowen 'Can Dignity Guide our Equality Jurisprudence?' (2001) 17 SAJHR 34; S Liebenberg 'The Value of Human Dignity in Interpreting Socio-Economic Rights' (2005) 21 SAJHR 1 (in relation to socio-economic rights), S Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2003) Chapter 33.

This latter view has been partially borne out by the way the Constitutional Court has developed the meaning of dignity under the Final Constitution. With some notable exceptions,[1] the Court has adopted a contextual rather than an abstract understanding of dignity, and has moved from a narrow focus on individual, personal autonomy and psychological self-worth to a systemic understanding of individual and group-based civil, political and material inequalities.[2] This development has been explicit in relation to socio-economic rights, where the Court has linked dignity (together with freedom and equality) to the achievement of basic needs: 'There can be no doubt that human dignity, freedom and equality, the foundational values of our society, are denied those who have no food, clothing and shelter.'[3] The Court in Khosa v Minister of Social Development not only emphasized the material conditions necessary for the recognition of an individual's dignity,[4] it also suggested that dignity is a group-based concept involving a collective concern for the well-being of others:

> Sharing responsibility for the problems and consequences of poverty equally as a community represents the extent to which wealthier members of the community view the minimal well-being of the poor as connected with their well-being and the well-being of the community as a whole.[5]

In developing the meaning of dignity in relation to equality, the Court has offered a variety of meanings to give content to the more abstract idea of 'equal concern and respect' — the expression of equal dignity or equal 'moral worth'. However, the Court has also missed important opportunities to link this concept to systemic forms of inequality.

At its most formal, equal concern and respect has been applied to the irrational treatment of a group on an arbitrary ground such as race. A constitutional challenge to the unequal, racially-based enforcement of municipal debts in Pretoria City Council v Walker offers a good example of this formal approach.[6] In Walker, the Court found the enforcement policy to constitute an impairment of dignity and thus amount to unfair discrimination:

[1] See Jordan & Others v S (Sex Workers Education and Advocacy Task Force & Others as Amici Curiae*)* 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC). See also § 35.5*(g)*(ii)(bb) infra.

[2] This more expansive approach was arguably implicit in cases such as National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at para 24 and Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC) at para 38. For a discussion of the five different definitions of dignity employed by the Constitutional Court, and an explanation as to how they cohere, as variations on Kant's categorical imperative and his notion of a realm of ends, see Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) at § 36.2.

[3] See Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC) at para 23. Later on, the Grootboom Court states: 'A society must seek to ensure that the basic necessities of life are provided to all if it is to be a society based on human dignity, freedom and equality'. Ibid at para 44. See also A Chaskalson 'The Third Bram Fischer Lecture: Human Dignity as a Foundational Value of Our Constitutional Order' (2000) 16 SAJHR 193.

[4] 2004 (6) 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC).

[5] Ibid at para 74.

[6] See Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC)('Walker') at paras 69–81. For the facts of this case, see § 35.3*(a)* infra.

> No members of a racial group should be made to feel that they are not deserving of equal 'concern, respect and consideration' and that the law is more likely to be used against them more harshly than others who belong to other racial groups.[1]

A series of claims for equality by gay and lesbian claimants has led to the development of a deeper understanding of 'equal concern and respect'.[2] In National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs, the Court spoke of 'equal concern and respect' in relation to the social consequences of legal exclusion for gay and lesbian couples.[3] This exclusion was said to reinforce harmful stereotypes of gay and lesbian relationships, in particular the message that gay and lesbian people lacked the inherent humanity to constitute families and live within the protection of the law. The Court found such gross invasion of individual self-worth to constitute a violation of dignity and, therefore, of equality.[4] 'Equal concern and respect' thus entails respect across differences and an affirmation of diversity. This theme runs through the entire body of sexual orientation jurisprudence. In Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie, the Court wrote:

> Equality means equal concern and respect across difference. It does not presuppose the elimination or suppression of difference. Respect for human rights requires the affirmation of self, not the denial of self. Equality therefore does not imply a levelling or homogenisation of behaviour.[5]

In cases on gender and citizenship, the Court has found that legal measures that create or reinforce the social and/or economic exclusion of women[6] and non-citizens[7] deny them 'equal concern and respect'. On the other hand, the fact that legal measures do not exacerbate systemic inequalities has led the Court to conclude that certain claimants have not been treated without 'equal concern and respect'.[8]

At the same time, the Constitutional Court has missed significant opportunities to understand and address the systemic nature of social exclusion in cases relating to gender and to refugees. In Jordan v The State, a case concerning the criminalization of sex work, the majority judgment failed to understand how the systemic

[1] Walker (supra) at para 81.
[2] See § 35.5*(g)*(v) infra
[3] 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC).
[4] Ibid at paras 45–53.
[5] Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie & Another; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC) at para 60.
[6] Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)(In relation to the customary rule of primogeniture.) See § 35.(g)(ii)(aa) infra.
[7] Larbi-Odam & Others v Member of the Executive Council for Education & Another 1998 (1) SA 745 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1655 (CC)(On equality of access to economic opportunities (teaching posts).) See § 35.5*(e)* infra.
[8] See Walker (supra) at para 68 (The Court found that the applicants were not a disadvantaged group and that the impact of the flat rate, with its concurrent implications of cross-subsidisation in favour of black areas, did not exacerbate any (economic) disadvantage.) See also Hugo (supra) at para 40 (The Court found that fathers were not a disadvantaged group — socially or economically.)

social stereotypes underlying sex work might mean that sex workers were not treated 'with equal concern and respect'.[1] In National Union of Refugee Women v Director: Private Security Industry Regulatory Authority, the Court similarly failed to see the systemic foundations of the legal exclusion of refugees.[2]

In a small number of cases, the Constitutional Court has connected the value of dignity and the commitment to equal concern and respect to the goal of eliminating group-based material disadvantage. In Khosa v Minister for Social Development, the Court found the exclusion of permanent residents from social assistance to be 'intentional, statutorily sanctioned unequal treatment' that affected the material and social well-being of the applicants. [3] The Court found that 'decisions about the allocation of public benefits represent the extent to which poor people are treated as equal members of society'. The applicants, excluded from such public benefits, were forced into 'relationships of dependency upon families, friends and community', 'relegated to the margins of society' and 'cast in the role of supplicants'.[4] In Khosa, the exacerbation of material disadvantage, even destitution, reflected an absence of equal concern and respect. This absence was not merely a concern of the state, but of society as a whole.

The primacy of the value of dignity within the equality right — manifest in the notion of equal moral worth and the requirement that all persons be treated with equal concern and respect — is a malleable concept. It easily embraces ideas of status or recognition, related to social disadvantage, which are implicated in the majority of equality (unfair discrimination) cases. Here the value of dignity evinces a constitutional concern with the equal moral worth of persons and groups, with their inclusion and participation within society as equals, without stereotyping, prejudice and isolation. Although the value of dignity has been tied to material disadvantage, this connection has had limited application in our jurisprudence.[5] In equality cases, this conception of dignity has only been employed where the underlying inequality is supported by a violation of a socio-economic right.[6] That said, these cases demonstrate that dignity is capable of supporting a substantive understanding of equality that explores and seeks to remedy systemic

[1] 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC).

[2] Union of Refugee Women v Director: Private Security Industry Regulatory Authority CCT Case No. 39/09 (Judgment of 12 December 2006 (as yet unreported)('Union of Refugee Women') at para 38 (majority's findings) and para 119 (minority's findings).

[3] 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC).

[4] Ibid at paras 74, 76, 77.

[5] For a sustained argument connecting the right to dignity to the material conditions of existence (and thus material disadvantage), see Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) at § 36.2.

[6] For a discussion of this idea of dignity in relation to socio-economic rights, see S Liebenberg 'The Value of Human Dignity in Interpreting Socio-Economic Rights' (2005) 21 SAJHR 1. For a discussion of the relationship between equality and socio-economic rights, see S Fredman 'Providing Equality: Substantive Equality and the Positive Duty to Provide' (2005) 21 SAJHR 163; B Goldblatt & S Liebenberg 'Achieving Substantive Equality in South Africa: The Relationship between Equality and Socio-Economic Rights' (2007, forthcoming).

inequalities and disadvantage. At the same time, they reveal that a different definition of dignity, often combined with legal formalism, may block a substantive understanding of equality. Trenchant criticisms of dignity in Canadian jurisprudence have revealed that the courts' reliance on dignity may place undue emphasis on whether a particular person or group has been treated with 'equal concern and respect' and fail to assess whether the broader goals of substantive equality have been achieved.[1]

(ii) Equality

Despite its dominance, dignity is not the only value that has informed the interpretation of the right to equality. The Constitutional Court has recently developed the value of substantive equality in relation to the equality right, especially in cases concerned with the positive and the restitutionary aspects of the right that flow from FC s 9(2).

The constitutional value of substantive equality is linked to the achievement of social and economic equality and the dismantling of structural inequalities. The Constitutional Court has consistently referred to the achievement of equality in the context of South Africa's apartheid past.[2] In Minister of Finance v Van Heerden, Moseneke DCJ spoke of the need for 'a credible and abiding process of reparation for past exclusion, dispossession and indignity within the discipline of our constitutional framework'.[3] This statement was perhaps the first detailed and explicit recognition of the relationship between the value of equality and right to equality. Van Heerden was also the first case to engage FC s 9(2): this provision provides constitutional protection for positive measures designed to remedy unfair discrimination.

In Van Heerden, the Court linked the achievement of equality with the achievement of a society based on 'social justice'. However, such an achievement would only be possible if there was a 'positive commitment progressively to eradicate socially constructed barriers to equality and to root out systematic or institutionalised under-privilege'.[4] This commitment requires remedial or restitutionary

[1] See, eg, C Sheppard 'Inclusive Equality and New Forms of Social Governance' (2004) 24 Supreme Court LR (2d) 45; S Moreau 'The Wrongs of Unequal Treatment' (2004) 54 University of Toronto LJ 291; J Fudge 'Substantive Equality, The Supreme Court of Canada and the Limits to Redistribution' (2007, forthcoming).

[2] See, eg, Walker (supra) at paras 45-48; National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at paras 60-62; Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC) at para 72-77. That the value of equality embraces an idea of material equality and economic redistribution has been endorsed by was also expressed by former Chief Justice, Arthur Chaskalson, and by present Chief Justice, Pius Langa. See A Chaskalson 'The Third Bram Fischer Lecture: Human Dignity as a Foundational Value of Our Constitutional Order' (2000) 16 SAJHR 193; P Langa 'Transformative Constitutionalism' (2006) 17 Stellenbosch Law Review 351.

[3] 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC), 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC)('Van Heerden') at para 25. For a discussion of the facts of this case, see § 35.4*(b)* infra. For earlier statements of this idea, see Walker (supra) at paras 45-48; National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('NCGLE I') at paras 60-62.

[4] Van Heerden (supra) at para 31.

equality.[1] Although the Van Heerden Court does not use the term 'redistribution', its interpretation of the value of equality clearly envisages a degree of economic redistribution and the removal of material disparities. Of course, such redistribution would be constitutionally constrained by the criteria for positive measures established under FC s 9(2).

(iii) Values, substantive equality and institutional boundaries

In the end, a redistributive function does not always fit comfortably with the institutional role of courts and with the distinction courts seek to draw between issues of social policy and issues of law.[2] The meaning accorded to the value of dignity has become influential in defining the boundaries of the right,[3] and its flexibility and degree of abstraction has been useful for courts as they negotiate the redistributive and institutional difficulties posed by the equality right. The value of equality is far more explicit in its commitment to redistribution, but the Constitutional Court's embrace of the redistributive aspects of equality has been constitutionally and legally constrained — either by the presence of other rights in the Final Constitution (the right to social assistance in Khosa[4]) or in legislation (the Maintenance Act in Bannatyne[5] and the Political Office Bearers Pension Fund in Van Heerden). Fredman suggests that the presence of such express rights is an important indicator of whether a court will act in such a redistributive manner.[6]

Dignity's place in our equality jurisprudence means that it will have to be harnessed in a manner that enables jurists to use the right to equality to achieve transformative ends. However, it is important to remember that the rights and the values of both dignity and equality respond to different kinds of claims, and that each has its place in addressing systemic social and economic inequalities in South Africa.

35.2 Overview of the Right to Equality

The equality right set out in FC s 9 — the successor to IC s 8 — contains five discrete provisions. Each provision reflects a different aspect of the right and a different 'level' of equality protection. This section provides a brief overview of [1] Van Heerden (supra) at para 30 and at paras 73-74 (Mokgoro J).

[2] See NCGLE I (supra) at para 123 (Sachs J expresses concern regarding 'over-intrusive judicial intervention in matters of broad social policy'.)

[3] See also S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) § 36.4.

[4] Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Another v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) SA 569 (CC).

[5] Bannatyne v Bannatyne (Commission for Gender Equality, as Amicus Curiae*)* 2003 (2) SA 363 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 111 (CC).

[6] S Fredman 'Providing Equality: Substantive Equality and the Positive Duty to Provide' (2005) 21 SAJHR 163.

the right, and the relationship of the provisions to one another. In this respect, the Constitutional Court has argued that '[a] comprehensive understanding of the Constitution's conception of equality requires a harmonious reading of the provisions of section 9'.[1] This reading also requires the right to be approached holistically rather than formulaically, in which the right, as a whole, produces an approach to achieving equality which is 'cumulative, interrelated and indivisible'.[2] Thus, although various tests are formulated for different aspects of the right, it is important to apply these tests in a manner that understands the overall meaning and purpose of the right. Central to this understanding are a theory of substantive equality and an appreciation for the set of values that underpin the right. More than a decade after the onset of constitutional democracy, the Constitutional Court's equality jurisprudence is reasonably well established in relation to all sections of the right, and it is relatively easy to navigate its different pathways.

IC s 8(1) provided that 'every person shall have the right to equality before the law and equal protection of the law', while FC s 9(1) provides that 'everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law'.[3] The Constitutional Court has accorded no meaning to this textual change.[4] Both IC s 8(1) and FC s 9(1) provide constitutional protection against any irrational or arbitrary classifications (on any basis) made by the state. This weak rationality constraint on state action renders irrational or arbitrary classifications unconstitutional. The failure of law to meet FC s 9(1)'s requirements forestalls the need for further assessment under FC s 9(3). Moreover, a violation of FC s 9(1) cannot be saved by the higher justificatory standards of reasonableness and proportionality that ground FC s 36's limitations analysis.

FC s 9(1) also has a secondary and less developed meaning. In a few cases, IC s 8(1) and FC s 9(1) have been interpreted as a guarantee of equal treatment by the courts or 'equality in the legal process'.[5] This interpretation overlaps, but does not fully coincide with, FC s 9(1) as a rationality constraint. It remains unclear as to whether it protects merely against irrational actions, or whether it also reflects a stronger standard of justification. Its relationship to equality of outcome, and not just equality of process, remains an open question.

FC ss 9(3) and (4) and IC s 8(2) prohibit unfair discrimination on a series of listed and unlisted grounds.[6] There is no material difference between the two constitutional texts, except that FC s 9 adds three further prohibited grounds,

[1] Van Heerden (supra) at para 28.
[2] Ibid at para 135 (Sachs J).
[3] For a full discussion of this section, see § 35.3 infra.
[4] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at paras 58-59.
[5] See § 35.3*(c)* infra.
[6] The major equality cases decided under IC s 8 were: Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (1) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC); President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC); Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC); Harksen v Lane NO 1998 (1) 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC); Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC); Jordan v S 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC).

namely, pregnancy, marital status and birth, as well as a specific protection against unfair discrimination in the private sphere, in FC s 9(4). If the differentiation complained of is on a ground listed in these sections (or a similar ground defined by its potential to impair dignity), then there is no need to apply FC s 9(1) — one can proceed directly to FC s 9(3) or FC s 9(4).

FC ss 9(3) and (4) provide the main substantive protection afforded by FC s 9. Once one is able to show discrimination on a listed or similar ground, the enquiry shifts to determine whether this discrimination is fair or unfair. This essentially moral enquiry focuses on the impact of the discrimination on the complainant and his or her group. The court must consider issues of disadvantage and vulnerability, the purpose of the discrimination, and whether the discrimination is so invasive of the rights and interests of the complainant as to impair his or her dignity or to constitute a similarly serious violation of another right. FC s 9(5) states that discrimination on a listed ground is presumed to be unfair, unless shown to be fair.

If the discrimination complained of relates to a positive measure to achieve equality, then the respondent (usually the state) is able raise a defence to the FC s 9(3) claim under FC s 9(2). FC s 9(2) states that equality includes 'the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms'. It confirms that the equality right 'includes the adoption of positive measures to achieve equality', in addition to providing protection against unfair discrimination. It differs from IC s 8(3)(a) in its positive phrasing, affirming that the meaning of equality includes positive measures. As such, it is an important statement of principle and provides textual support for the remedial and restitutionary aspect of the right. FC s 9(2) also contains a set of criteria that can constitute a complete defence to a claim of unfair discrimination. If a defence of positive measures is raised, then the enquiry proceeds directly to FC s 9(2). Under these circumstances the presumption of unfairness in FC s 9(5) does not apply. If the claim is successfully defended under FC s 9(2), then the positive measure is not unfair. It is only if the impugned measure is not saved under FC s 9(2) that the matter falls to be assessed in terms of FC s 9(3).

FC s 36 provides that a right may be limited if such limitation is 'reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom'. It is logically impossible for a violation of FC s 9(1) to be saved under this section. It is also unlikely, though not logically impossible, for a violation of FC s 9(3) or FC s (4) to be justified under FC s 36.[1]

[1] For a more detailed explanation of the relationship between unfair discrimination analysis and limitations analysis, and the extent to which FC s 9 analysis exhausts the grounds for justification of discrimination, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

35.3 FC s 9(1)

Early academic commentary on IC s 8(1) and FC s 9(1) suggested that the subsection should be given broad, substantive content. It was argued, for example, that the provision should be read as an overarching expression of the equality right to permit affirmative action and redistribution, oppose subordination through the law and provide substantive protection in the legal process.[1] The Constitutional Court did not follow this approach and accorded IC s 8(1) a particular meaning, separate from the rest of the clause. The first cases on IC s 8(1) focused on the idea of equality before the law as at least entitling everyone to equal treatment by courts of law.[2] Although this interpretation has not been superseded, the dominant function accorded to IC s 8(1) in Prinsloo v Van der Linde, and subsequent cases under FC s 9(1), has been to protect claimants against inequality qua irrationality.[3] Thus IC s 8(1) and FC s 9(1) are largely limited to protection against arbitrary and irrational distinctions made by the legislature or the administration. This connotation of inequality forms part of a wider constitutional commitment to the legality principle and the rule of law doctrine.[4]

(a) FC s 9(1) as a minimum rationality requirement

A useful starting point for the courts' interpretation of IC s 8(1) and FC s 9(1) as a rationality constraint is the idea that differentiation lies at the heart of both inequality and effective governance. The constitutional question is when such differentiation is permissible, and under what circumstances it is impermissible and unconstitutional as a violation of equality. IC s 8(2) and FC s 9(3) and (4) clearly outlaw differentiation as discrimination. Are there other forms of differentiation that also amount to inequality? In answering this question, the Constitutional Court distinguishes between what it terms 'mere differentiation' and differentiation that amounts to discrimination.[5] While discrimination clearly refers to distinctions made on the basis of prohibited grounds,[6] 'mere differentiation' describes the myriad distinctions that are made by a modern state in the business of effective governance. Examples of these range from income classification for the purposes of taxation or social welfare grants to distinctions made for the

[1] See C Albertyn & J Kentridge 'Introducing the Right to Equality in the Interim Constitution' (1994) 10 SAJHR 149, 157-160; D Davis 'Equality' in D Davis et al Fundamental Rights in the Constitution (1997) 52–55.

[2] S v Ntuli 1996 (1) SA 1207 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 141 (CC) at para 91.

[3] 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) SA 759 (CC).

[4] See C Albertyn 'Equality' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) Chapter 4. See also Van der Merwe v The Road Accident Fund 2007 (1) SA 176 (CC), 2006 (6) BCLR 682 (CC) at n67.

[5] Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 23.

[6] See § 35.5*(b)* infra.

distribution of various types of drugs, or the sentencing of offenders for different crimes, or the privileges accorded different categories of prisoners. It is these 'mere differentiations' that are regulated by FC s 9(1).

In Prinsloo v Van der Linde, the Constitutional Court established that these distinctions will only contravene the equality right if they are irrational.[1] Ackermann J explained the point as follows:

> [T]he constitutional state is expected to act in a rational manner. It should not regulate in an arbitrary manner or manifest naked preferences that serve no legitimate governmental purpose, for that would be inconsistent with the rule of law and the fundamental premises of the constitutional state. The purpose of this aspect of equality is, therefore, to ensure that the state is bound to function in a rational manner. This has been said to promote the need for governmental action to relate to a defensible vision of the public good, as well as to enhance the coherence and integrity of legislation.[2]

Described thus, rationality is part of accountability and justification in a democratic state. As apparent in the above extract, however, it is capable of at least two meanings: a weak version in which rationality encompasses the principle of the rule of law that the exercise of public power should not be arbitrary; and a strong version which requires a degree of principled justification of state action ('a defensible vision of the public good'). It is the first and weaker rationality constraint that has become the test for constitutionality under FC s 9(1).[3]

In Harksen v Lane NO, decided under IC s 8(1), the Constitutional Court distilled the conclusions of Prinsloo v Van der Linde into a simple test:

> Does the provision differentiate between people or categories of people? If so, does the differentiation bear a rational connection to a legitimate government purpose? If it does not, then there is a violation of section 8(1). Even if it does bear a rational connection, it might nevertheless amount to discrimination.[4]

(i) Has there been a differentiation between individuals or groups?

Differentiation between individuals or groups triggers FC s 9(1) scrutiny. The Constitutional Court has suggested that this differentiation can be either direct or indirect, although there is no reported case on indirect differentiation.[5] If there

[1] This proposition is widely accepted in other jurisdictions. See, eg, P Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (1996) 1240-1243.

[2] Prinsloo v Van der Linde (supra) at para 25 (footnotes omitted).

[3] Although this weak rationality constraint has dominated FC s 9(1) jurisprudence, Union of Refugee Women demonstrates a shift to a more principled defence. In Union of Refugee Women, the Court did identify a defensible vision of the public good in the important role of the security industry in protecting the human rights, especially the freedom and security, of the public at large. Union of Refugee Women (supra) at paras 37-41.

[4] 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 38.

[5] See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('NCGLE v Minister of Justice') at para 63 (The Constitutional Court found that the reference to 'direct and indirect discrimination' in s 9(3) meant that the enquiry under s 9(1) necessarily encompasses both direct and indirect differentiation.)

is no differentiation, then there can be no violation of FC s 9(1).[1] If the differentiation is on a prohibited ground, then it is possible to proceed directly to an enquiry under FC s 9(3) or (4). FC s 9(1) is thus not a necessary step in an equality claim.[2]

Although the fact of differentiation will not usually be in dispute, the Constitutional Court has given some guidance to interpreting contested legislative distinctions. In Jordan v The State[3] the state challenged the assumption that the impugned provision criminalized sex workers and not their clients.[4] The minority judgment of O'Regan and Sachs JJ addressed the criteria for the proper interpretation of the section.[5] Overall, they suggested that the Court would 'consider whether there is a constitutionally compatible interpretation of the section' that the provision is 'reasonably capable of bearing'.[6] In doing this, the Court would look at what interpretation had been generally accepted in South African law, the natural reading of the section, and the context of the enactment of the provision.[7] Where the alleged distinction related to a crime, the Court would avoid broadening the definition of the crime, a task that ordinarily fell to the legislature and not the courts. In general, it would be contrary to constitutional values, including the principle of legality, to accept an extended definition of a crime.[8]

(ii) Does the differentiation have a rational connection to a legitimate government purpose?

The interrogation of this relationship involves first, the identification of a legitimate purpose, and second, the finding of a rational connection between the differentiation and this purpose. It is not sufficient to identify a generic purpose for the impugned provision or conduct. In Van der Merwe v Road Accident Fund[9] the Constitutional Court warned that '[a] court remains obliged to identify and examine the specific government object sought to be achieved'. It might be that the generic purpose is not 'open to constitutional doubt', but that the specific purpose is.[10] In this case, the applicant sought to recover damages from the Road Accident Fund for injuries suffered as a result of her husband's intentionally

[1] Irrational state action that does not arise from a differentiation is prohibited under the the rule of law doctrine. See F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11.

[2] NCGLE v Minister of Justice (supra) at para 18.

[3] 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC)('Jordan').

[4] Section 20(1)(aA) of the Sexual Offences Act. Jordan (supra) at paras 8, 40. Note that this case was decided under IC s 8(1).

[5] Note that this aspect of the judgement does not seem to be contested by the majority, who agree with the finding that there is such a distinction. See Jordan (supra) at para 8.

[6] Ibid at para 40.

[7] Ibid at paras 41-44.

[8] Ibid at paras 45-46.

[9] 2007 (1) SA 176 (CC), 2006 (6) BCLR 682 (CC)('Van der Merwe').

[10] Ibid at para 33.

knocking her down with his car and then reversing over her.[1] The Fund raised a special plea that it was not liable for patrimonial damages by reason of s 18, read with s 19 of the Matrimonial Property Act 88 of 1984.[2] These provisions prevented a spouse married in community of property from recovering damages for patrimonial loss 'in respect of bodily injuries suffered by him and attributable either wholly or partly to the fault of that spouse'.[3] The applicant consequently challenged these provisions under FC s 9. In defending the claim in relation to FC s 9(1), the Fund argued that s 18 had the legitimate purpose of 'regulat[ing] the patrimonial consequences of marriage'. The Court responded that even if this general purpose was constitutionally valid, one needed to have regard to the specific purpose of the provision to see if that 'specific part of the scheme was constitutionally valid'.[4]

The determination of whether the specified purpose is legitimate or not entails an evaluation of the reasons given for this purpose. To meet the criterion of legitimacy under FC s 9(1), the state merely has to show that its purpose is neither arbitrary nor irrational. In general, legitimacy is equated with a weak form of rationality. The government does not have to justify its purpose against substantive constitutional values or any conception of 'the general good'. In a rare finding of an illegitimate purpose in Van der Merwe v Road Accident Fund, the Constitutional Court concluded that that the reasons given for pursuing the specified purpose of avoiding the futility of spousal claims were no longer valid. They had fallen away with changes in the concept of, and legislative framework for, the 'joint estate' in marriage. As such, the purpose was based on a 'relic of the common law of marriage' which was neither useful nor legitimate.[5]

The related question of whether the scheme or measure chosen by Parliament or the government is rationally connected to the identified purpose is also a limited enquiry. The Constitutional Court has cautioned that

> [t]he question is not whether the government may have achieved its purposes more effectively in a different manner, or whether its regulation or conduct could have been more closely connected to its purpose. The test is simply whether there is a reason for the differentiation that is rationally connected to a legitimate government purpose.[6]

In Van der Merwe, the Constitutional Court found that the scheme which excluded spouses married in community of property from claiming patrimonial damages from their spouses was not rationally connected to its (already illegitimate) purpose. The Court's analysis reveals that there were no valid reasons for the legislative scheme. On the contrary, it found the reasons proffered to be outdated,

[1] Van der Merwe (supra) at para 11.
[2] Ibid at para 14.
[3] Section 18*(b)* of the Act.
[4] Van der Merwe (supra) at para 33
[5] Ibid at paras 34 and 50-52.
[6] East Zulu Motors (Pty) Limited v Empangeni/Ngwelezane Transitional Local Council 1998 (2) SA 61 (CC), 1998 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 24. See also Prinsloo v Van der Linde (supra) at paras 35-38.

arbitrary and absurd. The absurdity of the legislation was reflected in its differential treatment of the negligent driving of a spouse in one class of marriage (out of community of property), which created liability for patrimonial damages, from the negligent driving of another class of spouse (in community of property), which did not create such liability.[1] The legislation also offered no rational explanation for the divide between non-patrimonial damages (which were permitted) and patrimonial damages (which were not). Overall the Court found no rational basis for the scheme or purpose of the Act. The differentiation was thus impermissible as an arbitrary distinction that served no legitimate public end.[2]

In Jooste v Score Supermarket Trading (Pty) Ltd (Minister of Labour intervening),[3] the Constitutional Court considered the provisions of the Compensation for Occupational Injuries and Diseases Act.[4] The Act required employees to claim damages for injuries incurred in the course of their employment in terms of that Act and thus precluded such employees from claiming under the common law. The Jooste Court found this distinction to be rationally connected to the legitimate government purpose of providing compensation for disability caused by injuries sustained during the course of employment.[5] In doing so, the Court said:

> It is clear that the only purpose of the rationality review is an inquiry into whether the differentiation is arbitrary or irrational, or manifests naked preference and it is irrelevant to this enquiry whether the scheme chosen by the legislature could be improved in one respect or another. Whether an employee ought to have retained a common law right to claim damages, either over and above or as an alternative to the advantages conferred by the Compensation Act, represents a highly debatable, controversial and complex matter of policy. It involves a policy choice which the legislature and not a court must make.[6]

In summary, FC s 9(1) protects against arbitrary and irrational state action. Although it requires that the purpose and scheme be examined in their proper context, it does not require an analysis of the impact of the impugned action or of the policy choices made.[7] It merely requires the state to have a defensible purpose, together with reasons for its actions that bear some relationship to the stated purpose. This weak rationality constraint is extremely deferential to the legislature[8] and most laws will pass constitutional muster under this

[1] Van der Merwe (supra) at para 55.
[2] Ibid at paras 52-58
[3] 1999 (2) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (2) BCLR 139 (CC).
[4] Act 130 of 1993.
[5] Ibid at paras 12-16.
[6] Ibid at para 16. See also Bel Porto School Governing Body v Premier of the Province, Western Cape 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC) at para 45.
[7] The Union of Refugee Women v The Director: The Private Security Industry Regulatory Authority CCT 39/09 (as yet unreported judgment of 12 December 2006)('Union of Refugee Women') at para 37.
[8] In US constitutional law, a similar strong presumption of constitutionality informs rationality review. See L Tribe American Constitutional Law (2nd Edition, 1988) 1439-43.

provision.[1] Thus far, Van der Merwe v Road Accident Fund is the only case that has reached the Constitutional Court that has failed the rationality test. Pretoria City Council v Walker provides an interesting example of the failure to meet the rationality requirement of FC s 9(1). (It was not, however, decided on such grounds.)[2] The Walker Court was confronted with the constitutionality of the City Council's selective enforcement of the debts of defaulting residents. It concluded that this practice was not based on a 'rational and coherent' policy, but was adopted and implemented in a secretive and misleading manner by Council officials, apparently without Council authority and in conflict with a Council resolution.[3] Although the Walker Court found this to be unfair, indirect, racial discrimination, the facts also support a claim that the differential treatment was irrational and arbitrary.

(b) Can irrationality be justified under FC s 36?[4]

FC s 36 provides that the rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited by 'law of general application to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom'.

[1] Examples of the unsuccessful application of FC s 9(1) include: Prinsloo v Van der Linde (supra) at paras 35-42 (A presumption of negligence in the Forest Act 122 of 1984 in respect of causing veld, forest or mountain fires that was imposed on owners of land outside fire control areas, and not on land-owners within such areas, was found to be rationally connected to the legitimate government purpose of preventing veld fires); Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC)('Walker') at para 27 (Geographic differentiation in methods of charging for municipal services for residents of Pretoria townships, where a flat rate was charged, and 'old Pretoria', where metered rates were charged, was found to be rationally connected to the purpose of equalising the provision of such services to residents of areas that were deeply unequal in the past.); Harksen v Lane NO 1998 (1) 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at paras 58 (A provision in the Insolvency Act 24 of 1936 that the property of the solvent spouse should vest in the Master and be treated as if part of the insolvent estate was found to be rationally connected to the government's purpose of protecting creditors and facilitating the often complicated process of sequestration); Bel Porto School Governing Body v Premier of the Province, Western Cape 2002 (3) SA 365 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC) at paras 41-45 (Not irrational to distinguish between departmental and school employees in developing a staffing policy for Western Cape schools that sought to equalise posts across schools within budgetary constraints); Jordan (supra) at para 58 (Not irrational to target the criminal conduct of one group (sex workers or purveyors of sex for reward) and not another (clients or purchasers)); De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, WLD 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC) at paras 39-41 (The distinction between defences available to 'mere possessors' and to distributors or broadcasters of publications found to be child pornography under the Films and Publications Act 65 of 1996 is rationally connected to the legitimate government objective of combating harm caused by pornographic and violent materials); Union of Refugee Women (supra) at paras 35-42 (Differentiating between citizens and permanent residents on the one hand, and all foreigners on the other, in registration requirements for security officers is rationally connected to the legitimate government purpose of achieving and maintaining a trustworthy and legitimate private security industry.)

[2] Walker (supra) at paras 27-28. Although the Court applied IC s 8(1) to the question of whether the imposition of a flat rate for municipal services in certain geographical areas violated the equality guarantee, it did not do so in relation to the question of whether the selective enforcement of debts violated the equality right.

[3] Ibid at paras 73 and 76.

[4] For a discussion of 'irrationality' and the criteria for the law of general application test in FC s 36, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

The minimum rationality test means that most claims based on 'mere differentiation' will be filtered out (as rational) by the FC s 9(1) enquiry and will not be subject to any greater standard of justification. If, however, a legislative measure is found to be irrational under FC s 9(1), it is difficult to see how such irrationality could be saved by FC s 36, which sets a higher standard of justification than the rationality standard set by FC s (1). It is more likely that measures that fail FC s 9(1) will be found to be irretrievably unconstitutional.

This point is illustrated by Van der Merwe v Road Accident Fund. Here the Court sought to engage in a justification enquiry, but found that the absence of a legitimate purpose for the legislation rendered this enquiry impossible:

> [T]he pursuit of a legitimate government purpose is central to a limitation analysis. The court is required to assess the importance of the purpose of a law, the relationship between a limitation and its purpose and the existence of less restricted means to achieve the purpose. However, in this case there is nothing to assess. The lack of a legitimate purpose renders, at the outset, the limitation unjustifiable.[1]

(c) FC s 9(1) as a guarantee of equality in the legal process

The Constitutional Court has emphasized that its equality jurisprudence is constantly evolving, and that each case requires it to address the particular context of inequality in South Africa. Most IC s 8(1) and FC s 9(1) cases have interpreted these provisions as imposing a weak rationality constraint on the state, especially its legislative, executive and administrative arms. This reading does not constitute the sole meaning of FC s 9(1). On the contrary, a small but significant group of cases have used IC s 8(1) and FC s 9(1) to address questions of equality in the legal process, especially in relation to criminal procedure.

The idea that IC s 8(1) and FC s 9(1) might protect equality in the legal process has also been mooted by some legal scholars. These scholars suggest that it might provide both procedural and substantive protection (and thereby embrace both the substance and the content of the law).[2]

In S v Ntuli, Didcott J argued that IC s 8(1) 'surely entitles everybody, at the very least, to equal treatment by our courts of law'.[3] Ntuli was decided before the establishment of the rational connection test under IC s 8(1). The case addressed the constitutional validity of provisions in the Criminal Procedure Act that differentiated between categories of criminal appellants.[4] The first category consisted

[1] Van der Merwe (supra) at para 63. For an analysis of whether a violation of the right to equality can ever, as a matter of logic in terms of FC s 9(1), or as an empirical matter in terms of FC s 9(3) and FC s 9 (4), be justified under FC s 36, see S Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra).

[2] C Albertyn & J Kentridge 'Introducing the Right to Equality in the Interim Constitution' (1994) 10 SAJHR 149, 160 and 178.

[3] 1996 (1) SA 1207 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 141 (CC) at para 18.

[4] Act 51 of 1977 s 309 read with s 305.

of prisoners, who had been convicted in the lower courts without legal representation, and who required a judge to certify that there were reasonable grounds for an appeal before proceeding with the appeal. The second category — all other criminal appellants — did not require this intervening step of judicial certification before commencing an appeal. The Ntuli Court found that the provision violated IC s 25(3)(h) — the right to a fair trial, in particular the right 'to have recourse by way of appeal or review to a higher court than the court of first instance' — as well as IC s 8(1). The IC s 25(3) enquiry engaged the standard of substantive fairness in investigating the working and impact of the different appeal procedures. It found a violation of the right to a fair trial.[1] The Court also found that the differentiation between the two categories of criminal appellants, in which one group could appeal as of right and the other required a judge's certificate to do so, amounted to unequal treatment and thus violated the guarantee of 'equality before the law'.[2]

Equal treatment by the courts or equality of legal process does not require identical procedures in different courts, but it does seem to require fair procedures across groups.[3] This suggests that the standard of constitutionality in relation to legal process is not rationality but fairness.[4] At the very least, the substantive content of IC s 8(1) and FC s 9(1) has been enhanced in relation to criminal trials by the fair trial guarantee in IC s 25 and FC s 35. In addition, the idea of 'equality of arms'[5] that has been included within the meaning of 'equality before the law' is linked to the concept of a fair trial. Equality of arms requires that the state and an accused person be placed in an equal position: 'Although inequalities between accused persons are inherent within any criminal justice system, inequalities between opposing litigants in a criminal trial are contrary to the principle of a fair trial.'[6] Two High Court cases have applied this doctrine. The Lavhengwa court applied the doctrine during its assessment of a summary procedure relating to contempt of court in the magistrates' courts.[7] The Qozeleni court applied the doctrine to the right of a defendant to have full access to the records and other documents in a criminal case.[8]

Thus far, the cases have concerned laws relating to the criminal process. Would the same principles apply in civil trials and procedures, or to the application rather than the content of the law? In Cary v Cary, which concerned an application for costs of a pending matrimonial action under Rule 43(1)(a), the High Court found

[1] S v Ntuli (supra) at paras 13-16.
[2] Ibid at paras 18-20.
[3] S v Rens 1996 (1) SA 1218 (CC), 1996 (2) BCLR 155 (CC) at para 29.
[4] See S v Lavhengwa 1996 (2) SACR 453, 479A-B (W).
[5] See Qozeleni v Minister of Law and Order 1994 (1) BCLR 75, 88 (E), 1994 (3) SA 625, 642 (E)('Qozeleni'); S v Lavhengwa (supra) at 477D–478C.
[6] S v Lavhengwa (supra) at 478B.
[7] Ibid at 477D–478C.
[8] Qozeleni (supra) at 642C-I.

that its discretion was subject to the right to equality before the law, which, in turn, required equality of arms in a divorce action.[1]

In Van der Walt v Metcash Trading the Constitutional Court was asked to consider whether FC s 9(1) guaranteed 'equality in outcome in litigation based upon materially identical facts and circumstances'.[2] The Supreme Court of Appeal had been petitioned in two separate, but materially identical, cases for leave to appeal. Two different panels of judges made contrary orders. Writing for the majority, Goldstone J noted that, unlike S v Ntuli, a legal right was not denied to one litigant but granted to another. Rather, the exercise of the same right by both litigants resulted in different outcomes.[3] The issue was thus not differential statutory provisions, but a different outcome that flowed from the exercise of judicial discretion. Thus, although FC s 9(1) required 'all persons in a similar position must be afforded the same right to access the courts and to the same fair and just procedures with regard to such access', it did not extend to a guarantee of equality of outcome in matters where judicial discretion is exercised.[4] The Final Constitution does not protect the public from incorrect decisions[5] — although the case suggests that it does protect the public against judges who act in an arbitrary and irrational manner.[6] The Metcash Court found that FC s 9(1) offered no substantive protection and that its procedural protection of equality did not require the Supreme Court of Appeal to ensure that identical applications were heard by the same panel of judges (this duty lay with the attorneys, not the judges). Ngcobo J, in dissent, argued that the Supreme Court of Appeal was bound to ensure that similar applications were heard by the same panel, and was thus obliged to structure the process in such a way as to guarantee equal outcomes.[7]

(d) Can inequality in the legal process be justified under FC s 36?

It is logically impossible for a violation of FC s 9(1) as a rationality constraint to be justified under FC s 36. If, however, the interpretation of FC s 9(1) as a guarantee of equality in legal process set a higher standard of justification, such as fairness, then one might still be tempted to ask whether an unfair legal process could be found to be 'reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom'.[8] We think that a finding of unfairness will probably exhaust all possible justifications that might be offered under FC s 36.

[1] Cary v Cary 1999 (8) BCLR 877, 881-82 (C).
[2] 2002 (4) SA 317 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 454 (CC) at para 15.
[3] Ibid at paras 16 and 17.
[4] Ibid at para 24.
[5] Ibid at para 19.
[6] Ibid at para 18.
[7] Ibid at paras 41-42.
[8] See S v Ntuli (supra) at paras 21-25 (Court found that the unequal treatment of two groups of convicted persons was unreasonable and thus not justified under IC s 33(1).) But see S v Lavhengwa (supra) at 478d-482e (Summary procedure in relation to contempt was found to be justified under IC s 33(1).)

(e) The future scope of FC s 9(1)

The dominant meaning of the right to equality before the law and to equal protection and benefit of the law is that it prohibits irrational distinctions or classifications made by the government and Parliament. A second, parallel, meaning is that FC s 9(1) guarantees, at the very least, equal treatment by the courts of law and equality of legal process. Both meanings raise questions of regarding the future development of the right: Is the rationality constraint sufficient to protect those who cannot claim unfair discrimination? Does equality of process include equality in the content and application of the law?

(i) Beyond rationality?

The interpretation of FC s 9(1) as a rationality constraint developed in the context of establishing a conceptual separation between legislative distinctions that involve 'unfair discrimination' and those that do not ('mere differentiation').[1] The meaning of FC s 9(1) has thus partly evolved in relation to the centrifugal force of discrimination within the right to equality.[2] The relationship between of FC s 9(1) and FC s 9(3) or (4) means that all legislative and other classifications are only subject to a weak rationality constraint, unless the claimant is able to show that the distinction is based on a ground prohibited under FC ss 9(3) or (4). Distinctions based on a ground prohibited under FC ss 9(3) or (4) trigger the higher level of constitutional scrutiny, namely fairness.

Does FC s 9(1) need to be limited to a rationality test? One argument in favour of a wider interpretation is that the protection against irrational and arbitrary state action exists elsewhere in the Final Constitution. In New National Party of South Africa v Government of the RSA, a case dealing with the constitutionality of the Electoral Act, the Constitutional Court found that the legality principle and the rule of law doctrine, constituted a rationality constraint binding all parts of the state.[3] The rule of law doctrine provides a minimum threshold for the exercise of public power that exists 'prior' to the enquiry into the infringement of fundamental rights.[4] The legality principle mirrors the FC s 9(1) test:

[1] This process began in Prinsloo v Van der Linde. See Prinsloo (supra) at para 23.

[2] This proposition was confirmed in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice. 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('NCGLE v Minister of Justice') at para 63 (Ackerman J held that differentiation under FC s 9(1) could be direct or indirect, reasoning that this 'must necessarily flow from the reference in section 9(3) to "direct and indirect discrimination"'.)

[3] 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC)('New National Party').

[4] Ibid at para 24. See also Mphahlele v First National Bank of South Africa Ltd 1999 (2) SA 667 (CC), 1999 (3) BCLR 253 (CC)(On the role of the rule of law as a foundational value of the Constitution.)

> The first of the constitutional constraints placed on Parliament is that there must be a rational relationship between the scheme it adopts and a legitimate government purpose. Parliament cannot act capriciously or arbitrarily. The absence of such a rational connection will result in the measure being unconstitutional.[1]

Although an overlap in sources of constitutional protection is neither impermissible nor exceptional, it does suggest that rationality is not a necessary interpretation of FC s 9 (1) and that further judicial constructions of FC s 9(1) are possible.

Second, it might be argued that FC s 9(1) is conceptually flawed in that it does not conform to the purpose of the right, namely, substantive equality. The idea of equality as rationality refers to a formal notion of equality that sees inequality as a function of laws that irrationally single out groups, rather than as emerging from a social and economic context of inequality.[2] It is also a value-neutral process that tests legislative classifications by the presence of reasons, rather than by the substantive choices made by the law and the values underlying these choices.

On the other hand, one could argue that, viewed holistically, FC s 9 embraces substantive equality.[3] By limiting the meaning of FC s 9(1), the Constitutional Court has made a choice between those legal distinctions that are subject to minimum scrutiny and those that are subject to a more substantive enquiry. It has also determined which policy decisions remain largely in the realm of Parliament and government, and which are tested by the courts, thus paying attention to the separation of powers doctrine.[4] In principle, it is correct that such a choice should be made. It is also appropriate to limit the equality guarantee to certain individuals and groups, to avoid its injudicious use by, for example, corporations,[5] and to apply judicial resources frugally in testing government policy. The critical question here is whether the Court has drawn the line in the correct place. Are there groups who deserve greater protection under the equality right curently excluded from its ambit?

[1] New National Party (supra) at para 19. See also Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA; In Re: Ex Parte Application of President of the RSA 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) especially at paras 83–85 (Concerned judicial review of executive action, and whether the exercise of public power was rationally related to the purpose for which it was given.)

[2] See H Lessard 'Equality and Access to Justice in the Work of Bertha Wilson' (1992) 15 Dalhousie Law Journal 55, 56.

[3] See NCGLE v Minister of Justice (supra) at paras 58-64 (This appears to have been the response of the Constitutional Court to the amicus.)

[4] See Bel Porto School Governing Body v Premier of the Province, Western Cape 2002 (3) SA 365 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC)(Chaskalson P) at para 46 ('If we were to apply a "reasonableness" review at the stage of the section 9(1) enquiry, we would be called upon to review all laws for reasonableness, which is not the function of the court.')

[5] The early Canadian experience of the equality right (s 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights) was that it was abused by juristic persons for largely economic ends. See G Brodsky & Shelagh Day Canadian Charter Equality Rights for Women: One Step Forward or Two Steps Back (1989).

Several legal distinctions not protected by FC s 9(3) can give rise to levels of disadvantage that deserve greater constitutional scrutiny than rationality.[1] Among those classifications that warrant heightened scrutiny are the category of offender, whether one is in prison,[2] and distinctions made on the basis of property ownership or income level.[3] For example, a municipality passes a by-law that imposes a flat rates charge of R100 per plot, regardless of property size or the income of proprietor. This distinction amounts to a wealth classification that may not be tested under FC s 9(3).[4] Any equality challenge based upon FC s 9(1) would only requires 'good' reasons for state action and will not necessarily scrutinize policy choices. However, other options exist. The test under FC s 9(1) could be strengthened. Or one could employ the FC s 9(3) or FC s (4) unfair discrimination test and contend that grounds such as socio-economic status or prisoner-status ought to be recognized as additional (unlisted) grounds.

The question of unlisted grounds is dealt with below. There are several ways of developing FC s 9(1) into a more substantive enquiry.[5] The first would be to strengthen the rationality constraint to require a more substantive interrogation of the relationship between means and ends, or a greater defence of the public good.[6] Although this new test may create some overlap with FC s 36, it would provide a stronger standard of constitutional justification. Alternatively, one could develop a different test by, for example, asking a series of questions that flow from the value of equality and an expanded idea of 'equal protection and benefit of the law'. As suggested elsewhere,[7] these questions could relate to the role of the law in fulfilling the Final Constitution's egalitarian vision of full and equal participation in society. Does the provision facilitate or impede this vision by reinforcing or [1] It has been suggested that the criterion of fairness should be built into FC s 9(1) so that it applies to those who do not qualify under FC s 9(3) but nevertheless deserve the protection of the Final Constitution. See G Swart 'An Outcomes-based Approach to the Interpretation of the Right to Equality' 1998 (13) SAPR/PL 217, 224-233. See also Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC)(Didcott J) at para 57.

[2] As a result, most of the challenges to differentiation that arise in criminal law and procedure have taken place under FC s 9(1). See, eg, S v Ntuli (supra); S v Rens 1996 (1) SA 1218 (CC), 1996 (2) BCLR 155 (CC).

[3] See L Tribe American Constitutional Law (2nd Edition, 1988) 1635-38 (For a discussion of equal protection law and the changing constitutional scrutiny of wealth classifications in the US.)

[4] Given the convergence of poverty and race in South Africa, one could argue that the differential rates amount to indirect racial discrimination. However, such an argument misses those class and wealth dimensions of the problem that are not reducible to race. Alternatively, it could be argued that socio-economic status is a prohibited, but unlisted ground.

[5] This development cannot be achieved through a more substantive enquiry under the rationality test. It would entail an interrogation of means and purpose that would too closely mirror the limitations analysis under FC s 36. Indeed, the rationality test is based on US jurisprudence that does not separate a limitations enquiry from the enquiry into the contravention of the right.

[6] See Union of Refugee Women (supra) at paras 37-41

[7] C Albertyn 'Equality' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2nd Edition, 2005) Chapter 4.

removing systemic barriers to advancement in our society? If it can be shown that the flat rate places an intolerable burden on poor people, the constitutional culture of justification[1] demands that such a measure be subject to the kind of justification required by FC s 36, rather than the test of rationality. According to this line of analysis, FC s 9(1) is more than a mere rationality constraint. It is, rather, a substantive provision that ensures the fullest respect for the value of substantive equality and for the constitutional value of accountability for government action.

(ii) Equality of process as equality of substance and outcome?

The ambit of FC s 9(1) in protecting equality in the legal process remains a moot point for two reasons. Firstly, it is unclear whether the standard of protection is limited to rationality or extends beyond rationality to questions of, for example, fairness. Second, in Van der Walt v Metcash Trading, Goldstone J left open the question whether FC s 9(1) should necessarily be confined to matters of procedure and not substance.[2] Whether, and the extent to which, equality before the law guarantees equal outcomes remains undecided. Both of these areas of equality law will require further clarification by the Constitutional Court.

(f) FC s 9(1) and horizontal application?

None of the jurisprudence on FC s 9(1) suggests that it is horizontally applicable. On the contrary, the interpretation of FC s 9(1) has been entirely located within an understanding of the role and responsibilities of the state in a constitutional democracy. In its present incarnation, therefore, FC s 9(1) cannot apply horizontally either by virtue of the nature of the right, or by virtue of the nature of the duty imposed by the right.[3] To shift the meaning of the right to include private actors would require a jurisprudential development of the human rights obligations of, for example, large national and multinational corporations.

35.4 FC s 9(2): Positive Measures, Substantive Equality and Equality of Rights

FC s 9(2) states that '[e]quality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms' and that positive measures are permitted to 'promote the achievement of equality' for persons and groups who have been 'disadvantaged by unfair discrimination'. IC s 8(3)(a) permitted positive measures 'to achieve the adequate protection and advancement of persons or groups or categories of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination, in order to enable their full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms'. The textual difference means little in so far as the provision was only given a detailed interpretation by the Constitutional Court under the Final Constitution.

[1] This 'culture of justification' has been referred to in several cases. See Shabalala v Attorney-General of the Transvaal 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1593 (CC) at para 26; Prinsloo v Van der Linde (supra) at para 25.

[2] Van der Walt (supra) at para 25.

[3] FC s 8(2). For more on the application of the Bill of Rights, and specifically its horizontal application, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 31.2, § 31.4 and the Appendix.

The Constitutional Court has consistently referred to IC s 8(3)(a) and to FC s 9(2) as important indicators of the commitment to substantive equality. Thus it has acknowledged the remedial and restitutionary aspects of the right and the significance of achieving equality within the overall constitutional vision of transformation. More recently, the Court has confirmed that FC s 9(2) is an important shield of protection for positive measures, providing a complete constitutional defence to a claim of unfair discrimination.

(a) FC s 9(2) as a statement of substantive equality

The Constitutional Court has always recognized that the achievement of equality in South Africa entails the need to overcome a past characterized by deep social and economic inequalities, in which race, gender and other patterns of exclusion and disadvantage structured access to, and enjoyment of, opportunities and benefits.[1] A substantive notion of equality entails the recognition and dismantling of these 'forms of social differentiation and systematic under-privilege'.[2] It also recognizes that the positive, remedial and restitutionary measures referred to in IC s 8(3)(b) and FC s 9(2) are fundamental to the achievement of equality and to the creation of conditions for full and equal participation in society.[3] IC s 8(3)(b) and FC s 9(2) thus cohere with the transformative purpose of the two constitutions and the idea that the achievement of equality is an ongoing process that is 'remedial and restitutionary'.[4] In the words of Moseneke J, writing for the majority in the leading case on FC s 9(2), Minister of Finance v Van Heerden, the equality right is part of 'a credible and abiding process of reparation for past exclusion, dispossession, and indignity within the discipline of our constitutional framework'.[5]

[1] See Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC)(O'Regan J) at para 42. See also Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC); NCGLE v Minister of Justice (supra) at para 62.

[2] Minister of Finance v Van Heerden 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC), 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC)('Van Heerden') at para 27. See § 35.1 supra.

[3] Van Heerden (supra) at paras 22-32.

[4] NCGLE v Minister of Justice (supra) at para 61. Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC) at paras 73-77.

[5] Van Heerden (supra) at para 25.

FC s 9(2) also states that equality includes the equal enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set out in the Bill of Rights.[1] Writing extra-curially, (then) Chief Justice Arthur Chaskalson has suggested that this statement envisages a society in which all people enjoy a level of psychological, physical and material well-being, enabling them to enjoy all rights and participate fully in that society.[2] In this sense, the assertion of equal rights within the equality clause is an important statement of principle, prefiguring the fundamental transformation of our society. Together with FC s 9(2) as a whole, it confirms that equality does not merely offer protection against past discrimination. It also mandates the achievement of equality in line with a particularly South African (constitutional) vision of social justice.[3]

(b) Positive measures

FC s 9(2) provides for positive measures to advance equality. It reflects a change in wording from IC s 8(3)(a) of the Interim Constitution and offers a more positive phrasing of the right's commitment to the promotion of equality. Early concerns that positive measures would be seen as exceptions to equality, rather than as part of substantive equality, were dispelled by this textual change and by the subsequent jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court.[4] However, even with such improvements, many questions remained about the interpretation and the application of FC s 9(2), especially its position in the equality right, its relation to the protection against unfair discrimination in FC s 9(3), the application of the FC s 9(5) presumption to FC s 9(2) and the interpretation of the 'internal criteria' in FC s 9(2).

These questions were largely settled in Minister of Finance v Van Heerden. The case concerned an equality challenge to the Political Office Bearers Pension Fund established for members of Parliament after the transition to democracy in 1994. Between 1994 and 1999, the rules of the Fund provided an additional benefit to members of Parliament, who had entered the institution for the first time in 1994, in the form of enhanced employer contributions calculated on a particular scale. Van Heerden, a member who had served in the pre- and post-1994 parliaments, claimed that the scheme amounted to unfair discrimination.[5] The Constitutional Court found the scheme to be constitutionally permissible as a positive measure under FC s 9(2). In doing so, the Court set out the constitutional standards for remedial, positive action by the state.

[1] This provision in FC s 9(2) is textually distinct from FC s 9(2)'s statement on positive measures. In IC s 8(3)(a) the provision directly linked positive measures to the equal enjoyment of rights. It thus permitted positive measures 'to achieve the adequate protection and advancement of persons or groups or categories of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination, in order to enable their full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedom' (emphasis added).

[2] See A Chaskalson 'The Third Bram Fischer Lecture: Human Dignity as a Foundational Value of Our Constitutional Order' (2000) 16 SAJHR 193, 203.

[3] See Van Heerden (supra) at paras 22-32.

[4] Ibid at paras 30-31. But see NCGLE v Minister of Justice (supra) at para 62.

[5] See Van Heerden (supra) at paras 4-11 (Summary of the facts.)

(c) The relationship of FC s 9(2) to FC s 9(3) and FC s 9(5)

One of the main questions in academic debate about IC s 8(3)(b) and FC s 9(2) has been its conceptual and practical relationship with unfair discrimination and FC s 9(3) and, by necessity, with FC s 9(5). Two related issues arise. First, is FC s 9(2) a complete defence to a claim of unfair discrimination under FC s 9(3),[1] or does it merely provide additional guidelines to the determination of fairness in terms of FC s 9(3)?[2] Secondly, does the FC s 9(5) presumption of unfairness apply to FC s 9(2)? In other words, are positive measures presumptively unfair, thus requiring the state to prove their fairness?

In general, the High Courts had approached FC s 9(2) as if it were a special defence of 'fairness' to a claim of unfair discrimination, but found that special measures were presumptively unfair in so far as they were based on the grounds listed in FC s 9(3).[3] Positive measures thus attracted an onus of establishing on the balance of probabilities that they were taken to promote the achievement of equality. In Minister of Finance v Van Heerden, the Constitutional Court agreed that FC s 9(2) constituted a defence to unfair discrimination, but found that it was conceptually wrong to allow special measures to be seen as presumptively unfair.[4]

(i) Fairness

The Van Heerden Court reiterated the idea that

> [r]emedial measures are not a derogation from, but [are] a substantive and composite part of, the equality protection envisaged by the provisions of section 9 and of the Constitution as a whole. Their primary object is to promote the achievement of equality.[5]

However, implicit in the majority judgment, and made explicit by Sachs J, is the notion that fairness remains an important principle in FC s 9(2) analysis. The enquiry entails an interrogation of many of the factors relevant to the fairness enquiry under FC s 9(3), albeit with an emphasis on the group being advanced, rather than the group being prejudiced. Conceptually therefore, compliance with FC s 9(2) does not make positive measures 'exempt' from attack as unfair discrimination, rather it means that the measures are fair.[6]

[1] See Employment Equity Act 55 of 1998. Under the Act, affirmative action is a complete defence to a claim of unfair discrimination and is not weighed up within the fairness enquiry. See Eskom v Hiemstra NO 1999 (11) BCLR 1320 (LC).

[2] See Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000. Under PEPUDA, a court is required to investigate all the listed criteria of unfairness, even if the defence is one of affirmative action or positive measures. See C Albertyn, B Goldblatt & C Roederer (eds) An Introduction to the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act (2001) 36.

[3] See Public Servants' Association of South Africa v Minister of Justice 1997 (5) BCLR 577 (T); Motala v University of Natal 1995 (3) BCLR 374 (D); Minister of Finance v Van Heerden & Another Cape High Court Case 7067/01 judgment of 12 June 2003 (as yet unreported)('Van Heerden HC').

[4] Van Heerden (supra) at para 32.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Ibid at para 140.

(ii) A complete defence

The Van Heerden Court found further that that 'differentiation aimed at protecting or advancing persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination is warranted provided the measures are shown to conform to the internal test set by section 9(2)'.[1] In other words, FC s 9(2) provides a complete defence to a claim that positive measures constitute unfair discrimination. All that is required to succeed in this defence is to demonstrate compliance with the internal conditions established in FC s 9(2).

(iii) The place of FC s 9(3)

If the measure is found to comply with FC s 9(2), then the enquiry ends. If it does not pass muster under FC s 9(2), and if the measure is based on a listed or unlisted ground prohibited by FC s 9(3), then it will still need to be tested under FC s 9(3) to determine whether it amounts to unfair discrimination.[2] In Van Heerden, the minority judgments of Mokgoro and Ngcobo JJ followed this route. Both found the legislative scheme to constitute fair discrimination, mainly because the measure did not impact negatively on, nor impair the dignity of, the claimant.[3]

(d) Proving the defence: the internal criteria in FC s 9(2)

The Van Heerden Court identified three criteria that must be satisfied for a defence to succeed under FC s 9(2):

- Does the measure target persons or categories of persons who have been disadvantaged by unfair discrimination?
- Is the measure designed to protect persons or categories of persons who have been disadvantaged by unfair discrimination?
- Does the measure promote the achievement of equality?[4]

Before considering these criteria, it is useful to consider what measures fall under FC s 9(2), and whether the section is limited to measures taken by the state or whether it also applies to positive measures in the private sphere. The broad formulation of the term 'legislative or other measures' seems to suggest that all public or state measures can rely on FC s 9(2) for constitutional protection. The High Court decision in Motala v University of Natal took the view that IC s 8(3)(a) also applied horizontally.[5] Unless it is decided that the inclusion of the word

[1] Van Heerden (supra) at para 32.
[2] Ibid at para 36. All four judgments in Van Heerden agree on this approach to FC s 9(2).
[3] Van Heerden (supra) at para 97.
[4] Ibid at para 37. Note that all the judges are in accord about the nature of this test. Ibid at paras 82 and 108. Mokgoro J and Ngcobo J, however, each come to different conclusions in applying the test.
[5] 1995 (3) BCLR 374 (D).

'legislative' limits FC s 9(2) to public, rather than private, measures, there is no reason in principle why FC s 9(2) should not apply horizontally. In most instances, the provisions of the Employment Equity Act will regulate positive measures in the workplace.[1] However, the jurisdiction of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act is far less clear, and no precedent exists that currently requires that this Act to be used rather than the Final Constitution.[2]

(i) Does the measure target persons or categories of persons who have been disadvantaged by unfair discrimination?

The first criterion focuses on the group that is being promoted by the measure to determine whether it is constituted by 'persons or categories of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination' described in FC s 9(2). Two issues are important here: First, to what extent does one have to show actual disadvantage in the group being targeted? Second, can one distinguish between persons within a particular disadvantaged group by targeting a section of a disadvantaged group (the idea of relative disadvantage)?

To answer the first question, one needs to start with the Constitutional Court's recognition that the fundamental cleavages in South African society emerged from group-based attributes such as race or gender. These cleavages permeated the attitudes, practices, institutions and structures of an entire society, and they continue to exist more than a decade after the Final Constitution was enacted. They require extensive remedial and group-based action. To meet this criterion, the 'programme of redress must favour a group or category designated by section 9(2)' and 'the beneficiaries must be shown to be disadvantaged by unfair discrimination'.[3] In practice, this part of the FC s 9(2) test requires that the programme must be shown to benefit a group that is both disadvantaged and defined by a ground that is prohibited under FC s 9(3) (black rather than white, female rather than male etc). Although some evidence to this effect ought to be offered, courts will often be prepared to take judicial notice of such a disadvantaged group. It does not yet matter that the group consists of 'privileged' members of the disadvantaged group, as arguably, Members of Parliament in South Africa are. Nor does it matter if some members of the overall group being advanced by the measure belong to a privileged group. A measure will not fail because it includes persons who have not, in fact, been disadvantaged. It is sufficient that 'an overwhelming majority' have been so disadvantaged.[1]

[1] Act 55 of 1998.

[2] In Du Preez v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development, the Equality Court did not follow the Constitutional Court in Van Heerden in interpreting this Act's provision for positive measures (s 14(1)). 2006 (5) SA 592 (EC). On the contrary, it seemed to suggest that challenges to positive measures under the Act — in this case a challenge to shortlisting criteria for appointment to the position of a regional magistrate — should be tested under the unfair discrimination provisions of the Act (s 13 read with s 14 (2) and (3)) and not in terms of the internal criteria set out in s 14(1), despite the similarity in the wording of s 14(1) and FC s 9(2). This approach does not seem, to us, to be correct. The Act should rather be interpreted in a manner that coheres with, rather than contradicts, Van Heerden.

[3] Van Heerden (supra) at para 8.

In Van Heerden, the group or 'category of persons' who received the beneficial treatment by way of enhanced employer contributions to the Pension Fund comprised all members who entered Parliament for the first time in 1994. This group of 251 people included 53 white people, some of whom were members of the New National Party (the previous governing party). In finding this group to be 'disadvantaged by unfair discrimination', the majority judgment found that the group was largely defined by those 'who were excluded from Parliamentary participation on account of race, political affiliation or belief'.[2] The majority judgment thus accepted that the group was 'disadvantaged' even though up to 20 percent of its members were not historically disadvantaged.[3] In doing so, they did not interrogate the issue of 'membership' closely, but acknowledged that the definition of a class to benefit from a positive measure is a difficult task which would not always be guided by clearly defined boundaries of disadvantage.

It was this loose definition of the group that was found wanting by the minority judgments of Mokgoro and Ngcobo JJ. Both justices found that the group included too many people from an advantaged group, was not defined by race, and could not be seen to be a 'disadvantaged' group.[4] These dissents turned in part over a disagreement over what constitutes an 'overwhelming' majority or a 'tiny minority' within the group (Moseneke J's description of the group). While Mokgoro J agreed that one did not have to show actual disadvantage, she argued that one did have to show that they were all members of a group that was previously disadvantaged.

This difference of judicial opinion goes to a more substantive disagreement about the level of scrutiny that the court will impose on positive measures. The majority judgment signifies a more deferential approach to positive measures, setting the threshold for compliance at a relatively low level and leaving significant space for government and Parliament to address the patterns of subordination and disadvantage in South African society. By contrast, the minority judgments argue that the lines should be drawn differently. In defending the need for greater scrutiny, Mokgoro warns that > section 9(2), as an instrument of transformation and the creation of a truly equal society, is powerful and unapologetic. It would therefore be improper and unfortunate for section 9(2) to be used in circumstances for which it was not intended. If used in circumstances where a measure does not in fact advance those previously targeted for disadvantage, the effect would be to render constitutionally compliant a measure which has the potential to discriminate unfairly.[5]

[1] Van Heerden (supra) at paras 38-40.
[2] Ibid at paras 38-40.
[3] Twenty percent of the group were white, although some of these individuals were members of the African National Congress. Ibid at para 93.
[4] Ibid at paras 88, 105 and 108.
[5] Ibid at para 87.

These questions also go to a wider debate in South African society about the continuing use of positive measures as past inequalities are reduced through greater access to educational and economic opportunities. Although not immediately likely, it is possible that the Constitutional Court's approach to the delineation of a disadvantaged group will change over time. It is interesting to note that the Indian Supreme Court eventually narrowed its approach to the definition of disadvantage after it became apparent that preferential policies, entrenched in the Indian Constitution since the 1950s,[1] had only benefited a small and privileged elite within the defined groups.[2] The Indian Supreme Court now requires both membership in a named group, as well as evidence of low socio-economic status, in order to qualify for preferential treatment.[3]

A related question in South Africa is whether the group may be constituted by a portion of a disadvantaged group, for example, black Africans within the larger black group. The issue of relative disadvantage was not discussed by the majority in Van Heerden. Sachs J, in his minority judgment, noted that such relative disadvantage creates 'a more difficult case'.[4] The issue of relative disadvantage did arise in Motala v University of Natal.[5] In this case, an Indian student, with five distinctions in matric, challenged the University of Natal's refusal to admit her to medical school. The refusal was based on the decision by the medical school to limit the admission of Indian students to a certain percentage so that more African students could have an opportunity to enter the school. The poor quality of African education under apartheid meant that Africans could not compete equally in a purely merit-based system. The High Court held that, although Indian students were disadvantaged by apartheid, African students had experienced greater disadvantage. As a result, the measure that preferred one black group over another was lawful.[6]

The complex forms of inequality in South Africa, where factors such as race, class, religion and gender intersect in a multitude of ways, means that positive measures may be tailored to particular groups. For example, a particular measure may be targeted at black women, rather than all women, or at Africans rather than [1] Articles 15(3), 15(4) and 16(4) of the Indian Constitution allow 'special provision' for women and children, Scheduled Castes and Scheduled Tribes and socially and educationally backward classes of citizens. These provisions apply generally (art 15) and to appointments and posts in the state (art 16).

[2] See WF Menski 'The Indian Experience and its Lessons for Britain' in B Hepple & E Szyszczak Discrimination: The Limits of the Law (1992) 330; V Nair 'Search for Equality through Constitutional Process: The Indian Experience' in S Jagwanth & E Kalula (eds) Equality Law: Reflections from South African and Elsewhere (2001) 255.

[3] See Indra Sawhney v Union of India (1993) AIR SC 477; Indra Sawhney v Union of India (2000) AIR SC 498.

[4] Van Heerden (supra) at para 149. The minority judgement of Mokgoro J suggested that the relative disadvantage experienced by African, coloured and Indian South Africans should have been addressed. Ibid at para 93.

[5] 1995 (3) BCLR 374 (D)('Motala').

[6] Ibid at 383B–F.

all black people. In such cases of relative disadvantage, it might be that the scrutiny of the group would need to be higher.[1] Thus, such measures may be constitutional if, in each case, the definition of the group is justified with reference to the actual historic or current unfair discrimination suffered by the majority of that group in a particular context. For example, it is the actual relative privilege of the majority of Indian learners over African learners, as shown in statistics, which allowed the kind of measure contemplated in Motala to be found to be constitutional.[2]

(ii) Is the measure designed to protect persons or categories of persons who have been disadvantaged by unfair discrimination?

The second condition placed on positive measures by FC s 9(2) is that they should be 'designed to protect or advance' certain persons or groups. Writing about the Interim Constitution, Mureinik argued that the 'culture of justification' brought about by the new Constitution required the courts to test both the purpose and the means of positive measures. Thus, a court should ask what a measure was intended to achieve, and, thereafter, assess whether the design of the measure makes it objectively probable that it will, in fact, achieve the intended ends.[3] Following this general approach, the High Court in Van Heerden had required both a causal connection and a necessary connection between the designed measures and the objectives.[4]

This approach was rejected by the Constitutional Court. Moseneke J found that the remedial measure must be 'reasonably capable of attaining the desired outcome'.[5] This phrase meant that the measure should not be 'arbitrary, capricious or display naked preference'.[6] However, the Court did not expect any 'precise prediction of a future outcome', merely a 'reasonable likelihood' that the measure will realize the purpose. This standard does not entail any tests of necessity, precision or proportionality.[7] It is not necessary to establish that the objective will be achieved, that it was necessary to prejudice one group to advantage another, or that there might be less onerous ways to achieve the objective.[8]

An important difference in the standards set by the High Court and the Constitutional Court relates to the question of the onus. The High Court found the onus of fairness to lie with the state and thus required a heavier

[1] Sachs J, in Van Heerden, describes an assessment of relative disadvantage as constituting a 'more difficult case'. Van Heerden (supra) at para 149.
[2] Motala (supra) at 383 B-F.
[3] E Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where? Introducing the Interim Bill of Rights' (1994) 10 SAJHR 31, 47.
[4] Van Heerden (supra) at para 14. See also Public Servants' Association of South Africa v Minister of Justice 1997 (5) BCLR 577, 639–641 (T).
[5] Van Heerden (supra) at para 41.
[6] Ibid at paras 42 and 149.
[7] Ibid at paras 42 and 43
[8] Ibid at para 42.

burden of proof; the Constitutional Court established that the presumption of unfairness did not apply to FC s 9(2). Relieved of the presumption, the standard applied by the Constitutional Court does not seem to be much more onerous than a rationality test: generally such a standard requires 'a clear and rational consideration' of the relationship between means and purpose.[1] However, the Court has not set the test at this level of scrutiny, but has rather required a level of 'reasonableness' in the design of the programme. Hence it noted that the scheme 'distribute[d] pension benefits on an equitable basis with the purpose of diminishing the inequality between privileged and disadvantaged parliamentarians.[2] The Court also noted that the scheme was transitional, a limited and temporary tool with a five-year life span. It said that the classification of the group related to the need to ameliorate past disadvantage and that there was a 'clear connection' between the differentiation (the definition of the group) and the need.[3] In general, the Court's consideration of the pension scheme demonstrated a fairly detailed scrutiny of the issues, even if it did not apply a very strict standard of assessment. Again, the interpretation and the application of the criterion demonstrate deference to the other branches of government. However, the criterion of reasonableness also provides a degree of flexibility and suggests that the parameters of this requirement will be developed over time.

(iii) Does the measure promote the achievement of equality?

The third criterion of constitutionality under FC s 9(2) is that the purpose of the measure must be to achieve equality by protecting or advancing disadvantaged persons or groups. The purpose is tested against the constitutional vision of equality and the creation of a 'non-racial, non-sexist society in which each person will be recognised and treated as a human being of equal worth and dignity'.[4] To achieve this constitutional purpose, remedial actions need to be taken, even though they 'may often come at a price for those who were previously advantaged'.[5]

In assessing a measure, a court will look to at its remedial purpose. It is likely that this remedial purpose must go beyond compensation[6] and should seek to ameliorate past disadvantage.[7] The overall purpose must be to promote equality, rather than to harm or to punish previously advantaged groups.[8]

[1] Van Heerden (supra) at para 52.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid at paras 47, 50 and 52.
[4] Ibid at para 44.
[5] Ibid. See also Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC) at para 76.
[6] See Action Travail des Femmes v Canadian National Railway Co (1988) 40 DLR (4th) 193, 213.
[7] Van Heerden (supra) at para 48.
[8] Ibid at para 76.

The application of this criterion requires a weighing up of the beneficial purpose of the measure against the possible harm that it might cause. This weighing up means that the court must consider the impact of the measure on both groups — although the emphasis falls on the group being promoted by the measure. The court must ensure that the measure is not an abuse of power, and does not impose 'substantial and undue harm' on those excluded from the measure. In assessing harm, one must look to the entire class complaining of unfair discrimination. It is a contextual, group-based analysis, not one of individual misfortune. One of the determinative factors in Van Heerden was that, apart from a few 'jammergevalle', the majority of those left out of the measure remained better off than those who benefited from the measure.[1] The presence of these 'jammergevalle' or 'unfortunate ones' who are prejudiced by the measure, but are unrepresentative of the class complaining of unfair discrimination, does not negate the measure.[2]

This criterion allows courts to assess the need for, and impact of, positive measures in different contexts as the transformation project begins to shift social and economic relations in South Africa.[3] In undertaking such regular reviews of this project, Sachs J suggests that the courts should have overall regard to the values of dignity and non-racialism,[4] and to the transformative project of achieving substantive equality.

(e) Applying the FC s 9(2) criteria to the case

Van Heerden demonstrates that the application of the FC s 9(2) criteria to a particular case involves a fairly detailed scrutiny of the issues. This assessment requires looking at the scheme or measure as a whole, its historical context, the duration, nature and purpose of the measure, the position of the person complaining of unfair discrimination and the impact of the measure of him or her and his/her class, as well as the position of the group being promoted.[5] In other words, the issues considered in the enquiry are similar to those considered in the enquiry into unfair discrimination. Like that latter enquiry, FC s 9(2) demands a contextual enquiry into impact, but with an emphasis on the group being promoted.[6]

As Sachs J points out, the enquiry is closely linked to FC s 9(3) and its idea of fairness. If fairness is a moral concept that allows an examination of the competing moral claims within the social and historical context of inequality in our society, then the FC s 9(2) enquiry also entails the balancing of the prejudice

[1] Van Heerden (supra) at paras 55-56.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid at paras 145 and 149-150 (Sachs J).
[4] Ibid at para 151.
[5] Ibid at para 45.
[6] Ibid at paras 77-80 (Mokgoro J).

caused to individuals by positive measures and the collective benefit of these measures to society in overcoming past discrimination and disadvantage.[1] The overlap between FC s 9(2) and (3) is also illustrated in cases where the courts have dealt with challenges to 'positive measures' in terms of unfair discrimination under FC s 9(3). In Pretoria City Council v Walker, for example, the Constitutional Court addressed the constitutionality of a flat rate for municipal charges as a question of unfair discrimination and assessed its validity with reference to the criterion of fairness.[2] Cases such as Walker highlight the conceptual relationship between FC s 9(2) and FC s 9(3). The overlap between the principle of remedial equality underlying FC s 9(2) and unfair discrimination in FC s 9(3) has been recognized by the Constitutional Court.[3]

The difference between the two enquiries appears to lie mainly in the manner in which the issues are assessed. An FC s 9(2) enquiry is more deferential to the legislature or government, using a light brush of reasonableness and setting a lower threshold of constitutional validity. It has a forward-looking focus that considers the remedial aspects of equality as applied to a disadvantaged group, rather then an assessment of the past impact of allegedly discriminatory measures. In the overall assessment, more weight is placed on the remedial purpose of the measure, than on its impact on those complaining of unfair discrimination.[4] In a FC s 9(3) enquiry, it is the impact on the complainant which is the key factor. These differences reflect the different aspects of South Africa's broad and substantive equality right.

(f) FC s 9(2) as a sword or a shield?

If FC s 9(2) provides a defence or a shield to positive measures, then does it also provide a sword, or a claim for positive action by the state? Can a court compel the state to act, or does this prerogative lie within the purview of Parliament and the executive? The question of principle is clear — there is a constitutional duty to promote the achievement of equality:

> Our supreme law says more about equality than do comparable constitutions. Like other constitutions, it confers the right to equal protection and benefit of the law and the right to non-discrimination. But it also imposes a positive duty on all organs of state to protect and promote the achievement of equality — a duty which binds the judiciary too.[5]

[1] Most commentators on the right to equality have adopted this position. See, eg, C Albertyn & J Kentridge 'Introducing the Right to Equality in the Interim Constitution' (1994) 10 SAJHR 149; D Davis 'Equality' in D Davis, H Cheadle & N Haysom Fundamental Rights in the Constitution: Commentary and Cases (1997).

[2] 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC). The low 'flat rate' imposed for municipal services in previously black townships that was challenged in this case was a positive measure in favour of the more economically disadvantage residents of these townships.

[3] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at paras 61-62.

[4] Mokgoro J makes this distinction in Van Heerden. Van Heerden (supra) at paras 78-80.

[5] Ibid at para 24.

The permissive language of FC s 9(2) and the deferent approach that the Constitutional Court has adopted in relation to positive measures militate against an interpretation of FC s 9(2) as providing a sword to compel the state to act.[1] In the words of the Van Heerden Court: 'presumptive unfairness would unduly require the judiciary to second-guess the legislature and the executive concerning the appropriate measures to overcome the effect of unfair discrimination'.[2] It is the Court's concern for the proper separation of powers which suggests that FC s 9(2) does not ground a challenge based upon the state's failure to act.

It is more likely that actions to compel the state to enact positive measures to promote equality may be founded on FC s 9(3),[3] or on other substantive rights as defined by the value of equality and/or read with the FC s 9(2) guarantee of the equal enjoyment of rights. The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act may also be used to generate remedies that require positive state action or positive private action.[4]

FC s 9(2) states that equality includes the equal enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set out in the Bill of Rights. This clause is textually separated from the statement on positive measures. (In IC s 8(3)(a) the provision linked positive measures to the equal enjoyment of rights.) This textual separation strengthens the claim that the statement has an independent meaning under FC s 9. However, it is not clear whether it also forms an independent basis for a claim for equal access to, and enjoyment of, other rights.

This point may be considered in relation to socio-economic rights. Can one ground a challenge to inequalities in the provision of social assistance or housing in FC s 9(2)? The answer is clearly 'no' in relation to inequalities that arise out of a ground prohibited under FC s 9(3). And it is also likely to be 'no' in relation to inequalities arising out of other grounds. Although the principle of the non-discriminatory enjoyment of all rights might be captured in FC s 9(2), it is undoubtedly FC s 9(3) that provides the core operating mechanism for challenging discrimination in the provision of social assistance, housing or education. It is improbable that FC s 9(2) provides an independent mechanism for addressing inequalities that are not caught in the net of FC s 9(3) or FC s 9(4). On the other hand, if a claim is based on a listed socio-economic right such as the right of access to health care under FC s 27 or housing under FC s 26, then it is likely that reliance may be placed on the value of substantive equality (as articulated in part by FC s 9(2)) and the principle of non-discrimination in international law to

[1] Van Heerden (supra) at para 33.
[2] Ibid at paras 33 and 152.
[3] See § 35.5 infra.
[4] Act 4 of 2000. For further discussion of PEPUDA, see § 35.8 infra.

demand the consistent application of the right.[1] This approach is apparent in Khosa v Minister for Social Development. In Khosa, the applicants successfully claimed access to various social benefits, denied to them because of their status as non-citizens, under FC s 9(3) and FC s 27.[2] In discussing their claim of access to social assistance under FC s 27, the Constitutional Court referred to the foundational value of equality which informed the interpretation of the right to mean equal access to socio-economic rights for all persons.[3] The Khosa Court also found that the unequal enjoyment of the right could found a claim of unfair discrimination.[4]

(g) FC s 9(2) and FC s 36

FC s 36 provides that a right may be limited, but only to the extent that the limitation is 'reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based of human dignity, equality and freedom'. This limitation provision does not apply directly to FC s 9(2), either conceptually or practically. The primary purpose of FC s 9(2) concerns the promotion of equality not the violation or the limitation of the right. If a measure fails to conform to the guidelines for promotional measures under FC s 9(2), then the next step is to test whether it violates the equality right under FC s 9(3). If it does violate FC s 9(3), then FC s 36 would apply if the limitation on the right to equality arose from a law of general application.[5]

35.5 FC ss 9(3), (4) and (5): Prohibition Against Unfair Discrimination

The subsections dealing with unfair discrimination comprise the functional centre of the equality right. It is here that the court considers whether the state (FC s 9(3)) or a private actor (FC s 9(4)) has unfairly discriminated against another person. The Constitutional Court has considered the meaning of unfair discrimination in a number of cases and has developed a detailed test to be followed in claims of unfair discrimination.

[1] FC s 39(1) requires a court to consider international law. On this matter, see Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC) at paras 26-33. The principle of equality or non-discrimination in the enjoyment of rights is a central one in international law. Indeed, the principle of non-discrimination has been identified as a core obligation in, for example, the right to the highest attainable standard of health care established in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (article 12). See, eg, Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights General Comment 14 'The Right to the Highest Attainable Standard of Health' (Twenty-second session, 2000) UN Doc E/C.12/2000/4 paras 18-19 and 43 (The state has a responsibility to ensure the right of access to health facilities, goods and services on a non-discriminatory basis, especially for vulnerable or marginalised groups.)

[2] Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Another v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) SA 569 (CC).

[3] Ibid at para 42.

[4] Ibid at para 44.

[5] See § 35.5*(d)* infra.

(a) Test for unfair discrimination

The test was first set out in Harksen v Lane NO. Goldstone J summarized the test as follows:

> 1(i) Does the differentiation amount to 'discrimination'? If it is on a specified ground, then discrimination will have been established. If it is not on a specified ground, then whether or not there is discrimination will depend upon whether, objectively, the ground is based on attributes and characteristics which have the potential to impair the fundamental human dignity of persons as human beings or to affect them adversely in a comparably serious manner.
>
> (ii) If the differentiation amounts to 'discrimination', does it amount to 'unfair discrimination'? If it has been found to have been on a specified ground, then unfairness will be presumed. If on an unspecified ground, unfairness will have to be established by the complainant. The test of unfairness focuses primarily on the impact of the discrimination on the complainant and others in his or her situation. If, at the end of this stage of the enquiry, the differentiation is found not to be unfair, then there will be no violation of section 9(3).
>
> 2. If the discrimination is found to be unfair then a determination will have to be made as to whether the provision can be justified under the limitations clause (s 36).[1]

We can pare this test down to three queries:

1 Does the differentiation amount to discrimination?
2. If so, was it unfair?
3 If so, can it be justified in terms of the limitations clause (FC s 36)?

(b) Step 1: Does the differentiation amount to discrimination?

The equality right has the unusual feature of prohibiting discrimination that is unfair. Fairness is the means of sorting permissible from impermissible forms of discrimination.[2] While discrimination itself contains a negative or pejorative connotation entailing some harm based on difference, unfair discrimination goes further in deepening or worsening existing disadvantage.[3] The Final Constitution requires that disadvantaged groups must be assisted.[4] This requirement does not mean that privileged groups will never be protected by FC s 9(3). It does, however, point to the importance of understanding unfair discrimination contextually,[5] historically and in light of the values underlying the Final Constitution.

[1] 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC)('Harksen') at para 53. Although the test was developed under the Interim Constitution, it has been followed under the Final Constitution. See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at para 15.

[2] See J Kentridge 'Equality' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS3, 1999) Chapter 14, 14-18.

[3] Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 31.

[4] Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 42.

[5] See Kentridge 'Equality' (supra) at 14-18.

In comparative jurisprudence a distinction is drawn between symmetrical and asymmetrical approaches to discrimination law.[1] A symmetrical approach would regard all differentiation on a prohibited ground to be unacceptable, while an asymmetrical approach would find that measures to benefit disadvantaged groups might be permissible.[2] The existence of positive measures in FC s 9(2) clearly points to an asymmetrical approach to FC s 9 as a whole. The Harksen test for unfair discrimination has the curious feature of seeming to offer both a symmetrical and asymmetrical approach in different parts of the test. In step 1 the court says that differentiation on a listed ground is discrimination. There is no suggestion in Harksen that the differentiation would need to entail some prejudice to the person complaining of the discrimination. At this stage of the FC s 9(3) enquiry the approach is entirely symmetrical. This approach seems to have been followed in the majority decision in Walker and led to the criticism in the minority judgment of Sachs J that 'the measure must at least impose identifiable disabilities, burdens or inconveniences, or threaten to touch on or reinforce patterns of disadvantage, or in some proximate or concrete manner threaten the dignity or equal concern or worth of the persons affected'.[3] Sachs J was, however, commenting only on indirect discrimination on a prohibited ground.[4] Jagwanth has criticized the Harksen test as reducing 'the first part of the enquiry into a decontextualised, abstract and mechanical exercise of formal equality'.[5] She explains that an asymmetrical approach that understands difference within social hierarchies of power would result in a more contextual examination that would exclude certain privileged groups from even succeeding at the first stage of the enquiry.

It seems that in applying its own test, the Constitutional Court has sometimes assumed some form of prejudice to be present.[6] While the first step of the FC s 9(3) enquiry may benefit certain privileged groups, they will still have to go through the second step involving the unfairness enquiry. This second step is a more challenging standard to satisfy. Thus, while ideally there should be a better flow in the FC s 9(3) test as a whole between an initial examination of prejudice and later questions of disadvantage (elucidated by looking at impact and context),

[1] See T Loenen 'The Equality Clause in South Africa: Some Remarks from a Comparative Perspective' (1997) 13 SAJHR 401; C O'Regan 'Equality at Work and the Limits of the Law: Symmetry and Individualism in Anti-Discrimination Law' (1994) Acta Juridica 64.

[2] See C Albertyn 'Equality' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 4-46 — 4-47.

[3] Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC)('Walker') at para 113. Sachs J, while correct to require prejudice, seems to require a demonstration of disadvantage at this stage rather than at the unfairness stage. See C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Facing the Challenge of Transformation: Difficulties in the Development of an Indigenous Jurisprudence of Equality' (1998) 14 SAJHR 248, 268-269 ('Facing the Challenge').

[4] For further discussion of direct and indirect discrimination, see § 35.5*(c)* infra.

[5] S Jagwanth 'What is the Difference? Group Categorization in Pretoria City Council v Walker' (1999) 15 SAJHR 200, 204.

[6] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Home Affairs 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC)('NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs') at paras 32-40.

the test is capable of resulting in an appropriate substantive equality analysis. Arguably, the broad reach of the first step of the test has the benefit of not excluding people who deserve their 'day in court'. The overall test for unfair discrimination provides a mechanism for courts to examine the complexities of cases that come before them and produce just results.

The other issue that is important at the first stage of the FC s 9(3) enquiry is the proper definition of the group affected by the discrimination. Falling within a listed ground enables a group to get through step one without anything further. It also provides access to the presumption of unfairness in FC s 9(4).[1] In Hugo, the male prisoner was unsuccessful because the majority of the Court saw him as part of the group of privileged fathers rather than as a primary care-giver or a disadvantaged father within the broader group of privileged fathers.[2] The need to understand the context of discrimination is therefore important for the purpose of steps 1 and 2 of the FC s 9(3) test. As Jagwanth has pointed out, a proper contextual enquiry at the discrimination stage of the test will allow for a substantive approach to equality where comparisons between groups are understood within the social context of unequal power and hierarchies.[3] It should also be noted that, while equality is a comparative concept, substantive equality enables one to move away from a rigid analytical framework. Thus, in an infamous US decision, pregnancy was equated to disability and, since male workers were not entitled to disability leave, the court denied female workers any entitlement to pregnancy leave. This type of formalism takes the idea of a comparator to an illogical extreme and fails to acknowledge the historical, contextual and even biological factors involved in an evaluation of discrimination.[4]

The Court has said that intention on the part of the alleged discriminator is not relevant to the enquiry as to whether there has been discrimination. It must be determined objectively in light of the facts of each case.[5] Considerations of intention may arise at the fairness stage (step 2 of the test) and in relation to justification (step 3 of the test).

Discrimination can arise where there is an offending act or where there is a failure to act that in itself causes discrimination. The failure to take measures to assist a disadvantaged group such as the lack of sign language interpreters in hospitals can result in a finding of discrimination.[6] There is some debate as to

[1] The choice of ground can also affect remedy. For example, in NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs, the Court decided the issue on the ground of sexual orientation, thus limiting the remedy to same sex couples. Had they decided that there was unfair marital status discrimination against non-spouses, heterosexual domestic partners might also have benefited. See Albertyn 'Equality' (supra) at 4-46. For more on remedies, see M Bishop, M Chaskalson, S Budlender & J Klaaren 'Remedies' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2007) Chapter 9.

[2] Albertyn & Goldblatt 'Facing the Challenge' (supra) at 264-65.

[3] Jagwanth (supra) at 205.

[4] See Law v Canada [1999] 1 SCR 497 at para 58, cited in Albertyn 'Equality' (supra) at 4-49 — 4-50.

[5] See Walker (supra) at para 43; Harksen (supra) at para 47.

[6] See Eldridge v A-G of British Columbia (1997) 151 DLR (4th) 577 (SCC).

whether our equality right can be used to require the state to provide services where none exist.[1]

In the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence to date, there has been little dispute over the issue of proof of discrimination, both in relation to the question whether there has been discrimination at all, and also whether, if so, such discrimination is based on a prohibited ground. In discrimination law more widely (both labour claims in South Africa and general discrimination claims elsewhere) these issues have been strongly contested. There have, however, been two cases, NCGLE v Home Affairs and Jordan v The State, in which the Constitutional Court has touched on these issues. These decisions provide some insight as to how disputes about whether there was discrimination and its relationship to the ground might be resolved.

In Jordan, the very fact of the legislative distinction was in dispute. Did the provision that criminalized sex work differentiate between sex workers and their clients? It was argued by the state that it did not, since the provision criminalized the conduct of both sex worker and client.[2] The majority accepted that there may be a distinction, but found against the complainant on the relationship of the distinction to the ground, ie that there was no discrimination on the basis of gender. The minority judgment addressed the criteria for the proper interpretation of the provision[3] by looking at issues of statutory interpretation as well as the context in which the provision operated.[4] The minority's approach led to a finding that the provision did differentiate between sex worker and client, and that this differentation amounted to gender discrimination.

In National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs, the state sought to argue that the exclusion of gay and lesbian partners from certain benefits was not discrimination based on sexual orientation, but discrimination based on the fact that these partners were 'non-spouses'. The Constitutional Court went to some lengths to show how meanings of 'spouse' were based on harmful exclusions of gay and lesbian people. This more contextual approach stands in contrast to that of the majority in Jordan.

It is likely that these issues will be further contested where more complicated claims of intersectional or indirect discrimination are asserted. The courts should adopt a substantive rather than mechanical approach to the issue of whether there has been discrimination.

[1] See S Fredman 'Providing Equality: Substantive Equality and the Positive Duty to Provide' (2005) 21 SAJHR 163.

[2] Jordan & Others v S & Others 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC)('Jordan') at paras 8 and 40.

[3] Note that this aspect of the judgement does not seem to be contested by the majority, who agree with the finding that there is such a distinction. Ibid at para 8.

[4] Ibid at paras 41-44.

(c) 'Directly or indirectly'

The prohibition in FC s 9(3) and (4) applies to both 'direct' and 'indirect' unfair discrimination. Direct discrimination occurs where a provision specifically differentiates on the basis of a listed or unlisted ground. For example, the common law definition of marriage specifically referred to 'a man and a woman' and thus discriminated directly against same-sex couples on the ground of sexual orientation. Indirect discrimination occurs where differentiation appears to be neutral and hence benign but has the effect of discriminating on a prohibited ground, whether listed or unlisted. For example, where a measure that treats people in one geographical area differently from people in another area is really based on the fact that white people live in the one area while black people live in the other, indirect discrimination on the basis of race may have occurred. In Walker, the Court noted that the reference in the right to direct and indirect discrimination reflected a concern for the 'consequences' rather than the 'form' of the conduct. This approach was consistent with the Walker Court's desire to uncover the impact of discrimination.[1]

In Jordan, the majority's failure to consider the substantive issues of sex work prevented it from understanding the challenged law as indirect gender discrimination. In particular, the majority failed to see the criminalization of the conduct of the sex worker (usually a woman) but not of the client (usually a man) as indirect gender discrimination. The Court did not go beyond the wording of the gender-neutral legislation to look at the different realities of its impact on men and women. This refusal to look at different realities indicates an inability to understand the social context of sex work and the unequal gender relations in society that shape this occupation. The minority reached the opposite conclusion with a more context-sensitive interpretation of the legislation. O'Regan and Sachs JJ looked beyond the statute, which made no distinction between male and female sex workers or clients, to the actual circumstances of sex work in South Africa. In this way they were able to challenge the stereotyped assumption that female sex workers are to blame for selling themselves rather than the men who 'create the demand for it'.[2] As a general matter, however, we would suggest that the distinction between direct and indirect discrimination is not especially significant since our jurisprudence focuses on the impact of the impugned law on the complainant and enables courts to look beneath any masked prejudice to discover the true face of discrimination.[3]

[1] Walker (supra) at paras 31-32.

[2] Jordan (supra) at para 65. For another, related, critique of Jordan, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44.

[3] Albertyn 'Equality' (supra) at 4-34 — 4-35.

(d) 'Anyone'

FC s 9(3) prohibits unfair discrimination against 'anyone'.[1] This raises the question whether the prohibition only applies to natural persons or also to corporations. While the unfairness test generally requires an impairment of dignity, which could not apply to non-humans, it also allows a claim to succeed where an adverse effect of a comparably serious manner is shown. Kentridge suggests that this may allow a corporation to show that it was subject to unfair discrimination on the basis of race if a law precluded black-owned companies from obtaining some benefit.[2] This test seems appropriately flexible and inclusive of possible scenarios where rights violations might occur.

(e) 'Including': unspecified grounds

FC s 9(3) prohibits unfair discrimination on a list of grounds but is careful to say 'including' before listing these grounds. This word clearly indicates that the list of grounds is not closed and that other grounds of unfair discrimination are possible. In respect of IC s 8(2), which stipulated that the listed grounds did not derogate from the generality of the provision, the Constitutional Court held that the list of grounds was not 'exhaustive'. Despite the absence of an express non-derogation provision, FC s 9(3) must be taken to include unspecified (also referred to as unlisted or analogous) grounds of discrimination. The fact that FC s 9(5) presumes discrimination on a listed ground to be unfair also strongly suggests that there can be discrimination on the basis of unspecified grounds (where the presumption would not apply).

The Court in Harksen explained how it sees the specified grounds:[3]

> What the specified grounds have in common is that they have been used (or misused) in the past (both in South Africa and elsewhere) to categorise, marginalise and often oppress persons who have had, or who have been associated with, these attributes or characteristics. These grounds have the potential, when manipulated, to demean persons in their inherent humanity and dignity. There is often a complex relationship between these grounds. In some cases they relate to immutable biological attributes or characteristics, in some to the associational life of humans, in some to the intellectual, expressive and religious dimensions of humanity and in some cases to a combination of one or more of these features. The temptation to force them into neatly self-contained categories should be resisted.

In the light of this understanding of specified grounds, the Court explained how the unspecified grounds must be determined:[4]

[1] FC s 9(4) similarly prohibits unfair discrimination by private persons.
[2] Kentridge 'Equality' (supra) at 14-48.
[3] Harksen (supra) at para 49.
[4] Ibid at para 46.

> There will be discrimination on an unspecified ground if it based on attributes or characteristics which have the potential to impair the fundamental dignity of persons as human beings, or to affect them adversely in a comparably serious manner.

Kentridge has pointed out that there is a similarity between the enquiry into whether differentiation on an unspecified ground amounts to discrimination and the unfairness enquiry since both consider the question of impairment of dignity. This is a somewhat problematic overlap since discrimination entails 'a demonstration of immediate harm that flows from differentiation' while the unfairness enquiry is a deeper exploration of the impact of the discrimination on the individual and her group.[1] The unspecified grounds enquiry looks generally at the group involved while there is more room in the unfairness enquiry to examine the specific complaint. The two enquiries have different objectives: the former distinguishes differentiation from discrimination while the latter has to determine whether a particular act of discrimination was unfair. The two enquiries are, however, related and may overlap somewhat.

The only difference between unspecified and listed grounds is that the former do not benefit from the presumption of unfairness in FC s 9(5).[2] The Court has also said that the enquiry into whether there has been differentiation on a listed or unspecified ground is an objective one.[3]

Under the Interim Constitution, marital status was not a listed ground. In both Brink and Harksen, O'Regan J found it to be an unspecified ground of discrimination.[4] This view was vindicated by the inclusion of the ground in the list of grounds in FC s 9(3).

The unspecified ground of 'citizenship' illustrates the application of the test. It has now been used in a number of cases where foreign nationals living in South Africa have been the subject of discrimination. Non-citizens are a classic vulnerable group who face xenophobia and even violence. This situation is likely to worsen as the number of immigrants increases and the desperation of those South Africans waiting for services grows. The equality right becomes a critical mechanism for this group to assert its entitlement to the promise of (most rights in) the Final Constitution. Both Larbi-Odam and Khosa offer positive examples of the courts' support for non-citizens. In Larbi-Odam, the Constitutional Court first recognized the ground of citizenship as an additional ground of unfair discrimination. In Larbi-Odam, Mokgoro J noted that 'foreign citizens are a minority in all countries, and have little political muscle'. She also said that citizenship is 'a personal attribute that is difficult to change'. The judge compared the experience of foreign citizens to the hardships suffered historically by black South Africans

[1] Albertyn 'Equality' (supra) at 4-49.

[2] For an interesting discussion of discrimination on the unlisted ground of appearance, see M Pieterse 'Discrimination through the Eye of the Beholder' (2000) 17 SAJHR 121.

[3] Harksen (supra) at para 47.

[4] Ibid at para 92.

living in Bantustan 'homelands' who were effectively denied their citizenship rights. Lastly, she referred to evidence of intimidation and exclusion of foreign teachers that indicated the vulnerability of the non-citizens in this case.[1]

Khosa reiterated the reasons set out in Larbi-Odam for treating citizenship as an unlisted ground of discrimination.[2] The judgment was significant in extending access to social grants to permanent residents. Williams notes, however, that courts must take care not to reinforce hierarchies of entitlement within the group of non-citizens, ie permanent residents, legal immigrants, refugees and illegal immigrants, in a way that deepens the vulnerability of the worst off.[3]

In Hoffman, the Court found there to be discrimination on the basis of HIV status. It said the following:[4]

> The appellant is living with HIV. People who are living with HIV constitute a minority. Society has responded to their plight with intense prejudice. They have been subjected to systemic disadvantage and discrimination. They have been stigmatised and marginalised. As the present case demonstrates, they have been denied employment because of their HIV positive status without regard to their ability to perform the duties of the position from which they have been excluded. Society's response to them has forced many of them not to reveal their HIV status for fear of prejudice. This in turn has deprived them of the help they would otherwise have received. People who are living with HIV/AIDS are one of the most vulnerable groups in our society. Notwithstanding the availability of compelling medical evidence as to how this disease is transmitted, the prejudices and stereotypes against HIV positive people still persist. In view of the prevailing prejudice against HIV positive people, any discrimination against them can, to my mind, be interpreted as a fresh instance of stigmatisation and I consider this to be an assault on their dignity. The impact of discrimination on HIV positive people is devastating. It is even more so when it occurs in the context of employment. It denies them the right to earn a living. For this reason they enjoy special protection in our law. (footnotes omitted)

HIV status was included in the list of additional grounds for possible inclusion in s 34 of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 (PEPUDA) and is obviously of great importance in a country such as South Africa where millions of people are living with HIV/AIDS.

There has been some debate over whether the dignity-based test for additional grounds can be extended to include groups whose vulnerability arises from their material disadvantage.[5] In Khosa, while the ground of citizenship was used to

[1] Larbi-Odam & Others v Member of the Executive Council for Education & Another 1998 (1) SA 745 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1655 (CC) at paras 19-20.

[2] Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Another v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) SA 569 (CC) at para 71.

[3] See L Williams 'Issues and Challenges in Addressing Poverty and Legal Rights: A Comparative United States/South Africa Analysis' (2005) 21 SAJHR 436, 468. For the Constitutional Court's views on refugees as a group discriminated against in relation to citizens and permanent residents, see Union of Refugee Women v The Director: The Private Security Industry Regulatory Authority CCT 39/06 Unreported judgment 12 December 2006) at para 45.

[4] Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC) at para 28.

[5] See Albertyn 'Equality' (supra) at 4-43 — 4-44.

assist this group, the poverty and related vulnerability of this group were also stressed in the judgment. The test for unlisted grounds, while focusing on dignity impairments, arguably has scope to include other forms of disadvantage. As set out above, the Court uses dignity as a primary criterion but also asks whether an adverse effect 'in a comparably serious manner' should be examined to decide whether a group was discriminated against on an unlisted ground. PEPUDA includes socio-economic status, like HIV status, as an additional ground to be considered for inclusion in the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination. The next ten years may witness cases being brought by people who feel that they have been left behind during South Africa's recent and significant economic expansion. Appropriate claims of discrimination on the grounds of poverty or socio-economic status should be considered by our courts.[1]

(f) 'On one or more grounds'

The phrase 'on one or more grounds' indicates that discrimination can be based on a listed or unlisted ground on its own, or with other listed or unlisted grounds. In Brink, O'Regan J made it clear that even where two grounds were implicated in a case, it was enough to make a finding on the basis of only one of the grounds.[2] The Court in NCGLE v Home Affairs also pointed to the existence of 'overlapping' and 'intersecting' grounds of discrimination.[3] Sachs J in NCGLE v Minister of Justice gave detailed consideration to this issue. His starting point was that

> [R]ights must fit the people, not the people the rights. This requires looking at rights and their violations from a persons-centred rather than a formula-based position, and analysing them contextually rather than abstractly.[4]

He further noted that:

> One consequence of an approach based on context and impact would be the acknowledgment that grounds of unfair discrimination can intersect, so that the evaluation of discriminatory impact is done not according to one ground of discrimination or another, but on a combination of both, that is globally and contextually, not separately and abstractly. The objective is to determine in a qualitative rather than a quantitative way if the group concerned is subjected to scarring of a sufficiently serious nature as to merit constitutional intervention. Thus, black foreigners in South Africa might be subject to discrimination in a way that foreigners generally, and blacks as a rule, are not; it could in certain circumstances be a fatal combination. The same might possibly apply to unmarried mothers, or homosexual parents, where nuanced rather than categorical approaches would

[1] These grounds will in all likelihood often overlap with other listed grounds such as race, gender and age or other unlisted grounds such as citizenship and landlessness.

[2] Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 43.

[3] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Home Affairs 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) at para 40.

[4] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) ('NCGLE v Minister of Justice') at para 112.

> be appropriate. Alternatively, a context rather than category-based approach might suggest that overlapping vulnerability is capable of producing overlapping discrimination. A notorious example would be African widows, who historically have suffered discrimination as blacks, as Africans, as women, as African women, as widows and usually, as older people, intensified by the fact that they are frequently amongst the lowest paid workers.[1]

This discussion concerns the issue of what commentators in other jurisdictions have referred to as intersectional grounds of discrimination.[2] An example is where a company employs only black men and white women, with the result that black women fall through the cracks as a separate category of people who fail to benefit from positive measures to advance previously disadvantaged work seekers. An interesting question is whether intersectional grounds of discrimination based on existing grounds result in the creation of a new unlisted ground or are treated as the combination of listed grounds. This is an important distinction since listed grounds benefit from the presumption of unfairness in FC s 9(5) while discrimination on the basis of unlisted grounds does not. It is suggested that the presumption should benefit the new category of discrimination where existing listed grounds are implicated. This expansive interpretation is based on the word 'one or more grounds' in FC s 9(3) and the view that rights should be interpreted in favour of those complaining of violations.

The other possibility contained in anti-discrimination law is the existence of multiple forms of discrimination. Here, a single legislative provision may result in discrimination that affects more than one group.[3] For example, a law prohibiting polygamous unions might discriminate against Muslim people on the ground of religion and against African people on the ground of culture.

A contextual approach requires that different layers of disadvantage be teased out and addressed in their full complexity. Sachs J refers (in a footnote to the above quote) to the view of L'Heureux-Dubé in Egan v Canada:

> In reality, it is no longer the 'grounds' that are dispositive of the question of whether discrimination exists, but the social context of the distinction that matters. (C)ontext is of primary importance and that abstract 'grounds of distinction' are simply an indirect method to achieve a goal which could be achieved more simply and truthfully by asking the direct question: 'Does this distinction discriminate against this group of people?'.[4]

[1] NCGLE v Minster of Justice (supra) at para 113.

[2] K Crenshaw 'Demarginalizing the Intersection of Race and Sex: A Black Feminist Critique of Antidiscrimination Doctrine, Feminist Theory and Antiracist Politics' (1989) University of Chicago Legal Forum 139; N Iyer 'Categorical Denials: Equality Rights and the Shaping of Social Identity' (1993) 19 Queen's Law Journal 179.

[3] Albertyn 'Equality' (supra) at 4-45 — 4-46.

[4] (1995) 29 CRR (2d) 79, 120.

While the Constitutional Court may not be ready to abandon grounds completely as suggested here, it has thus far taken a relatively expansive and contextual approach to both the listed and unlisted grounds. However, it has been argued that the Court has not always been clear of the difference between multiple and intersectional discrimination, leading to the outcome in Hugo that favoured mothers rather than fathers because of an inability to understand the complexities of sex and gender for primary care-giver fathers.[1]

(g) Grounds of discrimination

FC s 9(3) prohibits unfair discrimination on a list of grounds. This list also applies to FC s 9(4) and (5).[2] The grounds were discussed by the Constitutional Court in Harksen in a passage quoted earlier. The passage is worth repeating here:

> [T]hey have been used (or misused) in the past (both in South Africa and elsewhere) to categorise, marginalise and often oppress persons who have had, or who have been associated with, these attributes or characteristics. These grounds have the potential, when manipulated, to demean persons in their inherent humanity and dignity. There is often a complex relationship between these grounds. In some cases they relate to immutable biological attributes or characteristics, in some to the associational life of humans, in some to the intellectual, expressive and religious dimensions of humanity and in some cases to a combination of one or more of these features. The temptation to force them into neatly self-contained categories should be resisted. Section 8(2) seeks to prevent the unequal treatment of people based on such criteria which may, amongst other things, result in the construction of patterns of disadvantage such as has occurred only too visibly in our history.[3]

While there were slight changes to the list between the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution, the Constitutional Court's conceptual understanding of the grounds has remained consistent. Most of the cases that have come to court have been decided on the basis of a small number of listed grounds: race, gender, marital status and sexual orientation. It is not surprising that in post-apartheid South Africa there would be race discrimination challenges. The challenges based on gender and sexual orientation reflect to some extent the role of two key social movements — the women's movement and the gay and lesbian equality campaign — both of which have used the courts actively in their struggles. As rights awareness becomes more deeply entrenched, challenges on the basis of other grounds are likely to come to court.

[1] See Albertyn 'Equality' (supra) at 4-45 — 4-46.
[2] See § 35.6 - § 35.7 infra.
[3] Harksen v Lane NO 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 49.

(i) Race and colour

South Africa's history of apartheid makes race a central category in understanding discrimination. 'Non-racialism' is included alongside 'non-sexism' as a founding value in FC s 1*(b)*. The Constitutional Court has repeatedly referred to this unjust history and the need to remove discriminatory laws. O'Regan J, in Harksen, said the following:

> Our history is of particular relevance to the concept of equality. The policy of apartheid, in law and in fact, systematically discriminated against black people in all aspects of social life. Black people were prevented from becoming owners of property or even residing in areas classified as 'white', which constituted nearly 90% of the landmass of South Africa; senior jobs and access to established schools and universities were denied to them; civic amenities, including transport systems, public parks, libraries and many shops were also closed to black people. Instead, separate and inferior facilities were provided. The deep scars of this appalling programme are still visible in our society. It is in the light of that history and the enduring legacy that it bequeathed that the equality clause needs to be interpreted.[1]

Race discrimination occurs where physical attributes associated with a particular race group are used to prejudice the group or its individual members.[2] In South Africa's racist past, racial categories were explicitly defined as including African, coloured, Asian and white and these categories continue to shape people's thinking and people's experiences of disadvantage. Colour discrimination is less familiar to South Africans but is closely tied to discrimination on the basis of race. In the USA, there is some recognition of discrimination on the basis of a person's skin tone within a racial group.[3] Those persons with lighter skins may be given preference over those with darker skins. Discrimination against albinos may fall into this category, and simultaneously intersect with disability discrimination.

The Constitutional Court has decided a number of cases dealing with race discrimination: Walker,[4] Bel Porto School Governing Body v Premier, Western Cape,[5]

[1] Harksen (supra) at para 40.

[2] For a more detailed discussion of 'racialism' see M Pieterse 'It's a Black Thing: Upholding Culture and Customary Law in a Society Founded on Non-racialism' (2001) 17 SAJHR 364, 365-67.

[3] See T Jones 'Shades of Brown: The Law of Skin Colour' (2000) 49 Duke Law Journal 1487.

[4] Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) at para 81 (The case concerned a complaint against alleged differential treatment by the Pretoria City Council. The Council's policy saw residents of a formerly white suburb paying metered rates for municipal services while residents of the adjacent, formerly black township paid a flat rate. The Constitutional Court said that there was race discrimination (albeit indirect) but that it was not unfair as the flat rate was the only practical response to the immediate post-apartheid situation. In the second part of the case, however, the Court held that the Council's differential debt collection policy constituted unfair discrimination. However, Sachs J, in dissent, found that the selective enforcement of debts by the Council was not unfair race discrimination.)

[5] 2002 (3) SA 265 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC)(The Court in found that the distinction between previously black and white schools did not result in unfair race discrimination.)

Moseneke[1] and Bhe.[2] In two cases, the Constitutional Court found there to be unfair discrimination on the basis of unlisted grounds that were closely associated with race.[3]

As the legal remnants of apartheid dwindle, fewer cases of this (formal equality) type are likely to reach the courts: although indirect race discrimination cases may continue for as long as the social and material legacy of past racism remains. Challenges to affirmative action cases dealing with issues of race brought under FC s 9(2) may well increase as previously advantaged groups question the continued existence of positive measures.[4] It is also likely that a number of race discrimination cases will be brought under the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act (PEPUDA), rather than FC s 9, because it is expressly designed to cover issues of racism and inequality in daily life.

(ii) Sex, gender and pregnancy

Many national constitutions refer only to sex as a ground of discrimination. The Final Constitution's expansive list of grounds provides for sex and gender discrimination as well as pregnancy discrimination, a category often subsumed under sex.[5] The Constitutional Court tends to use sex and gender interchangeably in the relatively large number of cases it has considered on these grounds. Sex is generally taken to mean the biological differences between men and women, while gender is the term used to describe the socially and culturally constructed differences between men and women. Pregnancy is one of the most common biological

[1] Moseneke v Master of the High Court 2001 (2) SA 18 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 103 (CC) at para 21 (In this case a section of the Black Administration Act treating the administration of the estates of black people differently from that of others in the country was declared to be unfair race discrimination on the basis of race, colour and ethnic origin.) See also Ex Parte Western Cape Provincial Government; In Re: DVB Behuising (Pty) Ltd v North West Provincial Government 2001 (1) SA 500 (CC), 2000 (4) BCLR 347 (CC)(On the racist history of the Black Administration Act and its predecessors.)

[2] Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at paras 60-68 (The case concerned, among other issues, a challenge to succession provisions under the Black Administration Act and to the customary law of male primogeniture. The offending section of the Act was found to constitute unfair race discrimination.)

[3] See Mabaso v Law Society of the Northern Provinces & Another 2005 (2) SA 117 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 129 (CC) at para 38 (Concerned a challenge to legislation that prevented attorneys admitted in a former 'homeland' from being allowed to enrol in the same way as other 'non-homeland' attorneys were allowed to do. The Court found there to be unfair discrimination on the basis of the unlisted ground of those covered by former 'homeland' legislation. This difference was clearly informed by past racist measures.) See also Zondi v Member of the Executive Council for Traditional and Local Government Affairs 2005 (3) SA 589 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 347 (CC) at paras 94-96 (The Court found there to be unfair discrimination on the basis of landlessness as well as race. The High Court had found there to be discrimination on the basis of colour and landownership since franchise, which was racially determined, and land ownership were qualifications in the challenged legislation. The Constitutional Court understood landlessness as having been shaped by racism.)

[4] For further discussion of FC s 9(2), see § 35.4 supra.

[5] See § 35.5*(g)*(iii) infra.

attributes of women used to deny them opportunities. But while some aspects of human reproduction are confined of necessity to women, many other components of child rearing are defined by society as 'women's work' because of underlying patriarchal assumptions.[1] Fraser highlighted the fact that men may suffer unfair gender discrimination where sexist cultural assumptions prevent them from participating in child care.[2]

The Constitutional Court has pointed to the deeply entrenched gender inequalities in our society that cause harm to women. Such harm may sometimes be more insidious than race discrimination, and, thus, they are equally unacceptable.[3] In Brink, the Court drew attention to the relationship between race and gender discrimination which results in black women in South Africa facing particularly acute barriers to advancement. Many of the gender discrimination cases overlap with marital status discrimination cases since a number of laws have treated — and still treat — married women differently from married men.[4]

(aa) Women's property

Historically, married women have had legal restrictions placed on their contractual capacity and their right to own and control property independently of men. One of the last vestiges of this position — the unfairly discriminatory effect of insurance laws on wives — was considered in Brink. The assumption underlying the law was that the defrauding of creditors could be avoided if wives were unable to benefit fully from a policy. However, the law did not cover situations where a husband might similarly attempt to defraud creditors. The Constitutional Court found unfair discrimination based on sex.[5]

Harksen concerned a challenge to insolvency laws that affected the rights of insolvent spouses.[6] The majority found there not to be any unfair discrimination. The minority opinion of O'Regan J, however, found there to be unfair discrimination based on marital status: such unfair discrimination was characterized as a form of sex discrimination encountered by married women.

Bhe found the customary law rule of primogeniture to be unfair discrimination on the basis of gender.[7] The minority decision concluded that there was also

[1] See President of the RSA & Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at paras 37-39.

[2] Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North & Others 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC) at para 25 (While Mohamed DP found the distinction between fathers married in terms of Muslim law and those married in terms of customary law to be the primary basis for a finding of unfair discrimination, he also noted the unfair gender discrimination between unmarried mothers and fathers.)

[3] Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC)('Brink') at paras 41 and 44 (O'Regan J); Volks NO v Robinson & Others 2005 (5) BCLR 446 (CC) at paras 163-64 (Sachs J).

[4] On marital status, see § 35.5*(g)*(iii) infra.

[5] Brink (supra) at paras 43-44.

[6] Harksen v Lane NO 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC).

[7] Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha and Others; Shibi v Sithole and Others; SAHRC & Another v President of the RSA &Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe').

discrimination based on age and birth, but found that such discrimination was justifiable. The discrimination based on gender could not be justified.[1]

Volks dealt with the rights of unmarried domestic partners and was decided on the basis of marital status discrimination. However, the majority offered the following gloss on the issue of gender inequality with regard to women's property in intimate partnerships:

> Structural dependence of women in marriage and in relationships of heterosexual unmarried couples is a reality in our country and in other countries. Many women become economically dependent on men and are left destitute and suffer hardships on the death of their male partners … Women remain generally less powerful in these relationships. They often wish to be married, but the nature of the power relations within the relationship makes a translation of that wish into reality difficult. This is because the more powerful participants in the relationship would not agree to be bound by marriage. The consequences are that women are taken advantage of and the essential contributions by women to a joint household through labour and emotional support is not compensated for.[2]

(bb) Women's bodies

Women face domestic violence and rape on a dramatic scale in South Africa. This violence is directly linked to women's unequal position in society and the prevalent social belief that women are required to submit to their fathers, husbands and other men in their lives. Women's control over their bodies relates also to their reproductive rights and their decision to engage in sex work. While other constitutional provisions such as the right to freedom and security of the person in FC s 12 are implicated in some cases concerning women's physical rights, there is a close link to the right to equality and the prohibition of unfair sex and gender discrimination. The Constitutional Court has recognized the prevalence of violence against women in South Africa and has stressed the need to ensure that the law assists women in protecting them from such violence. In Carmichele, the Court recognized that violence against women was an obstacle to their enjoyment of all of their fundamental rights and freedoms:[3]

> In addressing these obligations in relation to dignity and the freedom and security of the person, few things can be more important to women than freedom from the threat of sexual violence. As it was put by counsel on behalf of the amicus curiae: 'Sexual violence and the threat of sexual violence goes to the core of women's subordination in society. It is the single greatest threat to the self-determination of South African women.'

[1] Bhe (supra) at para 179-191.

[2] Volks (supra) at paras 63-64. The minority opinion of O'Regan and Mokgoro JJ and the minority opinion of Sachs J link marital status discrimination to gender discrimination.

[3] Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC) at para 62. See also S v Baloyi 2000 (2) SA 425 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 86 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 81 (CC)(Court's response to a challenge to the Prevention of Family Violence Act 133 of 1993); Omar v Government of the RSA 2006 (2) SA 289 (CC), 2006 (2) BCLR 253 (CC)(Court entertains a challenge to the Domestic Violence Act 116 of 1998.); Masiya v Director of Public Prosecutions (Pretoria) & Others (Centre for Applied Legal Studies and Tshwaranang Legal Advocacy Centre as Amici Curiae) CCT 54/06 judgment of 10 May 2007 (as yet unreported)(Court extended the common-law definition of rape to include anal penetration of females, but refused to extend its reach to males.)

The Court referred, in that context, to the following statement by the Supreme Court of Appeal in S v Chapman:

> The courts are under a duty to send a clear message to the accused, to other potential rapists and to the community. We are determined to protect the equality, dignity and freedom of all women, and we shall show no mercy to those who seek to invade those rights.[1]

In Van der Merwe, the Constitutional Court considered the position of people married in community of property to recover delictual patrimonial benefits from damages arising from bodily injury inflicted by a spouse.[2] The complainant had been seriously injured when her husband intentionally rode over her in his car. The Court considered gender discrimination arguments, but made no finding under FC s 9(3) since the case could be disposed of in terms FC s 9(1).[3] The Court did however note the following:

> There is no doubt that in our society domestic violence and economic vulnerability are gendered in nature. Both are a sad sequel to patriarchy. Women are more likely to fall victim to the battery, abuse or negligent driving of their domestic partner than otherwise and are therefore more likely to be non-suited for patrimonial damages than their husbands. Even more demeaning is that victims of domestic and other violence within marriages in community of property would have to solicit their abuser's consent to meet medical and other bills or to make up loss of earnings out of the joint estate. Moreover, in these circumstances third party insurers, if any, are not liable to reimburse the injured spouse or the joint estate. In this way, the burden of abuse and economic dependency becomes mutually reinforcing and most intolerable.[4]

The issue of sex work and its relationship to gender discrimination arose in Jordan. The equality challenge was that the law criminalizing sex work treated the sex worker, usually female, more harshly than the customer, usually male. The majority of the Constitutional Court rejected these challenges: holding that there was no unfair sex or gender discrimination as the legislation was 'gender-neutral' in that it applied to male and female sex workers and customers. By contrast, and in a more contextual judgment, the minority found there to be unfair gender discrimination.

The ground of pregnancy discrimination has not been considered by the Constitutional Court. It was considered by the Labour Appeal Court in Woolworths v Whitehead. The court upheld the appellant's failure to employ a pregnant applicant.[5] It is also an issue that arises in relation to pregnant learners in the education

[1] 1997 (3) SA 341, 345 C-D (A), quoted in Carmichele (supra) at para 62.
[2] Van der Merwe v Road Accident Fund 2006 (4) 2 SA 230 (CC), 2006 (6) BCLR 682 (CC)('Van der Merwe').
[3] See § 35.3*(a)*(ii) supra.
[4] Van der Merwe (supra) at para 67.
[5] Woolworths (Pty) Ltd v Whitehead 2000 (12) BCLR 1340 (LAC).

system.[1] While pregnant women elsewhere in the world have sometimes struggled to succeed in equality claims, the existence of this ground within a strong equality right means South African women are more likely to be assisted by the courts.

(cc) Women, men and children

The Constitutional Court has considered the relationship between men and their children in two important FC s 9(3) cases.[2] As discussed above, Fraser was brought by an unmarried father who opposed the lack of consent afforded to him in the adoption of his child. The Fraser Court recognized that the existence of a marriage might have little to do with whether or not a father involved himself with his children.[3] The Court also stressed the 'deep disadvantage experienced by the single mothers in our society'.[4]

Hugo concerned a challenge to a presidential pardon that favoured women with young children but excluded fathers. The majority found that there was no unfair discrimination against such fathers. The Hugo Court said that:[5]

> As many fathers play only a secondary role in child rearing, the release of male prisoners would not have contributed as significantly to the achievement of the President's purpose as the release of mothers.

The various judgments of the Hugo Court debated the interesting strategic issue of whether the lack of involvement of fathers in their children's lives should be punished by the law or whether the law should be used to encourage a greater involvment.

(dd) Critical responses to the Court's gender equality jurisprudence

A number of writers have evaluated the first decade of the Constitutional Court's gender equality judgments.[6] The Court has been commended for acknowledging feminist theory as an aid to the proper interpretation of the Final Constitution. The Court has referred to a public/private divide that has the effect of silencing women's claims in the home and other spheres of life considered 'private'.[7] It

[1] See M O'Sullivan 'Reproductive Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 37.4.

[2] The Court has acknowledged the gender inequalities within the judicial maintenance system where mothers depend on the financial assistance of fathers to look after children in their custody. See Bannatyne v Bannatyne 2003 (2) SA 363 (CC), 2003 (2) BCLR 111 (CC)('Bannatyne') at paras 27-30.

[3] Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North & Others 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC)('Fraser') at para 26.

[4] Ibid at para 44.

[5] President of the RSA & Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC)('Hugo') at para 46.

[6] C Albertyn (2005) 'Defending and Securing Rights through Law: Feminism, Law and the Courts in South Africa' (2005) 32(2) Politikon 217 ('Defending and Securing'); E Bonthuys (2007) 'Institutional Openness and Resistance to Feminist Arguments: The Example of the South African Constitutional Court' Canadian Journal of Women and the Law (forthcoming); S Jagwanth 'Expanding Equality' in C Murray & M O'Sullivan (eds) Advancing Women's Rights (2005) 131; Saras Jagwanth & Christina Murray 'No Nation Can Be Free When One Half of It is Enslaved: Constitutional Equality for Women in South Africa' in B Baines & R Rubio-Marin The Gender of Constitutional Jurisprudence (2005) 230.

[7] For more on this point, and the Court's views in S v Baloyi, see Albertyn 'Defending and Securing' (supra) at 225-226.

has acknowledged that there is a sexual division of labour that burdens women with child care and household responsibilities.[1] And it has recognized that the feminization of poverty results when families break down and women are usually left with the responsibility for children and consequent greater financial difficulties. In Bannatyne, Mokgoro J considered the administrative problems of the judicial maintenance system and said the following:

> Compounding these logistical difficulties is the gendered nature of the maintenance system. The material shows that on the breakdown of a marriage or similar relationship it is almost always mothers who become the custodial parent and have to care for the children. This places an additional financial burden on them and inhibits their ability to obtain remunerative employment. Divorced or separated mothers accordingly face the double disadvantage of being overburdened in terms of responsibilities and under-resourced in terms of means. Fathers, on the other hand, remain actively employed and generally become economically enriched. Maintenance payments are therefore essential to relieve this financial burden.
>
> These disparities undermine the achievement of gender equality which is a founding value of the Constitution. The enforcement of maintenance payments therefore not only secures the rights of children, it also upholds the dignity of women and promotes the foundational values of achieving equality and non-sexism. Fatalistic acceptance of the insufficiencies of the maintenance system compounds the denial of rights involved. Effective mechanisms for the enforcement of maintenance obligations are thus essential for the simultaneous achievement of the rights of the child and the promotion of gender equality.[2]

While some of the Court's decisions have taken account of the context of women's lives and the multiple burdens that arise in South Africa's patriarchal society, some commentators point to a disappointing failure by the majority of the Court in Jordan and Volks. These decisions both resulted in a refusal to assist two categories of disadvantaged women — sex workers and unmarried cohabitants. Ultimately, a deferential approach was followed where the legislature was seen as 'knowing what it was doing' (Jordan) or 'needing to improve the situation' (Volks). In Jordan, the majority failed to heed the Court's own jurisprudence by not looking into the private sphere of sexuality, ignoring context and reinforcing harmful stereotypes.[3] In Volks, the majority again resorted to a formal equality approach and moral conservatism.[4] These decisions point to the possibility that a substantive interpretation of FC s 9 with regard to gender equality is not always

[1] See Jagwanth & Murray (supra) at 245 (On Hugo.) See also Volks (supra) at para 110 (O'Regan and Mokgoro JJ on the gendered division of labour.)

[2] Bannatyne (supra) at paras 29-30.

[3] See Albertyn 'Defending and Securing' (supra) at 228-9. See also D Meyerson 'Does the Constitutional Court of South Africa Take Rights Seriously? The Case of S v Jordan' (2004) Acta Juridica 138-54 (Both majority and minority judgments are criticised for failing to follow a high standard of justification where constitutional rights are at stake.) See also R Kruger 'Sex Work From a Feminist Perspective: A Visit To the Jordan Case' (2004) SAJHR 20, 138-50.

[4] See Albertyn 'Defending and Securing' (supra) at 229-30. See also Jagwanth 'Expanding Equality' (supra) at 135–36; C Lind 'Domestic Partnerships and Marital Status Discrimination' (2005) Acta Juridica 108.

understood or applied adequately by all of the judges on the Court. Gender issues seem to test many ideas around prejudice and stereotyping that seem less complex when seen through the prism of race.

(iii) Marital status

The ground of marital status was not included in the Interim Constitution. It is a listed ground in the Final Constitution. In Brink, which was brought under the Interim Constitution, the ground of marital status was recognized but not considered since the Court felt the case could be decided with reference only to sex discrimination.[1] In Harksen, also decided under the Interim Constitution, O'Regan J, in dissent, wrote that marital status was a ground of discrimination. She said:

> I agree that marital status is a matter of significant importance to all individuals, closely related to human dignity and liberty. For most people, the decision to enter into a permanent personal relationship with another is a momentous and defining one. It requires related decisions concerning the nature of the relationship, its personal and proprietary consequences.[2]

As discussed under the grounds of sex and gender, there is often an overlap between discrimination affecting men and women and marital status discrimination. This overlap occurs because marital systems (civil, customary and religious) have historically contained provisions that give lesser rights and benefits to women.[3] Apartheid thinking also resulted in inequalities between marital systems, with the civil law system generally given preference over customary and religious systems.[4] Here, marital status discrimination overlaps with discrimination on the basis of race, religion and culture. There is also a frequent overlap between marital status and the ground of sexual orientation since same-sex couples have, until recently, been unable to marry.[5] Fourie contains a detailed discussion of the nature and benefits of marriage and why same-sex couples' exclusion from marriage is harmful.[6] The exclusion of unmarried partners from the benefits and consequences of marriage has also been raised as a source of marital status discrimination.[7] In Volks the exclusion of unmarried cohabitants from the

[1] Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 43.

[2] Harksen v Lane NO 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 92.

[3] Ibid at para 94 (O'Regan J). See also Daniels v Campbell NO 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC)('Daniels').

[4] Daniels (supra) at paras 19-20.

[5] For cases dealing with this overlap, see National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) at para 40; Du Toit & Another v Minister for Welfare and Population Development & Others 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1006 (CC) at para 26; J & Another v Director General, Department of Home Affairs & Others 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC) at para 13. For a discussion of the ground of sexual orientation, see § 35.3(g)(v) infra.

[6] Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie & Another; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC) at paras 63-74.

[7] Volks (supra) at para 49.

provisions of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act was held by the majority to be marital status discrimination but was not found to be unfair.[1] The court pointed to the importance of marriage as an institution and the choice provided to heterosexual couples to enter into marriage or remain outside of it. There is also a detailed discussion of marriage in the minority judgment of O'Regan and Mokgoro JJ that finds that the Act does discriminate unfairly against unmarried partners on the basis of marital status. The minority points to stigma facing such couples as well as a lack of legal protection and finds that cohabiting partners are a vulnerable group.[2]

There is a discussion of the scope of the ground of marital status discrimination in the case of Van der Merwe v Road Accident Fund. In Van der Merwe, a woman was intentionally injured by her husband. The Road Accident Fund argued that it did not have to pay for her patrimonial damages since she was married in community of property and the Matrimonial Property Act contains a provision that one spouse can not recover such damages from the other.[3] The injured woman challenged this provision on the basis that it unfairly discriminated against people married in community of property, as opposed to those married under other property regimes, on the ground of marital status. The Constitutional Court decided this case in terms of FC s 9(1) and thus found it unnecessary to decide the FC s 9(3) claims. Nevertheless, the Court made certain obiter statements about the ground of marital status.[4] The Court said that the existing jurisprudence on marital status related to 'protectable interests or disabilities of being married or not married'[5] and expressed doubt as to whether it could encompass a case where the 'law denies one class of married people a protection that another class enjoys'.[6] The Court seemed to reject the applicant's assertion that it should adopt a generous and expansive interpretation of marital status to encompass people covered by different property regimes within marriage. This position is somewhat at odds with the decision of the Court in Fraser. Mohamed DP found there to be unfair discrimination against fathers married in terms of Muslim law as opposed to fathers married in terms of customary law.[7] Thus, in Fraser, a distinction is drawn between the benefits afforded to those persons in one form of marriage and the denial of those same benefits to people married under another system. The Fraser Court did not expressly describe this distinction as 'marital status' discrimination.

[1] Act 27 of 1990.
[2] Volks (supra) at para 135.
[3] Act 88 of 1984.
[4] Van der Mewe (supra) at paras 45-47.
[5] Ibid at para 46.
[6] Ibid at para 45.
[7] Fraser (supra) at paras 21-23.

(iv) Ethnic or social origin

Discrimination on the basis of ethnic or social origin is closely related to race. Ethnic origin is taken to combine 'a biological group that shares a common descent, with a common cultural heritage and, sometimes, a territorial base'.[1] In South Africa, ethnicity was used under apartheid to further divide African people into 'homelands' and for other harmful purposes. Private bodies like the mining houses also segregated ethnic groups within their hostel system. Ethnicity was also used to stigmatize non-indigenous groups such as the Chinese, Malays and Indians. Thus far, the case law has raised 'ethnic origin' as a ground of discrimination in cases dealing with race discrimination.[2]

Social origin relates to ethnic origin where it concerns one's position in a particular clan or group. But it can also refer to one's position in a hierarchy within a family, tribe or other social group. It obviously intersects with age, gender and other categories that affect one's position and status within a particular social group. An international example of social origin discrimination is the caste system in India, which is the subject of efforts to address inequality through Indian anti-discrimination laws. This ground has not yet been considered by our courts.

Social origin discrimination is also used to describe the differential treatment of people on the basis of class. Here, it relates to the additional ground of 'socio-economic status' in s 34 of PEPUDA. Socio-economic status is defined in s 1 of the Act as including 'a social and economic condition or perceived condition of a person who is disadvantaged by poverty, low employment status or lack of or low-level educational qualifications'. In South Africa, class tends to correspond with race and gender in as much as Africans and women constitute the greatest proportion of the poor.[3]

Although Khosa, concerned the rights of non-citizens living in poverty to state support, Mokgoro J links the ground of citizenship to poverty in pointing out the need for the poor to be treated as equal members of society.[4] Social origin may also be linked to the ground of 'birth' since it may involve discriminating against a person because of their position or status in a family.

[1] C Albertyn, B Goldblatt & C Roederer (eds) Introduction to the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 (2001) 79-80.

[2] See Moseneke v Master of the High Court 2001 (2) SA 18 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 103 (CC) at paras 21-22, Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others; Shibi v Sithole & Others; SAHRC & Another v President of the RSA &Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 60-61; Mabaso v Law Society of the Northern Provinces & Another 2005 (2) SA 117 (CC), 2005 (2) BCLR 129 (CC).

[3] Poverty, race and gender might also be understood as intersecting grounds of discrimination. See S Fredman 'Providing Equality: Substantive Equality and the Positive Duty to Provide' (2005) 21 SAJHR 163, 182-5; M Jackman 'Constitutional Contact with the Disparities in the World: Poverty as a Prohibited Ground of Discrimination under the Canadian Charter and Human Rights Law' (1994) 2 Review of Constitutional Studies 76-122; B Goldblatt & S Liebenberg 'Achieving Substantive Equality in South Africa: The Relationship between Equality and Socio-Economic Rights' (2007)(forthcoming).

[4] Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Another v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) SA 569 (CC) at para 74. For a discussion of unspecified grounds, see § 35.5*(c)* supra.

(v) Sexual orientation

South African laws and social practices reflect a history of exclusion and marginalization of gays and lesbians. The ground of sexual orientation discrimination was included following intense lobbying in the constitution-writing process by gay and lesbian rights activists.[1] A large number of cases have been brought to the courts by organizations representing gay and lesbian interests and by individuals challenging sexual orientation discrimination. The organizations followed a carefully formulated litigation strategy starting with challenges to the criminal law (NCGLE v Minister of Justice) and moving to challenges to the status of gay and lesbian relationships (NCGLE v Home Affairs).[2] Satchwell, Du Toit and J, although brought by individuals rather than the movement, fit well into the strategy of including same-sex relationships within the benefits afforded to heterosexual spouses.[3] Fourie, which requires the state to legislate for same-sex marriage, is the culmination of a careful building-block approach that has placed South African law on the same advanced footing as a handful of other countries in the world with regard to the removal of sexual orientation discrimination.[4]

The sexual orientation judgments were relatively straightforward formal equality decisions since the legislative discrimination was so overtly unfair. One of the authors has argued that this series of cases is inclusive rather than transformatory since it allows gays and lesbians into the protected social institution of marriage without challenging the position of this institution in the wider idea of family in

[1] See C Stychin 'Constituting Sexuality: The Struggle for Sexual Orientation in the South African Bill of Rights' (1996) 23(4) Journal of Law and Society 455; S Croucher 'South Africa's Democratisation and the Politics of Gay Liberation' (2002) 28(2) Journal of Southern African Studies 315-330; R Louw 'A Decade of Gay and Lesbian Equality Litigation' in M du Plessis & S Pete (eds) Constitutional Democracy in South Africa 1994-2004 (2004) 65-79.

[2] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (1) BCLR 1517 (CC)('NCGLE v Minister of Justice')(Found the criminalisation of sodomy to be unfair discrimination); National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC)('NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs')(Found the failure to confer immigration benefits provided to spouses on permanent, same sex life partners to be unfairly discriminatory.)

[3] Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another 2003 (4) SA 266 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC)('Satchwell')(Unfair exclusion of same sex couples from the provisions of the Judges Remuneration and Conditions of Employment Act 88 of 1989); Du Toit & Another v Minister for Welfare and Population Development & Others 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1006 (CC)('Du Toit')(Finding provisions of the Child Care Act 74 of 1983 unconstitutional for limiting joint adoption to married people to the exclusion of same sex couples); J & Another v Director-General, Department of Home Affairs & Others 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC)('J').

[4] Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Others; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)('Fourie').

South African law.[1] However, she argues that inclusion does not preclude future transformation and may in fact 'assist in setting democratic norms that may eventually shift the social norms'.[2]

The Court has adopted the definition of 'sexual orientation' used by Edwin Cameron as defining people 'by reference to erotic attraction: in the case of heterosexuals, to members of the opposite sex; in the case of gays and lesbians, to members of the same sex'. [3] Ackermann J, in NCGLE v Minister of Justice, said that the concept of sexual orientation must be given a generous interpretation. It applied equally to bisexuals and transsexuals and even to the orientation of persons who might, on a single occasion only, be erotically attracted to a member of their own sex.[4] In NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs the Court described the impact of sexual orientation discrimination on gays and lesbians as denying their inherent dignity which 'insidiously degenerates into a denial of humanity and leads to inhuman treatment by the rest of society in many other ways'.[5]

(aa) Recognition of same-sex relationships: material benefits

Langemaat v Minister of Safety and Security concerned a successful claim by a police woman to have her partner registered on her medical aid.[6] Following the case, a new Medical Schemes Act was introduced which defines a dependant as a 'spouse or partner'.[7] In 2001 a case challenging the Pension Fund Act 41 of 1963, which excluded same-sex life partners from state pension benefits accorded to heterosexual spouses, was settled to allow their inclusion. Satchwell v Minister of Justice was brought by a High Court judge to challenge legislation regarding judges' pensions and other benefits of service. While this case did not benefit very many people directly, the judgment was important in recognizing that same-sex couples who depend upon each other are entitled to financial benefits.[8] In Farr v Mutual and Federal, an insurance policy holder in a gay relationship wished to have his partner covered by his motor vehicle insurer following an accident.[9] The policy excluded

[1] C Albertyn 'Defending and Securing Rights through Law: Feminism, Law and the Courts in South Africa' (2005) 32 Politikon 217, 233. But see S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36 (Woolman contends that the case law on sexual orientation traces a clear arc from mere privacy concerns to full public acknowledgement of the difference of same-sex life partnerships and that the Court's recognition of the rights of same-sex couples to marry constitutes a direct challenge to the conservative mores of the vast majority of South Africans.) See also Volks NO v Robinson & Others 2005 (5) BCLR 446 (CC)(Sachs J) at paras 146-242 (On the transformation of family law.)

[2] Albertyn 'Defending and Securing' (supra) at 233.

[3] E Cameron 'Sexual Orientation and the Constitution: A Test Case for Human Rights' (1993) 110 SALJ 450, quoted in NCGLE v Minister of Justice (supra) at para 20.

[4] NCGLE v Minister of Justice (supra) at para 21.

[5] NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs (supra) at para 42 (Ackermann J).

[6] 1998 (3) SA 312 (T), 1998 (4) BCLR 444 (T).

[7] Act 131 of 1998.

[8] Satchwell (supra) at paras 23–25.

[9] 2000 (3) SA 684 (C).

'a member of the policy holder's family normally resident with him' from its cover. He argued that his partner was not a family member. The judge found for the insurer on the basis that a permanent same-sex relationship does constitute a family based on the current social context. A number of cases were successfully taken to the pension fund adjudicator by gays and lesbians wishing to include their partners as beneficiaries. The Closed Pension Fund Act thereafter addressed sexual orientation discrimination for pension holders.[1]

In Du Plessis v RAF, the Supreme Court of Appeal delivered a highly significant judgment recognizing that there is a common-law duty of support in permanent, same-sex relationships.[2] The unanimous judgment by Cloete JA found that the partner of a man killed in a car accident was entitled to claim damages against the Road Accident Fund for loss of support. The court, relying on Satchwell, found that such an action did exist. The Satchwell Court had said:

> In a society where the range of family formations has widened, such a duty of support may be inferred as a matter of fact in certain cases of persons involved in permanent, same sex life partnerships. [3]

In Gory v Kolver, the Court found the provisions of the Intestate Succession Act[4] that exclude same-sex partners from being treated as 'spouses' to be unconstitutional.[5] The case is significant in that it goes beyond the earlier cases where third parties were required to allow partners in same-sex relationships to benefit where spouses already did. It concerns recognition of the inheritance rights to the entire estate of a partner in a same-sex partnership. Interestingly, the changes to the Act read in by the Court are retrospective and take effect from 27 April 2004.

(bb) Recognition of same-sex relationships — status benefits

NCGLE v Minister of Home Affairs concerned a challenge to the Aliens Control Act 96 of 1991 that gave immigration rights to spouses of permanent residents but not to same-sex partners. The judgment was important in not only finding the laws to be invalid but in reading the wording 'or partner, in a permanent same-sex life partnership' after the word 'spouse' into the offending legislation. The case highlighted the importance of context and impact, vulnerability and patterns of group disadvantage in the discrimination enquiry and advanced the idea that families take many forms, all deserving recognition and protection. Marriage was

[1] Act 41 of 1999.
[2] 2004 (1) SA 359 (SCA), 2003 (11) BCLR 1220 (SCA).
[3] Satchwell (supra) at para 25.
[4] Act 81 of 1987.
[5] Gory v Kolver NO & Others (Starke & Others Intervening) 2007 (3) BCLR 249 (CC).

only one form of valid life partnership. The language used by the court in its reading-in order has become an important standard for later judgments and even for some legislation.

(cc) Recognition of different types of families

Du Toit v Minister of Welfare was an adoption case also brought by a High Court judge and her partner to challenge the adoption provisions of the Child Care Act.[1] That Act allowed only one partner in a same-sex relationship to be registered as the legally recognized parent of adopted children. Skweyiya AJ made some important remarks about the changing and varied nature of family in society.

J v D-G, Department of Home Affairs amended the Children's Status Act 82 of 1987 to include same-sex partners as parents of children conceived by way of artificial insemination. Here, the one woman carried twins who had been conceived by way of artificial insemination from the ova of the second woman and sperm from an anonymous donor. The birth mother was registered as the parent of the children but the Department of Home Affairs refused to register the other woman as a parent.

These two important cases extended the legal recognition of family to same-sex relationships and their children.

(dd) Marriage[2]

In 2002, a lesbian couple (Fourie and Bonthuys) began their struggle for the right to marry under South African law. After approaching the High Court, then the Supreme Court of Appeal, and finally the Constitutional Court, they were told in December 2005 that they would have to wait another year for the law to be changed by Parliament, or failing this, by the automatic operation of the Court's own order on 2 December 2006, in order to marry.

The couple had asked the Court to address their exclusion from the common-law definition of marriage, which says that marriage is 'a union of one man with one woman, to the exclusion, while it lasts, of all others'. The Court was asked, in a separate (but joined) case brought by the Lesbian and Gay Equality Project, to remedy the problematic marriage formula in the Marriage Act 25 of 1961 that refers to a person taking another person as his or her 'lawful wife (or husband)'. The state opposed both cases. Sachs J gave a judgment on behalf of the majority of the Court which held that the common law and the formula in the Marriage Act were inconsistent with the Final Constitution and invalid to the extent that they excluded same-sex couples from marriage. The decision was based primarily on the right to equality and the right to dignity.

[1] Act 74 of 1983.

[2] For an expanded discussion of the Fourie decision, see B Goldblatt 'Case Note: Same-Sex Marriage in South Africa — The Constitutional Court's Judgment' (2006) Feminist Legal Studies (forthcoming).

Sachs J stressed the need for tolerance and 'respect across difference'. He said:

> [W]hat is at stake is not simply a question of removing an injustice experienced by a particular section of the community. At issue is a need to affirm the very character of our society as one based on tolerance and mutual respect. The test of tolerance is not how one finds space for people with whom, and practices with which, one feels comfortable, but how one accommodates the expression of what is discomfiting.[1]

The majority decided to suspend the declaration of invalidity for one year from the date of judgment to allow the legislature to correct the defects in the common law and Marriage Act. In the event that the defects were not corrected through legislation the offending words in the marriage formula would be read as including the words 'or spouse' after the words 'or husband'. The common law would become invalid to the extent that it did 'not permit same-sex couples to enjoy the status and benefits coupled with responsibilities it accords to heterosexual couples'. Sachs J said any legislation designed to cure the defects in the common law and the Marriage Act must ensure that same-sex couples are 'not subjected to marginalization or exclusion by the law, either directly or indirectly'.[2] The judgment set out the principles that must be applied to ensure that any new law is constitutionally adequate.[3] These are that:

- The objective of the new measure must be to promote dignity, equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms.
- A new law must not create equal disadvantage for everyone, ie levelling down to get rid of civil marriage.
- Parliament must be sensitive to avoid a remedy that appears equal but actually creates a separation that further marginalizes same-sex couples — segregation that reflects distaste for one group will cause insult to that group. The approach to impact and context taken in our equality jurisprudence would not allow this. Differential treatment may be possible if it enhances dignity and promotes equality.
- The measure chosen must be as 'generous and accepting towards same sex couples as it is to heterosexual couples' in terms of 'tangibles and intangibles'.

Parliament recently passed the Civil Union Act.[4] The Act purports to address Fourie by creating the new institution of a 'civil union'. This new institution, available to same-sex and heterosexual couples, provides such couples with the full consequences of marriage. The union can be called a marriage or a civil partnership. The new Act appears to comply with the principles set out in Fourie.[5]

[1] Fourie (supra) at para 60.
[2] Ibid at para 147.
[3] Ibid at paras 148-53.
[4] Act 17 of 2006.
[5] The Marriage Act continues to remain solely available to opposite-sex couples.

However failure by government to introduce law reforms that would comprehensively address the rights of same-sex couples has resulted in a number of admonishing statements by the Constitutional Court. Goldstone J in J said:

> It is unsatisfactory for the courts to grant piecemeal relief to members of the gay and lesbian community as and when aspects of their relationships are found to be prejudiced by unconstitutional legislation. The executive and legislature are therefore obliged to deal comprehensively and timeously with existing unfair discrimination against gays and lesbians.[1]

(Similar remarks were made in Satchwell and Du Toit.[2]) The passing of the Civil Union Act — at the eleventh hour — seems to indicate that the government is grudgingly heeding the Constitutional Court's call. However, for those same-sex (and heterosexual) couples who do not choose to marry but remain as domestic partners, the law remains inadequate in recognizing their relationships and protecting a surviving partners' interests.

(vi) Age

Age discrimination has been defined in s 1 of PEPUDA as including 'the conditions of disadvantage and vulnerability suffered by persons on the basis of their age, especially advanced age'. It also obviously applies to discrimination of the youth, as minors and young adults are sometimes unfairly denied benefits available to older people. The elderly, particularly in modern, western societies, often become vulnerable and disadvantaged.[3] The Constitutional Court has only considered this ground in the minority judgment of Ngcobo J in Bhe where he discussed the rights of the eldest male child to succeed to the status of the deceased and found this to be reasonable and justifiable.[4]

The High Court considered age discrimination in Christian Lawyers Association v Minister of Health.[5] In this case, a challenge to the provisions of the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Act, the applicants argued that girls under the age of 18 should not be able to choose to terminate their pregnancies without parental consent because they were not capable of making this decision alone.[6] The court rejected this challenge. It concluded that the Act made informed consent, and not age, the basis for its regulation of access to termination of pregnancy. Mojapelo J said the following:

[1] J (supra) at para 23.
[2] Satchwell (supra) at para 29; Du Toit (supra) at para 41.
[3] See Albertyn, Goldblatt & Roederer (supra) at 73-75.
[4] See § 35.5*(g)*(ix) infra.
[5] 2005 (1) SA 509 (T).
[6] Act 92 of 1996.

> Section 9(1) moreover provides that 'everyone' is equal before the law and has the right to 'equal protection and benefit of the law'. Section 9(3) goes further to prevent unfair discrimination against 'anyone' inter alia on the ground of 'age'. Any distinction between women on the ground of their age, would invade these rights.[1]

The High Court also found there to be unfair age discrimination in Harris v Minister of Education: government policy prevented a child from entering Grade 1 in an independent school before the age of 7.[2] The Harris Court found that from an educational perspective there was no reason why a 6-year-old should not be ready for school and the government had offered no sound pedagogical reasons for the exclusion. Moreover, since the case related to an independent school rather than a government school, no good administrative reasons existed for preventing 6-year-olds from beginning grade 1 at independent schools.

(vii) Disability

Many stereotypes accompany disability. Disabled people are assumed to be incapable, abnormal or ill. Discrimination can also occur where there is a perceived rather than actual disability. Equality for the disabled involves removing barriers to opportunities, eradicating discrimination and providing positive measures to accommodate and include them. PEPUDA addresses these issues in some detail.[3] A number of other countries have disability discrimination laws or constitutional provisions addressing this and their case law may be of assistance.[4] International law, including the recently introduced UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, can be used to inform our approach.[5]

In Hoffman, the Constitutional Court found there to be unfair discrimination on the basis of HIV status — a status said to be similar in many respects to disability discrimination.[6] The Court pointed to the denial of employment, prejudice and stigma suffered by HIV-positive people in South Africa.[7]

In IMATU v City of Cape Town, the Labour Court found there to be unfair discrimination on the ground of disability in terms of the Employment Equity Act.[8] In this case, a law enforcement officer applied to be transferred to the

[1] Christian Lawyers (supra) at 528E.
[2] 2001 (8) BCLR 796 (T).
[3] See Albertyn, Goldblatt & Roederer (supra) at 65-67.
[4] See Eldridge v Attorney General of British Columbia (1997) 151 DLR (4th) 577 (SCC); Auton v British Columbia (Attorney General) 2004 SCC 78. See also Autism v France Complaint No: 13/2002 European Committee of Social Rights (2002).
[5] UN General Assembly (25 August 2006). The UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities was signed by South Africa on 30 March 2007, but has not yet been ratified.
[6] Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC). However the Court chose not to decide whether discrimination had also occurred on the listed ground of disability. Ibid at para 40.
[7] Ibid at para 28.
[8] [2005] 10 BLLR 1084 (LC).

position of fire fighter. His application was turned down on the basis that he was an insulin-dependent diabetic and might become ill while under pressure.

(viii) Religion, conscience, belief, culture, language

Language, culture and religion cases have not often come to court under the equality right but have been considered more fully under their own specific rights in FC ss 30, 31 and 15.[1] While FC s 9 provides protection against unfair discrimination on the basis of these grounds, the specific rights offer broader protections for people to practise their religion, use their language and participate in their culture.

South Africa's history of state-sanctioned racial discrimination overlapped with language discrimination since Afrikaans and English were promoted over other languages. It was the requirement that African children be taught subjects in Afrikaans that was one of the main causes of the Soweto uprising in 1976. Cultural intolerance was intimately linked to racism in the courts' and the lawmaker's approach to customary law. Christianity as understood by the National Party government shaped the apartheid education system. South Africa remains a deeply religious society with Christianity as the major religion. The need for tolerance within and between religions and cultures is an important theme of the Final Constitution.

(aa) Discrimination on the basis of religion, conscience and belief

Protection against discrimination on the basis of religion includes protection of individual and group identification with a particular religion as well as practices and beliefs in terms of that religion. Belief and conscience may extend to moral or other value systems part of, or separate from, faith-based systems of religion. Discrimination on the basis of conscience might result where a person is required by law to do something that contradicts their values or ethics.

In Christian Education of SA v Minister of Education concerning the prohibition of corporal punishment, the Constitutional Court addressed the issue of religion and equality in brief. Sachs J said the following:

> The respondent contended that, in line with the above considerations, the State had two powerful interests in the matter. The first was to uphold the principle of equality. It contended that to affirm the existence of a special exemption in favour of religious practices > of certain children only, would be to violate the equality provisions contained in s 9 of the Bill of Rights. More particularly, it would involve treating some children differently from others on grounds of their religion or the type of school they attended. I think this approach misinterprets the equality provisions. It is true that to single out a member of a religious community for disadvantageous treatment would, on the face of it, constitute unfair discrimination against that community. The contrary, however, does not hold. To grant respect to sincerely held religious views of a community and make an exception from a general law to accommodate them, would not be unfair to anyone else who did not hold those views. As the Court said in Prinsloo v Van der Linde & Another, the essence of equality lies not in treating everyone in the same way, but in treating everyone with equal concern and respect. Permission to allow the practice to continue would, in these circumstances, not be inconsistent with the equality provisions of the Bill of Rights.[1]

[1] See P Farlam 'Freedom of Religion, Belief and Opinion' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 41; S Woolman 'Community Rights: Language, Culture and Religion' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 58. These related rights make specific mention of the need for such rights to be exercised in a manner that is consistent with other provisions in the Bill of Rights. See, eg, S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg 1997 (4) SA 1176 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC)(Sunday liquor sales); Prince v President, Cape Law Society 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 133 (CC)(Ban on marijuana and rights of Rastafarians.)

The Constitutional Court has considered unfair discrimination on the ground of religion in a small number of cases.[2] The High Court has also considered religious discrimination in cases concerning a Sunday horse racing prohibition[3] and the terms of an educational trust.[4]

(bb) Discrimination on the basis of culture

Culture, often difficult to define, refers to the values, practices, rules and behaviour of different social groups.[5] Culture is an important component of human

[1] 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 42. See also Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Others; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)('Fourie') at para 159.

[2] Daniels involved the question whether a Muslim wife was a spouse in terms of the Intestate Succession Act 81 of 1987 and the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act 27 of 1990. It is worth noting that a finding on gender, marital status or religious discrimination was deemed to be unnecessary, since the Court simply interpreted the word spouse to include a party to a Muslim marriage. Moseneke J however, in a minority judgment, found this to be a strained interpretation. He preferred instead to find the exclusion of Muslim marriages to be unfair discrimination (on the basis of marital status, religion and culture) and the appropriate remedy to be reading in. Interestingly, in Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North, the Court found that there was unfair discrimination between fathers of children married in terms of Islam (but not recognised as having to consent to the adoption of their child in terms of the Child Care Act 74 of 1983) and fathers married in terms of customary law (who were recognized by that Act). See also Fourie (supra) at paras 88-98 (The Court upheld the rights of gays and lesbians to marry and rejected arguments that marriage should remain a heterosexual preserve. However, it also held that no religious denomination and no religious official could be forced to consecrate homosexual unions.)

[3] Gold Circle (Pty) Ltd & Another v Premier, Kwazulu-Natal 2005 (4) SA 402 (D)(The Court found the prohibition of horse racing on a Sunday to constitute unfair discrimination on the basis of religion since the prohibition was designed around the Christian Sabbath and yet prevented other religious groups from attending horse racing meetings.)

[4] Minister of Education v Syfrets Trust Ltd NO 2006 (4) SA 205 (C)(The court found that the terms of an educational bequest requiring that funds not go to Jews was unfair discrimination on the basis of religion.)

[5] For more on the difficulty of defining 'culture', see S Woolman 'Community Rights' (supra) at § 58.1*(a)–(c)*.

identity and may change over time.[1] The content of a particular culture may be contested by individuals or groups within it and this may result in a court having to weigh up competing rights and grounds of discrimination. These issues arose in Bhe, where the applicants challenged the customary law rule of primogeniture (succession along the male line). The Constitutional Court found the rule to be inconsistent with the Final Constitution in that it discriminated against women and extramarital children. The Court noted the evolving nature of customary law and looked at the case within the historical and current context of South Africa. It found that African customs had been distorted by apartheid and violated the dignity and equality rights of women.[2]

(cc) Discrimination on the basis of language

There are a number of strong constitutional protections of language in the Final Constitution in addition to the prohibition against discrimination on this ground. The issue of language discrimination has arisen in relation to the medium of schooling in a number of cases.[3] Language cannot be used as indirect race discrimination to keep black children out of formerly white or coloured schools.[4] In Ex parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature Sachs J discussed the position of Afrikaans in schools. He said:

> Thus, if persons were denied access to school because they spoke Afrikaans, or belonged to a cultural group which identified itself as Afrikaner, they could claim a violation of their constitutional rights. Similarly, any person who was denied access to State facilities because they did not speak Afrikaans or did not belong to the self-constituted Afrikaner community could allege that their fundamental rights were being infringed.[5]

[1] C Albertyn 'Equality' (supra) at 4-42.

[2] See Pillay v KwaZulu-Natal MEC of Education 2006 (10) BCLR 1237 (N)(An appeal against an Equality Court found that in terms of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act, a school's practice of prohibiting a learner from wearing a nose stud prevented her and her community from enjoying their culture and practising their religion.) See also Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In Re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill Of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC)('Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature') at paras 69-72 (Discussion by Sachs J of the protection of culture in human rights law, in particular the rights of minorities. He pointed to six interrelated principles of minority protection including: (i) the right to existence, (ii) non-discrimination, (iii) equal rights, (iv) the right to develop autonomously within civil society, (v) affirmative action, and (vi) positive support from the State.)

[3] See Wittman v Deutscher Schulverein, Pretoria 1998 (4) SA 423 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T); Matukane v Laerskool Potgietersrus 1996 (3) SA 223 (T), [1996] 1 All SA 468 (T); Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature (supra); Minister of Education, Western Cape, & Others v Governing Body, Mikro Primary School, & Another 2006 (1) SA 1 (SCA), 2005 (10) BCLR 973 (SCA). For a discussion of the nexus between egalitarian concerns and language policy in public schools and independent schools, see S Woolman 'Community Rights' (supra) at § 58.7.

[4] See I Currie 'Official Languages and Language Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 65.

[5] Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature (supra) at para 71.

He went on to say that this analysis did not necessarily require language exclusivity in schooling:

> Reading these principles together with s 32*(b)* in the manner most favourable to the petitioners, would mean that the practicability of language instruction in existing Afrikaans medium schools could, applying the non-diminution principle, be assumed to exist. At the same time, there is nothing in these principles to guarantee the exclusivity of Afrikaans in any school. On the contrary, the promotion of multi-lingualism, even leaving out the factor of equal access to schools, would encourage the establishment of dual- or multiple-medium schools. Whether or not the Afrikaans language would survive better in isolation rather than, as it were, rubbing shoulders with other languages, would not be a matter of constitutionality but one of policy, on which this Court would not wish to pronounce. Similarly, it would not be for us to say whether denying Afrikaans-speaking children the right to study and play with children of other backgrounds would or would not be to their mutual educational and social detriment or advantage.[1]

(ix) Birth

The Constitutional Court defined discrimination on the ground of birth in the case of Bhe:

> The prohibition of unfair discrimination on the ground of birth in s 9(3) of our Constitution should be interpreted to include a prohibition of differentiating between children on the basis of whether a child's biological parents were married either at the time the child was conceived or when the child was born. As I have outlined, extra-marital children did, and still do, suffer from social stigma and impairment of dignity. The prohibition of unfair discrimination in our Constitution is aimed at removing such patterns of stigma from our society. Thus, when s 9(3) prohibits unfair discrimination on the ground of 'birth', it should be interpreted to include a prohibition of differentiation between children on the grounds of whether the children's parents were married at the time of conception or birth. Where differentiation is made on such grounds, it will be assumed to be unfair unless it is established that it is not.[2]

In Petersen v Maintenance Officer, Simon's Town Maintenance Court, the High Court found there to be unfair discrimination on the basis of birth in a case concerning differentiation between the duty of support of grandparents towards children born in wedlock and extra-marital children.[3] There may be other dimensions to birth discrimination such as a child who is treated unfairly because, for example, he or she is the child of a refugee, adopted or fostered.[4] This ground may intersect or overlap with other grounds such as race, social origin and gender.

[1] Ex parte Gauteng Provincial Legislative (supra) at para 74.

[2] Bhe & Others v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others; Shibi v Sithole & Others; SAHRC & Another v President of the RSA & Another 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe') at para 59.

[3] 2004 (2) SA 56 (C).

[4] See Albertyn, Goldblatt & Roederer (supra) at 80-81. See Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Another v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) SA 569 (CC)('Khosa') at para 78 (The Court notes that the provisions of social security legislation that provides social assistance grants only to nationals discriminates against children on the grounds of their parents' nationality.)

The ground may also be linked to the ground of age discrimination. In Bhe, the minority decision of Ngcobo J discussed a challenge to the customary law rule of primogeniture on the basis that it allowed the eldest male to succeed and thus discriminated against younger children. He found that in this case, age and birth discrimination were both reasonable and justifiable.[1]

(h) Step 2: Was the discrimination unfair?

Once discrimination has been established, the FC s 9(3) test looks at whether the discrimination was unfair. If the discrimination is on a listed ground, then it is presumed to be unfair. Here is the point at which the presumption of unfairness in FC s 9(5) kicks in.[2] If discrmination occurs on an unlisted ground, then the presumption does not operate and the complainant must establish that the discrimination was unfair.

The unfairness test set out in Harksen looks at the following factors:

(a) the position of the complainants in society, whether they have suffered from past patterns of disadvantage, and whether the discrimination is on a listed ground;
(b) the nature of the provision or power and the purpose sought to be achieved by it. If it is aimed at achieving a worthy social goal and not at impairing the complainants it may be fair;
(c) with due regard to (a) and (b) and other relevant factors, the extent to which the complainants' rights or interests have been affected, whether this has led to an impairment of their fundamental human dignity or constitutes an impairment of a comparably serious nature.

The fundamental question in the fairness test is the impact of the discrimination on the complainant. The approach to establishing unfair discrimination must be contextual. In Van Heerden, Moseneke J notes that this contextual approach is informed by a commitment to substantive equality:

> This substantive notion of equality recognises that besides uneven race, class and gender attributes of our society, there are other levels and forms of social differentiation and systematic under-privilege, which still persist. The Constitution enjoins us to dismantle them and to prevent the creation of new patterns of disadvantage. It is therefore incumbent on courts to scrutinise in each equality claim the situation of the complainants in society; their history and vulnerability; the history, nature and purpose of the discriminatory practice and whether it ameliorates or adds to group disadvantage in real life context, in order to determine its fairness or otherwise in the light of the values of our Constitution. In the assessment of fairness or otherwise a flexible but 'situation sensitive' approach is indispensable because of shifting patterns of hurtful discrimination and stereotypical response in our evolving democratic society.[3]

[1] Bhe (supra) at paras 179-183. For a discussion of 'fairness' in the FC s 9(3) test and its relationship to FC s 36, see § 35.5*(i)* infra.
[2] For further discussion of FC s 9(5), see § 35.5*(b)* infra.
[3] Minister of Finance v Van Heerden 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC), 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC) at para 27.

The primary right and value upon which unfairness analysis turns is dignity. However, the infringement of other rights and values may butress a finding of unfairness. The Constitutional Court has said that the test is not a closed list of factors to be used in determining fairness and may develop further over time. The factors explored in each case have a cumulative effect and must be assessed objectively.[1] The overall purpose of the fairness enquiry is to use contextual material to establish the impact of the alleged discrimination on the complainant.

The Court refers to the text of the equality right as evidence that the drafters foresaw the possible existence of discrimination that was not unfair. Goldstone J, in Harksen v Lane NO, referred to the presumption of unfairness in favour of complainants of discrimination on a listed ground (in FC s 9(5)) as proof that discrimination on a listed ground can be shown to be fair.[2] In Hugo, for example, the granting of a presidential pardon to certain categories of prisoners and not others was regarded as fair discrimination.[3]

(i) The position of the complainant

In order to understand the complainant's position, a range of considerations have been used by the courts to ensure that a thoroughly contextual enquiry takes account of history, group disadvantage and harm, socio-economic factors and the many forms that inequality takes. This approach allows for a sophisticated impact enquiry.

The Group: The enquiry involves looking at the individual complainant but also his/her group and its position in society. The group may have been subjected to particular laws and practices that caused disadvantage and stigma. Often, the complainant's group will locate the claim within a clear ground of discrimination. Sometimes a person who has been discriminated against may have experienced discrimination across a number of intersecting grounds, resulting in a more specific and complex form of discrimination.[4] This focus on grounds helps to define the group involved so as to better understand its particular position in society.

History: The examination is often backward looking so as to establish the historical factors that led to 'patterns of group disadvantage and harm'.[5] South Africa's history of colonialism and apartheid created a legacy of race discrimination. Gender inequality and sexual orientation discrimination also have historical roots in unjust laws and practices. In fact, all the prohibited grounds are characterized by historical conduct that has marginalized and oppressed people and

[1] Harksen v Lane NO 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC)('Harksen') at para 51.
[2] President of the RSA & Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC)('Hugo') at para 45.
[3] For other decisions in which discrimination was found to be fair, see Harksen (supra); Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC)('Walker'); Bel Porto School Governing Body v Premier of the Province, Western Cape 2002 (3) SA 365 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 891 (CC); Jordan & Others v S & Others 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC); Volks NO v Robinson & Others 2005 (5) BCLR 446 (CC)('Volks').
[4] For a discussion of the meaning 'one or more grounds' see § 35.5*(f)* supra.
[5] Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 27.

groups who have (or are associated with) these attributes.[1] Understanding this history enables the Court to appreciate that alleged discrimination is not new but emerges from years of related maltreatment. Note, however, that the Court also needs to be aware of social changes that may not reflect historical practices. Thus, in Bhe, the Court recognized that customary law was not static and had evolved over time.[2]

Systemic inequality. The goal of substantive equality is premised on an awareness that inequality is often built into the fabric of our society, not just through laws and rules but through deeply entrenched social practices and attitudes. Children are taught prejudice and fear of 'the other' and are given fixed ideas about the natural order of things (such as fathers heading households). These value systems infuse South African and most other societies around the world and form the foundation for disadvantageous treatment of individuals and groups.[3]

The socio-economic context. The court has to look at the conditions faced by the complainant and his/her group to properly understand the impact of the discrimination. In Khosa, the Constitutional Court not only considered the position of the permanent resident group but also looked at the hardship caused to their families, friends and communities who were required to support them in the absence of social assistance from the state.[4]

Different forms of vulnerability. Group vulnerability and disadvantage can effect complainants in a range of ways:[5] stigmatization and marginalization;[6] material disadvantage;[7] social exclusion and stereotyping;[8] political minority status;[9] and failure to accord equal concern and respect.[10] In Hugo, O'Regan J held that there are degrees of vulnerability. Thus, 'the more vulnerable the group adversely affected by the discrimination, the more the discrimination will be held to be unfair'.[11] The impact enquiry may require recourse to evidence. The courts have tended to rely on secondary sources such as books and articles recording

[1] Harksen (supra) at para 49.
[2] Bhe (supra) at para 80.
[3] See § 35.1*(c)* supra.
[4] Khosa (supra) at para 76.
[5] See Albertyn 'Equality' (supra) at 4-54 – 4-56.
[6] See Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC)(A person infected with HIV was unfairly discriminated against.)
[7] See Khosa (supra)(Poverty was one of the causes of vulnerability for the group of non-citizens.)
[8] Many of the cases concerning sexual orientation discrimination considered by the Court have identified stereotyping and social exclusion as the source of the class's vulnerability. See, eg, Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Others; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC)('Fourie') at paras 71-72 (The Court said that 'the intangible damage (was) as severe as the material deprivation'.)
[9] See Khosa (supra) at para 71 (The Court points to the fact that non-citizens are 'a minority in all countries, and have little political muscle'.)
[10] See Walker (supra)(The white residents, although not historically or systemically vulnerable, were nevertheless treated arbitrarily with regard to the selective enforcement by the municipality on the basis of race, and were thus denied equal concern and respect.)
[11] Hugo (supra) at para 112.

the position of disadvantaged groups. Sometimes, they have simply taken judicial notice of these issues and have at times even displayed creativity in imagining the possible effects of discrimination. The court can use primary research, briefs submitted by an amicus curiae and other factual evidence to understand properly the social issues involved.[1]

(ii) Nature and purpose of the provision

In Harksen, the Court said that if the purpose of a provision was to achieve a worthy social goal such as the furthering of equality for all, then this justification might affect the fairness of the discrimination. The Court offered Hugo as an example: a presidential pardon extended to certain mothers of young children was found fairly to exclude the claimant father. This factor in the fairness enquiry raises a number of troubling issues that relate to the overall coherence of the Constitutional Court's equality jurisprudence.

First, if the focus of the fairness enquiry is on the impact of the discrimination on the complainant, is it correct to consider the purpose of the provision under challenge, ie will such an enquiry actually assist in determining whether the complainant's dignity was impaired or whether such person or group was truly disadvantaged?[2] It seems that the purpose of an impugned provision may shed light on its impact on the dignity of the complainant. Thus, in Walker, the purpose of the flat rate and cross-subsidization was not aimed at prejudicing the residents of the white area, but was used for reasons of practicality as well as for other strategic reasons.[3] On the other hand, the selective enforcement against rates defaulters was not based on a well formulated approach and resulted in treatment of the white residents that failed to accord them equal concern and respect.[4]

Second, the purpose enquiry seems to overlap with the FC s 36 limitations enquiry since both concern the purpose of the challenged provision and the rights concerned. It has been suggested that the enquiry into purpose at the fairness stage is purely a moral or value-based enquiry and that the FC s 36 enquiry allows for issues of a financial and administrative nature to be introduced. Of course, the FC s 36 enquiry also looks at values and the balancing of rights. But the real blurring of the line between the two enquiries arises when the impugned provision is not a law of general application. Since the Constitutional Court has

[1] For more on Rule 31 of the Constitutional Court Rules, see G Budlender 'Amicus' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 8; K Hofmeyr 'Rules and Procedure in Constitutional Matters' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2007) Chapter 5. See also Volks (supra) at paras 31-35.

[2] But see Woolman 'Dignity' at § 36.4*(a)* and Woolman 'Freedom of Association' at § 44.2*(b)* (Ananalyis of the fairness of discrimination must take account of countervailing interests behind the impugned law or conduct.)

[3] Walker (supra) at paras 67-68.

[4] Ibid at paras 79-81. See also Minister of Finance v Van Heerden 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC), 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC) at paras 123-131 (Ngcobo J)(Discussion of the purpose of the differential Parliamentary pensions and its impact on the complainant.)

adopted a relatively restrictive approach to the meaning of 'law of general application', it has resulted in a number of equality cases reaching the courts that cannot be looked at in terms of FC s 36. The result has been that some of the broader considerations such as administrative difficulty have been looked at within the purpose component of the fairness enquiry.[1] It is suggested that this approach is likely to result in the development of two streams of jurisprudence — the one dealing with cases involving laws of general application and the other without.[2] Different tests may lead to different results.

Third, it seems possible that some of the early cases in which the Court's equality jurisprudence was first shaped should not have been FC s 9(3) enquiries into unfair discrimination, but should rather have been examined in terms of FC s 9(2) analysis of positive measures to promote those who have been unfairly discriminated against. Thus, in both Walker and Hugo, the equivalent provision of FC s 9(2) in the Interim Constitution might have been the more appropriate vehicle to use. Of course, FC s 9(2) and FC s 9 (3) are both part of the equality right and must be understood in relation to each other. Further clarification by the Court of the relationship between the sections will assist in addressing some of the thorny issues around 'purpose' in the fairness and limitations enquiries.[3]

There may also be some overlap with the purpose enquiry and the FC s 9(1) examination of rationality and a legitimate government purpose: the former is, however, a more value-based enquiry than the latter. It has been suggested that the bright lines between the various sections of the equality right unnecessarily limit the reach of FC s 9(1) and treat FC s 9(3) as a gatekeeper of the right. It may be more appropriate to look at purpose according to different standards within each section of the right. Again, the interrelationship between the sections must be borne in mind as the jurisprudence may still develop a more nuanced approach to the right as a whole.

(iii) Impairment of the rights or interests of the complainant and dignity

This aspect of the fairness test combines the position of the complainant with the purpose of the provision, as well as any other factors that will assist in evaluating the extent of the effect of the discrimination on the complainant's interests and rights. It is in this cumulative examination that the focus turns to the impairment of dignity or a comparably serious impairment. The court will try here to establish degrees of unfair discrimination since 'the more invasive the nature of the discrimination upon the interests of the individuals affected by the discrimination, the more likely it will be held to be unfair'.[4] In NCGLE v Home Affairs the

[1] See Hugo (supra) at para 46. See also C Albertyn & B Goldblatt (1998) 'Facing the Challenge of Transformation: Difficulties in the Development of an Indigenous Jurisprudence of Equality' (1998) 14 SAJHR 248, 269-70 ('Facing the Challenge').

[2] Albertyn 'Equality' (supra) at 4-54 — 4-55.

[3] For further discussion of Step 3 of FC s 9(3) analysis, see § 35.5*(i)* infra. For a discussion of FC s 9(2) and its relationship to FC s 9(3), see § 35.4 supra.

[4] Hugo (supra) at para 112 (O'Regan J).

Constitutional Court found that the discrimination against gays and lesbians was 'severe' since 'no concern, let alone anything approaching equal concern' was shown towards this group.[1] In application, this last stage is sometimes merely repetitious of the previous two parts of the fairness test.[2] The Harksen test talks about 'interests and rights' of the complainant, both of which must be examined. For example, in Hoffmann, the complainant had an interest in being allowed to apply for a job as a cabin attendant with SAA and suffered disadvantage as a result of his application being refused.[3] His rights to not be unfairly discriminated against on the basis of his HIV status and his right to dignity were implicated here. In Khosa, the group of permanent residents had an interest in receiving social grants while facing poverty and desperation without these, and had rights to social security, life, equality and dignity.[4]

The emphasis on dignity in the test and as the central underlying value informing the equality right has been explored in academic writing.[5] It is important to recognize that dignity itself is open to interpretation and that such interpretations range from notions of individual affront to more collective and material conceptions of the value.[6] In addition the words 'or of a comparably serious nature' mean that it is not only dignity that is implicated in an evaluation of the impact of unfair discrimination but other values and rights as well. The ongoing engagement with these values and rights in our equality jurisprudence means that we should not view the unfair discrimination test as fixed and immutable but rather as a living and developing vehicle to achieve the goals of the Constitution. Because of its contextual nature and its comparative features, the application of equality is likely to change over time.

(i) Step 3: Can the unfair discrimination be justified?

Having engaged in the fairness enquiry and concluded that there has been unfair discrimination, the court considers whether there are any limitations of the equality right that would justify the unfair law. This stage only applies to discrimination in terms of 'law of general application' since it is only such

[1] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) at para 54. See also Zondi v MEC for Traditional and Local Goverment Affairs & Others 2005 (3) SA 589 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 347 (CC) at para 94 (The impact of discrimination on the landless was also found to be severe.)

[2] See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (1) BCLR 1517 (CC) at para 26.

[3] Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC).

[4] Khosa & Others v Minister of Social Development & Others; Mahlaule & Another v Minister of Social Development & Others 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) SA 569 (CC)('Khosa') para at 44.

[5] See § 35.1*(d)*(i). supra.

[6] For a discussion of the values underlying the equality right, see § 35.1*(d)* supra. See S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36; S Liebenberg 'The Value of Human Dignity in Interpreting Socio-Economic Rights' (2005) 21 SAJHR 1.

discrimination that may be justified under FC s 36.[1] In Harksen, the Constitutional Court said that this final stage will 'involve a weighing of the purpose and effect of the provision in question and a determination as to the proportionality thereof in relation to the extent of its infringement of equality'.[2]

The relationship between unfairness and justification has been described as a 'paradox' since it seems impossible that something that violates the right to equality would be reasonable and justifiable in a society based on equality. The focus of the unfairness test is the impact on the complainant and is a more 'moral' enquiry concerning the infringement of the person's rights. The limitations enquiry looks more widely at the broader social interests implicated in the case and may involve a balancing of rights. It is here that administrative, financial and other considerations relevant to the pursuit of valuable public policy could be taken into account.[3] There are very few examples of decisions where unfair discrimination was found to be justified. In Lotus River, Ottery, Grassy Park Association v South Peninsula Municipality the Cape High Court found that the raising of rates and service charges, while unfair, was justified.[4] In the minority decision of Ngcobo J in Khosa, the failure to extend social assistance grants to adult permanent residents was held to be justifiable: the state had legitimate financial constraints and permanent residents were expected to be self sufficient.[5] Although he analyzed the matter as a violation of FC s 27, Ngcobo J said that treating this dispute as an equality challenge would have led to the same result.[6] In contrast, the majority decision of Mokgoro J found that the cost implications of extending grants to permanent residents could not justify the unfair discrimination or the violation of permanent residents' right to social security in FC s 27. The Court scrutinized the state's financial arguments and found that the relatively small costs involved did not justify a limitation of the rights.

There has been some overlap between the unfairness enquiry and this stage of the test.[7] The unfairness test in (b) looks at the nature of the provision and its purpose. Thus, while the overall focus of the unfairness test is on the impact on the complainant, it is here that the nature and the purpose of a measure will be examined. The FC s 36 enquiry also looks at the nature and purpose of the limitation.

[1] See S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[2] Harksen v Lane NO 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 52.

[3] Ibid.

[4] 1999 (2) SA 817 (C)(Only case on record in which FC s 36 justified an unfair discrimination finding under FC s 9.).

[5] Khosa (supra) at paras 114-34.

[6] Ibid at para 102.

[7] But see Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra) at § 34.5*(b)*(FC s 36 analysis adds nothing, in almost all equality cases, to analysis already undertaken in terms of unfair discrimation analysis under FC s 9(3) or FC s 9(4). The reason, they contend, is that the arguments in justification canvassed in terms of FC s 9 invariably exhaust the arguments that might be offered in terms in FC s 36. As the unfair discrimination test is currently constructed, FC s 36 does not offer meaningful space for the justification of unfair discrimination.)

While we believe that there can be some a conceptual separation between the two enquiries, where there is no law of general application, FC s 36 does not apply, and the (b) part of the fairness test sometimes leads to a merging of the 'moral' and policy considerations.[1] In Hugo, the Court looked at factors such as cost and administrative burden in deciding that the Presidential pardon (not a law of general application) that excluded men was not unfair. Similarly, in Hoffmann, SAA's commercial interests were considered but did not justify overriding the rights of the HIV-positive complainant to be considered for a job. It seems that FC s 9(3) cases fall into two categories — those where a FC s 36 enquiry follows the finding of a rights violation and those where FC s 36 is not implicated. The former will preserve the boundary between fairness and justification while the latter is likely to blur this boundary.[2]

(j) Evaluation of the application of the FC s 9(3) test

The test of unfair discrimination was developed quite early, in Harksen, in the Court's existence. Since then it has been followed closely by the Court in a relatively large number of cases. Most cases have resulted in a finding of unfair discrimination in favour of the complainant. The Constitutional Court has repeatedly protected the rights of marginal groups such as gays and lesbians and at times the rights of poverty-stricken non-citizens in a number of thoroughly contextual enquiries. Notable exceptions where (privileged) complainants failed include Hugo and Walker. The other important cases concerning unsuccessful claims are Harksen, Jordan, and Volks. Interestingly, all three concerned claims on the ground of indirect gender discrimination. Harksen and Volks also concerned claims of marital status discrimination. In all three cases, the Constitutional Court was very divided, with the dissents reflecting the views of the same judges (O'Regan J and Sachs J in all three cases and Mokgoro J (who did not sit in Jordan) in Volks and Harksen)). This division in the Court seems to reflect a difference in the contextual application of the FC s 9(3) test: the majority adopts a rather formal approach to equality analysis; the minority adopts a more substantive approach.

In Union of Refugee Women v The Director: The Private Security Industry Regulatory Authority, the majority (six judges), while taking care to look at the context of refugees' lives, found that discrimination against them (as opposed to permanent residents and citizens) was not unfair. Again, Mokgoro and O'Regan JJ in a minority judgment (four judges) differed in their finding that refugees had been unfairly discriminated against in relation to permanent residents and as a vulnerable group whose dignity had been impaired. Their reading of the impugned legislation was that it contained an unstated stereotype that refugees are less trustworthy than South Africans. The consideration of impact took account of a wider range of contextual issues than did the majority and seems to have come to a deeper understanding of vulnerability.

[1] Albertyn & Goldblatt 'Facing the Challenge' (supra) at 269-72.
[2] Albertyn 'Equality' (supra) at 4-58 — 4-59.

In Jordan, the majority failed to appreciate the gendered nature of the sex work industry and chose to focus formalistically on the fact that the male customer and the female sex worker, as well as both male and female sex workers, were equally criminalized by the challenged legislation. The minority of five judges found that sex workers faced greater sanctions than did their clients, and that since sex workers were generally women and clients men, indirect discrimination had occurred. The minority was able to see this distinction 'matter[ed]' and explored the position of sex workers in society, ie as social outcasts and temptresses.[1]

Volks concerned a claim by a surviving domestic partner to maintenance in terms of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act. The majority had little sympathy for the middle class complainant: although it did acknowledge the vulnerability of poor women who find themselves in unregulated domestic partnerships. The judgment foundered on its inability to look at the matter historically and systemically. The focus on the special place of marriage led to an unwillingness to examine conservative ideas of the family. This focus on a person's choice to marry or not is at odds with any real understanding of the constraints on women's choices within intimate relationships, particularly when they are already disadvantaged and poor.[2]

35.6 FC s 9(4): Unfair Discrimination by Private Persons

FC s 9(4) extends the prohibition against unfair discrimination in FC s 9(3) to all persons other than the state. Thus private individuals or corporations can commit acts that discriminate unfairly. Since the limitations clause (FC s 36) does not apply to conduct, the full enquiry into whether there has been a violation of the right generally takes place within the fairness test.[3] The purpose element of the fairness test will include justificatory considerations such as cost and administrative burden that might otherwise have formed part of the limitations enquiry. This section has not yet been considered by the Constitutional Court as equality cases have involved challenges to national legislation or other acts of the state. There have however been a small number of High Court cases where FC s 9(4) challenges have been considered.[4] For example, Minister of Education v Syfrets Trust

[1] Jordan (supra) at para 64.

[2] See C Albertyn 'Defending and Securing Rights through Law: Feminism, Law and the Courts in South Africa' (2005) 32 Politikon 217, 229-30; C Lind 'Domestic Partnerships and Marital Status Discrimination' (2005) Acta Juridica 108.

[3] But see Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra) at § 34 (Not all private discrimination takes place in terms of unregulated conduct. If the private discrimination is supported by law, then it is not — logically — impossible to have regard to the justificatory framework offered by FC s 36.)

[4] Radio Pretoria v Chairman, Independent Communications Authority of South Africa, & Another 2003 (5) SA 451 (T) at para 24.4 (High Court rejected argument that the Independent Broadcasting Authority could not invoke the provisions of FC s 9(4) in assessing the discriminatory actions of a radio station.)

Ltd found that, since the provisions of FC s 9(4) apply horizontally, a charitable trust that covered 'all natural and juristic persons' fell within the ambit of the section.[1]

35.7 FC s 9(5): Presumption of Unfairness

This section creates a rebuttable presumption that discrimination on a ground listed in FC s 9(3) is unfair unless it is established that it is fair.[2] This presumption fits into the FC s 9(3) test at the beginning of step 2 (the enquiry into fairness). Thus, having moved from step 1 where discrimination on a ground has been established, it is necessary to see whether such discrimination is based on a listed ground. If it is, it is presumed to be unfair and the onus shifts to the party against whom the complaint of unfair discrimination has been made, to prove that the discrimination was not unfair. This section encourages applicants to fit their discrimination into listed categories so as to benefit from the presumption. It aims to assist those who are already part of recognized vulnerable groups. A number of vulnerable groups that have not managed to benefit from this presumption because they do not fall within a listed ground have still managed to prove unfairness.[3] The court will look at a range of evidence including statistical and sociological evidence and can also take judicial notice of discrimination as it manifests in society.

35.8 The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act

FC s 9(4) requires that national legislation be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination. The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2001 (PEPUDA) provides measures for the promotion of equality in addition to preventative/prohibitory provisions.

The Act 'is intended to give substance to the constitutional commitment to equality, by providing a legal mechanism with which to confront, address and remedy past and present forms of incidental, as well as institutionalized or structural, unfair discrimination and inequality'.[4] The Act is divided into two main sections dealing, first, with measures to prevent unfair discrimination (Chapters 2 and 3) and second, with measures to promote equality (Chapter 5). It also

[1] 2006 (10) BCLR 1214 (C) at paras 27-32.

[2] Khosa (supra) at para 68.

[3] These successful groups include the non-citizens in Khosa and the HIV-positive complainant in Hoffman. See § 35.5*(f)* supra.

[4] C Albertyn, B Goldblatt & C Roederer (eds) Introduction to the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act (2001) 3. For a critique of PEPUPA's framework for unfair discrimination analysis, and Albertyn, Goldblatt and Roederer's gloss on this test, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 44.2*(b)*.

contains provisions specifically dealing with hate speech, harassment and publication and dissemination of unfairly discriminatory information (ss 10-12). It establishes Equality Courts (Chapter 4) at magistrates' court and High Court level and sets out the procedures to be followed in such courts. The wide range of remedies available to these courts is designed to encourage a creative, informal judicial approach that is sensitive to the circumstances of each case and the needs and interests of the parties.[1]

The promotion measures of the Act have barely been used. No more than a trickle of unfair discrimination cases have reached the courts, and only a small number of these cases have been reported. However, it is likely that a larger body of jurisprudence will develop as public awareness of the courts increases.

The reported Equality Court judgments include: George v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism, dealing with the jurisdiction of the equality court;[2] Du Preez v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development, concerning the shortlisting criteria for the post of a regional court magistrate (which were found to constitute unfair race and gender discrimination in terms of PEPUDA);[3] and Pillay v KwaZulu-Natal MEC of Education & Others, concerning an appeal from an Equality Court on the subject of a girl's right to wear a nose stud at school in pursuance of her culture and religion.[4]

[1] See N Bohler-Muller 'What the Equality Courts Can Learn from Gilligan's Ethic of Care: A Novel Approach' (2000) 16 SAJHR 623. See also A Kok 'Motor Vehicle Insurance, The Constitution and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act' (2002) 18 SAJHR 59; S Teichner 'The Hate Speech Provisions of the Promotion of Equality and the Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000: The Good, The Bad and the Ugly' (2003) 19 SAJHR 349; N Bohler-Muller 'The Promise of Equality Courts' (2006) 22 SAJHR 380.

[2] 2005 (6) SA 297 (EqC). The judgment was confirmed on appeal by the Supreme Court of Appeal. See Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism v George [2006] SCA 57 (RSA). See also Minister of Justice v Language Durban and Coast High Court Case No 14181/2005 (Unreported judgment, 20 March 2006).

[3] 2006 (5) SA 592 (EqC).

[4] 2006 (10) BCLR 1237 (N). At the time of writing, this case was awaiting judgment from the Constitutional Court.

36 Dignity

Stuart Woolman

36.1 Introduction 36–1
(a) History of dignity 36–1
(b) Structure of the chapter 36–4
(c) Methodological concerns 36–5
36.2 Definitions of dignity 36–6
(a) Individual as an end (Dignity 1) 36–7
(b) Equal concern and equal respect (Dignity 2) 36–10
(c) Self-actualization (Dignity 3) 36–11
(d) Self-governance (Dignity 4) 36–12
(e) Collective responsibility for the material conditions for individual agency (Dignity 5) 36–14
(f) The relationship between the five definitions of dignity and the creation of a realm of ends 36–17
36.3 Uses of dignity 36–19
(a) Dignity as a first order rule 36–19
(b) Dignity as a second order rule 36–20
(c) Dignity as a correlative right 36–21
(d) Dignity as a value or a grundnorm 36–22
36.4 Dignity's relationship to the substantive provisions in the Bill of Rights 36–25
(a) Equality 36–25
(b) Association 36–30
(c) Freedom and security of the person 36–31
(i) Development of the common law 36–31
(ii) Reproductive rights 36–33
(iii) Punishment 36–34
(d) Religion, language and culture 36–39
(i) Religion 36–39
(ii) Culture and language 36–42

(e) Privacy. 36–43
(f) Freedom of trade, occupation and profession. 36–46
(g) Slavery, servitude and forced labour 36–49
(h) Expression 36–52
(i) Pornography and child pornography 36–52
(ii) Hate speech 36–53
(iii) Defamation. 36–55
(i) Socio-Economic Rights 36–58
36.5 Dignity's possibilities 36–62
(a) Dignity and transformation 36–62
(i) Dignity as a regulative ideal 36–62
(ii) Dignity and the politics of capability 36–65
(b) Dignity and the imaginary domain 36–70
(c) Dignity and trans-cultural jurisprudence. 36–71

1. Founding Provisions: The Republic of South Africa is one, sovereign, democratic state founded on the following values: (a) Human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms.

7. Rights: (1) This Bill of Rights is a cornerstone of democracy in South Africa. It enshrines the rights of all people in our country and affirms the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom.

10. Human Dignity: Everyone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected.

36. Limitations: (1) The rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited only in terms of law of general application to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom.

39. Interpretation: (1) When interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court, tribunal or forum must promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom.

165. Judicial authority: (4) Organs of state, through legislative and other measures, must assist and protect the courts to ensure the independence, impartiality, dignity, accessibility and effectiveness of the courts.

181. Establishment and governing principles [of Chapter 9 Institutions]: (3) Other organs of state, through legislative and other measures, must assist and protect these institutions to ensure the independence, impartiality, dignity and effectiveness of these institutions.

196. Public Service Commission: (3) Other organs of state, through legislative and other measures, must assist and protect the commission to ensure the independence, impartiality, dignity and effectiveness of the Commission.[1]

36.1 Introduction

As essentially a court lawyer, with no formal training in philosophy, I dare to take my stand on Kant because his imperatives encapsulate for me, by way of contrast and in the rationally most compelling manner that I have been able to discover, what was so obscene about apartheid. It serves as a constant reminder of our very ugly recent past. As a reforming Constitution, it is right that human dignity should be so highly valued.

Laurie Ackermann[2]

(a) History of dignity

South Africa boasts one of the world's most developed bodies of dignity jurisprudence. Only the Federal Constitutional Court's gloss on the meaning of dignity in Germany's Basic Law can match the richness of our Constitutional Court's account.

* I count myself extremely fortunate to have worked with Drucilla Cornell on this chapter. Professor Cornell not only recognized the Kantian character of our nascent body of jurisprudence, but possessed the imagination to see how a proper understanding of Kant might help us transcend the current limits of the black letter law. Although Professor Cornell disagrees strongly with some of the positions taken in this chapter, anyone familiar with her writing will recognize her handiwork in these pages. I am indebted to Laurie Ackermann for a lengthy, detailed and instructive critique of an early draft of this chapter. I further extend my thanks to Anthony Stein, Michael Bishop and Courtenay Sprague for their expert editorial interventions. All errors in argument and infelicities in style remain my responsibility alone.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('FC' or 'Final Constitution').

[2] LWH Ackermann 'The Legal Nature of the South African Constitutional Revolution' (2004) 4 New Zealand Law Review 650('Legal Nature').

As the epigram from Justice Ackermann suggests, the richness of this jurisprudence flows, in part, from South African history. The Truth and Reconciliation Commission ('TRC'), for example, recognized that dignity has its roots in the simple idea that justice consists of the refusal to turn away from suffering. The TRC's unflinching commitment to the provision of a historical record of such suffering under apartheid counts as the first step in our moral re-awakening. However, the demands of dignity trace an arc that extends beyond the narrow duty to refuse to turn away from suffering to a broader duty to recognize our fellow citizens as agents capable of governing themselves. The granting of a truly universal franchise, and its exercise in the election of Nelson Mandela in 1994 (and in every other subsequent election), constitutes formal recognition of the capacity of each person to legislate for him or her self. The history of dignity in South Africa does not end there. The formal recognition of our compatriots as autonomous moral agents ratifies an even wider obligation to assist our compatriots in the conversion of their innate talents into capabilities that will, in turn, enable them to realize their preferred way of being in the world. When refracted through the prism of dignity, the Final Constitution extends our obligations, beyond the franchise and those civil liberties that permit us to legislate for ourselves, to socio-economic rights that guarantee the material transformation of the lives of each and every South African.[1] This brief history of our new-found ability to recognize the inherent dignity of our fellow South Africans is meant to suggest how the extension of this right progresses from mere duties of justice to duties of virtue that have as their aim the qualitative perfection of humanity.[2]

[1] See S Liebenberg 'The Value of Human Dignity in Interpreting Socio-Economic Rights' (2005) 21 SAJHR 1 (Respect for human dignity requires society to respect the equal worth of the poor by marshalling its resources to redress the conditions that perpetuate their marginalisation.)

[2] Dignity dominates our literary, as well as our legal, history. It is, arguably, the chief leitmotif of JM Coetzee's work. From the halting efforts of the magistrate to 'see' his blind concubine in Waiting for the Barbarians, to the death march of the protagonist in Life and Times of Michael K, to the respect accorded animals in Disgrace and Elizabeth Costello, to the demand that we bear witness to the pain, as well as the struggle for autonomy, of a fictional character in Slow Man, Coetzee asks that we do more than acknowledge the existence of our fellow beings — human, animal, fictive. They may not be entitled to our love. (They may, indeed, be unlovable.) But they are all entitled to their dignity. Moreover, the dignity of which Coetzee speaks follows an arc of widening obligation strikingly similar to the constitutional concerns that animate this chapter. He moves, over time, from dignity as the refusal to turn away, to dignity as the formal recognition of others as ends, to dignity as the capacity to see others as they see themselves — a challenge that is especially great when that other is neither human nor animal, but, as in the case of Paul Rayment, entirely fictional.

As to the phrase, 'qualitative perfection of humanity', I have here, in mind, the constellation of features captured by the terms 'mensch' (Yiddish) or 'menschkeit' (German). These terms represent, at bottom, a goal of every human being: to rise above our passions and, in every moral transaction, to attempt to turn ourselves, as Henry James said, into persons 'upon whom nothing is lost'. See H James The Art of the Novel (1907) 149.

Despite its deep and profound resonance with South African history, dignity is manifestly not like Auden's valley cheese — 'local, but prized everywhere'. The Constitutional Court quite consciously draws upon two exogenous sources.[1]

First, the Court traces dignity's place in the pantheon of political thought back to Immanuel Kant.[2] The existing corpus of South Africa's dignity jurisprudence tracks, in a surprisingly direct manner, the trajectory of Kant's ethical thought, and, in particular, his various formulations of the categorical imperative.[3] The Court's jurisprudence turns, as we shall see, in ever widening gyres of obligation: moving outward from 'the refusal to turn away' as manifest in the death penalty

[1] Such potted histories necessarily verge on caricature. As a corrective, Laurie Ackermann suggests that an historical account of dignity's South African roots must take note of another endogenous source: the Roman-Dutch law of personality. See LWH Ackermann 'The Significance of Human Dignity for Constitutional Jurisprudence' (Lecture, Stellenbosch Law Faculty, 15 August 2005)(Manuscript on file with author) § 6 (Personality rights include the rights to dignity, life and bodily integrity, physical liberty, autonomy, reputation, feelings, privacy, self-realisation and identity.) See also J Neethling, JM Potgeiter & PJ Visser Neethling's Law of Personality (2nd Edition, 2005) 24-38; WA Joubert Grondslae van die Persoonlikheidsreg (1953); Whittaker v Roos and Bateman; Morant v Roos and Bateman 1912 AD 92, 122; Universiteit van Pretoria v Tommie Meyer Films (Edms) Bpk 1977 (4) SA 376, 381 (T); Jansen van Vuuren & Another NNO v Kruger 1993 (4) SA 842, 849 (A); National Media Ltd v Jooste 1996 (3) SA 262, 272 (A).

Other authors have suggested that the African concept of 'ubuntu' and dignity draw on quite similar moral intuitions. See Y Mokgoro 'Ubuntu and the Law in South Africa' (1998) 4 Buffalo Human Rights LR 15; D Cornell & K van Marle 'Interpreting Ubuntu: Possibilities for Freedom in the New South Africa' (2006) 6 African Human Rights LJ — (forthcoming); D Cornell 'A Call for a Nuanced Jurisprudence' (2004) 19 SA Public Law 661; M Pieterse 'Traditional' African Jurisprudence' in C Roederer & D Moellendorf (eds) Jurisprudence (2004) 441; IG Kroeze 'Doing Things with Values (Part 2): The Case of Ubuntu' (2002) 13 Stellenbosch LR 252; R English 'Ubuntu: The Quest for an Indigenous Jurisprudence' (1996) 12 SAJHR 641. See also S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC)('Makwanyane') at paras 224-225 (Langa J)(Ubuntu captures, conceptually, 'a culture which places some emphasis on communality and on the interdependence of the members of a community. It recognises a person's status as a human being, entitled to unconditional respect, dignity, value and acceptance from the members of the community such a person happens to be part of. It also entails the converse, however. The person has a corresponding duty to give the same respect, dignity, value and acceptance to each member of that community. More importantly, it regulates the exercise of rights by the emphasis it lays on sharing and co-responsibility and the mutual enjoyment of rights by all.' (Emphasis added).)

[2] For both the drafters of the Final Constitution and for Kant, the ideal basic law attempts to give adequate effect to three sometimes covalent, sometimes conflicting 'ideas': dignity, equality and freedom. Of this ideal basic law, Kant writes:

> Surely an organisation consisting of the greatest human freedom according to the laws through which the freedom of each can coexist with that of the others (not an organisation consisting of the greatest happiness, for this will no doubt follow on its own) is at least a necessary idea. It is an idea that we must lay at the basis not merely in first drafting a political Constitution, but also in all laws; and in so doing we must initially abstract from the present obstacles, which perhaps may not so much arise inevitably from human nature, as arise, rather, from our neglecting the genuine ideas in making laws.

I Kant Critique of Pure Reason (trans W Pluhar, 1996) 364.

[3] Despite the rather conservative cast of many of Kant's actual political positions — his opposition to suicide and his support for the death penalty — and some rather mystical and outré metaphysical commitments — his commitment to a noumenal free will — contemporary philosophers are willing and able 'to transpose Kants' writing, hearing them in a different key . . . from that in which they were and corporal punishment judgments, to 'the equal respect' accorded non-traditional forms of intimate association in the gay and lesbian rights cases, to 'the collective responsibility for the material conditions required for agency' contemplated in recent socio-economic rights decisions.

Second, the Court recognizes that the history of dignity is a history of the world after World War II.[1] It is no accident that dignity occupies a central place in German constitutional jurisprudence: for 'dignity' is the flip-side of 'never again'. And just as the Germans have promised not to shovel people into stoves, so too have South Africans promised never again to treat people like cattle to be packed off to bantustans or to be slaughtered in the middle of the night. Dignity, like the words 'never again', may now have a new and deeper meaning post-Third Reich and post-apartheid. But 'dignity', like 'never again', writes Alan Ryan, has, in fact, 'been the watchword all along.'[2] Ultimately, that watchword always returns us to first principles: the refusal to turn away.

(b) Structure of the chapter

This chapter engages the constitutional 'watchword' of dignity in a number of discrete, but ultimately related, ways. It sets out comprehensively the black letter law in § 36.2, § 36.3 and § 36.4. Section 36.2 offers a number of working definitions of 'dignity'. While these five definitions reflect different extensions of the term, I shall argue that these different definitions are, in fact, variations on a single theme: Kant's notion of the individual as an autonomous moral agent. Section 36.3 shows how dignity operates — as a first order rule, a second order rule, a correlative right, a value and a grundnorm — in both the text of the Final Constitution and in the judgments of our courts. Section 36.4 catalogues and critiques the courts' use of dignity to work out the extension of various other substantive provisions in the Bill of Rights. In § 36.5, I return to more speculative observations about how dignity operates as rule, value and ideal. Here I answer the 'realist charge' that dignity means anything and everything, and therefore nothing. I offer, in place of the realist critique, an account of dignity that I believe best fits both the remedial purpose and the overall structure of the Final Constitution. This originally written.' AW Wood 'What is Kantian Ethics' in I Kant Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals (ed and trans by AW Wood, 2002) 157. In part to disarm critics who might charge me with dilettantism, it must be stressed that the author is not a Kantian scholar and makes no claims, at all, about the best possible reading of Kant. The 'arguments' offered in these pages about Kant serve the much more modest aim of providing an analytical framework through which we might better understand the normative claims that hold our extant dignity jurisprudence together. (Moreover, my engagement with Kant is a function of the Court's own explicit, if sometimes cryptic, references to his conception of dignity.)

[1] The former Chief Justice of the Constitutional Court has acknowledged South Africa's debt to post-World World II constitutional jurisprudence. See A Chaskalson 'Human Dignity as a Foundational Value of our Constitutional Order' (2000) 16 SAJHR 193, 196 ('The affirmation of human dignity as a foundational value of the constitutional order places our legal order firmly in line with the development of constitutionalism in the aftermath of the second world war.') account explains why dignity must function as both a rule and a regulative ideal and imagines how dignity, properly understood, might serve the ends of a trans-cultural jurisprudence that would give equal weight to — or at least mediate — African and European conceptions of justice.

[2] A Ryan 'After the Fall: Judt's Postwar: A History of Europe Since 1945' New York Review of Books Volume LII, No 17 (3 November 2005) 16, 19.

(c) Methodological concerns

A word or two of explanation about this chapter's method is in order before I set out the black letter law below.

First, neither the emphasis on the actual manner in which the courts have used and defined dignity, nor the effort to distinguish first order rules from second order rules should lead the reader to conclude that I aim to offer a purely positivist account of this body of law.[1]

Second, if the point of a positivist account (shorn of more controversial jurisprudential baggage) is to construct a taxonomy of all the rules that constitute the law of dignity — made up of the primary rules that impose legal obligations and the secondary rules that govern the application and the interpretation of primary rules — then my account does do something like that. But it does so only because all lawyers and academics attempting to understand dignity require a Baedeker of this sort to make their way through a complex body of jurisprudence.

Third, such a Baedeker alone is insufficient to the task of explanation. In the first place, legal rules often perform more than a single function.[2] Not only do different denotations of dignity operate as different kinds of rules, the very same definition of 'dignity' may operate as both a primary rule and a secondary rule. In the second place, while the word 'dignity' may not be so open-textured as to be the basic unit in a jurisprudential 'Lego-land', its multiple uses confound all attempts to reduce the courts' jurisprudence to a finite number of rules.[3]

[1] Not even HLA Hart, with whom the nomenclature of primary rules and secondary rules is most often associated, assumes that such rules exhaust the universe of obligations. See HLA Hart The Concept of Law (1961).

[2] See JW Harris Legal Philosophies (1980) 105 - 109. In the accepted parlance of legal positivism, primary rules are generally understood to impose duties and obligations, while secondary rules, which are parasitic on the existence of primary rules, determine how primary rules are to be applied or to be altered. See Hart (supra) at 77–96. However, I use 'first order rule' and 'second order rule' in a technical sense not meant to evoke passionate debate about the virtues and vices of legal positivism. First order rules resolve disputes; second order rules assist in the interpretation of — though they do not necessarily determine — the content of first order rules in a manner that permits resolution of disputes. See S Woolman 'Review of Corder and Du Plessis Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights' (1996) 112 SALJ 711, 715. See also T Morawetz 'Understanding Disagreement, the Root Issue of Jurisprudence: Applying Wittgenstein to Positivism, Critical Theory and Judging' (1992) 141 University of Pennsylvania LR 371.

[3] For an example of dignity's simultaneous application as a first order rule, a second order rule, a correlative right and a value, see Moseneke & Others v The Master 2001 (2) SA 18 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 103 (CC) at paras 22–24 (Provision of Black Administration Act providing that Master of High Court had no power to handle intestate estates of black South Africans found to be both a limitation of FC s 9 — equality — because it 'assails the dignity of those concerned' and a 'limitation of the right to dignity in [FC] s 10.' Neither limitation could be justified in a state based upon the values of 'human dignity, equality and freedom.') Different judges have used dignity in different ways to resolve the very same dispute. See Daniels v Campbell 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 735 (CC)(Majority uses dignity as a

Fourth, two distinct dangers attach to a purely positivist account of dignity: (a) formally fair rules may mask substantially unjust arrangements;[1] (b) once a constitutional norm such as dignity is reduced to rules, obedience to the law tends to supplant considerations of justice as the primary end of our political community.[2] We need to be regularly reminded that the legal rules that the right to dignity produces are only as good as the everyday ethical practices that inform, and regularly transform, those rules.[3]

36.2 Definitions of dignity

This section identifies five primary definitions of dignity in the Court's jurisprudence. One aim of this taxonomy is to demonstrate how these five definitions draw down on the same basic insight: that we recognize all individuals as ends-in-themselves capable of self-governance. (Put pithily, each definition of dignity emphasizes a different dimension of our status as autonomous moral agents.) I suggest how these definitions build upon this common insight and interpenetrate one another to yield a theory of 'dignity.'

value to engage in statutory interpretation that permits Intestate Succession Act to be read in conformity with Final Constitution. Moseneke J, in dissent, found that the right to equality and the right to dignity had been violated, and that any legislative remedy for the violation must conform with such foundational values as dignity. Thus, dignity functions in these two judgments in the very same case as a first order rule, a second order rule, a correlative right, a value and a grundnorm.)

[1] For example, John Finnis somewhat cheekily observes that 'the rule of law' is 'the name commonly given to the state of affairs in which a legal system is legally in good shape.' J Finnis Natural Law and Natural Rights (1980) 270. But a commitment to the rule of law alone and to the formal features of law identified with it — is a necessary but not a sufficient condition for a just or a fair society. For more on those formal criteria, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 34. As Finnis notes, regimes that are exploitative or ideologically fanatical (or some mixture of the two) could submit themselves to the constraints imposed by the rule of law if it served the realization of their narrow conception of the good. Indeed, both Stephen Ellmann and David Dyzenhaus argue persuasively that the South African government under apartheid was an exploitative and ideologically fanatical regime committed to the rule of law. See S Ellmann In a Time of Trouble: Law and Security in South Africa's State of Emergency (1992); D Dyzenhaus Hard Cases in Wicked Legal Systems: South African Law in the Perspective of Legal Philosophy (1991). See also J Dugard Human Rights and the South African Legal Order (1981). Here then are two additional points about the limits of a positivist account. Although the rule of law did constrain the apartheid state — and even allowed for a cramped conception of human rights — few would allow that it was fair or just. What it was missing was any respect for individual dignity and the attendant sense that the purpose of state was to assist all persons to 'constitute themselves in community'. Finnis (supra) at 270–271. In addition, although the two most important constitutional doctrines developed by the Constitutional Court in its first decade of operation turn on a substantive conception of the rule of law and an account of dignity that makes it a grundnorm for the Final Constitution, those two doctrines alone are insufficient to guarantee the legitimacy of the new regime. For more on the rule of law, see F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11.

[2] On the relationship between rule-following behaviour, obedience to authority, and justice, see § 36.5*(a)* infra.

[3] For a discussion of dignity as a regulative ideal that enables us to transcend the limits of dignity as a first order rule, see § 36.5*(a)*(i) infra.

At the same time, one must recognize that the Court's definitions yield, at best, a partial theory of dignity.[1] It falls then to commentators such as myself to flesh out the Court's theory, to identify the particular definition(s) or dimension(s) of dignity being deployed in a given case, and to explain, more importantly, (a) how the Court responds when one denotation of dignity conflicts with another denotation of dignity and (b) how the Court determines when one such denotation must yield to another. It should go without saying that only after one has identified, as fully as possible, the various conceptions of dignity that animate the Court's reasoning does one earn the right to engage them critically.

(a) Individual as an end-in-herself (Dignity 1)

Justice Ackermann, the Court's original exponent of dignity, grounds the first definition of dignity in two sources that we have already identified: apartheid and the work of Immanuel Kant:

> [I]t is permissible and indeed necessary to look at the ills of the past which [the Constitution] seeks to rectify and in this way try to establish what equality and dignity mean? What lay at the heart of the apartheid pathology was the extensive and sustained attempt to deny to the majority of the South African population the right of self-identification and self-determination . . . Who you were, where you could live, what schools and universities you could attend, what you could do and aspire to, and with whom you could form intimate personal relationship was determined for you by the state . . . That state did its best to deny to blacks that which is definitional to being human, namely the ability to understand or at least define oneself through ones own powers and to act freely as a moral agent pursuant to such understanding of self-definition. Blacks were treated as means to an end and hardly ever as an end in themselves; an almost complete reversal of the Kantian imperative and concept of priceless inner worth and dignity.[2]

For Kant, as for Ackermann, the recognition of every human being's inherent dignity takes the form of an apparent variation on the golden rule,[3] the categorical imperative: 'Act in such a way that you always treat humanity, whether in your

[1] A Constitutional Court, particularly in its first few years, moves slowly. It might even be true — as a normative matter — that a Constitutional Court, as Laurie Ackermann suggests, 'ought not, even if it could, try to enunciate a total philosophical system based upon dignity.' Correspondence with Laurie Ackermann (26 January 2006)(on file with the author). See also A Honoré Ulpian: Pioneer of Human Rights (2002)('[I]t is a mistake to attribute to a lawyer a system of philosophy rather than a set of values.') Academics, however, are not subject to the same constraints as a court of law. The purpose of a book such as this is to offer a good faith reconstruction of the court's various doctrines, and then ask whether, in fact, such doctrines meet minimal criteria of coherence, and if they do, whether they are, ultimately, desirable.

[2] Ackermann 'Legal Nature' (supra) at 650.

[3] As a technical matter, Kant actually rejects the golden rule as a maxim for ethical action. See I Kant Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals (trans and ed AW Wood, 2002)('Groundwork') 46–47. He does so because the golden rule permits our individual inclinations to determine outcomes ('as you would have them do onto you') and does not require the attempt at moral perfection (through reason) demanded by the procedures associated with the categorical imperative. See TW Pogge 'The Categorical Imperative' in P Guyer (ed) Critical Essays on Kant's Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals (1998) 189, 191 (For Kant, 'the categorical imperative is not a version of the Golden Rule.') See also J Rawls Lectures on the History of Moral Philosophy (2000)('Lectures') 199.

own person or in the person of another, never simply as a means, but always at the same time as an end.'[1]

Stated in Kant's uncompromising terms, such an ethical algorithm might seem impossible to enact.[2] We all know that, even with the best of intentions, many of [1] Kant Groundwork (supra) at 45–46. See also D Meyerson Rights Limited (1997) 12 (Refers to this formulation of the categorical imperative as a heuristic device through which we might better understand our own basic law.) That Kant should be identified as a source for constitutional doctrine in South Africa is not as outlandish a proposition as it may initially sound. In his commentary on German constitutional law and its dignity jurisprudence, Donald Kommers identifies three 'politically significant sources of ethical theory': Christian natural law, Kantian thought and social democratic thought. D Kommers The Constitutional Jurisprudence of the Federal Republic of Germany (2nd Edition, 1997) 304.

The above variation of the categorical imperative is, in fact, Kant's second formulation. See Rawls Lectures (supra) at 181. Kant's numerous restatements of the second formulation enhance our understanding of his meaning (and that of our first definition). First, he writes: 'A reasonable and rational being in virtue of its nature is an end and consequently an end in itself, and must serve for every maxim as a condition limiting all merely relative and arbitrary ends.' Groundwork (supra) at 53. He then places the following gloss on the second formulation: 'So act in relation to every reasonable and rational being (both yourself and others) that that being may at the same time count as an end in itself.' Ibid at 55–56. The second formulation turns our attention to the nature of other moral agents as rational beings, who, like our own selves, are entitled to treatment as ends in themselves. The second formulation also makes, what is for Kant and for us moderns, a crucial distinction: between things which have a price — and are therefore fungible — and things which have no price — and thus have no replacement. Most of us think of ourselves and those we care about as priceless. Kant asks us to extend that recognition to all human beings: for they, like us, view themselves and their significant others as irreplaceable. See AW Wood 'Humanity as an End in Itself' in P Guyer (ed) Critical Essays on Kant's Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals (1998) 165, 170 (Wood 'Humanity as an End')(Defines the term 'individual as an end-in-itself' as 'an end with absolute worth or (as Kant also says) dignity, something whose value cannot be compared to, traded off against, or compensated for or replaced by any other value.')

[2] Kant did not view this principle as impossible to enact. Indeed, as Rawls notes, Kant found moral pietism offensive and conceived of the categorical imperative as a 'mode of reflection that could order and moderate the scrutiny of our motives in a reasonable way.' Rawls Lectures (supra) at 149. Perhaps the best way to characterize Kant's categorical imperative is as a reflective check, albeit a demanding one, on our moral intuitions. A contemporary example of such a reflective check — and one that continues to do a great deal of heavy lifting — is Rawls' own 'veil of ignorance'. See J Rawls A Theory of Justice (1972). Like the categorical imperative, the veil of ignorance serves as an intuition pump for claims about distributive justice by forcing us to forsake any knowledge of our current position in society before we begin debate on how various social goods are to be allocated. Both intuition pumps are designed to eliminate illicit information that might otherwise skew (or justify) the criteria for the distribution of important goods in favour of those who already satisfy the requisite desiderata for the distribution of those goods. See, eg, Pogge (supra) at 206 ('The categorical imperative is . . . a general procedure for constructing morally relevant thought experiments. . . [T]he categorical imperative amplifies my conscience by transforming the decision from one of marginal significance into one concerning the world at large, and also isolates my conscience by screening out personal considerations that might affect my choice of maxims but are irrelevant to my decisions about how through legislation to specify a realm of ends.')

John Rawls further claims that the categorical imperative — like the veil of ignorance — is not an 'algorithm intended to yield, more or less mechanically, a correct judgment.' Rawls Lectures (supra) at 166. Nor, he continues, is it correct to describe the categorical imperative as a set of rules to catch out liars, cynics and cheats. 'There are' Rawls says, 'no such rules.' Ibid. Kant, however, would seem to believe that his categorical imperative possesses such teeth — and generates such rules — when he argues that if we were to try to universalize a false promise, the universality of such a law 'would make promising, and the very purpose of promising, itself impossible: since no one would believe they were being promised anything, but would laugh at utterances of this kind as empty shams.' Kant Groundwork (supra) at 39. First, the procedure produces a universal law — promise-keeping — that secures the status of a law of nature. Second, given that promise-keeping comes to possess, in the adjusted social world associated with the myriad interactions we have with our fellow human beings will be almost entirely instrumental. We know that whether we are taking decisions for a family, a classroom of students, a neighbourhood, a town, a province or a nation, some form of a utilitarian calculus — the greatest good for the greatest number — will enter into our considerations. And we know that the relational or communitarian quality of ethics is such that we will often privilege the claims of family, kin, neighbourhood or nation over more general or universal claims.[1]

How then to understand Kant in a way that is neither sentimental nor woolly? Consider Oscar Schachter's gloss on the categorical imperative: 'Respect for the intrinsic worth of every person should mean that individuals are not to be perceived or treated merely as instruments or objects of the will of others.'[2] Dignity, on this account, sets a floor below which ethical — and legal — behaviour may not fall. Although some relationships will be purely instrumental, no individual person can be treated as a mere instrument over the entire domain of her social interactions. This floor supports — as the Dawood Court suggests — Chapter 2's express prohibitions on slavery, servitude and forced labour.[3] This definition of dignity also bars punishments that either extinguish the humanity of another entirely — say, the death penalty — or through their disproportionality reduce a human being to a mere signal within a large and impersonal system of social control.[4] the maxim, the status of a universal law, the burden shifts to the false promiser to offer a maxim that justifies her action while still safeguarding the social practice of promising.

---

A syllogism may clarify how the categorical imperative operates and the extent to which it determines whether a particular act accords human beings generally the requisite level of dignity.

1. One must always respect humanity as an end in itself in one's own person as well as in the person of another.
2. The act of suicide always fails to respect humanity in one's own person as an end in itself.
3. Therefore, one must never commit suicide.

Wood 'Humanity as an End' (supra) at 181. As Wood notes, however, because step 2 — the 'intermediate premise' or minor premise — is logically independent of step 1 — the second formulation of the categorical imperative or the major premise — one may raise 'legitimate questions about which acts express respect or disrespect for humanity.' Ibid at 181. Thus, although the categorical imperative does effectively screen out many personal considerations in the process of ethical decision-making, it does not distinguish, unequivocally, all acts that respect humanity from all acts that disrespect humanity. (It would be wrong, however, to claim, as some do, that the categorical imperative always begs the question as to whether an act constitutes an act that respects humanity.)

[1] See C Lamore Patterns of Moral Complexity (1986)(Argues that deontological, utilitarian and communitarian claims describe different dimensions of moral obligation, and that no one dimension can be made wholly subordinate to another.) For decidedly more deontological, but still quite plastic views on the sources of obligation, see B Williams Ethics and the Limits of Philosophy (1985); A Sen Collective Choice and Social Welfare (1979).

[2] O Schachter 'Human Dignity as a Normative Concept' (1983) 77 American J of Int L 848, 849 (Emphasis added).

[3] For more on the relationship between dignity and the prohibitions of slavery, servitude and forced labour, see § 36.4*(e)* and S Woolman & M Bishop 'Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 64.

[4] For more on the relationship between dignity and sentencing, see § 36.4*(c)*(iii) infra, and D Van Zyl Smit 'Sentencing and Punishment' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 49.

(b) Equal concern and equal respect (Dignity 2)

Another version of Kant's moral law — more accurately described as a principle of justice — yields another dimension of dignity: 'Any action is right if it can coexist with everyone's freedom in accordance with a universal law, or if on its maxim the freedom of choice of each can coexist with everyone's freedom in accordance with a universal law.'[1] This primarily negative obligation not to treat another merely as a means and to recognize in that other the ability to act as an autonomous moral agent underwrites a conception of dignity as a formal entitlement to equal concern and to equal respect.[2] From this conception of dignity as an entitlement to equal concern and to equal respect, the Constitutional Court has constructed two different, though not entirely distinct, tests in terms of FC s 9 (the right to equality): (1) a right to equal treatment which ensures (a) that the law does not irrationally differentiate between classes of persons and (b) that the law does not reflect the 'naked preferences' of government; and (2) a right to equal treatment that guarantees that individuals are not subject to unfair discrimination on the basis of largely ascriptive characteristics.[3] Of this demand for equal concern and equal respect, Justice Ackermann writes:

> [A]t the heart of the prohibition of unfair discrimination lies the recognition that the purpose of our new constitutional and democratic order is the establishment of a society in which all human beings will be accorded equal dignity and respect regardless of their membership in particular groups. The achievement of such a society in the context of our deeply inegalitarian past will not be easy, but that that is the goal of the Constitution should not be forgotten or overlooked.[4]

---

[1] See I Kant Metaphysics of Morals (1797) (trans M Gregor 1991) 56, 231, 395 ('Metaphysics of Morals')(Kant reiterates the same principle as: (1) 'Every action is right which by itself or by its maxim enables the freedom of each individual will to co-exist with the freedom of everyone else in accordance with the universal law'; and (2) 'Act according to the maxim of ends which it can be a universal law for everyone to have.')

[2] Kant offers a more accessible, and less rarefied, account of dignity as equal concern and equal respect in the Metaphysics of Morals, when he writes:

> [A] human being regarded as a person . . . is exalted above any price; for as a person . . . he is not to be valued merely as a means to the ends of others or even to his own ends, but as an end in itself, that is, he possesses a dignity (an absolute inner worth) by which he exacts respect for himself from all other rational beings in the world. He can measure himself with every other being of this kind and value himself on a footing of equality with them.

Ibid at 557 (emphasis added).

[3] See President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC)('Hugo') at para 41 ('[T]he purpose of our new constitutional and democratic order is the establishment of a society in which all human beings will be accorded equal respect regardless of their membership in particular groups.' (Emphasis added).)

[4] LWH Ackermann 'Equality under the 1996 South African Constitution' in Rüdiger Wolfrem (eds) Gleichheit und Nichtdiskriminierung im Nationalen und Internationalen Meschenrechtsschutz (2003) 105. See also Law v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) (1999) 170 DLR 4th 1 (SCC) at para 51 ('Human dignity means that an individual or group feels self-respect and self-worth. It is concerned with physical and psychological integrity and empowerment. Human dignity is harmed by unfair treatment premised upon personal traits or circumstances which do not relate to individual needs, capacities or merits. It is enhanced by laws which are sensitive to the needs, capacities and merits of different individuals, taking into account the context underlying their differences. Human dignity is harmed when individuals and groups are marginalized, ignored or devalued, and is enhanced when laws recognize the full place of all individuals and groups within Canadian society.')

(c) Self-actualization (Dignity 3)

Another formulation of the categorical imperative shapes a third strand of the Court's dignity jurisprudence. Kant writes: 'Act only on the maxim through which you can at the same time will that it should become a universal law.'[1] Here, the term that warrants the closest scrutiny is 'will'. For Kant, the hallmark of humanity is its ability to 'will' or to shape its ends through 'reason'. But when Kant writes that our humanity consists, at least in part, in our power to rationally set and will an end, he is not speaking solely of an individual's capacity to adopt an end for purely moral reasons. While Kant certainly contends that the defining feature of humanity is our capacity to overcome our instincts and that we are only truly free when we are moral, he maintains that we define ourselves — and our humanity — through the rational choice of all of our ends and not just those that are explicitly moral. This broader capacity to create meaning — to 'will' value into the world — gives rise to the modern political pre-occupation with 'self-actualization'.[2] An individual's capacity to create meaning generates an entitlement to respect for the unique set of ends that the individual pursues. In Ferreira v Levin, Justice Ackermann writes:

> Human dignity cannot be fully valued or respected unless individuals are able to develop their humanity, their 'humanness' to the full extent of its potential. Each human being is uniquely talented. Part of the dignity of every human being is the fact and awareness of this uniqueness. An individual's human dignity cannot be fully respected or valued unless the individual is permitted to develop his or her unique talents optimally. Human dignity has little value without freedom; for without freedom personal development and fulfilment are not possible. Without freedom, human dignity is little more than an abstraction. Freedom and dignity are inseparably linked. To deny people their freedom is to deny them their dignity.[3]

Dignity, properly understood, secures the space for self-actualisation.[4] That said,

[1] Kant Groundwork (supra) at 37–38 ('Act as if the maxim of your action were to become through your will a universal law of nature.')

[2] See, eg, C Korsgaard Creating the Kingdom of Ends (1996) 106–131.

[3] Ferreira v Levin 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira') at para 49.

[4] The majority in Ferreira rejected Justice Ackermann's view that IC s 11(1) and FC s 12(1) contain a robust, self-standing freedom right. Ibid at paras 170–185 (Chaskalson P). The Constitutional Court accepted, subsequently, Ackermann J's thesis that dignity (FC s 10) is meant to secure the space for self-actualisation (autonomy). However, this characterization of self-actualisation turns not on a commitment to political participation (Dignity 4) or to social entitlements (Dignity 5) — also known as 'positive liberty' or 'freedom to' — but primarily on a commitment to limiting state power — also known as negative liberty or 'freedom from'. The Court's conception of dignity qua freedom (autonomy) is elaborated in a series of early equality cases. See, eg, Hugo (supra) at para 41 ('[D]ignity is at the heart of individual rights in a free and democratic society'); Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC)('Prinsloo'); National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('NCGLE I'). See also N Haysom 'Dignity' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom (eds) South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 131-132.

however, dignity qua self-actualisation describes only a political, and not a metaphysical, state.[1]

(d) Self-governance (Dignity 4)

A third formulation of the categorical imperative helps us to identify a fourth dimension of dignity.[2] An essential feature of the constitutional politics that issues from the categorical imperative is the recognition of the ability of (almost) all human beings — through their capacity to reason — to legislate for themselves. Indeed, as we have just noted, it is our capacity for self-governance, and the fact that we are not simply slaves to our passions, that distinguishes man from beast. (Whether Kant is correct to make reason the sine qua non of humanity is another matter.[3]) Our capacity for self-governance — the capacity of (almost) all human

[1] See S Woolman 'The Selfless Constitution: Flourishing and Experimentation as the Foundations of the South African State' (2006) 21 SA Public Law – (forthcoming)(Self-actualization is not contingent upon the ability to will freely one's ends. Such a conception of freedom is a form of folk psychology. Rather, freedom consists primarily of having the capacity to participate in ways of being in the world that already give one's life the better part of its meaning); Wood 'Ethics' (supra) at 176 ('I doubt that Kant's extravagant metaphysics is the best we can do with this problem. The basic point, however, is that Kantian ethics is no more hostage to the free will problem than any other ethical theory would be that regards us as reasonable and self-governing beings'); D Cornell 'A Call for a Nuanced Constitutional Jurisprudence: Ubuntu, Dignity and Reconciliation' (2004) 19 SA Public Law 666, 667 ('[I]f we give Kantian dignity its broadest meaning, it is not associated with our actual freedom but with the postulation of ourselves as beings who not only can, but must, confront . . . ethical decisions, and in making those decisions . . . give value to our world.') For Kant — and no doubt some of the justices on the Constitutional Court — freedom does describe a metaphysical state. For Kant, this freedom consists of action in accordance with a maxim that satisfies the requirements of the categorical imperative. See I Kant Religion within the Limits of Reason Alone (trans TM Greene & HH Hudson, 1960) 24 ('Freedom of the will is of a wholly unique nature in that the incentive can determine the will only in so far as the individual has incorporated it into his maxim (has made it into the general rule in accordance with which he conducts himself).')

[2] See Rawls Lectures (supra) at 183 ('In the third formulation (that of autonomy) we come back again to the agent's point of view, but this time not as someone subject to moral requirements, but as someone who is, as it were, legislating universal law: here the [categorical imperative] procedure is seen as that procedure the adherence to which with a full grasp of its meaning enables us to regard ourselves as making law for a possible realm of ends.')

[3] See B Williams 'The Idea of Equality' in P Laslett & WG Runciman (eds) Philosophy, Politics and Society (1962) 111. Williams argues that the entitlement to equal treatment flows not, as in Kant, from the ability to reason, but primarily from the recognition that others have narratives (like our own) that shape their lives, that the pursuit of the ends in such narratives give life its meaning and that equal treatment requires that a person possess the material means necessary to make the pursuit of such ends genuinely possible. Kant was, however, uncompromising in his view that both reason and freedom are pre-conditions for a meaningful existence. On Kant's account:

> [I]n this world of ours there is only one kind of being with a causality that is teleological, that is, directed to purposes, but is yet so constituted that the law in terms of which these beings must determine their purposes is presented as unconditioned and independent of conditions in nature . . . That being is man . . . considered as a noumenon. Man is the only natural being in whom we . . . recognize, as part of his constitution, a supersensible ability (freedom). . . . [The principle of morality — the categorical imperative] is the only possible thing in the order of purposes that is absolutely unconditioned as concerns nature, and hence alone qualifies man, the subject of morality, to be the final purpose of creation.

beings to reason their way to the ends that give their lives meaning — is largely what makes democracy the only acceptable secular form of political organization. For if we are capable of shaping our own ends as individuals, equal political treatment demands that we be able to shape them as citizens in a democracy.[1] At a minimum, it means we must be able to participate in the collective decision-making processes that determine the ends of our community. As Justice Sachs notes in August v Electoral Commission:

> The universality of the franchise is important not only for nationhood and democracy. The vote of each and every citizen is a badge of dignity and of personhood. Quite literally, it says that everybody counts.[2]

This commitment to dignity qua self-governance is rather straightforward in the franchise cases.[3] However, dignity qua self-governance is, in fact, where the Constitutional Court falters most conspicuously. Dignity qua self-governance ought to promote the Court's commitment to representation reinforcing processes — most notably where our democratic processes cannot be profitably exploited by vulnerable minorities and out-groups. But Prince, Jordan, Volks and De Reuck sound cautionary notes about the extent to which the Court will extend itself on behalf of non-traditional associations, vocations or professions.[4] In these cases,

See I Kant The Critique of Judgment (trans JC Meredith, 1952) § 84. See also Rawls Lectures (supra) at 159. In sum, only man has the capacity to determine the laws of nature, to legislate them for himself (and others) and thus to be free in a way (of mere causality and desire) that no other entity (that we know of) is. One could subscribe to this vision of things without endorsing its religious dimensions. One could — indeed ought to — subscribe to this vision without the metaphysical baggage of an unconditioned noumenal self. One ought, however, to keep in mind that, for Kant, only by fashioning 'in ourselves a firm good will, and in shaping our world accordingly' would we qualify as the 'final purpose of creation.' Rawls Lectures (supra) at 162. According to Kant, absent such a good will — and a world shaped accordingly — there can be no justice, no dignity, and thus, as we noted at the outset, no reason for humanity to continue to exist.

[1] For what such equal treatment in a democracy requires, see T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 10.

[2] See August v Electoral Commission 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC) at para 17 (Emphasis added).

[3] See Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC); New National Party of South Africa v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 457 (CC).

[4] See Prince v Law Society 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC)('Prince'); S v Jordan & Others (Sex Workers Education and Advocacy Task Force & Others as Amici Curiae) 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC)('Jordan'); De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC); Volks v Robinson 2005 (5) BCLR 466 (CC)('Volks'). Sachs J, in dissent in both Prince and Volks, and as the author of Fourie, has begun to adumbrate a jurisprudence that values the meaning of non-dominant associations to their participants, but does not threaten the general principles to which the Final Constitution commits us. See Prince (supra) at para 149 ('[W]here there are [religious] practices that might fall within a general legal prohibition, but that do not involve any violation of the Bill of Rights, the Constitution obliges the State to walk the extra mile' and to find adequate means — perhaps a carefully constructed exemption — of accommodating the practice at issue.) See also Volks (supra) at paras 154 and 156 (Sachs J rejects the majority's finding that the appellant, 'having chosen cohabitation rather than marriage, . . . must bear the consequences' and thus could not avail herself of the benefits of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act. He contends that: 'Respecting autonomy means giving legal credence not only to a decision to marry but to choices that people make about alternative lifestyles. Such choices may be freely undertaken, either expressly or tacitly. Alternatively, they might be imposed by the unwillingness of one of the parties to marry the other. Yet if the resulting relationships the Court reinforces a traditional morality supported by a majority of South Africans and effectively undermines the efforts of these out-groups to determine the ends of their own lives.[1]

(e) Collective responsibility for the material conditions for agency (Dignity 5)

This failure to accord such out-groups the requisite level of equal respect is thrown into somewhat sharper relief by the fifth and final strand of the Court's dignity jurisprudence. Here the emphasis is not solely on the individual ends in our involve clearly acknowledged commitments to provide mutual support and to promote respect for stable family life, then the law should not . . . penalise or ignore them because they are unconventional. It should certainly not refuse them recognition because of any moral prejudice, whether open or unconscious, against them'); Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project v Minister of Home Affairs CCT 60/04; CCT 10/04 (unreported decision of 1 December 2005)('Fourie').

[1] To be clear, the Constitutional Court never dismisses cavalierly the interests of a vulnerable class of persons. The point is, rather, that traditional mores inform — sometimes more and sometimes less — explicitly the reasoning of the Court. So, for example, the Court in Jordan concludes that the criminalization of prostitution could not be said to impair the dignity of the prostitute because 'the diminution arose from the character of prostitution itself.' Jordan (supra) at para 74. And since prostitutes choose this ignominious fate, the Court continues, they have no one to blame for the stigma that attaches to their profession but themselves. Ibid at paras 16 –17 ('If the public sees the recipient of reward as being 'more to blame' than the 'client', and a conviction carries a greater stigma on the 'prostitute' for that reason, that is a social attitude and not the result of the law. The stigma that attaches to prostitutes attaches to them, not by virtue of their gender, but by virtue of the conduct they engage in.') Not only does the Court decline to take responsibility for the manner in which it reinforces such prejudice by upholding the law, it adamantly refuses to acknowledge the conditions of duress under which many sex workers operate. Ibid at para 16. ('It was accepted that they have a choice . . . that is limited or 'constrained'. Once it is accepted that . . . by engaging in commercial sex work prostitutes knowingly attract the stigma associated with prostitution, it can hardly be contended that female prostitutes are discriminated against.') Justice Sachs provides the putative grounds for upholding the legal sanctions for traditional taboos in NCGLE I:

> There are very few democratic societies, if any, which do not penalize persons for engaging in inter-generational, intra-familial, and cross-species sex, whether in public or in private . . . The privacy interest is overcome because of the perceived harm.

NCGLE I (supra) at para 118. Aside from the fact that most societies, historically, have not only permitted but promoted inter-generational sex, neither the invocation of tradition nor the pressure of the status quo counts as an argument. With respect, it is just this sort of non-argument argument about 'perceived harm', that makes it so difficult to secure judicial solicitude for aberrant practices. Justice Sachs uses 'democratic societies' as a rhetorical strategy to suggest that the Court shares the same set of values as the majority of South Africans. But it is an odd form of justification for a judge and a Court that prides itself on the protection it affords vulnerable groups and non-traditional associations. Indeed, the Court has recently rejected the contention that the trivial 'perceived harms' experienced by transient majorities are adequate grounds for imposing legal sanctions upon non-traditoinal associations. See, eg, Fourie (supra) at paras 60–61 (Sachs J)('Equality . . . does not presuppose . . . suppression of difference . . . Equality . . . does not imply . . . homogenisation of behaviour . . . . [T]here are a number of constitutional provisions that underline the constitutional value of acknowledging diversity and pluralism in our society, and give a particular texture to the broadly phrased right to freedom of association contained in section 18. Taken together, they affirm the right of people to self-expression without being forced to subordinate themselves to the cultural and religious norms of others, and highlight the importance of individuals and communities being able to enjoy what has been called the 'right to be different'. In each case, space has been found for members of communities to depart from a majoritarian norm.') realm of ends. The Court also contemplates a connotation of dignity that attaches to the realm as a whole.[1]

In a series of unfair discrimination and socio-economic rights cases, the Constitutional Court has made it clear that our commitment to dignity does not flow entirely from the inalienable rights of individuals. Whether it has engaged the stigma associated with HIV/AIDS, the urgent need for shelter, the entitlement of all to adequate food and water or the desperation associated with summary evictions, the Constitutional Court has, over the past several years, repeatedly emphasized the fact that

> It is not only the dignity of the poor that is assailed when homeless people are driven from pillar to post in a desperate quest for a place where they and their families can rest their heads. Our society as a whole is demeaned when state action intensifies rather than mitigates their marginalisation.[2]

Dignity, on this account, is not simply a constellation of duties owed by the state to each subject, or a set of entitlements that can be claimed by each member of the polity. Dignity is that which binds us together as a community, and it occurs only under conditions of mutual recognition. Moreover, such mutual recognition is not merely formal. The Court in Khosa notes that the Final Constitution commits us to an understanding of dignity in which > wealthier members of the community view the minimal well-being of the poor as connected with their personal well-being and the well-being of the community as a whole.[3]

The Court's account of dignity, which has heretofore supported various conditions required for the meaningful exercise of individual moral agency, now appears to describe dignity as a collective good. The case law even features a number of disputes in which the dignity interests of the collective are said to trump the dignity interests of an individual.[4]

---

[1] See Kant Groundwork (supra) at 51:

> I understand by a 'kingdom' a systematic union of different rational beings under common laws. Now since laws determine ends as regards their universal validity, we shall be able — if we abstract from the personal differences between rational beings, and also from the content of their private ends — to conceive of a whole of ends in systematic conjunction.

[2] See Port Elizabeth Municipality v Various Occupiers 2005 (1) SA 217 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1268 (CC) at para 18 (emphasis added).

[3] Khosa v Minister of Social Development 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 569 (CC)('Khosa') at para 74. The Court's language echoes Rawls' description of a Kantian 'realm of ends' in which > everyone recognizes everyone else as not only honouring their obligation of justice and duties of virtue, but also, as it were, legislating law for their moral commonwealth. For all know of themselves and of the rest that they are reasonable and rational, and that this fact is mutually recognized.

Rawls Lectures (supra) at 209. See also S Hoctor 'Dignity, Criminal Law and the Bill of Rights' (2004) 121 SALJ 265, 315 ('Dignity has a communitarian aspect: by requiring respect for others' claims to dignity, vindication of the human dignity of all is better assured, and a community of mutual co-operation and solidarity is fostered.')

[4] In two High Court judgments, the general public's right to receive information (Dignity 5) trumped the rather attenuated privacy claims of individuals who asserted a right to withhold information (Dignity 3). See S v Dube 2000 (2) SA 583 (N); MEC for Health, Mpumalanga v M-Net 2002 (6) SA 714 (T). See also § 36.4*(g)* infra, for a further discussion of these two expression/privacy/dignity cases.

But with the exception of a few apercu in the socio-economic rights cases, and an aside or two in a handful of other disputes, the Court rarely refers to our collective dignity.[1] The Court's circumspection, in this regard, suggests that it does not have in mind some neo-romantic conception of the political community.[2]

How then to comprehend dignity as a collective concern? What the Court wishes us to understand is that for dignity to be meaningful in South Africa, the political community as a whole must provide that basket of goods — including such primary goods as civil and political rights — which each member of the community requires in order to exercise some basic level of agency. This conception of dignity possesses several striking similarities to Amartya Sen's politics of capability.

For Sen, as for our Constitutional Court, the primary concern of the polity is not with wealth maximization. 'Wealth' as Aristotle wrote, 'is evidently not the good we are seeking; for it is merely useful and for the sake of something else.'[3] That something else, as Sen writes, is

> [t]he expansion of the 'capabilities' of persons to lead the kinds of lives they value — and have reason to value. . . . Having freedom to do the things one has reason to value is (1) significant in itself for the person's overall freedom, and (2) important in fostering the person's opportunity to have valuable outcomes.[4]

However, Sen's aims are not limited to fostering the agency of the individual. Individual agents should be understood both as ends-in-themselves and as the 'basic building blocks' of aggregate social development. The 'greater freedom' of

[1] One exception is S v Makwanyane, where Justice Langa connects ubuntu with the dignity of individuals and the solidarity of the community:

> [Ubuntu exists in] a culture which places some emphasis on communality and on the interdependence of the members of a community. It recognises a person's status as a human being, entitled to unconditional respect, dignity, value and acceptance from the members of the community such a person happens to be part of. It also entails the converse, however. The person has a corresponding duty to give the same respect, dignity, value and acceptance to each member of that community. More importantly, it regulates the exercise of rights by the emphasis it lays on sharing and co-responsibility and the mutual enjoyment of rights by all.

Makwanyane at paras 224-225 (Emphasis added).

[2] The purpose of the realm of ends has nothing to do with the romantic conception of a volk who would use the institutions of the state to give effect to their preferred way of being in the world. 'For the Kantian', says Wood, 'a community of rational beings must be conceived from the ground up as the rational agreement of a plurality of distinct and equal persons who freely choose to unite their ends on terms that respect each one's autonomy. The crucial thing . . . is not to determine a single given collective end.' Wood 'Ethics' (supra) at 162–163 (Emphasis added). According to Wood, 'For Kant the clearest model of a realm of ends in ordinary human life is friendship, in which . . . friends unite their ends in a collective end in which their individual happinesses are swallowed up.' Ibid at 167. This reading does not mean that individuals subordinate their individual goals to the goals of the collective. Individual narratives still matter. Friends are a model for the realm of ends because genuine friends act out of a disinterested desire to see their friends flourish, and for no immediate benefit to themselves. Friends are always ends.

[3] See Aristotle Nichomachean Ethics (trans D Ross 1980) Bk I, § 5, 7.

[4] A Sen Development as Freedom (1999) 18('Development').

individuals not only 'enhances the ability of people to help themselves and … to influence the world,' it is essential to the development of society as a whole.[1] For Sen, the link between individual capabilities and development is part of a virtuous circle. Enhancement of individual freedom — by both political and material means — leads to greater social development, which, in turn, further enhances the possibilities for individual capabilities and the freedom to lead the kinds of lives we have reason to value.[2]

This virtuous circle would appear to be what the Constitutional Court in Khosa has in mind when it ties the well-being of the worst off to the well-being of the wealthy. The enhancement of individual capabilities of the poorest members of our political community enhances the development of South Africa as a whole. Or put slightly differently, the greater the 'agency' of the least well-off members of our society, the greater the 'agency' of 'all' the members of our society. This gloss on Khosa emphasizes not the subjective sense of well-being that the well-off might experience by tying their well-being to that of the poor. Rather it emphasizes an increase in the objective sense of well-being that flows from the enhancement of the agency of each individual member of our society.

(f) The relationship between the five definitions of dignity and the creation of a realm of ends

We may be able to see, now, how dignity builds upon a simple premise, the refusal to turn away from suffering, and yields, ultimately, a realm of ends. The refusal to turn away marks the very beginning of our moral awareness — the first time we come to understand that others are not mere instruments for the realization of our desires, but beings who are ends in themselves. This moral awakening leads, almost ineluctably, to two further insights: (a) that others are entitled to the same degree of concern and respect that we demand for ourselves; and (b) that others are entitled to that equal respect and equal concern because they, like us, are possessed of faculties that enable them to pursue ends which give their lives meaning.[3] The ability to give our lives meaning and to determine the course by

[1] See Development (supra) at 18.

[2] For a more detailed discussion of the relationship between our dignity jurisprudence and Sen's views, see § 36.5*(a)*(ii), 'Dignity and the politics of capability', infra.

[3] In a recent lecture, Justice Laurie Ackermann offers a working definition of dignity that resonates with least four of the five definitions of dignity adumbrated in these pages:

> I would define Human dignity as follows: It is a concept comprising all those aspects of the human personality that arise from human intellectual and moral capacity; which in turn separate humans from the impersonality of nature, enables them to exercise their own judgment, to have self-awareness and a sense of self-worth, to exercise self-determination, to shape themselves and nature, to develop their personalities and to strive for self-fulfilment in their lives. I have modelled this on the classic German concept propounded by Prof Günter Dürig in the 1950's: 'Jeder Mensch ist Mensch kraft seines Geistes, der ihn abhet von der unpersönlichen Natur und ihn aus eigner Entscheidung dazu befähigt, seiner selbst bewußt zu werden, sich selbst zu bestimmen und sich und die Umwelt zu gestalten.' I have somewhat broadened his exposition by introducing the desire for self-fulfilment, in preference to the word 'happiness' … I have also added the individual's own sense of self-worth as an aspect of which we give our lives meaning, leads to the recognition that we are able to govern our selves. At a minimum, this mutual recognition of our ability to govern our selves supports the formal political recognition that just as each one of us is entitled to govern our individual self, so too are we entitled to legislate on behalf of the broader community of which we are a part. This mutual recognition of one another as rational beings capable of ordering the ends both of our own lives and of the larger community underwrites the final insight: that we not only live in a realm of ends, but that if such a realm is to have real meaning, we must be willing to order our community in a manner that enables each individual to realize their status as an end. It is simply not enough to (a) not turn away from suffering, (b) end discrimination and (c) grant all citizens the franchise. Once we recognize others as ends we must be committed — at some level — to the provision of those material means necessary to live as ends. To refuse them such means might render meaningless the more formal guarantees found in the Final Constitution. As the Court itself notes in Grootboom:

> The Constitution will be worth infinitely less than its paper if the reasonableness of state action concerned with housing is determined without regard to the fundamental constitutional value of human dignity. Section 26, read in the context of the Bill of Rights as a whole, must mean that the respondents have a right to reasonable action by the state in all circumstances and with particular regard to human dignity. In short, I emphasise that human beings are required to be treated as human beings.[1]

Two riders must attach to this account of dignity. First, the notion that the five definitions of dignity can be viewed as building blocks out of which we can construct a realm of ends is my speculative exercise. Certainly, the Constitutional Court has never said as much. However, that Kant and Rawls, amongst others, have offered similar philosophical constructs gives this reconstruction of the Court's jurisprudence more than a patina of plausibility. Second, that the five definitions of dignity can be viewed as building blocks out of which we can construct a reasonably coherent theory of dignity does not mean that these five definitions will always cohere with one another. As we shall see, the definitions human personality; for when a person is dealt with in a demeaning way, . . . the observer can actually experience the impairment of the victim's sense of self-worth. Criticism of another provides a subtle example. No matter how justified, objectively, the content of criticism might be, if it is delivered in an insulting or demeaning way, it unjustly impairs the victim's legitimate sense of self-worth as a human being.

See LWH Ackermann 'The Significance of Human Dignity for Constitutional Jurisprudence' (Lecture, Stellenbosch Law Faculty, 15 August 2005)(Manuscript on file with author) § 4 quoting G Dürig 'Der Grundrechtssatz von der Menschenwürde' (1956) 81 Archiv für öffentliches Recht 117, 125 ('All humans are human by virtue of their intellectual capacity ("kraft seine Geistes") which serves to separate them from the impersonality of nature and enables them to exercise their own judgment, to have self-awareness, to exercise self-determination and to shape themselves and nature.' (Ackermann's translation).)

[1] Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC)('Grootboom') at para 83 (Emphasis added).

sometimes pull in opposite directions and thereby generate significant doctrinal tension. I shall, in § 36.4, indicate where such conflicts occur and suggest, where possible, how such conflicts might be resolved.

36.3 USES OF DIGNITY

The word 'dignity' is sprinkled about the text of the Final Constitution. It is a founding value: FC s 1*(a)*. It acts as a cornerstone of both democracy and the Bill of Rights: FC s 7(1). It informs both our interpretation of the ambit of the specific substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights — FC s 39(1) — and our analysis of the justification of any limitation of a right or freedom — FC s 36. It governs the behaviour of our courts, other tribunals and state institutions supporting constitutional democracy: FC ss 165, 181, 196. It is, perhaps most importantly, the second substantive right identified in the Bill of Rights: FC s 10. That dignity operates as a first order rule, a second order rule, a correlative right, a value and a grundnorm — and sometimes all in a single case — is confirmed by Justice O'Regan's oft quoted dictum in Dawood:

> Human .... dignity informs constitutional adjudication and interpretation at a range of levels. It is a value that informs the interpretation of many, possibly all, other rights.... Human dignity is also a constitutional value that is of central significance in the limitations analysis. Section 10, however, makes it plain that dignity is not only a value fundamental to our Constitution, it is a justiciable and enforceable right that must be respected and protected. In many cases however, where the value of human dignity is offended, the primary constitutional breach occasioned may be of a more specific right such as the right to bodily integrity, the right to equality or the right not to be subjected to slavery, servitude or forced labour.[1]

So, just as dignity denotes at least five different, though often related, kinds of obligation, so too does dignity operate within our legal system in four sundry ways.[2]

(a) Dignity as a first order rule

Dignity is rarely a first order rule. That is, the right to dignity alone is rarely dispositive of a constitutional matter. The first rule of South African dignity jurisprudence is that where a court can identify the infringement of a more specific right, FC s 10 will (ostensibly) not add to the enquiry.[1] That said, dignity has operated as a first order rule in a number of intimate association matters because the Constitutional Court could identify no other specific right that would protect the interests of the married couples or life partners in question.[2] High Courts have extended the protection that FC s 10 affords intimate associations beyond the confines of marriage or life partnerships to relationships between grandparents and grandchildren.[3] High Courts have also deployed dignity as an operational rule when no other right would protect the linguistic interests of a party before the court.[4]

[1] Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC)('Dawood') at para 35 (Emphasis added).

[2] It is worth noting that even judges comfortable with the common law and quite uncomfortable with constitutional development of that body of law still recognize that the protection afforded individuals under FC s 10 — and elsewhere in the Final Constitution — is substantially broader than the notion of dignitas that animates the actio injuriarum. See, eg, Dendy v University of the Witwatersrand 2005 (5) SA 357 (W)('Dendy'). In Dendy, the High Court found no need to develop the common law in light of FC s 10 (first order rule) or FC s 39(2) (second order rule or value). The Dendy court simply noted, in passing, that in these circumstances dignity functions as a residual right (correlative right). Ibid at para 24.

(b) Dignity as second order rule

Dignity often operates as a second order rule. That is, dignity determines how a first order rule disposes of a given matter.[5]

Dignity, as a second order rule, features most prominently in equality (FC s 9) cases.[6] It does so in two ways. First, an impairment of human dignity may [1] Dawood (supra) at para 35. What happens, then, when the Court finds that law or conduct has violated both FC s 10 and some other right in Chapter 2? As we note in the section on dignity as a correlative right, when dignity and another right are both violated, the content of that other right — at least in so far as the particular challenge is concerned — would appear to be a particular manifestation of the right to dignity at the same time as it is informed by the value of dignity.

[2] Ibid. See also Booysen v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2001 (4) SA 485 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 645 (CC)('Booysen'); Daniels v Campbell 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 735 (CC)(Moseneke J, in dissent, found that the statutory provisions and common law rules in question constituted an affront to the dignity of all persons married under Muslim law and, consistent with the finding in Dawood, undermined their capacity to enjoy the full benefits of their intimate association.)

[3] See Petersen v Maintenance Officer, Simon's Town 2004 (2) SA 56 (C), 2004 (2) BCLR 205 (C)(High Court found that the common law's differentiation between children born in wedlock and children born out of wedlock, which only placed duty of support on paternal grandparents for children born in wedlock, violated the right to dignity, the right to equality and the best interests of the child.)

[4] See S v Pienaar 2000 (7) BCLR 800 (NC) at para 10 (Failure to acknowledge difference in language, and to ignore the speaker, may violate speaker's right to dignity); Advance Mining Hydraulics v Botes NO 2000 (1) SA 815 (T), 2000 (2) BCLR 119, 127 (T)(Right to dignity requires, at the very least, that 'persons be treated as recipients of rights and not as objects subjected to statutory mechanisms without a say in the matter.' The presiding officer's failure to warn an examinee — in a s 415 inquiry — of his right to legal representation before compelling him to answer questions he did not understand constituted a 'blatant affront' to the examinee's dignity.)

[5] In this regard — the disposal of specific disputes — dignity as a second order rule differs from dignity as a value. As we shall see in our discussion of the Court's equality cases, the effect of law or conduct on the dignity of the complainant determines, in part, whether differentiation counts as discrimination and whether discrimination amounts to unfair discrimination. See § 36.4*(a)* infra. The repeated invocation of the Harksen test by the Court in equality cases, and the Harksen test's appraisal of the impairment of the complainant's dignity as a second step in its calculus of unfair discrimination turns dignity into a second order rule. Similarly, where a punishment is so disproportionate to the crime as to turn a convict into a mere signal in a larger system of social control, the Court will find that the dignity of the convict is impaired. This impairment of the convict's dignity may then support a finding that the sentence imposed on the prisoner constitutes cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment. Again, the rule that disproportional punishment impairs the dignity of a person determines, in part, whether the court will find that a violation of FC s 12 has occurred.

[6] See § 36.4*(a)* infra.

determine whether mere differentiation amounts to actual discrimination. Second, when attempting to determine whether discrimination amounts to unfair discrimination, the Constitutional Court will ask to what extent the law or the conduct in question impairs the dignity of the complainant and whether the law or the conduct in question re-inscribes systemic patterns of disadvantage for — and thus impairs the dignity of — a specific class of persons.[1] Similarly, dignity, as a second order rule, determines: (a) whether punishments are disproportionate (FC s 12);[2] (b) whether the state has a duty of care with respect to the physical security of its citizens (FC ss 11 and 12);[3] (c) the extent of the state's interest in foetal life (FC s 11);[4] (d) the parameters of contractual autonomy (FC s 22);[5] (e) the circumstances under which an individual may legitimately claim that his or her home is an impregnable castle (FC s 14);[6] (f) when the conditions of existence amount to slavery (FC s 13);[7] and (g) when expressive conduct constitutes hate speech (FC s 16).[8]

(c) Dignity as a correlative right

The Constitutional Court often deploys rights simultaneously in the service of its arguments. It likes to describe rights as interdependent and symbiotic. This talk of 'interdependence' is especially evident in challenges to law or to conduct grounded in the right to dignity. However, for my immediate purpose — to distinguish dignity as a correlative right from dignity as a first order rule, dignity as a second order rule or dignity as a value — I must show that dignity functions, in some respects, independently of other rights in constitutional challenges that rely upon multiple rights.

S v Jordan provides a paradigmatic example of dignity deployed as a correlative right. Justices O'Regan and Sachs note that although the rights to dignity, privacy, and freedom of the person intersect and overlap, the challenges brought in terms of each of these rights cannot be consolidated into a single challenge grounded in some 'unenumerated' right to autonomy. Each challenge based upon a specific right must, they say, be considered individually.[9]

The Court has adopted this multiple challenge approach in a wide variety of cases. In Bhe, customary law rules of primogeniture were found to violate both

[1] See Moseneke & Others v The Master 2001 (2) SA 18 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 103 (CC) at paras 22 and 23 (Provision of Black Administration Act providing that Master of High Court had no power to handle intestate estates of black South Africans held to be both an unjustifiable impairment of FC s 9 — Equality — because it 'assails the dignity of those concerned' and an unjustifiable 'limitation of the right to dignity in [FC] s 10.')

[2] See § 36.4*(c)*(iii) infra.

[3] See § 36.4*(c)*(i) infra.

[4] See § 36.4*(c)*(ii) infra.

[5] See § 36.4*(d)* infra.

[6] See § 36.4*(g)* infra.

[7] See § 36.4*(e)* infra.

[8] See § 36.4*(h)*(ii) infra.

[9] 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at paras 52–53.

the right to equality and the right to dignity.[1] The NCGLEI Court, in finding that the common law criminalization of sodomy constituted a violation of the right to dignity, as well as a violation of the right to equality and a violation of the right to privacy, wrote '[i]t is clear that the constitutional protection of dignity requires us to acknowledge the value and the worth of all individuals as members of society'[2] and that 'the rights of equality and dignity are closely related, as are the rights of dignity and privacy.'[3]

The language in NCGLE I echoes Justice Ackermann's assertion in Ferreira v Levin that there exists a strong correlation between the right to dignity and individual freedom.[4] Dignity is not, however, just a correlate for negative liberty. It also buttresses the right to equality. As the Court writes in Prinsloo v Van der Linde: 'In our view unfair discrimination [the linchpin of equality analysis] … principally means treating people differently in a way which impairs their fundamental dignity as human beings, who are inherently equal in dignity.'[5] And if the correlation between the right to dignity, the right to equality and various freedoms in Chapter 2 is still not clear, the Court, in President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo states:

> [D]ignity is at the heart of individual rights in a free and democratic society… [E]quality … means nothing if it does not represent a commitment to each person's equal worth as a human being, regardless of their differences. Equality means that our society cannot tolerate legislative distinctions that treat certain people as second-class citizens.[6]

(d) Dignity as a value or a grundnorm

Although dignity clearly operates as a first order rule, a second order rule and as a correlative right, it is invoked most often as a value. Part of the reason for this preference for deploying dignity as a value flows from the courts' stated preference for 'developing' the law rather than making it.[7] The result of this preference, however, is a certain lack of precision. For example, in Williams, the Court writes that:

[1] Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe').

[2] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('NCGLE I') at para 28.

[3] Ibid at para 30.

[4] Ferreira v Levin 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 49.

[5] 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 31 (Emphasis added).

[6] 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC)('Hugo') at para 41 citing Egan v Canada (1995) 29 CRR (2d) 79, 104-5 (Emphasis added). For further analysis of the relationship between equality and dignity, see C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 35.

[7] See, eg, Advance Mining Hydraulics (Pty) Ltd & Others v Botes & Others 2000 (1) SA 815 (T), 2000 (2) BCLR 119 (T)(High Court holds that it is unnecessary to decide whether proceedings at issue violated the right to dignity when it could be decided by reference to FC s 39(2)'s injunction to interpret all law in light of the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights — namely the creation of an open and democratic society based upon human dignity, equality and freedom — as well as the Final Constitution's founding provisions in FC s 1.)

> The Constitution has allocated to the State and its organs a role as the protectors and guarantors of those rights to ensure that they are available to all. In the process, it sets the State up as a model for society as it endeavours to move away from a violent past. It is therefore reasonable to expect that the State must be foremost in upholding those values which are the guiding light of civilised societies. Respect for human dignity is one such value; acknowledging it includes an acceptance by society that '. . . even the vilest criminal remains a human being possessed of common human dignity.'[1]

Dignity, in the previous paragraph, appears to operate as a value. In fact, juvenile whipping, in Williams, was challenged in terms of the right to equality, the right to dignity and the right to be free from cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment. The Williams Court held that juvenile whipping is a violation of the right to dignity (IC s 10) and the right to be free from cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment (IC 11(2)).

Whatever the reason for this particular instance of analytical confusion, as a matter of doctrine, the Constitutional Court is on record as having little time for the putative collapse of the rule/value distinction.[2] In Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention, Chaskalson CJ writes:

> The values enunciated in section 1 of the Constitution are of fundamental importance. They inform and give substance to all the provisions of the Constitution. They do not, however, give rise to discrete and enforceable rights in themselves. This is clear not only from the language of section 1 itself, but also from the way the Constitution is structured and in particular the provisions of Chapter 2 which contains the Bill of Rights.[3]

Values are one thing, the NICRO Court appears to be saying, rules another. While it is certainly true that the fundamental values articulated in the Final Constitution will shape the rules expressed therein, and that the rules will have a reciprocal effect with respect to our understanding of those fundamental values, there remains a distinction with a difference. Rights give rise to rules and to enforceable claims. Values do not.

And so it is with dignity. FC s 10 — as a first order rule and as a correlative right — gives rise to enforceable claims. Dignity, where it appears as a value, does not.

The first reason that dignity is invoked more often as a value than as a rule is that FC s 39 states that the various substantive provisions in the Bill of Rights, and the Bill of Rights as a whole, must be interpreted so as to 'promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom.' The second reason is that when a law is found to have infringed a fundamental right, the question raised, FC s 36 tells us, is whether the limitation in question 'is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom.' The third reason is that the ubiquity of dignity has led the Court to adhere to a relatively restrictive rule regarding the use of dignity as a first order rule: where a court can identify the infringement of a more specific right, FC s 10 should not be added to the enquiry. Because some rights are understood, immediately, to be expressions of the commitment to dignity — say, the prohibitions on torture (FC s 12), slavery, servitude or forced labour (FC s 13) — and many other rights, once refracted through the value of dignity, become expressions of the more basic (non–justiciable) commitment to dignity — say the right to equality and the right not to be subject to cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment — the need for dignity to function as a rule that disposes of cases directly is less pronounced than it might otherwise be.

[1] 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) SA 861 (CC) at para 77.

[2] But see C Roederer 'Post-matrix Legal Reasoning: Horizontality and the Rule of Values in South African Law' (2003) 19 SAJHR 57 (Argues, incorrectly, that the Final Constitution — in particular various operational provisions in Chapter 2 such as FC s 8 and FC s 39 — makes the distinction between rules and values unimportant for the purposes of constitutional interpretation.) For a critique of this position, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31, Appendix.

[3] Minister of Home Affairs v National Institute for Crime Prevention 2005 (3) SA 280 (CC), 2004 (5) BCLR 445 (CC)('NICRO') at para 21.

In the first class of 'dignity as value' cases, dignity guides our interpretation of the right and, in so doing, shapes the ambit of a right. In Coetzee v Comitis, the Cape High Court finds that the restraint of trade provision at issue 'strips the player of his human dignity' and therefore constitutes an unjustifiable limitation of his freedom, under FC s 22, of trade, occupation and profession.[1] In Khosa v Minister of Social Development, the Constitutional Court's conclusion that 'the exclusion of permanent residents in need … [from] social-security programmes' has 'a serious impact on [their] dignity' supports a finding that the Social Assistance Act violates both the right to equality and the right to social security of permanent residents.[2]

In the second class of 'dignity as value' cases, dignity is used to justify a limitation on a right. In Khumalo v Holomisa, the Constitutional Court twins the privacy and the dignity rights that ground the interest in a good reputation to turn back a freedom of expression challenge to the constitutionality of the law of defamation.[3] In De Reuck, the Constitutional Court finds that the state's interest in protecting the dignity of all children justifies the limitation of the freedom of expression that the Films and Publications Act imposes upon the producers and the possessors of child pornography.[4] In Christian Education, the mutually reinforcing rights of religion and culture said to sanction corporal punishment in private schools were deemed subordinate to a constellation of rights that included dignity, equality, and freedom and security of the person.[5]

In the third class of 'dignity as value' cases, those cases in which the Bill of Rights does not apply directly, the Court will often speak of dignity as a value that informs the development of the common law or the interpretation of a statute. In Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security, the Constitutional Court found that the value of dignity, as well as the values that animate freedom and security of the

[1] 2001 (1) SA 1254 (C), 2001 (4) BCLR 323 (C).
[2] 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC)('Khosa') at para 76 (Emphasis added).
[3] 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC).
[4] De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC)('De Reuck') at paras 62-63.
[5] Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC) at para 51.

person, required that the duty of care imposed on the state in delictual actions be expanded so as to ensure that the state did not permit known and dangerous felons to imperil the lives of its citizens.[1] Similarly, in NK v Minister of Safety and Security, the Constitutional Court found that that these same values required a significant alteration in the common law understanding of vicarious liability and ensured that the state remained responsible for police officers, acting under the colour of law, who abused their authority and violated the physical integrity of the very people they are duty bound to protect.[2] In Metrorail, the Constitutional Court interpreted the Legal Succession of the South African Transport Act[3] in light of the values that animate the rights to dignity, life and freedom and security of the person and found that the Act, properly construed, required that the state actors responsible for rail travel take affirmative steps to ensure the safety of their commuters.[4]

36.4 Dignity's relationship to substantive provisions in the Bill of Rights

Dignity's presence — as a first order rule, a second order rule, a correlative right, a value and a grundnorm — in our jurisprudence ensures that dignity determines the extension of many of the substantive rights in Chapter 2. However, dignity's ubiquity guarantees that these same substantive rights will shape our understanding of dignity. The manner and the circumstances in which substantive rights recast our understanding of dignity may vary quite markedly: the relationship between dignity and the freedom of trade, occupation and profession will differ from the relationship between dignity and various socio-economic rights. Despite such differences, the reciprocal effect of dignity and various substantive provisions on one another promises that, however dignity is construed in a given matter, its meaning will never stray far from our core concern with the treatment of individuals as ends-in-themselves.

(a) Equality[5]

Dignity is the linchpin for equality analysis under FC s 9. Indeed, whether unfair discrimination is deemed to have occurred in terms of FC ss 9(3) s 9(4) and 9(5) will often turn on whether, and the extent to which, the complainant's dignity has been impaired. According to the Harksen Court, the question as to whether differentiation amounts to unfair discrimination has two parts:

> Firstly, does the differentiation amount to "discrimination"? If it is on a specified ground, then discrimination will have been established. If it is not on a specified ground, then

[1] 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC)('Carmichele').
[2] [2005] JOL 14864 (CC)(CCT 52/04)('NK').
[3] Act 9 of 1989.
[4] Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC)('Metrorail').
[5] For more on FC s 9, see C Albertyn & B Goldblatt 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2006) Chapter 35. See also I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) Chapter 9.

> whether or not there is discrimination will depend upon whether, objectively, the ground is on attributes and characteristics which have the potential to impair the fundamental human dignity of persons as human beings or to affect them adversely in a comparably serious manner. If the differentiation amounts to "discrimination", does it amount to "unfair discrimination"? If it has been found to have been on a specified ground, then unfairness will be presumed. If on an unspecified ground, unfairness will have to be established by the complainant. The test of unfairness focuses primarily on the impact of the discrimination on the complainant and others in his or her situation. If, at the end of this stage of the enquiry, the differentiation is found not to be unfair, then there will be no violation of [FC s 9(3)].[1]

Dignity thus informs equality analysis at two stages. First, it enables us to distinguish mere differentiation from discrimination. Differentiation on a ground listed in FC s 9(3) amounts to discrimination because distinctions based upon such ascriptive characteristics are an affront to dignity (Dignity 2). Second, and more importantly perhaps, the extent to which a discriminatory measure impairs the complainant's dignity will determine whether discrimination found to be presumptively unfair on a listed ground in FC s 9(3), or merely discriminatory on an analogous ground, will ultimately be held to be unfair. As a general matter, the court asks three discrete questions before arriving at a final conclusion as to the unfairness of the discrimination:

- (1) Is the complainant a member of a class of persons subject to past patterns of systemic discrimination? (This question reflects the Court's well-founded belief that differential treatment of persons who are members of historically disadvantaged groups is more likely to impair their dignity (Dignity 2), and thus be unfair, than is the differential treatment of persons who are members of groups that have, historically, been relatively well-off.)[2]

[1] Harksen v Lane 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC)('Harksen') at para 53. See also Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC); President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC); City Council of Pretoria v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (2) BCLR 257 (CC).

[2] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1516 (CC); National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC)('NCGLE II'); Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2001 (12) BCLR 1284 (CC)('Satchwell I'); Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa 2003 (4) SA 266 (CC), 2004 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Satchwell II'); J & Another v Director General, Department of Home Affairs & Others 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC); Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC); Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project v Minister of Home Affairs CCT 60/04; CCT 10/04 (unreported decision of 1 December 2005)('Fourie'). See also Du Plessis v Road Accident Fund 2004 (1) SA 359 (SCA), 2003 (11) BCLR 1120 (SCA)(Where common law fails to recognize that same sex life partners owe same duty of care as married heterosexual partners it violates both FC s 9 and FC s 10.)

- (2) Does the discriminatory law or conduct in question impair the dignity, or some other fundamental right, of the complainant? (This question draws our attention to the actual circumstances of the complainant and requires that the complainant experience some demonstrable harm that prevents self-actualization (Dignity 3).)[1]
- (3) Is the discriminatory law or conduct in question designed to achieve an important societal goal and is the discriminatory law or conduct in question narrowly tailored to achieve this legitimate goal? (This question recognizes that our constitutional order serves ends other than equality and that such ends cannot always be reduced to or be squared with egalitarian concerns.[2] However, they can be described in terms of dignity interests in self-actualization and in self-governance (Dignity 3 and Dignity 4).)

While we can characterize all three inquiries in terms of dignity, it is misleading to characterize all three inquiries solely in terms of the dignity interests of the complainant. For while the third question can be framed as an inquiry into the dignity of a class of persons who benefit from the discriminatory measure under scrutiny, it should not be understood as an elaboration of the restitutionary measures provision found in FC s 9(2).[3] The third prong of the test for unfairness is

[1] Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC)(Though persons living with HIV/AIDS are not necessarily part of an historically disadvantaged group, the social stigma that attaches to their illness often results in conduct that impairs their dignity. The Court found that the refusal to hire a person on the grounds of his HIV/AIDS status impairs his dignity by preventing him from living life 'to the full extent of its potential'. That impairment of his dignity justifies the ultimate finding of unfair discrimination.)

[2] See Taylor v Kurtstag [2004] 4 All SA 317 (W) at para 38 (FC s 18 — freedom of association — 'guarantees an individual the right to choose his or her associates and a group of individuals the right to choose their associates.' The High Court recognizes that the right of the group to choose their associates in the pursuit of such constitutionally recognized objectives as the practice of religion by necessity means the right to require those who wish to join the group to conform their behaviour to certain dictates and the right to exclude — and thus discriminate against — those who refuse to conform.) See also Wittmann v Deutscher Schulverein, Pretoria & Others 1998 (4) SA 423, 451 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T)('Section 17 of the [I]nterim Constitution and s 18 of the [Final] Constitution recognise the freedom of association. [IC] s 14(1) and [FC] s 15(1) respectively recognise the freedom of religion which includes the right to join others in worship, propagation of the faith etc. Freedom of association entails the right with others to exclude non-conformists. It also includes the right to require those who join the association to conform with its principles and rules.') See, more generally on this point, S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) §§ 44.1*(c), 44.3(c)(iii), 44.3(c)*(viii).

[3] See Minister of Finance v Van Heerden 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC), 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC)('Van Heerden'). The Van Heerden Court establishes FC s 9(2)'s provision for restitutionary measures as a complete defense:

> The pivotal enquiry in this matter is not whether the Minister and the Fund discharged the presumption of unfairness under section 9(5), but whether the measure in issue passes muster under section 9(2). If a measure properly falls within the ambit of section 9(2) it does not constitute unfair discrimination. However, if the measure does not fall within section 9(2), and it constitutes discrimination on a prohibited ground, it will be necessary to resort to the Harksen test in order to ascertain whether the measures offend the anti-discrimination prohibition in section 9(3). . . . When a measure is challenged as violating the equality provision, its defender may meet the claim by showing that the measure is contemplated by section 9(2) in that it promotes the achievement of equality and is primarily concerned with creating the requisite space for other constitutionally mandated goods. Various rights — to religion, to reproductive capacity, to privacy, to expression, to association, to assembly, to education, to property, to language, to form political parties, to form families and to raise children — will and must commit us to discriminatory arrangements. To fail to recognize that a constitutional order based upon human dignity, equality and freedom commits us to communitarian, egalitarian and utilitarian ends that pull in different directions is to be soft-headed about hard choices. It is, moreover, to be obtuse about easy choices. If, for example, we wish to have educational institutions that further and deepen our various religious faiths, then we must permit those educational institutions to discriminate, at a bare minimum, in terms of admissions policies that require matriculants to accept a religious curriculum consistent with the belief set of the particular denomination that supports the school.[1] For without such discrimination — which may offer no tangible benefits to historically disadvantaged persons — we will afford religious communities (or other tightly knit associations) no meaningful space within which to pursue their comprehensive vision of the good.[2] A state that rejects such discrimination may possess many virtues, designed to protect and advance persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination. It seems to me that to determine whether a measure falls within section 9(2) the enquiry is threefold. The first yardstick relates to whether the measure targets persons or categories of persons who have been disadvantaged by unfair discrimination; the second is whether the measure is designed to protect or advance such persons or categories of persons; and the third requirement is whether the measure promotes the achievement of equality.

Van Heerden (supra) at paras 36–37. Justice Ackermann himself may be responsible for this misapprehension. He writes:

> In determining whether a discriminatory provision has impacted unfairly on complainants various factors are to be considered, including the position of complainants in society and whether they have suffered in the past from patterns of disadvantage, whether the discrimination under consideration is on a specified ground or not, and the nature of the provision or power and the purpose sought to be achieved by it. If its purpose is manifestly not directed, in the first instance, at impairing the dignity of the complainants, that is aimed at achieving a worthy and societal goal, such as*, for example, the furthering of equality for all*, this purpose may, depending on the facts of the particular case, have a significant bearing on the question whether complainants have in fact suffered an impairment to their dignity; the extent or degree to which the rights or interests of the complainants have been affected by the discrimination.

LWH Ackermann 'Equality under the 1996 South African Constitution' in Rüdiger Wolfrem (eds) Gleichheit und Nichtdiskriminierung im Nationalen und Internationalen Meschenrechtssschutz (2003) 547. Ackermann's suggestion that a discriminatory measure may have as its end the realization of a substantively more equal society does not mean that all discriminatory measures must have such an objective to warrant sufficient constitutional solicitude to overcome either a presumption (in terms of FC s 9(5)) or an allegation that the measure in question is unfair.

[1] See S Woolman 'Admissions Policies and Discrimination: Rhetoric and Reality in the Equity Requirements for Public Schools and Independent Schools' Presentation before and Submission to the South African Human Rights Commission's Inquiry into Equality and Voluntary Association (12 June 2005)(Manuscript on file with author).

[2] See Fourie (supra) at paras 60–61.

but one of them will not be freedom of even the most dessicated sort.[1]

[1] Because our history is one of radical inegalitarianism, equality is, understandably, often treated as the pre-eminent constitutional value. See President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC)('Hugo') at para 41 ('[T]he purpose of our new constitutional and democratic order is the establishment of a society in which all human beings will be accorded equal respect regardless of their membership in particular groups. The achievement of such a society in the context of our deeply inegalitarian past will not be easy, but that that is the goal of the Constitution should not be forgotten or overlooked.') The assertion of such pre-eminence has led some courts and some commentators to characterize equality either as the value with which all other values must cohere or as the value before which all other values must fall. Two problems face this reification of equality. As a methodological matter, this emphasis on coherence, while attractive and powerful, locates the problem of legal interpretation in some kind of theory of established meaning which does not specifically address the normative role of law, and the possibility of radical transformation. 'Synchronization', as Drucilla Cornell notes, 'points us to the real problem':

> How do we develop an institutional analysis which allows us not only to synchronize the competing rights of individuals, but also the conflicts between the individual and the community, and between different groups in society. The goal of a modern legal system is synchronization and not coherence. Synchronization recognizes that there are competing rights situations and real conflicts between the individual and the community which may not yield a coherent whole. The conflicts may be mediated and synchronized but not eradicated.

D Cornell 'Pragmatism, Recollective Imagination, and Transformative Legal Interpretation' (1993) Transformations 23, 35–36. Or to put the matter slightly differently, those who would make equality the measure of all things, and for whom equality as equal respect and full redress still falls short of some ideological ideal, err because they rely upon a notion of 'rational coherence' which, in turn, depends upon the community acting as a single speaker:

> In reality, a complex, differentiated community can never be reduced to a single voice. Synchronization recognizes the inevitable complexity of the modern state and the imperfection of all our attempted solutions.

Ibid at 36. As a substantive matter, a requirement that certain social formations open themselves up to a wider potential membership because they control access to important social goods could be a compelling justification for interfering with an association's rules regarding entrance, voice and exit. However, it does not follow from such a commitment to equality as redress or equality as substantively equal opportunity that all individuals and all groups are always entitled to substantively equal treatment. The potential conflation of instrumental and ideological grounds for intervention — and the privileging of ideological egalitarianism over dignity-inspired egalitarianism — runs the risk of undermining the very institutions and social practices 'that actually make political pluralism, cultural diversity, individual autonomy and social empowerment possible.' S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 44.2. This distinction — between equality as ideology and equality as dignity — has real teeth both in our equality jurisprudence and in the equality jurisprudence of other jurisdictions. See, eg, Fourie (supra) at paras 60–61 ('Equality means equal concern and respect across difference. It does not presuppose the elimination or suppression of difference. Respect for human rights requires the affirmation of self, not the denial of self. Equality therefore does not imply a levelling or homogenisation of behaviour .... [T]here are a number of constitutional provisions that underline the constitutional value of acknowledging diversity and pluralism in our society, and give a particular texture to the broadly phrased right to freedom of association contained in section 18. Taken together, they affirm the right of people to self-expression without being forced to subordinate themselves to the cultural and religious norms of others, and highlight the importance of individuals and communities being able to enjoy what has been called the 'right to be different'. In each case, space has been found for members of communities to depart from a majoritarian norm.') See also Hurly v Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston (1995) 515 US 557 ('Hurly')(The Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston ('GLIB') asked to be allowed to march in Boston's annual St Patrick's day parade. The US Supreme Court finessed the difficult issues raised by GLIB's egalitarian claims by analysing the alleged fit of GLIB's expressive conduct with the parade organizer's exclusionary practices. GLIB was the only such group excluded. A rightly decided Hurley might have held that where no link could be established between the association's purpose and its discriminatory practice, then the State might

(b) Association

The Constitutional Court has, in two discrete lines of cases, made dignity the primary justification for the protection of intimate association. In the first line of cases, the Court has struck down a variety of laws that invidiously distinguished homosexual acts and relationships from heterosexual acts and relationships (Dignity 2). The Court has invalidated laws that criminalize sodomy,[1] that differentiate between heterosexual married couples and gay, lesbian, and transgendered partners in terms of immigration rights,[2] that deny benefits to the surviving same-sex life partner of a judge,[3] that bar same-sex life partners from adopting children,[4] that prevent same-sex life partners from asserting parental rights in instances of artificial insemination,[5] and that prevent same-sex life partners from securing public recognition of their life partnership as a marriage.[6] In the second line of cases, the Court has gone to great lengths to ensure that married couples could continue to cohabit within South Africa while a non-citizen partner seeks permanent residence,[7] that foreign-national spouses seeking work in exercise a presumption in favour of intervention on the grounds of equal protection. However, were such a link to exist, then the State would bear the burden of demonstrating that its interest was sufficiently compelling to trump the expressive and associational interests of the group whose exclusionary conduct is being challenged.) These observations suggest that the Dignity 3 and the Dignity 4 interests of an association may trump the Dignity 2 interests of an individual where: (a) the discriminatory conduct of the association serves legitimate objectives via means narrowly tailored to realize those objectives; and (b) the social goods, if any, made available through the association are accessible to the complainant through other institutions. Allan Wood suggests that Kant would reach a similar conclusion with regard to the dignity interests at stake when he writes

> When a social order treats some people better and some worse in ways that they themselves regard as essential to their self-worth, there is a presumption, based upon [the notion of humanity as an end in itself], that this social order fails to respect the humanity of those who receive worse treatment . . . Any such egalitarian presumption might be rebutted, of course, by showing that greater equality in one area could be achieved only at the cost of more fundamental failures to respect humanity in other areas.

See AW Wood 'Humanity as an End in Itself' in P Guyer (ed) Critical Essays on Kant's Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals (1998) 165, 183.

[1] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1516 (CC)(Sachs J) at para 127 ('It is the tainting of desire, it is the attribution of perversity and shame to spontaneous bodily affection, it is the prohibition of the expression of love, it is the denial of full moral citizenship in society because you are what you are, that impinges on the dignity and self-worth of a group.') See also S v H 1995 (1) SA 120 (C); S v Kampher 1997 (4) SA 460 (C), 1997 (9) BCLR 1283 (C)(Common-law or statutory offences which proscribe private homosexual acts between consenting adult males cannot survive constitutional scrutiny).

[2] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC).

[3] Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2001 (12) BCLR 1284 (CC); Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa 2003 (4) SA 266 (CC), 2004 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).

[4] Du Toit v Minister of Welfare and Population Development 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC), 2002 (10) SA 1006 (CC)('Du Toit')(Court held that lesbian partners in a long-standing relationship had their right to dignity and right to equality impaired by various sections of the Child Care Act 74 of 1983 and the Guardianship Act 192 of 1993 that only provided for the joint adoption and guardianship of children by married persons.)

[5] J & Another v Director General, Department of Home Affiars 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC), 2003 (5) BCLR 463 (CC).

[6] Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie CCT 10/04 (1 December 2005).

[7] Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (1) SA 997 (C), 2000 (3) BCLR 331 (C)('Dawood').

South Africa could remain in — country while their applications for work permits were processed[1] and that unwed fathers could secure access to their children.[2]

To the extent that these intimate associations take forms similar to those of traditional unions, the Court has demonstrated a willingness to embrace them.[3] The Dawood Court hints at the historical basis for deploying dignity as a first order rule in the second line of 'family' unit cases when it writes: 'The Constitution asserts dignity to contradict [a] past in which human dignity for black South Africans was routinely and cruelly denied.'[4] One of the most repugnant features of apartheid was the use of pass laws, denationalization, migrant labour, and work permits to wreak havoc on black South African families. In both lines of cases, the Court sets its face squarely against those rules of law that might impair one of the most important sources of meaning in our lives: our intimate associations (Dignity 3).[5]

(c) Freedom and Security of the Person

Dignity, as refracted through the prism of freedom and security of the person, has revolutionized three bodies of law: (a) the common law of delict in the context of state liability for wrongful behaviour; (b) the state's regulation of abortion; and (c) punishment.

(i) Development of the common law of delict in the context of state liability

In both Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security[6] and NK v Minister of Safety and Security,[7] the Constitutional Court found that that the right to dignity and the right to freedom and security of the person imposed positive duties on the state to

[1] See Booysen v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2001 (4) SA 485 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 645 (CC)('Booysen')

[2] See Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC), 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC)(Court finds that unwed fathers in non-Christian marriages entitled to same rights of access as other fathers); Minister of Welfare and Population Development v Fitzpatrick 2000 (3) SA 422 (CC), 2000 (7) BCLR 713 (CC).

[3] But see S v Jordan & Others (Sex Workers Education & Advocacy Task Force & Others as Amici Curiae) 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 499 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC)('Jordan').

[4] Dawood (supra) at para 35.

[5] The Dawood Court says that it relies upon FC s 10 to protect intimate associations because 'it cannot be said that there is a more specific right that protects individuals who wish to enter into and sustain permanent intimate relationships than the right to dignity in s 10.' Dawood (supra) at para 36. That conclusion seems rather odd given that the text expressly provides for freedom of association — FC s 18 — and that intimate associations are, as a matter of foreign law, routinely protected under such a right. The US Supreme Court is inclined to protect intimate family household structures against state intervention, but to permit state intervention where a household does not possess the requisite level of insularity and selectivity. Compare Moore v City of Cleveland (1976) 431 US 494 (Striking down zoning laws because they struck too deeply into well-protected sphere of domestic autonomy) with Village of Belle Terre v Boraas (1973) 416 US 1 (Upholding zoning laws because they were rationally related to a legitimate state interest and a household of college friends did not constitute an intimate arrangement deemed worthy of constitutional protection.)

[6] 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC)('Carmichele').

[7] [2005] JOL 14864 (CC)(CCT 52/04)('NK').

prevent, where possible, violations of physical integrity (Dignity 1).[1] The violations in these cases were not simply assaults — they were rapes. The seriousness of the crime, and the complicity of the state, led the Carmichele Court to write:

> In addressing these obligations in relation to dignity and the freedom and security of the person, few things can be more important to women than freedom from the threat of sexual violence. . . . Sexual violence and the threat of sexual violence goes to the core of women's subordination in society. It is the single greatest threat to the self-determination of South African women.[2]

The rights implicated, including dignity, did not give rise to a new constitutional action or a new constitutional remedy. The rights did require that a court hearing such a delictual matter must cast 'the net of unlawfulness wider'.[3] Although the Constitutional Court did not itself develop the common law, it directed the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal to do so. To ameliorate the defect in the extant law of delict, the Constitutional Court suggested that the courts craft a new test that would impose a duty of care on state actors in 'circumstances where state authorities knew or ought to have known at the time of the existence of a real and immediate risk to the life or physical security of an identified individual or individuals from the criminal acts of a third party' and where, in such circumstances, 'they failed to take measures within the scope of their powers which, judged reasonably, might have been expected to avoid that risk.'[4]

In NK, the state was more than merely complicit in the rape at issue. The state was deemed vicariously liable for a rape carried out by three police officers acting under the colour of law. In rejecting the Supreme Court of Appeal's conclusion that the principles of vicarious liability did not cover the behaviour of policemen who had used, quite consciously, the trappings of their office to commit this crime, the Constitutional Court wrote:

> [T]he opportunity to commit the crime would not have arisen but for the trust the applicant placed in them because they were policemen, a trust which harmonises with the constitutional mandate of the police and the need to ensure that mandate is successfully fulfilled. When the policemen — on duty and in uniform — raped the applicant, they were simultaneously failing to perform their duties to protect the applicant. In committing the crime,

[1] The interaction between FC s 12 and FC s 10 extends the Final Constitution's commitment to the bodily integrity and the physical security of women to all sexual assaults against women. See S v Baloyi (Minister of Justice & Another Intervening) 2000 (2) SA 425 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 86 (CC)(State under positive duty in terms of FC 7(2) read with FC 12 (freedom and security of the person) and FC s 10 (dignity) to prevent private threats to personal security, generally, and domestic violence, in particular); S v Chapman 1997 (3) SA 341 (SCA), 1997 (2) SACR 3 (SCA)(Rights of dignity, privacy and freedom and security of the person, in the context of endemic sexual violence against women, means that convicted rapists will be shown no mercy.)

[2] Carmichele (supra) at para 62.

[3] Ibid at para 57.

[4] Currie & De Waal (supra) at 305. Chastened by the Constitutional Court's reversal, Chetty J subsequently altered the common law in Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security. 2003 (2) SA 656 (C), 2002 (10) BCLR 1100 (C). The Supreme Court of Appeal followed suit in Minister of Safety and Security v Carmichele. 2004 (3) SA 305 (SCA), 2004 (2) BCLR 133 (SCA).

> the policemen not only did not protect the applicant, they infringed her rights to dignity and security of the person. In so doing, their employer's obligation (and theirs) to prevent crime was not met. There is an intimate connection between the delict committed by the policemen and the purposes of their employer. This close connection renders the respondent liable vicariously to the applicant for the wrongful conduct of the policemen.[1]

What ties both Carmichele and NK together, and what distinguishes them from other instances in which the state fails to discharge its responsibilities in terms of FC s 12, is the Court's concern with the dignity of women and the systemic violence to which they continue to be subjected. The Court recognizes that so long as the law permits women to be treated as objects, and in particular, allows the state itself to indulge in this kind of abuse, women will never be able to enjoy equal respect in a realm of ends (Dignity 1, Dignity 2, and Dignity 5). Moreover, the state's complicity with respect to this culture of rape demeans us all and is something for which we must accept collective responsibility (Dignity 5)(in the form of damages in a delictual action).

The Supreme Court of Appeal deployed both FC s 12 and FC s 10 to develop the law of delict in the context of an omission by state actors to divest of firearms a person known to be a danger to the community. In Minister of Safety and Security v Van Duivenboden, the court held that the state had had a duty, under s 11 of the Arms and Ammunition Act,[2] to deprive the person in question of firearms after he had entered into a gun battle with police in 1994.[3] The failure of the police to act on the obvious danger posed by this person led to, or was certainly a sufficiently proximate cause of, his shooting to death, a year later, his wife and his daughter. The negligence of the police — their failure to take the necessary action to avert a reasonably foreseeable set of events and their disregard for the dignity, life and bodily integrity of the people they are sworn to protect — justified the Supreme Court of Appeal's imposition of vicarious liability on the responsible Minister.[4]

(ii) Reproductive rights

The Final Constitution's concern for the dignity of women takes a very specific form in FC s 12*(a). FC s 12(a)*, unlike its predecessor in the Interim Constitution, embraces a women's right 'to make decisions concerning reproduction'.

Although the Constitutional Court has yet to expressly vindicate the right to an abortion, two High Courts have heard, and rebuffed, challenges to the statutory

[1] NK (supra) at para 57.
[2] Act 75 of 1969.
[3] 2002 (6) SA 431 (SCA).
[4] Ibid at paras 22–24.

expression of this right in the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Act.[1] In Christian Lawyers II, Mojapelo J held that FC s 12(2)(a) and (b)[2] guarantees the right of every woman to determine the fate of her pregnancy.[3] He noted that while the state does have a legitimate interest in the protection of pre-natal life, such regulation may not amount to a denial of a woman's right to freedom and security of the person. The decision in Christian Lawyers II reflects something of an advance on Christian Lawyers I with respect to its treatment — or at the very least recognition — of the varying (and conflicting) kinds of dignity interests at stake when reproductive rights are pressed into service in the name of abortion. In Christian Lawyers I, McCreath J held that whatever the status of the foetus may have been under the common law, under the Final Constitution the foetus lacks legal personality.[4] As a result, McCreath J could uphold the defendant's exception that the plaintiff's particulars of claim did not disclose a cause of action in that 'a foetus is not a bearer of rights in terms of' FC s 11 and in that FC s 11 does not, therefore, 'preclude the termination of pregnancy in the circumstances and the manner contemplated by the [Termination of Pregnancy Act] and protected under [FC] ss 9, 10, 11, 12, 14, 15(1) and 27(1)(a).'[5] While Christian Lawyers I recognizes expressly the dignity rights of women (Dignity 2 and Dignity 3), McCreath J ducks the more difficult question of whether the state possesses an interest in the dignity of life generally (Dignity 5), and thus the dignity of pre-natal life, in particular. It remains possible, as both Christian Lawyers II and the Termination of Pregnancy Act reflect, to take a state interest in dignity seriously (Dignity 5) without concomitantly undermining a women's right to dignity (Dignity 2 and Dignity 3), and her ability to secure an abortion.[6]

(iii) Punishment

Dignity and that subsection of freedom and security of the person that prohibits 'cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment' have worked a minor,

[1] Act 92 of 1996.

[2] FC s 12(2): 'Everyone has the right to bodily and psychological integrity which includes the right-(a) to make decisions concerning reproduction.' For more on the relationship between FC s 12, FC s 10 and abortion, see M O'Sullivan 'Reproductive Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 37.

[3] Christian Lawyers Association v National Minister of Health & Others 2005 (1) SA 509, 526 (T), 2004 (10) BCLR 1086, 1103 (T)('Christian Lawyers II').

[4] Christian Lawyers Association of South Africa & Others v Minister of Health & Others 1998 (4) SA 113 (T), 1998 (11) BCLR 1434 (T)('Christian Lawyers Association I').

[5] Ibid at 1443, 1437.

[6] For more on how the courts might better characterize the complex relationship between the dignity interests that inform a woman's right to control her reproductive capacity (Dignity 2 and Dignity 3) and her bodily integrity (Dignity 1) and the state's dignity interest in pre-natal 'life' (Dignity 5), see O'Sullivan (supra) at § 37.2.

and sometimes unpopular, revolution in the criminal law.[1] The revolution began with S v Williams.[2] In Williams, the Constitutional Court held unconstitutional those provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act that sanctioned the whipping of juveniles. In finding that whipping assailed the dignity of all individuals who participate in such a process and thus constituted cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment (Dignity 1 and Dignity 5), the Williams Court wrote:

> The Constitution clearly places a very high premium on human dignity and the protection against punishments that are cruel, inhuman or degrading; very stringent requirements would have to be met by the State before these rights can be limited. . . . [T]here is no place for brutal and dehumanising treatment and punishment. The Constitution has allocated to the State and its organs a role as the protectors and guarantors of those rights to ensure that they are available to all. In the process, it sets the State up as a model for society as it endeavours to move away from a violent past. It is therefore reasonable to expect that the State must be foremost in upholding those values which are the guiding light of civilised societies. Respect for human dignity is one such value; acknowledging it includes an acceptance by society that . . . 'even the vilest criminal remains a human being possessed of common human dignity.'[3]

Dignity, in Williams, constitutes a second order rule that determines the application of a first order rule — the right not to be treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way. That a juvenile whipping constitutes a violation of the right to dignity generates the attendent finding of a violation of the right not to be subjected to degrading punishment.

Dignity is deployed once again as a second order rule in the context of punishment in S v Makwanyane.[4] In Makwanyane, the Constitutional Court held the death penalty to be an unjustifiable abrogation of a panoply of constitutional protections — including the rights to life, dignity, equality, fair trials and humane punishment. While the eleven Justices differed as to the exact basis for this finding, dignity as a second order rule leads Chaskalson P to write:

> The rights to life and dignity are the most important of all human rights, and the source of all other personal rights in Chapter Three [of the Interim Constitution]. By committing ourselves to a society founded on the recognition of human rights we are required to value these two rights above all others. And this must be demonstrated by the State in everything that it does, including the way it punishes criminals. This is not achieved by objectifying murderers and putting them to death to serve as an example to others in the expectation that they might possibly be deterred thereby.[5]

The centrality of dignity for the South African constitutional project not only enables the right to be free from cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment to [1] For more on our jurisprudence of punishment, see D Van Zyl Smit 'Sentencing and Punishment' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 49.

[2] S v Williams 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC).

[3] Ibid at paras 76–77 quoting Furman v Georgia 408 US 238 (1972).

[4] 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC)('Makwanyane').

[5] Ibid at para 144.

trump the various justifications for the death penalty offered by the state,[1] it also underwrites a more subtle distinction between punishments. In rejecting the Attorney-General's argument that no meaningful distinction exists between the death sentence and life imprisonment, because 'a prisoner does not lose all his or her rights on entering prison,' Chaskalson P does not rely on a rather arid formalism that equates the termination of life with a denial of dignity.[2] He invokes, instead, the particular meaning of the death penalty in South Africa. It was, for many years, a sword of Damocles hanging over the head of any black South African who might be inclined to challenge the authority and the legitimacy of the apartheid state.

Kant and Hegel, in their rather Manichean universe, could view equal respect as the entitlement of every citizen who recognized that identical status in others, and simultaneously demand that those who failed to accord others such respect, ie, by committing murder, should forfeit (in its entirety) the entitlement to that respect.[3] The Makwanyane Court refuses to endorse such a simple calculus: that kind of oversimplification seems more of a piece with the black and white ideology of apartheid than with the post-apartheid struggle to accord each individual equal concern and equal respect (Dignity 2). The power of the Court's analysis lies not in refusing to impose a capital sentence. The judgment's force flows from the Court's refusal, at least at the level of rhetoric, to use the law to treat individuals as mere means to achieve some (perceived) greater good (Dignity 1).[4]

This leitmotif — of refusing to turn away from suffering, and of not allowing individuals to simply disappear — recurs in a broad array of 'punishment' cases.

In Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa, the Constitutional Court held that a provision of the Magistrates Court Act[5] that permitted incarceration without trial of a civil debtor constituted an unjustifiable infringement of the right to freedom and security of the person.[6] The Coetzee Court did away with these civil imprisonment provisions largely because incarceration for one's 'status' — and not a crime — is out of step with contemporary mores, and in particular, the

[1] Makwanyane (supra) at para 145.
[2] Ibid at para 142.
[3] See, eg, Kant Metaphysics of Morals (supra) at 140-143.
[4] In a similar vein, the Constitutional Court refused, in Mohamed v President of the Republic of South Africa, to allow the state to ignore the applicant's rights to dignity, life, and freedom and security of the person in the service of some greater political good — say, the war on terror. 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC), 2001 (2) SACR 66 (CC).
[5] Act 32 of 1944.
[6] 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC)('Coetzee').

constitutional commitment to human dignity.[1] To treat a human being as a marker for a debt — and to keep them alive as a mere physical reminder to others to beware their financially frivolous ways (Dignity 1) — is entirely at odds with a vision of South Africa as a realm of ends (Dignity 5). In Dodo, the Court struggles mightily with the law's inevitable use of individuals to send messages back to the community about the price of any given crime.[2] Ackermann J writes:

> To attempt to justify any period of penal incarceration, let alone imprisonment for life as in the present case, without inquiring into the proportionality between the offence and the period of imprisonment, is to ignore, if not to deny, that which lies at the very heart of human dignity. Human beings are not commodities to which a price can be attached; they are creatures with inherent and infinite worth; they ought to be treated as ends in themselves, never merely as means to an end. Where the length of a sentence, which has been imposed because of its general deterrent effect on others, bears no relation to the gravity of the offence … the offender is being used essentially as a means to another end and the offender's dignity assailed. So too where the reformative effect of the punishment is predominant and the offender sentenced to lengthy imprisonment, principally because he cannot be reformed in a shorter period, but the length of imprisonment bears no relationship to what the committed offence merits. Even in the absence of such features, mere disproportionality between the offence and the period of imprisonment would also tend to treat the offender as a means to an end, thereby denying the offender's humanity.[3]

One might be surprised, after such a strong pronouncement, that the Dodo Court would then go on to uphold any mandatory life sentence for any category of murder.[4] But the Dodo Court is not committed to the principle that any hint of a

[1] In Coetzee, Sachs J wrote:

> The essence of civil imprisonment, even in its milder forms, has always been that the debtor pays with his or her body. The Afrikaans word gyselaar (hostage) comes from the contract recognised in Roman-Dutch law in terms of which a freeman pledged his person as suretyship for performance. . . . The broad question before us would be whether, in the open and democratic society contemplated by the Constitution, it could ever be appropriate to use imprisonment as a means of ensuring that creditors got paid in full, bearing in mind that the amount to be collected would often fall below the costs of collection, not to speak of the costs to the taxpayer of keeping the debtor in prison. It is evident from the statistical data presented to us that committal to prison is in reality mainly for relatively small amounts and largely for debt in respect of goods purchased, services rendered and money borrowed … The persons most vulnerable to committal orders would be precisely those who were unemployed, and thus could not be subject to emoluments orders, and those who did not have any property which could be attached. To penalise the workless and the poor so as to frighten those a little better-off would be exactly the kind of instrumentalising of human beings which the concept of fundamental rights was designed to rebut.

Coetzee (supra) at paras 66–67.

[2] S v Dodo 2001 (3) SA 382 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 423 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 594 (CC)('Dodo').

[3] Ibid at para 38.

[4] Of course, this general statement must be viewed in terms of the actual context of the case before the Court and thus the term 'mandatory' must be read in the context of the section in question. Section 51(1) of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 'made it obligatory for a High Court to sentence an accused, convicted of offences specified in the Act, to imprisonment for life unless, under s 51(3)(a), the Court was satisfied that "substantial and compelling circumstances" existed which justified the imposition of a lesser sentence.' Ibid at para 2 referring to Act 105 of 1997. Moreover, the Court does go on to note that if the legislation had compelled a court to impose life imprisonment and that sentence were deemed utilitarian calculus in the law is an affront to dignity.[1] Rather, as Williams, Makwanyane and Coetzee make clear, dignity simply demands that we do not allow the consequentialist character of the law to exhaust law's moral content.[2] Dignity forces us to attend constantly to law's ultimate goal: not to control the ends of individuals, but to create a realm of ends (Dignity 5).[3]

The Constitutional Court's decision in Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education confirms that this commitment to law qua realm of ends is not empty rhetoric. Nothing would have been simpler than acceding to the applicants' contention that the particular tenets of their faith — and the protection afforded by FC s 15 — permitted the use of corporal punishment in private religious schools. Instead, the Court recognizes that the state's interest in banning corporal punishment in schools is justified by reference to the inherent dignity of all children — regardless of their parents' religion — and that this commitment precludes the grossly disproportionate to the crime, then the Court would be obliged to find the legislation unconstitutional. But that caveat simply supports the proposition in the text above.

Justice Ackermann's position on mandatory life sentences is explored at somewhat greater length in his concurrence in Makwanyane. Justice Ackermann writes:

> If the death penalty is to be abolished, as I believe it must, society is entitled to the assurance that the State will protect it from further harm from the convicted unreformed recidivist killer or rapist. If there is an individual right not to be put to death by the criminal justice system, there is a correlative obligation on the State, through the criminal justice system, to protect society from once again being harmed by the unreformed recidivist killer or rapist.

Makwanyane (supra) at para 171. But that obligation, Justice Ackermann notes, still 'demands a humane execution of the sentence.' Ibid at 172. Drawing on the jurisprudence of Germany's Federal Constitutional Court ('FCC'), he states that this means, at a minimum, that 'a law providing for life imprisonment must lay down objective criteria for the release of prisoners serving life sentences.' Ibid. In the words of the FCC:

> Human dignity is not infringed when the execution of the sentence remains necessary due to the continuing danger posed by the prisoner and clemency is for this reason precluded. The state is not prevented from protecting the community from dangerous criminals by keeping them incarcerated.

Ibid (Ackermann J's translation).

[1] In S v Chapman, Chief Justice Mohamed made it clear that the courts would use criminal sanctions to send a message to rapists, potential rapists and the general community that sexual violence against women would not be tolerated and that our new constitutional ethos — and the rights of women to dignity, privacy and bodily integrity — dictates that those who engage in sexual violence be shown no mercy. 1997 (3) SA 341 (SCA), 1997 (2) SACR 3 (SCA).

[2] See, eg, S v Pennington 1997 (4) SA 1076 (CC), 1999 (10) BCLR 1413 (CC), 1999 (2) SACR 329 (CC)('Pennington')(An undue delay in appeals process could constitute an impairment of dignity if it turned out, in a particular case, that the delay visited extreme hardship; but delays are an inevitable part of the criminal justice system and they do not, per se, constitute an impairment of the right to a fair trial or the right to dignity.) But see Johnson v Minister of Home Affairs 1997 (2) SA 432 (C)(Failure to process immigration applications expeditiously — with detentions lasting over 14 months — violates IC s 11(1)'s prohibition on detention without trial and IC s 10's right to dignity.)

[3] See S v Thebus 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC), 2003 (2) SACR 318 (CC) at paras 35–40 (Court rejects argument that the common purpose doctrine violates the right to dignity because it 'de-individualizes . . . [and] dehumanizes people by treating them in a general manner as nameless faceless parts of the group.' It upholds the doctrine on the grounds that 'effective prosecution is a legitimate, pressing social need' and that there is 'need for a strong deterrent to violent crime.' Thus, an individual may be convicted of a crime in terms of the common purpose doctrine even though individual culpability for the act in question cannot be established.)

use of violence to maintain order. Or, in other words, the Court forbade the use of (violence against) children as a means to enforce both discipline within the school and discipline within the broader religious community (Dignity 1).[1]

(d) Religion, language and culture

(i) Religion

Despite the obvious centrality of religion for collective identity — and thus for individual dignity (Dignity 2 and Dignity 3) — religion and dignity as mutually reinforcing rights have not fared particularly well in the few cases to reach the Constitutional Court. In Prince v President, Cape Law Society, a sharply divided Constitutional Court held that although a Rastafarian's right to freedom of religion in terms of FC s 15(1) of the Final Constitution permitted him to engage in Rastafarian rituals, the state was justified in proscribing the ritual use of cannabis.[2] In reaching its conclusions, the majority relied heavily on the state's evidence that even limited dagga smoking could lead to broader drug use in the country and greater narcotics trafficking through the country. This finding turned, at least in

[1] The High Courts have, as a result of FC s 10's refusal to allow individuals to be treated as mere means, displayed increasingly greater empathy towards prisoners. In Stanfield van Zyl insisted that a terminally ill prisoner be given parole because his dignity (in terms of FC s 10) demanded no less:

> Every sentenced prisoner is entitled to respect for and recognition of his equality, human dignity and freedom, in the sense of his right not to be treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way. Section 35(2)(e) ensures that he has the right 'to conditions of detention that are consistent with human dignity, including at least exercise and the provision, at state expense, of adequate accommodation, nutrition, reading material and medical treatment'. What will be 'consistent with human dignity' in any particular case will, of course, depend on the facts and circumstances of each such case.

Stanfield v Minister of Correctional Services & Others 2004 (4) SA 43 (C), 2003 (12) BCLR 1384 (C) at para 89. See also S v Dube 2000 (2) SA 583 (N), 2000 (6) BCLR 685 (N)(Entrapment and the seizing of property of an accused person by the state violates dignity.) The Supreme Court of Appeal has likewise held that the denial of important privileges, that normally attach to citizenship, to prisoners still awaiting trial and sentencing constitute a violation of the Final Constitution's commitment both to the rule of law and to human dignity. See Minister of Correctional Services v Kwakwa & Another 2002 (4) SA 455 (SCA).

The Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal have also placed significant limits on the use of violence — and in particular, deadly force — with respect to the prevention of crimes that involve no violence themselves. The principle of proportionality, as we have seen in the punishment cases, demands that the state not employ means that are not narrowly tailored to meet a constitutionally legitimate objective. The use of deadly force, as contemplated by the Criminal Procedure Act, to apprehend a pick-pocket is the epitome of disproportionality. These powers, therefore, constitute unjustifiable limitations on the rights to dignity, to life and to freedom and security of the person. See Govender v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 273 (SCA), 2001 (11) BCLR 1197 (SCA), 2001 (2) SACR 197 (SCA); Ex Parte Minister of Safety and Security: In re S v Walters 2002 (4) 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC), 2002 (2) SACR 105 (CC).

[2] 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC)('Prince').

part, on an under-interrogated assumption that no meaningful exemption to existing laws could be carved out for ritual dagga use.[1]

When viewed through the lens of dignity analysis — which valourizes such constitutive attachments as marriage and the family (Dignity 2 and Dignity 3) — the majority's cursory appraisal of the importance of this religious practice for an adherent is rather perplexing. The Prince Court's discourse permits a vague sense of danger to the commonweal to overwhelm the dignity interests of a marginal religious minority (Dignity 2, Dignity 3, and Dignity 4).[2]

The Constitutional Court's decision in Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education, on the other hand, contains valuable language about how our dignity jurisprudence tolerates legal asymmetries.[3] The essence of dignity and equality under the South African Constitution, so says the judgment, is that it does not require that we treat everyone the same way, but that we treat everyone with equal concern and equal respect (Dignity 2).[4]

Unfortunately, the Christian Education Court does not really extend the benefit of this understanding of dignity to religious belief and practice. The judgment assumes, without argument, that s 10 of the South African Schools Act[5] limits

[1] In fairness to the majority in Prince, it must be noted that: (a) the constitutionality of the proscription of the use of cannabis by criminal sanction was never raised by Prince; (b) the religious use of cannabis may appear — to some — indistinguishable from the recreational use of it; and (c) had the religious use been more circumscribed, the majority stated its willingness to carve out an exception. Of course, even with these caveats, the majority's judgment still begs the question as to whether the lack of judicial solicitude turns entirely on the state's identification of some intoxicants as criminal — marijuana — and other equally powerful intoxicants — alcohol — as acceptable. The need for an exemption could turn on distinctions without meaningful differences.

[2] The minority judgment offers some solace for those inclined to treat religious belief with greater dignity. Justice Ncgobo writes:

> Apart from this, as a general matter, the Court should not be concerned with questions whether, as a matter of religious doctrine, a particular practice is central to the religion. Religion is a matter of faith and belief. The beliefs that believers hold sacred and thus central to their religious faith may strike non-believers as bizarre, illogical or irrational. Human beings may freely believe in what they cannot prove. Yet that their beliefs are bizarre, illogical or irrational to others, or are incapable of scientific proof, does not detract from the fact that these are religious beliefs for the purposes of enjoying the protection guaranteed by the right to freedom of religion. The believers should not be put to the proof of their beliefs or faith. For this reason, it is undesirable for courts to enter into the debate whether a particular practice is central to a religion unless there is a genuine dispute as to the centrality of the practice.

Prince (supra) at 813. Thus, the minority judgment recognizes: (1) how associations are constitutive of the beliefs and practices of individuals; and (2) how the fact of their being constitutive entitles them to constitutional protection. The judgment is remarkable in that it does not rely upon a model of rational moral agency to distinguish those beliefs that are entitled to judicial solicitude from those beliefs that are not. For a further discussion of the Constitutional Court's analysis in Prince, Christian Education and other religion cases, see S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44 and P Farlam 'Freedom of Religion, Conscience, Thought and Belief' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 41.

[3] 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC)('Christian Eduction').

[4] Ibid at para 42.

[5] Act 84 of 1996.

FC ss 15 and 31. The Court then explains why the state is justified in barring corporal punishment in all schools and why it need not consider an exemption for such punishment when religious doctrine so dictates.

The problem with the judgment, as I have noted elsewhere, is not its result. It is perfectly reasonable to override religious dictates and to bar corporal punishment that impairs the dignity of children (Dignity 1 and Dignity 5). The problem is with the distinction between the practice of religion in schools and the practice of religion elsewhere, i.e., the home. If children lack the capacity to decide for themselves whether religious practices will prove deleterious to their health — and it therefore becomes incumbent upon the state to intervene on their behalf to protect their dignity — then it would seem reasonable to conclude that barring religion sanctioned corporal punishment at home should be no different than barring religion sanctioned corporal punishment at school. But that is not what the Court concludes. Rather, it contends that the parents 'were not being obliged to make an absolute and strenuous choice between obeying a law of the land or following their conscience. They could do both simultaneously.'[1] That is, parents could follow their conscience at home — and beat their children — but still obey the law of the land by having their children attend school free from corporal punishment. The Court cannot have it both ways. Either a child's right to dignity (Dignity 1) is of such paramount importance that it precludes corporal punishment at home and at school, or the dignity interests of a religious community in practicing its faith (Dignity 3 and Dignity 4) justify corporal punishment in school and at home. To say, as the Court does, that the crux of the matter is the use of a teacher as the instrument of religious discipline is pure sophistry. If the teacher was the parent or the school was at home, then the court's basis for enabling the parents' 'to do both simultaneously' would evaporate. The Court refusal to offer any justification for this distinction does its dignity analysis a disservice.[2]

If Christian Education and Prince represent low water marks with respect to the Court's treatment of conflicts between the dignity interests of religious groups (Dignity 3 and Dignity 4) and the dignity interests of individuals (Dignity 1, Dignity 2 and Dignity 3) or the polity as a whole (Dignity 5), then the Court's recent ruling in Fourie might be judged a marked improvement. In finding that the dignity interests (Dignity 2) of same-sex life partners were unjustifiably limited by rules of common law and statutory provisions that prevented them from entering civilly-sanctioned marriages, the Fourie Court went out of its way to note that religious prohibitions on gay and lesbian marriage did not constitute an unjustifiable infringement and that religious officials could legitimately refuse to consecrate a marriage between members of a same-sex life partnership.[1] In other words, the Court recognized expressly constitutional goods — and, in particular, dignity interests — that had nothing to do with, and which might even be viewed as inimical to, egalitarian concerns.[2]

[1] Christian Education (supra) at para 51.

[2] For a further discussion of Christian Education, see Woolman 'Association' (supra) at § 44.3*(c)*(viii). Patrick Lenta has recently offered a similar analysis of Christian Education. See P Lenta 'Religious Liberty and Cultural Accommodation' (2005) 122 SALJ 352, 370 ('Is Sach's hinting, despite his refusal to rule on the question, that corporal punishment administered in the home should be constitutionally permissible. . . It is hard to see how this could be so. There is no necessary qualitative difference between the two locations.') Both Laurie Ackermann and Patrick Lenta suggest that pragmatic grounds might exist for the distinction: namely that we would not want trivial instances of family conflict caught up in the net of the criminal justice system. See Correspondence with Laurie Ackermann (26 January 2006)(On file with author); Lenta (supra) at 371. While the law is often too blunt a cudgel for matters of the heart, the law does not permit non-trivial violence in the home to remain a private matter.

(ii) Culture and Language

Conflicts over cultural practices often pit the dignity interests of the individual (Dignity 2) against the dignity interests of communities and associations (Dignity 3 and Dignity 4).[3] Unlike the robust protection afforded religious practices under FC s 15, however, the Final Constitution makes it clear that cultural practices secure constitutional protection only where they do not interfere with the exercise of other fundamental rights.[4]

By granting communities the right to create schools based upon a common culture, language or religion, the Constitutional Court in Gauteng School Education Bill expressly recognized the importance of such attachments for individual dignity and group identity.[5] The Supreme Court of Appeal in Mikro gave this finding

[1] Fourie (supra) at paras 90–98. See also Fourie v Minister of Home Affairs 2005 (3) SA 429 (SCA), 2005 (3) BCLR 241 (SCA) at paras 36–37 (No religious denomination would be compelled to marry gay or lesbian couples.)

[2] See Woolman 'Association' (supra) at § 44.3*(c)*(viii); Taylor v Kurtstag [2004] 4 All SA 317 (W); Wittmann v Deutscher Schulverein, Pretoria, & Others 1998 (4) SA 423, 451 (T), 1999 (1) BCLR 92 (T).

[3] For a more detailed discussion of the relationship between customary law and the dictates of dignity, see § 36.5*(c)* infra. See also Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC); Mabuza v Mbatha 2003 (4) SA 218 (C), 2003 (7) BCLR 743 (C) at para 32 ('[These rules] provide a setting which contributes to the unity of family structures and the fostering of co-operation, a sense of responsibility in and of belonging to its members, as well as the nurturing of healthy communitarian traditions such as ubuntu. These valuable aspects of customary law more than justify its protection by the Constitution. It bears repeating, however, that as with all law, the constitutional validity of rules and principles of customary law depend on their consistency with the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.')

[4] FC s 31 reads as follows: '(1) Persons belonging to a cultural, religious or linguistic community may not be denied the right, with other members of that community — (a) to enjoy their culture, practice their religion and use their language; and (b) to form, join and maintain cultural, religious and linguistic associations and other organs of civil society; (2) The rights in ss (1) may not be exercised in a manner inconsistent with any provision of the Bill of Rights.' FC s 31(2) could be construed to preclude all exclusionary and discriminatory policies. But that assumes that all such practices are inconsistent with various provisions in the Bill of Rights, in particular, equality and dignity. The Constitutional Court has made it quite clear that not all discrimination is unfair discrimination. See, eg, Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC).

[5] Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In Re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC)(Court held that IC s 32*(c)* permitted communities to create schools based upon common culture, language and religion. It further held that IC 32*(c)* provided a defensive right to persons who sought to establish such educational institutions and that it protected that right from invasion by the state. It did not, however, impose upon the state an obligation to establish such educational institutions.)

teeth by holding that FC s 29(2) — the right to receive education in an official language of choice at a public educational institution, where practicable — did not encompass the right to receive such education at each and every public school.[1] The Mikro Court further held that the state did not, as a general matter, have the power to substitute its judgment regarding appropriate language policy for that of the school governing body ('SGB'). Dignity 3 and Dignity 4 interests will not, therefore, always yield to Dignity 2 interests. The High Court in Laerskool Middelburg correctly added the corollary that the right to single-medium public schools cannot automatically trump the right of all public school students to education in the official language of their choice where the provision of such instruction is 'reasonably practicable'.[2]

(e) Privacy

The privacy jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court draws down on the first and third dimensions of dignity identified at the outset. The notion that dignity entitles the individual to be treated as an end-in-herself (Dignity 1) and to pursue some semblance of self-actualization (Dignity 3) has driven the Court to conclude that the individual is, consequently, entitled to a space within which to define

[1] Western Cape Minister of Education v The Governing Body of Mikro Primary School 2006 (1) SA 1 (SCA), 2005 (10) BCLR 973 (SCA)('Mikro').

[2] Laerskool Middelburg en 'n Ander v Departementshoof, Mpumalanga Departement van Onderwys en Andere 2003 (4) SA 160 (T). The Court was clearly troubled by the conflict between the right to a single-medium school and the right to be educated in the official language of one's choice. In deciding that the 'minority' students must be accommodated, the Court correctly concluded that the right to a single-medium public educational institution was clearly subordinate to the right of every South African child to education in a language they can comprehend. However, the High Court made two errors — one in law and one in analysis. First, according to the Supreme Court of Appeal in Mikro, the High Court in Laerskool Middelburg erred when it held that 'minority' students always have a right to an education in their preferred language. That right — said the Mikro Court — was constrained by the phrase 'reasonably practicable'. That meant, at a minimum, that learners who had access to another institution that already catered to their linguistic preference were obliged to attend that institution and could not use their linguistic preference to turn a single medium school into a dual medium school. Second, the High Court seems to be on shaky ground when it suggests that it is an open question as to whether facility in a given language was better served where other languages were excluded. Similarly, the High Court wrongly concluded that a claim to a single-medium institution was probably best defined as a mere claim to emotional, cultural, religious and social-psychological security. This trivializes the desire to maintain basic, constitutive attachments. The desire to sustain a given language and culture — especially a minority culture, as Afrikaner culture now is — is best served by single medium institutions that reinforce expressly the importance of sustaining the integrity of that community. As a result, the High Court must also be wrong, if not terribly confused, when it claims that the conversion of a single-medium public institution to a dual-medium school cannot per se diminish the force of linguistic (and cultural-linguistic) ties. That is, with respect, exactly what the conversion per se does. However, the Laerskool Middelburg High Court is correct to note that exclusion on the grounds of language and culture cannot serve as a proxy for exclusion on the grounds of race. See, eg, Matukane & Others v Laerskool Potgietersrus 1996 (3) SA 223 (T)(Court found that discriminatory entrance policies ostensibly based upon language and culture, but which were really designed to exclude learners because of their race, violated the right to equality of the complainants and could not be justified on the grounds of cultural, minority or associational rights.)

herself without interference by the state or other members of society.[1] In finding that Section 2(1) of the Indecent or Obscene Photographic Matter Act 37 of 1967 violated the right to privacy by prohibiting the possession of 'indecent' or 'obscene' materials in one's own home, Didcott J, for a majority in Case & Curtis, wrote:

> What erotic material I may choose to keep within the privacy of my home, and only for my personal use there, is nobody's business but mine. It is certainly not the business of society or the state. Any ban imposed on my possession of such material for that solitary purpose invades the personal privacy which section 13 of the interim Constitution guarantees that I shall enjoy.[2]

But this understanding of privacy, dignity as self-actualization (Dignity 3), secured neither the full endorsement nor the long-term support of the Court. In her concurrence in Case & Curtis, Mokgoro J wrote:

> I would, however, respectfully part company from Justice Didcott to the extent that any part of his opinion might be read to suggest that it is not in any circumstances the business of the state to regulate the kinds of expressive material an individual may consume in the privacy of her or his own home. It may be so that, as in England, a 'South African's home is his (or her) castle.' But I would hesitate to endorse the view that its walls are impregnable to the reach of governmental regulation affecting expressive materials.[3]

---

[1] For the leading statement on privacy, see Bernstein & Others v Bester NO & Others 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC)('Bernstein') at paras 67, 73, 79 (Ackermann J identifies 'privacy' with the 'inner sanctum of a person, such as his/her family life, sexual preference and home environment, which is shielded from erosion by conflicting rights of the community.' He quotes, with approval, the Council of Europe's gloss on the right to privacy:

> [The right to privacy] consists essentially in the right to live one's own life with a minimum of interference. It concerns private, family and home life, physical and moral integrity, honour and reputation, avoidance of being placed in a false light, non-revelation of irrelevant and embarrassing facts, unauthorised publication of private photographs, protection from disclosure of information given or received by the individual confidentially

Ackermann J then concludes that South African and foreign authorities are all inclined to limit 'the "right to privacy" . . . to the most personal aspects of a person's existence, and not to every aspect within his/her personal knowledge and experience.') See also Pretoria Portland Cement & Another v Competition Commission & Others 2003 (2) SA 385 (SCA)(Use of warrant to film premises, not approved in the warrant itself, constitutes grave violation of the right to privacy (FC s 14) and the right to dignity (FC s 10) of the applicant, as well as a denial of the applicant's right of access to court (FC s 34).) But see Director of Public Prosecutions, Cape of Good Hope v Bathgate 2000 (2) SA 535 (C) at paras 70–112 (Search and seizure provisions of Proceeds of Crime Act 76 of 1996 that permitted confiscation of ill-gotten goods in order to prevent their concealment or dissipation did not constitute an unjustifiable limitation of the rights to dignity, property, privacy or a fair trial); S v Huma 1996 (1) SA 232 (W), 1995 (2) SACR 411 (W)(Court holds that taking of fingerprints as part of criminal investigation does not constitute an impairment of the accused's dignity in terms of IC s 10 or any other right associated with a fair trial.)

[1] Case v Minister of Safety and Security; Curtis v Minister of Safety and Security 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC)('Case & Curtis') at para 91 citing with approval Bernstein (supra) at paras 67–69 (Right to privacy protects 'the inner sanctum of a person' that lies within 'the truly personal realm.') See also Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd: In re Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd v Smit NO 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC) at para 18 (Right to privacy protects intimate space because such a space is a prerequisite for human dignity.)

[2] Case & Curtis (supra) at para 65. See also S v Dube 2000 (2) SA 583 (N)(High Court holds that the right to privacy does not embrace the right not to be secretly photographed while engaging in criminal activity. Such an extravagant notion of privacy — a highly attenuated Dignity 3 interest — even if constitutionally protected would have to yield before the overwhelmingly more important interests of the polity as a whole (Dignity 5)).

The commitment to privacy grounded in individual autonomy would have to yield, as several other justices in Case & Curtis likewise noted, when the greater good so required.[1] Thus, while neither Mokgoro J nor Langa J were willing, in Case & Curtis, to contest the right of an individual to receive and to read some kinds pornography in the comfort of their own home, they strongly intimated that other kinds of dignity concerns might warrant the limitation of that right.

In De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division, Langa J identified at least one class of pornographic materials that no one in South Africa would be permitted to possess: child pornography.[2] Langa J acknowledged that the right to privacy was infringed by Section 27(1) of the Films and Publications Act 65 of 1996.[3] But that limitation was more than justified by the objectives of the Act, and the means required to realize them. What is worth remarking upon in this chapter are the putative grounds for the limitation. Langa J makes a point of trawling through the available evidence that child pornography is (a) 'harmful to children who are used in its production'; (b) 'potentially harmful because of the attitude to child sex that it fosters'; and (c) harmful because of 'the use to which it can be put in grooming children to engage in sexual conduct'.[4] Having been convinced by this body of evidence, Justice Langa makes it part of the justification for the limitation of the right to privacy. However, a close reading of De Reuck shows that these grounds are not a necessary condition for the Court's ultimate conclusion. The only real justification that matters is the Court's belief that the mere fact of child pornography impairs the dignity of all children (Dignity 5) and any society (Dignity 5) that condones it:

> The degradation of children through child pornography is a serious harm which impairs their dignity and contributes to a culture which devalues their worth. Society has recognised that childhood is a special stage in life which is to be both treasured and guarded. The state must ensure that the lives of children are not disrupted by adults who objectify and sexualise them through the production and possession of child pornography. There is obvious physical harm suffered by the victims of sexual abuse and by those children forced to yield to the demands of the paedophile and pornographer, but there is also harm to the dignity and perception of all children when a society allows sexualised images of children to be available. The chief purpose of the statutory prohibitions against child pornography is to protect the dignity, humanity and integrity of children.[5]

Given that less restrictive means could have been employed — and, indeed, are employed in England and Germany — to realize the three 'empirical' justifications for the prohibition identified above, the only ground that justifies the

[1] See also MEC for Health, Mpumalanga v M-Net 2002 (6) SA 714 (T)(The privacy interests of a public hospital and public hospital staff (Dignity 3) fall before the freedom of expression interests of the general public ('Dignity 4 and Dignity 5') in viewing clandestinely filmed operations that demonstrate the patently negligent conduct of the hospital staff.)

[2] De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC)('De Reuck').

[3] Ibid at para 52.

[4] Ibid at para 62.

[5] Ibid at para 63.

continued validity of the provision of the Films and Publications Act at issue is dignity writ large (Dignity 5).[1] One might be inclined to characterize the conflict as one between dignity qua self-actualization (Dignity 3) and dignity qua individual-as-end-in-herself (Dignity 1). In De Reuck, however, dignity qua self-actualization (Dignity 3) actually succumbs to dignity qua good of the community (Dignity 5). For the real offence, according to the Court, is not to the class of actual individual children harmed. Were that the case, we could have expected the Court to require the state to create means narrowly tailored to protect that vulnerable class. Instead, the offence is to the dignity of the entire community (Dignity 5). For to say that all children have their dignity impaired by the mere fact of child pornography is to say that we have all had our dignity impaired — as children, as adults, and thus, and as a society as a whole — by the mere fact of (real, imitated or animated) child pornography. There is, quite clearly, a puritanical, and uninterrogated set of assumptions about the meaning of both childhood and sexuality at work here.[2] What is more significant, for my immediate purposes, is the recognition that dignity is used not to protect the individual ends of the realm, but to protect the realm itself.[3]

(f) Freedom of trade, occupation and profession

As we saw in such cases as NCGLE I, Hugo, and Prinsloo, the South African courts often emphasize the extent to which various dimensions of dignity — say self-actualization (Dignity 3) and self-governance (Dignity 4) — are necessary conditions for individual freedom. Given this link between dignity and freedom, it is hardly surprising that, as Cameron J explains in Brisley v Drotsky, contractual autonomy should now be informed by our constitutional commitment to dignity.[4] Moreover, Cameron argues, contractual freedom, shorn of its excesses, 'enhances rather than diminishes our self-respect and dignity.'[5]

The kind of enhancement contemplated by Cameron J is on full display in Coetzee v Comitis.[6] In Comitis, the Cape High Court assessed the constitutionality of National Soccer League ('NSL') employment conditions which provided that any person wishing to play professional football (1) had to register with the NSL; (2) had to obtain a clearance certificate from his former club before he could be registered by the NSL as a player of a new club; (3) had to ensure that after

[1] For example, the three 'empirical' reasons for upholding the statute are irrelevant to the Court's apparent conclusion that animated porn may be legitimately proscribed. England and Germany, amongst other jurisdictions, take cognisance of the difference between actual and animated pornography. The laws on their books do not proscribe animated pornography and are, therefore, 'less restrictive means' of achieving the same legitimate state objective.

[2] For a critique of the Court's 'sexuality' jurisprudence, see N Fritz 'Crossing Jordan: Constitutional Space for (Un)Civil Sex?' (2004) 20 SAJHR 230.

[3] Here, in De Reuck, is one of the few instances where the Court expressly endorses a conservative, neo-romantic notion of a people over a heterogeneous realm of ends.

[4] 2002 (4) SA 1 (SCA), 2002 (12) BCLR 1229 (SCA)('Brisley') at paras 94 and 95.

[5] Brisley (supra) at para 94 citing, with approval, the dicta of Davis J in Mort NO v Henry Shields-Chiat 2001 (1) SA 464, 475 (C), [2002] 2 All SA 515 (C).

[6] 2001 (1) SA 1254 (C), 2001 (4) BCLR 323 (C)('Comitis').

conclusion of a contract with a new club, his former club was duly compensated; and (4) remained a registered player of the club with which he was last employed — should the clubs not be able to agree on an appropriate transfer fee — for a period of thirty months (only after this period would the former club no longer be entitled to compensation). Prior IC s 26, challenges to covenants in restraint of trade had foundered on the shoals of dicta set out in the pre-constitutional Magna Alloys and Research (SA) (Pty) Ltd v Ellis.[1]

After noting that the jurisprudence generated under IC s 26 had 'been uniformly dismissive of a suggestion that the Interim Constitution necessitated a revision of the restraint of trade law',[2] Traverso J states that '[c]onsiderations of public policy cannot be constant [given that] [o]ur society is an ever-changing one' and that '[w]e have moved from a very dark past into a democracy where the Constitution is the supreme law, and public policy should be considered against the background of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.'[3] Traverso J then holds that because the aforementioned employment conditions 'strip the player of his human dignity' by treating him as no more than 'goods and chattel . . . at the mercy of the employer', the NSL Rules cannot be squared with the dictates of FC s 7(1) or FC s 10.[4] The notion that the player is an end-in-himself — and no mere object — requires that the principle of the sanctity of contract yield to more basic considerations of human dignity (Dignity 1).[5]

But other courts — including the Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal — seem disinclined to follow Traverso J's decision to deploy dignity in a manner that diminishes the deleterious consequences: (a) of contracts of adhesion; or (b) of criminal sanctions visited upon those who have no choice but to engage in morally reprehensible behaviour if they are to survive.

In Afrox Healthcare Bpk v Strydom, an agreement was concluded between the appellant, the owner of a private hospital, and the respondent, a party seeking medical treatment.[6] After an operation at the hospital, negligent conduct by a

[1] 1984 (4) SA 874 (A)('Magna Alloys')(Court held that a restraint of trade clause within a contract was prima facie valid and that whoever wished to prove the contrary bore the onus of showing that 'the restriction conflicted with the public interest.') See, further, Waltons Stationery Co. (Pty) Ltd v Fourie & Another 1994 (4) SA 507 (O), 1994 (1) BCLR 50 (O); Kotze en Genis (Edms) BPK v Potgieter 1995 (3) SA 783 (C), 1995 (3) BCLR 349 (C); AK Entertainment CC v Minister of Safety 1994 (4) BCLR 31 (E); Knox D'Arcy (Ltd) & Another v Swar & Another 1996 (2) SA 651(W), 1995 (12) BCLR 1702 (W).

[2] Comitis (supra) at para 30.

[3] Ibid at para 32.

[4] Ibid at paras 34 and 38 (Emphasis added).

[5] For similar analysis, see Santos Prof Football Club v Igesund 2002 (5) SA 697, 701 (C)(Court finds that the most basic autonomy interests (Dignity 1) of the player militate against the enforcement — by specific performance — of the contract in question.) See also Fidelity Guards Holdings (Pty) Ltd T/A Fidelity Guards v Pearmain 2001 (2) SA 853, 862 (SCA)('Insofar as . . . restraint [of trade clauses constitute] . . . a limitation of the rights entrenched in [FC] s 22, the common law as developed by the Courts, in my view, comply with the requirements laid down in [FC] s 36(1). Any party to any agreement where a restraint clause is regarded as material is free to agree to include such a clause in the main agreement and the common law in this regard is therefore of general application'); Fidelity Guards v Pearmain 2001 (2) SA 853 (SE), 1997 (10) BCLR 1443 (SE).

[6] 2002 (6) SA 21 (SCA)('Afrox').

nurse led to complications that caused further injury to the respondent. The respondent argued that the negligent conduct of the nurse constituted a breach of contract by the appellant and instituted an action holding the appellant responsible for the damages suffered. The Supreme Court of Appeal rejected the respondent's various claims — including a constitutional challenge that relied upon an argument that values such as human dignity required the development of the common law on behalf of those persons who (a) do not possess the requisite capacity to understand fully the document they sign or (b) occupy substantially weaker bargaining positions. Instead, the SCA concluded that the exemption clause at issue legitimately immunized the appellant from claims for negligence and that the courts are duty bound to enforce such contractual terms unless the Final Constitution or the boni mores of the community clearly dictate otherwise. Afrox rests on the classically liberal fiction that the common law constitutes a neutral contractual backdrop for relations between fully autonomous individuals. Unlike the Comitis court, the Afrox court shows little interest in assessing whether the actual contractual conditions that obtain with respect to most hospital admissions forms 'strip the [patient] of his human dignity' and place him 'at the mercy' of the hospital and its staff. The question as to whether these forms — and the common law that backs them up — can be squared with the dictates of FC s 7(1), FC s 10 or FC s 39(2) never arose.

The Constitutional Court's decision in Jordan must, in light of both Comitis and Brisley, be viewed as doubly disappointing: it neither upholds contractual freedom in the service of dignity qua autonomy (Dignity 3) nor comes to the aid of those treated as chattel rather than as ends-in-themselves (Dignity 1). While one might be excused for thinking, after the decisions in NCGLE I and NCGLE II, that the Final Constitution's express commitment to dignity and equality would protect the sexual practices of a historically disadvantaged and marginal social group,[1] the Jordan Court rejected each and every constitutional challenge to the statutory proscriptions of prostitution.[2] With respect to the argument from dignity, the Court wrote:

> Our Constitution values human dignity which inheres in various aspects of what it means to be a human being. One of these aspects is the fundamental dignity of the human body, which is not simply organic. Neither is it something to be commodified. Our Constitution requires that it be respected. We do not believe that s 20(1)(aA) can be said to be the cause of any limitation on the dignity of the prostitute. To the extent that the dignity of prostitutes is diminished, the diminution arises from the character of prostitution itself. The very nature of prostitution is the commodification of one's body. … The very character of the work they undertake devalues the respect that the Constitution regards as inherent in the human body.[3]

[1] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs & Others, 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC)('NCGLE II'); National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (3) SA 173 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('NCGLE I').

[2] S v Jordan & Others (Sex Workers Education and Advocacy Task Force & Others as Amici Curiae) 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC)('Jordan').

[3] Ibid at para 74.

The Court's assessment that the criminalization of prostitution could not be said to impair the right to dignity of the prostitute because 'the diminution arose from the character of prostitution itself' — the commodification of one's body — is difficult to understand in a liberal, market-based society such as ours.[1] As I have written elsewhere:

> So much of what we do involves the commodification of our bodies. A day-labourer is entitled to some level of constitutional protection of his dignity despite the fact that he has chosen to sell his body for the wages needed to pay for food and shelter. A Constitutional Court judge, while commodifying her body in the natural course of listening to arguments and writing opinions, is likewise entitled to some level of constitutional solicitude. It cannot be that the commodification of one's body per se bothers the Court. All of us gainfully employed do just that. It must be a particular form of commodification — or the commodification of a particular body part — that provokes the Court. But when the offending commodification just happens to be a form of behaviour that attracts the censure of many South Africans, then it is hard not to conclude that the Court has confused commodification with moralization.[2]

It is, of course, no reply to argue that the South African constitutional framework not only permits but requires the legislature to enact laws which foster the dignity of all South Africans (Dignity 5).[3] The question that goes begging is whether the conception of dignity fostered in Jordan can be squared with prior constructions of the right, the value and the ideal of dignity. Given the objectification and the commodification that attend all forms of sexual congress, the Court can articulate no compelling dignity standard that might enable us to distinguish those historically suspect sexual acts, such as homosexual sodomy, that have now secured constitutional protection from those sexual acts, such as prostitution, that have not. Had the Court grounded its dignity analysis either in a Brisley-like defence of dignity as contractual freedom (Dignity 3) or a Comitis-like defence of dignity as emancipation (Dignity 1), the result in Jordan might well have been different.[4]

(g) Slavery, servitude and forced labour

As I noted at § 36.3 above, 'where the value of human dignity is offended, the primary constitutional breach occasioned may be of a more specific right such as the right to bodily integrity, the right to equality or the right not to be subjected to

[1] Jordan (supra) at para 74.
[2] See Woolman 'Association' (supra) at § 44.3*(c)*(x).
[3] Jordan (supra) at para 105.
[4] Most of the decisions handed down on FC s 22 read with FC s 10 have been equally deferential. In Affordable Medicines Trust v Minister of Health, the High Court held that the state is entitled to restrict the trade, occupation and practice of the complainants — including licenses to dispense medicine — if the restrictions are rational. 2004 (6) SA 387 (T). Moreover, the court found that if anyone's dignity was impaired it was that of the patients. That said, the mere inconvenience caused to the patients did not amount to an impairment of their dignity. Ibid at para 45.

slavery, servitude or forced labour.'[1] The Dawood dictum intimates that it is the infringement of FC s 13 (slavery) that establishes an infringement of FC s 10 (dignity) — and not the other way around. As we have already noted, this relationship reflects the first rule of South African dignity jurisprudence: Where a court can identify the infringement of a more specific right, FC s 10 will not add to the enquiry.[2] But this rule does not reflect accurately the reciprocal effect between dignity and many, if not all, of the remaining rights in Chapter 2. Given that dignity demands that each individual be permitted to develop his or her unique talents optimally (Dignity 3), then dignity qua freedom from slavery underwrites the proscription of those practices where the exercise of 'entitlements of ownership' in one person by another 'impair substantially' the ability of a person to develop optimally her unique talents.[3] Moreover, it requires that those who make law exercise their imagination and retire those edicts that promote such practices.

S v Jordan & Others, as we have just seen, evinces such a failure of legal imagination in the context of freedom of trade, occupation and profession.[4] It does so once again in the context of slavery and, in particular, sexual slavery. The majority's very strong commitment to a form of metaphysical autonomy that makes all individuals morally and legally culpable for actions that issue ineluctably from their circumstances, fails dramatically the increasingly large number of prostitutes who are victims of sexual trafficking. Sexual trafficking is about the sale and exploitation of women and female children. Jordan has little if nothing to say about state complicity in a legal regime that condones institutionalised rape. Perhaps this characterization of Jordan's weltanschauung seems unfair. But the majority judgment speaks for itself:

[1] Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC)('Dawood') at para 35. See also S Woolman & M Bishop 'Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 64.

[2] Dawood (supra) at para 35.

[3] The method of analysis that informs the construction of the constitutional norm of dignity can assist us in discriminating between conditions of slavery and non-slavery. The Constitutional Court's dignity jurisprudence reflects five different perspectives on individual agency. The Court uses its variegated understanding of dignity to identify an ever-expanding list of practices that prevent us from acting as agents. It then augments this list of repugnant practices by identifying analogous practices that deny us our agency. So, for example, in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Home Affairs & Others the Constitutional Court held that statutory provisions that did not accord same-sex life partners the same set of entitlements as hetrosexual life partners to permanent residence violate the right to dignity. 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC). In Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa & Another, the Constitutional Court found that statutory provisions withholding spousal survivor benefits to the survivors of same-sex relationships were deemed analogous to statutory provisions that did not accord same-sex partners the same set of entitlements to permanent residence. 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC). As a result, the refusal to grant spousal survival benefits to the survivors of same-sex relationships constitutes a violation of the right to dignity.

[4] 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC)('Jordan').

> It was accepted that they have a choice but it was contended that the choice is limited or 'constrained'. Once it is accepted that [the criminalization of prostitution] is gender-neutral and that by engaging in commercial sex work prostitutes knowingly attract the stigma associated with prostitution, it can hardly be contended that female prostitutes are discriminated against.[1]

The Constitutional Court's recent judgment in Khosa v Minister of Social Development; Mahlaule v Minister of Social Development hints at a way out of this autonomy bind.[2] In Khosa, the Constitutional Court found unconstitutional, as a violation of both FC s 9 and FC s 27(1), the exclusion of permanent residents from the class of persons entitled to a variety of social security grants. In Khosa, Mokgoro J writes:

> The exclusion of permanent residents in need of social-security programmes forces them into relationships of dependency upon families, friends and the community in which they live, none of whom may have agreed to sponsor the immigration of such persons to South Africa.... Apart from the undue burden that this places on those who take on this responsibility, it is likely to have a serious impact on the dignity of the permanent residents concerned who are cast in the role of supplicants.[3]

Mokgoro J could well have added that permanent residents are, as supplicants, not merely dependent on family members, but quite literally at their mercy. Many sex-slaves, and therefore a large number of prostitutes, would consider themselves fortunate to be supplicants. They are not just excluded from the protection of the law. Many sex-slaves do not speak the language, find themselves in wholly unfamiliar surroundings, and lack the resources to engage effectively corrupt immigration officials or to escape criminal syndicates. Many are enslaved by their own families. The point is not that sex-slaves are excluded from some particular benefit to which another class of persons is entitled. Khosa stands for the broader proposition that FC s 7(2) places the state under an obligation to protect and to fulfil the rights of all persons in South Africa. As the Khosa Court rightly recognizes, legal regimes that offer incentives to individuals to become members of the political community but then punish persons who cannot act, ultimately, on such incentives — by withholding benefits or by imposing incarceration — are perverse. These disincentives deny the affected person that minimum level of dignity that FC s 7(2) obliges the state to provide (Dignity 1). The Khosa Court indicates that where the autonomy of our most vulnerable compatriots is largely extinguished (Dignity 1), the state bears a much greater burden with respect to demonstrating that it has discharged its duty to provide them with the entitlements necessary to vouchsafe their dignity (Dignity 3). The current inability of most sex-slaves/prostitutes to manumit themselves is a problem that can be solved by the state with only the most limited amount of imagination: decriminalisation or regulation.[4]

[1] See Jordan (supra) at para 16 (Emphasis added)(Why 'knowing' under conditions of duress and compulsion makes one culpable remains unclear.)

[2] 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC)('Khosa').

[3] Khosa (supra) at para 76.

[4] See S Woolman and M Bishop 'State as Pimp: Sexual Trafficking and Slavery in South Africa' (2006) 24 Development SA — (forthcoming).

(h) Expression

Freedom of expression, the first amongst equals in American constitutional law, can make no similar claim to status with regard to the South African Bill of Rights. Indeed, in head-to-head competition with dignity interests, in all their various manifestations, expressive interests invariably come up short. As Justice Kriegler notes in his analysis of the offence of scandalizing the court in S v Mamabolo:

> The balance which our common law strikes between protection of an individual reputation and the right to freedom of expression differs fundamentally from the balance struck in the United States. The difference is even more marked under the two respective constitutional regimes. The United States constitution stands as a monument to the vision and the libertarian aspirations of the Founding Fathers; and the First Amendment in particular to the values endorsed by all who cherish freedom. But they paint eighteenth century revolutionary insights in broad, bold strokes. The language is simple, terse and direct, the injunctions unqualified and the style peremptory. Our Constitution is a wholly different kind of instrument. For present purposes it is sufficient to note that it is infinitely more explicit, more detailed, more balanced, more carefully phrased and counterpoised.[1]

The balance, the careful phrasing, the counterpoised concepts refer to what Justice Kriegler calls the 'three conjoined, reciprocal and covalent values … foundational to the Republic: human dignity, equality and freedom.'[2] One consequence of this conjoinment, reciprocity and covalence is that 'the right to freedom of expression cannot be said automatically to trump the right to human dignity.'[3] Another more immediate consequence is that the crime of scandalizing the court survives the freedom of expression challenge in S v Mamabolo. It survives because the administration of justice requires that the 'dignity' of the judiciary as a whole be protected from comments designed to bring the system into disrepute (Dignity 5).[4]

(i) Pornography and child pornography

We have already noted, in the section on privacy, the Constitutional Court has, in emphasizing the different dimensions of dignity, arrived at different conclusions as to the level of constitutional solicitude that pornographic publications and their readers will be afforded.[5] In Case & Curtis, a majority of the Court declined the opportunity to decide whether the publication or the receipt of pornographic

[1] S v Mamabolo 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC)('Mamabolo') at para 40.

[2] Ibid at para 41.

[3] Ibid.

[4] However, the mere assertion by the State that the dignity of the community might be offended by some form of expression or behaviour, without argument or evidence, is insufficient to justify a limitation on expression. See Phillips v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division 2003 (3) SA 345 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC), 2003 (1) SACR 425 (CC).

[5] On dignity interests and privacy, see § 36.4*(e)* supra.

material was protected under IC s 15. It preferred instead to ground its finding, that the Indecent or Obscene Photographic Matter Act's criminal sanctions with respect to possession of pornography were constitutionally infirm, in the right to privacy.[1] In De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division, the Court found that pornography, as a form of expression, is entitled to the protection afforded by FC s 16.[2] It then proceeded to hold, however, that the state's interest in the dignity of children generally justified the particular limitations that the Films and Publications Act imposed on both the producers and the possessors of pornography that features children. I suggested that whereas the majority in Case & Curtis might be inclined to characterize the conflict as one in which dignity qua self-actualization (Dignity 3) trumps dignity qua good of the community (Dignity 5), in De Reuck, dignity qua self-actualization (Dignity 3) is justifiably limited — at least in the Court's view — by dignity qua good of the community (Dignity 5).

(ii) Hate speech

Dignity (Dignity 2) justifies our jurisprudence's most significant incursion into freedom of expression: hate speech is unprotected. The incursion is built-in to FC s 16 itself. FC s 16(2) reads, in relevant part, that the right to freedom of expression 'contained in subsection (1) does not extend to … (c) advocacy of hatred that is based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion, and that constitutes incitement to cause harm.' In Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority & Others, Justice Langa explains the purpose of FC s 16(2)'s definitional limits on FC s 16(1) as follows:

> Section 16(2) therefore defines the boundaries beyond which the right to freedom of expression does not extend … Implicit in its provisions is an acknowledgment that certain expression does not deserve constitutional protection because, among other things, it has the potential to impinge adversely on the dignity of others and cause harm.[3]

It does not follow, of course, that any proscription placed on hate speech is consistent with FC s 16(2)(c)'s dictates and thus automatically justified by reference to an individual interest (Dignity 2), a group interest (Dignity 2), or a state interest in dignity (Dignity 5). Indeed, at issue in Islamic Unity Convention was a section of the Code of Conduct for Broadcasting Services that prohibited any broadcast 'likely to prejudice relations between sections of the population'. Given that any number of speech acts could be deemed likely to 'prejudice relations between sections of the population' without either (a) constituting 'advocacy of hatred based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion' or (b) constituting 'incitement to cause harm' based upon such advocacy, the code clearly swept into its overly broad ambit speech acts that were protected in terms of FC s 16. The Islamic Unity Convention Court concluded that the dignity interests at stake did not justify the Code's limits on expression. After articulating the grounds for its finding of invalidity, the Court, as a remedy, notionally severed the offending text and read the more limited incursion of FC s 16(2)'s hate speech clause into the Code.

[1] Case & Curtis (supra) at paras 90–95.

[2] De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC).

[3] Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority and Others 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC)('Islamic Unity Convention') at para 32 (emphasis added). Justice Langa further notes that: 'There is no doubt that the state has a particular interest in regulating this type of expression because of the harm it may pose to the constitutionally mandated objective of building a non-racial and non-sexist society based on human dignity and the achievement of equality.' Ibid at para 33 (Emphasis added).

Despite the finding in Islamic Unity Convention, FC s 16(2)(c) retains its teeth. In Freedom Front v South African Human Rights Commission, the South African Human Rights Commission found that the slogan 'Kill the farmer, kill the boer' constitutes advocacy of hatred of Afrikaners and incitement to do them harm.[1] The SAHRC was able to reach this finding, as Iain Currie and Johann de Waal note, because it did not restrict 'harm' to the physical, but found the term to embrace both emotional harm and psychological harm.[2] The grounds for such an extension of the term can, Currie and De Waal suggest, be traced directly to the Canadian Supreme Court's decision in R v Keegstra.[3] In Keegstra, the Canadian Supreme Court wrote:

> A person's sense of human dignity and belonging to a community is closely linked to the concern and respect accorded the groups to which he or she belongs. The derision, hostility and abuse encouraged by hate propaganda therefore have a severe impact on the individual's sense of self-worth and acceptance. This impact may cause target-group members to take drastic measures in reaction, perhaps avoiding activities which bring them into contact with outsiders or adopting attitudes directed towards blending in with the majority. Such consequences bear heavily on a nation that prides itself on tolerance and the fostering of human dignity through, among other things, respect for the many racial, religious and cultural groups in our society.[4]

Thus, just as dignity grounds the Keegstra Court's finding that anti-semitic statements and holocaust denialism were not entitled to constitutional protection, so too does dignity (Dignity 2) ground the SAHRC's conclusion that that the slogan 'Kill the farmer, kill the boer' constitutes hate speech in terms of FC s 16(2)(c) and falls beyond the protections afforded speech by FC s 16(1).

The Broadcasting Complaints Commission of South Africa ('BCCSA') reached a similar conclusion in South African Human Rights Commission v SABC.[5] The BCCSA was asked to determine whether derogatory remarks about the South African Indian community that formed the primary riff in a well-known Zulu rap song constituted hate speech. The BCCSA concluded that because the song both advocated hatred with respect to members of the Indian community and caused

[1] 2003 (11) BCLR 1283 (SAHRC).
[2] I Currie & J de Waal 'Expression' The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 358, 376.
[3] Ibid at 376–377 citing R v Keegstra [1990] 3 SCR 697 ('Keegstra').
[4] Keegstra (supra) at 227–228 (Emphasis added).
[5] 2003 (1) BCLR 92 (BCCSA).

harm that impaired the dignity of members of that community, the song qualified as hate speech for the purposes of FC s 16(2)(c).

In South African Human Rights Commission v SABC, as in Freedom Front v South African Human Rights Commission, the dignity-inflected demand for equal concern and equal respect (Dignity 2) outweighs the dignity interest in expression as a form of self-actualization (Dignity 3). The two tribunals have found that the prevention of genuine harm — physical or psychological — trumps the putative benefits of largely valueless forms of self-actualization because justice, in post-apartheid South Africa, first requires that all persons are treated with equal respect. Although this restatement begs any number of questions about harm and value, our constitutional order appears to be committed to the proposition that only once the formal conditions of equal respect (Dignity 2) have been secured are individuals free to pursue non-harmful forms of self-actualization (Dignity 3).

(iii) Defamation

The law of defamation, as the Khumalo Court notes, 'lies at the intersection of the freedom of speech and the protection of human dignity.'[1] But at that intersection, the light is generally green for dignity and red for expression.

Currie and De Waal observe that the law of defamation in South Africa, prior to 1994, consistently undervalued freedom of speech, and in particular, 'freedom of the media'.[2] That devaluation was consistent with the suppression of all forms of expression by the state under apartheid.[3]

The ossification of the law of defamation under apartheid was finally addressed by the Supreme Court of Appeal in National Media Ltd v Bogoshi.[4] Although it declined to address directly the constitutional challenges to the existing law, the Bogoshi Court did decide that the imposition of strict liability on the media with respect to a finding of unlawfulness could no longer be maintained. It replaced the strict liability standard for the media with the ordinary standard of reasonableness.

[1] 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC) at para 26. See Kausea v Minister of Home Affairs 1995 (1) SA 51, 67 (NM)(Utterances by police officer accusing entire command structure of racism constitute hate speech under statute and do not qualify as fair comment for purposes of defence against suit in defamation. 'Freedom of expression,' writes the court, 'cannot . . . be used to violate the dignity of a person.')

[2] Currie & De Waal 'Expression' (supra) at 383.

[3] Compare Argus Printing & Publishing v Esselen's Estate 1994 (2) SA 1 (A)(Appellate Division permits judge to sue for defamation in respect of criticism levelled at the judge in his official capacity) with S v Mamabolo 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC)(Contempt may only be found if there is actual harm done to the administration of justice; otherwise freedom of expression allows for criticism of judges in their individual capacity.)

[4] 1998 (4) SA 1196 (SCA), 1999 (1) BCLR 1 (SCA)('Bogoshi'). However, the reluctance of the Appellate Division, the Supreme Court of Appeal and the Constitutional Court to revisit this body of law in light of constitutional imperatives did not stop lower courts from taking up the challenge. In Mandela v Falati, the court stated that the new dispensation privileged speech over the reputations of politicians, that expression should be largely unrestrained, and that courts should allow neither prior restraints nor defamation actions to silence critical voices. 1995 (1) SA 251, 259–260 (W).

Advocates of more robust protections for freedom of expression and freedom of the media were not satisfied with this via media. In Khumalo v Holomisa, the defendants, on exception, asked the Constitutional Court to revisit Bogoshi in the light of the novel requirements of FC s 16(1)(a). Although the Constitutional Court agreed that FC s 16(1)(a) applied directly, it declined the invitation to alter the common law of defamation. Justice O'Regan, in support of her conclusion that 'the common law as currently developed' was consistent with the requirements of the Final Constitution, wrote:

> In the context of the actio injuriarum, our common law has separated the causes of action for claims for injuries to reputation (fama) and dignitas. Dignitas concerns the individual's own sense of self-worth, but included in the concept are a variety of personal rights including, for example, privacy. In our new constitutional order, no sharp line can be drawn between these injuries to personality rights. The value of human dignity in our Constitution is not only concerned with an individual's sense of self-worth, but constitutes an affirmation of the worth of human beings in our society. It includes the intrinsic worth of human beings shared by all people as well as the individual reputation of each person built upon his or her own individual achievements. The value of human dignity in our Constitution therefore values both the personal sense of self-worth as well as the public's estimation of the worth or value of an individual. . . . The law of defamation seeks to protect the legitimate interest individuals have in their reputation. To this end, therefore, it is one of the aspects of our law which supports the protection of the value of human dignity.[1]

Freedom of expression, described by the majority as a non-paramount value, yields to the dictates of dignity.[2] But should it?[3]

What if the dignity interest that informs freedom of expression had featured in the Court's analysis? Judge van der Westhuizen, in the court a quo, recognizes dignity interests on both sides. Dignity qua equal concern and equal respect

[1] Khumalo (supra) at paras 27–28. See also Marais v Groenewald 2001 (1) SA 634 (T)(Right to good name and reputation, underwritten by FC s 10, requires that defendant be held liable for statements that he could believe 'lawful' only because of his gross negligence and his refusal to take adequate steps to establish the truth.)

[2] In asserting that the justifications for the law of defamation sound the central themes of our constitutional order, the Constitutional Court appears to echo Kant:

> By defamation (obtrectatio) or backbiting I do not mean slander (contumelia), a false defamation to be taken before the court; I mean only the immediate inclination, with no particular aim in view, to bring into the open something prejudicial to respect for others. This is contrary to the respect owed to humanity as such; for every scandal given weakens that respect, on which the impulse to the morally good rests, and as far as possible makes people sceptical about it.

Kant Metaphysics of Morals (supra) at 258. However, Kant differs from the Court in two fundamental respects. First, he was writing of virtues that should not be enforced as a matter of right. Defamation for Kant engages primarily ethical considerations. Second, the Court, unlike Kant, will tolerate false statements so long as they are 'reasonably' made.

[3] Signs of a more generous approach to expressive interests in the context of defamation are on display in Hardaker v Phillips 2005 (4) SA 515 (SCA)(Supreme Court of Appeal finds that a jibe, though false and potentially defamatory, constituted fair comment and that any dignity interest that the plaintiff might have had must yield to a more general public interest in free and robust expression.)

buttresses arguments in support of the right to one's reputation (Dignity 2), while dignity qua self-governance (Dignity 4) values 'expression' for the 'central part' its plays in legislating for oneself, and for others, consistent with the dictates of reason.[1] Indeed, in Sayed, Judge Davis suggests that had the Khumalo Court taken dignity qua self-governance seriously, the outcome might have been different.[2] Davis J reasons that even on the most uncontroversial reading of recent South African history, 'democracy' ought to be understood as 'the fundamental objective of the Constitution'. As a result, the entire structure of the Final Constitution 'implies that [the] value of democracy needs to be given primacy of place [when] … we have to … balance[ ] … freedom of expression against [the interests of] those who seek public office or positions of prominence in our public life.'[3] Only a robust media, on Davis' account, is commensurate with the dictates of both democracy and dignity qua self-governance (Dignity 4).[4]

Two High Courts have recognized that, in a head-to-head contest between expression and privacy, the more important dignity interest might attach to expression. In MEC for Health, Mpumalanga v M-Net, the High Court was asked to grant an urgent interdict that would have prevented a broadcaster from airing a piece of investigative journalism that relied on clandestinely obtained footage of negligent medical practices.[5] Bertlesmann J rejected the request for the interdict. He held that the privacy interests of a public hospital and public hospital staff (Dignity 2) must fall before the freedom of expression interests (the right to receive information) of the general public (Dignity 4 and Dignity 5). Only by having access to these clandestinely filmed operations that demonstrate the patently negligent conduct of the public hospital staff could: (a) the fourth estate discharge its responsibility to ensure government accountability (Dignity 5) and; (b) the general public meaningfully exercise its rights of self-governance (Dignity 4).[6] In Van Zyl v Jonathan Ball Publishers, the High Court denied an applicant's request for an interim interdict preventing dissemination, distribution, display or sale of a book that the applicant claimed to be defamatory.[7] It found, on balance, that the expressive

[1] See Holomisa v Khumalo & Others 2002 (3) SA 38 (T).
[2] See Sayed v Editor, Cape Times 2004 (1) SA 58 (C).
[3] Ibid at 62-63.
[4] Although careful to stay within the limits established by Bogoshi, the Supreme Court of Appeal in Mthembi-Mahanyele v Mail & Guardian notes that 'some latitude must be allowed in order to allow [for] robust and frank comment in the interest of keeping members of society informed about what government does.' 2004 (6) SA 329 (SCA), 2004 (11) BCLR 1182 (SCA) at para 64. Moreover, in assessing whether a comment is reasonable, the court must take cognizance of the duty of accountability that the Final Constitution places on the state and the role that the media plays in holding the state accountable. Ibid at 66. Without announcing as much, the Supreme Court of Appeal, per Lewis J, appears to offer greater judicial solicitude for political speech. Indeed, the findings in favour of the respondents in both Sayed and Mthembi-Mahanyele suggest that the reasonableness requirement set out in Bogoshi may be sufficiently supple to accommodate a highly critical and confrontational press — so long as the press spends an 'appropriate' amount of time checking its facts.
[5] 2002 (6) SA 714 (T).
[6] Ibid at paras 23–27.
[7] 1999 (4) SA 571 (W)('Jonathan Ball Publishers').

interests of the respondent (and the public), as guaranteed by FC s 16 (Dignity 4 and Dignity 5), outweighed the dignity interests of the applicants, as guaranteed by FC s 10 (Dignity 2). The Jonathan Ball Publishers Court went to some lengths, however, to point out that, although the requirements for an interim interdict were not satisfied, the outcome should not lead the media to conclude that they deserved or would receive 'exceptional treatment' in defamation cases.[1]

(i) Socio-economic rights

In each of the four major socio-economic rights decisions handed down thus far, the Constitutional Court has taken great care to make its readers aware of the manner in which the commitment to human dignity — as rule, value or ideal — has shaped the disposition of the matter before it.[2] Even in Soobramoney v Minister of Health, Kwa-Zulu-Natal, where the Court denied Mr Soobramoney's claim that FC s 27(3)'s right to emergency medical treatment entitled him to access to the dialysis that he required for survival, the dismissal was justified in terms of much broader claims to dignity.[3] As Sachs J writes:

> In all the open and democratic societies based upon dignity, freedom and equality with which I am familiar, the rationing of access to life-prolonging resources is regarded as integral to, rather than incompatible with, a human rights approach to health care.[4]

[1] Jonathan Ball Publishers (supra) at 595–596. Indeed, courts have found that while a publication may, initially, have been reasonable — and not an impairment of dignity — because the author or the publisher was not aware of the harm that the publication might cause, the continued publication of a book after the author and the publisher have been made aware of the injury does constitute an actionable offence. See NM & Others v Smith & Others [2005] 3 All SA 457 (W), [2005] JOL 14587 (W)(Court holds that continued publication of a book that identified three women with HIV by name and without their permission constituted a violation of their common-law rights to dignity and privacy and warranted imposition of damages.)

[2] For an excellent restatement and reconceptualiztion of this area of the law upon which my analysis is parasitic, see S Liebenberg 'The Value of Human Dignity in Interpreting Socio-Economic Rights' (2005) 21 SAJHR 1.

[3] Soobramoney v Minister of Health, Kwa-Zulu-Natal 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC)('Soobramoney').

[4] Ibid at para 52 (emphasis added). Chaskalson P denied Mr Soobramoney's claim on the grounds that the rights enshrined in the Bill of Rights were not always the entitlements their language suggested:

> The Constitution is forward-looking and guarantees to every citizen fundamental rights in such a manner that the ordinary person-in-the-street, who is aware of these guarantees, immediately claims them without further ado and assumes that every right so guaranteed is available to him or her on demand. Some rights in the Constitution are the ideal and something to be strived for. They amount to a promise, in some cases, and an indication of what a democratic society aiming to salvage lost dignity, freedom and equality should embark upon. They are values which the Constitution seeks to provide, nurture and protect for a future South Africa.

Ibid at 52. The dignity long denied the majority of South Africans was something that could not yet be recovered in full: it remained a 'promise'. For a recent critique of this promise, see K van Marle '"No Last Word": Reflections on the Imaginary Domain, Dignity and Intrinsic Worth' (2002) Stellenbosch LR 299, 305–307.

Subsequent decisions in Grootboom, TAC and Khosa take progressively more seriously the dignity interests of the parties claiming relief under FC ss 26 or 27. In Grootboom, the Court reversed the spin placed on the dignity interests at stake in Soobramoney. Yacoob J writes:

> It is fundamental to an evaluation of the reasonableness of state action that account be taken of the inherent dignity of human beings. The Constitution will be worth infinitely less than its paper if the reasonableness of state action concerned with housing is determined without regard to the fundamental constitutional value of human dignity. Section 26, read in the context of the Bill of Rights as a whole, must mean that the respondents have a right to reasonable action by the state in all circumstances and with particular regard to human dignity. In short, I emphasise that human beings are required to be treated as human beings.[1]

The demands of dignity, far from justifying a failure to deliver on various vague promises, become the measure of the State's efforts to discharge its positive duties to act. As Sandy Liebenberg has astutely observed, the dignity discourse of the Court suddenly shifts, in Grootboom, from the language of social exchange as a zero-sum game to the language of a social democratic state committed to 'positive social relationships which both respect autonomy and foster the conditions in which it can flourish'.[2]

Critics of the Court were quick to denigrate this commitment to social democratic principles by pointing to the failure of this more robust, relational notion of dignity to deliver actual houses or shelter to Mrs Grootboom and her fellow litigants.[3] However, in Treatment Action Campaign, the Constitutional Court did deliver the relief what it had said that dignity demands.[4] It rejected the government's claim that it could not, at this juncture in time, afford to extend its nevirapine treatment protocol in order to diminish the rates of mother to child transmission ('MTCT') of HIV. While noting that an order directing the government to provide even this relatively inexpensive anti-retroviral could have

[1] Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Grootboom & Others 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC) at para 83 (Emphasis added)(Court finds that state has failed to discharge its responsibilities in terms of FC s 26. It holds, in addition, that the general entitlements secured through socio-economic rights are essential components of a just political order because they are necessary for self-actualisation (Dignity 3 and Dignity 5)).

[2] Liebenberg (supra) at 11.

[3] But see K Roach & G Budlender 'South African Law on Mandatory Relief and Supervisory Jurisdicton' (2005) 122 SALJ 325. Roach and Budlender note that a structural interdict was unnecessary in Grootboom because the government had agreed to provide alternative accommodation for the applicants. When the government failed to comply with the terms of this undertaking, the Court was obliged — at the request of the applicants — to issue an order 'putting the government on terms to provide certain rudimentary services'. Ibid at 329 quoting Grootboom (supra) at para 5, n 17. Despite such evidence of bad faith, Roach and Budlender counsel caution with respect to the use of supervisory jurisdiction and structural interdicts to ensure that the government follows through on settlements or court orders. Ibid at 345–351. Not only are courts ill-equipped to manage polycentric conflicts over time, the risk of contempt by government officials poses a genuine risk to the long-term credibility and legitimacy of the judiciary.

[4] Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign (2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 ('TAC').

relatively significant budgetary implications, the Court found that the needs of the women and children effected were simply too pressing to be ignored. Put in Kantian terms, the Court decided, as Sandy Liebenberg writes, that 'for society to deny poor women and their newborns access to "a simple, cheap and potentially lifesaving medical intervention" would clearly indicate a lack of respect for their dignity as human beings entitled to be treated as worthy of respect and concern.'[1]

In Khosa v Minister of Social Development, the Court goes beyond dignity as minimal respect (Dignity 1), or dignity as equal concern (Dignity 2), and arrives at dignity as a collective concern (Dignity 5).[2] In finding that the State's express refusal, under the Social Assistance Act, to provide permanent residents with social welfare benefits constituted a violation of the right to social security under FC s 27, Mokgoro J writes:

> Sharing responsibility for the problems and consequences of poverty equally as a community represents the extent to which wealthier members of the community view the minimal well-being of the poor as connected with their personal well-being and the well-being of the community as a whole. In other words, decisions about the allocation of public benefits represent the extent to which poor people are treated as equal members of society.[3]

The trajectory of the Court's dignity jurisprudence over these four cases is breathtaking. By committing us to the dual proposition that 'we are diminished as a society' to the extent that any of our members are deprived of the opportunities to develop their basic capabilities to function as individual and social beings, and that 'claims on social resources are strongly justified when people lack the basic material necessities of life to enable them to survive',[4] the Court takes seriously

[1] Liebenberg (supra) at 13 citing TAC (supra) at para 73.

[2] See Khosa v Minister of Social Development 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC)('Khosa'). The Constitutional Court has discussed dignity as a collective responsibility in a number of its unfair discrimination decisions. See, eg, Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC) at para 43 ('The interests of the community lie in the recognition of the inherent dignity of every human being and the elimination of all forms of discrimination.') The Constitutional Court has written about dignity qua collective responsibility in the context of evictions and claims asserted under FC s 26. (Dignity 5). See Port Elizabeth Municipality v Various Occupiers 2005 (1) SA 217 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1268 (CC) at para 18 ('It is not only the dignity of the poor that is assailed when homeless people are driven from pillar to post in a desperate quest for a place where they and their families can rest their heads. Our society as a whole is demeaned when state action intensifies rather than mitigates their marginalisation.' (Emphasis added).) However, dignity qua collective responsibility does not mean that the right to dignity can be successfully invoked against the state whenever the exercise of or entitlement to a socio-economic right is threatened. So, for example, in Hartzenberg v Nelson Mandela Metropolitan Municipal (Despatch Administrative Unit) 2003 (3) SA 633 (SE), the High Court held, correctly, that FC s 10 and FC s 12 had nothing to say about the disconnection of electrical services for failure to pay the arrears on water bills. That the state was not entitled to disconnect the electricity was a statutory matter for which the state lacked the requisite authority.

[3] Khosa (supra) at para 74.

[4] Liebenberg (supra) at 12.

the sense of urgency rooted in the manifold demands of dignity.[1]

What is truly remarkable about the Court's language in Khosa is the manner in which it sweeps up and engages all five primary definitions of dignity. The Court first notes that socio-economic rights, like that of social security in FC s 27, invariably engage the 'founding values of human dignity, equality and freedom'.[2] It then teases out human dignity from these three covalent values, and invokes Dawood in support of the proposition that '[h]uman dignity … informs the interpretation of many, possibly all, other rights.'[3] The three rights that dignity informs in the instant matter are life, equality and social security.[4] From this doctrinal foundation, the Khosa Court commits itself, in short order, to the following propositions:

- the Final Constitution recognizes 'everyone' as deserving of equal concern and equal respect (Dignity 2), whether it be in terms of differentiation by law in terms of FC s 9(1), or the receipt of benefits in terms of FC s 27;[5]
- persons who 'are already settled permanent residents and part of South African society' cannot be abandoned 'to destitution if they fall upon hard times' simply because immigration officials see 'some [pecuniary] advantage to the state in doing so':[6] that is, members of our community cannot be treated as mere means for the advancement of the greater good (Dignity 1);
- 'the exclusion of permanent residents from the [social security] scheme' denies them the capacity 'to sustain themselves', and casts them in the role of supplicants:[7] by definition, a supplicant does not govern himself, but remains dependent upon the largesse of those around him; such a state of affairs constitutes the abnegation of dignity (Dignity 4);
- '[t]he denial of access to social assistance' relegates many permanent residents to the 'margins of society' and deprives them of those essential goods that are necessary for them 'to enjoy other rights vested in them under the Constitution';[8] the denial of these goods and rights functions as an absolute bar to the development of the 'unique talents' of each individual permanent resident (Dignity 3);

[1] On the relevance of urgency to an assessment of reasonableness, see D Bilchitz 'Giving Socio-Economic Rights Teeth: The Minimum Core and its Importance' (2002) 118 SALJ 484, 490-1. See also M Nussbaum Women and Human Development (1999) 56 ('Programs aimed at raising general or average well-being do not improve the situation of the least well-off, unless they go to work directly to improve the quality of those people's lives. If we combine this observation with the thought . . . that each person is valuable and worthy of respect as an end, we must conclude that we should look not just to the total or the average, but to the functioning of each and every person. We may call this the principle of each person as an end.')

[2] Khosa (supra) at para 40.

[3] Ibid at para 41.

[4] Ibid at paras 41–43.

[5] Ibid at para 53.

[6] Ibid at para 65.

[7] Ibid at para 80.

[8] Ibid at para 81.

- this failure to recognize permanent residents as more than means, as persons worthy of equal respect, as individuals capable of self-actualization and self-governance leads the Court to conclude that adequate redress can only occur when we come to understand that our own dignity is linked inextricably to the 'well-being of the poor … and the well-being of the community as a whole.'[1] (Dignity 5)

Each of Justice Mokgoro's arguments regarding the constitutionality of the exclusion of permanent residents from the social security scheme at issue turns on one of the five definitions of dignity. These arguments from dignity reinforce one another and build toward a conclusion in which Justice Mokgoro appears to claim that the goal of the Final Constitution is 'a realm of ends', a community in which each of us identifies our own well-being, our own status as ends, with the identification of all other members of our community as ends-in-themselves.

36.5 DIGNITY'S POSSIBILITIES

(a) Dignity and transformation

(i) Dignity as a regulative ideal

In the last section, we saw how the five definitions of dignity — and the rules of law they generate — inform the Constitutional Court's jurisprudence in domains as varied as unfair discrimination, intimate association, pornography, abortion, social assistance, restraint of trade clauses, whipping, hate speech and defamation. In this section, I want to move beyond a discussion of dignity as a set of rules that disposes of specific disputes in a court of law to dignity as a philosophical concern that informs the content of the rules we deploy. To that end, this section endeavours to distinguish dignity as a rule from dignity as a regulative ideal.[2]

For Kant, dignity operates as a regulative ideal when we come to view ourselves and others as rational beings capable — through an appeal to various shared ideals — of arriving at a universalizable moral law.[3] In somewhat more

[1] Khosa (supra) at para 81.

[2] But see SJ Cowan 'Can Dignity Guide South Africa's Equality Jurisprudence' (2001) 17 SAJHR 34 (Cowan discusses dignity as a value or a rule even where it seems she wishes to defend it as a regulative ideal.)

[3] See I Kant Critique of Practical Reason (trans W Pluhar, 2002) 101. On the notion of regulative ideals, Kant writes:

> For rational beings all stand under the law that each of them should treat himself and all others never merely as a means but always at the same time as an end in himself. But by so doing there arises a systematic union of rational beings under common objective laws that is a kingdom. Since these laws are directed precisely to the relation of such beings as one another as ends and means this kingdom can be called a kingdom of ends which is admittedly only an ideal. Ibid (Emphasis added).

See, in addition, D Cornell 'A Call for a Nuanced Constitutional Jurisprudence: Ubuntu, Dignity and Reconciliation' (2004) 19 SAPR/PL 666–667.

common parlance, what Kant means is that human beings can adopt a position in which we attribute to ourselves and to others the capacity to imagine a political community in which each of us could legislate for himself or herself those maxims by which each and every member of our community could live.[1] As the word 'imagine' suggests, the ideals to which we appeal do not (yet) constitute who we are. They remain aspirations. That is, regulative ideals, such as dignity, inform our judgments. But these ideals do not operate as part of a chain of propositions from which we can simply deduce a rational response to a particular problem the world has set for us.[2]

And what, if anything, do these abstract observations about apodeictic uses of reason have to do with the daily grind of determining the meaning of dignity in a court of law? Only by recognizing dignity as a regulative ideal that operates outside the rather instrumental domain of our black letter law will our political community begin to approximate a realm of ends.[3] This realm of ends will not

[1] See D Cornell The Imaginary Domain 4–5, 8; D Cornell At the Heart of Freedom (1998) 8, 15, 18–19.

[2] Dignity as a regulative ideal operates, in some respects, against law. The concern, as Van Marle notes, is that if law purports to specify all that dignity — or freedom — requires, then the actual space for self-actualization and self-governance will be exhausted by the law. See K van Marle 'No Last Word: Reflections on the Imaginary Domain, Dignity and Intrinsic Worth' (2002) 13 Stellenbosch LR 299.

Kant's distinction between the apodeictic use of reason and the hypothetical use of reason may help us to better understand the difference between dignity as a regulative ideal and dignity as a rule. See Kant Critique of Pure Reason (supra) at 621 ('If reason is a power to drive the particular from the universal then there are two alternatives. Either, first, the universal is already certain in itself and given. On this alternative, only the power of judgment is required for subsumption. And by this subsumption the particular is determined necessarily. I shall call this the apodeictic use of reason.') With regard to the hypothetical use of reason, the universal can only be assumed. If, in terms of the hypothetical use of reason, it seems that all particular cases follow a rule, then we infer from this regularity the rule's universality. Whereas the apodeictic use of reason assumes that the truth is constitutive of the universe, the hypothetical use of reason does not rest on such an assumption. The particular — no matter how many examples we offer — cannot prove the universal. The sceptics challenge to the (hypothetical) rule will always remain. S Kripke Wittgenstein on Rules and Private Language (1982). How exactly does the apodeictic use of dignity relate then to what might be called the hypothetical use of dignity? Like this: the apodeictic use of dignity is meant to shake us free from the strictures of rule-following in an attempt to bring us closer to the truth. See Kant Critique of Pure Reason (supra) at 621. This abbreviated account warrants the disclaimer that Kant's views on this aspect of moral reasoning cannot be adequately captured in a footnote.

[3] Dignity as a regulative ideal goes beyond dominant notions of legitimacy in modern legal systems because it forces us to attend to the ethical dimensions of action. Roger Berkowitz writes that we often do not notice the extent to which 'justice has fled our world', because 'law has taken its place'. He further writes:

> The CEO of a Fortune 500 company who pays a fine so that his company can dump toxic waste into a reservoir, or moves its corporate address to the Bahamas with the intent of avoiding taxes, does not say: 'I am acting legally if also unjustly.' On the contrary, the very legality of the act is seen as proof of its justness. The divorce of law from justice informs our modern condition. Lawfulness, in other words, has replaced justice as the measure of ethical action.

R Berkowitz The Gift of Science: Leibniz and the Modern Legal Tradition (2005) ii. The modern emphasis on law as a set of rules often causes us, as Berkowitz suggests, to lose sight of the ultimate purpose of law: justice. Moreover, he notes, legal positivism turns us into instruments — as opposed to agents — and causes us to lose sight of how human beings find their commonality in ethical interactions. Dignity as a regulative ideal — and not a set of rules that we must simply obey — turns us back into the authors of our actions and forces us to take responsibility for the justice or injustice that we find in the world. Dignity, as expressed in any of Kant's four variations of the categorical imperative, asks us to lay down for ourselves a law that embraces every other individual in a manner that extends beyond the interests of our more parochial selves. Dignity as a regulative ideal thereby reminds us of our highest calling as human beings — doing the right thing. See D Cornell 'A Call for a Nuanced Constitutional Jurisprudence' (supra) at 668.

arise by the mere logical application of an established set of rules. It might, however, happen if we can 'hear the music' of the basic law's variations on the theme of dignity.[1] The preceding analysis of the Constitutional Court's dignity jurisprudence suggests that the Court has already 'heard the music'.

My reconstruction of the Court's dignity jurisprudence — the teasing out of five definitions and four uses — stands then as something of an answer to Dennis Davis' realist critique. Davis suggests that this music is not a symphony, but rather a cacophony of disparate themes, each distinct theme played to suit the particular mood of the Court.[2] I hope to have shown that a dignity jurisprudence that begins with the simple proposition that one may never treat another human being solely as a means, can, along with other variations on the categorical imperative, be used to develop an account of what it means to treat another as an object of equal concern and equal respect. I then suggested how the refusal to turn away and the principle of equal concern and equal respect have been leveraged, by the Court, to generate defensible theses about dignity qua self-actualization and dignity qua self-governance as constitutive features of a just society. Finally, this cluster of definitions, all rooted in related notions of individual agency, ground the more radical claim that dignity actually requires all citizens to assume responsibility for the manner in which all other citizens live.[3] These definitions of dignity, when married to appeals to the regulative ideal of dignity, provide a reliable guide for understanding what dignity in the Final Constitution is designed to do.[4]

[1] Rawls uses this felicitous phrase when describing how one comes to understand Kant's four formulations of the categorical imperative. See Rawls Lectures (supra) at 203. Pogge writes that another reason for the proliferation of formulae is that 'through them the categorical imperative can "be brought closer to intuition and thus to feeling".' TW Pogge 'The Categorical Imperative' in P Guyer (ed) Critical Essays on Kant's Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals (1998) 189, 208. The same logic holds true for the multiple definitions of dignity. Each definition captures a critical aspect of individual agency. Together, the multiple definitions describe, almost in full, a human being who lives up to her highest calling — doing the right thing — and who, at the same time, flourishes. Indeed, both Kant's project and the Constitutional Court's project is animated by the desire to get us to understand that living up to such a calling is, in fact, a large part of flourishing.

[2] See D Davis 'Equality: The Majesty of Legoland Jurisprudence' (1999) 116 SALJ 398. Dennis Davis writes that: 'The court has given dignity both the content and scope that make for a piece of jurisprudential Lego-Land to be used in whatever form and shape is required by the demands of the judicial designer.' Ibid at 413. Even if I disagree with that indictment of our current dignity jurisprudence, Davis had good grounds — at the time of writing — for critiquing the Court's nascent dignity and equality jurisprudence for being grounded in a predominantly 'individualistic framework'. Ibid at 412. See also SJ Cowan 'Can Dignity Guide Our Equality Jurisprudence?' (2001) 17 SAJHR 34, 39. For the articulation of similar concerns with respect to German jurisprudence, see D Kommers The Constitutional Jurisprudence of the Federal Republic of Germany (2nd Edition, 1997) 300-301, 312-313 ('Kommers') (The anteriority of the right — to dignity — to the state complicates judicial control of the concept); S Wermiel 'Law and Human Dignity: The Judicial Soul of Justice Brennan' (1998) 7 William and Mary Bill of Rights LJ 223.

[3] See D Cornell Defending Ideals (2004) 75–76.

[4] That the case law does, in fact, reflect a certain level of rigour can be seen in the way the various definitions of dignity track various formulations of the categorical imperative and the manner in which those definitions all sound a similar concern with the treatment of all individuals as ends-in-themselves. But again I wish to stress that this account of how these definitions build upon one another and yield, in a non-linear and cumulative fashion, a commitment to a realm of ends is my speculative exercise.

Some readers might be puzzled by my insistence on dignity as a regulative ideal when it has been so clearly enshrined in FC s 10 as a rule and in FC ss 1, 36, 39 as a value. One reason for this insistence is the belief that dignity must still be treated as a touchstone of day-to-day life in South Africa at the same time as it is doubly institutionalised through legislation and judicial interpretation. The appeal to dignity as a regulative ideal in our strictly moral transactions cannot but then inform the manner in which legislatures and courts shape dignity as rule and value. In a heterogeneous society such as ours, where the right and the good are not coextensive, the re-inscription of dignity as a legal rule will have the reciprocal effect of deepening our understanding of dignity as an ethical norm.[1]

How does this reciprocal effect — of ethical ideals and justiciable rules — work in practice? Once again, the evolution of the Court's jurisprudence of dignity provides the most publicly accessible, and compelling, account.

(ii) Dignity and the politics of capability

We have, over the Court's first ten years, heard its various members explain the presence of dignity in our Final Constitution by reference to the denial of dignity under apartheid. As Justice O'Regan writes:

> The Constitution asserts dignity to contradict our past in which human dignity for black South Africans was routinely and cruelly denied. It asserts it to inform the future, to invest in our democracy respect for the intrinsic worth of all human beings.[2]

The Constitutional Court reacts to the particular ways in which dignity was denied under apartheid (the imposition of the death penalty to blunt political opposition, the implementation of pass laws to control both the intimate and economic lives of black South Africans, the use of corporal punishment as a form of social control) by finding unconstitutional those laws that continue to re-inscribe these affronts to dignity.

But as Justice O'Regan observes above, and Justice Ackermann has written elsewhere, the Final Constitution does not simply ask us to react to, and to reverse, past indignities. It demands that we transform our society into one that will ultimately recognise the intrinsic worth of each individual.[3]

We can trace that process of transformation in the equality jurisprudence on sexual orientation. Our courts begin slowly, dispatching laws proscribing sodomy as a violation of intimate or private space. The courts go on to reject laws that impair the ability of same-sex partners to live — private lives — within South Africa. They then abolish laws that refuse to extend 'public' benefits to the surviving same-sex life partner of a judicial officer. Ultimately, the dignity of same-sex partners is understood to be as important a public matter as it is private, and the public institution of marriage sanctions heterosexual and homosexual unions alike.[1]

[1] HLA Hart The Concept of Law (1961) 77-96.

[2] Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC)('Dawood') at para 35.

[3] See D Cornell 'Laurie Ackermann: Bridging the Span toward Justice: The Ongoing Architectonic of Dignity Jurisprudence' (2008) Acta Juridica (Forthcoming).

The public recognition of same-sex life partnerships as marriages takes dignity beyond the merely restitutional, and articulates an understanding of dignity that is fundamentally transformative of our politics. That this recent holding is fundamentally transformative, and not merely reactive, is reflected in the state's response to the various challenges mounted against anti-gay and anti-lesbian enactments. The early challenges to sodomy laws and immigration laws met with little resistance. However, as the challenges to the law required public recognition of the equality of gays and lesbians — as opposed to mere sufferance of the homosexuals in our midst — the state's resistance stiffened. In both Satchwell I and II, Parliament balked at providing spousal benefits to the survivors of same-sex life partnerships. In Satchwell II, the Constitutional Court had to take the unusual and uncomfortable step of invalidating a piece of legislation virtually identical to the legislation that it had found unconstitutional in Satchwell I. It is hard to read Parliament's response to Satchwell I as anything but a refusal to recognize that same-sex partnerships are entitled to equal concern and equal respect. In Fourie, the state actively sought to block the recognition of same-sex unions as marriages. Again, it is hard to read the state's response as anything other than a refusal to accord same-sex life partnerships the same public recognition as opposite-sex life partnerships. The Constitutional Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal have reached beyond mere restitutionary forms of justice to a vision of dignity that forces all South Africans to reconsider their previous understandings of marriage. This new vision of dignity compels all South Africans to acknowledge publicly the variety of legitimate and valuable life partnerships within our society.

It seems reasonable to ask, at this juncture, whether the Court's jurisprudence on equality and sexual orientation reflects a genuine transformation or the mere logical extension of the Court's liberal commitment to state non-intervention and the overt and explicit pressures of the written text. The question arises because some critics of the Court's early dignity jurisprudence have, correctly, suggested that the Constitutional Court permitted a Berlian understanding of negative liberty to slip into the Court's equality jurisprudence through the backdoor of dignity. The Ferreira Court rejected Justice Ackermann's view that IC s 11(1) and FC s 12(1) required that 'freedom' and 'security of the person' should be read disjunctively and that IC s 11(1) and FC s 12(1) contained a robust freedom right. However, in a number of cases decided shortly after Ferreira, the Court appeared to accept Justice Ackermann's contention that there exists an inextricable link between dignity and the need for individual freedom from state intervention. In [1] See Minister of Home Affairs & Another v Fourie & Another; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project v Minister of Home Affairs 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC)('Fourie').

Hugo, the Court places 'dignity … at the heart of individual rights in a free and democratic society.'[1] In National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice, the Court states that 'it is clear that the constitutional protection of dignity requires us to acknowledge the value and the worth of all individuals as members of society.'[2] Thus, over the course of several cases and the space of a couple of years, individual freedom qua negative liberty becomes the foundation for dignity, and dignity, in turn, becomes the basis for equality.

One can accept the truth of the proposition that the Constitutional Court accepted the link between dignity and the need for individual freedom from state intervention without accepting the proposition that dignity is only about the need for individual freedom from state intervention. For example, Amartya Sen ties his notion of 'development as freedom' to the provision of a basic basket of goods — both real and figurative — that enable human beings to develop those 'capabilities' necessary for each individual to achieve those ends that each has reason to value.[3] Sen contends that dignity and freedom and equality, rightly understood, are meant neither to achieve definitive outcomes nor to prescribe a univocal understanding of the good.[4] What these covalent values do require is a

[1] President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 41.

[2] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at para 28.

[3] See A Sen Development as Freedom (1999)('Sen Development'); A Sen Inequality Re-examined (1992).

[4] Sen's relationship to classical schools of political philosophy is far too subtle and complicated to be explicated meaningfully here. However, a précis of his position may suggest why Sen, of all contemporary theorists, offers an account of dignity, equality and freedom that provides the best fit with my own take on these 'three conjoined, reciprocal and covalent values'. S v Mamabolo 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC) at para 41. Sen rejects Rawls' contention in A Theory of Justice (1972) — and to a lesser degree in Political Liberalism (1993) — that there are certain primary goods — civil liberties such as expression, assembly, the franchise — 'that cannot be compromised in any way.' Sen Development (supra) at 64. Sen has even less time for utilitarian frameworks that make the greatest good for the greatest number the sole measure of justice. In addition to offering the standard criticisms of utilitarians — their inability to arrive at an acceptable metric for interpersonal comparisons of happiness, their general indifference to radical inequality in the distribution of happiness, and their neglect of rights, freedoms and other non-utility concerns — Sen inveighs against the general inclination to measure utility or happiness in terms of wealth (eg, GNP) and wealth in terms of income (per capita). Neither wealth nor income provide adequate information about the well-being and the substantive freedom of individuals. Both liberals and utilitarians — as we have just described them — fail to take account of how individual differences — in physical ability or disability, in environment, in social practices, in family structure — create significant asymmetries in the manner in which primary goods and incomes can be exploited. Ibid at 73.

Sen asks us to take account, in his theory of distributive justice, of how the heterogeneity amongst individuals (both within societies and across societies) shapes the meaning of primary goods and incomes. For example, the meaning of a primary political good like freedom of assembly will have demonstrably different meanings for a person who is ambulatory and for a person who is not ambulatory, but housebound. Similarly, the utility of an income of R200 000 will have demonstrably different value for a person who is ambulatory and for a person who is not ambulatory, but housebound. At a minimum, says Sen, quoting Adam Smith, our primary concern ought to be providing individuals with those necessities of life that will, in fact, give them '"the ability to appear in public without shame".' Ibid at 73 quoting A Smith The Wealth of Nations (1776)(ed RH Campbell and AS Skinner 1976) 469–471 (By "necessities", Smith means 'not only the commodities which are indispensably necessary for the support of life, but level of material support (eg, food) and immaterial support (eg, civil liberties) that enable individuals to pursue a meaningful and comprehensive vision of the good life — as they understand it.[1]

I have suggested, in this chapter's analysis of the case law, that the Court has moved beyond a minimalist understanding of dignity, and a negative conception of freedom, to something richer and more substantial. In Grootboom the Constitutional Court announced: 'A society must seek to ensure that the basic necessities of life are provided to all if it is to be a society based on dignity, equality, and freedom.'[2] In Khosa v Minister of Social Development, the Court commits the state to the provision of actual resources, social assistance, to an identifiable class of persons — permanent residents. In so doing, the Court moves well beyond dignity as negative liberty to a vision of dignity in which 'wealthier members of the community view the minimal well-being of the poor as connected with their personal well-being and the well-being of the community as a whole.'[3]

Dignity qua collective responsibility for material agency moves us towards a Sen-like capabilities model. Moreover, it does so without being susceptible to the critique of dignity qua negative liberty leveled by exponents of substantive equality. The capabilities model defines equal treatment as the provision of differently situated persons with the material and immaterial means that these individuals, in particular, require to pursue some specific vision of the good.[4] So, for example, Sen argues that pregnant women need more nutrition than non-pregnant women and men and that any basic food program is obliged to recognize this difference in a basic nutritional package.[5]

Dignity qua collective responsibility based upon a Sen-like capabilities model also appears to answer the charge that a commitment to substantive equality — whatever the customs of the country renders it indecent for creditable people, even the lowest order, to be without.') That sounds very much like South African dignity discourse.

Sen thus shifts our focus to the actual 'freedom generated by commodities', and away from 'commodities seen on their own'; he attends to the actual freedom generated by civil liberties, and away from formal constitutional rights viewed in the abstract. Ibid at 74. Sen argues that the best measure of equality or freedom or dignity is the ability of individuals to convert such primary goods as income or civil liberties into the capability 'to choose a life one has reason to value' — or in simpler terms, the ability to pursue one's own ends. Ibid at 75. The virtue of Sen's approach is that it recognizes (a) the heterogeneity of capacity that people possess by virtue of biology, custom, or class; (b) the heterogeneity of critical functions — from nourishment to civic participation — that may be required to live a life one has reason to value; and (c) the heterogeneity of capabilities that people possess — different combinations of more basic functions — which, in turn, enable them to pursue different 'lifestyles' or different visions of the good. Because Sen refuses to reduce 'freedom' to a single basic unit — a utile or a liberty — he is, inevitably, quite pluralistic about the kinds of goods which individuals ought to be free to pursue.

[1] Sen Development (supra) at 75.

[2] K van Marle 'No Last Word: Reflections on the Imaginary Domain, Dignity and Intrinsic Worth' (2002) 13 Stellenbosch LR 299 ('No Last Word') 306.

[3] Khosa (supra) at para 74.

[4] See D Cornell Defending Ideals: War, Democracy, and Political Struggles (2004).

[5] See Sen Development (supra) at 189–203.

or what I have described elsewhere as substantive autonomy[1] — reinscribes the disadvantage of those who find themselves in a 'state of injury'.[2] A capabilities model does not underscore the lack of freedom of our fellow citizens, nor call undue attention to their injury, so much as it demands that we recognize that all of us require a certain basket of goods in order to pursue our preferred way of being in the world.[3]

Dignity qua collective responsibility based upon a Sen-like capabilities model also meets the challenge of those theorists such as Steven Feldman who contend that if we give 'dignity' too much content, then we ultimately put 'freedom' itself at risk. Feldman writes:

> [W]e must not assume that the idea of dignity is inextricably linked to a liberal-individualist view of human beings as people whose life-choices deserve respect. If the state takes a particular view on what is required for people to live dignified lives, it may introduce regulations to restrict the freedom which people have to make choices, which, in the state's view, interfere with the dignity of the individual, a social group or the human race as a whole? The quest for human dignity may subvert rather than enhance choice, and in some circumstances may limit rather than extend the scope of the traditional 'first generation' human rights and fundamental freedoms. Once it becomes a tool in the hands of law-makers and judges, the concept of human dignity is a two-edged sword.[4]

Feldman, however, conflates 'dignity' with 'dignified'.[5] 'Dignity', on my account, rests on objective characteristics of a person. Material goods flow to an individual — or a group — because of these objective characteristics. (So, again, pregnant women would receive a better nutritional package because they require better nutrition than non-pregnant women or men.) The term 'dignified', on the other hand, concerns itself with a subjective judgment about the 'value' of the lives

[1] S Woolman & D Davis 'The Last Laugh: Classical Liberalism, Creole Liberalism and the Application of Fundamental Rights under the Interim and the Final Constitutions' (1996) 12 SAJHR 361, 362–363 ('Unlike the notion of formal autonomy which animates classical liberalism, creole liberalism relies upon a notion of substantive autonomy. Substantive autonomy recognizes simultaneously the socially constructed, contingent and dependent nature of the individual and the legitimate nature of demands for freedom from social and political coercion. Both creole liberalism and the notion of substantive autonomy rest upon the premise that real individual autonomy can only occur within the many and competing . . . associations into which an individual is born and within which she 'chooses' to remain a part. On this view, the state has an essential role to play in determining the contours of those 'private' relationships which so fundamentally shape individual identity and in making possible a variety of life choices through support for those associations and organizations which make up society writ large. Creole liberalism envisages a state which does not exhaust the possibilities of individual lives, but helps to make real those possibilities. In addition, creole liberalism requires that the state occupy a crucial, if not always central, place in the debate about and construction of values at the same time as it supports a variety of different ways of being in the world. Put slightly differently, such a state bears the dual responsibility of ruling out ways of being which threaten the core values of our polity (tolerance, dignity, rough equality, the real possibility of democratic participation) and of providing a framework within which competing notions of the good life can coexist — if inevitably uncomfortably.') See also Sen Development (supra) at 24 (Describes this same set of normative commitments as substantive freedom.)

[2] See W Brown States of Injury: Power and Freedom in Late Modernity (1995).

[3] See D Cornell Just Cause: Freedom, Identity and Rights (2000)('Just Cause').

[4] Cowan (supra) at 52–53.

[5] See D Cornell 'A Call for a Nuanced Constitutional Jurisprudence' (supra) at 668 and D Cornell Defending Ideals (supra) at 63–83.

being led. So, for example, feminists often conflate 'dignity' and 'dignified' when they attribute false consciousness to women in traditional communities who have chosen lives which seem undignified because these communities embrace practices that appear to deny women their agency. As Drucilla Cornell notes, while we must recognize that material and legal conditions exist that impair the ability of women to shape their preferred way of being in the world, and that such obstacles to agency ought to be removed,[1] we should be quite chary of the argument that to live life within the frame of a traditional community makes a woman's life undignified.[2]

(b) Dignity and the imaginary domain

This last insight into the lived experience of many women in a patriarchal society underwrites a more general claim to protection of what Drucilla Cornell has described as 'the imaginary domain'.[3] It is in this imaginary domain that each of us can explore — or at the very least come to terms with — who we really are.

[1] See S Woolman & M Bishop 'Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 64. See also A Sen 'More Than 100 Million Women Are Missing' The New York Review of Books (20 December 1990)(Analysis of obstacles to women's agency — infanticide, denial of property rights, limited education, lack of access to health care, malnutrition — that lead to substantially higher rates of mortality in Asia, Africa and South America.)

[2] For a more detailed discussion of the relationship between women's agency, customary law and the dictates of dignity, see § 36.5*(c)* infra. See also D Cornell Just Cause (supra); Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).

[3] Drucilla Cornell's 'imaginary domain' is an intuition pump that — unlike Kant's categorical imperative or Rawls' original position, does not frame ethical decisions in terms of an abstract, ostensibly universalizable, community of 'rational' individuals. See D Cornell The Imaginary Domain (1995); D Cornell At the Heart of Freedom (1998). The imaginary domain takes the radical givenness of individuals — and their desires — seriously as the departure point for ethical inquiry. Van Marle offers the following description of the imaginary domain:

> The imaginary domain means that psychic or moral space in which we are sexed creatures who care deeply about matters of the heart, are allowed to evaluate and represent who we are. Cornell argues that the right to the imaginary domain takes us beyond hierarchical definitions of the self. Integral to the imaginary is the notion that the person can never be assumed as a given, but is always part of a project of becoming. A person is understood as a possibility, an aspiration. . . . [S]he argues that the freedom to become a person is dependent upon the minimum conditions of individuation. . . . The freedom that a person must have to become a person demands the space for the renewal of the imagination and concomitant re-imagining of who one is and who one seeks to become.

K van Marle 'No Last Word' (supra) at 301. Cornell identifies three necessary preconditions for the imaginary domain: (1) physical security of the person; (2) the ability to engage in sufficiently complex symbolic analysis to permit individuation of the self; (3) a commitment to the protection of the imaginary domain. Those conditions bear some similarity to the conditions that the Constitutional Court has identified with dignity: from not permitting physical violations of the self that make selfhood impossible (Dignity 1), to those material conditions without which no meaningful individuation can occur (Dignity 5), to the provision of some of the formal conditions required for self-actualization (Dignity 3). The three preconditions for the imaginary domain are, like the five faces of dignity, constitutive features of a realm of ends.

This imaginary domain maps on to the space I have identified with dignity because it requires that we agree to coordinate our actions with others so as to maximize our freedom, and yet do so only in so far as that freedom is consistent with the freedom of others.

Moreoever, this reconceptualization of dignity stands as a rebuttal, of sorts, to Dennis Davis' somewhat disparaging description of the Constitutional Court's equality and dignity jurisprudence as a mere 'Lego-land'. When viewed from the perspective offered by the imaginary domain, Booysen, Dawood, National Coalition of Gay and Lesbian Equality, Comitis, and Khosa can be understood as attempts by our courts to create the requisite space within which the individual — in a marriage to a South African citizen, in a same-sex life partnership, in a professional football league or living life as a permanent resident — can reflect upon, and, if necessary, alter the fundamental meaning of her being. What the courts, in each of these cases, have done, is require us to take seriously non-dominant ways of being in the world by forcing us to attend to the centrality of a particular kind of relationship, practice or ascriptive characteristic for the self-representation of a given individual (or group). Dignity qua imaginary domain also offers an implicit critique of those Constitutional Court judgments which have failed to recognize adequately the practice of a non-dominant group as essential to that group's self-understanding and have, as a consequence, refused to accord the practice at issue the level of respect that it deserves.

(c) Dignity and trans-cultural jurisprudence

Dignity qua regulative ideal and dignity qua imaginary domain also point up the possibilities for overcoming the divide between European and African conceptions of justice. Just as dignity qua regulative ideal asks us to take seriously the material requirements of others and dignity qua imaginary domain asks us to take seriously their unchosen conditions of being, I believe that our dignity jurisprudence could offer some assistance in the development of a conception of justice that takes seriously the traditional norms of African culture that ground the lives of many South Africans.

The Constitutional Court's decisions reflect demonstrable sympathy for the many vulnerable minorities that have sought one form of judicial solicitude or another. At the same time, the Court's current body of jurisprudence demonstrates the challenges that adhere to any attempt to accommodate subordinate bodies of law, be they sacred or profane, with that law — the Final Constitution — from which all other law must derive its force.

As we have already noted, the Final Constitution makes it clear that a community's cultural or linguistic practices secure constitutional protection only where they do not interfere with the exercise of other fundamental rights.[1] This formally correct articulation of the relationship between FC s 31 and the rest of the Bill of Rights is often assumed to imply that the other substantive rights — including dignity — trump collective cultural concerns because dignity and other substantive rights do not protect such concerns. That, however, is untrue. For example, the Constitutional Court in Gauteng School Education Bill recognized the importance for individual dignity, and collective claims for equal respect, of granting communities the right to create schools based upon a common culture, language or religion.[1]

[1] FC s 31(2) could be construed to preclude all discriminatory policies. But that assumes that all such practices are inconsistent with various provisions in the Bill of Rights, in particular, equality and dignity. The Constitutional Court has made it quite clear that not all discrimination is unfair discrimination. See, eg, Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC).

Moreover, the courts often mediate conflicts that arise from cultural practices that pit the dignity interests of the individual against the dignity interests of the community. In Christian Education, the Constitutional Court had to assess the relative virtues of arguments that (a) justified corporal punishment of children in terms of the understanding of dignity refracted through the tenets of a specific religious faith, and that (b) called for bans on such punishment because it turned the children of religious parents into mere instruments for the articulation of a community's beliefs. The difficulty in determining where exactly the polity's interest in dignity lies — or which kind of dignity interest deserves primacy of place — ultimately led the Christian Education Court to fudge the issue by declaring that the dignity of children was impaired by corporal punishment meted out in religious schools, but that the same child's dignity was not necessarily so impaired by corporal punishment meted out in religious homes.[2]

The courts have had somewhat greater success in mediating the dignity interests at stake in a number of recent challenges to rules of customary law. In Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others, the Constitutional Court found that the customary law rule of male primogeniture — and several statutory provisions that reinforced the rule — impaired the dignity of and unfairly discriminated against the deceased's two female children because the rule and the other impugned provisions prevented the children from inheriting the deceased's estate.[3] However, it is the manner in which the Bhe Court negotiates two different kinds of claims for equal respect that is most instructive for our current purposes.

The Bhe Court begins with the following bromide: while customary law provides a comprehensive vision of the good life for many South African

[1] Ex Parte Gauteng Provincial Legislature: In Re Dispute Concerning the Constitutionality of Certain Provisions of the Gauteng School Education Bill of 1995 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC)(Court held that IC s 32*(c)* permitted communities to create schools based upon common culture, language and religion.)

[2] Christian Education of South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 51 (CC)('Christian Education') at para 25 ('It might well be that in the envisaged pluralistic society members of large groups can more easily rely on the legislative process than can those belonging to smaller ones, so that the latter might be specially reliant on constitutional protection, particularly if they express their beliefs in a way that the majority regard as unusual, bizarre or even threatening. Nevertheless, the interest protected by section 31 is not a statistical one dependent on a counter-balancing of numbers, but a qualitative one based on respect for diversity.') For criticism of Christian Education, see 36.4*(c)*(iii) supra. See also S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 44.3*(c)*(viii); P Lenta 'Religious Liberty and Cultural Accommodation' (2005) 122 SALJ 352.

[3] See Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha & Others 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Bhe').

communities and receives some level of constitutional solicitude,[1] this new-found constitutional respect for traditional practices does not immunize them from constitutional review.[2] The Bhe Court must locate any justification of extant customary law in the provisions of the Final Constitution.

The Bhe Court then characterizes the customary law of succession in terms that validate its spirit without necessitating that the Court be beholden to its letter. The customary law of succession is, according to the Court, a set of rules

> . . . designed to preserve the cohesion and stability of the extended family unit and ultimately the entire community. . . . The heir did not merely succeed to the assets of the deceased; succession was not primarily concerned with the distribution of the estate of the deceased, but with the preservation and perpetuation of the family unit. Property was collectively owned and the family head, who was the nominal owner of the property, administered it for the benefit of the family unit as a whole. The heir stepped into the shoes of the family head and acquired all the rights and became subject to all the obligations of the family head. He inherited the property of the deceased only in the sense that he assumed control and administration of the property subject to his rights and obligations as head of the family unit. The rules of the customary law of succession were consequently mainly concerned with succession to the position and status of the deceased family head rather than the distribution of his personal assets.[3]

By recasting the justification for customary rules of succession in terms of family and community stability, rather than patriarchy and property, the Bhe Court is able to soften its critique. It then notes that the conditions of family and community that gave rise to the challenged rules no longer obtain. The Bhe Court writes:

> Modern urban communities and families are structured and organised differently and no longer purely along traditional lines. The customary law rules of succession . . . determine succession to the deceased's estate without the accompanying social implications which they traditionally had. Nuclear families have largely replaced traditional extended families. The heir does not necessarily live together with the whole extended family which would include the spouse of the deceased as well as other dependants and descendants. He often simply acquires the estate without assuming, or even being in a position to assume, any of the

[1] See, eg, FC s 39(3): 'The Bill of Rights does not deny the existence of any other rights or freedoms that are recognised or conferred by common law, customary law or legislation, to the extent that they are consistent with the Bill.'

[2] Bhe (supra) at paras 42–46 ('At the level of constitutional validity, the question in this case is not whether a rule or provision of customary law offers similar remedies to the Intestate Succession Act. The issue is whether such rules or provisions are consistent with the Constitution. This status of customary law has been acknowledged and endorsed by this Court.') See also Alexkor Ltd & Another v Richtersveld Community & Others 2004 (5) SA 460 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1301 (CC)('Richtersveld') at para 51 ('While in the past indigenous law was seen through the common law lens, it must now be seen as an integral part of our law. Like all law it depends for its ultimate force and validity on the Constitution. Its validity must now be determined by reference not to common law, but to the Constitution'); Mabuza v Mbatha 2003 (4) SA 218 (C), 2003 (7) BCLR 743 (C)('Mabuza') at para 32 ('It bears repeating, however, that as with all law, the constitutional validity of rules and principles of customary law depend on their consistency with the Constitution and the Bill of Rights.')

[3] Bhe (supra) at para 75.

> deceased's responsibilities. In the changed circumstances, therefore, the succession of the heir to the assets of the deceased does not necessarily correspond in practice with an enforceable responsibility to provide support and maintenance to the family and dependants of the deceased.[1]

Customary law has not, the Bhe Court ruefully observes, evolved to meet the changing needs of the community. It fails African widows because: '(a) … social conditions frequently do not make living with the heir a realistic or even a tolerable proposition; (b) … the African woman does not have a right of ownership; and (c) the prerequisite of a good working relationship with the heir for the effectiveness of the widow's right to maintenance', as a general matter, no longer exists.[2] Again the Court takes care to note that the fault for this arrested development lies outside traditional communities. Ruptures within traditional ways of life — caused by both apartheid, the hegemony of western culture and capitalism — have prevented the law's evolution.[3] This aside sets the stage for the delivery of the Bhe Court's coup de grace: that 'the official rules of customary law of succession are no longer universally observed.'[4] The trend within traditional communities is toward new norms that 'sustain the surviving family unit' rather than re-inscribe male primogeniture.

By having shown that the spirit of succession lies in its commitment to family cohesion, that the traditional family no longer coheres as it once did, and that 'distorted' rules of customary law 'emphasise … patriarchal features and minimise its communitarian ones,' the Bhe Court closes the gap between constitutional imperative and customary obligation.[5] Had customary law been permitted to develop in an 'active and dynamic manner', it would have already reflected the Bhe Court's conclusion that 'the exclusion of women from inheritance on the grounds of gender is a clear violation of … [FC s] 9(3).'[6] Had customary law not been allowed to ossify, traditional communities would have noted how male primogeniture entrenched 'past patterns of disadvantage among a vulnerable group' and endorsed the Bhe Court's re-working of customary understandings of the competence 'to own and administer property' in a manner that vindicates a woman's right to dignity under FC s 10.[7] The Bhe Court is able, therefore, to assert that traditional communities have conceptions of dignity worth protecting without being obliged to endorse a rule that quite clearly offends the dignity

[1] Bhe (supra) at para 80.
[2] See South African Law Reform Commission *The Harmonisation of the Common Law and the Indigenous Law: Succession in Customary La*w Issue Paper 12, Project 90 (April 1998) 6-9. See also TW Bennett Human Rights and African Customary Law under the South African Constitution (1997) 126-7.
[3] See, eg, Richtersveld Community & Others v Alexkor Ltd & Another 2003 (6) SA 104 (SCA), 2003 (6) BCLR 583 (SCA) at paras 85–105.
[4] Bhe (supra) at para 84.
[5] Ibid at para 89.
[6] Ibid at para 83.
[7] Ibid at para 84.

interests of many women and female children within those communities.[1]

Of course, the Bhe Court could have taken a different view of the dignity interests at stake — a view that could, arguably, be said to take somewhat more seriously the claim that apartheid had ravaged African societies. Justice Ncgobo, in dissent, suggests that if the Bhe Court had been truly serious about rectifying the wrongs done to African communities under apartheid, the Court would not have, as it did, subordinate customary law to more general constitutional dictates and statutory enactments. Had the majority taken seriously its own interim conclusion that customary law under apartheid reflected a system of colonial control rather than an authentic expression of law, then it might have placed greater weight on recent trends in indigenous law which suggested that women were increasingly being allowed to take up positions in the family to which they had, heretofore, been barred. The majority, in Justice Ncgobo's view, failed to acknowledge the multiplex kinship relationships that primogeniture was meant to protect and that traditional communities continued to support. Ncgobo J then articulates a response to the problem of primogeniture that — he believes — would have allowed indigenous law the requisite space in which to generate a remedy that honoured both the dignity of women and the dignity of the communities of which these women remain a part.[2] For Justice Ncgobo, equal concern and equal respect for the dignity of indigenous law requires that it be accorded a status equal to ostensibly more atomized notions of dignity found in European conceptions of justice.[3] The challenge of trans-cultural jurisprudence now facing the Constitutional Court, in particular, and South Africa, in general, is how to contrive an ethic that refuses to privilege reflexively the language of the western legal tradition over the language of indigenous law. If the discourse of dignity is, ultimately, to be privileged over talk of ubuntu, then, Justice Ncgobo suggests, such privileges must be earned and not merely assumed.

[1] Judge Hlophe employs a similar disabling strategy in Mabuza. He recognizes the supremacy of the Final Constitution at the same time as he asserts that the protean nature of customary law should enable it to conform, as necessary, to the dictates of the Bill of Rights. His nuanced assessment of the role of ukumekeza reconfigures siSwati marriage conventions in a manner that (a) refuses to allow ukumekeza to be used by the groom's family as a means of control over the bride and (b) consciously places the husband and wife on an equal footing with respect to subsequent determinations of whether a valid marriage under siSwati customary law has taken place. See, further, S Woolman & M Bishop 'Slavery, Servitude and Forced Labour' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 64.

[2] See Bhe (supra) at para 148, where. Justice Ncgobo writes:

> Our Constitution recognises indigenous law as part of our law. Thus section 211(3) enjoins courts to 'apply customary law when that law is applicable, subject to the Constitution and any legislation that specifically deals with customary law.' The Constitution accords it the same status that other laws enjoy under it. In addition, courts are required to develop indigenous law so as to bring it in line with the rights in the Bills of Rights. While in the past indigenous law was seen through the common law lens, it must now be seen as part of our law and must be considered on its own terms and 'not through the prism of common law.' Like all laws, indigenous law now derives its force from the Constitution. Its validity must now be determined by reference not to common law but to the Constitution.

[3] See, especially, M Pieterse '"It's a Black Thing": Upholding Culture and Customary Law in a Society Founded on Non-Racialism' (2001) 17 SAJHR 364. (Pieterse engages in a thorough analysis — conceptual and practical — of the manner in which the current 'dualism' of western and customary law might be overcome.) See also D Cornell & K van Marle 'Interpreting Ubuntu: Possibilities for Freedom in the New South Africa' (2006) 6 African Human Rights LJ (forthcoming); D Cornell 'A Call for a Nuanced Jurisprudence' (2004) 19 SA Public Law 661.

37 Reproductive Rights

Michelle O'Sullivan

37.1 Introduction 37–1
37.2 Life 37–2
37.3 Privacy 37–8
37.4 Equality 37–12
37.5 Freedom and security of the person 37–15
37.6 Children's rights 37–18
37.7 Religion 37–21
37.8 Dignity 37–23
37.9 Access to healthcare 37–23
37.10 Access to information 37–24
37.11 Freedom of expression 37–25
37.12 Limitations 37–26

37.1 INTRODUCTION

While reproductive rights protect the health and well-being of both men and women, reproductive rights are of fundamental importance to women. Only when armed with such rights can women effectively exercise the rest of the rights enshrined in Chapter 2 of the Final Constitution and become full and equal members of South African society.

Even under the narrowest of constructions, reproductive rights demand respect for women's bodily integrity and an environment for decision making free from fear of abuse, violence and intimidation. Viewed more broadly, reproductive rights require the provision of information about and access to voluntary and adequate reproductive and sexual health services and may even command the provision of such basic necessities as food, shelter, childcare and education. So although this chapter focuses primarily on abortion, reproductive health engages the full panoply of rights guaranteed women in Chaper 2.

Abortion in South Africa is legally regulated by the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Act.[1] The Choice Act provides that a pregnancy may be terminated upon request of a woman during the first 12 weeks of the gestation period of her pregnancy,[2] and under somewhat more onerous conditions from 12 to 20 weeks.[3] From 20 weeks onwards terminations are available under more limited circumstances.[4]

The Choice Act provides that only the consent of a pregnant woman is required for a termination. It does not require the consent of a partner or, in the case of a minor, parental consent.[5] Non-mandatory and non-directive counselling are to be promoted by the state.[6] Ideally, this service should be available

* I would like to thank Catherine Bailey, who co-authored this chapter with me in the first edition of this work, for allowing me to use some of that chapter's material in this new chapter.

[1] Act 92 of 1996 ('Choice Act').

[2] Choice Act s 2(1)(a). 'Termination of pregnancy' is a broader term than 'abortion'. Choice Act s 1(x) defines termination as 'the separation and expulsion, by medical or surgical means, of the contents of the uterus of a pregnant woman'. The definition includes abortion and induced labour. In this chapter, termination of pregnancy and abortion are used interchangeably.

[3] Choice Act s 2(1)(b) provides that a pregnancy may be terminated where a woman gives informed consent and a medical practitioner, after consultation with the pregnant woman, is of the opinion that:
(i) the continued pregnancy would pose a risk of injury to the woman's physical or mental health; or
(ii) there exists a substantial risk that the foetus would suffer from a severe physical or mental abnormality; or
(iii) the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest; or
(iv) the continued pregnancy would significantly affect the social or economic circumstances of the woman.

[4] Choice Act s 2(1)(c) provides that a pregnancy may be terminated after the 20th week of the gestation period if a medical practitioner, after consultation with another medical practitioner or a registered midwife who has completed the prescribed training, is of the opinion that the continued pregnancy:
(i) would endanger the woman's life; or
(ii) would result in a severe malformation of the foetus; or
(iii) would pose a risk of injury to the foetus.

[5] Choice Act ss 5(1), (2) and (3). For a discussion of these sections, see §§ 37.3–37.5, and § 37.6 infra.

[6] Choice Act s 4.

before and after the termination of a pregnancy. The Choice Act stipulates that women shall have access to information concerning their rights in relation to the Act.[1] It further provides that all terminations (surgical and medical) must take place in an approved facility and authorizes provinces to approve health facilities that perform terminations.[2]

While the Final Constitution does not deal expressly with the issue of abortion, several of the rights are relevant to the circumstances in which a woman exercises choice over the decision to terminate a pregnancy. This chapter considers the ways in which the rights to life, privacy, religion, freedom and security of the person, dignity, equality, access to information, expression and children's rights effect the right to abortion in South African law.[3]

37.2 LIFE

IC s 9 provided that 'every person shall have the right to life'. FC s 11 provides that 'everyone has the right to life'. The replacement of 'every person' with 'everyone' presumably reflects the apparent linguistic requirement of Constitutional Principle II that 'everyone shall enjoy all universally accepted fundamental rights, freedoms and civil liberties.'[4] In Christian Lawyers Association of South Africa & others v Minister of Health & others[5] McCreath J correctly held that the two terms are interchangeable and that the change across the board from 'every person' to 'everyone' could never > have been intended to introduce a significant new class of rights-bearer. It is inconceivable that any new category could have been introduced by the legislature in this obscure way.'[6]

As Christian Lawyers I suggests, a technical or literal interpretation of the term 'everyone' cannot settle the question of whether a foetus is included within the term 'everyone' for the purposes of the various rights enshrined in Chapter 2.

[1] Choice Act s 6.

[2] Choice Act s 3(1). Medical terminations of pregnancy are carried out by the administration of mifepristone and prostaglandin hormone. The action of these drugs can take several days. Thus, a woman will, in all likelihood, have left the facility prior to the expulsion of the foetus. See In Re A Case Stated by the Abortion Supervisory Committee [2003] 3 NZLR 87 (Court held that a doctor did not act illegally under the Contraception, Sterilisation and Abortion Act of 1977 when performing medical abortions if the woman did not remain on licensed premises until the embryo or foetus was expelled.)

[3] See Section 39(1)(b) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('FC' or 'Final Constitution'). FC s 39(1)(b) directs courts to consider international law when interpreting fundamental rights. See K Hopkins and H Strydom 'International Law' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, August 2005) Chapter 30. See also L du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, August 2005) Chapter 3. FC s 39(1)(c) provides that courts may consider comparative law when interpreting fundamental rights. See C Botha 'Interpretation of the Bill of Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2005) Chapter 32.

[4] Ibid at 1438A (emphasis added).

[5] 1998 (4) SA 113 (T), 1998 (11) BCLR 1434 (T)('Christian Lawyers Association I').

[6] Ibid at 1438A–B.

At South African common law, legal subjectivity begins at birth. According to the nasciturus fiction, however, a foetus, if subsequently born alive, is deemed to have all the rights of a child, where this is to its advantage. This fiction is used to overcome the absence of legal personality of a foetus and to confer upon the foetus particular rights in a limited number of circumstances.[1] The protection provided by the nasciturus fiction does not extend to upholding the right to life of the foetus.[2]

The status of the foetus at common law does not determine the issue of legal personality as a constitutional matter. In Christian Lawyers I, McCreath J held that whatever the status of the foetus may be under the common law, under the Final Constitution the foetus is not a legal persona.[3] McCreath J reasoned as follows. Because the Final Constitution does not include any express provisions affording the foetus (or embryo) legal personality or protection, the drafters of the Constitution could not have intended to make the foetus a beneficiary of any of the rights and freedoms in Chapter 2.[4] Moreover, one would have expected such a clear commitment given that the common law denied the foetus legal personality:

> One of the requirements of the protection afforded by the nasciturus rule is that the foetus be born alive. There is no provision in the Constitution to protect the foetus pending the fulfilment of that condition.'[5]

McCreath J then considered how FC s 12(2), which provides everyone with the right to make decisions concerning reproduction and security and control over their body, might influence the construction of FC s 11:

> Nowhere is a woman's right in this respect qualified in terms of the Constitution in order to protect the foetus.[6]

---

[1] Pinchin & another NO v Santam Insurance Co Ltd 1963 (2) SA 254, 260 (W)(Extended the application of the nasciturus rule to delictual as well as property rights.) See J Sinclair 'Family Rights in D Van Wyk, B De Villiers, J Dugard and D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 502, 526 n78.

[2] See Christian League of South Africa v Rall 1981 (2) SA 821 (O); G v Superintendent, Groote Schuur Hospital, & others 1993 (2) SA 255 (C). In both cases the court refused to appoint a curator ad litem to protect the interests of the foetus against its mother, who attempted to procure a legal abortion in terms of the Abortion and Sterilisation Act 2 of 1975. See also Van Heerden & another v Joubert NO & others 1994 (4) SA 793 (A)(Held that a still-born baby is not a person for the purposes of the Inquest Act); S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 31.3(a)(On whether a foetus is the beneficiary of constitutional rights.)

[3] Christian Lawyers Association I (supra) at 1443B-C, 1437C-D (On this basis McCreath J upheld the defendant's exception that the plaintiffs' particulars of claim did not disclose a cause of action. The notice of exception had alleged that: 'A foetus is not a bearer of rights in terms of' FC s 11. FC s 11 'does not preclude the termination of pregnancy in circumstances and manner contemplated by the act' and 'the right of women to choose to have their pregnancy terminated in the circumstances and manner contemplated by the act, is protected under [FC] ss 9, 10, 11, 12, 14, 15(1) and 27(1)(a).')

[4] Christian Lawyers Association I (supra) at 1441H-I.

[5] Ibid at 1441I.

[6] Christian Lawyers Association I (supra) at 1441J-1442A (McCreath J emphasized that this does not mean that the state is prohibited from enacting legislation to regulate or to restrict abortion. The state may invoke FC s 36 for that purpose.) For a discussion of FC s 36 in the context of reproductive rights, see § 37.11 infra.

If the drafters had wanted to protect the foetus in the Bill of Rights, McCreath J contends that FC s 28, which specifically protects the rights of the chid, would have been an appropriate vehicle. McCreath J then notes that there are clear indications that the safeguards in FC s 28 do not extend to protect the foetus. A 'child' for the purposes of the section is defined as a person under the age of 18 years.[1] McCreath J writes:

> Age commences at birth. A foetus is not a 'child' of any 'age'. The rights afforded by section 28(1) are in respect of 'every child' — ie all children. Yet certain of the rights could not have been intended to protect a foetus; paragraph (f) relates to work, paragraph (g) to detention and (i) to armed conflict. The protection afforded in other paragraphs of subsection (1) must accordingly also exclude the foetus . . . If FC s 28, specifically designed to protect the rights of the child, does not include the foetus within its ambit of protection, then it can hardly be said that the other provisions of the Bill of Rights, including FC s 11, can be said to do so. [2]

Although, rights are conferred on 'everyone' by the Bill of Rights except where a specific class of person is alone singled out for protection, McCreath believes that the foetus could not be included in the scope of protection of 'everyone'.[3] To acknowledge that the foetus is protected under FC s 11, McCreath reasons, would mean ascribing to 'everyone' a meaning which is different to that which it bears everywhere else in the Bill of Rights. Moreover granting constitutional protection to the life of the foetus would afford the foetus the same protection as that of the mother: Termination of pregnancy would no longer constitute abortion, but murder: '[T]he drafters of the Constitution could not have contemplated such far-reaching results without expressing themselves in no uncertain terms.'[4]

McCreath J then suggests that the Final Constitution ought to be viewed primarily as an egalitarian instrument designed to eradicate systematic forms of domination and disadvantage based on race, gender and class. Once the rights of women enshrined in FC ss 9, 10, 11, 12, 14, 15 and 27 are viewed through the prism of transformation, the argument that the foetus possesses the status of a legal person loses much of its force.

The Constitutional Court is apt to confirm the decision in Christian Lawyers I, at least in part, because like McCreath J, it is unlikely to consider the foetus to be a bearer of constitutional rights and accord the foetus a 'right to life'. This conclusion is supported at international law[5] and by the jurisprudence in foreign

[1] FC s 28(3).

[2] Christian Lawyers Association I (supra) at 1442D-E.

[3] Ibid at 1442F-I. (McCreath J refers specifically to FC ss 12(1)(a), 12(1)(b), 12(2)(b), 14, 15(1), 16(1), 17, 18, 21, 30 and 35.) For a critique of McGreath J's interpretation of the beneficiaries of these varied rights, see S Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.3(a).

[4] Ibid at 1443B-C.

[5] See L Hernandez 'To Bear or Not to Bear: Reproductive Freedom as an International Right' (1991) Brooklyn International LJ 309, 322 (Foetus not a person under the American Convention on Human Rights even though Convention protects the right to have life respected from the moment of conception); Inter-American Commission on Human Rights Baby Boy (Unreported, 6 March 1981)(Decided that American Convention's language does not translate into a legally protected right of the foetus.) See also Organisation of African Unity, Protocol on the Rights of Women, Article 14 (11 July 2003)(Significantly broadens the protection of the right of women to terminate a pregnancy. This protocol is not in effect as it requires the ratification of 15 African countries to bring it into effect, and has only been ratified by 12 countries.)

jurisdictions.[1] In Roe v Wade Justice Blackmun decided that the use of the word 'person' in the Fourteenth Amendment to the US Constitution — which provides that the states shall not 'deprive any person of life . . . without due process of law' — did not include the unborn.[2] In Winnipeg Child and Family Services (Northwest Area) v G(DF), the Canadian Supreme Court confirmed that Canadian law does not recognize the unborn child as a legal or juridical person whether the case falls under family law, tort law or succession law.[3] The Winnipeg Child Court held that the state's interest in preserving fetal life may only be served by legislative solutions that are at once principled and minimally intrusive with respect to the rights of pregnant women.[4] This very position has also been endorsed by the European Court of Human Rights.[5]

In contrast, the German courts have tackled the abortion question in terms of the right to life. Article 2(2) of the Basic Law provides that '[e]veryone shall have the right to life and to the inviolability of his person'.[6] The supreme value accorded to the right to life in the German Constitution should be understood as a direct response to German history and the Nazi's view, during the Third Reich, that certain forms of life and certain kinds of human being were worthless.[7]

[1] See R v Demers [2003] BCJ 75, 2003 BCCA 28 (British Columbia Court of Appeal confirmed that a foetus is not captured by the term 'everyone' for the purposes of Canadian Charter s 7. Canadian Supreme Court dismissed Demer's application for leave to appeal.) See also Kelly v Kelly 1997 SLT 896, 1997 SCLR 749 (Scottish Second Division Court dismissed an application for an interdict by a husband seeking to prevent his estranged wife from terminating a pregnancy. Confirmed the nasciturus rule that an injury to a foetus was not actionable before birth and observed that recognising a right of the foetus to continue in the womb would inevitably create a conflict between the existing legal rights of the mother and those of the unborn child.)

[2] 410 US 113, 158 (1973).

[3] [1997] 3 SCR 925.

[4] See R v Morgenthaler (1988) 44 DLR 385, [1988] 1 SCR 30 (Canadian Supreme Court finds that abortion provisions of Criminal Code that violate a woman's Charter s 7 right to fundamental justice — without ruling on foetus' right to life.)

[5] VO v France [2004] 2 FCR 577 (French Court acquitted the doctor of the offence of unintentional homicide of the applicant's child on the basis that the foetus was not a human person for the purposes of the offence. The applicant appealed to the European Court of Human Rights alleging that the French authorities' refusal to classify the taking of life of her unborn child's life as unintentional homicide, and the absence of criminal legislation to prevent and punish such an act, breached Article 2 of the ECHR: 'Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law.' The ECHR Court held that the issue of when the right to life began fell within the margin of appreciation enjoyed by contracting European states and that consensus on such protection has not been resolved within the contracting states. The Court correctly held that in these circumstances, it was neither desirable nor possible to answer in the abstract the question of whether an unborn child was a person for the purposes of Article 2.)

[6] The German courts have also relied on right to dignity provision in GBL, article 1(1). See M Glendon Abortion and Divorce in Western Law (1987) 24–39.

[7] See D Van Zyl Smit 'Reconciling the Irreconcilable? Recent Developments in the German Law on Abortion' (1994) 2 Medical LR 302, 303–308 (For a discussion of the history of German abortion laws, in particular the Erbgesundheidsgesetz of 1933, which provided for mass sterilization and abortion for eugenic purposes and restrictions on abortions for healthy German mothers.) The state has a legitimate interest in upholding the intrinsic value of potential life. However, guaranteeing a foetus the right to life under FC s 11 is not the appropriate mechanism to achieve this end. The Final Constitution, like the German Basic Law, marks a break with a long history of repression. The state's use of repressive criminal sanctions to prevent persons from exercising control over their reproductive lives, especially as they relate to abortion, would be inconsistent with the meaning of that historic break.

In 1993, the German Constitutional Court ('FCC') struck down a federal abortion statute[1] on the grounds that > the state had a primary duty to protect human life, even before birth. This duty, which began at conception, related to every individual life and included a duty also to protect the unborn child against the mother.[2]

Although the majority conceded that this duty to protect the foetus may clash with the pregnant woman's right to protection of her human dignity, bodily integrity and the development of her personality, they maintained that the Basic Law established minimum standards of protection for the foetus. The minority did not deny that the foetus required constitutionally-based protection. They emphasized, however, that because pregnancy involves the pregnant woman from beginning to end, it was not appropriate to set the rights of a woman against those of a foetus.[3] The majority resolved the conflict between the protection of unborn life and the pregnant woman's rights by drawing a conceptual distinction between illegality, which refers to the 'status of the conduct in the legal system as a whole', and criminality, which refers only to the criminal law.[4] On this view, although an abortion could never be justified constitutionally because of the duty of the state to protect unborn life, the state was not under an 'absolute duty' to criminalize all illegal abortions. The FCC therefore decided that where a woman insisted on having an abortion after she had been subjected to counselling designed to persuade her to carry the foetus to term,[5] and the abortion was performed within a legislatively defined period, such an abortion need not be a criminal offence.[6]

Ronald Dworkin, unlike the FCC, rejects the notion that arguments about abortion turn primarily on whether a foetus is the beneficiary of constitutional rights.[7] Any argument that accords the foetus constitutional rights merely grants the state a derivative interest in prohibiting or regulating abortion. The real issue,

[1] BVerfGE A III J2 (1993).

[2] Ibid at 31.

[3] The minority contended that in the early stages of pregnancy the pregnant woman had to be fully involved in all decisions relating to the pregnancy. Only an advanced foetus should be protected by the state by means of the criminal law. See BVerfGE A III J2 (supra) at 311–312.

[4] See Van Zyl Smit (supra) at n 97 (This distinction is unique to German criminal law theory.)

[5] The German court recognized that if women were encouraged by the state to continue a pregnancy to term, the state would have a duty to support these women and the children that they bear. FC s 27(1) provides: Everyone has a right of access to social security, including, if they are unable to support themselves and their dependants, appropriate social assistance. The fiscal constraints upon our health and welfare budgets, limited child care grants, high maintenance default rates, and limited mandatory maternity leave and childcare benefits mean that South African women receive limited state assistance for pregnancy and child-rearing. In this context, it is appropriate that the Choice Act provides only for non-directive counselling, allowing women to make reproductive decisions in relation to abortion free of state interference or coercion. In addition, women who have decided to have an abortion are seldom dissuaded from doing so by counsellors. Cf D Hansson and D Russell 'Made to Fail: The Mythical Option of Legal Abortion for Survivors of Rape and Incest' (1993) 9 SAJHR 500, 511.

[6] BVerfGE A III J2 (supra) at 312–313.

[7] R Dworkin Life's Dominion: An Argument about Abortion and Euthanasia (1993).

argues Dworkin, is not whether we object to abortion because we believe that the foetus is a rights bearer whose particular interests must be defended by a third party, but whether we attach some intrinsic value to life and the potential for human life. The interest of the state in potential human life flows from its interest in protecting the sanctity of human life. Abortion is to be regarded as morally repugnant where it offends against this commitment to the sanctity of life. The state may therefore be justified in regulating abortion on grounds that are independent of the rights-bearing capacity of the foetus itself. Hence, argues Dworkin, the state has a 'detached' (as distinct from 'derivative') interest in the regulation of abortion.

The FCC appears to have conflated the detached interest and the derivative interest of the state in regulating abortion. The majority drew no distinction between pre-natal and post-natal life. Because the foetus is a bearer of constitutional rights from conception, the state was found to have a derivative interest in prohibiting abortion.

If our Constitutional Court were to hold that the foetus is a bearer of constitutional rights, it is possible that only abortions performed to save the life of the mother would be a justifiable limitation upon 'the right to life' of the foetus.[1] The Supreme Court of Ireland has taken this very approach. In Attorney General v X and others, a 14 year old girl became pregnant as a result of rape and indicated an intention to commit suicide if required to carry the child to term.[2] The Supreme Court held that the proper test to apply when interpreting Article 40, Section 3(3) of the Irish Constitution is that a termination of pregnancy is permissible if it is established, as a matter of probability, that there is a real and substantial risk to the life of the mother that can only be avoided by the termination of pregnancy. The Attorney General v X Court held that in view of the likelihood of suicide, such a risk existed.

The experience of South African women under the Abortion and Sterilisation Act provides a compelling argument against the adoption of such a restrictive approach. Thousands of women died each year of pregnancy-related causes, and particularly from unsafe, induced abortion.[3] In contrast, recent research has demonstrated that the Choice Act, combined with accessible, affordable reproductive health care services, will prevent the majority of these deaths.[1] The reduction of morbidity associated with safe terminations protects a woman's right to life and enhances a woman's quality of life.[2]

[1] See S v Makwanyane & another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 268 (Capital punishment unanimously held to be unconstitutional. Several justices based their decisions, in whole or in part, upon the fact that the death penalty violates the right to life. Although an analysis of abortion was not germane to the issues considered, Mahomed DP did refer to it.) See also S Woolman and H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, September 2005) Chapter 34.

[2] See Attorney General v X and others (1992) 15 BMLR 104. This section provides that 'The State acknowledges the right to life of the unborn and, with due regard to the equal right to life of the mother, gaurantees in its laws to respect, and, as far as practicable, by its laws to defend and vindicate that right'.

[3] H Rees, J Katzenellenbogen et al 'The Epidemiology of Incomplete Abortion in South Africa' (1997) 4 SAMJ 432 (Estimates from data collected in September 1994 at fifty six public hospitals in nine provinces in South Africa that there were at least 425 deaths in South African hospitals annually as a result of unsafe abortion, and an estimated 44 686 women were admitted with incomplete abortions.) Unsafe abortion was, prior to the Choice Act, one of the chief causes of South Africa's high rate of maternal morbidity. See Parliamentary Select Committee on Abortion 'Presentation on Behalf of the Medical Research Council's Incomplete Abortion Research Group' (1995) available at www.geocites.-com/terjeskjerdal/abort_1.htm.

Even if the foetus itself does not have a right to life, the state nevertheless has a 'detached' interest in fostering the sanctity of human life by protecting potential life and by regulating abortion in the late stages of pregnancy.[3] The ECHR supports this line of argument when it writes:

> At best, it may be regarded as common ground between states that the embryo/foetus belongs to the human race. The potentiality of that being and its capacity to become a person enjoying protection under the civil law, moreover, in many states, such as France, in the context of inheritance and gifts, and also in the United Kingdom, requires protection in the name of human dignity, without making it a 'person' with the 'right to life' for purposes of Article 2.'[4]

The state's detached dignity interest in fetal life is relevant to the question of the validity of the Choice Act. At the very least, it seems safe to conclude that the constitutional enquiry does not end with a finding that the foetus does not have a right to life.

37.3 PRIVACY[5]

FC s 14, the right to privacy, is said to be primarily about a 'right to be let alone'.[6] At the very least it ensures that certain areas of an individual's life remain free from state interference. In Eisenstadt v Baird, the US Supreme Court wrote:

---

[1] See R Jewkes and H Rees 'The Impact of Age on the Epidemiology of Incomplete Abortions in South Africa after Legislative Change' (2005) 112 BJOG: International Journal of Obstetrics and Gynaecology 355 (Demonstrates convincingly that the introduction of the Choice Act has had a positive impact on maternal morbidity from incomplete abortions, and has resulted in an extremely significant reduction in abortion associated mortality. By comparison with the 1994 research cited above, the 1998–2001 mortality data indicates that there has been a 91.06% reduction in deaths from unsafe abortions.)

[2] See R Cook 'Advancing Reproductive Rights Beyond Cairo and Beijing' (1996) 3 International Family Planning Perspectives 22 (Considers the international-law obligations of governments to reduce maternal mortality and morbidity.)

[3] See D Myerson 'Abortion: The Constitutional Issues' (1999) 116 SALJ 50.

[4] VO v France [2004] 2 FCR 577 at para 84.

[5] FC s 14 provides:

Everyone has the right to privacy, which includes the right not to have —

(a) their person or home searched;
(b) their property searched;
(c) their possessions seized;
(d) the privacy of their communications infringed.

Section 13 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC') provided:

> 'Every person shall have the right to his or her personal privacy, which shall include the right not to be subject to searches of his or her person, home or property, the seizure of private possessions or the violation of private communications.'

See D McQuoid-Mason 'Privacy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 38.

[6] Glendon (supra) at 36.

> [I]f the right of privacy means anything it is the right of an individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child.[1]

In Roe v Wade, the US Supreme Court struck down a Texas law criminalizing abortion on the grounds that the right to privacy embraced the right to terminate a pregnancy.[2] The court acknowledged the need to strike a balance between the woman's right to privacy and the state's interest in potential human life.[3] The Roe Court established a framework, known as the trimester approach, in terms of which the state's interest in protecting potential life did not become compelling until after the point of viability of the foetus.[4] Only at the point of viability, or in the third trimester of pregnancy, would the interest of the state in protecting potential life be sufficiently compelling to justify the restriction of a woman's right to choose to have an abortion. Even then, said the Roe Court, the compelling interest of the state in protecting potential life remained subordinate to the woman's life and health. A state could impose restrictions on abortion prior to viability only if the measures were necessary to protect a woman's health and were the least restrictive means of doing so.

There are good reasons to allow a state to prohibit abortion after viability. At about that point, foetal brain development is sufficient to feel pain, which indicates that the foetus has protectable interests of its own. By then a woman has had sufficient opportunity to decide whether she believes that it is best to terminate the pregnancy. Hence she is not then denied the right to choose abortion.[5]

[1] 405 US 438, 453 (1972)(Decision provided unmarried couples with the right to choose to use contraceptives. Although the right to privacy is not specifically mentioned in the US Constitution, it is implicitly guaranteed in various of its provisions.) See L du Plessis 'Personal Rights: Life, Freedom, and Security of the Person, Privacy and Freedom of Movement' in Van Wyk et al (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism (supra) 212, 242 (Summary of American privacy jurisprudence); R Dworkin 'Unenumerated Rights: Whether and How Roe Should be Overruled' (1992) 59 University of Chicago LR 381, 417 ('Unenumerated Rights').

[2] 410 US 113 (1973).

[3] Ibid at 158.

[4] 'Viability' is the point at which a foetus can exist independently outside the uterus. Courts have recently considered whether this includes living with artificial aid. See Kassama v Magat 767 A 2d 348 (Md Spec App 2001)(Held that 'viability' means potentially able to live outside mother's womb, albeit with artificial aid); Carhart v Stenberg 972 F Supp 507 (D Neb 1997)(Held that in the abortion context 'viability' of foetus occurs when there is reasonable likelihood of foetus' sustained survival outside womb, with or without artificial support, and that even as medical technology advances, the point of viability is determined not in relation to technology but in relation to when the foetus can survive without artificial support.)

[5] The Choice Act utilizes a three-stage framework. After 20 weeks gestation, which is just prior to the point of viability, terminations are available only in limited circumstances. In addition, the Choice Act requires that two health workers be involved in a decision to terminate a pregnancy in the late stages of pregnancy, indicating the increased importance and difficulty of the decision. The limited circumstances under which terminations are available in the Act after 20 weeks protect women's health, as the risks involved in a termination increase as the pregnancy develops. The interests of health workers are also protected, as most prefer to perform an early, rather than a late, termination. Women are encouraged to exercise their choice to terminate a pregnancy in the early stages of a pregnancy, by making abortion available on request through the first 12 weeks.

The viability demarcation also acknowledges that abortion becomes 'morally more problematic as the foetus develops towards the shape of infanthood, as the difference between pregnancy and infancy becomes more a matter of location than development.'[1] The reasons advanced for the limitation of a right to abortion at viability appear to be sufficiently compelling to satisfy the limitations test set out in FC s 36.

In the two decades following Roe, a number of US Supreme Court decisions curtailed the right to choose an abortion.[2] In Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v Casey, the US Supreme Court reaffirmed that women have the constitutional right to choose to have an abortion, but abandoned the trimester framework of Roe and held that the state had a legitimate interest in foetal life throughout pregnancy.[3] A state could promote this interest by enacting restrictive measures designed to encourage childbirth over abortion, provided that the measures did not unduly burden a woman's right to choose an abortion. According to Casey, a restriction imposes an undue burden on a woman if it has 'the purpose or effect of placing a substantial obstacle in the path of a woman seeking an abortion.'[4] A woman challenging such restrictive measures bears the initial burden of demonstrating 'undue' harm.[5]

Inconvenience, even severe inconvenience, is not an 'undue burden' on a woman's right to an abortion. Instead, a court's proper focus must be on the practical impact of the challenged regulation and whether it will have the likely effect of preventing a significant number of women for whom the regulation is relevant from obtaining abortions. To constitute an undue burden, a challenged

[1] See R Dworkin 'Unenumerated Rights' (supra) at 429–430.

[2] See, eg, Harris v McRae 448 US 297 (1980) (Upheld a ban on federal Medicaid reimbursements for abortions except in the case of life endangerment); Hodgson v Minnesota 497 US 417 (1990)(Upheld a requirement that a young woman seeking an abortion notify both parents); Ohio v Akron Center for Reproductive Health 497 US 502 (1990)(Upheld a requirement that a young woman obtain the consent of one parent or a judicial waiver); Webster v Reproductive Health Services 492 US 490 (1989)(Upheld a statute that created a presumption of 'viability' at 20 weeks'; the preamble to the statute asserted that '[t]he life of each human being begins at conception' and that 'unborn children have protectable interests in life, health and well being'; the legislation also prohibited state public employees from counselling women about abortion and banned the performance of abortions at public facilities.)

[3] 505 US 833 (1992).

[4] Ibid.

[5] J Benshoof 'Planned Parenthood v Casey — The Impact of the New Undue Burden Standard on Reproductive Health Care' (1993) 269 JAMA 2249. Prior to Casey, the court had consistently invoked the principle of government neutrality. For example, in Harris v McRae, this principle was found to justify a state not providing any financial assistance to women who choose to have abortions. Casey was the first case that did not involve government funding in which the court abandoned the principle that the government must act with neutrality in regard to a woman's decision to terminate her pregnancy. But see Carhart v Smith 178 F Supp 2d 1068 (D Neb 2001)(Held that to afford no protection to the effectuation of a woman's decision to obtain an abortion would render her fundamental right meaningless); Eubanks v Schmidt 126 F Supp 2d 451 (WD Ky 2000)(Women have the right to choose to have an abortion before viability and to obtain it without state's imposition of any undue burden. A law will impose a prohibited 'undue burden' on the right to choose abortion if it has the purpose or effect of placing a substantial obstacle in path of women seeking abortion of a nonviable fetus. A State may pass a law aimed at decreasing number of abortions so long as law strives to reach this goal by influencing woman's choice, rather than by creating substantial obstacles.)

state regulation must have a strong likelihood of preventing women from obtaining abortions rather than merely making abortions more difficult to obtain.[1] American courts have also held that the states do not violate the US Constitution by expressing a preference for normal childbirth over abortion.[2] The government has no constitutional obligation whatsoever to facilitate abortions, and can further restrict that right short of placing an undue burden on a woman's right to choose.[3] Despite the erosion of reproductive rights in these decisions, American courts have consistently held that a state may not place its interest in foetal life above its interest in the life or health of a woman at any time during the course of a pregnancy.[4]

As the US jurisprudence suggests, locating a right to choose an abortion within the right to privacy has numerous drawbacks. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsberg notes that analysing the right to terminate in terms of privacy — an autonomy right — has made it easier for the court to justify limiting women's access to abortion. She suggests that analysing the issue in terms of the right of women to the equal protection of the law — a solidarity right — would have made it more difficult for the court to rule, for example, that neither the US Constitution nor federal statute requires state health insurance reimbursements for elective abortions.[5]

Research in America suggests that the negative consequences of restrictions on abortion and the lack of access to publicly funded abortion facilities are visited primarily on poor, young, rural, and battered women in dysfunctional families.[6] Locating the right to choose an abortion exclusively in the right to privacy could well have a similar effect in South Africa and leave the current position of the most vulnerable women in our society unchanged. As June Sinclair has argued:

> In the US the Supreme Court in Roe v Wade held that a woman's constitutional right to privacy prevented a state from forbidding abortion. This recognition of women's autonomy in the 'private' sphere of reproduction, however, is what has been used to justify failures on the part of the federal government to provide funding necessary to make the abortion choice meaningful to those women who cannot afford medically acceptable procedures. The duty of the state not to prohibit abortion in this sphere of privacy has come to mean

[1] Karlin v Foust 188 F 3d 446 (7th Cir 1999).

[2] Women's Emergency Network v Bush 323 F 3d 937 (11th Cir 2003); Taylor v Kurapati 600 NW2d 670 (Mich App 1999).

[3] Victoria W v Larpenter 205 F Supp 2d 508 (EDLa. May 21, 2002).

[4] See Women's Medical Professional Corp v George Volnovich 130 F 3d 187 (6th Cir 1997)(Held that even though state has right to ban post-viability abortions, and therefore applications of this ban are constitutional if woman's health and life are not at risk, post-viability abortion regulation which threatens life or health of even a few pregnant women should be deemed unconstitutional.) See also Planned Parenthood of Rocky Mountains Services, Corp. v Owens 2002 WL 571784 (10th Cir 2002); Rhode Island Medical Soc v Whitehouse 66 F Supp 2d 288 (Dis RI 1999); McMillan v City of Jackson 701 So 2d 1105 (Miss 1997).

[5] R Ginsburg 'Sex Equality and the Constitution: The State of the Art' (1992) 14 Women's Rights Law Reporter 361, 362.

[6] J Benshoof 'The Impact of the New Undue Burden Standard' (supra) at 2254. Under the Final Constitution, the right of access to reproductive health care services, (see § 37.8 infra), freedom and security of the person (see § 37.5 infra), and a substantive interpretation of equality (see § 37.4 infra), should make it unnecessary to rely entirely on privacy to found a right to abortion in South Africa.

that it also has no duty to intervene to protect this choice that its non-intervention guarantees. The negative right does not translate into a positive claim to safe, subsidized abortion facilities.'[1]

Despite these limitations, Ronald Dworkin cautions against dismissing the privacy argument altogether. He suggests that it should be used in conjunction with, rather than in contra-distinction to, an equal protection analysis.[2] This approach makes sense in a country such as ours with its long history of state regulation of reproduction.[3]

37.4 EQUALITY[4]

Equality has a special place in the Final Constitution.[5] As we try to expiate the sins of a past 'in which inequality was systematically entrenched,'[6] the Final Constitution sets its face against laws and practices which reinforce the subordination of disadvantaged groups and undermine their dignity.[7]

The Final Constitution is concerned with both substantive and formal equality. Substantive equality looks beyond abstract legal rights to the actual social, political and economic conditions of disadvantaged groups. From this perspective it is clear that, in order to secure the equal access of persons to constitutional rights and freedoms, more may be required from the state than abstention from interference in the lives of its citizens. The state may be required to intervene positively to provide the minimum resources necessary for the enjoyment of certain rights.

Because reproductive autonomy is a precondition for the sexual and social equality of women,[8] women ought to be entitled to claim state resources in

[1] See J Sinclair (supra) at 525. Similar criticism of these decisions has been levelled by numerous commentators. See DE Roberts 'The Future of Reproductive Choice for Poor Women and Women of Colour (1992) 14 Women's Rights Law Reporter 309 ('A choice — at least where fundamental rights are concerned — means more than the abstract ability to reach a decision in one's mind. A true choice means an uncoerced selection of one course of action over another and the ability to follow one's chosen course. An indigent woman may have the legal option to decide that she wants to terminate her pregnancy. She may even feel that an abortion is essential to her economic, physical and emotional survival. But if the government will pay for her childbirth expenses and not for an abortion, and she has no money for either option, she does not have a choice.')

[2] R Dworkin Life's Dominion: An Argument about Abortion and Euthanasia (1993) 54.

[3] On the principle of procreative autonomy underlying decisions upholding the right to contraception and abortion see R Dworkin 'Unenumerated Rights' (supra) at 417.

[4] See J Kentridge 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 35.

[5] See C A MacKinnon Toward a Feminist Theory of the State (1989) 246.

[6] See Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 33.

[7] See S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at paras 218, 262 and 322.

[8] See Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC), President of the Republic of South Africa & Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 41; Harksen v Lane 1998(1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC); National Coalition for Gay & Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC); Satchwell v President of the Republic of South Africa 2002 (6) SA 1 (CC), 2002 (9) BCLR 986 (CC); Nonkululeko Letta Bhe and others v The Magistrate Khayelitsha and others 2005 1 SA 580 (CC), 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).

that choice safely and securely.[1] By looking at abortion as an equality issue we can also assess reproductive choice in the whole context in which women fall pregnant and decide to terminate a pregnancy or to raise children.[2] The social and sexual equality of women will only be achieved when women are free to choose whether or not to have sex, and when women are free to decide on the number and spacing of their children, if any.[3] A legal right to early and safe abortion is an issue of individual conscience, social justice and sexual equality.

The biological facts of life determine that it is women who become pregnant. However, it is also a social reality of South African life that, in addition to the burden of childbirth, the costs and responsibility of bringing up children are disproportionately borne by women. Goldstone J emphasised in President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Hugo the acute challenges involved in child rearing for South African women:

> For all that it is a privilege and the source of enormous human satisfaction and pleasure, there can be no doubt that the task of rearing children is a burdensome one. It requires time, money and emotional energy. For women without skills or financial resources, its challenges are particularly acute. For many South African women, the difficulties of being responsible for the social and economic burdens of child rearing, in circumstances where they have few skills and scant financial resources, are immense. The failure by fathers to shoulder their share of the financial and social burden of child rearing is a primary cause of this hardship. The result of being responsible for children makes it more difficult for women to compete in the labour market and is one of the causes of the deep inequalities experienced by women in employment.[4]

The social and economic consequences of pregnancy may include: losing a job or promotion, low-paid or no maternity leave, lack of adequate childcare, interrupted careers or education.[5] This double burden of birth has a profound impact on women's ability to participate as equal citizens.[6]

[1] See R Dworkin 'Why Liberals Should Care About Equality' A Matter of Principle (1985) 205.
[2] Ibid.
[3] Ibid.
[4] Hugo (supra) at para 38.
[5] In South Africa 330–400 of every 1 000 births are to young women and girls under 19. See Youth Speak Out . . . A Study on Youth Sexuality (NPPHCN/UNICEF (1996). Without the option of abortion some of these women drop out of the education system and thereby forgo the benefits of education. The result is a cycle of poverty for women already trapped by their disadvantaged social circumstances. See Mfolo and Others v Minister of Education, Bophuthatswana 1992 (3) SA 181 (B), 1994 (1) BCLR 136 (B) (Held that a regulation prohibiting pregnant women from pursuing their studies to be inconsistent with section 9 of the Bophuthatswana Constitution.) See also Student Representative Council of Molepolole College of Education v Attorney General [1995] (3) LRC 447 (Botswana Court of Appeal)(Found regulations obliging pregnant students to leave Teachers Training College or miss the following semester to contravene section 15(3) of the Botswana Constitution. Section 15(3) prohibits sex-based discrimination); Lloyd Chaduka and Morgenster College v Enita Mandizvidza, Judgment No SC 114/2001, Civil Appeal No 298/2000)(Zimbabwe Supreme Court)(Held that a contractual provision that required women to withdraw from college if they become pregnant is contrary to public policy and the Zimbabwean Constitution.)
[6] The repealed Abortion and Sterilization Act operated unfairly to discriminate against women generally by denying them control over their own fertility, but also discriminated indirectly against black, poor, and rural women. Under the Abortion and Sterilization Act, 61.3% of the legal abortions performed in South Africa during 1995 were on white women. See answer to Question in National Assembly on 14 March 1996 by Dr Zuma, Minister for Health, Interpellations, questions and Replies of the National Assembly Third Session — First Parliament 1–14 March 1996.

The equality clause in the Final Constitution provides expressly that everyone has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law. FC s 9(2) provides that 'equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms' and supports a substantive rather than purely formal approach to equality. If we accept that the primary purpose of the equality clause is to assist disadvantaged groups to overcome the inequality of their condition, we must then separate substantive equality claims from other equality claims. This may be important if, in claiming equal protection, men or partners of pregnant women attempt to prevent women from asserting their reproductive rights. The demand for substantive equality in the domain of reproductive rights makes the connection between systemic discrimination against women and women's unique reproductive role.[1] With respect to disputes over reproductive rights, a man's formal right to equality must yield before a woman's substantive right to equality.[2] Indeed, the text of FC s 9(3) embraces pregnancy,[3] in addition to sex and gender, as a prohibited ground of discrimination and thereby acknowledges that pregnant women are members of a systematically disadvantaged group whose historical and current condition require enhanced judicial solicitude.

Because the social consequences of pregnancy may profoundly impair a woman's ability to participate as citizens,[4] FC s 9(3), recognizes that women deserve to be treated with equal concern and respect in relation to their biological difference, not punished for it.[5] Although the Bill of Rights addresses discrimination on the basis of pregnancy, it is likely to be many years before women are free and equal to men in their sexual relationships. The Choice Act recognizes that to achieve sex and gender equality, women of all ages must be able to decide

[1] K Mahoney 'Canadian Approaches to Equality Rights and Gender Equity in the Courts' in R Cook (ed) Human Rights of Women: National and International Perspectives (1994) 439.

[2] See G Brodsky & S Day 'Canadian Charter: Equality Rights for Women' Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women (September 1989) 192. See also Coe v County of Cook 162 F 3d 491 (7th Cir 1998)(Upheld principle that the constitutional right of a woman to have an abortion without interference from the man who impregnated her precludes recognition of any constitutional right of the man to interfere); Paton v British Pregnancy Advisory [1979] QB 276 (In the absence of the right to be consulted under the Abortion Act, a husband had no rights enforceable in law or in equity to prevent his wife from having an abortion or to stop the doctors carrying out the abortion which was lawful under the 1967 Act); Paton v United Kingdom (1981) 3 EHRR 408 (European Commission found that the husband's and potential father's right to respect for his private life and family life cannot be interpreted so widely as to embrace such procedural rights as claimed by the applicant, i.e. a right to be consulted, or a right to make applications about an abortion which his wife intends to have performed on her.)

[3] See Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 42. But see Geduldig v Aiello 417 US 484 (1974)(Disingenuous comparison made between pregnant and non-pregnant persons); Bliss v AG of Canada [1979] 1 SCR 183 (Held that discrimination on the ground of pregnancy did not amount to discrimination on the basis of sex.)

[4] For example, abortions in England and Wales rose by over 14 % to a six-year high in 1996 following a government public health warning that certain contraceptive pills carried an increased risk of blood clots. See 'Blood Clots Fears Only Covering Explanation: Abortions Up 14%' The Guardian (21 February 1997).

[5] See Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia [1989] 1 SCR 143 (Canadian Supreme Court adopted a new test, abandoning the similarly situated or male comparator test, which focuses on the impact of laws on the context of the person affected. This test analyses discrimination in terms of disadvantage, which requires judges to look at the real experience of women or other claimants and to confront systematic discrimination.)

whether to terminate a pregnancy. Parliament has acknowledged that women are best placed to make this choice, and has provided for abortion on request within the first 12 weeks of pregnancy.[1] If women present early for terminations, both doctors and properly trained midwives can perform the termination procedure.[2] Abortion on request, combined with access to medical terminations, heralds a new age in women's reproductive health: I say heralds, because such unencumbered access to abortion is not yet the reality for many women in South Africa.[3]

The right to access health care services, including reproductive health care, is guaranteed in FC s 27.[4] A failure by any state-controlled clinic or hospital to provide termination of pregnancy on the same scale as any other medical or surgical procedure unfairly discriminates against pregnant women under FC s 9 and violates FC s 27. Similarly, given that FC s 9 is enforceable between private persons[5] — as is the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act[6] — medical aid schemes may not be able to refuse funding for terminations of unwanted pregnancies without infringing a woman's constitutional and statutory rights.

37.5 Freedom and Security of the Person

The right to freedom and security of the person has been extended in the Final Constitution to include the right of everyone to bodily and psychological integrity. This subsection encompasses the right to make decisions concerning reproduction and to security in and control over one's body.[7] The decision to terminate a pregnancy falls clearly within the ambit of this right.

In Christian Lawyers II, Mojapelo J held that FC ss 12(2)(a) and (b) guarantee the right of every woman to determine the fate of her pregnancy — whether to terminate it or not — and that this freedom of choice is reinforced by the rights to equality, dignity, life, privacy and to access to reproductive health care.[8] He confirmed that while the state has a legitimate interest in the protection of prenatal life, such regulation may not amount to a denial of the right to freedom and security of the person.

[1] Choice Act s 2(1)(a).

[2] Choice Act s 10(1)(a).

[3] The Choice Act came into effect on 1 February 1997. See K Dickson, R Jewkes, H Brown, H Rees and L Mavuya 'Abortion Service Provision in South Africa Three Years After Liberalization of the Law' 34 (3) Studies in Family Planning (2003) 277 (Reveals that three years after enactment of the Choice Act, only 32% of the 292 designated abortion facilities were functioning; 27% of functioning facilities were in the private sector. Substantial parts of South Africa were without abortion services — resulting in gross inequalities in service availability.)

[4] FC s 27(1)(a).

[5] See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31.

[6] Act 4 of 2000.

[7] FC s 12(2): Everyone has the right to bodily and psychological integrity which includes the right-(a) to make decisions concerning reproduction; (b) to security in and over their body.

[8] Christian Lawyers Association v National Minister of Health and Others 2005 (1) SA 509, 526 (T), 2004 (10) BLLR 1086, 1103 (T)('Christian Lawyers II').

The Constitutional Court's purposive approach to the interpretation of FC s 12 — which looks at the right in its broader constitutional context and situates it within our particular historical condition — is especially important in the context of reproductive rights: for the 'right to choose means little when women are powerless.'[1]

The Constitutional Court first considered the scope of freedom and security of the person under the IC in Ferreira v Levin NO & others.[2] The Ferreira Court construed the right quite narrowly[3] and limited its reach to maintaining physical integrity within the context of unlawful detention and proscribing cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment.[4]

In his minority judgment, Ackermann J interpreted the ambit of freedom and security of the person, and freedom in particular, to be the right of individuals 'not to have obstacles to possible choices and activities' put in their path by the state.[5] However, this reliance on a classically liberal notion of freedom from state intervention suffers from limitations for women similar to those created by the right to privacy. It does not, for one, ground a positive claim against the state to provide women with access to safe and affordable abortion facilities. The explicit and detailed provisions of FC s 12 recognize that the struggle of women for personal autonomy has, historically, been a struggle for inclusion in society, rather than exclusion by the state.[6]

FC s 12 confronts directly the fact that many women do not enjoy security in and control over their bodies.[7] The extremely high rate of rape, sexual abuse, forced sex, sexual intimidation, domestic violence and femicide in South

[1] See C Smart Feminism and the Power of Law 151 (A generous interpretation of freedom does not imply absolute freedom or no state regulation.)

[2] 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira'). IC s 11(1) provided that 'every person shall have the right to freedom and security of the person, which shall include the right not to be detained without trial. IC s 11(2) prohibited all forms of physical, mental and emotional torture as well as cruel inhuman and degrading treatment.

[3] Ferreira (supra) at para 158 (Chaskalson P took the view that the constitutional challenge to s 417(2)(b) of the Companies Act 1973 should be based on the right to a fair criminal trial.)

[4] See S v Coetzee & others 1997 (3) SA 527 (CC), 1997 (4) BCLR 437 (CC)(On the narrow construction of right to freedom in IC s 11(1)).

[5] Ferreira (supra) at para 54.

[6] See H Lessard 'Relationship, Particularity and Change: Reflections R v Morgenthaler and Feminist Approaches to Liberty' (1991) 36 McGill LJ 263, 292.

[7] FC s 12(1)(c) extends the protection of freedom and security of the person to be free from all forms of violence from either public or private sources and may be used to develop the common law of delict. See Rail Commuter Action Group and Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail and Others (No 2) 2003 (5) SA 593 (C), 2003 (3) BCLR 288 (C); Rail Commuter Action Group and Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail and Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC); R Jewkes and L Penn Kekana 'He Must Give Me Money, He Musn't Beat Me: Violence Against Women in Three South African Provinces.' (Women's Health Medical Research Council 1999) 11 (Surveyed 1306 women in 3 provinces and revealed that 26.8% of women from the Eastern Cape, 28.4% of Women from Mpumalanga and 19.1% of Women in the Northern Province had been physically abused by a current or ex-partner.) See S Matthews, N Abrahams et al (2004) 'Every Six Hours a Woman is Killed by Her Intimate Partner: A National Study of Female Homicide in South Africa' (2004) (5) MRC Policy Brief 2 (Reported that, in 1999, 8.8 per 100 000 of women aged 14 years and older were killed by their partners, the equivalent of one women being killed every six hours.)

Africa has forced the Constitutional Court to acknowledge that that 'spousal abuse and domestic violence 'is a pervasive and frequently hidden problem that challenges society at every level' and that 'domestic violence is 'systematic, pervasive and overwhelmingly gender-specific.'[1] The circumstances in which women become pregnant are often beyond their control: their partners refuse to use condoms or to let them practise contraception,[2] or have intercourse with them against their will.[3]

HIV infection is another consequence of our coercive sexual environment. South African women in violent relationships have an increased risk of being infected with HIV than women in non-violent relationships.[4]

The history of reproductive rights in South Africa is a history of pervasive, highly invasive regulation. Women were subject to the marital power of their husbands and relegated to the status of perpetual minors.[5] As mothers, they were accorded equal status as guardians of their children as recently as 1993.[6] In addition the racist population control policies of the apartheid government sought to control black women's fertility by the use of injectable contraceptives — another egregious assault on the bodily integrity, dignity and equality of women.[7] Until recently abortion was criminalized.[8] Women either carried unwanted foetuses to term or sought abortions on the backstreets.[9]

Our constitution's express recognition of the experience of repression and degradation by South Africa's women is a departure from international freedom and security of the person provisions.[10] In the course of rejecting its racist and

[1] S v Baloyi 2002 (2) SA 425 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 86 (CC) at para 11. See also Sonderup v Tondelli 2001 (1) SA 1171 (CC), 2001 (12) BCLR 152 (CC) at para 34.

[2] See B Klugman and R Weiner 'Occasional Paper No 28' Women's Health Project, Centre for Health Policy, University of Witwatersrand (1992) 27 as quoted in J Birnbaum 'Contextualising Choice: Abortion, Equality and the Right to Make Decisions Concerning Reproduction' (1996) 12 SAJHR 485, 500 n 47.

[3] Beijing Conference Report '1994 Country Report on the Status of Women' (1994) 44 (Places the number of reported rapes in 1993 at 23 318.) The South African Police Service acknowledges that rapes are radically underreported. They estimate that only 1 in 35 rapes is reported.

[4] K Dunkle and R Jewkes Gender-based Violence and HIV Infection Among Pregnant Women in Soweto (Gender and Health Group, Medical Research Council 2003).

[5] Marital power was finally abolished for all races retrospectively by s 29 of the General Law Fourth Amendment Act 132 of 1993. See F Kaganas & C Murray 'Law and Women's Rights in South Africa: An Overview' in Gender and the New South African Legal Order (1994) 13.

[6] Guardianship Act 192 of 1993.

[7] During apartheid, the government's population policy was designed to control black South African population growth. Many black women were injected with a contraceptive known as Depo Provera. As a result contraception is a highly politicized issue.

[8] Abortion and Sterilization Act 2 of 1975 (Repealed by the Choice Act).

[9] An estimated 42 000 to 300 000 backstreet abortions were performed annually under the Abortion and Sterilization Act. The women involved face a high risk of permanent infertility, disability and mortality from septic abortions. See ARAG Submission to Ad Hoc Select Committee on Abortion and Sterilization (1995)(text on file with author).

[10] Article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) provides that 'everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person'. Articles 9 and 10 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966) provide for liberty and security of the person in the context of freedom from unlawful arrest and detention, as does Article 6 of the African Charter on Human and People's Rights (1981).

sexist past, South Africa now leads, and no longer follows, in the field of human rights.[1]

The Choice Act promotes a woman's right to freedom and security of her person by affording every woman the right to choose to have an early, safe and legal abortion. The language is not gender-neutral. It applies to women. The Choice Act recognizes that each woman is best placed to make the decision to terminate in accordance with her individual beliefs.[2]

Whether the choice Act's various infringements of FC s 12 are reasonable and justifiable limitations of women's reproductive choice in South Africa is considered below.[3] The nature of the liberty afforded to women under FC s 12 will be important in determining whether the state has taken the requisite steps to ensure full enjoyment of this right. However, as Ackermann J suggests in his dissent in Ferreira, rights to freedom and security are bound up with the conditions for their exercise.[4] They are, in particular, contingent upon having access to the reproductive health care services expressly provided for in FC s 27.[5] Without wide access to health facilities and health workers prepared to perform early and safe abortions, these FC s 12 right's will be largely meaningless.[6] By giving women control of their own fertility under statute and through the Final Constitution, we create a framework within which women will truly be able to enjoy the fundamental freedom to choose the number and the spacing of their children.

37.6 CHILDREN'S RIGHTS

Christian Lawyers II concerned a constitutional challenge to those provisions of the Choice Act that required only the consent of a minor in order for her to obtain a termination of pregnancy.[7] The Act does not require parental consent. The Christian Lawyers Association alleged that women or girls below the age of 18 are not capable, without parental consent or control, of making an informed decision as

[1] Article 16(1)(e) of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women ('Women's Convention') (1979) provides that: 'State parties shall take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination against women in all matters relating to marriage and family relations and in particular shall ensure, on a basis of equality of men and women: the same rights to decide freely and responsibly on the number and spacing of their children and to have access to the information, education and means to enable them to exercise these rights.')

[2] In the first 12 weeks it is the woman's decision alone.

[3] See § 37.11 infra.

[4] Ackermann J draws on the wisdom of Isaiah Berlin in order to warn us against the danger of conflating freedom with the condition of its exercise. Ferreira (supra) at para 52. Freedom is never lost, they both argue, and the state is under a certain obligation to promote education, health, justice, to raise standards of living, which is 'not directed at the promotion of liberty itself, but to the conditions in which alone its possession is of value. Useless freedoms should be made usable but they are not identical with the conditions indispensable for their utility.' I Berlin 'Introduction' in Four Essays on Liberty (1969) at liii–lv, as quoted by Ackermann J in Ferreira (supra) at para 52, n 55.

[5] FC s 27(1)(a). See also Article 14(2)(b) of the Women's Convention, which obliges state parties to take all appropriate measures to eliminate discrimination in rural areas, which include the rights 'to have access to adequate health care facilities, including information, counselling and services in family planning.'

[6] R v Morgenthaler (1988) 44 DLR (4th) 385, [1988] 1 SCR 30 ('Morgenthaler').

[7] Ibid.

to whether or not to have a termination of pregnancy. Since a girl is, on this view, never capable of giving informed consent, they contended that sections 5(1),(2) and (3) of the Choice Act — which do not require parental consent — are unconstitutional. In the case of a minor requesting a termination, the Act advises that she consult with her parents, guardian, family or friends before the termination. But if she chooses not to do so, she is not, under the Act, to be denied a termination. The Christian Lawyers Association sought a declaration that section 5*(a)* was inconsistent with the rights of children to family or parental care and to be protected from maltreatment, degradation or abuse, and (b) violated a child's best interests and the right to equal protection of the law.[1]

Mojapelo J considered the entire scheme of the Choice Act. The Act requires informed consent. It provides that a termination can only be performed by a medical practitioner or registered midwife at a designated facility. It obliges the state to promote the provision of counselling before and after a termination. It encourages a young woman to consult family or friends prior to obtaining a termination of pregnancy. It requires that women be informed of their rights under the Act.[2] Mojapelo J concluded that the legislature had not, in fact, left termination of pregnancy unregulated and that the cornerstone of the Choice Act is that a pregnant woman of any age is required to give informed consent in order to obtain a termination.[3]

He considered what 'informed consent' means in this context: namely knowledge, appreciation and consent.[4] 'Knowledge' means that a woman who consents to a TOP must have full knowledge 'of the nature and extent of the harm or risk'. The requirement of 'appreciation' implies more than mere knowledge. The woman concerned 'must also comprehend and understand the nature and extent of the harm or risk.'[5] 'Consent' means that a woman must consent to the harm or risk associated with the termination of her pregnancy. Her consent 'must be comprehensive.' That is, 'it must extend to the entire procedure inclusive of any consequences.'[6] In sum, Mojapelo J writes, 'valid consent can only be given by someone with the intellectual and emotional capacity for the required knowledge, appreciation and consent.'[7] The Act thereby recognises that where the capacity for informed consent exists, in spite of the youthfulness or age of the person, such a person can obtain a termination of pregnancy. Age is no bar to informed consent.

[1] FC s 28(1)(b) provides: Every child has the right to family care or parental care. FC s 28(1)(d) provides: Everyone has the right to be protected from maltreatment, neglect, abuse or degradation. FC s 28(2) provides: A child's best interests are of paramount importance in every matter concerning the child.

[2] Christian Lawyers Association II (supra) at 514–515.

[3] Ibid at 515.

[4] See Waring and Gillow v Sherborne 1904 (TS) 340, 344 cited in Christian Lawyers Association 2 (supra) at 515 ('It must be clearly shown that the risk was known, that it was realised, that it was voluntarily undertaken. Knowledge, appreciation, consent — these are the essential elements; but knowledge does not invariably imply appreciation, and both together are not necessarily equivalent to consent.')

[5] See Castell v De Greeff 1994 (4) SA 408, 425 (C); J Neethling, J M Potgieter and P J Visser Law of Delict (3rd Edition, 1999) 100–101 as cited in Christian Lawyers Association II (supra) at 516.

[6] Castell (supra) at 425 as cited in Christian Lawyers Association II (supra) at 516.

[7] See Castell (supra) at 425 and J Neethling, J M Potgieter and P J Visser (supra) at 120 as cited in Christian Lawyers Association II (supra) at 516.

Mojapelo J went on to hold that the approach of the Choice Act in relation to minors was, in light of the requirements of informed consent, constitutional. He reasoned as follows. First, the Final Constitution affords everyone the right to make decisions concerning reproduction and security over their bodies, including girls under eighteen. Second, the right to equality makes everyone equal before the law and prevents unfair discrimination on the basis of age. Any distinction drawn on the basis of age would violate the right to equality and the party engaging in age discrimination would have the burden of proving the discrimination fair.[1] Third, the argument that the provisions of the Choice Act under attack do not cater for the best interests of the girl child is unwarranted. Mojapelo J writes:

> The legislative choice opted for in the Act serves the best interest of the pregnant girl child . . . because it is flexible enough to recognise and accommodate the individual position of a girl child, based on her intellectual, psychological and emotional make up and actual majority.[2]

The judge concluded that provided a girl under 18 is capable of giving informed consent, she can obtain a termination of pregnancy.[3]

The approach adopted by Mojapelo J is consistent with the approach of courts in other jurisdictions.[4] In American Academy of Paediatrics v Lungren the Supreme Court of California declared a statute unconstitutional which required a minor to obtain parental or judicial consent for an abortion.[5] The Lungren court emphasised that the legislation under scrutiny allowed a minor to make decisions about child-care and whether to give a child up for adoption — decisions that had potentially deleterious consequences for the minor's long term mental and physical health. The Lungren court held that:

> It is particularly difficult to reconcile the defendant's contention — that parental or judicial involvement in the abortion decision is necessary to protect a minor's emotional and

[1] Christian Lawyers Association II (supra) at 528.

[2] Ibid.

[3] As the case was decided on exception, the Christian Lawyers Association may amend their defective claim and proceed with a constitutional challenge. They are unlikely to proceed with the claim as it is presently conceived. As presently conceived, the Christian Lawyers Association's constitutional complaint is underpinned by the notion that a parent has a right to veto a minor's termination of pregnancy, for any reason at all and irrespective of the circumstances giving rise to the pregnancy. No exceptions are contemplated. No suggestion is made that this discretion must be exercised wisely nor of the circumstances under which the veto may be exercised. This violates a minor's right to procreative autonomy. To require parental consent in circumstances of parental rape or incest could never be in the best interests of a child. The order sought by the Christian Lawyers Association, which they suggest is necessary to cure the constitutional omission, would in fact render the legislation unconstitutional. The Christian Lawyers Association proposes parental consultation as an alternative requirement. This requirement would be at odds with the basis for the primary cause of action, namely that a minor is never capable of giving informed consent for an abortion. The suggested requirement of parental consultation is underpinned by the notion that a child is capable of giving informed consent whereas a requirement of parental consent is not.

[4] 2 See Gillick v West Norfolk and Wisbech Area Health Authority and Another [1988] All ER 402, 409 (HL)(Supports approach that is consistent with procreative autonomy and evolving capacity of minors in respect of access to reproductive health services.)

[5] 940 P2d 797 (Cal Sup Ct 1997).

> psychological health — with these statutory provisions authorizing a minor who has given birth to consent, on her own, to the adoption of her child. The decision to relinquish motherhood after giving birth would seem to have at least as great a potential to cause long-lasting sadness and regret as the decision not to bear a child in the first place.[1]

Mojapelo J's approach in Christian Lawyers II likewise recognises that Parliament has made a rational legislative choice in enacting the provisions of the Choice Act relating to minors and that this choice respects the autonomy of minors to make important reproductive decisions.

37.7 RELIGION

FC s 15 protects everyone's right to freedom of conscience, religion, thought, belief and opinion. Taken together, and read with FC s 31, these rights protect the moral autonomy of both groups and individuals. When a state prohibits abortion, it invariably imposes a particular conception of morality that encroaches upon the moral autonomy of women protected by FC s 15.[2] However the converse is not true. The Choice Act does not coerce anyone into having an abortion, and therefore does not infringe the right to religious freedom.

Rights of conscience do, however, protect health workers who refuse to perform abortions because of their beliefs or opinions about abortion. This right is subject to certain limitations. For example, a health worker cannot refuse to perform an abortion where it is necessary to save the life of the woman concerned or to alleviate her pain. This proviso does not violate the right to freedom of conscience or religion of providers because it is grounded in the 'double effect' doctrine. This doctrine provides that any medical intervention which has a good objective, such as preserving a patient's life, may be performed despite the fact that it can only be done at the expense of what is believed to be an unavoidable harmful effect. Similarly, rights of conscience do not permit health workers to misinform or to fail to inform women of their rights in relation to the Act.[3] In other jurisdictions the right to conscientious objection has been narrowly interpreted. It protects the conscience of health workers who perform the actual procedure, not the conscience of every person involved.[4]

The right not to be unfairly discriminated against on the basis of religion, conscience and belief is also entrenched in the Employment Equity Act (EEA)[5] and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination (PEPUDA).[6] These Acts provide a basis for health workers to challenge unfair discrimination by an employer in respect of conscientious objection, or an

[1] Child Care Act 74 of 1983 s 18(4)(d)(Permits a minor to consent to the adoption of her child.)
[2] P Farlam 'Freedom of Religion' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 43.
[3] See § 37.9 infra.
[4] Janaway v Salford Health Authority [1988] 3 All ER 1079 (HL).
[5] Act 55 of 1998.
[6] Act 4 of 2000.

employer's failure to prevent such unfair discrimination.[1] PEPUDA also protects health workers from unfair discrimination from co-workers and other private persons. A health worker who assists in the performance of terminations and suffers victimisation or discrimination from colleagues who object to terminations may institute a complaint in terms of PEPUDA.

Contraceptive coverage laws have been challenged in the United States on the basis that they violate the religious beliefs of Catholic charitable entities. In Catholic Charities of Sacramento, Inc v The Superior Court of of Sacramento County,[2] a Catholic Church affiliated employer challenged the Women's Contraception Equity Act (WCEA).[3] The WCEA was enacted by the legislature in 1999 to eliminate gender discrimination in health care benefits and to improve access to prescription contraceptives. The WCEA requires employers that offer coverage for prescription drugs to cover prescription contraceptives. However, it includes an exception for religious employers that enables them to exclude coverage for 'contraceptive methods that are contrary to the religious employer's religious tenets.' Catholic Charities did not qualify as a 'religious employer' under the WCEA because it did not meet the four criteria of the definition of 'religious employer'.[4] The Catholic Charities Court upheld the constitutionality of the WCEA on the grounds that the WCEA was designed to remedy gender discrimination and did not interfere with the free exercise of religion. In Catholic Charities of the Diocese of Albany v Serio, a New York Supreme Court heard a constitutional challenge to similar provisions in New York's Women's Health and Wellness Act (WHWA).[5] The New York Supreme Court upheld the WHWA on the grounds that it was narrowly tailored to effect the purpose of improving healthcare for women and ending discrimination against women in healthcare coverage. The Serio Court also held that the Act's 'narrow exception serves to protect the rights and health of large numbers of employees who do not share their employer's religious views.'[6] In our secular society, the religious views of employers and health workers should not be imposed upon women in a manner that impinges upon constitutional rights to reproductive autonomy.

[1] See EEA s 60(3)(Provides that if an employer failed to take necessary steps to deal with unfair discrimination, and it is proved that the employee has contravened the relevant provisions, the employer must be deemed also to have contravened that provision.) See also Ntsabo v Real Security CC (2003) 24 ILJ 2341, 2377F, 2378A (LC).

[2] 85 P 3d 67(Cal 2004)..

[3] California Health & Safety Code 1367.25 and California Insurance Code 0123.196.

[4] A 'religious employer' includes an entity for which each of the following is true: '(a) The inculcation of religious values is the purpose of the entity; (b) The entity primarily employs persons who share the religious tenets of the entity; (c) The entity serves primarily persons who share the religious tenets of the entity; (d) The entity is a non-profit organization.'

[5] RJI No. 01-03-072905 (NY Sup Ct 2003)(New York Supreme Courts are the lowest courts in the State, not, as the name suggests, the highest.)

[6] Ibid at 17.

37.8 DIGNITY[1]

FC s 10 provides that everyone 'has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected'.[2] The denial of the right to choose an abortion infringes the right of a woman to human dignity. In Morgenthaler, Wilson J asserted that:

> The right to reproduce or not to reproduce which is the issue in this case is one such right and is properly perceived as an integral part of modern women's struggle to assert her dignity and worth as a human being.[3]

Denying a woman the freedom to make and to act upon decisions concerning reproduction treats her as a means to an end and strips her of her dignity. The right to dignity twinned with the right to life raises vexed issues with regard to the quality of life of a woman who must bring an unplanned pregnancy to term. The consequences of an unwanted pregnancy forced to term impacts not only upon a woman's quality of life but often that of her existing family and children, the newborn, and society as a whole. Access to reproductive health care services, including abortion services, enhances the quality of life of all these individuals.

Denise Myerson argues that because the concepts of human dignity, equality and freedom function differently in limitations analysis and rights analysis, even if the foetus is not a rights bearer, consideration still needs to be given as to whether the values of human dignity, equality and freedom operate as a constitutional constraint on legislation governing access to abortion. She suggests that the value of human dignity is most obviously under threat when abortion is permitted, because the destruction of foetal life, which has intrinsic value, threatens human dignity. The value of human dignity in the context of foetal life suggests permitting abortion up until the point of viability. Meyerson concludes that the Choice Act probably strikes just the right balance between these competing considerations.[4]

37.9 ACCESS TO HEALTHCARE

FC s 27(1)(a) provides that everyone has the 'right to have access to health care services, including reproductive health care services'. FC s 27(2) provides that the 'state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources to achieve the progressive realisation of these rights'. The Final Constitution does not guarantee a right to health, only the qualified right of access to health care services. However, the right of access to health care services and the related right to health in international law must be considered when interpreting this section.[5] Articles 10 and 12 of the Women's Convention explicitly protect

[1] See D Cornell 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, August 2005) Chapter 36.

[2] S v Makwanyane & another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC).

[3] R v Morgenthaler (1988) 44 DLR (4th) 385, 491.

[4] D Myerson (1999) 116 SALJ 50, 56–57. See § 37.2 infra.

[5] D Bilchitz 'Health' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, August 2005) Chapter 56A.

equal access of women to reproductive health care services. Other health provisions in international law implicitly protect reproductive health by protecting both women and the children they bear.

Reproductive health is the condition in which the reproductive process is accomplished in a state of complete mental, physical and social well-being. It is not merely the absence of disease or disorders of the reproductive process. Reproductive health therefore implies that people have the ability to practice and to enjoy 'safe' sexual relations. It further implies that women can go safely through pregnancy and childbirth and should be assured that the conditions necessary for infant survival, growth and healthy development exist.[1] Access to safe abortion services contributes to reproductive health through the reduction of maternal morbidity and mortality.

37.10 Access to Information

FC s 32 provides everyone with a right of access to information held by the state and required for the exercise or protection of his or her rights. Moreover, it extends the application of the right to other persons and provides for the enactment of national legislation to give effect to the right.[2]

Article 10(h) of the Women's Convention states that the right to access to information means that women have the right 'to specific educational information to help to ensure the health and well-being of families, including information and advice on family planning.' Lack of access to information about reproductive health will prevent women from exercising their right to reproductive decision-making, which includes making informed choices, and this will consequently limit the control that they have over their bodies.

The state's failure to provide information about reproductive health could be an actionable offence. In Brownfield v Daniel Freeman Marina Hospital, the Court of Appeal of California held that a rape survivor who was denied access to information concerning emergency contraception by a Catholic hospital could sue for medical malpractice.[3] The hospital asserted that providing the morning-after pill constituted performing an abortion. The Brownfield Court concluded that this treatment constituted prevention (ie. birth control) rather than a termination of pregnancy[4] and that 'a women's right to control her treatment must prevail over [the hospital's] moral and religious convictions.'[5] The Brownfield Court reasoned that the duty to disclose information about reproductive health arises from the fact that an adult of sound mind has > the right, in the exercise of control over [her] own body, to determine whether to submit to lawful medical treatment. Meaningful exercise of this right is possible only to the extent that

[1] See R Cook 'Human Rights and Reproductive Self-Determination' (1995) 44 American University LR 975, 1002.

[2] See J Klaaren and G Penfold 'Access to Information' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2002) Chapter 61.

[3] 208 Cal App 3d 405, 412–414 (1989) ('Brownfield')

[4] See also Margaret S v Edwards 488 F Supp 181 (EDLa 1980)('[A]bortion as it is commonly understood, does not include the IUD, the 'morning-after' pill, or, for example, birth control pills.') > patients are provided with adequate information upon which to base an intelligent decision with regard to the option available.[1]

[5] Brownfield (supra) at 6.

The Choice Act demands that medical practitioners and midwives provide women with information concerning their rights in relation to the Act. In other jurisdictions, medical practitioners who refuse to perform a termination are advised to provide woman with information about facilities where they can obtain a termination. Our courts will have to decide whether this clause is a reasonable and justifiable limitation upon the freedom of conscience of health workers.[2]

37.11 Freedom of Expression

Abortion implicates the right to freedom of expression in so far as the dissemination of information assists or dissuades women from terminating a pregnancy. In Africa Christian Action v Marie Stopes South Africa, the Advertising Standards Authority heard argument that the advertising of 'safe' and 'pain free' abortions is misleading and offensive and that there was no evidence to substantiate such claims.[3] The Advertising Standards Authority Appeal Committee dismissed the complaint. The Committee concluded that there was sufficient evidence to substantiate Marie Stopes' advertising of abortions as 'safe' and 'pain free'.[4]

In relation to whether the advertisement was misleading and offensive, the Committee ruled that having regard to the constitutional right of reproductive autonomy and a woman's statutory rights under the Choice Act, it cannot be said that this advertisement caused widespread offence. Although the advertising may

[1] Brownfield (supra) at 8.

[2] See § 37.12 infra.

[3] Africa Christian Action v Marie Stopes South Africa (Advertising Standards Authority Final Appeal Committee, 22 April 2004) available at www.wlce.co.za/litigation/Heads%20ArgumentMarieStopes.pdf (accessed on 7 June 2005)('African Christian Action').

[4] Ibid at paras 10.2–10.5. The Committee relied on the strict requirements in the Choice Act for the approval of designated abortion facilities, similar World Health Organisation standards and evidence from the World Health Organisation that abortion when performed by trained healthcare providers with proper equipment, correct technique and sanitary standards is one of the safest medical procedures. The Committee also considered the constitutional protection afforded to reproductive decision-making and the preamble to the Choice Act which provides for access to safe, effective, affordable and acceptable methods of fertility regulation. Marie Stopes produced evidence to demonstrate that conscious sedation is a technique to reduce the pain and anxiety associated with a TOP. The Committee concluded that the average reasonable person knows that the phrases 'safe and unsafe abortions' are used in the context of terminating a pregnancy by persons with the necessary skills in an acceptable medical environment compared with termination by persons without the necessary skills in an environment that fails to meet acceptable medical standards. A reasonable person would know that every medical or surgical procedure by its nature connotes risk, and that errors of judgment in carrying out the procedure, or post-operative complications may render the procedure itself unsafe. The record included the Department of Health's view that 'any restriction on advertising abortion may prevent women from obtaining much needed information about the availability of safe and high quality abortion services in their vicinity, thus denying them the opportunity to make informed choices.' The Committee concluded that in weighing up these interests, the balance must favour the respondent's interest in informing society that they do provide a 'safe' abortion service.

be offensive to certain segments of our society, such offence does not meet the stringent requirements of the relevant test.[1] The Committee held that:

> Even if it were found that the advertisement is offensive one would have to balance the right of freedom of expression against the offensiveness to public values in the context of an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom.'[2]

In Open Door and Dublin Well Women and others v Ireland, the applicants complained that an injunction issued by the Irish Supreme Court ordering that the applicants, 'their servants or agents be perpetually restrained from assisting pregnant women within the jurisdiction to travel abroad to obtain abortions by referral to a clinic, by making for them any travel arrangements, or by informing them of the identity and location of and the method of communication with a specified clinic or clinics or otherwise' impaired their freedom of expression.[3] The European Court of Human Rights ruled that the issuing of the injunction constituted an infringement of Article 10's right to freedom of expression.[4] Although the restriction pursued the legitimate aim of the protection of morals — of which the protection of the right to life of the unborn in Ireland is but one aspect — the injunction preventing applicants from receiving or imparting information about abortion facilities outside Ireland was disproportionate to the aim pursued.[5] The counselling of pregnant women neither advocated nor encouraged abortion, the Court observed, but was confined to an explanation of the available options. Furthermore, the injunction was found to be ineffective in protecting the right to life of the unborn since it did not prevent large numbers of Irish women from continuing to obtain abortions in Great Britain.[6] In fact, the Court found that the injunction created a risk to the health of those women seeking abortions at a later stage in their pregnancy due to a lack of proper counselling and appropriate medical supervision.[7]

37.12 LIMITATIONS

The purpose of the Choice Act is to provide for early, safe and legal abortion. It provides a legal framework for women to exercise their reproductive rights in a [1] African Christian Action (supra) at para 12.

[2] Ibid at para 13.1.
[3] 14234/88 [1992] ECHR 68 ('Open Door').
[4] Article 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights provides:
1. Everyone has the right to freedom of expression. This right shall include freedom to hold opinions and to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers.
2. The exercise of these freedoms, since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society, in the interests of national security, territorial integrity or public safety, for the prevention of disorder or crime, for the protection of health or morals, for the protection of the reputation or rights of others, for preventing the disclosure of information received in confidence, or for maintaining the authority and impartiality of the judiciary.'
[5] Open Door (supra) at para 73.
[6] Ibid at para 76.
[7] Ibid at para 77.

responsible manner. In so doing it also limits the right to terminate a pregnancy in certain important respects. For example, abortion on request is available only in the first 12 weeks of gestation, and on limited grounds up until 20 weeks.[1] Some pro-choice activists argued that 14 and 24 weeks were more appropriate time limits.[2] However, as registered midwives will also be able to perform the termination in the first 12 weeks, a compromise around an earlier date is not unreasonable.

After 12 weeks the decision is no longer the woman's alone. The decision is then shared by the woman and a medical practitioner. The latter must be of the opinion that the pregnant woman falls within one of the specified grounds.[3] This balances the need for later abortions, particularly for young women or rape survivors who may not realize they are pregnant until an advanced stage of pregnancy, and the need to encourage women who present early to act in the interests of their own health and well-being.

The availability of abortion after 20 weeks of pregnancy is severely curtailed.[4] In other jurisdictions late terminations are rare.[5] The restrictions contained in the Choice Act are an attempt to balance the increasingly compelling interests of the foetus at and after viability.[6]

Abortion is often treated as a litmus test when individuals are assessed as to their suitability for the bench. But a litmus test of what? I'd like to suggest that a democracy — and the individuals citizens therein — can have its moral maturity measured by the reproductive rights its secures for women. Democracy is, after all, grounded in a belief that individuals can and, indeed, ought to become autonomous, self-governing moral agents. Only a regime that accords women meaningful reproductive rights can claim to treat the better half of its population seriously as citizens and decision-makers.[7] In Morgenthaler, Wilson J roundly condemned the criminalization of abortion in Canada for this very reason: it failed to treat women as autonomous human beings worthy of the equal concern and respect demanded by the Charter. By so linking liberty and equality rights, Wilson's judgment in Morgenthaler provides persuasive authority for the proposition that the South African state cannot simply subordinate the physical integrity and moral autonomy of women to other state interests without doing violence to the

[1] Because it is difficult to predict with accuracy the actual date of conception, the date is counted from the 'gestation of pregnancy', which means from the first day of the last menstrual period ('LMP'). Many women will only conceive in the 14-day period after the LMP. Accordingly, many women will only be 10 and 18 weeks pregnant respectively, at 12 and 20 weeks' gestation.

[2] See ARAG Freedom of Choice (Abortion) Bill.

[3] See § 37.1 supra (Discusses specified grounds).

[4] Choice Act s 2(1)(c).

[5] In 1992, only 53 out of approximately 160 000 terminations in the UK occurred after 24 weeks, 50 because of severe foetal handicap and 3 to prevent grave permanent injury to the physical or mental health of the pregnant woman. See Office of the Population Census & Survey (UK). Research indicates that foetuses do not have a conscious appreciation of pain before 26 weeks of gestation. See also 'For Debate: Do Foetuses Feel Pain?' 313 British Medical Journal (28 September 1996) 795.

[6] See § 37.3 infra (Reproductive technology is constantly changing and the law must be sufficiently flexible to be able to respond to these changes.)

[7] See R Copelon 'Sexual and Reproductive Rights?' in The Constitution of South Africa from a Gender Perspective (1995) 233.

very conception of citizenship to which the Final Constitution and the Bill of Rights seeks to give birth.[1]

The Choice Act could have been more permissive. It is certainly not the least restrictive means for providing early, safe and legal abortion.[2] That said, Parliament and the Ministry of Health consulted widely and debated the proposed Bill at length prior to its promulgation. The regulatory framework of the Choice Act reflects a rational and a democratic choice consistent with the 'objective normative value system' manifest in our Bill of Rights.[3]

[1] Morgenthaler (supra) at 25.

[2] See FC s 36(1)(e).

[3] During 1995, written and oral submissions were made to a multi-party Ad Hoc Select Committee on Abortion and Sterilization. The National Assembly Portfolio Committee on Health also invited written comments and heard oral submissions over three days on the Termination of Pregnancy Bill. The Bill was tabled in Parliament on 17 September 1996. See ARAG Newsletter (November 1996).

38 Privacy

David McQuoid-Mason

38.1 Introduction: The meaning of privacy 38-1
38.2 Common-law right to privacy 38-2
(a) Essentials for liability 38-3
(i) Wrongfulness 38-3
(ii) Fault 38-4
(aa) Intention or animus injuriandi 38-4
(bb) Negligence by the mass media 38-5
(iii) Invasion of privacy 38-6
(aa) Intrusions and interferences with private life . 38-7
(bb) Publication of private facts 38-7
(cc) False light 38-8
(dd) Appropriation 38-9
(b) Remedies 38-9
(i) Damages 38-9
(ii) Interdicts 38-10
(iii) Retraction and apology 38-11
(c) Defences 38-12
(i) Defences excluding wrongfulness 38-12
(aa) Truth for the public benefit 38-12
(bb) Fair comment 38-13
(cc) Qualified privilege 38-14
(dd) No closed list of defences 38-15
(ee) 'Reasonable publication' as a defence 38-16
(ii) Defences excluding intention 38-17
(aa) Mistake 38-17
(bb) Jest 38-17

(cc) Rixa 38-18
(dd) No closed list of defences 38-18
(ee) Rebuttal of negligence by mass media 38-18
38.3 Constitutional right to privacy 38-19
(a) Elements for a constitutional invasion of privacy 38-20
(i) Was there an infringement of a constitutional right to privacy? 38-21
(aa) Privacy rights protecting personal autonomy . 38-22
(A) Pornography 38-23
(B) Sexual relationships 38-24
(C) Prostitution 38-24
(bb) Privacy rights protecting information 38-25
(ii) Unlawful searches and seizures 38-28
(iii) Infringements of private communications 38-31
(iv) Fault not required 38-34
(b) Remedies 38-35
(i) Constitutional damages 38-36
(ii) Interdicts 38-37
(iii) Declarations of invalidity 38-38
(iv) Exclusion of improperly obtained evidence 38-38
(v) Any other 'appropriate relief' 38-38
(c) Defences 38-39
38.4 Privacy and Juristic Persons 38-40
38.5 Privacy and Limitations analysis 38-41
(a) Limitation of personal autonomy privacy 38-41
(b) Limitation of informational privacy 38-42

38.1 Introduction: The Meaning of Privacy

Section 14 of the Final Constitution provides:

> 'Everyone has the right to privacy, which includes the right not to have —
> (a) their person or home searched;
> (b) their property searched;
> (c) their possessions seized; or
> (d) the privacy of their communications infringed.'[1]

Privacy has a variety of connotations,[2] has been described as 'an amorphous and elusive' concept,[3] and has been closely identified with the concept of identity.[4] Whatever its actual extension is, at the very least, the right to privacy embraces the right to be free from intrusions and interference by the state and others in one's personal life. Such freedom from interference may require that a citizen be free from unauthorized disclosures of information about his or her personal life.[5] This second connotation of privacy implies that individuals have control not only over who communicates with them but also who has access to the flow of information about them.[6]

Privacy, like other rights, is not absolute.[7] The 'inner sanctum' of a person (eg, family life, sexual preference and home environment) may be shielded from invasion by conflicting rights of the community. However, as a person moves into

[1] The Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC'). The wording in s 13 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC') is substantially the same: 'Every person shall have the right to his or her personal privacy, which shall include the right not to be subject to searches of his or her person, home or property, the seizure of private possessions or the violation of private communications.'

[2] See AF Westin Privacy and Freedom (1967) 7 ('the voluntary and temporary withdrawal of a person from the general society through physical and psychological means, either in a state of solitude or small group intimacy or, when among larger groups, in a condition of anonymity or reserve'). Cf Universiteit van Pretoria v Tommie Meyer Films (Edms) Bpk 1977 (4) SA 376, 348-5 (T). See also International Commission of Jurists Conclusions of the Nordic Conference on the Right to Privacy (1967) (Nordic Conference defined privacy as 'the right to be let alone to live one's own life with the minimum degree of interference'); Olmstead v United States 277 US 438, 478, 48 SCt 564 (1928) (Brandeis J dissenting) ('the right to be let alone–the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men'); J Neethling Die Reg op Privaatheid (1976) 287 ('n individuele lewens-toestand van afsondering van openbaarheid'). Cf National Media Ltd & another v Jooste 1996 (3) SA 262, 271 (A). See also J Burchell Personality Rights and Freedom of Expression: The Modern Actio Injuriarum (1998) 365 ('Burchell Personality Rights').

[3] Bernstein v Bester NO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC) at para 65 ('Bernstein').

[4] Ibid.

[5] Case v Minister of Safety and Security 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC) at para 91.

[6] D J McQuoid-Mason The Law of Privacy in South Africa (1977) 99 ('McQuoid-Mason Privacy'). Cf J Neethling J M, Potgieter & P J Visser Neethling's Law of Personality (4th edition 1996) 243 ('Neethling et al Law of Personality'): ('privacy can be infringed only by acquaintance with personal facts by outsiders contrary to the determination and will of the person whose right is infringed, and such acquaintance can take place in two ways only, namely through intrusion (or acquaintance with private facts) and disclosure (or revelation of private facts)').

[7] Cf Case v Minister of Safety and Security (supra) at para 106.

communal relations and activities such as business[1] and social interaction, the scope of personal space shrinks accordingly.[2] This diminished personal space does not entail that people involved in business or social interactions no longer have a right to privacy:[3] As Neethling, Potgieter and Visser have argued:

> Privacy is an individual condition of life characterized by seclusion from the public and publicity. This implies an absence of acquaintance with the individual or his personal affairs in this state.[4]

Thus a right to privacy encompasses the competence to determine 'the destiny of private facts'. This determination of destiny, in turn, embraces the right to decide 'when and under what conditions private facts may be made public'.

38.2 Common-Law Right to Privacy

Section 14[5] creates a constitutional right to privacy. The supremacy of the Constitution does not mean that all previous notions of privacy will be forgotten and fall into disuse. The courts will inevitably retain those existing common-law actions which are in harmony with the values of the Constitution.[6] For instance, it is unlikely that in the immediate future the courts will develop an independent 'constitutional delict' of invasion of privacy, unless circumstances arise where such invasion cannot be accommodated by the common law and the courts are required to fashion some other 'appropriate remedy'.[7]

---

[1] In appropriate circumstances the right to privacy also extends to business relationships. See Haynes v Commissioner for Inland Revenue 2000 (6) BCLR 596, 613 (Tk). Despite the suggestion to the contrary. See Shelton v Commissioner for South African Revenue Services 2000 (2) SA 106, 123 (E). See also Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences v Hyundai Motor Distributors 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC) at para 17 (Langa DP assumed that businesses could sue for invasion of privacy when he said: 'The right to privacy may be claimed by any person. The present matter is concerned with the right to privacy of . . . a natural person, and nine business entities which are juristic persons'. He then went on to observe that 'what is clear is that the right to privacy is applicable, where appropriate, to a juristic person'.) See § 38.5.

[2] Bernstein (supra) at para 67.

[3] Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences v Hyundai Motor Distributors (supra) at para 16 infra: ('The right, however, does not relate solely to the individual within his or her intimate space . . . Thus, when people are in their offices, in their cars or on mobile telephones, they still retain a right to be left alone by the State unless certain conditions are satisfied.')

[4] J Neethling, JM Potgieter & PJ Visser (eds) Law of Delict (2001) 355 ('Neethling et al, Law of Delict'). Cf Bernstein (supra) at para 68.

[5] Section 13 of the Interim Constitution.

[6] Cf Gardener v Whitaker 1995 (2) SA 672, 684 (E), 1994 (5) BCLR 19 (E). It has been pointed out, however, that caution must be exercised when attempting to project common-law principles onto the interpretation of fundamental rights and their limitation: At common law the determination of whether an invasion of privacy has taken place constitutes a single inquiry, including an assessment of its unlawfulness, whereas in constitutional adjudication under the Constitution a two-stage approach must be used in deciding the constitutionality of a statute. See Bernstein (supra) at para 71 (Ackermann J). See S Woolman 'Limitations' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz, S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st edition, RS5, 1999) Chapter 12.

[7] D McQuoid-Mason 'Invasion of Privacy: Common Law v Constitutional Delict — Does It make a Difference?' (2000) Acta Juridica 227, 259-261('McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict'). See Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC) ('Fose').

South African courts have had little difficulty in recognizing a common-law action for invasion of privacy under the broad principles of the actio injuriarum.[1] A traditional definition for this delict would be 'an intentional and wrongful interference with another's right to seclusion in his [or her] private life'.[2] There is, however, no requirement of intention in cases involving the mass media.[3]

(a) Essentials for liability

For a common-law action for invasion of privacy based on the actio injuriarum to succeed, the plaintiff must prove the following essential elements: (i) wrongfulness, (ii) fault in the form of intention — or in the case of the mass media, negligence, and (iii) infringement of the plaintiff's privacy.[4]

(i) Wrongfulness

The wrongfulness of a factual infringement of privacy is judged in the light of contemporary boni mores and the general sense of justice of the community as perceived by the court.[5] In National Media Ltd & another v Jooste, Harms JA wrote:

> The boundary of a right or its infringement remains an objective question. As a general proposition, the general sense of justice does not require the protection of a fact that the interested party has no wish to keep private.[6]

It has been pointed out, however, that 'legal protection of private facts is extended to ordinary or reasonable sensibilities and not to hypersensitiveness'.[7] The courts will not protect facts 'whose disclosure will not 'cause mental distress and injury to anyone possessed of ordinary feelings and intelligence'.'[8] Put slightly differently, even if a person feels subjectively that his or her rights have been impaired under the actio injuriarum, such impairment will not be unlawful unless a person of ordinary sensibilities would have regarded the conduct as offensive.

---

[1] O'Keeffe v Argus Printing and Publishing Co Ltd & Another 1954 (3) SA 244, 248 (C) ('O'Keeffe'); Cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 86. See S v A & another 1971 (2) SA 293, 297 (T)('S v A'): '[T]here can be no doubt that a person's right to privacy is one of . . . 'those real rights, those rights in rem related to personality, which every free man is entitled to enjoy' '. See also Bernstein (supra) at para 68.

[2] McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 100. The courts have found reference to the American courts useful when considering this the contours and the requirements of this action. O'Keeffe (supra) at 249; cf Rhodesian Printing and Publishing Co Ltd v Duggan & another 1975 (1) SA 590, 593-4 (RA)('Rhodesian Printing'). See generally McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 35 for relevant United States developments. See also Bernstein (supra) at para 75.

[3] See infra § 38.2 (a)(ii)(bb).

[4] Cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 33, 100.

[5] Financial Mail (Pty) Ltd & others v Sage Holdings Ltd & another 1993 (2) SA 451,462 (A) ('Financial Mail'); Bernstein (supra) at para 68. See also O'Keeffe (supra) at 249; S v A (supra) at 299; Rhodesian Printing (supra) at 595; McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 118-22.

[6] See National Media Ltd & another v Jooste 1996 (2) SA 262, 271 (A) (Harms JA).

[7] Ibid.

[8] Financial Mail (supra) at 462; National Media Ltd & another v Jooste (supra) at 270.

The test for injury in these cases is objective.[1] This subjective-objective distinction tracks the analysis of the Constitutional Court[2]. The Court has held that a person's subjective expectation of privacy will only have been wrongfully violated if the court is satisfied that such expectation was objectively reasonable.[3]

In determining the current modes of thought and values of any community, the courts may be influenced by its statute law.[4] It is also clear that the Constitution — 'and its spirit, purport and objects' — will play a major role in determining the 'new' boni mores of South African society.[5] In a sense, the Bill of Rights 'crystallizes' the boni mores of society by providing that an infringement of the right to privacy in the Constitution is prima facie unlawful.[6]

(ii) Fault

The defendant must have acted intentionally or with animus injuriandi.[7] In a case involving the media, negligence may be sufficient. [8]

(aa) Intention or animus injuriandi

Animus injuriandi in defamation and related wrongs requires the intention to injure and consciousness of wrongfulness.[9] The intention to injure refers to the direction of the wrongdoer's will towards the conduct. Consciousness of wrongfulness means that the defendant must know that his or her conduct is wrong.[10] The principles governing intention in delict are similar to those in criminal law: intention may be categorized as dolus directus, dolus indirectus, and dolus eventualis.[11] Once the other elements of an invasion of privacy have been proved, animus injuriandi will be presumed.[12]

---

[1] Cf De Lange v Costa 1989 (2) SA 857, 860 (A); Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 329.

[2] McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict' (supra) at 232.

[3] Bernstein (supra) at para 75. See below § 38.3*(a)*(i).

[4] Rhodesian Printing (supra) at 595.

[5] Gardener v Whitaker 1995 (2) SA 672, 684 (E), 1994 (5) BCLR 19 (E) (Froneman J). For a discussion of the direct and indirect application of the Chapter on Fundamental Rights to the common law, see S Woolman 'Application' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st edition, RS5, 1999) §§ 10.3*(a)(v)* and 10.8

[6] Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 117. Cf Neethling et al Law of Personality (supra) at 239, n 7.

[7] O'Keeffe (supra) at 247; Kidson v SA Associated Newspapers Ltd 1957 (3) SA 461, 468 (W); Mhlongo v Bailey & another 1958 (1) SA 370, 372 (W); C v Minister of Correctional Services 1996 (4) SA 292,306 (T). Cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 113-5.

[8] Cf National Media Ltd v Bogoshi 1998 (4) SA 1196, 1213 (SCA), 1999 (1) BCLR 1 (SCA), [1998] 4 All SA 347 (A) ('Bogoshi'). See below § 38.2*(a)*(ii)(bb).

[9] Cf Minister of Justice v Hofmeyr 1993 (3) SA 131, 154 (A).

[10] Neethling et al Law of Delict (supra) at 125.

[11] Neethling et al Law of Delict (supra) at 123-125. Dolus eventualis has been applied to electronic surveillance by private detectives. S v A (supra) at 299.

[12] Kidson v SA Associated Newspapers Ltd (supra) at 468. It has been suggested that where the plaintiff can prove patrimonial loss he or she should be entitled to sue for a negligent invasion of privacy under the lex aquilia. See McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 253. See also H D Krause 'The Right to Privacy in Germany — Pointers for American Legislation?' (1965) Duke LJ 481, 516 (In Germany liability for negligent invasions of privacy should be 'limited to situations in which the plaintiff can show tangible damage').

For policy reasons the courts have not required the element of consciousness of wrongfulness as an element of animus injuriandi in wrongs affecting the liberty of the individual: wrongful arrest and detention or detention without a warrant or a wrongful attachment of goods.[1] In such cases, it is not open to the defendants to argue that they were ignorant of the wrongfulness of their acts. [2] Strict liability is imposed.[3] It has been suggested that a possible effect of the Constitution on the concept of animus injuriandi might be to regard certain of the rights mentioned in s 14 (such as unlawful searches and seizures) as so fundamental and important that strict liability should be imposed in the same manner as the common law imposition of strict liability for unlawful arrest, detention and attachment.[4]

(bb) Negligence by the mass media

The Supreme Court of Appeal has suggested that in defamation cases 'the media should not be treated on the same footing as ordinary members of the public by permitting them to rely on the absence of animus injuriandi'.[5] The court went on to say that 'given the credibility which the media enjoys amongst large sections of the community,' it would be 'entirely reasonable' to hold that 'the media are liable unless they were not negligent'.[6] Similar considerations apply to publications resulting in invasions of privacy by the media.[7] The adoption of the 'reasonableness' test regarding the conduct of the media may not, it has been opined, necessarily mean that the court endorsed negligence as a requirement for liability by the media.[8] However, the requirement of negligent conduct by the media to determine liability seems to accord with the constitutional imperative of freedom of the press.[9] The controversy has arisen because the courts tend to blur the questions of wrongfulness and fault and because the criterion of 'reasonableness' can be used in two senses: (1) during the policy-based inquiry into whether the defendant's conduct was unlawful; and (2) during the defence stage to determine whether the defendant's conduct was justifiable.[10] The Constitutional Court has since confirmed that the latter applies and that 'reasonable publication' is another one of the crystallized defences available to the media.[11] It did not, however,

[1] Minister of Justice v Hofmeyr (supra) at 154-5; Todt v Ipser 1993 (3) SA 577, 588 (A); C v Minister of Correctional Services (supra) at 306. Cf McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict' (supra) at 233.

[2] Todt v Ipser (supra) at 588.

[3] Neethling et al Law of Personality (supra) at 129.

[4] McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict' (supra) at 233-234. Cf Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 117-118.

[5] Bogoshi (supra) at 1213. See also Khumalo and Others v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC) ('Khumalo').

[6] Ibid. Cf McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict' (supra) at 234.

[7] Cf Jansen van Rensburg v Kruger 1993 (4) SA 842, 849-850 (A).

[8] See JR Midgley 'Media Liability for Defamation' (1999) 116 SALJ 211, 215.

[9] Section 16(1). See Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 226-227.

[10] Cf Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 388.

[11] Khumalo (supra) at paras 18-19. See infra § 38.2*(c)*(i), for the other crystallized defences of truth and for the public benefit, fair comment and qualified privilege.

comment on the fact that a High Court has suggested that the reasonable publication defence should be extended to other situations not only publications by the media.[1]

The suggestion that the mass media may only use those defences that negate wrongfulness,[2] will have to be revisited in the light of s 16[3] — freedom of expression — of the Constitution. The courts must now weigh up competing constitutional imperatives of the right to privacy against the freedom of the press.[4] In media cases, the Constitutional Court has held that the 'reasonable publication' defence strikes an equitable balance between freedom of expression and the duty of editors and journalists to act with due care and respect for the individual's dignity.[5]

(iii) Invasion of privacy

In South Africa, the courts have regarded invasion of privacy as an impairment of dignitas[6] under the actio injuriarum. Privacy thus includes 'those rights relating to . . . dignity'.[7] Although the Constitution mentions 'dignity' and 'privacy' separately,[8] the Constitutional Court has stated that they are linked.[9] Invasions of privacy may be broadly divided into intrusions or interferences with private life, and disclosures and acquisition of information.[10] The latter are sometimes called substantive and informational privacy rights.[11]

---

[1] Marais v Groenewald 2001 (1) SA 634, 646 (T), [2001] 2 All SA 578 (T). Cf JR Midgley 'Intention Remains the Fault Criterion under the Actio Injuriarum' (2001) 118 SALJ 433, 440; JR Midgley 'Media Liability for Defamation' (supra) at 223.

[2] See below § 38.2*(c)*(i).

[3] Section 15 of the Interim Constitution.

[4] Khumalo (supra) at para 25: 'In particular, the values of human dignity, freedom and equality'.

[5] Khumalo (supra) at para 43.

[6] O'Keeffe (supra); Universiteit van Pretoria v Tommie Meyer Films (Edms) Bpk 1977 (4) SA 376, 383-4 (T), Universiteit van Pretoria v Tommie Meyer Films (Edms) Bpk 1979 (1) SA 441, 455 (A); Nell v Nell 1990 (3) SA 889, 896 (T); Sage Holdings & another v Financial Mail (Pty) Ltd & others 1991 (2) SA 117, 129-31 (W), Sage Holdings & another v Financial Mail (Pty) Ltd & others 1993 (2) SA 451, 462-3 (A); McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 124. See, however, J Neethling Persoonlikheidsreg (3rd Edition 1991) 223-6, where he describes privacy as an independent right.

[7] O'Keeffe (supra) at 246. Cf McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict' (supra) at 229.

[8] Sections 10 and 14 respectively. Cf Neethling et al Law of Personality (supra) at 242 n 40: 'the express constitutional recognition of the right to privacy . . . independent of the right to dignity . . . finally lays to rest the possible equation of, and thus confusion between, these two personality rights'. See, however, O'Regan J's judgment in Khumalo (supra) at para 26: 'No sharp lines . . . can be drawn between reputation, dignitas and privacy in giving effect to the value of human dignity in our Constitution'.

[9] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC); 1998 (6) BCLR 726 (CC) at para 30.

[10] In the United States invasions of privacy tend to be divided into: (a) intrusions, (b) public disclosures of private facts, (c) placing a person in a false light, and (d) appropriation. See generally W Page Keeton, DB Dobbs, RE Keeton and DG Owen Prosser and Keeton on The Law of Torts (5th edition 1984) 851-66; McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 37-43.

[11] Cf L du Plessis & J de Ville 'Personal Rights' in D van Wyk, J Dugard, B de Villiers & D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 242.

(aa) Intrusions and interferences with private life

The courts have held the following intrusions into a person's private life or affairs or 'inner sanctum'[1] to be criminally or civilly actionable: illegally entering a private residence,[2] persistently shadowing a person,[3] secretly watching a person undress[4] or bath,[5] improperly interrogating a detainee,[6] electronically 'bugging' a person's home,[7] reading a person's private documents,[8] or correspondence,[9] taking unauthorized blood tests[10] and illegal telephone tapping.[11] The Constitution makes all of these forms of intrusions unlawful.[12] Most of these intrusions involve individuals becoming acquainted with private information about others without their consent. If such information is communicated to third parties without lawful justification, it would give rise to an action for invasion of privacy based on wrongful disclosure of private facts.[13] The list of intrusions that fall under the general rubric of invasion of privacy is not closed.[14]

(bb) Publication of private facts

Traditionally, publication of private facts may involve placing a person in a false light[15] and appropriating their image or likeness for monetary purposes.[16] These acts are dealt with as separate forms of invasion of privacy.[17] Some commentators have suggested that false light and appropriation cases should be treated as infringements of the right to identity rather than the right to privacy.[18]

---

[1] Bernstein (supra) at para 71.

[2] De Fourd v Council of Cape Town (1898) 15 SC 399, 402, police entering a brothel without a warrant; S v Boshoff & others 1981 (1) SA 393, 396 (T). Cf S v I & another 1976 (1) SA 781 (RA).

[3] Epstein v Epstein 1906 TH 87. Cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 154.

[4] R v Holliday 1927 CPD 395,401; R v Daniels 1938 TPD 312, 313; R v R 1954 (2) SA 134, 135 (N).

[5] R v Schoonberg 1926 OPD 247.

[6] Gosschalk v Rossouw 1966 (2) SA 476, 492 (C); Minister of Justice v Hofmeyr 1993 (3) SA 131 (A).

[7] S v A (supra); cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 148-9.

[8] Reid-Daly v Hickman & others 1981 (2) SA 315, 323 (ZA).

[9] S v Hammer & others 1994 (2) SACR 496, 498 (C).

[10] Seetal v Pravitha & another NO 1983 (3) SA 827, 861-862 (D); M v R 1989 (1) SA 416, 426-7 (O); Nell v Nell 1990 (3) SA 889, 895-896 (T); C v Minister of Correctional Services 1996 (4) SA 292, 300 (T). See also D v K 1997 (2) BCLR 209 (N) (Natal Provincial Division held that the constitutional protection of privacy precluded it from invoking its inherent jurisdiction to order the respondent in a paternity dispute to undergo a blood test against his will. The court held that the presumptions contained in ss 1 and 2 of the Children's Status Act 82 of 1987 adequately protected the interests of the minor child in a paternity dispute without invading the constitutionally protected privacy of the respondent.)

[11] Financial Mail (supra) at 463.

[12] FC Section 14 recognizes a general right to privacy.

[13] See below § 38.2*(a)*(iii)(bb).

[14] See McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict' (supra) at 230.

[15] See below § 38.2*(a)*(iii)(cc).

[16] See below § 38.2*(a)*(iii)(dd).

[17] Cf Page Keeton et al The Law of Torts (supra) at 863. Cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) Chapters 5-8.

[18] Neethling et al Law of Delict (supra) at 357.

A list of actionable disclosures involving publications of private facts would incorporate: disclosures concerning the contents of stolen documents,[1] unauthorized publication of a photograph of a retired schoolteacher portraying him as a young man in the company of a well-known singer,[2] publication of a story about young children abducted from the custody of their parents,[3] attempted photographing of security policemen mentioned by counsel at a trial as having been responsible for the death of a detainee,[4] the disclosure of private facts obtained by illegal telephone tapping,[5] the unauthorized publication of a photograph and story about an unmarried mother who conceived a child by a well-known rugby player,[6] unauthorised disclosure by a doctor to colleagues that his patient was suffering from AIDS, [7] and disclosing the identity of a police informer.[8] All such cases would be captured by the right to privacy in the Constitution.[9]

(cc) False light

Publishing non-defamatory but false statements about a person — eg a false newspaper story that certain married and engaged nurses 'want boyfriends', will also constitute placing a person in false light.[10] This definition of false light is a variation of a definition of publication of private facts. In both actions the facts published are not true. Such statements are not actionable under the law of defamation because there is no lowering of the plaintiff's reputation. Should the publication be deemed to fall under the right to privacy, however, it ought to be protected by the Constitution. That said, if such false light publication is regarded as an infringement of identity[11] it may not be covered as a constitutional wrong unless it is further regarded as part of dignity.[12] The preferred view is that false light cases should be regarded as invasions of privacy because such publicity has unjustifiably exposed the plaintiff to unwanted publicity.[13]

[1] Goodman v Von Moltke 1938 CPD 153. Cf Neethling Die Reg op Privaatheid (1976) 390.
[2] Mhlongo v Bailey & another 1958 (1) SA 370 (W) ('Mhlongo').
[3] Rhodesian Printing and Publishing Co Ltd v Duggan 1975 (1) SA 590 (RA).
[4] La Grange v Schoeman & others 1980 (1) SA 885 (E).
[5] Financial Mail (supra) at 463.
[6] National Media Ltd & another v Jooste 1996 (3) SA 262, 271 (A).
[7] Jansen van Vuuren & another NNO v Kruger 1993 (4) SA 842 (A).
[8] Swanepoel v Minister van Veiligheid en Sekuriteit 1999 (4) SA 549, 553 (T), [1999] 3 All SA 285 (T).
[9] FC s 14.
[10] Kidson v SA Associated Newspapers Ltd 1957 (3) SA 461 (W).
[11] See Neethling et al Law of Delict (supra) at 356-357.
[12] See FC s 10. It has been suggested that dignity should be given a broad definition to include privacy. See Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 334. The Constitutional Court has acknowledged that dignity includes identity. See National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (6) BCLR 726 (CC) at para 120 (Sachs J): ('The violation of dignity under section 10 . . . offers protection to persons in their multiple identities and capacities'.)
[13] McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict' (supra) at 231.

(dd) Appropriation

Appropriation means that a person's image or likeness is used without their consent: for example, the unauthorized use of a photograph for an advertisement.[1] Appropriation is also a variation of publication of private facts. As such, it has been suggested that appropriation is better dealt with under the right to identity.[2] Indeed, the Constitutional Court has pointed out that 'the scope of privacy has been closely related to the concept of identity'.[3] Appropriation is clearly a violation of a person's right to decide for herself who should have access to her image and likeness — something that goes to the root of individual autonomy or privacy.[4] The control of one's image should be protected under the right to privacy. However, if an appropriation is regarded as an infringement of the right to identity, then it should be protected under the right to dignity broadly construed.[5]

The Namibian High Court has held that an applicant's claim to adopt his wife's surname was not protected by the right to privacy.[6] An appropriation must be linked to a reasonable expectation of privacy.[7]

(b) Remedies

The main remedies for invasion of privacy at common law are: (i) damages and (ii) interdicts. The old common law remedy of the right to retraction, apology and reply appears to have been abrogated by disuse.[8] It could, however, be revived as 'appropriate relief' under the Constitution.[9]

(i) Damages

A plaintiff wishing to recover sentimental damages for invasion of privacy under the actio injuriarum sues for a solatium or satisfaction. She does not sue for pecuniary loss that can be accurately calculated in monetary terms.[10] Where

[1] O'Keeffe (supra).
[2] Neethling et al Law of Delict (supra) at 357.
[3] Bernstein (supra) at para 65.
[4] But see Neethling et al Law of Delict (supra) at 357 n 282, who suggest that it is a right independent of privacy. See also Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 334, who would prefer to see the exercise of individual autonomy under the rubric of dignity rather than privacy.
[5] Cf Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 334. See, generally, McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict' (supra) at 231.
[6] Muller v President of the Republic of Namibia 2000 (6) BCLR 655, 668 (NmS) (held that her name was also not protected by the right to protection of family life).
[7] For instance, the High Court has held that the use of an accused person's photograph for a photographic identification parade without his consent is not a violation of his right to privacy. See S v Zwayi 1998 (2) BCLR 242 (Ck), [1998] 1 All SA 569 (Ck), 1997 (2) SACR 772 (Ck). Cf Johan de Waal, Iain Currie and Gerhard Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (3rd edition 2000) 276.
[8] See below § 38.3*(a)*(i).
[9] FC s 38. See below § 38.3*(b)*(iv).
[10] McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict' (supra) at 231.

patrimonial loss can also be proved the plaintiff may bring a 'rolled up' action for both sentimental damages and actual pecuniary loss.[1]

When calculating damages for invasion of privacy the courts will take into account the contents, nature and extent of the publication,[2] the standing of the plaintiff,[3] and the conduct of the defendant.[4] The courts have regarded the fact that the defendant deliberately rode roughshod over the plaintiff's feelings as an aggravating factor[5] and the tendering of an apology as a mitigating factor.[6] The court may take into account further factors: the nature of the imputations, the probable consequences of the defendant's conduct, and comparable awards in other cases.[7]

The Namibian court has regarded flagrant invasions of fundamental rights and freedoms in the Namibian Constitution as an aggravating factor and have suggested that 'a liberal approach to quantum' should be adopted in such cases.[8] The South African Constitutional Court has held that additional constitutional punitive damages should not be awarded for infringements of fundamental rights and freedoms.[9] One of the main reasons advanced for rejecting punitive damages was that they blur the distinction civil and criminal law.[10] However, as I have argued elsewhere, not all egregious impairments of personality rights could result in criminal prosecutions.[11] The problem can be overcome by treating such cases as justifying aggravating compensatory damages.[12]

(ii) Interdicts

In the past, under the common law, a plaintiff has been able to obtain an interdict to restrain a proposed or continued invasion of privacy.[13] In order to obtain a final interdict the plaintiff must prove that he or she has: (i) a clear right, (ii) suffered actual injury or has a well-grounded apprehension of irreparable injury,

[1] Mathews v Young 1922 AD 492, 505.
[2] O'Keeffe (supra) at 248; cf SAAN v Yutar 1969 (2) SA 442, 458 (A).
[3] Mhlongo (supra) at 372. Cf Buthulezi v Poorter & others 1975 (4) SA 608, 613-614 (W); Smith v Die Republikein (Edms) Bpk en 'n ander 1989 (3) SA 872, 878 (SWA); Afrika v Metzler 1997 (4) SA 531, 535 (NmH).
[4] Afrika v Metzler (supra) at 535.
[5] Mhlongo (supra) at 372.
[6] Kidson v SA Associated Newpapers Ltd 1957 (3) SA 461, 468 (W).
[7] Cf Smith v Die Republikein (Edms) Bpk (supra) at 877-8.
[8] Afrika v Metzler (supra) at 539; cf McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict' (supra) at 235.
[9] Fose v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC) at paras 69-73 (Ackermann J).
[10] Ibid at para 70. See below § 38.3*(b)*(i).
[11] McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict' (supra) at 235: (the unauthorized publication of the photograph in Mhlongo (supra) and the defamation in Afrika v Metzler (supra) could not have given rise to criminal actions).
[12] Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 474; cf McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict' (supra) at 235.
[13] Epstein v Epstein 1906 TH 87, 88; Rhodesian Printing and Publishing Co Ltd v Duggan 1975 (1) SA 590, 595 (RA); Financial Mail (supra).

and (iii) that no other satisfactory remedy is available.[1] For an interim interdict the applicant must show (i) a prima facie right;[2] (ii) a well-grounded apprehension of irreparable harm if the interim relief is not granted; (iii) the balance of convenience favours the granting of the interim interdict; and (iv) the applicant has no other satisfactory remedy.[3] When granting such interdicts, fault by the defendant is irrelevant.[4]

The Constitution has now made the courts more circumspect in granting interdicts that impose prior restraints on freedom of expression. These prior restraints are regarded as presumptively invalid.[5] Otherwise, the imposition of such interdicts do not require a different approach from the previous common law position. The infringement of the freedom of expression can be dealt with during the 'balance of convenience' stage of the enquiry.[6]

(iii) Retraction and apology

The Roman-Dutch law remedy of amende honorable was thought to have fallen into disuse under South African common law.[7] It has recently been held that although the remedy may have fallen into disuse, it had not been abrogated.[8] In Mineworkers Investment Co (Pty) Ltd v Modibane, the court wrote that even if the amende honorable had never existed 'the imperatives of our times would have required its invention … [as] it is entirely consonant with the 'spirit, purports and objects' of the Bill of Rights in our Constitution'.[9] It can therefore be used in circumstances where it would provide 'appropriate relief'.[10]

The fact that a defendant has retracted the statement or apologized has been used as a mitigating factor when assessing damages.[11] However, courts have also noted that in defamation cases it is 'virtually impossible for one to restore another's good name and reputation to its former glory by a mere, at times

[1] Setlogelo v Setlogelo 1914 AD 221, 227. See McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 132.

[2] See La Grange v Schoeman & others 1980 (1) SA 885 (E)(an application for an interdict failed where a newspaper photographer unsuccessfully tried to establish that he had a prima facie right to take photographs of a policeman accused in a trial of having killed a political detainee).

[3] Hix Networking Technologies v System Publishers (Pty) Ltd 1997 (1) SA 391, 398 (A), [1996] 4 All SA 675 (A).

[4] Setlogelo v Setlogelo (supra) at 227; cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) 132; Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 490-491.

[5] Mandela v Falati 1995 (1) SA 251, 259-260 (W), 1994 (4) BCLR 1 (W).

[6] Hix Networking Technologies v System Publishers (Pty) Ltd (supra) at 400.

[7] Ward-Jackson v Cape Times Ltd 1910 WLD 257, 263; cf Kritinger v Perskorporasie van Suid-Afrika (Edms)Bpk 1981 (2) SA 373, 389 (O).

[8] Mineworkers Investment Co (Pty) Ltd v Modibane 2002 (6) SA 212 (W) at para 24.

[9] Ibid at para 28.

[10] McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict' (supra) at 236. See below § 38.3*(b)*(iv).

[11] Cf Norton v Ginsberg 1953 (4) SA 537, 540 (A).

invariably predestinated, retraction and/or apology'. [1] That said, Jonathan Burchell has suggested that a prompt and unreserved apology may also be a factor affecting the reasonableness of a publication.[2]

(c) Defences

Defences that rebut wrongfulness or animus injuriandi in the law of defamation generally also apply to invasions of privacy.[3] The same is likely true for the defences that rebut negligence in cases of defamation by mass media.

(i) Defences excluding wrongfulness

Defences rebutting unlawfulness that apply to defamation — and that might also apply to invasions of privacy — include: (a) truth for the public benefit, (b) fair comment and (c) qualified privilege.[4] This list is not closed. Because the traditional defences of truth for the public benefit, fair comment and qualified privilege do not necessarily provide adequate protection for the press,[5] the broad criterion of 'reasonable publication' by the defendant can also be used to negate unlawfulness.[6] This defence could be raised at either the policy-based initial inquiry into the lawfulness of the privacy infringement or subsequently as a special defence dealing with absence of negligence.[7] This broad policy-based approach has been adopted where a spouse invaded her adulterous husband's privacy in order to get evidence for a divorce.[8]

(aa) Truth for the public benefit

A defendant may offer a defence that the defamatory statement in question was true and for the public benefit.[9] The onus of proving truth and public benefit rests on the defendant.[10] There is no onus on the plaintiff to prove the falsity of

[1] Afrika v Metzler (supra) at 539.
[2] Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 496.
[3] Jansen van Vuuren v Kruger 1993 (4) SA 842, 849-50 (A).
[4] Ibid at 850.
[5] National Media Limited v Bogoshi 1998 (4) SA 1196,1207 (SCA), [1998] 4 All SA 347 (A), 1999 (1) BCLR 1 (SCA) ('Bogoshi').
[6] Ibid at 1211.
[7] See generally, McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict' (supra) at 239.
[8] S v I 1976 (1) SA 781, 784 (RAD), where Beadle CJ observed: 'The sole issue in this case . . . is whether, in the circumstances, the appellants were justified in peeping through the window. Again put another way, were they justified in invading the complainant's privacy in the manner they did? If they were so justified, the fact that as a necessary consequence of this invasion of privacy the complainant's dignitas was injured is an irrelevant consideration'.
[9] Khumalo and others v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC); 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC) at para 23 ('Khumalo').
[10] Bogoshi (supra) at 1215.

the published statement.[1] Similar principles apply to invasions of privacy.[2] Some commentators have suggested that the defence does not apply to invasions of privacy because privacy can only be violated if the communication concerns true facts.[3] However, that assessment does not hold for false light invasions of privacy[4] where the true facts have been falsified in a non-defamatory manner. In cases involving invasions of privacy the fact that a person is a public figure or has been catapulted into the public eye[5] may be an important consideration in determining whether the publication is for the public benefit.[6] The Constitution provides that freedom of expression includes the 'freedom to receive or impart information or ideas.'[7] This proviso will become an important factor in deciding whether the publication is for the public benefit.[8]

(bb) Fair comment

The defamation defence of fair comment may be relevant as a defence in privacy cases where the plaintiff has been portrayed in a false light because of a

[1] Khumalo (supra) at para 43; cf Selemela and others v Independent Newspaper Group Ltd and others 2002 (2) BCLR 197, 208 (NC). The court in Khumalo's case (supra) at para 43 explained the reason as follows: '[T]he defence of reasonableness developed in [Bogoshi's]case … strikes a balance between the constitutional interests of the plaintiffs and defendants. It permits a publisher who can establish truth and the public benefit to do so and avoid liability. But if a publisher cannot establish the truth or finds it disproportionately expensive or difficult to do so, the publisher may show that in all the circumstances the publication was reasonable' (O'Regan J).

[2] Cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 218-224. The statement need not be true in all respects, provided it is substantially true (ie the material allegations are true). See Johnson v Rand Daily Mails 1928 AD 190, 204. Truth alone is not a defence, but may be used in mitigation of damages. See Geyser v Pont 1968 (4) SA 67,68 (W). It has been held that 'the publication of false defamatory allegations of fact will not be regarded as unlawful if, upon a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, it is found to have been reasonable to publish the particular facts in the particular way at the particular time'. See Bogoshi (supra) at 1211. The publication of the truth must be for the public benefit. 'Public benefit' means the same thing as 'public interest' and has been described as: 'Material in which the public has an interest' — not 'what the public finds interesting'. Ibid. Cf Financial Mail (supra) at 464 (Corbett CJ) ('In my view there is a public interest in preserving confidentially in regard to private affairs and in discouraging the leaking of private and confidential information, unlawfully obtained, to the media'). The court will look at the time manner and place of publication to determine if it is for the public benefit as people should be allowed to live down their past. See Lyon v Steyn 1931 TPD 247, 251. Traditionally if it is proved that the defendant was actuated by spite or malice the defence of truth for the public benefit will fail. See Coetzee v Nel 1972 (1) SA 353, 374 (A). Although this view has been doubted on the basis that the 'truth is the truth no matter what the motives of the publisher are and the publication of truth for the public benefit does not cease to be for the public benefit simply because the publisher is prompted by some improper or ulterior motive', Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 276.

[3] Neethling et al Law of Personality (supra) at 276.

[4] Neethling et al Law of Personality (supra) at 285: (they regard such cases as falling under 'identity' not privacy. It is probably for this reason that they say that the defence of truth for the public benefit cannot apply to invasions of privacy.)

[5] Cf La Grange v Schoeman 1980 (1) SA 885, 892 (E).

[6] Cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 219-24; Neethling et al Law of Personality (supra) at 268.

[7] Section 16(1)(b).

[8] Cf Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 415.

non-defamatory comment by the defendant.[1] The constitutional imperative of freedom of expression[2] may result in the courts taking a more liberal approach concerning the interpretation of the 'fairness' requirement.

(cc) Qualified privilege

A defendant will not be liable for a defamatory statement made: (i) on a privileged occasion, where the statement is made in discharge of a duty; (ii) the statement was published during judicial or quasi-judicial proceedings; (iii) or the statement was published in a report of proceedings of courts, parliament or public bodies.[3] The same principles apply to invasions of privacy.[4]

The position of the mass media has been strengthened by the freedom of expression provisions in the Constitution.[5] It is likely that the press will be able to rely more frequently on the defence of qualified privilege than in the past. Burchell has suggested that the media have a duty to inform the public of news-worthy events, characters and conduct and that the public have a corresponding interest to be so informed.[6] However, the courts have been careful to point out that there is no special defence of qualified privilege for the media.[7]

---

[1] Cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 230. For the defence of fair comment to succeed the defendant must prove (a) the statement must be a comment (opinion) not a statement of fact; (b) the comment must be 'fair' (relevant, honest and free from malice); (c) the facts commented on must be true; and (d) the comment must be on a matter of public interest. See Crawford v Albu 1917 AD 102, 113-114; Marais v Richard 1981 (1) SA 1157 (A). A comment is an opinion not a statement of fact and the test is whether a reasonable person would regard the statement as a comment or a statement of fact. See Crawford v Albu (supra) at 127. A comment is fair if it is relevant, honest and made free from malice. See Crawford v Albu (supra) at 115. The fact that a comment is extravagant, exaggerated or prejudiced does not make it 'unfair'. See Johnson v Beckett 1992 (1) SA 762, 780–783 (A). If malice is shown the comment will no longer be fair. See Johnson v Beckett (supra) at 780, 783. The facts commented upon must be true: As in the case of truth for public benefit the facts commented upon need not be true in every minute detail. See Buthelezi v Poorter 1974 (2) SA 831, 833 (W).

[2] Section 16(1)(b).

[3] Discharge of a duty: The occasion will give rise to a qualified privileged where the person making the statement is discharging a moral, social or legal duty by communicating it to a person with a legitimate interest or duty to receive it. See de Waal v Ziervogel 1938 AD 112; O v O 1995 (4) SA 482, 492 (W). For example where a doctor may be legally obliged to make certain disclosures. Cf Jansen van Vuuren NO v Kruger 1993 (4) SA 842, 851 (A). The test is whether an ordinary, reasonable person, having regard to the relationship of the parties and surrounding circumstances would have made the disclosure. See Borgin v de Villiers 1980 (3) SA 556, 577 (A). Judicial & quasi-judicial proceedings: Judges and magistrates are presumed to have acted lawfully within the limits of their authority. See May v Udwin 1981 (1) SA 1, 19 (A). Witnesses, litigants, advocates and attorneys are accorded a qualified privilege as long as the statement is relevant to the case and is founded on some reasonable cause. See Pogrund v Yutar 1967 (2) SA 564, 570 (A); Joubert v Venter 1985 (1) SA 654, 697 (A). Reports of court proceedings, parliament and public bodies: The defence of qualified privilege applies to fair and substantially accurate reports of judicial or parliamentary proceedings. See Benson v Robinson & Co 1967 (1) SA 420, 428 (A). The defence of qualified privilege can be defeated by proof of malice. See Benson v Robinson and Co (supra) at 432.

[4] Jansen van Vuuren NO v Kruger (supra) at 849.

[5] Section 16(1)(b).

[6] Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 295. Cf Bogoshi (supra) at 1200.

[7] Neethling v du Preez, Neethling v The Weekly Mail 1994 (1) SA 708, 777 (A); Holomisa v Post Newspapers Ltd 1996 (2) SA 588, 610 (W).

In order to succeed with the defences of truth for the public benefit, qualified privilege and fair comment, the defendant is required to show on a balance of probabilities that all elements of the defence have been proved.[1] However, this requirement may inhibit freedom of expression. As a result, some authors have argued that the defendant should merely carry an evidential burden as in the case of animus injuriandi.[2] In Gardener v Whitaker,[3] the High Court held that the Constitution had brought about a fundamental change and that the plaintiff 'now bears the onus of showing that the defendant's speech or statement is, for example, false; not in the public interest; not protected by privilege; unfair comment, and the like'.[4] Such an approach was rejected in Buthelezi v SABC.[5] In Buthelezi, the court observed that there is no evidence 'that the Constitution sets greater store by freedom of speech than the essential worth of the character of the individual.' The court held that the onus should shift to the defendant to prove the defence because the latter has knowledge of the information necessary to establish the defence.[6] This latter view was supported by the Supreme Court of Appeal in National Media Ltd v Bogoshi.[7] As the law currently stands, the abolition of strict liability on the press has created a predisposition in favour of freedom of expression. The law now allows the press to escape liability by showing reasonableness or absence of negligence.

(dd) No closed list of defences

The list of defences is not closed. Other defences which rebut unlawfulness that could apply to privacy are: consent, absolute privilege, statutory authority, necessity and private defence. Consent will be a good defence provided that the invasion of privacy takes the form to which the plaintiff consented.[8] Absolute privilege will be a good defence in situations of parliamentary privilege provided for by the Constitution.[9] Statutory authority may justify certain invasions of [1] Neethling v du Preez, Neethling v The Weekly Mail (supra) at 770, 777; Bogoshi (supra) at 1216.

[2] Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 227.
[3] Bogoshi (supra).
[4] Gardener v Whittaker 1995 (2) SA 672, 691 (E), 1994 (5) BCLR 19 (E).
[5] Buthelezi v SABC 1997 (12) BCLR 1733 (D) .
[6] Ibid at 1744.
[7] Bogoshi (supra) at 1216. See infra § 38.2 (c)(i)(ee).
[8] National Media Ltd v Jooste 1996 (3) SA 262, 272 (A). The defence failed, for instance, where the consent was given to use a photograph in a news story and it was used in an advertisement. See O'Keeffe v Argus Printing and Publishing Co Ltd & Another 1954 (3) SA 244, 257 (C). It also failed where a person consented to a photograph being used in a nursing journal article, but not for an appeal in a Sunday newspaper. See Kidson v SA Associated Newspapers Ltd 1957 (3) SA 416, 464 (W).
[9] In respect of parliamentary proceedings, see FC s 58(1), provincial parliamentary proceedings, see FC s 117(1), and municipal councils with delegated powers from the province, see FC s 161. The privilege is absolute because it cannot be defeated by malice.

privacy[1] that would otherwise be unlawful, (such as the duty to report child abuse,[2] mentally ill persons who are dangerous,[3] or notifiable diseases[4]), provided the statutes concerned satisfy the limitation requirements of the Constitution.[5] Necessity could be raised as defence where the defendant has acted reasonably to prevent a threat of greater harm to another person arising from force of nature or conduct unconnected with the plaintiff.[6] Private defence applies where the defendant invades the plaintiff's privacy to prevent his or her interests being harmed by the plaintiff.[7]

(ee) 'Reasonable publication' as a defence

'Reasonableness' is the criterion used for determining the lawfulness of publications by the mass media in defamation cases.[8] It could also be used to rebut unlawfulness in similar cases of invasion of privacy. In one sense, reasonableness can be used during the policy-based ex post facto enquiry into wrongfulness.[9] In another, it can also be used as a defence to rebut fault in the form of lack of negligence.[10] This dual application of the reasonableness criterion leads to an overlap between the unlawfulness enquiry and the fault criterion of negligence.[11]

[1] In the past it was used to justify excessive intrusions by the apartheid authorities such as state interferences with a person's choice as to: marriage, see Prohibition of Mixed Marriages Act 55 of 1949 s 1; sexual partners, see Immorality Act 23 of 1957 s 16; education for whites, was controlled by the provinces, see Republic of South Africa Constitution Act 32 of 1961 s 84(1)(c); education for blacks, see the Bantu Education Act 47 of 1953; coloureds, see the Coloured Persons Education Act 47 of 1963; education for Indians, see the Indian Education Act of 1965; university, see Extension of University Education Act 45 of 1959 ss 17 and 31; residence, see Group Areas Act 36 of 1966 s 13; Bantu Land Act 27 of 1913; Bantu Trust and Land Act 18 of 1936; Coloured Persons Settlement Act 7 of 1946; Rural Coloured Areas Act 24 of 1963; entertainment, see Publications Act 42 of 1974 s 8(1)(d); political party, see Prohibition of Political Interference Act 51 of 1968 s 2. The police were also given wide powers of search, see Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 s 22, detention without trial, see Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 s 185; Internal Security Act 74 of 1982 s 50(1); and the right to intercept postal communications, see Post Office Act 44 of 1958 s 118A, and telephone conversations, see Post Office Act 44 of 1958 s 118A(2)(b). See generally McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 235. See also Case v Minister of Safety and Security 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC) at para 100.

[2] See, eg Child Care Act 74 of 1983 s 42.

[3] See, eg Mental Health Act 18 of 1973 s 13.

[4] See, eg Health Act 63 of 1977 s 45.

[5] Section 36(1); Burchell Personality Rights (supra) 425-7. See below § 38.5.

[6] Neethling et al Law of Personality (supra) at 263; McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 233. For instance, a shopkeeper with a closed circuit television camera to monitor shoppers. See Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 424-5.

[7] McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 234; cf Rhodes University College v Field 1947 (3) SA 437, 463 (A): '[A] man whose character, reputation or conduct has been assailed can say what is reasonably necessary to defend it.'. Cf S v I 1976 (1) SA 781 (RA); Neethling et al Law of Personality (supra) at 264-6.

[8] See Bogoshi (supra) at 1211. Cf Khumalo (supra) at 424.

[9] Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 227.

[10] Ibid at 226.

[11] Ibid.

(ii) Defences excluding intention

Once the other elements of an action for invasion of privacy have been proved animus injuriandi will be presumed.[1] The evidential burden then shifts to the defendant to show absence of animus injuriandi.[2] Presumably this is because the defendant has unique if not incorrigable knowledge of his or her mental state at the time. The question remains, however, why only an evidential burden rests on defendants to rebut animus injuriandi while a full onus rests on the defendant to rebut unlawfulness.[3] Burchell has been pointed out that the requirement of 'subjectively assessed, intention-based liability' for individuals under the actio injuriarum 'furthers freedom of speech'.[4] Defences that rebut animus injuriandi include (a) mistake, (b) jest, (c) rixa, and any other defence that can rebut intention or consciousness of wrongfulness (eg intoxication,[5] insanity,[6] no intention to injure etc).

(aa) Mistake

If the defendant did not intend to invade the plaintiff's privacy or was bona fide unaware of the wrongfulness of his or her act, then the presumption of animus injuriandi would be rebutted.[7] However, if the constitutional right to privacy is regarded as so fundamental that defendants may not argue that they were ignorant of the unlawfulness of their acts, it will no longer be open to them to simply show that they made a bona fide mistake of law. They be obliged to show that the mistake was reasonable.[8]

(bb) Jest

Neethling, Potgieter and Visser have argued that when a person publishes such

[1] Kidson v SA Associated Newspapers Ltd 1957 (3) SA 416, 468 (W).

[2] SAUK v O'Malley 1977 (3) SA 394, 403 (A); Neethling v du Preez, Neethling v The Weekly Mail 1994 (1) SA 708, 768 (A).

[3] Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 305: 'The courts will have to explain why a defence excluding unlawfulness must be proved on a preponderance of probabilities but, in regard to a defence excluding animus injuriandi, only an evidential burden rests on the defendant'.

[4] Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 305.

[5] Cf Geyser en 'n ander v Pont 1968 (4) SA 67, 72-3 (W); Muller v SA Associated Newspapers Ltd 1972 (2) SA 589, 592 (C).

[6] Cf Wilhelm v Beamish (1894) 11 SC 13, 15; Muller v SA Associated Newspapers Ltd & others (supra) at 592. But if the defendants' mental afflictions are such that they appreciate the nature and effect of their acts they will still be liable. See Vaughan & another v Ford 1953 (4) SA 486, 488-9 (R).

[7] Maisel v van Naeren 1960 (4) SA 836, 840, 850 (C). It has been suggested that for a bona fide mistake the defendant must show subjectively both a mistake of fact and a mistake of law. See Neethling et al Law of Personality (supra) at 179.

[8] On the possibility of strict liability being imposed, see infra § 38.3*(a)*(iii).

defamatory words as a joke, his or her will is not directed to injuring the plaintiff's reputation.[1] A similar stance could well be taken with respect to invasions of privacy.[2] However, I believe that certain fundamental constitutional rights to privacy are so important that the defence of bona fide unconsciousness of wrongfulness should not be available to the defendant unless it is also reasonable.[3]

(cc) Rixa

A defendant is not liable for defamation if he or she spoke the words without premeditation, in sudden anger on provocation by the plaintiff, and did not persist in uttering them.[4] Technically, if the defendant was 'unconscious of any intention to defame' at the time of the utterance, he or she would not possess animus injuriandi.[5] A similar approach could be adopted in respect of invasions of privacy.[6] However, in cases of egregious invasions of certain constitutional rights to privacy, it could again be argued that bona fide unconsciousness of the wrongfulness of the act should not be available as a defence unless it is reasonable.[7]

(dd) No closed list of defences

The list of defences rebutting intention or animus injuriandi is not closed.[8]

(ee) Rebuttal of negligence by mass media

As has been pointed out,[9] the court in National Media Ltd v Bogoshi blurred the distinction between wrongfulness and fault. At the same time, the SCA stated that the onus was on the defendant to prove that the publication was reasonable and not negligent and that 'proof of reasonableness would probably be proof of lack of negligence'.[10] The court rejected the principles underlying strict liability and

[1] Neethling et al Law of Personality (supra) at 180. The courts have, however, introduced an objective element by holding that the defence applies if the words could not reasonably be understood in a defamatory sense. See Peck v Katz 1957 (2) SA 567, 572-3 (T). Cf J Burchell The Law of Defamation in South Africa (1985) 285-6. This could be explained on the basis that if the joke is misunderstood by reasonable bystanders an inference of dolus eventualis could be drawn. See NJ van der Merwe and PJ Olivier Die Onregmaatige Daad in die Suid-Afrikaanse Reg (4th edition 1980) 444. The better view seems to be that jest is a defence that rests upon the subjective absence of animus injuriandi. cf Geyser v Pont 1968 (4) SA 67, 72 et seq (W).

[2] Cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 241.

[3] See below § 38.3*(a)*(iii).

[4] Kirkpatrick v Bezuidenhout 1934 TPD 155, 158. Cf Peck v Katz 1957 (2) SA 567, 573 (T); Jeftha v Williams 1981 (3) SA 678 (C); Bester v Calitz 1982 (3) SA 864 (O).

[5] Cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 240 n53.

[6] Cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 240-1: For example, 'where after provocation during a quarrel somebody bursts into another's room or makes embarrassing disclosures concerning his argumentative opponent's private life'.

[7] See below § 38.3*(a)*(iii).

[8] Muller v SAAN 1972 (2) SA 589 (C); Burchell The Law of Defamation in South Africa (supra) at 284-6.

[9] See above § 38.2*(a)*(i).

[10] Ibid at 1215.

dolus eventualis and accepted that the media could escape liability by proving that they were not negligent.[1] Although it has been suggested that the SCA did not go so far as to recognize that negligence was a specified ground of defence for the mass media,[2] the High Court seems to have placed such a gloss on Bogoshi.[3] Midgley has opined that animus injuriandi still remains a criterion for liability by the press, but that 'if the media were not negligent in publishing the material they may raise a lack of knowledge of unlawfulness as a defence'.[4] I can see no reason in principle why a reasonable lack of such knowledge by the media does not constitute a defence to an allegation of negligence.[5] After all, negligence is measured objectively and deals with conduct. Intention is measured subjectively. Therefore, a requirement of reasonable conduct by the defendant does not mean that media defendants have to rebut animus injuriandi. It merely means that they have to show that they were not negligent.[6]

38.3 The Constitutional Right to Privacy

Section 14 of the Final Constitution refers to a general right to privacy as well as the right of individuals not to have their persons or their homes or property searched or their communications infringed. The right to privacy is recognized in a number of international human rights instruments.[7] The right is also recognized in the constitutions of many foreign jurisdictions.[8]

Section 14 will not only have an impact on the development of the common law action for invasion of privacy.[9] It may also give rise to new actions for invasion of privacy which reflect not only the interests protected by the common law but also a number of important personal interests as against the state. In countries such as the United States the result of constitutionalizing these interests is that 'what once were victimless crimes are now lawful pursuits, the invasion of

[1] Ibid at 1214-1215.
[2] Midgley 'Intention Remains the Fault Criterion under the Actio Injuriarum' (2001) 118 SALJ 433.
[3] Marais v Groenewald en ander 2001 (1) SA 634, 645 (T), [2002] 2 All SA 578.
[4] Midgley 'Intention' (supra) at 433.
[5] Cf Burchell Personality Rights (supra) at 227.
[6] Cf Bogoshi (supra) at 1215.
[7] For example, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (art12); the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (art 17); the European Convention of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (art 8); the American Convention on Human Rights (art 11); the Convention on the Rights of the Child (art 16); and the American Declaration on the Rights and Duties of Man (arts 5, 9 and 10). Cf Case v Minister of Safety and Security 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC) at para 104.
[8] For example, in the Constitutions of Angola (art 24), Argentina (art 29), Mauritius (art 3*(c)*), Mexico (art 16), Mocambique (art 64), and Namibia (art 13). The right is also recognized in the French Civil Code (art 9) and Penal Code (arts 368–72). The German Basic Law does not mention a general right to privacy, but protects individual aspects of privacy such as protection of postal articles (art10) and inviolability of the home (art13). Likewise the right to privacy is not enshrined in the Constitution of the United States but has been held to be implicit in the First, Third, Fourth, Ninth and Fourteenth amendments which create 'zones of privacy'. See Grisworld v Connecticut 381 US 479 (1965); Roe v Wade 410 US 113 (1973). See, generally, Bernstein (supra) at paras 72-4, 77.
[9] See supra § 38.2*(a)*(i).

which creates a constitutional tort'.[1] Section 14 may well yield a similar transformation in South Africa. However, it would seem that at present the Constitutional Court is more inclined to develop the common law than to create a separate constitutional delict. Of course, this predisposition does not mean that such a delict may not be developed in the future.[2]

(a) Elements for a constitutional invasion of privacy

A breach of s 14 of the Constitution will prima facie be regarded as an unlawful invasion of privacy. The onus will then be on the person or body breaching the right to establish that such breach was justified in terms of s 36. Fault is not a requirement[3] and any defences must be consistent with s 36.[4] The courts have a discretion to award a wide variety of remedies.[5]

The Constitutional Court has pointed out that whereas at common law the test for whether there has been an unlawful infringement of privacy is a single inquiry, under the Constitution a two-fold inquiry is required.[6] In the case of a constitutional invasion of privacy the following questions need to be answered: (a) has the invasive law or conduct infringed the right to privacy in the Constitution? (b) if so, is such an infringement justifiable in terms of the requirements of the limitation clause[7] of the Constitution?[8] For this reason the Constitutional Court has cautioned against simply using common law principles to interpret fundamental rights and their limitations.[9]

As has been previously mentioned, the first constitutional enquiry is analogous to the policy-based enquiry into the unlawfulness stage of the common law — in both instances the subjective expectation of privacy must be reasonable.[10] The second enquiry deals with the justification of the infringement of the right to privacy in terms of s 36 of the Constitution and must be discharged on a balance of probabilities.[11] One must consider each of these stages of the enquiry before considering whether in a constitutional action for invasion of privacy it is necessary to prove fault.

---

[1] Dooley Modern Tort Law (1997) Vol 3 § 35.05.
[2] See, generally, McQuoid-Mason 'Common Law v Constitutional Delict' (supra) at 243-246.
[3] See infra § 38.3*(a)*(iii).
[4] See infra § 38.3*(a)*(ii).
[5] See infra § 38.3*(b)*.
[6] Bernstein (supra) at para 71.
[7] Section 36(1).
[8] Bernstein (supra) at para 71.
[9] Ibid.
[10] See supra § 38.3.(a)(i).
[11] It has been pointed out that once an infringement of the constitutional right has been established the question of whether the right may be limited 'involves a far more factual enquiry than the question of interpretation'. See J De Waal, I Currie and G Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (supra) at 134. This inquiry may involve sociological or statistical evidence on the impact that the restriction of the right has on society. Ibid at 134-5.

(i) Was there an infringement of the constitutional right to privacy?

The concept of privacy applies to both common law and constitutional infringements of the right.[1] In order to establish an infringement of the constitutional right to privacy the plaintiff will have to show that he or she had a subjective expectation of privacy which was objectively reasonable.[2] Except in the case of privacy rights going to the 'inner sanctum' of a person, an individual's expectation of privacy must be weighed against 'the conflicting rights of the community'.[3] Such expectations may also be tempered by countervailing fundamental rights such as freedom of expression[4] or the right of access to information.[5] However, freedom of expression — unlike the rights to life and dignity[6] — has been afforded no higher status than any other right in the Constitution,[7] including the right to privacy. Accordingly, the courts have to strike a balance between the individual's right to privacy and the public's right to information within the norms of the Constitution.[8]

The Constitution provides a right of access to any information held by the State or by any other person that is required for the exercise or protection of any rights.[9] These provisions have now been given effect by the Promotion of Access to Information Act.[10] The Act contains detailed provisions concerning the manner in which access to information held by public and private bodies should be made available.[11] It also provides special safeguards to protect the privacy of third parties, who are natural persons,[12] from publishing information which if released

[1] See supra § 38.1.

[2] Bernstein (supra) at para 75; Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences v Hyundai Motor Distributors 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC); 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC) at para 16. The Constitutional Court has suggested that, like the American courts, the Canadian courts require a subjective expectation of privacy by the injured person and that the expectation is recognized as reasonable by society, and that the German courts use an approach similar to that of a 'reasonable expectation of privacy.' Bernstein (supra) at paras 76, 78.

[3] Bernstein (supra) at para 69: a person's 'inner sanctum' was described by Ackermann J as their 'family life, sexual preference and home environment'.

[4] Section 16. However, it has been pointed out that in the case of the mass media it does not follow that 'journalists enjoy special constitutional immunity beyond that accorded to ordinary citizens'. See Holomisa v Argus Newspapers Ltd 1996 (2) SA 588, 610 (W), [1996] 1 All SA 478 (W), 1996 (6) BCLR 836 (Cameron J).

[5] Section 32, now given effect to by the Promotion of Access to Information Act 2 of 2000.

[6] The Constitutional Court has said that the 'rights to life and dignity are the most important of all human rights, and the source of all other rights.' See S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391, 451 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 65 (CC).

[7] Buthulezi v SABC 1997 (12) BCLR 1733, 1739 (D), [1998] 1 All SA 147 (D).

[8] Cf Holomisa v Argus Newspapers Ltd (supra) at 606, where the court sought to balance freedom of speech against reputation. Section 16(1)(b) of the Constitution provides that freedom of expression includes 'freedom to receive or impart information or ideas'.

[9] Section 32(1).

[10] Act 2 of 2000. See J Klaaren and G Penfold, 'Access to Information' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, Original Service 2002) Chapter 62. See also I Currie and J Klaaren, The Promotion of Access to Information Act (2001).

[11] Sections 17-32 (public bodies) and 53-61 (private bodies).

[12] Sections 34 and 63.

would constitute an action for breach of confidence,[1] and, a variety of other forms of information held by public[2] and private bodies.[3] A public or private body that is sued for releasing information in terms of the Act will have to show that such disclosures were made in terms of the Act and were reasonable and justifiable in terms of FC s 36.

The constitutional right to privacy in s 14 can be broadly divided into (i) personal autonomy cases and (ii) informational privacy cases. Variations of these categories have been recognized in the common law for many years.[4] The common law can therefore provide some useful guidelines when giving the right content.

(aa) Privacy rights protecting personal autonomy

Personal autonomy privacy rights protect individuals against intrusions in and interference with their private lives. They are sometimes called substantive privacy rights.[5] Many personal autonomy rights were flagrantly invaded under the apartheid state in South Africa.[6] Under the new constitutional dispensation these rights may be infringed only if the state or party seeking to uphold an infringement can satisfy the test set out in the limitation clause.[7] The recognition of a constitutional right to privacy may also give rise to new actions for invasions of privacy by the state.

Personal autonomy privacy rights permit individuals to make important decisions about their lives without interference by the state.[8] These rights are generally

[1] Sections 37 and 65.

[2] Such as certain records of the South African Revenue Services (s 35); commercial information belonging a third party (s 36); information which might jeopardise the safety of individuals or property (s 38); information in certain police dockets in bail proceedings or used in law enforcement and legal proceedings (s 39); privileged records in legal proceedings (s 40); and research information belonging to third parties and public bodies (s 41).

[3] Such as certain commercial information belonging to a third party (s 64); information which might jeopardise the safety of individuals or property (s 66); privileged records in legal proceedings (s 67); commercial information belonging to a private body (s 68); and research information belonging to third parties and private bodies (s 69).

[4] Cf Financial Mail (Pty) Ltd & others v Sage Holdings Ltd & another 1993 (2) SA 451, 462 (A). See above § 38.2*(a)*(iii).

[5] L Du Plessis and J De Ville 'Personal Rights' in D Van Wyk, J Dugard, B de Villiers & D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 242.

[6] See above § 38.2*(c)*(iii)(dd).

[7] S Woolman 'Limitations' in M Chaskalson et al (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st edition RS5 1999) Chapter 12. See also H Botha and S Woolman 'Limitations' in M Chaskalson et al (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, forthcoming 2004) Chapter 36.

[8] Page Keeton et al The Law of Torts (supra) at 866. However, it has been suggested that 'the mere compulsion to be physically present at a particular place at a particular time in response to a subpoena cannot in itself be regarded as an intrusion on a person's privacy'. Bernstein (supra) at para 58. Ackermann J went on to say: 'A distinction must be drawn between the compulsion to respond to a subpoena and the compulsion to answer particular questions . . . in consequence of responding to the subpoena.' Ibid.

understood to give the individual — or a small intimate group — control over such matters as marriage, procreation, contraception, family relationships, child-rearing, and education.[1] This set of privacy rights cover personal decisions about one's home life, (possession of pornography[2]) and one's sexual life (the practice of sodomy[3]). Personal autonomy privacy enables individuals to decide who should enter their home and protects individuals from unauthorized intrusions into their homes by officers of the state[4] and other uninvited persons. However, these rights are not unlimited. Certain pornographic material may not be protected by the right to privacy.[5] Nor may certain sexual behaviour.[6] This lack of protection is particularly apt particularly where harm is caused to others — even if it takes place in the privacy of the home.

(A) Pornography

Section 2(1) of the repealed[7] Indecent or Obscene Photographic Matter Act,[8] subject to certain exceptions,[9] prohibited the possession of any 'indecent or obscene photographic matter'.[10] The latter was defined as including 'photographic matter or any part thereof depicting, displaying, exhibiting, manifesting, portraying or representing sexual intercourse, licentiousness, lust, homosexuality, lesbianism, masturbation, sexual assault, rape, sodomy, masochism, sadism, sexual bestiality or anything of a like nature'.[11] In Case & another v Minister of Safety and Security & others[12] the Constitutional Court struck down s 2(1) as an unconstitutional violation of the right to privacy. Didcott J wrote:

> 'What erotic material I may choose to keep within the privacy of my home, and only for my personal use there, is nobody's business but mine. It is certainly not the business of society or the State. Any ban imposed on my possession of such material for that solitary purpose invades the personal privacy which section 13 of the Interim Constitution (Act 200 of 1993) guarantees that I shall enjoy.'[13]

---

[1] Page Keeton et al The Law of Torts (supra) at 866-7.

[2] Case v Minister of Safety & Security 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC) at para 91.

[3] Cf National Coalition of Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6, 30 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at 30 ('NCGLE').

[4] Cf State v Madiba 1998 (1) BCLR 38, 43 (D); State v Gumede 1998 (5) BCLR 530, 538 (D).

[5] Case v Minister of Safety and Security (supra) at para 99 (Langa J) (for example, pornography involving children or animals).

[6] NCGLE (supra) at para 118 (Sachs J): 'There are very few democratic societies, if any, which do not penalize persons for engaging in inter-generational, intra-familial, and cross-species sex, whether in public or in private . . . The privacy interest is overcome because of the perceived harm'.For a critique of Sach J's argument, see S Woolman 'Association' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition OS 12-03) § 44.1(b)

[7] Repealed by the Films and Publications Act 65 of 1996 s 33.

[8] Act 37 of 1967.

[9] These were set out in s 2(2), which relates to situations where special permission has been granted, or the photographic matter has not been declared undesirable.

[10] 'Photographic matter' is defined in s 1 to include 'any photograph, photogravure and cinematograph film, and any pictorial representation intended for exhibition through the medium of a mechanical device'.

[11] Section 1.

[12] 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC).

[13] Ibid at para 91.

However, the right to personal autonomy privacy is not absolute. Didcott J's statement was qualified by some of the other judges[1] who expressed concern about issues such as child pornography.[2]

(B) Sexual relationships

In National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice[3] the Constitutional Court considered the constitutionality of the common law crime of sodomy and s 20A of the Sexual Offences Act. [4] Although the court found that the crime of sodomy violated the right of homosexuals not to be discriminated against on the basis of sexual orientation, it also made the following observations concerning privacy:

> Privacy recognises that we all have a right to a sphere of private intimacy and autonomy which allows us to establish and nurture human relationships without interference from the outside community. The way in which we give expression to our sexuality is at the core of this area of private intimacy. If, in expressing our sexuality, we act consensually and without harming one another, invasion of that precinct will be a breach of our privacy.[5]

The court went on to say that 'the law may continue to proscribe what is acceptable and what is unacceptable even in relation to sexual expression and even in the sanctum of the home, and may, within justifiable limits, penalize what is harmful and regulate what is offensive'.[6] The court rejected the notion that 'the privacy argument may subtly reinforce the idea that homosexual intimacy is shameful or improper'.[7] The court observed that 'privacy protects persons not places' and is 'not simply a negative right to occupy a private space free from government intrusion, but a right to get on with your life and to express your personality'.[8]

(C) Prostitution

In S v Jordan and others[9] the Constitutional Court had to decide whether ss 2, 3*(b)* and (c) and s 20(1) (aA) of the Sexual Offences Act[10] — that made it an offence to keep a brothel and to have unlawful carnal intercourse or commit an act of indecency for reward — were unconstitutional in terms of the interim Constitution. Although most of the judgment dealt with whether the provisions were

[1] See Case (supra) at para 99. Langa J observes that the right to personal privacy even in this context is not necessarily exempt from limitation. Didcott J accepts this qualification. Ibid at para 95.
[2] Ibid at para 107 (Madala J). Cf Osborne v Ohio 495 US 103, 110 SCt 1691 (1990).
[3] NCGLE (supra).
[4] Sexual Offences Act 23 of 1957 s 20A
[5] NCGLE (supra) at para 23.
[6] Ibid at para 118.
[7] E Cameron 'Sexual Orientation and the Constitution: A Test Case for Human Rights' (1993) 110 SALJ 450, 464.
[8] NCGLE (supra) at para 116 (Sachs J).
[9] 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC) ('Jordan').
[10] Act 23 of 1957.

discriminatory, violated the rights to freedom and security and economic activity, and whether the state was entitled to outlaw commercial sex, the court also briefly dealt with the question of privacy.[1] The court held that none of the considerations regarding the establishment and nurturing of 'human relationships without interference from the outside community' mentioned in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice[2] were present in the case of prostitution.[3] The court went on to say that by 'making her sexual services available for hire to strangers in the market place, the sex worker empties the sex act of much of its private and intimate character … [and] places her far away from the inner sanctum of protected privacy rights'.[4] The court, however, concluded that 's 20(1)(aA) does amount to an infringement of privacy and we cannot agree with the proposition that prostitutes surrender all their rights to privacy in relation to the use of their bodies simply because they receive money for their sexual services'.[5] The question, then, was whether the invasion of privacy occasioned by s 20(1)(aA) was justified in terms of s 33, the limitation clause, of the Interim Constitution. The court found that it was.[6]

The American experience regarding privacy rights which protect personal autonomy is instructive. The US Supreme Court has declared unconstitutional state laws which prohibited abortion except in order to save the mother's life;[7] city by-laws that have attempted to restrict the number of related individuals living in one house,[8] and by-laws that defined a 'family' narrowly as including only a few categories of related individuals.[9]

(bb) Privacy rights protecting information

Privacy rights limit the ability of people to gain, publish, disclose or use information about others without their consent. Some of these privacy rights have been

[1] Jordan (supra) at para 82 (Ngcobo J) (that privacy 'lies at the periphery [of the case] and not at its inner core').

[2] NCGLE (supra) at para 23.

[3] Jordan (supra) at paras 29 (Ncgobo J) and 82 (Sachs and O'Regan JJ). Interestingly enough, more than a hundred years ago, De Villiers CJ, in a case involving a raid on a brothel by the police without a proper warrant observed as follows: 'Even these abandoned women have their rights, and without their permission or a legal warrant no policeman is justified in interfering with their privacy.' De Fourd v Cape Town Council (1898) 15 SC 399, 402.

[4] Jordan (supra) at para 82. The court subsequently observed: 'although s 20(1)(aA) breaches the right to privacy, it does not reach into the core of privacy, but only touches its penumbra'. Ibid at para 86.

[5] Jordan (supra) at para 83: (Sachs and O'Regan JJ) 'However, we conclude that the invasion of privacy thus caused is not extensive'.

[6] Jordan (supra) at para 94. See infra, § 38.5.

[7] Roe v Wade 410 US 113, 93 SCt 705 (1973). For a discussion of privacy issues in the context of abortion, see M O'Sullivan & C Bailey 'Reproductive Rights' in M Chaskalson et al (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st edition RS5 1999) § 16.3.

[8] Belle Terre v Boraas 416 US 1, 94 SCt 1536 (1974).

[9] Moore v City of East Cleveland 431 US 494, 97 SCt 1932 (1977). See also L du Plessis & J de Ville 'Personal Rights' in Van Wyk et al Rights and Constitutionalism (supra) at 248; S Woolman and J De Waal 'Freeedom of Association' in Van Wyk et al Rights and Constitutionalism (supra) at 338 and S Woolman 'Association' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition OS 12-03) § 44.3*(c)*(ii).

mentioned earlier in the discussion of common-law actions.[1] During the apartheid era in South Africa, the state engaged in widespread abuse of rights protecting information. Most of the offensive legislation upon which the abuse was predicated has been repealed.[2] Examples of invasions of informational privacy rights that are protected under the Final Constitution include: taking a prisoner's blood with consent, but not for HIV testing without consent;[3] taking a person's blood for testing with consent, but not for DNA testing; [4] and restoring erased computer information.[5]

Attempts by examinees to prevent the extraction of information at meetings of creditors in company liquidation and insolvency hearings by relying on the constitutional right to privacy have also been considered by the courts. In Bernstein v Bester NO[6] the Constitutional Court held that ss 417 and 418 of the Companies Act[7] were not inconsistent with the privacy and search and seizure provisions of s 13 of the interim Constitution. However, the Court held that if the answer to any question would infringe or threaten the examinee's interim Constitution rights, it would constitute 'sufficient cause' for the purposes of s 418(5)(b)(iii)(aa) of the Companies Act for refusing to answer the question, because such a question would not have been 'lawfully put'.[8] The Constitutional Court has held that the same principle applies to questions asked in terms of ss 64 and 65 of the Insolvency Act.[9] A similar approach was adopted by the Constitutional Court in respect of s 205 of the Criminal Procedure Act.[10] This Act also requires examinees to answer certain questions or face criminal penalties.[11]

It seems that if information is conveyed in circumstances analogous to a privileged occasion under the common law,[12] such disclosure may not necessarily be a breach of constitutional privacy provided the information itself was not originally obtained as a result of such a breach. In Mistry v Interim National Medical and Dental Council of South Africa & others,[13] information was communicated by one medicines control inspector to another for the purposes of planning and implementing a search of premises in order to carry out a regulatory inspection. It was argued that this was an invasion of constitutional privacy provided for in

[1] See supra § 38.2*(a)*(iii).
[2] See supra § 38.2*(c)*(iii)(dd).
[3] Cf C v Minister of Correctional Services 1996 (4) SA 292 (T).
[4] S v R 2000 (1) SACR 33, 39 (W).
[5] Klein v Attorney-General, WLD 1995 (3) SA 848, 865 (W).
[6] Bernstein (supra).
[7] Act 61 of 1973.
[8] Bernstein (supra) at para 61.
[9] Act 24 of 1936. See Harksen v Lane NO & others 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 77.
[10] Act 51 of 1977.
[11] Nel v Le Roux NO & others 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC) at para 18.
[12] See supra § 38.2*(c)*(i)(cc).
[13] 1998 (7) BCLR 880 (CC), 1998 (4) SA 1127 (CC) ('Mistry').

Interim Constitution s 13 and contrary to the secrecy provisions of the Medicines and Related Substances Control Act[1] and the Medical, Dental and Supplementary Health Service Professions Act.[2] In finding that the applicant's right to constitutional privacy had not been breached, the Constitutional Court took into account the following factors: the substance of the communication was merely that a complaint had been made and that an inspection was planned; the information had not been obtained in an intrusive manner but had been volunteered by a member of the public; it was not about intimate aspects of the applicant's personal life but about how he conducted his medical practice; it did not involve data provided by the applicant himself for one purpose and used for another; it was information which led to a search, not information derived from a search; and it was not disseminated to the press or the general public or persons from whom the applicant could reasonably expect such private information would be withheld, but was communicated only to a person who had statutory responsibilities for carrying out regulatory inspections for the purpose of protecting the public health, and who was himself subject to the requirements of confidentiality.[3]

State demands for information that is reasonably required for official statistical,[4] census[5] and income tax[6] purposes are likely to be regarded as reasonable and justifiable.[7] Likewise, statutory reporting requirements concerning information about child abuse[8] and mental patients who are dangerous to others[9] are likely to be declared constitutional.[10]

The United States' experience concerning access to information is useful, but should not be followed blindly. It has been held not to be unconstitutional for a statute to require doctors to disclose information to the state about prescriptions for certain drugs with a high potential for abuse,[11] and for certain census questions to elicit information concerning personal and family characteristics.[12] It has also been held that a telephone subscriber can have no 'reasonable expectation of privacy' regarding telephone calls which are electronically monitored by a telephone company,[13] and that a bank client has no expectation of privacy in respect

[1] Act 101 of 1965, s 34.
[2] Act 56 of 1974, s 41A(9)(a).
[3] Mistry (supra) at para 44 (Sachs J).
[4] Statistics Act 66 of 1976.
[5] Ibid.
[6] Income Tax Act 58 of 1962.
[7] See generally McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 99, 158. It could perhaps be argued that the Identification Act 72 of 1986 s 6 goes too far, particularly with regard to the need for fingerprints (s 11). However, the secrecy provisions (s 17) and the need to guard against fraud may justify the requirement.
[8] Child Care Act 74 of 1983 s 42; Prevention of Family Violence Act 133 of 1993, s 4.
[9] Mental Health Act 18 of 1973, s 13.
[10] See Woolman 'Limitation' (supra).
[11] Whalen v Roe 429 US 589, 97 SCt 869 (1977) (information was stored in a central computer).
[12] United States v Little 321 F Supp 38 D Del (1971). See generally Du Plessis and De Ville 'Personal Rights' in Van Wyk et al Rights and Constitutionalism (supra) at 244-5.
[13] Smith v Maryland 442 US 735, 99 SCt 2577 (1979).

of information contained in cheques and deposit slips handed in to the bank.[1] These latter decisions are wrong. They assume that the subscribers and clients have forfeited their right to privacy simply by agreeing to comply with the statutory or other requirements of the service providers.

Section 14 of the Final Constitution specifically provides protection against the following methods of unlawfully obtaining information: (a) searches of people's persons or homes;[2] (b) searches of people's property;[3] (c) seizures of possessions;[4] and (d) infringements of communications.[5] The list is not exhaustive. The first three categories can be broadly subsumed under a single category of unlawful searches and seizures.

(ii) Unlawful searches and seizures

Unlawful searches and seizures include searches of individual's persons or homes, searches of individual's property and seizure of possessions. Such searches and seizures are generally regarded as invasions of privacy.[6] A number of laws authorizing searches and seizures have been declared unconstitutional. De Waal, Currie and Erasmus have suggested[7] that to be constitutionally valid such laws must (i) properly define the power to search and seize;[8] (ii) provide for prior authorization by an independent authority;[9] and, (iii) must require the independent authority to be provided with evidence on oath that there are reasonable grounds for conducting the search.[10]

Section 13 of the Interim Constitution was aimed at protecting personal privacy and not private property.[11] The same proposition applies to s 14 of the Final Constitution.[12] A person may be searched in terms of the Criminal Procedure

[1] United States v Miller 425 US 435, 96 SCt 1619 (1976).

[2] S v Madiba 1998 (1) BCLR 38, 43 (D)(search and seizure in terms of Arms and Ammunition Act 75 of 1969 – evidence allowed).

[3] Cf Mistry (supra)(search of doctor's surgery).

[4] Mistry (supra)(seizure of pharmaceutical goods).

[5] S v Naidoo 1998 (1) SACR 479 (N), 1998 (1) BCLR 46 (D)(intercepting a telephone call); Protea Technology v Wainer and others 1997 (9) BCLR 1225 (W)(recording a telephone conversation). Where such information is used only by the person obtaining it and is not disclosed to others the unlawful conduct may amount to an intrusion.

[6] See Fedics Group (Pty) Ltd & another v Matus & another 1997 (9) BCLR 1199 (C), 1998 (2) SA 617 (C) at para 97.

[7] See De Waal et al Bill of Rights (supra) at 278.

[8] Mistry (supra) at para 29.

[9] Park-Ross v Director, Office for Serious Economic Offences 1995 (2) BCLR 198, 218-9 (C), 1995 (2) SA 148.

[10] Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences v Hyundai Motor Distributors 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC), 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC) at para 28. See also South African Association of Personal Injury Lawyers v Heath 2001(1) SA 883 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1131, 1165 (CC). Cf De Waal et al Bill of Rights (supra) at 278.

[11] Mistry (supra) at para 28.

[12] National Coalition of Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at para 116.

Act[1] if he or she has been arrested,[2] or the person conducting the search has a search warrant.[3] A search without a warrant will usually result in a constitutional violation.[4] Quite a number of extant statutory provisions regarding searches and seizures should be regarded as unconstitutional invasions of privacy.[5]

The Constitutional Court declared that s 28(1) of the Medicines and Related Substances Control Act[6] — which empowered inspectors to enter and search premises without a warrant and to seize and remove medicines from those premises — is inconsistent with the privacy right contained in IC s 13.[7] It held that to the extent that a statute authorizes warrantless entry into private homes and rifling through intimate possessions, such a statute would breach the right to personal privacy.[8] The court held that the invasion authorized by s 28(1) was substantially disproportionate to its public purpose, was clearly overbroad in its reach, and failed to pass the proportionality test.[9] Furthermore, the provisions were so wide that they could not be 'read down' to bring them within the limits of the Constitution.[10]

A lower court has held that s 6 of the Investigation of Serious Economic Offences Act,[11] which empowers the Director of the Office for Serious Economic Offences in pursuit of an enquiry under s 5 to enter and search premises

[1] Act 51 of 1977.
[2] Section 23.
[3] Section 21(2).
[4] S v Motloutsi 1996 (1) SA 584, 592-3 (C), 1996 (2) BCLR 220 (C)(the fact that the accused's lessee had allowed the police to search the premises without a warrant did not make the police conduct lawful).
[5] See eg ss 19-36 in Chapter 2 of the Criminal Procedure Act, which confer extensive powers of search and seizure and provide for entry of premises and the forfeiture and disposal of property; s 11(1)(g) of the Drugs and Drug Trafficking Act, which allows a police official to 'seize anything which, in his opinion, is connected with, or may provide proof of a contravention of a provision' of the Act; s 41(1)(a) of the Arms and Ammunition Act, which allows a police official 'who has reason to believe that an offence has been committed, by means of or in respect of any article which he has reason to believe to be in or on any place, including any premises, building, dwelling, flat, room, office, shop, structure, vessel, aircraft or vehicle, or any part thereof or to be in possession of any person' to 'without warrant, enter and search such a place or search such a person and seize any article, arm or ammunition'; s 4 of the Customs and Excise Act, which gives customs officers wide powers of entry search and seizure and to question people; s 8(6) of the Prevention of Public Violence and Intimidation Act, which allows the Chairman, or any member of staff, of a Commission of Inquiry Regarding the Prevention of Public Violence, for the purposes of an inquiry, at all reasonable times to enter upon and inspect any premises and demand and seize any document on or kept on such premises; s 37(2)(b) of the Criminal Procedure Act, which allows a registered medical practitioner attached to any hospital to take a blood sample from a person if such medical officer has reasonable grounds to believe that the contents of the person's blood may be relevant at any later criminal proceedings. The taking of fingerprints of an arrested person in terms of s 37 of the Criminal Procedure Act was found not to be contrary to ss 10 and 11(2) of the Interim Constitution, but the question of privacy was not raised. See S v Huma & another 1996 (1) SA 232, 233, 237 (W).
[6] Act 101 of 1965.
[7] Mistry (supra).
[8] Ibid at para 16.
[9] Ibid at para 23.
[10] Ibid at para 27.
[11] Act 117 of 1991.

and to seize and remove property therefrom without authority, violates the constitutional right to privacy in terms of the Interim Constitution.[1] However, s 7 of the Act, which prohibits disclosure without the permission of the Director of any information obtained as a result of an enquiry, search and seizure conducted in terms of the Act, was held by the same court not to be unconstitutional because the Director is required to act intra vires s 7.[2]

It has also been held that the provisions of s 7(3) of the Harmful Business Practices Act,[3] — which gave investigating officers arbitrary powers of entry, inspection, search and seizure without a warrant — are an infringement of s 14 of the Constitution.[4] Section 7(3) was not saved by the limitation clause of the Constitution[5] because there was no reason why such powers could not be subject to the same sort of prerequisites and controls that are laid down by the search and seizure provisions of s 21 of the Criminal Procedure Act.[6] The argument that the exercise of the powers in s 7(3) of the Harmful Business Practices Act would not be unconstitutional if the provisions were used with due regard to the Constitution was held not to be feasible in practice.[7]

In the United States the word 'search' has been held to mean 'a governmental invasion of a person's privacy'.[8] Persons claiming that their privacy has been invaded have to establish that they had a subjective expectation of privacy, and that society has recognized that expectation as objectively reasonable.[9] The American courts have decided that whether or not an individual has lost his or her legitimate expectation of privacy is determined by considering such factors as whether the item was abandoned[10] or obtained by consent.[11] The courts have also interpreted 'seizure' of a person's property as occurring when the government 'meaningfully interferes with an individual's interests in possession'.[12] As

[1] Park-Ross v Director, Office for Serious Economic Offences 1995 (2) SA 148 (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 198 (C).
[2] Ibid.
[3] Act 71 of 1988.
[4] Janse van Rensburg NO v Minister van Handel en Nywerheid en 'n ander 1999 (2) BCLR 204, 220 (T). ('Janse van Rensburg')
[5] Section 36(1).
[6] Act 51 of 1977. See Janse van Rensburg (supra) at 220. (The court said that by way of comparison notice could also be taken of s 10(2) of the Consumer Affairs (Unfair Business Practices) Act 7 of 1996 of Gauteng.)
[7] Janse van Rensburg (supra) at 220.
[8] Rakas v Illinois 439 US 128 at 143, 99 SCt 421 (1978).
[9] Ibid. Cf Bernstein (supra) at para 75: (Ackermann J) '[I]t seems a sensible approach to say that the scope of a person's privacy extends a fortiori only to those aspects in regard to which a legitimate expectation of privacy can be harboured.'
[10] Katz v United States 389 US 347, 361, 88 SCt 507 (1967); Abel v United States 362 US 217, 241, 80 SCt 683 (1960). No expectation of privacy where items were left in a hotel waste basket after a guest had checked out of the hotel.
[11] See United States v Matlock 415 US 164, 177, 94 SCt 988 (1974)(Consent given by a fellow occupant of a bedroom). But see S v Motloutsi 1996 (1) SA 584, 592-3 (C), 1996 (7) BCLR 220 (C)(the court held that the fact the accused's lessee had given consent for the police to search the premises without a warrant did not make their conduct lawful).
[12] United States v Jacobsen 466 US 109, 120, 104 SCt 1652 (1984).

the South African Constitution operates horizontally as well as vertically, the terms 'searches' and 'seizures' may have a wider meaning than in the United States and may apply to private security firms and any one else who engages in unlawful searches and seizures. However, it has been held that Bills[1] designed to prohibit traditional leaders from accepting any remuneration or allowances other than that provided for by law or custom of the Province of KwaZulu-Natal do not violate the right not to have private possessions seized in terms of s 13 of the Interim Constitution.[2]

The Constitutional Court has no jurisdiction to investigate the legality of searches and seizures which occurred prior to the Interim Constitution coming into operation.[3]

(iii) Infringements of private communications

Infringements of private communications have long been recognized as invasions of privacy in South African law.[4] For instance, the courts have held that eavesdropping and electronic surveillance by private detectives during matrimonial disputes may result in a criminal invasion of privacy if the methods used are unreasonable.[5] The stealing of tape recordings of confidential business meetings and offering them to a third party has been held to be an unlawful invasion of privacy.[6] During the Apartheid era, however, widespread violation of private communications was sanctioned by statute. For example, a person designated by the Minister of Posts and Telegraphs, or a Minister who was a member of the State Security Council, could authorize the interception of mail 'in the interests of state security'[7] and listen in to telephone conversations.[8] Such practices would today certainly be an infringement of s 14.[9]

[1] See K*waZulu-Natal Amakhosi and Iziphakanyiswa Amendment Bill, 1995 and Payment of Salaries, Allowances and other Privileges to the Ingonyama Amendment Bill, 1995* 1996 (4) SA 653 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 903 (CC).

[2] Ex parte Speaker of the KwaZulu-Natal Provincial Legislature: In re Payment of Salaries, Allowances and other Privileges to the Ingonyama Amendment Bill of 1995 1996 (4) SA 653 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 903 (CC).

[3] Key v Attorney-General, Cape Provincial Division, & another 1996 (4) SA 187 (CC), 1996 (6) BCLR 788 (CC), 1996 (2) SACR 113 (CC); Rudolph & another v Commissioner for Inland Revenue & others 1996 (4) SA 552 (CC), 1996 (7) BCLR 889 (CC).

[4] McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 141-142. See above § 38.2.

[5] S v A 1971 (2) SA 293, 297 (T)(where private detectives were convicted on a charge of crimen injuria for installing a 'transmitter wireless microphone' under the dressing table of the complainant during an investigation into the latter's private life at the request of an estranged spouse).

[6] Janit v Motor Industry Fund Administrators (Pty) Ltd 1995 (4) SA 293 (A).

[7] Post Office Act 44 of 1958 s 118A. Cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 141-142.

[8] Act 44 of 1958 s 118(2)(b). Cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 145-146.

[9] Section 13 of the Interim Constitution. See, for example, Fedics Group (Pty) Ltd & another v Matus & another 1997 (9) BCLR 1199 (C), 1998 (2) SA 617 (C); Protea Technology Ltd & another v Wainer & others 1997 (9) BCLR 1225 (W).

The Interception and Monitoring Prohibition Act[1] now prohibits the intentional interception of telecommunications or monitoring of conversations by monitoring devices[2] unless such interception is authorized by a judge.[3] The same applies to postal articles.[4] The courts have held that the primary purpose of the Act is to protect confidential information from illicit eavesdropping.[5] Such authorization, however, may only be given by a judge, on written application, if he or she is satisfied that: (i) the offence that has been or is being or will probably be committed is a serious offence that cannot be properly investigated in any other manner and of which the investigation in terms of the Act is necessary; or (ii) the security of the Republic is threatened or (iii) that the gathering of information concerning a threat to the security of the Republic is necessary.[6] The above provisions may well be open to scrutiny by the Constitutional Court to determine whether they violate FC s 14. Even if these provisions are found constitutionally sound, where the provisions of the Act have not been followed, the injured party may have an action for an invasion of his or her constitutional right to privacy[7] and secure an order declaring that the evidence obtained is inadmissible.[8]

Some courts have held that in the case of intercepting a telephone call from a kidnapper demanding a ransom, or the interception of persistent indecent telephone calls made by a perverted caller, such interceptions may escape the prohibition in s 2(1)(b) of the Interception and Monitoring Prohibition Act. They escape on the grounds of the consent of one of the parties to the telephone call or on the basis of an argument that such a call would not constitute 'a conversation'.[9] However, in cases where police informers or traps are used, the mere consent of one of the parties to the surreptitious electronic recording of a

[1] Act 127 of 1992.
[2] Section 2(1).
[3] Section 2(2).
[4] Section 2(2)(b).
[5] Lenco v Holdings Ltd & others v Eckstein & others 1996 (2) SA 693, 700 (N); S v Kidson 1999 (1) SACR 338, 344 (W) ('Kidson').
[6] Section 3(1)(b).
[7] See, for example, S v Naidoo & another 1998 (1) BCLR 46, 72 (N), 1998 (1) SACR 479 (N) (McCall J) ('If the monitoring of a conversation is not authorized by a direction properly and lawfully issued by a Judge in terms of section 3, then not only would such monitoring constitute a criminal offence in terms of the Monitoring Act, it would also, in my judgment, constitute an infringement of the right to privacy, which includes the right not to be subject to the violation of private communications'.)
[8] S v Naidoo (supra) at 72: a judge granted a direction in terms of the Monitoring Act, based on false and misleading information, to tap a telephone. See also S v Nkabinde 1998 (8) BCLR 996 (N): the police monitored conversations between the accused and his legal representatives in terms of an order wrongly granted under the Monitoring Act, and continued to do so for a period beyond the date provided for by the tainted authority. See M Chaskalson & W Trengove 'Evidence' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st edition RS5 1999) § 26.4*(c)*.
[9] S v Naidoo (supra). See Kidson (supra) at 343 (Cameron J agreed with McCall J that consent by one of the parties to a two-party conversation may render that monitoring exempt, but went on to qualify his agreement).

conversation is not sufficient, and proper prior authorization must be obtained.[1] A reasonable expectation of privacy is violated when a telephone conversation is intercepted by a third party without the knowledge or consent of the participants.[2] However, the mere fact that the parties on a telephone are aware that they must be careful when talking on the telephone cannot be construed as consent to the violation, or a waiver of the person's expectation of a right to privacy.[3]

The case of 'participant monitoring' has been dealt with differently by the High Court.[4] Where a suspect who was assisting the police in their investigations into a murder had offered to visit an accused at her home carrying a concealed voice-activated tape recorder and had later handed over the recording to the police, the information imparted was held not to be 'confidential information' for the purposes of the Interception and Monitoring Prohibition Act.[5] The court held that the legislature could not have intended to impose an unqualified prohibition on participant monitoring. Its primary aim is to protect confidential information from such illicit eavesdropping as third-party surveillance.[6] While the Act prohibits intentional monitoring to gather confidential information, information voluntarily imparted in a two-party conversation covering the criminal conduct of the communicator is not for the purposes of the Act 'confidential information' in relation to the other party to the conversation.[7] Therefore, 'no constitutionally cognisable breach of privacy occurred' when the police procured the monitoring by the suspect of his conversation with the accused.[8] Even assuming that the Act had been breached, the court found that these facts did not support a claim of entrapment. Although the police might have played a trick on the accused, the police violation was 'minimal' and there had not been 'any police impropriety or invasion of privacy' or 'serious failure' by them.[9] More recently the 'participant

[1] Compare the Canadian approach in R v Duarte [1990] 1 SCR 30; R v Wiggins [1990] 1 SCR 62; R v Wong [1990] 3 SCR 36. See also P W Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada vol II (3 ed 1992) 45-7.

[2] R v Thompson [1990] 2 SCR 1111. Cf Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (supra) at 45-7.

[3] S v Naidoo(supra) at 89.

[4] Kidson (supra).

[5] Kidson (supra) at 348. Cameron J took the view that the formulation by Heher J, in Protea Technology Limited & another v Wainer & others 1997 (3) SA 594, 603 (W) ('Protea Technology'), that the question of whether or not the information enjoys the protection of the Act depends largely upon the intention of the communicator was 'over-broad'. Kidson (supra) at 347. He suggested that the following additional requirement should be added: 'the information the communicator intended to restrict as confidential must be information upon which the law attributes the confidentiality'. Ibid.

[6] Ibid at 344.

[7] Ibid at 348.

[8] Ibid at 350.

[9] Ibid at 352. Cameron J therefore used his discretion to admit the tape recording and transcript. Ibid at 353. See Chaskalson and Trengove 'Evidence' (supra) at § 26.4(c). The court had previously cautioned that: 'The police and other agencies should not be encouraged to circumvent statutory prohibitions with flimsy re-arrangements of personnel and operators' Kidson (supra) at 346.

monitoring' exemption from constitutional invalidity has been extended to entrapment in both civil[1] and criminal[2] cases.[3]

In Protea Technology v Wainer, the court held that employees have a legitimate expectation of privacy concerning telephone calls made and received by them in matters unconnected with their employer's business.[4] Where conversations involve their employer's affairs the latter is entitled to demand and obtain as full an account as the employee is capable of furnishing.[5] Such conversations are not protected by the Constitution because as soon as employees abandon their private sphere for the affairs of their employers they lose the benefit of the right to privacy. The employers then have the right to know both the substance and the manner in which employees conduct themselves and it matters not how the information is obtained.[6] However, such an approach goes too far and could make working conditions untenable. Unreasonable monitoring of employees' communications when dealing with the employer's business should be regarded as prima facie evidence of a breach of their constitutional right to privacy. Employers who wish to monitor continually the substance and manner in which their employees communicate with others about the affairs of the business should be required to justify their conduct within the provisions of s 36 of the Constitution.[7]

In the United States, electronic eavesdropping on private conversations has been held to be an invasion of privacy[8] except where such calls are electronically monitored by a telephone company.[9] In Germany, the privacy of correspondence, post and telecommunications is protected by the Basic Law.[10]

(iv) Fault not required

Fault is not a requirement for an infringement of a constitutional right to privacy. Thus strict liability may be imposed upon a defendant who breaches the constitutional right to privacy. Actions brought under the general common law right to privacy, as developed under the Final Constitution, require the usual fault

[1] See Tap Wine Trading CC v Cape Classic Wines (Western Cape) CC 1999 (4) SA 194, 197 (C), [1998] 4 All SA 86 (C).

[2] See S v Dube 2000 (1) SACR 53, 75-6 (N), 2000 (6) BCLR 685 (N), 2000 (2) SA 583 (N).

[3] See De Waal et al Bill of Rights (supra) at 287: 'In our view these cases were correctly decided since a person can hardly be said to have a subjective expectation of privacy vis-a-vis a party to a conversation. The Monitoring Act and Constitution is [sic] aimed at preventing third party monitoring in the sense of eavesdropping'. That said, if the conversation was meant to be confidential (and was not unlawful) and a disclosure is subsequently made to third parties, the protection of the general right to privacy in s 14 of the Final Constitution would apply.

[4] Protea Technology (supra).

[5] Ibid at 1240.

[6] Ibid at 1241.

[7] Woolman 'Limitations' (supra).

[8] See Katz v United States 389 US 347, 88 SCt 507 (1967).

[9] See Smith v Maryland 442 US 735, 99 SCt 2577 (1979). See also Du Plessis and De Ville 'Personal Rights' in Van Wyk et al Rights and Constitutionalism (supra) at 244-5.

[10] Article 10. See Du Plessis and De Ville 'Personal Rights' in Van Wyk et al Rights and Constitutionalism (supra) at 248-9.

elements to be proved.[1] However, the position regarding actions based on the listed categories in s 14 may be different. The imposition of strict liability for unlawful searches and seizures and interferences with communications specifically listed in the Constitution is similar to that adopted by the common law in respect of unlawful arrest or imprisonment.[2] Such wrongs are technically regarded as injuriae under the actio injuriarum. But the courts tend to impose strict liability on the arresting or imprisoning authorities.[3] The plaintiff must prove the fact of the arrest or imprisonment and that it was unlawful. It is not necessary to allege or prove dolus or culpa.[4] Thereafter, it is for the defendant to show that the arrest or imprisonment was justified.[5] The policy behind the approach is that the courts regard unlawful arrest as a serious encroachment upon the freedom of an individual.[6] The infringement of a constitutional right to privacy can be regarded as equally egregious, particularly the specific categories mentioned in s 14. The US courts adopt this approach with respect to constitutional torts involving invasions of privacy.[7]

The defendant can justify such infringements at the rights analysis stage by showing that the plaintiff had no reasonable expectation of privacy[8] or subsequently, in terms of s 36, showing that the legally sanctioned limitation was reasonable and justifiable.[9]

(b) Remedies

There is a wide range of remedies available for breaches of fundamental rights in the Constitution.[10] Apart from the specific remedy of declaring any law or conduct inconsistent with the Constitution invalid to the extent of the inconsistency,[11] the court may grant 'appropriate relief' including a declaration of rights, to any person who alleges and proves that a right in the bill of rights has been infringed or threatened.[12]

---

[1] See supra § 38.2*(a)*(ii).

[2] Whittaker v Roos and Bateman 1912 AD 92, 129; Ramsay v Minister van Polisie 1981 (4) SA 802, 806-7 (A); Minister of Justice v Hofmeyr 1993 (3) SA 131, 156 (A).

[3] Ibid. See also Neethling et al Law of Personality (supra) at 130.

[4] Donono v Minister of Prisons 1973 (4) SA 259, 262 (C); Shoba v Minister van Justisie 1982 (2) SA 554, 559 (C).

[5] May v Union Government 1954 (3) SA 120, 124 (N); Ingram v Minister of Justice 1962 (3) SA 225, 227 (W); Bhika v Minister of Justice 1965 (4) SA 399, 400 (W); Divisional Commissioner of SA Police Witwatersrand v SA Associated Newspapers Ltd 1966 (2) SA 503, 511-2 (A); cf Groenewald v Minister van Justisie 1973 (3) SA 877, 883-4 (A); Prinsloo v Newman 1975 (1) SA 481, 500 (A); Minister of Law and Order v Hurley 1986 (3) SA 568, 589 (A).

[6] Areff v Minister van Polisie 1977 (2) SA 900, 914 (A).

[7] Cf Monroe v Pape 365 US 167 (1961), wrongful search, seizure and arrest. See also Bivens v Six Unknown Named Agents of Federal Bureau of Narcotics 403 US 388 (1971).

[8] See supra § 38.3*(a)*(ii).

[9] See infra § 38.3*(c)*.

[10] See, generally, De Waal et al Bill of Rights (supra) ch. 8.

[11] Section 172 (1).

[12] Section 38.

In respect of infringements of privacy four broad categories of constitutional remedies will be considered: (a) constitutional damages; (b) interdicts; (c) declarations of invalidity; and (e) exclusion of evidence.[1] The first two are always relevant for a delictual action for invasion of privacy, while the latter may sometimes be relevant. However, these categories are not closed. The courts have the power to adopt a flexible approach by granting any other 'appropriate relief'.[2]

(i) Constitutional damages

In Fose v Minister of Safety and Security,[3] the Constitutional Court expressed the view that in most cases the ordinary common law remedies for delictual damages for infringements of personality rights will be an adequate remedy for a breach of a fundamental right. However, it has been pointed out that there is no reason 'to imagine that any remedy is excluded' provided it 'serves to vindicate the Constitution and deter its further infringement'.[4] In Fose, the Court expressed strong reservations about the concept of punitive damages for constitutional wrongs and refused to grant them on the facts of the case. It appears, however, that the court rejected the concept of constitutional punitive damages in addition to the damages that were claimed by the plaintiff as a solatium for the torture and assault allegedly suffered by him at the hands of the police. The fact that his constitutional rights had been egregiously violated would be provided for in the calculation of the common law damages that would be awarded to vindicate his rights.[5]

Justice Ackermann, writing for the majority, stated that as the claim for punitive constitutional damages was in addition to the claim for patrimonial loss, pain and suffering, loss of amenities, contumelia and other general damages, it would perpetuate 'an historical anomaly' which 'fails to observe the distinctive functions of the civil and criminal law and which sanctions the imposition of a penalty without any of the safeguards afforded in a criminal prosecution'.[6] A more cautious approach was taken by Didcott J and Kriegler J. Didcott J thought that punitive damages should not be awarded against the state and that the matter was better dealt with by the legislatore.[7] Kriegler J argued that although punitive damages should not be awarded in the case before the court, he believed that the court should not go as far as 'rejecting for all time the possibility that a case may arise where punitive or exemplary damages are 'appropriate' redress for infringement of constitutionally protected rights'.[8]

[1] De Waal et al Bill of Rights (supra) at 159.
[2] Section 38. See De Waal et al Bill of Rights (supra) at 172-173.
[3] 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 at paras 58, 98 ('Fose'). See also Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC).
[4] Ibid at para 100 (Kriegler J).
[5] Ibid at para 67.
[6] Ibid at para 70.
[7] Ibid at para 87.
[8] Ibid at para 91. Kriegler J pointed out that Ackermann J had been 'uncharacteristically ambivalent' in that he appeared to reject the concept in paras 69–73 of his judgment, but at para 70 'seeks to found the current rejection on the particular facts of this case.' Ibid.

However, after Carmichele the position regarding damages for delicts resulting from breaches of constitutional fundamental rights has changed.[1] Now all courts will be required to develop the common law so that it complies with constitutional imperatives. That said, courts are still unlikely to award additional constitutional damages unless these can be regarded as 'an appropriate remedy'.[2] In such cases it would have to be shown that such damages would vindicate the Constitution and serve to deter further violations of fundamental rights.[3]

The same common law principles concerning the presumption that the plaintiff has suffered sentimental damages will apply.[4] The quantum of damages for a solatium cannot be accurately calculated and the court will take into account the same factors as under the common law. It is submitted however that when calculating the quantum of damages the fact that the defendant has breached a constitutional right should be regarded as an aggravating factor, in the sense that it is prima facie evidence of egregious conduct by the defendant.[5]

(ii) Interdicts

The Constitutional Court has used the remedy of interdict[6] and mandamus[7] to protect fundamental rights. The elements required for the granting of an interdict to prevent a constitutional infringement are the same as those that apply at common law.[8] Where there is an application for a prior restraint against the publication of an alleged defamatory statement, the courts have been cautious about infringing the right to freedom of expression.[9] In such cases, the courts seem to take the view that such restraints bear a heavy presumption against constitutional validity.[10] Similar principles would apply to publications involving informational privacy. De Waal, Currie and Erasmus point out that the Constitutional Court has on occasion used 'the so-called 'structural interdict' which directs violators to rectify the breach of fundamental rights under court supervision'.[11]

---

[1] Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC).

[2] Ackermann J observed, in Fose (supra) at para 69, that 'an appropriate remedy must mean an effective remedy'.

[3] Sanderson v Attorney-General, Eastern Cape 1998 (2) SA 38 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1675 at para 38.

[4] See, generally, Neethling et al Law of Personality (supra) at 277.

[5] Cf Afrika v Metzler 1997 (4) SA 531, 539 (NmH) (court said that the fact that the defendant had breached a fundamental right in the Namibian Constitution should be regarded as an aggravating factor).

[6] See, eg, City Council of Pretoria v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC), 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) at para 96 (an interdict was an appropriate remedy to prevent the selective institution of legal proceedings by the city council for the recovery of rates which amounted to unfair discrimination in breach of the Constitution).

[7] See, eg, New National Party of South Africa v Government of the Republic of South Africa 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC) at para 46: a mandamus was considered an appropriate remedy to compel the Electoral Commission to comply with Constitution.

[8] See above § 38.2*(b)*(ii).

[9] Mandela v Falati 1997 (3) SA 789 (CC).

[10] Mandela v Falati (supra) at 259-60.

[11] De Waal et al Bill of Rights (supra) at 193, citing August v Electoral Commission 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC)(The Electoral Commission was directed to make the necessary arrangements to enable prisoners to vote). On remedies, generally, see J Klaaren 'Remedies' in M Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) Chapter 9.

(iii) Declarations of invalidity

If the court finds that a law or a provision of a law is inconsistent with the Constitution it may declare the law or the provision invalid to the extent of the inconsistency.[1] This applies equally to the conduct of a person or an institution.[2] There have been several instances where certain provisions of laws[3] or conduct of certain persons[4] have been declared inconsistent with the constitutional right to privacy. In such cases, the declaration of invalidity could also lay the basis of an award for delictual damages. The plaintiff's claim could include a prayer for a declaration of invalidity together with a prayer for an award of damages if the first prayer is upheld. The remedy of a declaration of the invalidity of a statute does not exist at common law.

(iv) Exclusion of improperly obtained evidence

In searches and seizures or infringements of private communications which result in a person's privacy being unlawfully infringed and evidence improperly obtained, the evidence must be excluded if it would render the trial unfair or be detrimental to the administration of justice.[5] This topic is discussed elsewhere in this volume.[6]

(v) Any other 'appropriate relief'

The Constitution empowers the courts to provide 'appropriate relief' where the applicant's statutory or common law remedies are insufficient.[7] In delictual actions, any other 'appropriate relief' could be any remedy that vindicates the Constitution, deters future violations of fundamental rights and is relevant to the plaintiff's claim for relief. In some instances it could be a prerequisite for, or in addition to, a claim for damages. Such remedies may include exclusion of [1] Section 172(1)(a).

[2] Section 2 read with s 172(1); cf De Waal et al Bill of Rights (supra) at 176.

[3] Cf Park-Ross v Director, Office for Serious Economic Offences 1995 (2) 148, 218-21 (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 198 (C)(declaring invalid s 6 of the Investigation of Serious Economic Offences Act 117 of 1991); Mistry (supra) at para 27(declaring invalid s 28(1) of the Medicines and Related Substances Control Act 101 of 1965); Janse van Rensburg NO v Minister van Handel en Nywerheid 1999 (2) BCLR 204, 220 (T)(declaring invalid s 7(3) of the Harmful Business Practices Act 71 of 1988).

[4] S v Naidoo 1998 (1) BCLR 46, 72 (N), 1998 (1) SACR 479 (N)(where the police monitored telephone communications in violation of the Interception and Monitoring Act 127 of 1992 and the Constitution).

[5] Section 35 (5) of the Constitution; S v Naidoo (supra). The principle seems to apply to both criminal and civil cases. See Fedics Group (Pty) Ltd & another v Matus & another 1997 (9) BCLR 1199 (C), 1998 (2) SA 617 (C) at para 92.

[6] See M Chaskalson and W Trengove 'Evidence' (supra) at § 26.4*(c)*; T Roux and A Stein 'Evidence' (2nd Edition Original Service forthcoming 2004) Chapter 52.

[7] FC s 38. For instance, where a provincial department of welfare had failed to process an applicant's claim for a social grant within a reasonable period of time, the court ordered the authorities to pay her grant from the date when it should have accrued to her if her application had been dealt with reasonably and not from the later date when it accrued in terms of the regulations. See Mahambehlala v Member of the Executive Council for Welfare, Eastern Cape and another 2001 (9) BCLR 899, 911 (SE), 2002 (1) SA 342, 356 (SE); Mbanga v MEC for Welfare, Eastern Cape and another 2002 (1) SA 359, 370 (SE).

evidence,[1] administrative law remedies,[2] a declaration of rights[3] or some other appropriate remedy.

De Waal, Currie and Erasmus have suggested that before finding a constitutional remedy for the private violation of a right in the bill of rights, the court must 'first look at legislation, then turn to existing common law and finally, if all else fails, develop a new common law remedy'.[4] This principle could be applied, for example, to a false light invasion of privacy where the plaintiff wishes to demand a retraction, an apology or a right of reply. There is no statute that provides for this. The common law remedy of amende honorable was thought to have fallen into disuse. [5] However, in holding that the remedy is still part of South African law, a High Court has recently stated that if the remedy had not existed the constitutional 'imperatives of our times would have had required its invention' as 'appropriate relief'.[6] Thus, before creating a new remedy — the court did, in fact, rely on the existing common law and resuscitate an existing remedy.[7]

(c) Defences

The traditional defences rebutting wrongfulness in respect of a common law invasion of privacy[8] may also be applied to an invasion of the constitutional right to privacy provided they satisfy the requirements of the limitation clause.[9] Strictly speaking, as fault is not required for an invasion of the constitutional right to privacy,[10] it is not open to a defendant to use the common law defences that rebut fault in respect of the invasion of a constitutional right to privacy. However, it is probably unlikely that the courts are presently ready to develop the common law to impose strict liability for all forms of invasions of the constitutional right to

[1] Ibid.

[2] Where, for example, there is a violation of just administrative action in terms of the Final Constitution. Cf Claude Neon v City Council of Germiston 1995 (3) SA 710 (W), 1995 (5) BCLR 556 (W); De Waal et al Bill of Rights (supra) at 177.

[3] See FC s 38. Cf In re: The National Education Policy Bill No 83 of 1995 1996 (3) SA 289 (CC) at para 40; JT Publishing v Minister of Safety and Security 1997 (3) SA 514 (CC), 1996 (12) BCLR 1599 (CC).

[4] See De Waal et al Bill of Rights (supra) at 195. The authors contend a person who is prevented from voting must first lay a charge under the Electoral Act 73 of 1998 (ss 87-94 read with ss 97-99) and then bring an action under the actio injuriarum at common law. If these mechanisms do not provide the person with a remedy the court should assist him or her by developing the common law. If this cannot be done and the citizen is still unable to vote, he or she can then approach the court which 'must revisit the statutes, the common law and if necessary develop a new remedy that is appropriate to give effect to the constitutional right.' Ibid.

[5] Cf Kritzinger v Poskorporasie van Suid-Afrika (Edms) Bpk 1981 (2) SA 373, 389 (O).

[6] Mineworkers Investment Co (Pty) Ltd v Modilane 2002 (6) SA 512 (W) at para 28. See above § 38.2*(b)*(iv).

[7] Carmichele makes it clear that the courts must develop the common law actions and remedies to ensure that the spirit, purport and objects of the Constitution are vindicated.

[8] See supra § 38.2*(c)*(i).

[9] National Media Limited v Bogoshi 1998 (4) SA 1196 (SCA), 1999 (1) BCLR 1 (SCA). See below § 38.5.

[10] See supra § 38.3*(a)*(iii).

privacy (other than those express categories in s 14).[1] To impose strict liability for all forms of invasions of the constitutional right to privacy would involve negating the traditional requirement of fault (more particularly, animus injuriandi)[2] for claims under the actio injuriarum.[3]

If strict liability is imposed for an invasion of the constitutional right to privacy the only defence open to the defendant would be to show that the statutory provision could be justified by reference to the limitation clause in the Constitution.[4] The analysis would proceed as follows. At the first stage — the rights stage — the defendant merely has to give an explanation of why the plaintiff does not have a reasonable expectation of privacy (eg, where a 'participant' monitors a conversation with a colleague suspected of committing a crime).[5] If the defendant succeeds that is the end of the matter. If the defendant fails, then the question arises as to whether his or her conduct is protected by the limitation clause. The justification in terms of the limitation clause could be regarded as a special defence to a claim for a breach of a constitutional fundamental right which must be proved on a balance of probabilities.[6]

38.4 Privacy and Juristic Persons

At common law it was previously thought that as privacy is primarily a human trait, an action for invasion of privacy would not be open to artificial or juristic persons.[7] Artificial or juristic persons could not sue for invasion of privacy because they did not have a body or dignitas or feelings or self-respect. They could, on the other hand, sue for defamation.[8] The Appellate Division did, however, hold that an artificial person may have a right to privacy.[9]

[1] In terms of s14 people have the right not to have their (a) person or home searched; (b) property searched; (c) possessions seized; or (d) the privacy of their communications infringed.

[2] See above § 38.2*(a)*(ii)(aa).

[3] See D McQuoid-Mason 'Invasion of Privacy: Common Law v Constitutional Delict — Does It make a Difference?' (2000) Acta Juridica 227, 260.

[4] Conduct alone, without a statutory basis, could not be justified because it would not constitute a law of general application. See Woolman 'Limitations' (supra) at § 12.5.

[5] Cf S v Dube 2000 (1) SACR 53, 75-6 (N), 2000 (6) BCLR 685 (N), 2000 (2) SA 583 (N). See above §38.3*(a)*(i)(bb).

[6] The defences for invasion of privacy are similar to the defences for defamation. See Janse van Vuuren v Kruger 1993 (4) SA 842, 849-50 (A). In defamation if a defendant cannot prove on a balance of probabilities that defence of truth for the public benefit he or she can fall back on the defence of reasonable publication. See Khumalo and others v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC) at para 43. Either defence may indicate that the defendant's conduct was reasonable and justifiable in terms of the limitation clause in s 36.

[7] Cf Universiteit van Pretoria v Tommie Meyer Films 1977 (4) SA 376 (T) and Universiteit van Pretoria v Tommie Meyer Films (Edms) Bpk 1979 (1) SA 441, 453-4 (A); McQuiod-Mason Privacy (supra) at 191.

[8] Universiteit van Pretoria v Tommie Meyer Films (Edms) Bpk 1979 (1) SA 441, 453-4 (A).

[9] Financial Mail (Pty) Ltd & others v Sage Holdings Ltd & another 1993 (2) SA 451 (A) (a corporation had the right to sue for invasion of privacy where a newspaper had obtained information from a private memorandum and unlawful tape recordings).

Because privacy rights are generally justified by reference to personal autonomy,[1] their protection should generally be limited to natural persons.[2] That said, it seems consistent with the nature of the right that juristic persons should be able to claim certain informational privacy rights,[3] unless no reasonable expectation of privacy exists.[4] This view accords with the informational rights protected under the common law in Financial Mail (Pty) Ltd & others v Sage Holdings Ltd & another.[5] It also conforms to the position on the privacy rights of juristic persons set out in AK Entertainment CC v Minister of Safety and Security.[6] The Constitutional Court has also held that juristic persons enjoy the right to privacy in terms of the Constitution. However, because they are not bearers of human dignity, their privacy is less deserving of protection.[7] Nonetheless 'what is clear is that the right to privacy is applicable, where appropriate, to a juristic person'.[8]

38.5 Privacy and Limitations Analysis

(a) Limitations of personal autonomy privacy

The right to privacy is not absolute.[9] In personal autonomy privacy cases involving the possession of pornography or conducting of sexual relationships — even though they may involve the 'inner sanctum' of the privacy continuum — certain conduct may be justifiably limited. For instance, it may be reasonable and justifiable to outlaw the possession of child pornography[10] or sexual relationships involving children or animals.[11]

In S v Jordan and others[12] the Constitutional Court had to decide whether ss 2, 3*(b)* and (c) and 20(1)(aA) of the Sexual Offences Act[13] were unconstitutional and invalid. In the course of the judgments the court considered whether in the context of the right to privacy the provisions could be justified in terms of the limitations clause of the Interim Constitution. Ngcobo J wrote:

---

[1] See supra §§ 38.2.(a)(iii)(aa) and 38.3*(a)*(i)(aa).

[2] Cf Bernstein (supra) at para 79.

[3] In the US juristic persons have been able to claim for certain informational privacy rights, particularly in respect of the so-called 'appropriation' cases. 'Constitutional Law' American Jurisprudence (2nd Edition 1972) 606 at para 16(A). Cf McQuoid-Mason Privacy (supra) at 192; Neethling Die Reg op Privaatheid (supra) at 295.

[4] Bernstein (supra) at para 90. Section 8(4) of the Constitution provides that: 'Juristic persons are entitled to the rights in the Bill of Rights to the extent required by the nature of the rights and of the juristic persons.'

[5] 1993 (2) SA 451 (A), (the corporation was suing to prevent the publication of unlawfully obtained information).

[6] 1995 (1) SA 783 (E), 1994 (4) BCLR 31 (E).

[7] Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences v Hyundai Motor Distributors 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC), 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC) at para 16.

[8] Ibid at para 17.

[9] See, generally, Woolman 'Limitations' (supra).

[10] Case v Minister of Safety and Security 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC), at para 107 (Madala J). See above § 38.3*(a)*(i)(aa).

[11] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at para 118 (Sachs J). See supra § 38.3*(a)*(i)(aa).

[12] 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC) ('Jordan').

[13] Act 23 of 1957.

> Having regard to the legitimate State interest in proscribing prostitution and brothel-keeping, viewed against the scope of the limitation on the right of the prostitute and brothel-keeper to earn a living, I conclude that if there be a limitation of the right to privacy, the limitation is justified.[1]

Likewise, Sachs J and O'Regan J agreed with the submission of Counsel for the State:

> Parliament could choose between prohibiting prostitution, regulating it or abstaining from addressing it at all. The Act opted for prohibition and, while this might carry with it certain problems, it is a constitutionally permissible legislative choice.[2]

The court found that it was a justifiable limitation of the right to privacy to criminalize prostitution in terms of s 20(1)(aA).[3]

(b) Limitations of informational privacy

The Constitutional Court has held that the provisions of ss 417(3) and 418(2) of the Companies Act[4] — which compel production of private possessions or private communications during the winding-up of a company — are justifiable.[5] The Court in Bernstein wrote:

> The public's interest in ascertaining the truth surrounding the collapse of the company, the liquidator's interest in a speedy and effective liquidation of the company and the creditors' and contributor's financial interests in the recovery of company assets must be weighed against this peripheral infringement of the right not to be subjected to seizure of private possessions.[6]

The court also found that the information sought at such hearings pertained to 'participation in a public sphere' and could not rightly be held to be 'inhering in the person'. There was no reasonable expectation of privacy.[7]

[1] Jordan (supra) at para 29.
[2] Ibid at para 92.
[3] Ibid at para 94.
[4] Act 61 of 1973.
[5] Bernstein (supra) at para 90 (Ackermann J).
[6] Ibid. The court also reaffirmed its decision in Ferreira v Levin NO & others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 127. There it held that s 417(2)(b) of the Companies Act, which requires persons examined under that section to answer questions which might incriminate them, and provides that any answers given may be used in evidence against them, was not a justifiable limitation in terms of s 33 under the Interim Constitution. The Court found that there was not an acceptable degree of proportionality between the legitimate objective sought to be achieved in s 417(2)(b) and the means chosen.
[7] Bernstein (supra) at para 85.

The lower courts have also held that although the interrogation requirements under ss 65 and 152 of the Insolvency Act[1] infringed a debtor's right to privacy, such infringements are justified. The courts concluded that the rights of a creditor should enjoy preference over the insolvent's right to privacy in pre-sequestration matters.[2] Likewise, it has been held that the power of the Director of the Office for Serious Economic Offences, in terms of s 7 of the Investigation of Serious Economic Offences Act,[3] to decide whether or not to permit disclosures concerning information obtained as a result of an enquiry, search and seizure conducted in terms of the Act, is reasonable and justifiable. It was deemed so because the Act required the Director to act intra vires section 7.[4]

It has been held that the arbitrary powers of search and seizure given to inspectors under s 7(3) of the Business Practices Act[5] are not reasonable and justifiable.[6] They failed the limitations test because there was no reason why they could not be subject to the same well-articulated controls laid down in s 21 of the Criminal Procedure Act.[7]

There have been conflicting High Court decisions concerning the validity of the provisions governing the seizure of property in terms of the Proceeds of Crime Act[8] and the National Prosecuting Authority Act.[9] In Bathgate, the powers of seizure justified in terms of s 36. In Hyundai the powers of seizure were failed the limitations test.[10]

---

[1] Act 24 of 1936.

[2] Podlas v Cohen and Bryden NO & others 1994 (4) SA 662 (T), 1994 (3) BCLR 137 (T).

[3] Act 117 of 1991.

[4] Park-Ross v Director, Office for Serious Economic Offences 1995 (2) SA 148 (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 198 (C).

[5] Act 71 of 1988.

[6] Janse van Rensburg NO v Minister van Handel en Nywerheid en 'n ander 1999 (2) BCLR 204 (T).

[7] Act 51 of 1977.

[8] Act 76 of 1996, s 36; Director of Public Prosecutions: Cape of Good Hope v Bathgate 2000 (1) SACR 105, 135 (C), 2000 (2) SA 535 (C), 2000 (2) BCLR 151 (C) (powers of seizure justified in terms of s 36.)

[9] Act 32 of 1998; Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd v Smith NO 2000 (1) SACR 503 (T), 2000 (2) SA 934 (T), [2000] 1 All SA 259 (T)(powers of seizure not justified in terms of s 36).

[10] Gardener v Whitaker 1995 (2) SA 672, 686 (E), 1994 (5) BCLR 19 (E); S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 65 (CC) at para 102; Park-Ross v Director, Office for Serious Economic Offences 1995 (2) SA 148, 162 (C), 1995 (2) BCLR 198 (C); Director of Public Prosecutions: Cape of Good Hope v Bathgate (supra) at 126-127.

39 Life

Marius Pieterse

39.1	Introduction	39–1
39.2	The object of protection: 'life'	39–2
39.3	The subjects of protection: 'everyone'	39–3
39.4	End-of-life decision-making	39–6
39.5	The obligation to respect the right to life	39–8
	(a) The core of the right to life: A prohibition on killing	39–8
	(b) Beyond the core	39–13
39.6	The obligation to protect the right to life	39–14
39.7	The obligation to promote the right to life	39–16
39.8	The obligation to fulfil the right to life	39–17

Life
11. Everyone has the right to life.[1]

39.1 INTRODUCTION

> The right to life is the most basic, the most fundamental, the most primordial and supreme right which human beings are entitled to have and without which the protection of all other human rights becomes either meaningless or less effective. If there is no life, then there is nothing left of human dignity. Only when life exists can we be concerned with how to make it worth living and to prevent it from being undermined by various acts and omissions that endanger it. The protection of life is therefore an essential pre-requisite to the full enjoyment of all other human rights.[2]

The right to life is recognized in most legal and constitutional systems (to the extent that it is regarded as a norm of customary international law). It is often termed the 'most basic' human right, since its enjoyment is an essential pre-requisite for the meaningful exercise of all other rights. Given the near universal acceptance of its importance, it is perhaps surprising that there is little consensus on the normative content of the right to life. International human rights instruments and foreign constitutions or human rights legislation tend to emphasize different aspects of, or limits to, its enjoyment.[3]

In South Africa, a similar lack of consensus among the constitutional drafters resulted in the deliberately broad and unqualified formulation of the right in the Interim Constitution.[4] The open texture of the provision meant that controversies related to the normative content of the right, and its application to controversial social issues such as the death penalty and abortion, were deferred, and left largely, though not exclusively, to judicial resolution.[5] The Final Constitution retained this open-ended formulation.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Act 108 of 1996)('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

[2] F Menghistu 'The Satisfaction of Survival Requirements' in BG Ramcharan (ed) The Right to Life in International Law (1985) 63.

[3] T Desch 'The Concept and Dimensions of the Right to Life as Defined in International Standards and in International and Comparative Jurisprudence' (1985) 36 Österreichische Zeitschrift für Öffentliches Recht und Völkerrecht 77, 79-87 (Engages entrenchment of the right in various foreign constitutions). As to international law, compare for instance the following formulations in treaties that South Africa has ratified. Article 6(1) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966)('ICCPR') reads: '1. Every human being has the inherent right to life. This right shall be protected by law. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his life'. Article 6 of the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child (1989) reads: '1. States Parties recognize that every child has the inherent right to life. 2. States Parties shall ensure to the maximum extent possible the survival and development of the child'. Article 4 of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (1986) reads: 'Human beings are inviolable. Every human being shall be entitled to respect for his life and the integrity of his person. No one may be arbitrarily deprived of this right'.

[4] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').

[5] See LM du Plessis 'Whither Capital Punishment and Abortion under South Africa's Transitional Constitution?' (1994) 7 SACJ 145, 146-48 and 161.

Commentators appear to accept that this open-ended formulation, read with the directive in FC s 7(2) that 'the state must respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights', allows for a broad and permissive interpretation of the right to life in South Africa.[1] Constraints on its ambit are said to be permitted only in so far as FC s 36 allows. Of course, this general proposition sheds no light on the right's content, its outer limits, its enforceability and its impact on various forms of state and private action.

39.2 The Object of Protection: 'Life'

At common law, legal personality (and thus 'life' in a legal sense) begins when birth is complete and ends when a doctor certifies that a person is dead.[2] However, while the common-law understanding of the end of life largely corresponds with the scientific/biological understanding of death, life in a biological sense may well begin significantly before the granting of legal personality. The value society places on biological life creates significant tension within a variety of legal doctrines: (1) our courts are unwilling to hold that no life is preferable over severely disabled life in relation to so-called 'wrongful life' actions;[3] (2) our legislation on termination reflects unease with late-term abortions;[4] and (3) the cessation of life-support for patients lacking cognitive or intellectual life remains hotly contested.[5]

However, life as a constitutional norm has as its aim more than the mere protection of biological or legal life against extinction. It appears to demand respect for and protection of something altogether more encompassing. In S v Makwanyane, O'Regan J wrote:

> The right to life is, in one sense, antecedent to all other rights in the Constitution. Without life in the sense of existence, it would not be possible to exercise rights or to be the bearer of them. But the right to life was included in the Constitution not simply to enshrine the right to existence. It is not life as mere organic matter that the Constitution cherishes, but the right to human life: the right to live as a human being, to be part of a broader

[1] See S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC)('Makwanyane')(Chaskalson P) at para 85 (Regarding the right to life in the Interim Constitution); Du Plessis (supra) at 151; I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 281.

[2] See R Keightly 'The Beginning and End of Legal Personality: Birth and Death' in B van Heerden, A Cockrell, R Keightley, J Heaton, B Clarke, JD Sinclair & T Mosikatsana (eds) Boberg's Law of Persons and the Family (2nd Edition, 1999) 28-29, 50-54 (Discussing the common-law definition of birth and related complexities and the problems occasioned by the lack of a more precise legal definition of death.)

[3] See Friedman v Glicksman 1996 (1) SA 1134, 1142H-I (W)(Court expresses this unwillingness and indicates that actions for wrongful life are not recognized in South African law); M Blackbeard 'Die Aksie vir "Wrongful Life": "To Be or not to Be"?' (1991) 54 THRHR 57, 66-67 (Argues that this reluctance to recognize such an action is indicative of the value South African society places on 'life' in a biological sense.) The recognition of 'wrongful life' claims thus appears to be inimical to the values associated with the right to life. Otherwise, the debate surrounding these claims seems unaffected by the right to life. See J Fedler 'Life' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 2, 1998) 15-9–15-10.

[4] See D Meyerson 'Abortion: The Constitutional Issues' (1999) 116 SALJ 50, 56-57.

[5] See Clarke v Hurst 1992 (4) SA 630, 649G-H, 653A-C (D).

> community, to share in the experience of humanity. This concept of human life is at the centre of our constitutional values. The Constitution seeks to establish a society where the individual value of each member of the community is recognized and treasured. The right to life is central to such a society.[1]

This understanding of life — which embraces the cognitive and intellectual experience of humanity — begins to illuminate the extension of FC s 11. It also begins to explain our society's hesitation with respect to the termination of biological life after conception but before birth (being more hesitant to allow for such termination later in pregnancy when the potential of cognitive human life in the sense understood here is at its greatest) and the termination of life (euthanasia) under conditions of terminal illness or debilitating pain (allowing for cessation of life support only where there is no or preciously little potential of ongoing cognitive or intellectual existence).[2]

39.3 The Subjects of Protection: 'Everyone'

The right to life attaches to every human being. And the Constitutional Court has indicated that there are no exceptions. Criminals, for instance, do not forfeit their right to life through their actions.[3] But the interaction and tensions between biological, legal and constitutional notions of 'life' mean that the term 'everyone' is controversial when it comes to the interests of an unborn foetus (a biological, but not legal, entity) in being born alive. The threshold question to be decided in debates about the permissibility of abortion is whether such a foetus can claim the right to life. If not, the right to life (at least as an enforceable subjective right[4]) is a [1] Makwanyane (supra) at para 326. See also Fedler (supra) at 3.

[2] From this understanding of life, the Court affirms the connection between the rights of life and dignity. As O'Regan J has remarked:

> The right to life, thus understood, incorporates the right to dignity. So the rights of human dignity and life are entwined. The right to life is more than existence, it is a right to be treated as a human being with dignity: without dignity, human life is substantially diminished. Without life, there cannot be dignity.

Makwanyane (supra) at para 327. See also Makwanyane (supra) at paras 84, 111, 144, 218, 222, 311. See also Currie & De Waal (supra) at 281 ('Entrenchment of the right to life requires the state to take a leading role in re-establishing respect for human life and dignity in South Africa'); S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36.

[3] See Makwanyane (supra) at paras 137 and 331. See also Mohamed v President of the Republic of South Africa 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) 685 (CC)('Mohamed') at paras 47 and 52; Currie & De Waal (supra) at 282.

[4] Some commentators argue that even if a foetus does not have a right to life, the values of life and dignity still inform the regulation of abortions in an open and democratic society. See M O'Sullivan 'Reproductive Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 37; Meyerson (supra) at 56-58; T Naude 'The Value of Life: A Note on Christian Lawyers Association of SA v Minister of Health' (1999) 15 SAJHR 541, 551-59.

non-starter. If a foetus does, however, have a right to life, then the permissibility of abortion will pit the foetus' right against the autonomy and the bodily integrity rights of the woman who wishes to terminate her pregnancy.[1]

International human rights documents are largely ambivalent on the question of whether a foetus has a right to life, while foreign constitutional systems take a variety of positions on the issue.[2] Even at South African common law, where a foetus was not regarded as a person and did not therefore enjoy any subjective rights, divisions of the Supreme Court expressed some disagreement as to whether the nasciturus-fiction could be used in abortion cases to protect a foetus' interests in being born alive.[3] In Christian League of Southern Africa v Rall, the OPD held that the fiction does not provide protection against abortion and that any 'rights' of an unborn foetus die with it when it is aborted.[4] The CPD disagreed in G v Superintendent, Groote Schuur Hospital.[5] It held that 'there is much to be said for recognising that an unborn child has a legal right to representation, or an interest capable of protection, in circumstances where its very existence is threatened.'[6]

The question of whether a foetus can rely on the constitutional protection of the right to life was thus bound to be controversial. Indeed, some traction might be gained by differences in wording between FC s 11 — which grants the right to life to 'everyone' — and the arguably more restrictive formulation of IC s 9 — which granted the right to 'every person'.[7] The question on the meaning of 'everyone' in this context came before the TPD in Christian Lawyers Association of SA v Minister of Health. The applicants challenged various provisions of the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Act on the basis that they violated the [1] See Du Plessis (supra) at 158, 163. Commentators are divided as to whether, if a foetus indeed has a right to life, it could ever be outweighed by the autonomy interests of a pregnant woman. For instance, Meyerson argues that, in light of the value that our society places on the rights to life and dignity, a woman's rights in this respect would generally not outweigh the foetus' right to life. Meyerson (supra) at 53. PJ Visser regards the limitation of a foetus' right to life in this respect as uncontroversial. PJ Visser 'Enkele Gedagtes oor die Moontlike Invloed van die Reg op Lewe in die Deliktereg' (1997) 30 De Jure 135, 140. Michelle O'Sullivan recognizes that the state's general interest in human dignity underwrites the legal proscription of late-term abortion. However, she does not attribute personhood to the foetus and thus does not set up a direct conflict between women's reproductive rights and foetal rights.

[2] See M Slabbert 'The Position of the Human Embryo and Foetus in International Law and its Relevance for the South African Context' (1999) 32 CILSA 336; Desch (supra) at 87-96.

[3] According to this doctrine, a foetus that ultimately comes to term is regarded as having been born at conception in instances where the fiction works to the foetus' advantage. On the invocation of this legal fiction at common law, see Keightly (supra) at 31-41.

[4] Christian League of Southern Africa v Rall 1981 (2) SA 821, 827G, 830A-B (O).

[5] G v Superintendent, Groote Schuur Hospital 1993 (2) SA 255 (C).

[6] Ibid at 259D-E (C).

[7] But see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 31.3*(a)*(Woolman discusses the beneficiaries of constitutional rights, in general, and the rights, if any, of a foetus, in particular. Woolman notes that the change in language was not meant to reflect a change in content but was intended by the drafters to serve the ends of linguistic naturalness and transparency.) See, however, Fedler (supra) at 15-6 (Argues that the shift from 'every person' to 'everyone' may be significant for the abortion debate.)

constitutional right to life of unborn children.[1] McCreath J upheld an exception against the challenge, finding that, whatever the position may be at common law, the constitutional drafters did not intend for the concept 'everyone' to include unborn children.[2] Had this been the drafters' intention, McCreath J continued, the Final Constitution would either have contained an explicit provision to this effect, or unborn children would have been explicitly included in the definition of 'child' under FC s 28(3).[3] McCreath J also considered significant the drafters' refusal to limit the right to reproductive freedom in FC s 12(2)(a) to make allowance for the right to life of the foetus.[4] McCreath drew further support for his arguments from the absence of textual support for extending the protection of any other fundamental rights to unborn children. McCreath J concluded that '[t]o include the foetus in the meaning of that term ['everyone'] in s 11 would ascribe to it a meaning different from that which it bears everywhere else in the Bill of Rights'.[5] In the end, none of the challenged provisions of the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Act were deemed to infringe the right to life.[6] Given the sweeping nature of the Christian Lawyers I Court's judgment, a reader might be forgiven for assuming that pregnant women's rights to bodily integrity, equality, dignity, freedom of belief and access to reproductive health care services would trump foetal rights to life.[7]

However, the Christian Lawyers I Court's interpretation of the word 'everyone' in FC s 11 did not entirely settle the question as to whether the right to life or the right to dignity might, if properly construed, afford some protection to foetal life in South Africa. In Christian Lawyers II, Mojapelo J held that, while FC ss 12(2)(a) and (b) guarantee the right of every woman to determine the fate of her pregnancy, the state retains a legitimate dignity interest in the protection of life, generally, and of pre-natal life, in particular.[8] Although any regulation grounded in this dignity interest may not amount to a denial of a woman's right to reproductive autonomy, it appears that the rights to dignity and to life may well have a meaningful role to play in the regulation of abortion.[9]

[1] Act 92 of 1996.

[2] Christian Lawyers Association of SA v Minister of Health 1998 (4) SA 1113, 1117I-J, 1120H-1121H, 1123C (T), 1998 (11) BCLR 1434 (T)('Christian Lawyers Association I').

[3] Ibid at 1121G-H, 1122B-E.

[4] Ibid at 1121I-J.

[5] Ibid at 1122H-I.

[6] For criticism of the Christian Lawyers Association I Court's reasoning, see Naude (supra) at 541-48; Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.3*(a)*.

[7] See Christian Lawyers Association I (supra) at 1123E-G.

[8] See Christian Lawyers Association v National Minister of Health & Others 2005 (1) SA 509, 526 (T), 2004 (10) BLLR 1086, 1103 (T)('Christian Lawyers II').

[9] For more on how dignity interests play out in the context of reproductive rights and the 'life' of a foetus, see S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36; O'Sullivan (supra) at § 37.8; Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.3*(a)*.

39.4 End-of-life Decision-making

Despite its fundamental nature, it would seem that there are circumstances in which subjects may exercise their rights to life and to autonomy in a manner that extinguishes the object of the right to life. Legal systems around the world typically tolerate suicide.[1] They also generally accept the legal principle that every person is free to refuse life-saving or life-prolonging medical treatment, even when such refusal would cause or accelerate their death.[2]

In the case of life-saving treatment, the right to life appears to prohibit the refusal of treatment on behalf of someone else who lacks the capacity to do so himself. In Hay v B, the WLD authorized a blood transfusion to an infant despite the refusal of the treatment by the infant's parents. The Hay Court overruled the parents' refusal of consent, in its capacity as upper guardian of all minors, because the infant would die if the transfusion were not performed. The Hay Court was not prepared to 'negate the essential content' of the child's 'inviolable' right to 'live as a human being, be part of a broader community and share in the experience of humanity' merely because administering the transfusion was against the wishes and the sincere beliefs of his parents.[3]

Refusing life-prolonging treatment on behalf of another adult is a more vexed question. Whereas there is no legal duty artificially to keep someone alive who is clinically dead, it is less certain whether life-prolonging treatment may be discontinued where a patient lacks the capacity for cognitive or intellectual life but remains clinically alive.[4] In Clarke v Hurst, which pre-dated the Interim Constitution and thus did not explicitly involve the right to life, the Durban Supreme Court authorized the discontinuance of artificial life support on a patient who, despite his biological life-functions being described as 'stable', completely lacked cognitive or intellectual awareness due to severe brain-stem injury from which there was no chance of recovery.[5] The patient's wife had applied for an order to be appointed his curatrix personae and sought, in that capacity, to authorize the acceleration of her husband's death through the cessation of his gastric feeding and hydration treatment regimes. The Clarke Court held that the wrongfulness or otherwise of such an authorization depended on whether, according to the legal convictions of the community, the discontinuation of the treatment would be reasonable in light of the quality of life remaining to the patient and of his physical and mental status.[6] Given the patient's complete lack of cognitive or intellectual

[1] See Desch (supra) at 99. Committing or attempting suicide is not a crime in South Africa. See S v Gordon 1962 (4) SA 727 (N); Ex parte Minister van Justisie: In re S v Grotjohn 1970 (2) SA 355 (A).

[2] See Desch (supra) at 99; Fedler (supra) at 8. See also Castell v De Greeff 1994 (4) SA 408, 420J-421D (C).

[3] Hay v B 2003 (3) SA 492, 486B-E (W).

[4] See S v Williams 1986 (4) SA 1188 (A); Currie & De Waal (supra) at 289.

[5] Clarke v Hurst 1992 (4) SA 630, 649G-H, 653A-C (D)('Clarke').

[6] Ibid at 653A-C.

life and the irreversibility of his condition, the order was granted.[1] The 'qualitative conception of life' accepted in Clarke corresponds with the broader understanding of the object of the right to life advanced by O'Regan J in S v Makwanyane.[2] Read together, the cases suggest that extinguishing the object of the right to life of another through the refusal of life-prolonging treatment may be permissible in circumstances where the object of that other person's right has irreversibly been reduced to nothing more than biological existence.

Clarke is also authority for the proposition that South African law tolerates refusal of life-sustaining treatment by means of a so-called 'living will'.[3] A living will is a document in terms of which an able-bodied person commits to writing her refusal of life-sustaining medical treatment to apply in future circumstances where it is impossible to obtain her express consent to such treatment and where there is little or no hope that she would recover from a severely debilitating injury or condition.[4]

Clarke does not, however, answer the more controversial question of whether a person may request the termination of his life in circumstances where he remains cognitively and intellectually alive, but where his quality of life has so deteriorated that he considers life no longer to be worth living. Requesting active euthanasia is more controversial than refusal of life-sustaining treatment by means of a living will, since what is extinguished in cases of active euthanasia is not merely biological life, but also cognitive and intellectual life.[5] Even more controversial still are situations of active euthanasia where a patient does not himself expressly request the acceleration of death. The question of the permissibility of active euthanasia is often depicted as conflict between the right to life and various rights that secure individual autonomy.[6] However, given, first, the close connection between the rights to life and to dignity and, second, the fact that death is an inextricable part of life, one can argue that the right to life includes a right to die with dignity and that the right to die with dignity supports requests for active euthanasia.[7]

Whereas instances of active euthanasia in South Africa have historically resulted in criminal prosecution, courts have typically treated persons found guilty

[1] Clarke (supra) at 649A-H.

[2] See Fedler (supra) at 15-8.

[3] Ibid. See also Currie & De Waal (supra) at 289. The patient in Clarke was a member of the South African Voluntary Euthanasia Society and had signed a living will in terms of which he was not to receive life-sustaining medical treatment in circumstances where there were no reasonable prospects of his recovery from extreme physical or mental disability. See Clarke (supra) at 633E-634A.

[4] On the interpretation of the right to life in the context of living wills or powers of attorney generally, see C Wellman 'The Inalienable Right to Life and the Durable Power of Attorney' (1995) 14 Law & Philosophy 245.

[5] On euthanasia as a waiver of the right to life, see Desch (supra) at 97-100.

[6] See Fedler (supra) at 15-8; Currie & De Waal (supra) at 288.

[7] See L M du Plessis & J R de Ville 'Personal Rights: Life, Freedom and Security of the Person, Privacy, and Freedom of Movement' in D van Wyk, B de Villiers, J Dugard & D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (1994) 212, 232.

of murder under such circumstances with 'conspicuous leniency' in sentencing.[1] In its Report on Euthanasia and the Artificial Preservation of Life, the South African Law Commission (SALC) declined to take a final position on the question of active euthanasia.[2] Instead, it suggested three alternative models of regulating the practice to the legislature. The first is to leave the current legal position intact (and hence to allow courts to decide on whether a conviction is warranted and, if it so finds, to craft appropriate sentences for 'mercy killers'.) Under the second model, medical practitioners would be allowed to give effect to the explicit request of a terminally ill but mentally competent patient for the acceleration of her death, provided that they adhere to strict procedural guidelines. Under the third model, a multi-disciplinary panel or committee would be constituted to decide on requests for active euthanasia.[3] Under all three models, instances of active euthanasia in the absence of an express request by the patient would remain open for prosecution. None of these models has, as yet, been adopted by the legislature.

Should the right to life be interpreted as encompassing a right to die with dignity, a legislative scheme along the lines proposed by the SALC would probably not amount to an infringement of the right to life. But, even if such legislation were held to infringe a (more narrowly interpreted) right to life, commentators have suggested that such infringement would constitute a reasonable and justifiable limitation thereof, given the value that society attaches to the right to dignity, in particular, and to autonomy, in general.[4]

39.5 The Obligation to Respect the Right to Life

(a) The core of the right to life: A prohibition on killing

At its core, the right to life protects human life from extinction. To kill or to condone the killing of a person thus amounts to an infringement of the right to life. And yet, there are 'exceptionally compelling' circumstances in which open and democratic societies regard such an infringement as justifiable.[5]

The most widely debated example of such killing is the death penalty, which, perhaps surprisingly, is not altogether impermissible at international law. Article 6 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights contains an express

[1] Compare, for instance, the sentences passed in S v Hartmann 1975 (3) SA 532 (C); S v De Bellocq 1975 (3) SA 538 (T); S v Smorenburg 1992 (2) SACR 389 (C).

[2] South African Law Commission Report Euthanasia and the Artificial Preservation of Life Project 86 (November 1998)('SALC Euthanasia Report').

[3] See SALC Euthanasia Report (supra) at 228-232. The SALC's proposal allows for instances of 'passive euthanasia' such as that authorised in Clarke.

[4] See Fedler (supra) at 8-9; Currie & De Waal (supra) at 289.

[5] Accordingly, it is often said that the core of the right to life consists only of a guarantee against 'arbitrary' or 'unjust' killing. See Desch (supra) at 102-106; Du Plessis & De Ville (supra) at 222; Meghistu (supra) at 64; H Rudolph 'The 1993 Constitution — Some Thoughts on its Effect on Certain Aspects of Our System of Criminal Procedure' (1994) 111 SALJ 497, 500; Currie & De Waal (supra) at 282-283.

limitation on the right to life that allows for the death penalty to be imposed 'for the most serious crimes', subject to adherence to rigorous procedural safeguards.[1] In commenting on this provision, however, the UN Human Rights Committee (UNHRC) has indicated that the death penalty should only be tolerated in highly exceptional circumstances, and that its abolition is 'desirable' and is 'considered as progress in the enjoyment of the right to life'.[2]

The Constitutional Court declared the death penalty unconstitutional in S v Makwanyane. Chaskalson P viewed the penalty primarily as an unjustifiable violation of the guarantee against cruel and inhuman punishment (in terms of IC s 11(2)), but stated that his reading of IC s 11(2) was informed by the right to life in IC s 9.[3] He also held that the state had to demonstrate respect for the rights to life and dignity in everything it does, including the manner in which it punishes criminals. The fact that the death penalty failed to demonstrate such respect contributed to the Court's finding it unconstitutional.[4]

Most of the other opinions in Makwanyane regard the death penalty as a violation of the right to life. This right, a number of justices held, at the very least entitled citizens not to be deliberately and systematically put to death by the state in a manner that disregarded their human dignity.[5] Several justices also noted that the death penalty did not merely limit, but totally extinguished, the right to life (and, hence, the enjoyment of all other constitutional rights).[6]

Another form of state-sanctioned killing enjoying limited recognition in international law is killing during warfare and armed conflict. Whereas international law typically regards such killing as permissible, provided it takes place in accordance with the rules of humanitarian law,[7] the UNHRC has emphasized that war

[1] Article 6(2)-(6) states: '2. In countries which have not abolished the death penalty, sentence of death may be imposed only for the most serious crimes in accordance with the law in force at the time of the commission of the crime and not contrary to the provisions of the present Covenant and to the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide. This penalty can only be carried out pursuant to a final judgment rendered by a competent court. 4. Anyone sentenced to death shall have the right to seek pardon or commutation of the sentence. Amnesty, pardon or commutation of the sentence of death may be granted in all cases. 5. Sentence of death shall not be imposed for crimes committed by persons below eighteen years of age and shall not be carried out on pregnant women. 6. Nothing in this article shall be invoked to delay or to prevent the abolition of capital punishment by any State Party to the present Covenant'. For discussion of similar restrictions on the right to life in other international instruments, see Desch (supra) at 108-111.

[2] UN Human Rights Committee General Comment 6 'The Right to Life' (Article 6 of the Convention)(16th Session, 1982)('GC 6') at para 6. See also GC 6 (supra) at para 7.

[3] Makwanyane (supra) at para 80. See also Makwanyane (supra) at para 95.

[4] Ibid at para 144.

[5] Ibid at paras 166 (Ackermann J), 174-76 (Didcott J), 193 (Kentridge AJ), 208 (Kriegler J), 217, 234 (Langa J), 269, 282 (Mahomed DP), 313, 317 (Mokgoro J), 333-34 (O'Regan J), 353-54 (Sachs J).

[6] See, for instance, Makwanyane (supra) at paras 270 (Mahomed DP) and 350-51, 353 (Sachs J). The Court has since reiterated its stance on the death penalty in Mohamed. Mohamed (supra) at para 39. See also Kaunda v President of the Republic of South Africa 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC)('Kaunda') at paras 98 (Chaskalson CJ) and 206 (Ngcobo J).

[7] See Desch (supra) at 114-115.

and related violence pose major threats to the right to life and that states accordingly have a duty to prevent warfare at all costs.[1] In Makwanyane, Chaskalson P recognized that it may be permissible to limit the right to life in warfare and armed conflict (provided that the state adheres to relevant international standards.)[2] Furthermore, Kentridge AJ remarked, in a separate judgment, that the right to life must not be understood to prohibit the state from defending itself against insurrection.[3] One would, however, expect that such killing would only be justifiable in circumstances where no other options were reasonably available to the state.

A further particularly controversial example of killing in furthering state interests is the use of lethal force in arrest, which certain international human rights instruments regard as amounting, in narrowly defined circumstances, to a justifiable limitation of the right to life.[4] In South Africa, such killing has for years been authorized by s 49 of the Criminal Procedure Act.[5] The Act provided for the use of such force as is reasonably necessary in the circumstances to effect an arrest, and determined that killing a person suspected of having committed an offence listed in Schedule 1 of the Act (which included a list of crimes ranging from serious violent crimes to significantly more mundane offences) would amount to justifiable homicide where there were no other means of affecting the arrest. Several commentators speculated that s 49(2), in conferring such wide indemnity on police officers and others who kill in the course of an arrest, probably amounted to an unjustifiable violation of the right to life.[6]

In Makwanyane, Chaskalson P deliberately refrained from pronouncing on the constitutionality of s 49(2), but stated that '[g]reater restriction on the use of lethal force may be one of the consequences of the establishment of a constitutional state which respects every person's right to life'.[7] Subsequently, the Northern Cape High Court held in Raloso v Wilson that while s 49(2) was probably unconstitutional, it ought to refrain from making a declaration to that effect because the legislature had indicated that it was revising the subsection at issue.[8] In Govender v Minister of Safety and Security, the Supreme Court of Appeal held, in relation to s 49(1) of the Criminal Procedure Act, that the state's duty to protect the rights

[1] UNHRC General Comment 6 (supra) at para 2.
[2] Makwanyane (supra) at para 139.
[3] Ibid at para 193.
[4] See GC 6 (supra) at para 3; art 2(2) of the European Convention of Human Rights; Desch (supra) at 111-14.
[5] Act 51 of 1977.
[6] See, for example, Du Plessis & De Ville (supra) at 215; Rudolph (supra) at 501-02; Visser (supra) at 144. For a useful comparison of the interests served and affected by killing in the course of arrest and the death penalty, which illustrates the likely unconstitutionality of such a broad indemnity for killing in the course of arrest, see D Bruce 'Killing and the Constitution — Arrest and the Use of Lethal Force' (2003) 19 SAJHR 430, 439-42.
[7] Makwanyane (supra) at para 140.
[8] Raloso v Wilson 1998 (4) SA 369, 377E-G, 378G-H (NC).

(including the right to life) of citizens extended to fleeing subjects and that the legitimacy of the use of force in arrest would depend on the outcome of a proportionality inquiry. In such an inquiry, the interests served by such force would be weighed against the interests infringed thereby. The Govender Court further indicated that the protection of property would, in all likelihood, not outweigh the rights of fleeing suspects to life and physical integrity.[1]

The Constitutional Court finally held that s 49(2) was unconstitutional in Ex Parte Minister of Safety and Security: In re S v Walters.[2] In a unanimous judgment, the Court reiterated its stance in Makwanyane on the value of the right to life and reaffirmed the state's duty to promote respect for the right in everything that it does.[3] Kriegler J stated that the rights to life, dignity and bodily integrity were 'individually essential and collectively foundational to the value system prescribed by the Constitution'[4] and regarded it as obvious that s 49(2) significantly limited these rights.[5] The Walters Court held that s 49(2) was unconstitutional because the interests it protected did not provide the 'weighty consideration' that would be necessary to justify the taking of a life.[6] The Walters Court stated that the question of how much force was permissible in an attempt to affect an arrest, had to be answered in light of 'the value our Constitution places on human life'.[7] It reiterated that the use of force in arrest would only be justified if deemed reasonably necessary in the circumstances, taking into account the seriousness of the offence allegedly committed by the suspect and the threat of violence posed by the suspect to the arresting officer or others.[8]

Subsequent to Walters, s 49(2) was amended to allow for the use of deadly force in circumstances where such force is immediately necessary to protect the arrestor or a third party, where delaying the arrest holds substantial risk of death or bodily harm to members of the public, and where the suspected offence is a serious one of a violent nature. To the extent that it provides for the use of force beyond the parameters laid down in Walters, the new s 49(2) reintroduces uncertainty over the constitutionality of statutory limitations placed upon the right to life in these circumstances.[9]

The horizontal application of the prohibition against killing is effected primarily through the criminalization of murder and culpable homicide. A pertinent limitation on the right to life in this context, recognized in the great majority of legal

[1] Govender der v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 273 (SCA), 2001 (11) BCLR 1197 (SCA)('Govender') at paras 8, 13, 19-22.
[2] 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC)('Walters').
[3] Ibid at paras 5-6.
[4] Ibid at para 28.
[5] Ibid at paras 29-30.
[6] Ibid at paras 40-41, 44. On the weighing of interests in this context, see Bruce (supra) at 446-49.
[7] Walters (supra) at para 53.
[8] Ibid at para 54.
[9] The terms and effects of the amendment are critically discussed by Bruce. See Bruce (supra) at 436-37, 449-451. Bruce prefers the more precise Walters formulation of circumstances in which lethal force is permissible.

systems, including South African common law, is the permissibility of killing in self-defence or in defence of another person.[1] In both Makwanyane and Walters, the Constitutional Court indicated that such killing in principle remains tolerable in a society committed to respect for the right to life. In Makwanyane, Chaskalson P stated that it was consistent with the general limitations clause, and indeed required by the right to life, to give preference to the lives of 'innocent' civilians over the lives of 'aggressors' in circumstances of private defence.[2] Unlike the death penalty, he continued, such private defence 'takes place at the time of the threat to the victim's life, at the moment of the emergency which gave rise to the necessity and, traditionally, under circumstances in which no less-severe alternative is readily available to the potential victim'.[3] In Walters, Kriegler J was at pains to point out that the unconstitutionality of s 49(2) of the Criminal Procedure Act in no way diminished the ability of police officers, or civilians, to defend life or physical safety by any means necessary.[4]

However, both judgments accept that our basic law severely constrains the entitlement to kill in private defence. As Chaskalson P stated in Makwanyane: 'There are strict limits to the taking of life, even in the circumstances that have been described, and the law insists upon these limits being adhered to.'[5] The permissibility of a limitation on the right to life through killing in private defence, as with killing in the cause of arrest, is determined through weighing the interests protected by the killing against those infringed.[6] While such a proportionality exercise is consistent with the common-law approach to determining the permissibility of killing in private defence, the value that the constitutional order places on the right to life likely means that the common law boundaries of permissibility have significantly contracted.

Whereas the common law allows for killing in defence of life, physical integrity and even, in extreme cases, property, Chaskalson P's judgment in Makwanyane appears to regard life as the only interest that may justify extinguishing the right to life of another.[7] In Ntamo v Minister of Safety and Security, the Transkei High Court stated that the boni mores in private defence cases are impacted by 'the sanctity of life, a fundamental right enshrined in s 11 of the Constitution' and endorsed the views of Chaskalson P in Makwanyane.[8] In S v Dougherty, the WLD similarly held that the impact of the right to life on an inquiry into the permissibility of private defence was to raise the common-law standard. It rejected, as a result, the

[1] On the common law definition of 'private defense' and the circumstances in which it is allowed, and the authority for these defenses, see Bruce (supra) at 233 .

[2] Makwanyane (supra) at para 138.

[3] Ibid. See also Makwanyane (supra) at paras 193 (Kentridge AJ), 270 (Mahomed DP), and 355-56 (Sachs J).

[4] Walters (supra) at paras 33, 51, 54.

[5] Makwanyane (supra) at para 138.

[6] Ibid. See also Walters (supra) at para 33; Bruce (supra) at 233.

[7] See Ex Parte die Minister van Justisie: In re S v Van Wyk 1967 (1) SA 488 (A).

[8] Ntamo v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (1) SA 830 (Tk) at para 35.

appellant's reliance on private defence since the appellant could not show that lethal force was necessary to protect his own life.[1] In Walters, however, Kriegler J appeared to accept that killing in defence of physical safety would, at least in circumstances where such safety is seriously threatened, amount to a justifiable limitation of the right to life.[2] This latter view seems more realistic, and appears to be consistent with the values of a society that values bodily and psychological integrity as well as life. What seems clear, however, is that killing in defence of property is not constitutionally permissible,[3] and that killing in defence of physical safety would only be so in circumstances where such safety is genuinely and seriously threatened.

The right to life may, ultimately, compel a shift with respect to both criminal and civil liability for the negligent causation of death. As for civil liability, the Supreme Court of Appeal remarked, obiter, in Johannesburg Country Club v Stott that it may be against public policy contractually to exclude such liability because of the high value placed by the Final Constitution on the sanctity of life.[4] This 'high value' may, in addition, influence the calculation of damages in delictual cases concerning the negative causation of death in dependants' actions.

(b) Beyond the core

The Final Constitution's broad conception of 'life' ensures that FC s 11 protects South Africans against injuries that result in a significant diminution of their cognitive and intellectual capacity. The right to life therefore features in the calculation of delictual damages to compensate for the wrongful causation of loss of amenities of life and/or reduced life expectancy.[5]

In the realm of criminal law, a broad conception of the right to life raises the question of whether the right is unjustifiably limited by a sentence of life imprisonment. In an unreported judgment of the Namibian High Court in S v Tijo, it was held that, because life imprisonment significantly diminishes the experience of human life for a convicted person's entire lifespan, such a sentence was akin to 'a sentence of death' and accordingly amounted to an unconstitutional infringement of the right to life in the Namibian Constitution.[6] This view was subsequently rejected by the Namibian Supreme Court in S v Tcoeib. While seemingly accepting that life imprisonment significantly restricts enjoyment of life, the Court

[1] S v Dougherty 2003 (2) SACR 36 (W) at paras 38-39. For criticism of this aspect of the judgment, see CR Snyman 'Private Defence in Criminal Law — an Unwarranted Raising of the Test of Reasonableness' (2004) 67 THRHR 325, 330-31.

[2] See Walters (supra) at para 51.

[3] See Govender (supra) at para 22. See also Visser (supra) at 143.

[4] Johannesburg Country Club v Stott 2004 (5) SA 511 (SCA) at para 12.

[5] See Visser (supra) at 137-38, 141-42.

[6] S v Nehemia Tijo High Court of Namibia 4/9/91 (unreported), quoted and discussed in S v Tcoeib 1996 (1) SACR 390, 396A-H (NmS).

regarded it as significant that such a sentence, unlike the death penalty, did not involve the extinction of the right to life. Rather, Mahomed CJ viewed a sentence of life imprisonment as justifiably infringing the right to liberty of an imprisoned person.[1] Similarly, at least two judges in Makwanyane distinguished the death penalty from long-term imprisonment. They did so on the grounds that the latter did not involve the complete extinction of the rights to life and to dignity associated with the former.[2]

While certainly not comparable to the death penalty, a sentence of life-imprisonment does appear to be at odds with the broad understanding of the right to life endorsed elsewhere in Makwanyane. Life imprisonment is not solely concerned with the limitation of liberty interests. Because it involves a significant diminution of the right to 'human life' and 'to share in the experience of humanity', life imprisonment would constitute a justifiable limitation of the right to life only when imposed as punishment for the most heinous of offences.[3]

39.6 The Obligation to Protect the Right to Life

When read with FC s 7(2), it is clear that the right to life, in addition to providing a safeguard against killing or significant diminution of quality of life, imposes positive obligations on the state. Among these obligations is the duty to protect the right to life against unlawful outside threats. At a minimum, the state is required to punish the unlawful deprivation or diminution of life through the effective implementation of criminal law. However, the duty imposed by FC s 11 read with FC s 7(2) extends beyond punishment and encompasses an obligation to protect citizens from unlawful threats to their life and physical integrity.[4]

In Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security, the Constitutional Court found that the common law of delict was in need of development in order to comport with the constitutional entrenchment of rights to life, to dignity and to freedom and security of the person.[5] The Court further endorsed a dictum by the European Court of Human Rights, according to which the right to life 'may also imply in certain well-defined circumstances a positive obligation on the authorities to take

[1] Tcoeib (supra) at 396H-397C.

[2] See Makwanyane (supra) at paras 142 (Chaskalson P), and 196 (Kentridge AJ).

[3] On relationship between rights to life and right to dignity and the Court's jurisprudence on life imprisonment, see S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36; D van zyl Smit 'Sentencing and Punishment' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 49. See also S v Dodo 2001 (3) SA 382 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 423 (CC).

[4] See GC 6 (supra) at para 3; Makwanyane (supra) at para 193 (Kentridge AJ); BG Ramcharan 'The Concepts and Dimensions of the Right to Life' in BG Ramcharan (ed) The Right to Life in International Law (1985) 1, 7; Currie & De Waal (supra) at 285-86.

[5] Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 995 (CC)('Carmichele') at para 44.

preventative operational measures to protect an individual whose life is at risk from the criminal acts of another individual.'[1] While it did not speak directly to the existence of a positive obligation in terms of the right to life, the Carmichele Court signalled that the right imposed more than a negative duty of non-interference.

In Rail Commuters Action Group v Transnet t/a Metrorail, the Cape High Court recognized that the state actors in question 'have a legal duty to protect the lives and property of members of the public who commute by rail',[2] a finding informed by a purposive interpretation of the rights to life and to freedom from violence.[3] In upholding an appeal against the partial overturning of this judgment by the Supreme Court of Appeal, the Constitutional Court reiterated that the rights to life, to dignity and to freedom and security of the person sometimes imposed positive obligations on the State.[4] The Rail Commuters Action Group Court confirmed the respondents' duty to take reasonable measures to provide for the security of rail commuters, but found it unnecessary to locate such an obligation in the relevant constitutional rights. Instead, it found the duty implicit in the provisions of the Legal Succession to the South African Transport Services Act[5] read in light of FC ss 10, 11 and 12.[6]

Whereas the existence of an obligation to protect the lives of citizens, inherent in the right to life, thus appears to be beyond question, the extent of this obligation remains uncertain. In giving effect to the Constitutional Court's implied directive to develop the common law in Carmichele, the Supreme Court of Appeal stated that an obligation to protect the lives of citizens is not absolute and that liability for non-compliance with such an obligation would result only in circumstances where security officers were aware, or should reasonably have been aware, of a 'real and immediate risk to life' and where they failed to take such action within their powers as might reasonably 'have been expected to avoid that risk'.[7] The Supreme Court of Appeal has also suggested, in passing, that such an obligation does not operate horizontally, notwithstanding the constitutional entrenchment of the right to life.[8]

An interesting and related question is whether the obligation to protect the right to life extends to the protection of foetal life, even if it is accepted that a foetus cannot be a subjective beneficiary of the right to life. Given the high regard

[1] Osman v United Kingdom 29 EHHR 245 (ECHR) at para 115, quoted and endorsed in Carmichele (supra) at para 45.

[2] Rail Commuters Action Group v Transnet t/a Metrorail 2003 (3) BCLR 288, 352C-D (C).

[3] Ibid at 335H-I.

[4] Rail Commuters Action Group v Transnet t/a Metrorail 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC)('Rail Commuters') at paras 66 and 70

[5] Act 9 of 1989

[6] Rail Commuters (supra) at paras 72, 84, 111(3).

[7] Minister of Safety and Security v Carmichele 2004 (3) SA 305 (SCA), 2004 (2) BCLR 133 (SCA) at para 33, quoting from Osman (supra) at para 116. See also NK v Minister of Safety and Security 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC).

[8] Minister of Safety and Security v Van Duivenboden 2002 (6) SA 431 (SCA) at para 33.

that the Final Constitution has for the values of life and human dignity, the state may have an obligation to protect foetal life in a manner that might justify limitations on women's reproductive rights.[1] This interest might require a court to look harder at the justifications for late-term abortions endorsed by the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Act.[2]

39.7 The Obligation to Promote the Right to Life

In Makwanyane, Chaskalson P concluded that the state had to demonstrate respect for the right to life in 'everything that it does'.[3] That an obligation to promote respect for the right to life in this manner was more than a mere rhetorical flourish became apparent in Mohamed v President of the RSA. In Mohamed, the Constitutional Court held that immigration authorities 'failed to give any value to Mohamed's right to life' when allowing for his extradition to the United States in order to stand trial for an offence that could result in the imposition of the death penalty.[4] Given that the death penalty is inimical to the right to life in the Final Constitution, the state was held to have breached a constitutional obligation by allowing for the deportation or extradition of a person without first securing the assurance that he would not be sentenced to death.[5]

Whereas the Mohamed order included a directive to bring the judgment to the attention of the trial court in the United States, the majority of the Constitutional Court subsequently held in Kaunda v President of the RSA that the obligation to promote respect for the right to life did not extend to ensuring that the provisions of the Final Constitution are adhered to by foreign governments. As has been noted elsewhere, the two decisions are difficult to square with one another.[6] While the government ordinarily required assurance from foreign states that the death penalty would not be imposed on South African citizens, the majority in Kaunda was not prepared to direct the state to insist on such assurance in relation to crimes committed by South African nationals in countries where the death penalty was allowed in accordance with international law.[7] O'Regan J dissented

[1] I have in mind late-pregnancy abortions and deliberate foetal 'harvesting' for commercial, research or other reasons. See Meyerson (supra) at 56-58 (Argues that such an obligation may be derived from the constitutional value of human dignity.) But see Naude (supra) at 551-559 (Views the obligation as flowing from the value of life underlying FC s 11.)

[2] See Meyerson (supra) at 56-58 (Meyerson regards the current provisions of the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Act as striking an adequate balance between women's autonomy and equality rights on the one hand and the State's obligation to protect foetal life on the other.)

[3] Makwanyane (supra) at para 144.

[4] Mohamed (supra) at para 48.

[5] Ibid at paras 47-48, 52, 58, 73.

[6] S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein & M Chaskalson (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 31.5 (On the extraterritorial effect of the Final Constitution.)

[7] Kaunda (supra) at paras 32, 37, 44-45, 56, 70, 98-102, 144. The matter was accordingly distinguished from Mohamed on the basis that Mohamed was present in South Africa, and could thus avail himself of the protection of the Final Constitution. Ibid at paras 49-50, 56. It would appear that Chaskalson CJ did contemplate the operation of a duty to promote respect for rights as forming a part of customary international law in such circumstances.

on the grounds that the obligation to promote respect for the rights in the Bill of Rights also bound the South African government when conducting diplomatic affairs or otherwise acting extra-territorially. On her reading of Mohamed, the government was ordinarily under an obligation to ensure that South African citizens would not be sentenced to death elsewhere in the world.[1] Similarly, Sachs J reasoned that the government was obliged to do what was reasonably within its power to ensure that South Africans are not subjected to the death penalty elsewhere.[2] While O'Regan J's judgment gives better effect to the obligation to promote the right to life, a joint reading of Mohamed and Kaunda suggests that, at a minimum, state actions which do not themselves violate the right to life but which render the right vulnerable to infringement by others (in South Africa or elsewhere) fall foul of the obligation to promote respect for the right insofar as such actions fall within the territorial reach of the Final Constitution.

39.8 The Obligation to Fulfil the Right to Life

The existence of an obligation to fulfil the right to life was first acknowledged in South African constitutional jurisprudence by Sachs J in S v Makwanyane. Sachs J wrote that an 'objective approach in relation to the enjoyment of the right to life' entailed that 'the State is under a duty to create conditions to enable all persons to enjoy the right'.[3] This objective approach entails more than protecting the existence of citizens' lives from unlawful infringement by their peers. Enjoyment of the right to 'human life' and to 'share in the experience of humanity' depends not only on biological existence and cognitive and intellectual ability, but also on material means and access to social goods. As Joanne Fedler observes:

> Both materially and philosophically, life depends upon resources essential for the preservation and quality of existence. Inherent in a broader notion of life is a value judgment about what constitutes an acceptable quality of life. So whilst life may be a value in and of itself, without water, food, livelihood, friendship, and recreation it may not be worth living.[4]

The obligation to fulfil the right to life, therefore, involves satisfaction of the socio-economic dimensions of the right[5] and thus intersects with various positive obligations that the state must heed in terms of FC ss 26, 27, 28 and 35.

[1] Kaunda (supra) at paras 229, 231, 249, 253.
[2] Ibid at para 275.
[3] Makwanyane (supra) at para 353.
[4] Fedler (supra) at 15-2.
[5] That the right to life encompasses such socio-economic dimensions has also been affirmed in international law, with the UNHRC remarking that '[t]he expression "inherent right to life" cannot properly be understood in a restrictive manner, and the protection of this right requires that States adopt positive measures. In this connection, the Committee considers that it would be desirable for States parties to take all possible measures to reduce infant mortality and to increase life expectancy, especially in adopting measures to eliminate malnutrition and epidemics.' GC 6 (supra) at para 5. In international human rights law scholarship, the right to life is accordingly regarded as a prime example of the interdependence and indivisibility of civil and political rights and socio-economic rights. See C Scott 'The Interdependence and Permeability of Human Rights Norms: Towards a Partial Fusion of the International Covenants on Human Rights' (1989) 27 Osgoode Hall LJ 769, 781, 875, 878; Menghistu (supra) at 78.

Two 'categories' of socio-economic interests may be regarded as relevant to the enjoyment of the right to life. The first, which may be termed 'survival requirements', are 'the type of elementary, basic, and essential inputs necessary to keep [biological] life going'[1] and include access to basic nutrition, water, shelter and (arguably) basic health care services. Beyond these minimum requirements, the satisfaction of several 'secondary' socio-economic rights aimed at ensuring an adequate standard of living — housing, more advanced health care services and education — affirm the Final Constitution's commitment to human dignity and life.[2] However, even if 'life' is confined to biological existence, it may be argued that the obligation to fulfil the right to life at least requires the satisfaction of survival requirements:

> If deprivation of the lives of millions of people through lack of access to survival requirements is not a right to life issue, we can only say that the whole concept and notion of the right to life in its restricted and narrow sense does not apply to more than a billion people around the globe.[3]

Although the obligation to fulfil the right to life in South Africa appears to require the realization of most socio-economic rights, the Final Constitution's general commitment to the progressive realization of socio-economic rights suggests that the courts are unlikely to recognize a free-standing right to life that would secure the claimant some immediate set of entitlements.[4] But this does not mean that such positive obligations — in terms of the right to life — should be viewed as perpetually unenforceable. Indian Courts, for instance, have found that the right to life embraces a wide range of survival and quality of life concerns and have enforced several socio-economic claims (contained in the Indian Constitution as non-enforceable Directive Principles of State Policy) against the state in terms of the right to life.[5] While it is certainly significant that, unlike its Indian counterpart,, the South African Constitution provides for the judicial enforcement

[1] Menghistu (supra) at 67.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Ibid at 65. See also Menghistu (supra) at 63, 67-69, 79-80; Ramcharan (supra) at 6-10; Du Plessis & De Ville (supra) at 215; M Pieterse 'A Different Shade of Red: Socio-economic Dimensions of the Right to Life in South Africa' (1999) 15 SAJHR 372, 373 (Pieterse 'A Different Shade of Red').

[4] It may therefore be expected that the general limitations clause will more readily be invoked in relation to the obligation to fulfil the right to life than in relation to the obligations to respect and to protect the right. See Du Plessis & De Ville (supra) at 224; Pieterse 'A Different Shade of Red' (supra) at 378, 384.

[5] See, for example, the following judgments of the Indian Supreme Court: Bandhua Mutki Morcha v Union of India AIR 1984 SC 802 (Right to life includes protection of health); Olga Tellis v Bombay Municipal Corporation AIR 1986 SC 180 (Right to life includes right to livelihood); MC Metha v Union of India AIR 1987 SC 965 (Right to life includes protection against harmful environmental factors); Parmanand Katara v Union of India AIR 1989 SC 2039 (State must take all possible measures to preserve life; right to life violated where emergency medical treatment is refused); P Rathinam v Union of India AIR 1994 SC 1844 (Right to life entails more than 'mere animal existence'); Consumer Education and Research Centre v Union of India AIR 1995 SC 636 (Right to health forms integral part of the right to life); Consumer Education and Research Centre v Union of India AIR 1995 SC 922 (Right to life includes right to livelihood); UP Avas Evam Vikas Patishad v Friends Co-op Housing Society AIR 1996 SC114 (Right to life includes right to shelter); of several socio-economic rights in their own right and, while there is accordingly a strong argument that enforcement of such rights should not be confused with enforcement of the right to life, the Indian experience shows that enforcing the obligation to fulfil the right to life is not impossible. In South Africa, it may be argued that the obligation to fulfil the right to life at least entails that the state, in its effort progressively to realize socio-economic rights, should award immediate priority to the satisfaction of survival requirements.

In Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal, the Constitutional Court acknowledged that access to socio-economic amenities was essential to enjoyment of the right to life. In detailing the many socio-economic demands that the Constitution places on the state, Chaskalson P stated that satisfaction of needs for access to medical care, food, water, housing and employment formed part of the right to 'human life'.[1] In a separate concurring judgment, Sachs J added that: '[a] healthy life depends upon social interdependence: the quality of air, water, and sanitation which the State maintains for the public good; the quality of one's caring relationships as well as the quality of health care and support furnished officially by medical institutions and provided informally by family, friends, and the community.'[2] Madala J observed, in another concurring judgment, that '[t]he State undoubtedly has a strong interest in protecting and preserving the life and health of its citizens and to that end must do all in its power to protect and preserve life.'[3]

However, the Soobramoney Court did not ground a positive obligation to provide such goods in the right to life. The appellant, who required renal dialysis in order to remain alive, argued that a decision not to provide him with such treatment at state expense infringed his right to life, read with his right not to be refused emergency medical treatment.[4] He relied, for this part of his argument, on the judgment of the Indian Supreme Court in Paschim Banga Khet Mazdoor Samity v State of West Bengal.[5] In dismissing the claim, the Court regarded it as significant Paschim Banga Khet Mazdoor Samity v State of West Bengal AIR 1996 SC 2426 (Right to life violated by non-provision of emergency medical care); State of Punjab v Mohinder Singh Chawla AIR 1997 SC 1225 (Right to life includes access to health care services); Samatha v State of Andhra Pradesh AIR 1997 SC 3297 (Right to life requires the social and economic empowerment of tribal peoples); State of Himachal Pradesh v Raja Mahendra Pal AIR 1999 SC 1786 (Right to life includes right to livelihood); Akhtari B v State of Madhya Pradesh AIR 2001 SC 1528 (Right to life includes right to parental care); Murli S Deora v Union of India AIR 2002 SC 40 (Right to life includes right not to be victim of air pollution and requires ban of smoking in public places); Secretary, Minor Irrigation and Rural Engineering Services UP v Sahngoo Ram Arya and Another AIR 2002 SC 2225 (Right to life includes right not to be hounded and constantly harassed by police); MC Metha v Union of India AIR 2004 SCW 4033 (B)(Right to life includes rights to enjoyment of pollution-free water and air); Kapila Hingorani v State of Bihrar AIR 2005 SC 980 (Right to life includes right of workers to earn a salary).

[1] Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu Natal 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC), 1997 (12) BCLR 1696 (CC)('Soobramoney') at para 31.

[2] Ibid at para 54.

[3] Ibid at para 39.

[4] Ibid at para 14.

[5] Paschim Banga Khet Mazdoor Samity v State of West Bengal AIR 1996 SC 2426.

that, unlike its Indian counterpart, the Final Constitution contained a right not to be refused emergency medical treatment in FC s 27(3), which would logically apply to situations similar to that in Samity (where the claimant was in urgent need of immediate care).[1] The Soobramoney Court thus thought it unnecessary to engage the more general right to life in this matter. Further, since Mr Soobramoney's condition did not constitute a medical emergency, FC s 27(3) was held to be inapplicable.[2] Instead, the Soobramoney Court proceeded to evaluate the claim in light of the right to have access to adequate health care services in FC s 27(1) and (2) and found that the non-provision of dialysis to Mr Soobramoney, in terms of a rationally conceived and bona fide resource rationing policy, was not in breach of the state's FC s 27 obligations.[3]

While clearly ruling out the application of the right to life in circumstances covered by FC s 27(3), Soobramoney does not directly address whether the right to life may be used in conjunction with FC s 27(1) in circumstances where death may result from a refusal of medical treatment in non-emergency situations.[4] So while it seems clear from Sachs J's observation that 'the right to life may [not] . . . be extended to encompass the right indefinitely to evade death',[5] it is not clear whether the judgment similarly precludes claims for life-saving treatment in terms of the right to life.

The Constitutional Court seemed to acknowledge that the effect of the obligation to fulfil the right to life may mandate special consideration for claims for life-saving treatment in Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign (No 2).[6] In TAC, the Court remarked that 'regard must be had to the fact that this case is concerned with newborn babies whose lives might be saved by the administration of Nevirapine to mother and child at the time of birth'.[7] However, it nowhere explicitly depicted the restrictive policy as potentially falling foul of the obligation to fulfil the right to life. To date, the only explicit acknowledgement that the right to life has a role to play in securing access to life-saving medical treatment is the WLD's finding in Hay v B that a child's inviolable right to life justified an order that he receive life-saving medical treatment against the wishes of his parents.[8]

[1] Soobramoney (supra) at paras 15-18.
[2] Ibid at paras 20-21.
[3] Ibid at paras 29, 36-37.
[4] I have criticized the manner in which the judgment sidesteps this question and thereby reads down the ambit of the right to life elsewhere. See Pieterse 'A Different Shade of Red' (supra) at 382; M Pieterse 'Possibilities and Pitfalls in the Domestic Enforcement of Social Rights: Contemplating the South African Experience' (2004) 26 Human Rights Quarterly 882, 900. See C Scott & P Alston 'Adjudicating Constitutional Priorities in a Transnational Context: A Comment on Soobramoney's Legacy and Grootboom's Promise' (2000) 16 SAJHR 206, 236-237.
[5] Soobramoney (supra) at para 57. See also D Moellendorf 'Reasoning about Resources: Soobramoney and the Future of Socio-economic Rights Claims' (1998) 14 SAJHR 327, 327-328.
[6] See Pieterse 'A Different Shade of Red' (supra) at 385; Scott & Alston (supra) at 255.
[7] Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign (No 2) 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC)('TAC') at para 72. See also TAC (supra) at para 131.
[8] See Hay v B (supra) at 486B-E.

Apart from decisions concerning access to health care services, an acknowledgement of the socio-economic dimensions of the right to life motivated an obiter remark in the CPD that a prohibition on begging on privately owned public retail premises would be unlikely to withstand constitutional scrutiny. In Victoria & Alfred Waterfront v Police Commissioner, Western Cape, Desai J expressed 'grave reservations' on the constitutionality of such a prohibition. He continued:

> The issue of begging frequently raises a direct tension between the right to life and property rights. In that event, the property rights must give way to some extent. The rights to life and dignity are the most important of all human rights. By committing ourselves to a society founded on the recognition of human rights, we are required to value those rights above all others. Furthermore, the right to life encompasses more than "mere animal existence". It includes the right to livelihood.[1]

Finally, the Constitutional Court acknowledged that the 'intertwined' rights to life and to dignity were implicated in a matter concerning the denial of social security benefits.[2] In Khosa, the Court declared legislative provisions that limited social security benefits to South African citizens unconstitutional, since these provisions infringed the rights of non-citizens to equality and to have access to social security. In accepting social security as necessary for enjoyment of the right to life, Mokgoro J held that '[w]hen the rights to life, dignity and equality are implicated in cases dealing with socio-economic rights, they have to be taken into account along with the availability of human and financial resources in determining whether the State has complied with the constitutional standard of reasonableness.'[3]

It therefore seems that, while South African courts are prepared to acknowledge that the right to life encompasses access to such socio-economic amenities as are necessary for human survival and flourishing, they are unwilling to simultaneously acknowledge that this understanding of the right entails obligations beyond those imposed upon the State in terms of Chapter 2's enumerated socio-economic rights. At the moment, it, the right to life plays an indirect role in decisions concerning urgent access to vital socio-economic goods and services. While one may lament the inability to deploy the right to life in a manner that might enable one to secure access to those goods necessary for surviving and flourishing, it is encouraging that the socio-economic dimensions of the obligation to fulfil the right to life are not denied.

[1] Victoria & Alfred Waterfront v Police Commissioner, Western Cape 2004 (4) SA 444, 446D-G (C).
[2] Khosa v Minister of Social Development; Mahlaule v Minister of Social Development 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC) at para 41.
[3] Ibid at paras 44 and 81.

40 Freedom and Security of the Person

Michael Bishop and Stu Woolman

40.1 Introduction 40–1
(a) Drafting history 40–1
(i) Evolution of IC s 11 40–1
(ii) Evolution of FC s 12 40–4
(b) Philosophical background. 40–5
(i) IC s 12: Ferriera v Levin, classical liberalism and substantive due process 40–5
(aa) Negative liberty 40–11
(bb) Substantive due process 40–15
(ii) FC s 12: Enumerated rights, dignity, and the dialectic of enlightenment 40–22
40.2 Relationship between FC ss 12(1), 12(1)(a) and 12(1)(b) 40–26
(a) Dual function of FC s 12(1). 40–26
(b) Reconstructing 'freedom': Discrete roles of FC ss 12(1), 12(1)(a) and 12(1)(b) 40–30
(c) The 'due process wall': FC ss 12 and 35 40–31
40.3 FC s 12(1)(a) : Arbitrary deprivation of freedom. 40–31
(a) 'Freedom'. 40–32
(b) 'Deprivation' 40–32
(c) Substantive dimension of FC s 12(1)(a) 40–34
(i) Arbitrariness 40–34
(aa) Substantive arbitrainess. 40–35
(bb) Procedural arbitrainess 40–36
(ii) Just cause. 40–37
(aa) Constitutional values 40–37
(bb) Basic tenets of the legal system 40–38
(cc) Proportionality. 40–41

(d) Procedural dimension of FC s 12(1)(a) 40–42
40.4 FC s 12(1)(b): Detention without trial 40–44
(a) Detention. 40–45
(b) Trial 40–46
(c) Limitation 40–47
40.5 FC s 12(1)(c): Public and private violence. 40–48
(a) Violence. 40–49
(b) Positive obligations 40–49
(i) Vertical application 40–49
(ii) Horizontal application 40–54
(c) Negative obligations 40–54
40.6 FC s 12(1)(d): Torture 40–56
(a) Definition 40–56
(b) Justification 40–60
40.7 FC s 12(1)(e): Cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. 40–63
(a) Components of FC 12(1)(e) 40–63
(i) Treatment and punishment. 40–64
(ii) Cruel, inhuman and degrading 40–66
(aa) Dignity 40–66
(bb) Cruel 40–68
(cc) Inhuman 40–68
(dd) Degrading. 40–68
(b) Judicial doctrines. 40–69
(i) Inherently impermissible. 40–69
(aa) Physical punishment. 40–69
(bb) Imprisonment 40–70
(cc) Other forms of punishment 40–71
(ii) Proportionality 40–71
(aa) Gross diproportionality and mandatory minimum sentences 40–71
(bb) Gross disproportionality and indefinite incarceration 40–75
(c) Extraterritorial application 40–75
40.8 FC s 12(2): Bodily and psychological integrity. 40–76
(a) Bodily integrity 40–76
(b) Psychological integrity 40–78

40.9 FC s 12(2)(a): Decisions concerning reproduction 40–80
(a) Abortion 40–80
(b) Sterilization 40–82
(c) Contraception 40–84
40.10 FC s 12(2)(b): Security in and control over one's body 40–85
(a) Security in 40–85
(b) Control over 40–87
40.11 FC s 12(2)(c): Subjection to medical and scientific experiments 40–91
(a) Medical and scientific experiment 40–91
(b) Informed consent 40–95
(c) Persons unable to consent 40–98

Freedom and Security of the Person

12. (1) Everyone has the right to freedom and security of the person, which includes the right

(a) not to be deprived of freedom arbitrarily or without just cause;

(b) not to be detained without trial;

(c) to be free from all forms of violence from either public or private sources;

(d) not to be tortured in any way; and

(e) not to be treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way.

(2) Everyone has the right to bodily and psychological integrity, which includes the right

(a) to make decisions concerning reproduction;

(b) to security in and control over their body; and

(c) not to be subjected to medical or scientific experiments without their informed consent.[1]

40.1 INTRODUCTION

(a) Drafting history

(i) Evolution of IC s 11

Section 11 of the Interim Constitution[2] had its origins in two distinct rights found in the early drafts of the Interim Constitution: a right to personal liberty, and a right to freedom from torture and inhumane punishment.[3] The initial separation of the two rights tracked the structure of international human rights instruments and the provisions of a number of foreign constitutions.[4] After briefly forging a

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Act 108 of 1996)('FC' or 'Final Constitution').

[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('IC' or 'Interim Constitution').

[3] See Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights Fourth Report (3 June 1993). The personal liberty right read: 'Every person shall have the right to his or her personal liberty.' The freedom from torture and inhumane punishment right read: 'No person shall be subject to torture of any kind, whether physical, mental or emotional, nor shall any person be subject to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.'

[4] See Universal Declaration of Human Rights, arts 3 and 5, International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, arts 7 and 9(1), African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, arts 5 and 6, and European Convention on Human Rights, arts 3 and 5(1). The Canadian Charter, the German Basic Law and US Constitution also bifurcate the two sets of rights.

Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms states that: 'Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice.' Three different dimensions of the Canadian Supreme Court's interpretation of s 7 of the Charter inform our analysis of FC s 12: (1) the restrictive definition of 'liberty'; (2) the relatively restrictive definition of 'security of the person'; (3) the residuary definition of 'fundamental justice' — a definition that invites the court to entertain a wide and unenumerated variety of substantive challenges to the law. 'Liberty' — the functional equivalent of 'freedom' in FC s 12(1) — has been construed to mean freedom from physical restraint. Such restraint occurs primarily in the context of the criminal justice system and has been understood to encompass imprisonment, mandatory fingerprinting, document production, and oral testimony. 'Liberty' under s 7 of the Charter does not embrace political liberty (expressive rights and the franchise are protected elsewhere in the Charter) nor was it intended to offer any protection for property or economic interests. However, despite the drafters' relatively clear desire to limit s 7's ambit to purely procedural challenges, the Supreme Court has imputed a substantive dimension to the provision, and, in particular, the phrase 'fundamental justice'. See S Choudhry 'The Lochner Era and Comparative Constitutionalism' (2004) 2 Journal of International Constitutional Law 1. The Charter, s 12, contains a prohibition on 'cruel or unusual treatment or punishment'. However, the Canadian Supreme Court has had little occasion to define the phrase. The Supreme Court has said that one test for cruel and unusual punishment would be 'whether the punishment prescribed is so excessive as to outrage standards of decency'. See R v Miller and Cockerill [1977] 2 SCR 680, 688. The Supreme Court has, in terms of s 12, struck down a law that required a minimum sentence of seven years' imprisonment for importing narcotics as grossly disproportionate to the offense. See R v Smith [1987] 1 SCR 1045.

Article 1(1) of the German Basic Law states that 'human dignity is inviolable'. The right to human dignity has been interpreted by the Federal Constitutional Court to prevent the infliction of cruel or degrading punishment. 45 BVerfGE 187, 228 (1977) citing 1 BVerfGE 332 (1952) and 25 BVerfGE 269 (1969). The FCC has also held that life imprisonment may violate the right to human dignity if the possibility of parole was not built into the sentence. See 45 BVerfGE 187, 245 (1977) as quoted in D Currie The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (1994) 305. Article 2(2) of the GBL contains a general guarantee of life, bodily integrity, and personal liberty comparable to the guarantee of security of the person found in FC s 12(2): 'Everyone has the right to life and to inviolability of the person. Personal liberty shall be inviolable. These rights may be impinged upon only pursuant to statute.' Article 2(2)'s commitment to personal liberty has been interpreted narrowly as protecting individuals from physical restraint and bodily invasion. See 22 BVerfGE 180, 218–20 (1967) as cited in Currie (supra) at 307. In addition, the FCC held that art 2(2)'s commitment to personal liberty limits pretrial imprisonment to that time necessary to investigate the case, to a reasonably short period of time, to cases where there is a significant chance for recurrence and to determine an accused's mental competence. The FCC has also held that while art 2(2)'s guarantee of bodily integrity may not preclude the use of electroencephalograms, it does bar the state from subjecting individuals to non-consensual spinal taps or placing accused persons on trial when they are extremely ill. Articles 1(1) and 2(2) seem to place fairly clear limits on what might count as a violation of freedom and security of the person under the GBL. However, German constitutional jurisprudence has not entirely escaped the conceptual difficulties posed by the notion of substantive due process. Article 2(1) of the GBL states that: 'Everyone has the right to the free development of his personality in so far as he does not violate the rights of others or offend against the constitutional order or the moral code.' The FCC found that personality could not be meaningfully limited to some incorporeal set of mental events. It was therefore obliged to define the right broadly as a general right of freedom of action: the right of '[e]very person . . . to do or not to do what he wishes'. 16 BVerfGE 32, 36–37 (1957). Despite this broad construal of the language of the right, the Federal Constitutional Court appears to have been quite circumspect in using the right to strike down government restrictions on individual freedom. Striking down laws that prohibit intermediaries from seeking to match willing drivers with people looking for rides (17 BVerfGE 306 (1964)), that deny parents unlimited power to bind minor children by contract (72 BVerfGE 155 (1986)), or that require falconers to demonstrate the capacity to use firearms in order to procure a license to hunt with a falcon (55 BVerfGE 159 (1980)) hardly reflects a robust or uncontrollable understanding of 'freedom' or 'substantive due process'.

A substantial body of American jurisprudence exists on what counts as 'cruel and unusual punishment' under the Eighth Amendment. The Eight Amendment (1791) reads: 'Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.' Banishment, terms of imprisonment radically disproportionate to the offence for which they are imposed, and quaint forms of execution such as disembowelment, having a person drawn and quartered, or burning someone alive have all been declared unconstitutional. The most contentious issue in American criminal jurisprudence turns on whether 'cruel and unusual punishment' encompasses the death penalty. As the law currently stands, the Eighth Amendment does not bar the death penalty. Given the permissive approach of US courts to capital punishment and the striking down of the death penalty in South Africa, it might be thought that US capital punishment jurisprudence has entirely lost its relevance for South African constitutional law. However, because US death penalty jurisprudence is driven by the due process, the fair trial and the proportionality of punishment guarantees afforded by the Eighth, Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments, the case law still has some resonance for similar doctrines being developed by our courts. The Fifth Amendment reads, in relevant part: 'No person . . . shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law.' The Fourteenth Amendment reads, in relevant part: 'No State shall . . . deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law.'

What counts as 'liberty' or 'freedom' for the purposes of constitutional analysis and protection is a question which has vexed American jurists for well over two centuries. Most US Supreme Court judges over the past two centuries have defended the proposition that the drafters of both the federal Constitution and the state constitutions intended to create governments with limited powers (and thus new right to 'Security of the Person' (which included the right to be free from torture or inhuman punishment),[1] the Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights combined this new right with the right to personal liberty and called the amalgamation 'Freedom and Security of the Person'.[2] The enacted version, IC s 11, read as follows:

> Freedom and Security of the Person
>
> (1) Every person shall have the right to freedom and security of the person which shall include the right not to be detained without trial.
>
> (2) No person shall be subject to torture of any kind, whether physical, mental or emotional, nor shall any person be subject to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Neither the Technical Committee notes nor the Ad Hoc Committee notes offer an explanation for these changes.[3] One inference that might be drawn is that the drafters believed the rights to personal liberty and to security of the person were maximum individual liberty). A second proposition, defended by a handful of Supreme Court judges, is that, in addition to the enumerated provisions of the various constitutions that restricted the exercise of governmental powers, natural law vests the people with unenumerated rights that cannot be violated constitutionally. While the first proposition is uncontroversial, the second is not. In Calder v Bull Judge Chase wrote that the Supreme Court was entitled to declare legislation unconstitutional if it infringed upon the sphere of natural liberty which vested in all citizens. 3 US 386 (1799). However, a majority of the Calder Court, in holding that the Connecticut legislature's invalidation of a probate decree did not violate the US Constitution, reasoned that the US Supreme Court could invalidate acts of the federal government and state governments only where a specific constitutional provision had been violated. In the first decade of the 20th century, the Supreme Court began to give the 'due process' guarantees in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments substantive, as well as formal, content. 'Substantive due process' enables courts to find law unconstitutional if 'it exceed[s] all bounds of the social compact'. R Rotunda & J Novak Treatise on Constitutional Law: Volume I (1992) 380. Of course, the problem with the doctrine of substantive due process is that views on what counts as behaviour being beyond the bounds of the social compact may vary dramatically. The substantive due process doctrine reached its apogee in 1905 in Lochner v New York, 198 US 45 (1905). In Lochner, the Supreme Court struck down a New York statute that limited bakers to a 60-hour work week (for health-related reasons) on the grounds that that it was an arbitrary infringement of the freedom of contract protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Lochner Court's majority opinion elicited Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes' barbed reply that 'the Fourteenth Amendment does not enact Herbert Spencer's Social Statics'. Ibid at 75. The phrase, nearly a century later, is generally employed only as a term of opprobrium. Indeed, conservative American lawyers today note that the substantive due process doctrine gave birth to the 'right to privacy' and the controversial constitutional protection afforded to contraception and to abortion. S Woolman 'Metaphors and Mirages: Some Marginalia on Choudhry's The Lochner Era and Comparative Constitutionalism and Ready-Made Constitutional Narratives' (2005) 20 SAPR/PL 281. See also Griswold v Connecticut 381 US 479 (1965)(Contraception); Roe v Wade 410 US 113 (1973)(Abortion).

[1] See Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights Fifth Report (11 June 1993). The Fifth Report retained the right to personal liberty as it appeared in the Fourth Report. The freedom from torture and cruel punishment became the right to security of the person, with the addition of a new clause conferring the right to security of the person: '(1) Every person shall have the right to the security of his or her person. (2) No person shall be subject to torture of any kind, whether physical, mental or emotional, nor shall any person be subject to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.'

[2] Technical Committee on Fundamental Rights Sixth Report (15 July 1993). The Committee added the rather laconic Explanatory Note: 'Clauses 5 and 6 of the previous version of the draft have been combined.'

[3] Contemporaneous academic commentary on the subject is equally ambiguous. See H Corder & L du Plessis Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights (1994) 153.

sufficiently related to place them under the same heading. Another inference, drawn by Ackermann J in Ferreira v Levin, is that the amalgamation of the separate rights supported a disjunctive reading of IC s 11(1) and (2) and thus a construction of IC s 11 that results in a stand-alone right to 'freedom' writ large.

(ii) Evolution of FC s 12

The enacted version of s 12 of the Final Constitution varies substantially from both IC s 11 and earlier, draft formulations of FC s 12. The Constitutional Assembly had, in a relatively late draft, created a neat tripartite structure for the right that divided (and thereby emphasized) its three major components: freedom of the person, security of the person, and freedom from torture, cruel and degrading treatment and non-consensual medical experimentation.[1] The final

[1] The recorded drafting history of FC s 12 begins in October 1995. The first draft of the clause reflects an attempt to clarify the meaning of freedom of the person and security of the person. See Section 5 (Freedom and Security of the Person) of the Draft Bill of Rights (9 0ctober 1995), which reads, in relevant part: '(1) Everyone has the right to physical and psychological integrity and to freedom of the person; (2) no one may be– (a) deprived of liberty arbitrarily or without just cause; or (b) detained without trial; (3) No one may be– (a) tortured in any way; (b) treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way; or (c) subjected to medical or scientific experiments without their consent.' The first part of the draft clause separated freedom of the person from security of the person, and implicitly defined security of the person in terms of the right to physical and psychological integrity. The second part of the draft clause added a freedom from arbitrary deprivation of liberty to the freedom from detention without trial. The third part of the draft clause retained IC s 11's provisions regarding torture and cruel treatment and punishment. It added a restriction on subjecting individuals to medical or scientific experiments without their consent.

The February draft clause featured several advances. First, it divided the right into three major components: freedom of the person, security of the person, and freedom from torture, cruel and degrading treatment, and medical experimentation. Secondly, the right to freedom of the person was understood to include the right not to be deprived of liberty arbitrarily or without just cause and the right not to be detained without trial. These subsections were probably intended to emphasize that freedom of the person was designed to be primarily procedural in nature and that it was not intended as a full-blown (or even residual) right to negative freedom. Thirdly, the phrasing of the right to security of the person begins to get to grips with two rights of fundamental importance for gender equality: the right of persons to be free from all forms of violence, and to be secure in, and to control, their own bodies. While the potential ambit of these two subsections may be relatively broad, it is hard not to read them as being principally concerned with domestic violence and reproductive rights. Finally, the third subsection — freedom from torture, cruel and degrading treatment, and medical experimentation — dealt with freedom from direct physical abuse in three of its most fundamental senses. See Memorandum from Panel of Constitutional Experts to Chairpersons and Executive Director of the Constitutional Assembly (5 February 1996), s 11, which reads, in relevant part: 'Freedom and Security of the Person: (1) Everyone has the right to freedom of the person, including the right not to be– (a) deprived of liberty arbitrarily or without just cause; or (b) detained without trial; (2) Everyone has the right to security of the person [bodily and psychological integrity], including the rights– (a) to be free from all forms of violence; and [(b) to be secure in, and control their own body;] (3) No one may be– (a) tortured in any way; (b) treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way; or (c) subjected to medical experiments without that person's consent.'

The March draft maintained the structural and the linguistic clarity of the February draft and clarified the meaning of several of the subsections. See Discussion by Constitutional Committee Sub-Committee in Preparation for Report-Back to Constitutional Committee (12 March 1996): 'Freedom and security of the person: 11(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of the person, including the right not to be– (a) deprived of liberty arbitrarily or without just cause; or (b) detained without trial; (2) Everyone has the right to security of the person, including the right– (a) to be free from all forms of violence; (b) to [bodily/physical] and iteration of FC s 12 deviates, in some important respects, from this analytically sound rubric. The right to freedom of the person and the right to security of the person — separated in the drafts — are placed in the same subsection: FC s 12(1). FC s 12(1) now embraces three different kinds of freedom which had formerly been placed in three different subsections: freedom of the person and its largely procedural subsections; freedom from all forms of violence; and freedom from torture and cruel and degrading treatment and punishment. FC s 12(2) underwent a change in name and in substance. It is no longer the right to security of the person. Instead it is the right to bodily and psychological integrity. The grouping of paragraphs under FC s 12(2) makes somewhat more sense than the concatenation of rights found in FC s 12(1). When viewed through the lens of women's rights, the re-organization is far less compelling. In previous drafts, the freedom from all forms of violence cohered with rights to reproductive choice and to bodily integrity. All three subsections engage matters of great urgency for the women of South Africa. Under FC s 12(2)'s new grouping, reproductive rights are combined with the right to be free from medical experimentation without informed consent. While bodily control is clearly integral to both rights, women's concerns are no longer the focus of the section.

Although one might be inclined to read this final re-organization of FC s 12 as a failure to take women's concerns seriously, the actual jurisprudence emanating from FC s 12 suggests that these structural alterations have not, in fact, diminished women's rights. As we shall see, whereas IC s 11 primarily offered guarantees against state impairment of human dignity by the criminal justice system, FC s 12 extends the right's ambit to largely 'private' relationships. Real revolutions in the law have already been wrought from FC s 12's protection of individuals against various sources of physical violence and psychological harm.[1]

(b) Philosophical background

(i) IC s 11: Ferriera v Levin*, classical liberalism and substantive due process*

The drafters of the Interim Constitution could hardly have contemplated the heated philosophical exchanges that their construction of IC s 11 would occasion. The pace of negotiations, and the pressures placed upon technical committees charged with crafting provisions that would accommodate the concerns of a psychological integrity; and (c) to make decisions concerning [reproduction/their body] free from coercion, discrimination and violence; (3) No one may be– (a) tortured in any way; (b) treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way; or (c) subjected to medical or scientific experiments without that person's consent' (changes emphasized). Notice that the March draft expressly granted everyone freedom over reproductive choices. Of all the proposed drafts, the March 1996 iteration makes the most sense.

[1] See § 40.5 infra.

variety of parties, did not permit the luxury of rarefied academic debates. That said, the choices made by the Technical Committee responsible for IC s 11 — in particular, the conjunction of a right to personal liberty with a right to physical security — led, almost inexorably, to one of the more memorable set of exchanges amongst the original members of the Constitutional Court.

In Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others, Sachs J anticipated the gathering storm:

> My principal focus is on the rights subsumed in the expression 'freedom and security of the person'. The issue of determining the precise limits and content of these words will no doubt exercise this court for a long time to come. Other jurisdictions have battled with the problem of whether the phrase should be construed as referring to one right with two facets, or two distinct, if conjoined, rights. Another jurisprudentially controversial matter has been whether the words should be considered as applying only or mainly to the absence of physical constraint or whether it should be regarded as having the widest amplitude and extend to all the rights and privileges long recognized as central to the orderly pursuit of happiness by free men and women. Even more fundamental (and even more difficult) are questions relating to the nature of citizenship and civic responsibility in a modern industrial-administrative state, the degree of regulation that is appropriate in contemporary economic and social life and the extent to which freedom and personal security are achieved by protecting human autonomy on the one hand and recognizing human interdependence on the other.[1]

In the quotation above, Sachs J captures the heart of the incipient debate: (1) whether 'freedom' and 'security of the person' constitute two distinct rights housed under a single roof; (2) whether 'freedom' refers to freedom from the specific incursions into personal autonomy expressly identified in IC s 11, or whether it corresponds to the liberal political tradition's more general concern with the imposition of any unjustifiable restriction on individual autonomy.[2] Ferreira v Levin NO & Others witnessed the very tempest Sachs J had predicted.[3]

In Ferreira, Ackermann J both proposed a disjunctive reading of IC s 11 — separating the right to 'freedom' from the right to 'security of the person' — and

[1] Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others; Matiso v Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison, & Others 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC) at para 44.

[2] See J Rawls Political Liberalism (1993) 292 (Liberal theory prefers to confine state interference with individual conduct to those restrictions necessary to achieve mutual security and the maximum possible degree of individual autonomy); J Raz The Morality of Freedom (1986) 6–14 (While talk of a presumption of liberty — as with Rawls' first principle of justice — may be confusing, liberals are on more solid ground when they make the stronger claim that (a) freedom is intrinsically valuable and (b) every political act restricting any individual's freedom requires justification.)

[3] Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC)('Ferreira'). For a fuller account of this case, see I Currie & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 5, 1999) Chapter 39; I Currie 'Ferreira v Levin' (1996) 12 SAJHR 179.

defended a rather Berlinian conception of 'freedom' as negative liberty.[1] In addition to — or perhaps because of — the general protection of individual liberty afforded on this account, Ackermann J's reading of IC s 11(1) protected an unspecified number of 'residual' freedom rights. That is, it guaranteed protection of rights not specifically protected elsewhere in Chapter 3 of the Interim Constitution, including immunity against self-incrimination in contexts where the IC s 25(3) fair trial rights of accused persons did not apply.

To understand exactly how Ackermann J arrived at these conclusions requires an abbreviated account of the underlying facts and law at issue. Ackermann J's robust reading of IC s 11(1) was necessitated by a legal technicality. The applicants had attacked s 417(2)(b) of the Companies Act[2] as a violation of their IC s 25(3) fair trial rights.[3] In particular, they objected to the fact that s 417(2)(b) compelled an examinee at a s 417 inquiry into the winding up of a company to answer potentially incriminating questions, and allowed the answers given to those questions to be used in evidence in subsequent criminal proceedings against the examinee. The applicants contended that such compulsion was inconsistent with the fair trial rights of accused persons.

The applicants had a problem, however. They were not, as yet, accused persons. They had merely been summoned for examination by the Master. The Ferreira Court divided on whether the applicants could challenge the validity of s 417(2)(b) as a violation of their IC s 25(3) rights if they had neither been charged with a criminal offence nor, in a criminal trial, been confronted by evidence given by them at a s 417 inquiry.

Ackermann J found that although there was, as yet, no threat to the fair trial rights expressly protected by IC s 25(3), the applicants could find relief in IC s 11(1). IC s 11(1), according to Ackermann J, must be read disjunctively: the

[1] In fairness to Ackermann J, Ferreira represents the Justice's first attempt to work through a Kantian conception of human dignity in terms of the provisions of the South African Constitution. See C Taylor 'Kant's Theory of Freedom' in Philosophy and the Human Sciences: Philosophical Papers II (1985)(Human freedom is prior to legitimate order, in that legitimate authority can only arise as the creation of human agents through consent.) For a rather unsympathetic assessment of the Kantian strain in contemporary liberal political philosophy, see M Sandel 'Introduction' in M Sandel (ed) Liberalism and its Critics (1984) 1. Although unsuccessful in Ferriera, Ackermann J's approach was, ultimately, vindicated in the Court's dignity and equality jurisprudence. For a fuller, and rather appreciative, account of Ackermann J's project and its Kantian roots, see S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36.

[2] Act 61 of 1973.

[3] Section 417 of the Companies Act permits examination of the officers of a company being wound up because it is unable to pay its debts, and the examination of its debtors, and of persons with information about the affairs of the company or who are in possession of property of the company. Examinees may be summoned by the Master of the High Court or by the court itself to attend an examination. Section 417(2)(b) provides for the compulsion of an examinee: 'Any such person may be required to answer any question put to him at the examination, notwithstanding that the answer might tend to incriminate him, and any answer given to any such question may thereafter be used in evidence against him.' An examinee who fails, without sufficient cause, to answer questions is guilty of an offence (s 418(5)(b)(iii)) and liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding R2 000 or six months' imprisonment, or both such fine and imprisonment (s 441(1)(f)).

right 'to freedom' is a separate and independent right, related to the right to 'security of the person'. Part of the justification for this disjunctive reading lay in a rather Rawlsian or Kantian contention that 'freedom' was prior to other fundamental rights because the liberty to pursue one's own personal development and conception of the good life lies at the core of what it means to be human.[1] Another part of the justification for this disjunctive reading lay in the contention that 'freedom' was the ground for a broad array of other enumerated fundamental rights.[2]

Ackermann J's conception of 'freedom' in IC s 11(1) consciously corresponds with the standard philosophical account of negative liberty. Negative liberty, according to Ackermann J — and Isaiah Berlin — consists of 'the area within which . . . a person . . . is or should be left to do or be what he is able to do or be, without interference by other persons'.[3] While the right to freedom does not 'deny or preclude the constitutionally valid, and indeed essential, role of state intervention in the economic as well as the civil and political spheres', such interventions must, to the extent that they are limitations of freedom, be justified on the grounds set out in IC s 33(1).[4] This reading suggested, for Ackermann J, the following definition of the right to freedom: 'I would, at this stage, define the right to freedom negatively as the right of individuals not to have "obstacles to possible choices and activities" placed in their way by . . . the state.'[5]

For the most part, this sphere of negative liberty would be captured by many of the rights specifically enumerated in the Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights. As a result, 'the freedom rights protected by [IC] s 11(1) should more properly be designated "residual freedom rights".'[6] What, exactly, would the relationship between the enumerated rights and the residual freedom rights be? One would first determine whether an infringement of a specifically enumerated right had

[1] See J Rawls A Theory of Justice (1973); I Berlin 'Two Concepts of Liberty' in Four Essays on Liberty (1969); I Kant Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals (trans and ed AW Wood, 2002).

[2] See Ferreira (supra) at para 49 (According to Ackermann J, freedom provides the grounds for the entrenchment of the following rights: IC ss 12, 14-21, 25(2)(c) and (d), 25(3)(c) and (d), 27, 28, 30(1)(e), 30(2) and 31.)

[3] Ibid at para 52.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Ibid at para 54. John Stuart Mill adumbrates a similar conception of 'freedom' in his Introduction to On Liberty (1859)('It comprises first, the inward domain of consciousness; demanding liberty of conscience in the most comprehensive sense; liberty of thought and feeling; absolute freedom of opinion and sentiment on all subjects . . . The liberty of expressing and publishing opinions may seem to fall under a different principle, since it belongs to that part of the conduct of an individual which concerns other people; but, being almost of as much importance as the liberty of thought itself, and resting in great part on the same reasons, is practically inseparable from it. Secondly, the principle requires liberty of tastes and pursuits; of framing the plan of our life to suit our own character; of doing as we like subject to such consequences as may follow: without impediment from our fellow-creatures, so long as what we do does not harm them. . . . Thirdly, from this liberty of each individual, follows the liberty, within the same limits, of combination among individuals; freedom to unite, for any purpose not involving harm to others: the persons combining being supposed to be of full age, and not forced or deceived. No society in which these liberties are not, on the whole, respected is free, whatever may be its form of government.' (Emphasis added.)) occurred. If not, then one would determine whether a residual freedom right protected by IC s 11(1) existed. In the instant matter, no enumerated freedom right had been infringed by s 417(2)(b) of the Companies Act. Ackermann J then considered whether s 417(2)(b) impaired any of the residual freedom rights protected by IC s 11(1):

[6] Ferreira (supra) at para 57.

> What is it about the nature and operation of the provisions of s 417(2)(b) of the Act, and their impact upon the examinee, which can be said to be inconsistent with [s 11(1)] . . .? In the first place, the examinees . . . appear at the examination under compulsion, for if they are duly summoned and fail to attend voluntarily, the Master or the court may . . . cause them to be apprehended and brought before the Master or court for examination. The examinee has no choice but to attend. The examinee is, in terms of subsec (2), obliged to submit to examination. . . . Section 417 obliges the examinee to answer all questions, even though the answer given to any such question may tend to incriminate him or her. Examinees thus have a very restricted choice if they have in the past acted in a way which might make them liable to criminal prosecution in connection with the trade, dealings, affairs or property of the company and they are examined in connection with such acts. If they refuse to answer, they face conviction and sentence to a fine or imprisonment (or both). If they answer, they run the risk of prosecution and conviction under circumstances where they might not have been prosecuted or convicted but for their answers at the examination, because s 417(2)(b) explicitly provides that even an answer which tends to incriminate the examinee may thereafter be used in evidence against him or her.[1]

In addition to finding that s 417(2)(b)'s creation of 'obstacles to possible choices and activities' constituted an impairment of IC s 11(1) in its most general sense, Ackermann J concluded that it infringed a residual freedom right in IC s 11(1) — the right against self-incrimination — left unprotected by IC s 25(3). Moreover, the failure to provide examinees with immunity for their testimony could not be justified by reference to the objective sought to be achieved by the section (the protection of shareholders and creditors of a company) and thus constituted an unjustifiable limitation of the residual right to self-incrimination in terms IC s 33(1).

The majority in Ferreira reached a similar conclusion via a fundamentally different route. The majority found that the IC s 25(3) challenge to the Companies Act was justiciable and that s 417(2)(b) impaired the exercise of IC s 25(3). As a result, even in terms of Ackermann J's preferred mode of analysis, the majority had no need to consider whether a residual freedom right in IC s 11(1) had been infringed. However, the majority did believe it necessary to distance itself from what it considered some of the more immoderate aspects of Ackermann J's reading of IC s 11.

According to Chaskalson P, the primary, though not necessarily the only, purpose of IC s 11(1) was to ensure the protection of the physical integrity of the individual. Read in this more restrictive manner, IC s 11(1) protects a right to physical liberty and a right to physical security.[2] 'This does not mean', Chaskalson

[1] Ferreira (supra) at para 70.
[2] Ibid at paras 158–59 (Chaskalson P).

P conceded, 'that we must construe [IC] s 11(1) as dealing only with physical integrity.' 'Freedom' may well entail more than that. But whatever 'freedom' does mean, Chaskalson P continued, it does not amount to a presumption of individual liberty.

Textual peculiarities and institutional comity were the two primary drivers for the majority's reasoning.

The bifurcated structure of the limitations clause under the Interim Constitution — IC s 33(1) — meant that limitations of residual freedom rights would be subject to the more onerous 'necessity' requirement, while many of the enumerated freedom rights would only have to satisfy the more deferential 'reasonable' requirement. It would be odd, indeed, reasoned Chaskalson P, if the drafters of the Interim Constitution had intended the enumerated rights found in IC Chapter 3 to be more easily impaired than unenumerated residual freedom rights ostensibly protected by IC s 11(1). Moreover, the higher threshold for justification of an impairment of IC s 11(1) would create the perverse incentive amongst litigants to pursue more aggressively residual freedom right challenges than many enumerated right challenges. Again, the majority reasoned, the drafters could not have intended such an outcome.

The potential anomalies that the limitations clause might — under an Ackermannian reading of IC s 11(1) — have a bearing on critical considerations of institutional comity. For unless the Constitutional Court was willing to compromise on its understanding of the meaning of 'necessary' in IC s 33(1), then all government action would be subject to an extraordinarily high level of justification. An unduly intrusive and exacting Constitutional Court — in the early days of a constitutional democracy — would run the risk of straining its relations with the political branches of government. The Constitutional Court was obliged, according to Chaskalson P, 'to avoid the pitfall of Lochner v New York.'[1] The interventionism of the Lochner Supreme Court, whose willingness to frustrate remedial government action in the name of an expansive and anachronistic understanding of liberty, undermined both the authority of the court and the institution of judicial review, led Chaskalson P to conclude: 'We should not . . . construe s 11 so broadly that we overshoot the mark and trespass upon terrain that is not rightly ours.'[2]

What then does 'freedom' in the context of IC s 11 — and thus FC s 12 — mean? The holding of the majority in Ferreira can be summarized as follows. First, the right to freedom and security of the person in s 11 — and FC s 12 — is confined, primarily, to the protection of the physical liberty and physical security of the individual. Second, while freedom writ large obviously involves more than the protection of physical integrity, the protection for this more expansive understanding of freedom can generally be found in the other specific and enumerated provisions of the Bill of Rights. Third, if one cannot secure adequate protection for some basic component of individual freedom under any of the enumerated provisions of the Bill of Rights, then it may be appropriate to look to the right to freedom in IC s 11(1) — now FC s 12(1) — for such protection. Fourth, given that the right to a fair trial is dealt with specifically and in detail under IC s 25(3) — now FC s 35(3) — neither IC s 11 nor FC s 12 embraces a residual fair trial right. Fifth, whatever else it might encompass, the residual freedom rights to be found in IC s 11 or FC s 12 do not embrace 'a right not to have obstacles to future choices and activities placed in one's path by the state.'

[1] Ferreira (supra) at para 182, citing Lochner v New York 198 US 45 (1905).
[2] Ibid.

The majority in Ferreira may have effectively blunted Ackermann J's efforts to enshrine a broad, self-standing, freedom right in the Bill of Rights of both the Interim Constitution and the Final Constitution. Its holding did not, however, end the legal community's ongoing conversation about the extent to which the Bill of Rights protects the negative conception of liberty that animates Ackermann J's opinion or, as importantly, the latitude possessed by the judiciary to flesh out the meaning of the basic law.

(aa) Negative liberty

The fate of negative liberty as grundnorm in our basic law is fairly easy to predict. Ackermann J's initial desire to ground the Bill of Rights in a fundamentally negative conception of liberty — as reflected in his judgments in Ferreira and Du Plessis v De Klerk[1] — was, for good reason, largely rebuffed by the rest of the Constitutional Court. As Chaskalson P's remarks above suggest, the Court was loath — especially in its early days — to make grand philosophical pronouncements about the political underpinnings of our new order. It may also be that a majority of the Court disagreed with Ackermann J about the nature of these first principles. It is fair to say that they held the winning hand in this argument as well.

Although Ackermann J did South African jurisprudence an immense service by attempting to state clearly the principles upon which his reasoning lay — a characteristic that marked his entire tenure on the Court — it is not at all clear that his argument from first principles was correct.[2] Although this chapter is hardly the place to engage at length in complex philosophical debates, the terms of that debate — and our preferred understanding — are easy enough to state.

[1] 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC). For a critique of Ackermann J's jurisprudence of negative liberty, see S Woolman & D Davis 'The Last Laugh: Du Plessis v De Klerk, Classical Liberalism, Creole Liberalism and the Application of Fundamental Rights under the Interim and Final Constitutions' (1996) 12 SAJHR 361; S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 31. For the most sustained and well-developed defence of modern classical liberalism, see the works of Friedrich A Hayek: FA Hayek Law, Legislation and Liberty (1979); FA Hayek New Studies in Philosophy, Politics, Economics and the History of Ideas (1978); FA Hayek The Constitution of Liberty (1960); FA Hayek The Road to Serfdom (1948).

[2] See A Cockrell 'Rainbow Jurisprudence' (1996) 12 SAJHR 1, 12 (Ackermann's J exploration of the meaning of freedom in Ferreira stands out from the bulk of Constitutional Court jurisprudence as a rigorous consideration of the substantive reasons motivating constitutional adjudication.) But see H Klug 'Striking Down Death' (1996) 12 SAJHR 61, 66–67 (Klug justifies the cramped definition of rights offered by the Court as a political necessity. Broad declaratory definitions of rights might require the Court, when later faced with different facts and concerns, to modify or to create exceptions from its previous articulation of a rule. More importantly, broad definitions of rights at this early stage of South African constitutional democratic history — namely, the early years of genuine majoritarian rule — could put the Court's long term political viability at risk by setting up too many conflicts with the new 'representative' government.)

While Ackermann J recognizes that certain material and social preconditions must exist for negative liberty to operate as a genuinely meaningful ideal, he defends the thesis that a clear distinction between 'freedom' and its conditions must be maintained if anyone is to have any meaningful experience of freedom itself. This commitment to the 'priority' of negative liberty, along with an entirely accurate view of the dangers of a state committed to one right way of being in the world and final solutions (read Holocaust and Apartheid), leads Ackermann J to conclude that negative liberty, and not positive liberty, is the 'truer and more humane ideal'.[1]

This more humane ideal rests on at least two basic propositions. First, the individual determines, for herself, the sources of meaning in her life, and constructs out of these different sources a particular vision of the good life. Second, in order for an individual to pursue her preferred way of being in the world, the state must limit its intervention into the affairs of its citizens to those rules of law that are necessary for the security of the commonweal and that create the requisite space for each member of society to pursue her preferred way of being in the world in a manner consistent or compatible with the pursuit of the preferred ways of being in the world of her fellow citizens. Ackermann J states this second proposition as follows:

> I wish to emphasize quite explicitly that a broad and generous interpretation of freedom does not deny or preclude the . . . essential role of state intervention in the economic as well as the civil and political spheres. On the contrary, state intervention is essential to resolve the paradox of unlimited freedom (where freedom ultimately destroys itself) in all these spheres.[2]

The critiques of classical liberalism are well known and have, by and large, been incorporated into contemporary liberal theory. The first critique is that, as a metaphysical matter, classical liberalism has relied upon an atomistic model of the self which stresses the capacity of separate, independent selves to choose the aims and attachments by which they will define themselves. As a chooser, 'the self', as John Rawls has written, 'is prior to the ends which are affirmed by it; even a dominant end must be chosen from among numerous possibilities.'[3] Rawls himself later recanted this particular metaphysical commitment and recognized that all individuals have their identities or selves determined or conditioned by a vast network of social, historical, political, religious, educational, and linguistic practices over which they have no control whatsoever.[4] Liberals can still defend

[1] I Berlin 'Two Concepts of Liberty' in Four Essays on Liberty (1969) 171.
[2] Ferreira (supra) at para 52.
[3] J Rawls A Theory of Justice (1973) 3–4.
[4] See J Rawls Political Liberalism (1993). See also C Lamore Patterns of Moral Complexity (1986). The original critique to which Rawls was obliged to answer was levelled by Michael Sandel. See M Sandel Liberalism and the Limits of Justice (1981).

robust forms of associational freedom — or zones of autonomy — while recognizing that our identities are largely defined by and dependent upon the communities we inhabit.[1]

The second critique is that classical liberals often assume that individuals have privileged access to the 'correct' understanding of the good life and that neither the state nor other social actors are in a position to supplant that vision of the good with some other vision of the good. As Charles Taylor and others have forcefully argued, there are any number of instances in which others do possess greater insight into our needs than we do ourselves. And if 'we cannot maintain the incorrigibility of the subject's judgments about his freedom, or rule out second-guessing', then we must admit that others — including the state — may possess the capacity, on occasion, to set us free.[2]

Third, classical liberal theory generally takes the view that the state must refrain from taking decisions or making laws that determine beliefs or objectives that are deemed central to individual and group identity formation. The pithy way of putting this proposition is that liberals wish to remain 'neutral' between competing comprehensive conceptions of the good life. The more nuanced, but still liberal, response to this aspiration to neutrality is twofold: (a) although liberals are correct that the recognition of each individual as the author of her actions is a necessary condition for a free society, it does not follow that every individual choice is morally, politically or constitutionally justifiable; (b) individual selves are not merely socially constructed, but all of their actions are, in some way, addressed towards the other individuals and groups that make up their political community.[3] What this means for our constitutional politics is that one's belief in the correctness of a way of life does not end public debate about one's choices. While one's choices may ultimately be universally accepted — or simply acceptable in a society committed to zones of autonomy — those choices must, at the very least, be justifiable in a manner that other members of society can understand, if not live by themselves.

At a minimum, the previous analysis supports the following four propositions. First, individual autonomy and group autonomy — and the pluralist society which inevitably follows — remain valid ideals that are not contingent upon the acceptance of various axioms of classical liberal theory. Second, given our shared horizons of meaning, members of a given polity can have rational arguments about ways of being in the world and the extent to which particular practices conform to the ideals to which a polity has committed itself in public documents such as the Final Constitution. Third, such arguments can make a difference in the way others see us, and the way we see others. Thus, contrary to the positions taken by many classical liberals, the commitment to pluralism does not preclude rational discourse about values and the good life, nor does it necessarily preclude the reconciliation of differences over the ends of life — even where the goods at issue initially appear incommensurable. Furthermore, on this conception of politics, the state does not disappear. Quite the opposite. This more sophisticated form of liberalism sees the state as playing an essential role in the debate about, and the construction of, values. Fourth, the Final Constitution's commitment to transformation and to rough equality combined with the recognition that all meaningful action takes place within some form, indeed many forms, of association, results in a liberalism committed to some kind of state support for a variety of different ways of being in the world. Such support is especially important for those groups with visions of the good life which are not politically, socially or economically dominant: the state is obliged, on this account, to take more seriously the views of the good life held by aboriginal communities stripped of the wealth necessary to sustain traditional practices, or the views of the good life held by single mothers who run up against the burdens of single parenting, sexism in the workplace, and restrictions on reproductive choice.

[1] S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44 (Recognizing that the various associations into which we are born and of which we remain a part are constitutive of the self, and that a liberal conception of freedom — or any meaningful conception of freedom — rests upon the recognition of that fact.)

[2] C Taylor 'What's Wrong with Negative Liberty' Philosophy and the Human Sciences: Philosophical Papers II (1985) 211, 228.

[3] See C Taylor The Ethics of Authenticity (1992).

We have shown why we have good reason to refrain — at a theoretical level — from endorsing Ackermann J's views on the meaning of 'freedom' without withdrawing our support for a liberal reading of our basic law. Having underscored our differences, we think it important to emphasize the extent to which we agree with Ackermann J that 'freedom' cannot mean that the liberal state must tolerate all ways of being in the world and concur that those ways of being which threaten the core values of this constitutional order — dignity, rough equality and the real possibility of democratic participation — must be ruled out of bounds.

We also think it important to note that our thick conception of liberalism — our commitment to more than the nightwatchman state — is more than just a theory. It is, as things stand, our Constitutional Court's practice. As Theunis Roux writes, a host of Constitutional Court decisions and dissents, as well as the text of the basic law itself, underwrites a principle of democracy that demands more than the occasional exercise of the franchise.[1] As Frank Michelman notes, the rule of law doctrine — as currently constructed — potentially subjects every exercise of state power to judicial review.[2] (Could Ackermann J have wanted more than that?) In Sandra Liebenberg's estimation, our Court has shaped its socio-economic rights jurisprudence around conceptions of interdependence in which meaningful exercise of civil and political rights is contingent upon the progressive realization of rights to housing, water, food, health and social security.[3] According to one of the authors of this chapter, the Court's dignity jurisprudence traces an arc from the recognition that dignity begins with the refusal to turn away from suffering to the recognition that dignity requires the material transformation of the life of each South African in a manner that enables her to exercise meaningfully her agency and her capacity for self-actualization.[1] These discrete doctrines — especially the dignity jurisprudence explicated by Ackermann J — support the proposition that Ackermann J and the rest of the Court have generated a body of law that at once exhausts the debate about 'freedom' in Ferreira and, at the same time, leaves us with something far more substantial: the normative framework for a social democracy.

[1] See T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 10.

[2] See F Michelman 'Rule of Law, Legality and Constitutional Supremacy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 11.

[3] See S Liebenberg 'The Interpretation of Socio-Economic Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 33.

(bb) Substantive due process

If Ackermann J lost the battle over 'freedom', then in the end, it seems, he won the war over the value at the core of our current jurisprudence: dignity.[2] Could the same be said for the battle, in Ferreira, over whether too expansive a view of freedom would inevitably enmesh the Court in political conflicts it would do best to eschew? Recall that Chaskalson P admonished Ackermann J for falling, potentially, into the jurisprudential trap of substantive due process associated with Lochner v New York.[3] Chaskalson P's remarks in this regard are worth quoting in full:

> Implicit in the social welfare state is the acceptance of regulation and redistribution in the public interest. If in the context of our Constitution freedom is given the wide meaning that Ackermann J suggests it should have, the result might be to impede such policies. Whether or not there should be regulation and redistribution is essentially a political question which falls within the domain of the Legislature and not the Court. It is not for the Courts to approve or disapprove of such policies. What the Courts must ensure is that the implementation of any political decision to undertake such policies conforms with the Constitution. It should not, however, require the Legislature to show that they are necessary if the Constitution does not specifically require that this be done.
>
> In terms of our Constitution we are enjoined to protect the freedom guaranteed by s 11(1) against all governmental action that cannot be justified as being necessary. If we define freedom in the context of s 11(1) in sweeping terms we will be called upon to scrutinise every infringement of freedom in this broad sense as being 'necessary'. We cannot regulate this power by mechanisms of different levels of scrutiny as the Courts of the United States do, nor can we control it through the application of the principle that freedom is subject to laws that are consistent with the principles of 'fundamental justice', as the Canadian Courts do.

[1] See S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36.

[2] Ibid (Offers a detailed account of Ackermann J's contribution to this domain, as well as the evolution of his thought.)

[3] Ferreira (supra) at para 182, citing Lochner v New York 198 US 45 (1905).

> We should be careful to avoid the pitfall of Lochner v New York which has been described by Professor Tribe in his seminal work on American Constitutional Law, as being 'not in judicial intervention to protect "liberty' but in a misguided understanding of what liberty actually required in the industrial age'. The Lochner era gave rise to serious questions about judicial review and the relationship between the Court and the Legislature, and as Professor Tribe points out, the collapse of Lochner gave
>
> > 'credence to the notion that the legislative process should be completely wilful and self-controlled, with absolutely no judicial interference except where constitutional provisions much more explicit than due process were in jeopardy'.
>
> The protection of fundamental freedoms is pre-eminently a function of the Court. We should not, however, construe s 11 so broadly that we overshoot the mark and trespass upon terrain that is not rightly ours.[1]

Though we disagree with Ackermann J's take on 'freedom', his dismissal of Chaskalson P's Lochner gambit in the above passage is spot on:

> There may also be the anxiety that, unless freedom is given a more restricted meaning, this Court will inevitably be drawn into matters which are the concern of the Legislature rather than the Courts and could stand accused of what Tribe has described as being the error in decisions such as Lochner v New York which was 'a misguided understanding of what liberty actually required in the industrial age'. I believe this fear to be unfounded. Lochner . . . was decided in 1905 at a time and in a socio-economic context completely different from ours in 1995. I do not believe that we ought to allow ourselves to be haunted by the Lochner ghost. It is to me inconceivable that the broad sweep of labour legislation in this country could be struck down because of an argument that it infringed rights of contractual freedom protected by the Constitution. This is so for a number of reasons.
>
> First, the interventionist role of the State is no longer seen, in broad terms, as being limited to protecting its citizens against brute physical force and intimidation from others only, but is seen as extending to the economic and social realm as well. Secondly, there are specific provisions in the Constitution itself which will ensure that appropriate labour and other social legislation will not be invalidated because of a 'misguided understanding' of what liberty requires. Thirdly, statutory limitations on contractual freedom will . . . be justified under s 33(1) [the limitation clause], assuming the other requirements for limitation to have been fulfilled. . . . As a general proposition it is difficult to see how labour and other social legislation would be struck down where such legislation easily passes constitutional scrutiny in countries such as the United States of America, Canada and Germany.[2]

Beyond the obvious persuasiveness of Ackermann J's rejoinder, four aspects of this exchange will deepen our understanding of 'substantive due process' in South African constitutional law.

First, a decade later, all three branches of government continue to contend with basic issues of legitimacy and are, therefore, quite anxious about their exercise of power in relation to the other branches.[1] To the extent that Lochner means anything at all in South Africa, it must be understood as a warning articulated by one Justice, on one official occasion, about how far the courts should go in a fragile society where the trust necessary for testing the good will of one's political partners does not yet possess the kind of foundation born of time and respect found in other jurisdictions. Ironically, that Lochner gets mentioned less frequently in a country closer to crisis may well reflect the fact that an institution attempting to establish its own legitimacy and the legitimacy of the entire democratic constitutional project might be less inclined to use a metaphor synonymous with failure.

[1] See Ferreira (supra) at paras 180–83 (footnotes omitted).
[2] Ibid at paras 65–66 (footnotes omitted).

Second, for the purposes of this chapter, the most remarkable quality of the Court's jurisprudence is not its minimalism (its well-known desire to avoid making unnecessary pronouncements about the content of our basic law).[2] It is the Court's maximalism. For example, the development of the Court' rule-of-law doctrines has now outstripped the capacity of the Court to control its reach. The result is a doctrine that contains elements of Lochnerism — that is, characteristics of substantive due process — that the Chaskalson Court should, if operating in terms of its own logic, have worked more assiduously to control.

While the consequences of the Court's rule-of-law judgments for constitutional jurisdiction are radical, and clearly not contemplated by the drafters of the Final Constitution, it is certainly possible to view the legality principle as an inevitable consequence of a founding document committed to constitutional supremacy. What was certainly not inevitable, nor even foreseen, was the transmogrification of a doctrine designed to ensure that state actors exercise their powers within the formal bounds of the law into a doctrine in which the actual manner in which the

[1] The most recent exchange over the now moribund Constitution Fouteenth Amendment Bill — with its efforts to revamp the judiciary and bring it under the direct administrative control of the executive — is just one such example of the anxiety-ridden encounters that continue to occur between the three branches of government. For more on that exchange, see C Albertyn 'Judicial Independence and the Constitution Fourteenth Amendment Bill' (2006) 22 SAJHR 126. A better example may be the various pronouncements made by government officials surrounding the provision of nevirapine in order to prevent mother-to-child transmission of HIV. See Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign (No 2) 2002 5 SA 721 (CC), 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC)('TAC'). In TAC, the Constitutional Court went to great lengths to point out that it was simply ensuring that the government followed its own well-articulated policy regarding the provision of anti-retrovirals — proved safe and efficacious — to a particular class of persons. At the same time, several members of the Cabinet were not quite sure how to respond to the judgment. The Health Minister, Dr Manto Tshabalala-Msimang suggested that the government was free to contravene the Court's instructions. Shortly thereafter, the Minister of Justice, Penuell Maduna, publicly disavowed the Health Minister's intimations of contempt and assured the public that the government would abide by the Court's decision. The need for quite self-conscious recognition of the powers of a co-ordinate branch of government — and the need to build trust between the branches — was on display from the very beginning of the new constitutional dispensation. Hours after President Mandela lost a legal battle in Executive Council of the Western Cape Legislature v President of the Republic of South Africa he went on national television to declare not only that the Constitutional Court's judgment must be obeyed but that the simple fact of the Court's disagreement with the government was a sign of South Africa's political good health. 1995 (4) SA 877 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1289 (CC).

[2] For the locus classicus on the Constitutional Court's aversion to saying more than is absolutely necessary to resolve a dispute, see I Currie 'Judicious Avoidance' (1999) 15 SAJHR 138 state actor behaves — within such formal bounds — could be assessed in terms of substantive outcomes. That may not sound revolutionary. After all, various rights, as well as the limitations clause, subject state action to a test for reasonableness. What is revolutionary about Fedsure, Pharmaceutical Manufacturers and Modderklip is that prior to these judgments, the constitutionality of the conduct of state actors was always measured against a specific substantive provision in the Interim Constitution or the Final Constitution.[1] Indeed, one would have thought that self-same proposition lay at the very core of the Court's holding in Ferreira.

With Fedsure, constitutional review is no longer moored to the text. The legality principle draws its force, the Court tells us, from no specific provision, but from the text as a whole: something more basic than the text of the basic law. With Fedsure, the Court enters the well-established, if controversial, domain of modern substantive due process doctrine: the territory ploughed and cultivated by the

[1] The principle of legality and the rule of law doctrine articulated in Fedsure and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers respectively stand for the deceptively simple proposition that every exercise of public power must comply with the law. See Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of SA: In Re Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa 2000 2 SA 674 (CC), 2000 (3) BLCR 241 (CC)('Pharmaceutical Manufacturers'); Fedsure Life Assurance Ltd v Greater Johannesburg Transitional Metropolitan Council 1999 1 SA 374 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1458(CC)('Fedsure') at paras 58–59 ('It seems central to the conception of our constitutional order that the legislature and executive in every sphere are constrained by the principle that they may exercise no power and perform no function beyond that conferred upon them by law.') The most recent expression of this principle is to be found in the dissenting opinion of Langa CJ in AAA Investments v Micro Finance Regulatory Council & Another CCT 51/05 (unreported decision of 28 July 2006)('Public power can only be validly exercised if it is clearly sourced in law.') But this apparently uncontroversial thesis packs two additional punches. First, it requires that any exercise of public power be 'affirmatively authorized by positive law'. See F Michelman 'The Rule of Law, Legality and the Supremacy of the Constitution' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) 11-11. See also Minister of Public Works & Others v Kyalami Ridge Environmental Association & Others 2001 (3) SA 1151 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 652 (CC) at para 35. Second, because all law derives its force from the constitution, all positive law must comport with constitutional dictates, and therefore, any exercise of public power itself — as authorized by positive law — must be consistent with the explicit and implicit demands of the basic law.

While these two additional theses may appear, on their face, to be relatively tame, their consequences are revolutionary. The legality principle, and its doppelganger, the rule of law doctrine, makes every exercise of public power subject to constitutional review without any express provision of the Constitution requiring such an exacting standard. For a Constitutional Court committed to not saying anything more than necessary about the meaning of the constitutional text, the elevation of such a tacit (but perhaps penumbral) commitment to the status of a first principle makes the Lochner Court's gloss on the 14th Amendment's due process clause seem relatively tame. A second consequence of this doctrine that the Constitutional Court must have anticipated, but has as yet refused to address directly, is the radical expansion of its own jurisdiction. See Michelman (supra)(From the premise that every law draws its force from the basic law and that the validity of every exercise of power must be assessed in terms of the basic law, 'it apparently must follow that every possible appeal in a case at law presents a constitutional question.') By making every exercise of public power and every judicial construction of both law and conduct a 'constitutional matter', the Constitutional Court retains the capacity to review each and every judicial decision. That means, in short, that once a dispute reaches a tribunal, it becomes, potentially, a constitutional matter. (Whether the underlying dispute engages conduct by a state actor is immaterial.) Any judicial construction of law that is not authorized by law — and that includes the basic law — is meat for constitutional review. As a result, the Constitutional Court, a court of specialized and limited jurisdiction, has transformed itself into a court that could effectively be a court of plenary jurisdiction. See C Lewis 'Reaching the Pinnacle: Principles, Policies and People for a Single Apex Court in South Africa' (2005) 21 SAJHR 509.

US Supreme Court in reproductive rights cases stretching from Griswold[1] and Eisenstadt,[2] through Roe[3] to Carey,[4] and which ultimately gave birth by judicial writ to an unenumerated, but now largely accepted, right to privacy. Pharmaceutical Manufacturers is noteworthy, in this regard, not merely because it extends the reasoning of Fedsure. Pharmaceutical Manufacturers also holds that, despite the addition of a textual hook in the Final Constitution — FC s 1*(c)* — that commits us 'in principle' to the rule of law, the rule of law doctrine is not grounded in a specific textual provision.

Enter Modderklip. In Modderklip the Supreme Court of Appeal had found that the state's failure to act on the occupation of private land by an informal settlement amounted to an expropriation under FC s 25(1) read with FC s 7(2), and ordered the state to compensate Modderklip Boerdery for the violation.[5] The Constitutional Court declined to decide the case on the same basis.[6] The Modderklip Court relies instead, for reasons that cannot be interrogated here, on FC s 1*(c)* and FC s 34. No longer simply a stand-alone principle, FC s 1*(c), when read with the right of access to courts, FC s 34, generates the proposition that the rule of law, properly conceived, imposes an 'obligation [on] . . . the state to provide the necessary mechanisms for citizens to resolve disputes that arise between them.'[7] But the sting in this judgment is not that FC s 34 secures for the citizenry the legal institutions required to mediate conflict. Now read in concert with FC s 1(c)*, FC s 34 requires more than 'the mere provision of the mechanisms' for dispute resolution.[8] It demands that the state take 'reasonable steps . . . to ensure that large-scale disruptions in the social fabric do not occur in the wake of the execution of court orders, thus undermining the rule of law.'[9]

[1] 381 US 479 (1965).
[2] 405 US 438 (1972).
[3] 410 US 113 (1973).
[4] 431 US 678 (1977).
[5] Modderfontein Squatters, Greater Benoni City Council v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri SA and Legal Resources Centre, amici curiae*); President of the Republic of South Africa and Others v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd (Agri SA and Legal Resources Centre,* amici curiae*)* 2004 (6) SA 40 (SCA), 2004 (8) BCLR 821 (SCA). See also Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd v Modder East Squatters & Another 2001 (4) SA 385 (W).
[6] President of the Republic of South Africa & Others v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd 2005 (5) SA 3 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 786 (CC)('Modderklip').
[7] See Chief Lesapo v North West Agricultural Bank & Another 2000 (1) SA 409 (CC), 1999 (12) BCLR 1420 (CC)('Chief Lesapo') at para 22 (Chief Lesapo hints at some of the concerns raised in Modderklip. Mokgoro J writes that FC s 34 and the rule of law doctrine are 'foundational to the stability of an orderly society. It ensures the peaceful, regulated and institutionalised mechanisms to resolve disputes, without resorting to self-help. The right of access to court is a bulwark against vigilantism, and the chaos and anarchy which it causes. Construed in this context of the rule of law and the principle against self-help in particular, access to court is indeed of cardinal importance.' (our emphasis) However, it is one thing to enveigh against individualized acts of self-help, and quite another to find the State culpable for the social disintegration that flows from a generalized failure of the state's legal dispute mechanisms to resolve conflict effectively.)
[8] Modderklip (supra) at para 42.
[9] Ibid.

Third, if such language alone is not striking enough — the spectre of a Zimbabwe-like constitutional crisis looms large — then three subtle shifts in language are.

- The right of access to courts is no longer primarily concerned with the existence of formal legal structures. It is now concerned, it appears, with 'effective remedies'.[1] It is concerned with substantive outcomes — substantive due process — and thus outcomes the constitutionality of which are to be measured by the courts for compliance with some rather murky, but no less meaningful, sense of what 'reasonable steps' are required to turn back the forces of entropy.
- It also seems clear that this new reasonableness test is not derived from FC s 34. It flows from FC s 1*(c)* and our commitment to the rule of law. As Langa DCJ writes: 'The precise nature of the state's obligation in any particular case and in respect of any particular right will depend on what is reasonable, regard being had to the nature of the right or interest that is at risk as well as on the circumstances of each case.'[2] FC s 1*(c)* will tell us, in the context of various rights, what reasonable, substantive steps the state — and the courts — must take to maintain order.
- The challenges of meeting such a reasonableness requirement in similar kinds of cases are not to be underestimated. For, although the Court describes these circumstances as extraordinary, they are, indeed, the circumstances in which many South Africans find themselves now.[3]

In the space of several paragraphs, the Modderklip Court has moved from an apparently procedural gloss on the rule of law — consistent with the legality principle annunciated in Fedsure and Pharmaceutical Manufacturers — to something far more robust. The state — in order to comply with the dictates of the rule of law doctrine — must create and maintain courts that provide 'effective remedies'. Again, the rule of law requires not just any remedy, but an effective remedy. What is an effective remedy? An effective remedy must reflect a serious attempt to prevent 'large-scale disruptions in the social fabric' and their attendant 'chaos and misery'. Failure of the state to plan adequately for such contingencies risks censure by the courts. Moreover, such censure is no longer limited to a terse

[1] Modderklip (supra) at para 42.

[2] Ibid at para 43.

[3] Ibid at paras 46–49 ('[C]ourt orders must be executed in a manner that prevents social upheaval. Otherwise the purpose of the rule of law would be subverted by the very execution process that ought to uphold it. . . . The circumstances of this case are extraordinary in that it is not possible to rely on mechanisms normally employed to execute eviction orders. This should have been obvious to the state. It was not a case of one or two or even ten evictions where a routine eviction order would have sufficed. To execute this particular court order and evict tens of thousands of people with nowhere to go would cause unimaginable social chaos and misery and untold disruption. In the circumstances of this case, it would also not be consistent with the rule of law. The question that needs to be answered is whether the state was, in the circumstances, obliged to do more than it has done to satisfy the requirements of the rule of law and fulfil the [FC s] . . . 34 rights of Modderklip. I find that it was unreasonable of the state to stand by and do nothing in circumstances where it was impossible for Modderklip to evict the occupiers because of the sheer magnitude of the invasion and the particular circumstances of the occupiers.') statement at the end of a judgment castigating the responsible Minister for a failure to discharge constitutional responsibilities. A failure to take those reasonable steps necessary to safeguard the rule of law may result in an award of constitutional damages against the state. Like the Lochner Court and its expansive reading of the 14th Amendment, the Modderklip Court also states that it will find unconstitutional that state action — or that state inaction — which falls outside that permitted by our social compact. In South Africa, we are concerned, not with the violation of freedom of contract, but with state action that risks 'large-scale disruptions in the social fabric'. The Constitutional Court has retained for itself the right to intervene when it believes such disruptions pose a danger to the commonweal.

If Modderklip is Lochnerism, then it is Lochnerism of a certain kind. Modderklip announces that the Final Constitution — and the rule of law doctrine — does not simply oblige the state to act within the law. Modderklip warns the state that although the Final Constitution says nothing about violations of the rule of law — to say nothing about the imposition of constitutional damages for such violations — the courts will readily identify violations and impose appropriate sanctions when the state has not taken what the courts deem to be reasonable steps to maintain the rule of law. This maximalist account of what the rule of law requires is a species of Lochnerism because the highest constitutional tribunal in South Africa has gone far beyond the text of the Final Constitution and finds that the basic law now subjects the state to a set of due process dictates that are undeniably substantive.

Fourth, we have just argued that Modderklip reflects a very particular species of Lochnerism. If Modderklip is a form of Lochnerism, then so too must Ackermann J's opinion in Ferreira be. And if both Ferreira and Modderklip are species of Lochnerism, then Chaskalson P's charge against Ackermann J loses much, if not all, of its force. Both Ferreira and Modderklip stand for the proposition that judicial overreach is generally not 'a problem' with which most Constitutional Courts must contend. What the tag Lochneresque does is draw attention to the Constitutional Court's general desire to avoid offering a sustained political argument about (1) policy-decisions taken by a political branch of government; (2) the meaning of a constitutional provision; and (3) the use of a constitutional provision to uphold or strike down a law. That the exigencies of particular cases may demand such 'overreach' is an inescapable condition of doing justice in a constitutional jurisdiction. Ackermann J, in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs, identifies the proper response to our courts judicial flight from substance when he writes that:

> It should be borne in mind that whether the remedy a Court grants is one striking down, wholly or in part; or reading into or extending the text, its choice is not final and that legislatures are able, within constitutional limits, to amend the remedy, whether by re-enacting equal benefits, further extending benefits, reducing them, amending them, fine-tuning them or abolishing them. Thus, they can exercise final control over the nature and extent of the benefits.[1]

[1] 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) at para 76.

There is, as Ackermann J indicates, no real profit to be had in describing Modderklip and Ferreira in such odious terms as 'substantive due process'. He seems, in his opinions, to suggest instead that in the years to come, the myths of Modderklip and Ferreira will tell of a society that, having thrown off the shackles of a despotic state, still manages, under the quiet but insistent tutelage of the Constitutional Court, to enjoy the fruits of 'liberty'.

(ii) FC s 12: Enumerated rights, dignity and the dialectic of enlightenment

The result of the Court's post-Ferreira jurisprudence and the recasting of the actual language of the right is a provision that, while more modest in reach, is more influential in practice. The right to freedom and security of the person, as one of the authors has written elsewhere, has worked major and minor revolutions in the law of sentencing and punishment, delict, reproductive rights, remedies for public and private violence and detention.[1]

FC s 12 — for all its permutations in draft form — still retains the bifurcated structure of IC s 11: FC s 12(1)'s right to freedom and security of the person; and FC s 12(2)'s right to bodily and psychological integrity. As Iain Currie and Johan de Waal rightly observe, FC s 12 has retained its prominence in our nascent body of jurisprudence not because of its expansive understanding of freedom, but because 'it affords comprehensive protection' in the areas to which it does apply.[2]

FC s 12(1) provides both substantive protection and procedural protection for any deprivation of physical liberty. The substantive component requires that the state possess good reasons for the deprivation. The procedural component requires that the state employ fair proceedings or even trials when any such deprivation of freedom is contemplated.[3] Because the drafters offered a far stricter and a more specific formulation of FC s 12(1), we are unlikely to witness again the kind of debate about the meaning of 'freedom' that arose under IC s 11: all five dimensions of the right, as listed in FC s 12(1)(a) through FC s 12(1)(e), speak directly to 'unwarranted' invasions of the body by the state.[4] FC s 12(2) extends the domain of freedom secured by the right to specific forms of bodily integrity. It safeguards the reproductive rights of women and ensures that all persons subject to medical experimentation are, in so far as our limited capacity allows, aware of the potential consequences of novel medical or scientific experiments performed upon them. If a gap exists in the formulation of FC s 12 that might allow greater latitude for judicial law-making, then FC s 12(2) closes down that gap by containing provisions that further extend individual control over bodily integrity. Thus far, neither FC s 12(1) nor FC s 12(2) have elicited the kind of controversy to which IC s 11(1) gave rise.

[1] S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36.
[2] I Currie & J De Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 292.
[3] For a discussion of the dual nature of FC s 12 protection see § 40.2*(a)* infra.
[4] Ibid.

But the 'comprehensive protection' afforded by FC s 12 is only part of the story. FC s 12 has come to play a revolutionary role in the development of our law not because it serves as a vehicle for the preferred political philosophy of a majority of the justices on the Constitutional Court. It is at the centre of significant changes in our law because of the manner in which the Court has connected FC s 12 to the constitutional grundnorm of dignity.

Dignity represents our recognition of others as ends-in themselves, as the objects of our mutual concern and mutual respect, as capable of self-actualization and of self-governance, and, as members of our political community, entitled to the material conditions required for the meaningful exercise of individual agency.[1] Its ultimate aim, however, is the emancipation of all of the individual members of the polity.

Such a characterization of the core tenets of our dignity jurisprudence — and its relationship to FC s 12 — places far too positive a spin on the concerns that sit at the core of the right to freedom and security of the person. As one of the authors of this chapter has noted elsewhere, the right, the value and the ideal of dignity is, originally, animated by a refusal to turn away from suffering.[2] That original, animating feature of our dignity jurisprudence — the recognition of our capacity for brutality — is what ties FC s 10's right to dignity to FC s 12's right to freedom and security of the person.

FC s 12 recognizes that the history of emancipation associated with the modern nation-state is often, if not inevitably, accompanied by domination. Robespierre and The Terror, in 1793, followed hot on the heels of the French Revolution and The Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, in 1789.[3] After the Holocaust, Stalin's purges and the dropping of atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki, and after the victory of Allied forces and the creation of the various international institutions founded at Bretton Woods, members of the Frankfurt School articulated a trenchant critique of modernity that remains difficult to admit in full, but equally impossible to reject out of hand: that liberation and domination in the modern democratic constitutional state are flip-sides

[1] See Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) at § 36.4*(c)*(Freedom and security of the person as refracted through the prism of dignity, has revolutionized three bodies of law: (a) the common law of delict in the context of state liability for wrongful behaviour; (b) the state's regulation of abortion; and (c) punishment.)

[2] Ibid.

[3] The Declaration sounds the triumph of political emancipation from the despotism of monarchy. See art I — Men are born and remain free and equal in rights. Social distinctions can be founded only on the common utility; art III — The principle of any sovereignty resides essentially in the Nation. No body, no individual can exert authority which does not emanate expressly from it; art VI — All the citizens, being equal in [the eyes of the law], are equally admissible to all public dignities, places, and employments, according to their capacity and without distinction other than that of their virtues and of their talent. Only four years later France hears the indefatigable hooftaps of Robespierre, who justified mass executions in the name of progress by stating that: 'Terror is nothing other than prompt, severe, inflexible justice.'

of the same coin. That is, the liberation from one form of political economy, that of monarchy and mercantilism, invites new forms of domination that flow from another, that of the bureaucratic, democratic capitalist state. Adorno puts this basic thesis as follows:

> The dual nature of progress, which always developed the potential of freedom simultaneously with the reality of oppression, gave rise to a situation in which peoples were more and more inducted into the control of nature and social organization, but grew at the same time, owing to the compulsion which culture placed upon them, incapable of understanding in what way culture went beyond such integration. . . . They make common cause with the world against themselves, and the most alienated condition of all, the omnipresence of commodities, their own conversion into appendages of machinery, is for them a mirage of closeness. . . .
>
> The concept of dynamism . . . is raised to an absolute, whereas it ought, as an anthropological reflex of the laws of production, to be itself critically confronted, in an emancipated society, with need. The conception of unfettered activity, of uninterrupted procreation, of chubby insatiability, of freedom of frantic bustle, feeds on the bourgeois concept of nature that has always served solely to proclaim social violence as unchangeable. . . . It was in this, and not in their alleged leveling down, that the positive blue-prints of socialism . . . were rooted in barbarism. It is not man's lapse into luxurious indolence that is to be feared, but the savage spread of the social under the mask of universal nature, the collective as a blind fury of activity. The naïve supposition of an unambiguous development towards increased production is itself of a piece of that bourgeois outlook which permits development in only one direction because, integrated into a totality, dominated by quantification, it is hostile to qualitative difference. If we imagine emancipated society as emancipation from precisely such totality, then vanishing lines come into view that have little in common with increased production and its human reflections.[1]

We do not think it surprising that those persons who helped to bring about the end of apartheid — almost half a century after the world had declared itself rid of Nazi Germany — would imbue their founding document with a bit of grim realism about the emancipatory powers of the post-apartheid state. We find in FC s 12 a preoccupation with the worst forms of abuse that the state — and

[1] T Adorno Minima Moralia: Reflections from Damaged Life (trans EFN Jephcott, 1951) 146–56. Horkheimer describes the French Revolution as a 'condensed version of later history' and in words even more prescient for the common era writes:

> More and more, economic questions are becoming technical ones. The privileged position of administrative officers and technical and planning engineers will lose its rational basis in the future; naked power is becoming its only justification. The awareness that the rationality of domination is already in decline when the authoritarian state takes over society is the real basis for its identity with terrorism. (emphasis added)

M Horkheimer 'The Authoritarian State' in A Arato & E Gebhardt (eds) The Essential Frankfurt School Reader (1982) 95, 105. Perhaps no better explanation exists for the current existential and political crisis in the West and in the Middle East. However, as pessimistic as both Adorno and Horkheimer are about the human condition, they were by no means fatalists. Both imagined that neo-Marxist dialectic — as opposed to liberal enlightenment conceptions of development and progress — might strengthen 'freedom' and bring about the end of exploitation. See T Adorno & M Horkheimer Dialectic of Enlightenment (1972).

modern society — can visit upon the individual.[1] FC s 12 reminds us that the post-apartheid state retains the power to put people in prison without reason and without end, and that ours remains a society in which bodies are raped, tortured and otherwise exploited. Take FC s 12(1)(b) — the right not to be detained without trial. All of the original interpreters of our basic law understood that FC s 12(1)(b) was designed to remind us of apartheid's many depredations. As Ackermann J writes in De Lange:

> When viewed against its historical background, the first and most egregious form of deprivation of physical liberty which springs to mind when considering the construction of the expression 'detained without trial' in s 12(1)(b) is the notorious administrative detention without trial for purposes of political control. This took place during the previous constitutional dispensation under various statutory provisions which were effectively insulated against meaningful judicial control. Effective judicial control was excluded prior to the commencement of the detention and throughout its duration. During such detention, and facilitated by this exclusion of judicial control, the grossest violations of the life and the bodily, mental and spiritual integrity of detainees occurred. This manifestation of detention without trial was a virtual negation of the rule of law and had serious negative consequences for the credibility and status of the judiciary in this country.[2]

Moreover, many, but by no means all, of our Constitutional Court Justices understood that various commonplace acts of barbarism under apartheid would find renewed expression in our post-apartheid state, and that genuine emancipation would require constant vigilance against new forms of domination. We would suggest that a majority of the De Lange Court recognized that permitting presiding officers (who were neither magistrates nor judges) to imprison, indefinitely and repeatedly, recalcitrant witnesses in insolvency proceedings was of a piece with the apartheid practice of detention without trial, and that this identification of a 'new' form of exploitation underwrites the Court's finding that this particular statutory grant of power to punish is unconstitutional.

Ackermann J's words may seem rather tepid compared to Adorno's largely nihilistic critique of modernity. And that is not just because judges are not

[1] Although much ink has been spilled over the meaning of 'freedom' in IC s 11 and FC s 12, it seems fair to say that FC s 12's primary focus is on security of the person. FC s 12(1)(c), FC s 12(1)(d), FC s 12(1)(e), FC s 12(2)(a), FC s 12(2)(b) and FC s 12(2)(c) all reflect the drafters' concern with very concrete forms of harm that can be worked upon the individual body rather than concerns with more abstract notions of 'freedom'.

[2] De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC)('De Lange') at para 26. Sachs J sounds similar concerns when he writes that in terms of the

> [I]nterim Constitution . . . the words 'detention without trial' stood alone as an express bar to physical restraint by the State and accordingly had to function as the sole textual basis for analysing the constitutionality of all forms of coercive State power involving physical restraint. Now it is just one item in an extensive and nuanced catalogue, and therefore needs to be given a specific significance which both justifies its place in the list and separates it from the other items. It accordingly reclaims its commonly accepted identity in South Africa as relating to a specific and unmistakable prohibition of the special and intense form of deprivation of liberty that scarred our recent history.

Ibid at para 173.

philosophers. The Frankfurt School's post-Marxist dismissal of the Enlightenment's commitment to truth is not, as yet, a philosophical fashion that has taken root here. South Africa remains the last great modernist project. Our Final Constitution is certainly written as if it is such. It commits us to great ideals and the material transformation of the lives of those who cannot yet enter the public square without still experiencing shame. There is simply too much truth yet to be told. FC s 12 will not, therefore, be read as a double-edged sword by our courts. It will be read instead as a reminder that domination and exploitation are features of our society — as they are of every society — and that it falls to our politicians, judges, lawyers and various organs of civil society to ensure that the great emancipatory ends of our modernist project are not undermined by new forms of domination.

40.2 Relationship Between FC ss 12(1), 12(1)(a), and 12(1)(b)

Despite FC s 12(1)'s disaggregation and re-formulation of the various rights found in IC s 11(1), the Constitutional Court has largely failed to give distinct content to, and delineate satisfactorily between, FC s 12(1), FC s 12(1)(a) and FC s 12(1)(b). In this section, we attempt to reconstruct the Court's FC s 12(1), FC s 12(1)(a) and FC s 12(1)(b) jurisprudence. This reconstruction apportions discrete tasks to each of the three sections and avoids offending the constitutional canon of surplusage.

(a) Dual function of FC s 12(1)

FC s 12(1) provides both substantive and procedural protection. That much is settled law. What remains unclear is the actual textual source for this dual protection.

The (residual) dual protection now afforded by FC s 12(1) was first articulated by O'Regan J, in dissent, in Bernstein v Bester.[1] She argued that both the procedural dimension and substantive dimension of IC s 11(1) flowed from the very notion of 'freedom' itself:

> [F]reedom has two interrelated constitutional aspects: the first is a procedural aspect which requires that no one be deprived of physical freedom unless fair and lawful procedures have been followed. Requiring deprivation of freedom to be in accordance with procedural fairness is a substantive commitment in the Constitution. The other constitutional aspect of freedom lies in a recognition that, in certain circumstances, even when fair and lawful > procedures have been followed, the deprivation of freedom will not be constitutional, because the grounds upon which freedom has been curtailed are unacceptable.[1]

[1] Bernstein & Others v Bester & Others NNO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC)('Bernstein').

What is important about this approach is that both safeguards are enshrined in FC s 12(1)'s general right to 'freedom and security of the person' rather than any specific subsection.

Ackermann J, while professing to follow O'Regan J's dualist approach, located the procedural aspect of the right not in 'freedom' but in the word 'trial'. Indeed, under the Interim Constitution, a unanimous Court in Nel v Le Roux made it clear that the procedural protection of IC s 11 was to be found in the 'trial component' of the right.[2]

Ackermann J was provided with another opportunity to address the same question under the Final Constitution in De Lange v Smuts. In De Lange, Ackermann J begins by stating that 'the procedural aspect of the protection of freedom is implicit in [FC] s 12(1) as it was in s 11(1) of the interim Constitution'.[3] However, he later shifts the textual justification for his analysis and writes: 'Although para (b) of s 12(1) only refers to the right 'not to be detained without trial' and no specific reference is made to the other procedural components of such trial it is implicit that the trial must be a "fair" trial.'[4] Indeed, he concludes that s 66 of the Insolvency Act's lack of procedural protection limits FC s 12(1)(b), not FC s 12(1). This finding confirms his holding in Nel that FC s 12(1)(b) — and not FC s 12(1)'s general commitment to 'freedom' — provides the desired procedural protection. In addition, Ackermann J specifically sources the substantive protection afforded by FC s 12(1) in FC s 12(1)(a)'s prohibition on deprivations of liberty 'arbitrarily or without just cause'.[5]

---

[1] Bernstein (supra) at para 145. O'Regan J went on to note that both the procedural and the substantive protection afforded by IC s 11 received adequate protection elsewhere in the Bill of Rights. (Procedural protection is secured largely through the right to a fair trial. Substantive protection is achieved through such rights as expression, association, assembly and religion). As a result, O'Regan J conceived of IC s 11 as a residual right. Ibid at paras 146–47.

O'Regan J repeated this formulation in another separate judgment in S v Coetzee 1997 (3) SA 527 (CC), 1997 (4) BCLR 437 (CC) at para 159 ('They raise two different aspects of freedom: the first is concerned particularly with the reasons for which the State may deprive someone of freedom; and the second is concerned with the manner whereby a person is deprived of freedom. As I stated in Bernstein and Others v Bester and Others NNO, our Constitution recognises that both aspects are important in a democracy: the State may not deprive its citizens of liberty for reasons that are not acceptable, nor, when it deprives citizens of freedom for acceptable reasons, may it do so in a manner which is procedurally unfair. The two issues are related, but a constitutional finding that the reason for which the State wishes to deprive a person of his or her freedom is acceptable, does not dispense with the question of whether the procedure followed to deprive a person of liberty is fair.')

[2] Nel v Le Roux NO & Others 1996 (3) SA 532 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC)('Nel') at para 12 ('It was contended that the [challenged procedure] did not constitute a 'trial' for purposes of s 11(1) and in any event infringed the requirement of 'fairness' or 'due process' or 'natural justice' which is implicit in the 'trial' component of this right. I have no doubt that this latter requirement, however one wishes to label it, is implicit in this right.') See also De Lange v Smuts NO & Others 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC)('De Lange') at para 20.

[3] De Lange (supra) at para 22.

[4] Ibid at para 24.

[5] Ibid at para 22.

Mokgoro J's judgment in De Lange locates both the substantive and the procedural protection of freedom in FC s 12(1)(a). As far as she was concerned, substantive protection flowed from the requirement of 'just cause' and procedural protection from the prohibition on 'arbitrary' deprivations.[1]

The unanimous decision in S v Thebus creates additional confusion about the proper construction of FC s 12(1), FC s 12(1)(a), and FC s 12(1)(b).[2] The Thebus Court — in rejecting a FC s 12(1)(a) challenge to the common-law doctrine of common purpose — held that '[t]he "just cause" [in FC s 12(1)(a)] points to substantive protection against being deprived of freedom arbitrarily or without an adequate or acceptable reason and to the procedural right to a fair trial.'[3]

In sum, the Court, and its various members, offer four possible variations on the relationship between and the meaning of FC s 12(1), FC s 12(1)(a), and FC s 12(1)(b):

- Substantive protection and procedural protection both flow from the general FC s 12(1) right to 'freedom' (O'Regan J).
- Substantive protection is enshrined in FC s 12(1)(a), and procedural protection in FC s 12(1)(b) (Ackermann J).
- The term 'just cause' in FC s 12(1)(a) houses the substantive dimension of the right, while the term 'arbitrary' in FC s 12(1)(a) provides for procedural protection (Mokgoro J).
- Substantive protection and procedural protection are both sourced in FC s 12(1)(a) (Thebus).

This confusion with regard to the actual textual source of the substantive protection and procedural protection of FC ss 12(1), 12(1)(a) and 12(1)(b) may seem rather academic. However, the ambiguity surrounding the proper construction of FC ss 12(1), 12(1)(a) and 12(1)(b) has demonstrably practical consequences for constitutional doctrine.

In De Lange v Smuts, for example, when asked to consider whether the detention of witnesses for failure to answer questions violated FC s 12(1)(a), FC s 12(1)(b) or both, Ackermann J found that only FC s 12(1)(b) had been impaired. O'Regan J, on the other hand, found a general breach of FC s 12(1). Mokgoro J located the limitation in FC s 12(1)(a).

The variety of positions taken in De Lange are just a singular manifestion of a larger problem. In Geuking, the Court, as a whole, relied entirely on the general

[1] De Lange (supra) at para 130. See also J de Waal 'Revitalising the Freedom Right? De Lange v Smuts No (1999) 15 SAJHR 217, 225–26 (Agrees that part of the procedural aspect should be located in the prohibition on arbitrariness, but limits this role to requiring that the deprivation accord with the principle of legality. Whether the principle of legality truly reflects procedural protection rather than substantive protection is questionable.)

[2] S v Thebus & Another 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC)(The Court split on issues relating to the right to silence, but was unanimous on the construction of FC s 12.)

[3] Ibid at para 39 (our emphasis). See also Omar v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others (Commission for Gender Equality, Amicus Curiae) 2006 (2) SA 289 (CC), 2006 (2) BCLR 253 (CC)('Omar')(Court considers procedural issues in relation to a FC s 12(1)(a) challenge.)

'freedom' guarantee of FC s 12(1) to engage issues surrounding the constitutionality of a pending extradition.[1] In Lawyers for Human Rights, the following year, the Court addressed similar questions of detention (of illegal immigrants) in terms of 'distinct' rights afforded by FC s 12(1)(a) and FC s 12(1)(b).[2] And the year after that, in Omar, the Court chose to consider the constitutionality of detention for violation of domestic protection orders solely in terms of FC s 12(1)(a).[3] While some of these discrepancies may be a result of the manner in which the cases were presented, the variation in the form of analysis clearly illustrates confusion, or at least ambivalence, about how to allocate distinct analytical tasks to each of the three sections.[4]

[1] Geuking v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2003 (3) SA 34 (CC), 2004 (9) BCLR 895 (CC)('Geuking') at para 48 (The Court was asked to consider the constitutionality of certain provisions of the Extradition Act 67 of 1962. These provisions permitted extradition to countries without an extradition agreement. A successful extradition under these circumstances requires that a magistrate be satisfied, among other things, that the requesting country has sufficient evidence for a successful prosecution. Section 10(2) of the Act provides that a certificate from the prosecuting authority of the requesting state will serve as conclusive proof of this question. The applicant alleged that this provision violated both the substantive and procedural aspects of the FC s 12(1) framework. Goldstone J rejected this argument on the grounds that '[t]he role of the s 10(2) certificate in reaching such conclusions is a narrow one, related only to the question of whether the alleged conduct is sufficient to give rise to an offence in the foreign jurisdiction. As such its conclusive character does not detract from the fact that the magistrate's enquiry and conclusion is sufficient, in the context of the purpose of the enquiry, which is to facilitate extradition, to meet the constitutional requirement of just cause.')

[2] Lawyers for Human Rights & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2004 (4) SA 125 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 775 (CC)('Lawyers for Human Rights') at para 32 (The Immigration Act 13 of 2002 allows the detention of foreigners who arrive at ports of entry and who are suspected of being illegally in the country. The Court rejected the High Court's interpretation that a person could be detained on the mere 'say-so' of the immigration officer. Yacoob J instead interpreted the section to permit detention only if the officer had a 'reasonable suspicion' that the person was illegally in the country. Interpreted in this way, the provision did not violate FC s 12(1)(a):'It is not arbitrary to cause the detention of a person who has just arrived at a port of entry in South Africa, and who is reasonably suspected by an immigration officer on duty at the port of entry to be an illegal foreigner. Indeed, reasonable suspicion by an immigration officer constitutes just cause for the detention.' However, because it allowed detention without trial the act limited FC s 12(1)(b). That violation was unjustifiable only to the extent that it permitted detention for longer than 30 days without the option of having the detention confirmed by a court.)

[3] See Omar (supra)(The applicant questioned the constitutional validity of parts of the Domestic Violence Act 116 of 1998. The Act permitted the execution of suspended warrants of arrest following the issuance of a protection order. The challenges based on FC s 12 asserted that the possibility that a person could be arrested without notice of the protection order and that a police officer was compelled to arrest a potential offender based on the affidavit by the complainant. In rejecting both these challenges, Van der Westhuizen J failed to consider separately the twin pillars of FC s 12(1) protection and relied exclusively on FC s 12(1)(a), to address largely procedural complaints. Ibid at paras 44 and 48.)

[4] While there is no doubt that the right to freedom in its various forms has two dimensions, there is a limit to the utility of the division between procedure and substance. The two dimensions of freedom, as Mokgoro J notes, are intimately related:

> Where an interest of paramount importance is at issue, then stringent procedures are called for: indeed, we expect them to be more precise than when a lesser interest is implicated, and our contemplation of the substance of the matter will influence our attitude toward the procedure required. It may, however, be stated that while there are often clear examples of substantive and procedural issues that might be contrasted, sometimes the line is too fine to be drawn.

(b) Reconstructing 'freedom': Discrete roles of FC ss 12(1), 12(1)(a) and 12(1)(b)

We are not, it should be clear, claiming that the different definitions attached by different judges, and different courts, to FC ss 12(1), 12(1)(a) and 12(1)(b) are, in fact, outcome determinative. Our task — in this section — is to provide a gloss on the three sections that makes sense of the Court's extant jurisprudence and to construct a rubric for the analysis of future cases that gives each of the three sections a distinct, and yet coherent, meaning.

We begin with FC s 12(1)(a) because this is the only component part of FC s 12(1) to have attracted the unanimous agreement of the Court — in Thebus — on its content. Thebus tells us that FC s 12(1)(a) has a substantive dimension and a procedural dimension rooted in the phrase 'just cause'.

While we may, as the Thebus Court does, ignore FC s 12(1) generally, it is more difficult to disregard the word 'arbitrary' in FC s 12(1)(a). As Mokgoro J suggested in De Lange, the term 'arbitrary' in FC s 12(1)(a) must offer, at a minimum, a form of procedural protection for some deprivations of liberty.

Nor can FC s 12(1)(b) be ignored in its entirety. In the first place, it refers solely to those instances in which a person has been 'detained' — a patently higher threshold than FC s 12(1)(a)'s 'deprivation'. In addition, FC s 12(1)(b)'s 'trial' requirements clearly warrant more stringent procedural protections than those procedural protections demanded by FC s 12(1)(a). While the procedural requirements of FC s 12(1)(a) and FC s 12(1)(b) may overlap — where a 'deprivation' in terms of FC s 12(1)(a) requires a 'trial' in terms of FC s 12(1)(b) — there exists a distinction with a difference between the procedural protections afforded by FC s 12(1)(a) and FC s 12(1)(b). FC s 12(1)(b) ought to afford persons 'detained without trial' significantly greater procedural protection.

Given this apportionment of responsibilities between FC s 12(1)(a) and FC s 12(1)(b), what role, if any, remains for the general right to 'freedom' in FC s 12(1)? While it is difficult to imagine physical deprivations of freedom that will not be protected by FC s 12(1)(a), FC s 12(1) — unlike FC s 12(1)(a) — is De Lange (supra) at para 128. O'Regan J concurred with Mokgoro J in this assessment. Ibid at para 143 ('[T]here is no rigid rule as to what procedural safeguards are appropriate in the context of s 12(1). The procedural safeguards required will depend on the nature of the deprivation and its purpose.') See also J de Waal 'Revitalising the Freedom Right? De Lange v Smuts NO' (1999) 15 SAJHR 217, 226. But not only has the court used substance in determining procedure, it has also used procedure to determine substance. In De Lange (supra) at para 41 Ackermann J held, while considering the substantive fairness of the provision, that '[a] further significant safeguard to the examinee's rights is [the possibility of] an unrestricted reconsideration of the grounds for the examinee's committal and continued detention [by a court].' In two more recent decisions the Court has relied almost entirely on the manner in which a decision is reached as providing the substantive justification for the deprivation of freedom in the context of extraditions (Geuking) and illegal aliens (Lawyers for Human Rights). This jurisprudence seems to point towards the adoption of a broad single test of the 'fairness' or acceptability of a deprivation rather than two discreet enquiries. In its most recent consideration of FC s 12 the Omar Court failed to even mention the dual nature of this section. However, it is clear that, in theory at least, the Court maintains its two-prong approach.

not limited to deprivations that are arbitrary or without just cause. FC s 12(1) should therefore play, as O'Regan J suggests in De Lange, a residual role. It will, on our account, engage those violations of physical freedom that might fall through the doctrinal cracks of FC ss 12(1)(a) and 12(1)(b).[1]

In sum, we offer the following construction of the relationship between FC s 12(1), FC ss 12(1)(a) and 12(1)(b):

- FC s 12(1)(a) affords substantive protection and procedural protection for deprivations of freedom that are 'arbitrary' or that occur without 'just cause'.
- FC s 12(1)(b) affords more stringent procedural protection to persons 'detained without trial' than the procedural protection demanded by mere deprivations of freedom in terms of FC s 12(1)(a).
- FC s 12(1) operates as a residual right and affords both substantive protection and procedural protection for deprivations of freedom not captured by FC s 12(1)(a).

(c) The 'due process wall': FC ss 12 and 35

Although it is comprehensively dealt with elsewhere in this work,[2] we should briefly mention the relationship between FC ss 12 and 35. The general rule established by our Constitutional Court is that there is a 'due process wall' between the two.[3] This wall defends the following propositions: (a) the specific guarantees in FC s 35 should be confined to arrested, accused and detained persons and should not be extended to cover other situations; (b) the general right to fair procedure in FC s 12 should not influence the determination of FC s 35 rights; (c) the 'trial' under FC s 12(1)(b) is very different from, and less rigorous than, the trial anticipated in FC s 35.[4]

Despite the clear erection of this theoretical wall between FC ss 12 and 35, Snyckers and Le Roux note that there has nonetheless been a fair degree of seepage from both sides of the barrier.[5] So while FC s 12 clearly covers very distinct terrain from FC s 35, they may not be as far apart as the Constitutional Court would like.

40.3 FC s 12(1)(a): Arbitrary Deprivation of Freedom

The threshold inquiry to establish a violation of FC s 12(1)(a) must always be whether there has been a 'deprivation of freedom'. This inquiry itself has two

[1] This residual character of FC s 12(1) was recognized by the majority in Ferreira. Chaskalson P held that deprivations of freedom not enumerated elsewhere else in the Bill of Rights may deserve protection in terms of FC s 12 (then IC s 11).

[2] See F Snyckers & J le Roux 'Criminal Procedure: Rights of Detained, Arrested, and Accused Persons' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, August 2006) § 51.1*(a)*.

[3] This rule flows from the Court's decisions in, among others, Ferreira, Nel and De Lange.

[4] Snyckers & le Roux (supra) at § 51(1)(a)(iv).

[5] Ibid at § 51(1)(a).

component parts: (a) a determination of the extension of 'freedom'; (b) a determination of the extension of 'deprivation'.

(a) Meaning of 'freedom'

We have already covered the complex terrain of the Court's understanding of freedom.[1] The Court's jurisprudence strongly supports, and our gloss on the purpose of FC s 12 re-inforces, the contention that 'freedom' conduces principally to a concern about physical liberty.

(b) Meaning of 'deprivation'

Unfortunately our courts have not always been clear with respect to the question whether law or conduct amounts to a 'deprivation'.[2] What we can say with some certainty is that imprisonment always constitutes a 'deprivation' for the purpose of FC s 12(1)(a).

However, it seems equally clear — given the rejection of Ackermann J's take on IC s 11 in Ferreira — that not all constraints on physical freedom amount to 'deprivations'. The difficulty in constructing a predictable and a principled judicial doctrine on deprivation was squarely addressed by the European Court of Human Rights in Guzzardi v Italy:

> In order to determine whether someone has been 'deprived of his liberty' . . . the starting point must be his concrete situation and account must be taken of a whole range of criteria such as the type, duration, effects and manner of implementation of the measure in question. The difference between deprivation of and restriction upon liberty is nonetheless one of degree of intensity, and not one of nature or substance. Although the process of classification into one or other of these categories sometimes proves to be no easy task in that some borderline cases are a matter of pure opinion, the Court cannot avoid making the selection.[3]

The European Court and the European Commission have applied these guidelines to such diverse circumstances as asylum-seeking,[4] confinement of [1] See § 40.1*(b)* supra.

[2] In Bernstein, for example, Ackermann J held that '[t]he obligation to respond to a subpoena and to be present at the appointed time and place would not, on the majority view, compromise the physical integrity of the subpoenaed witness.' Bernstein (supra) at para 51. It is unclear whether this amounts to a finding that there was no 'deprivation' at all, or that there was a deprivation but that it was not 'arbitrary'. Currie and De Waal describe the finding as relating to 'deprivation'. I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 295. We are less certain. In the remainder of the paragraph, Ackermann J considers the necessity of subpoena proceedings in a democratic society and seems to be describing the 'just cause' or the justification for a subpoena rather than the extent of the 'deprivation'.

[3] (1981) 3 EHRR 333 at paras 92–93.

[4] See Amuur v France (1996) 22 EHRR 533 (Four Somali asylum-seekers were kept in the international zone of a Paris airport for 20 days. The Court held that they had been deprived of their liberty in terms of art 5(1). The fact that they could depart France for other countries was deemed immaterial. The applicants were entitled to seek asylum in France and it was by no means certain that another country would grant them such status.)

soldiers,[1] the hospitalization of children,[2] and the drying out of drunkards[3] — amongst others.[4] But while the ECHR jurisprudence should provide valuable assistance to our courts in the future, it currently provides neither bright-line rules nor anything that begins to approximate a clear definition. The Canadian Supreme Court has also applied its mind to this problem. While it has concluded that statutory requirements to submit to fingerprinting,[5] produce documents,[6] give oral testimony[7] and not to loiter near schools[8] all constitute 'deprivations of liberty',[9] the Supreme Court has been reluctant to offer a precise definition of 'deprivation'.

Contriving a precise definition of 'deprivation' is especially important when one considers the large number of temporary restrictions on physical liberty employed by law enforcement officials: road-blocks, body searches, and requests for the production of identification. The danger here, as Currie and de Waal note, is twofold: the threshold can be set too high and hamper law enforcement, or the threshold can be set too low and fail to offer meaningful safeguards against the

[1] See Engel & Others v The Netherlands (1976) 1 EHRR 647 (The ECHR considered various degrees of 'arrest' of military personnel. The ECHR first noted that the appropriate standard for 'deprivation' turned on the applicant's military status and that the standard differed from that of ordinary civilians. Ibid at para 59. The ECHR held that 'light arrest' — confinement to military premises while off-duty — and 'aggravated arrest' — confinement while off-duty to a specific room — did not constitute 'deprivations'. Ibid at paras 61–62. However, 'strict arrest' — confinement on and off-duty to a cell — and 'committal to a disciplinary unit' — confinement to military premises for up to six months — amounted to 'deprivations of liberty'. Ibid at paras 63–64.)

[2] See Nielsen v Denmark (1988) 11 EHRR 175 (A 12-year-old boy was placed in a psychiatric ward by his mother against his will. He was allowed to visit his mother's home and eventually to go to school. The Commission held that the mother's consent could not be decisive of the matter and that, in the circumstances, there had been a deprivation of liberty. Application No 10929/84. The ECHR reversed this finding. While agreeng that the mother's consent was not dispositive, it held that the restrictions were no more than those that would ordinarily be required in the hospitalization of a young child.)

[3] See Litwa v Poland (2000) 33 EHRR 1267 (Court held that detaining a drunk man in a 'sobering-up' facility for six hours, despite the short duration, amounted to a deprivation of liberty.)

[4] See Guzzardi v Italy (1981) 3 EHRR 333 at paras 92–93 (In a 10-8 split decision, Court held that the enforced stay on a small island, combined with police supervision, limits on the areas of the island that could be visited and the lack of social contact, constituted a deprivation of liberty); Raimondo v Italy (1994) 18 EHRR 237 (ECHR held that placing applicant under police supervision and house confinement from 9pm — 7am was only a 'restriction' and not a 'deprivation of liberty'); Blume v Spain (2000) 30 EHRR 632 (A court released the applicants from state custody and ordered that they be remanded to the custody of their families. It also made provision for psychiatric treatment on a voluntary basis. Upon release, the applicants were kept locked in a hotel for 10 days and subjected to 'de-programming' by a psychologist. ECHR held that this de-programming amounted to a deprivation of liberty and could be characterized as 'false imprisonment'.) See, generally, P van Dijk & GJH van Hoof Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights (3rd Edition, 1998) 345–48.

[5] See R v Beare [1988] 2 SCR 387. But see S v Huma & Another 1996 (1) SA 232 (W), 1995 (2) SACR 411 (W)(Taking of fingerprints is not an invasion of 'physical integrity' and does not amount to 'cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment'. The court did not consider the question of arbitrary deprivation of freedom.)

[6] See Thomson Newspapers v Canada [1990] 1 SCR 425.

[7] See Stelco v Canada [1990] 1 SCR 617.

[8] See R v Heywood [1994] 3 SCR 761.

[9] See, generally, P Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd Edition, Loose-Leaf, RS 1, 2004) § 44.7*(a)*.

abuse of police power.[1] Some judicial line-drawing must occur at this stage of the analysis.[2] For, while the Court has preferred to concentrate on the extension of the internal modifiers of 'deprivation' — 'arbitrary' or 'without just cause' — it is hard to know when one ought to proceed to the procedural phase or the substantive phases of a FC s 12(1)(a) inquiry without first knowing whether a deprivation worthy of constitutional solicitude has occurred.[3] As noted in Guzzardi, it is difficult, if not impossible, to build a meaningful test for deprivation. It therefore seems more likely that the courts will develop its content through application to specific facts. That said, we believe that the courts would do well to err on the side of an expansive application at this first stage of the inquiry.

(c) Substantive dimension of FC s 12(1)(a)

(i) Arbitrariness

In De Lange, Ackermann J separated the inquiry into substantive protection into two distinct stages:

> In the first place it may not occur 'arbitrarily'; there must, in other words, be a rational connection between the deprivation and some objectively determinable purpose. If such rational connection does not exist the substantive aspect of the protection of freedom has by that fact alone been denied. But even if such rational connection exists, it is by itself insufficient; the purpose, reason or 'cause' for the deprivation must be a 'just' one.[4]

[1] See Currie & De Waal (supra) at 295.

[2] See Magagane v The Chairperson, North West Gambling Board CCT 49/05 (Unreported decision, 8 June 2006) n73 ('[S]ome rights in the Constitution [including s 12(1)(a)] expressly provide for line drawing at the threshold inquiry.')

[3] The Court's current approach to arbitrariness and deprivation in FC s 12 appears to accord with the gloss placed by the Constitutional Court on 'arbitrariness' and 'deprivation' when it comes to the assessment of the prohibition on arbitrary deprivation of property in FC s 25(1). See First National Bank of South Africa Ltd t/a Wesbank v Commissioner, South African Revenue Service & Another; First National Bank of SA Ltd t/a Wesbank v Minister of Finance 2002 (4) SA 768 (CC); 2002 (7) BCLR 702 (CC)('FNB'). The Court held that '[i]n a certain sense any interference with the use, enjoyment or exploitation of private property involves some deprivation in respect of the person having title or right to or in the property concerned.' Ibid at para 57. According to Theunis Roux, '[a]fter FNB, it is clear that the term 'deprivation' will be given a wide meaning, and that this stage of the inquiry will consequently play very little role (if any) in future cases.' T Roux 'Property' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) 46-18. The collapsing of the analysis of the modifier into the analysis of the term modified also occurs in the context of FC s 14 analysis. In Magagane, the Court held that a regulatory search or inspection amounted to a 'search' in terms of FC s 14. The Court refused, however, to define the term 'search'. Writing for the Court, Van der Westhuizen J stated:

> It would be undesirable to impose at the threshold inquiry an arbitrary demarcation line between degrees of intrusion that would invoke the constitutional right to privacy. Such line drawing would have the negative effect of placing certain administrative inspections beyond the reach of judicial review.

Magagane (supra) at para 59. Interestingly enough, the Magagane Court did note that its position might be different with respect to FC s 12 analysis.

[4] De Lange (supra) at para 23.

Some commentators criticize this bifurcated inquiry as overly elaborate.[1] They prefer, instead, O'Regan J's single-step approach. O'Regan J's test turns on whether the grounds for the deprivation are 'acceptable'.[2]

The Court has, as yet, to fully endorse either position — Ackermann's opinion attracted only a plurality of the De Lange Court. However, two good reasons exist for rejecting O'Regan J's single-step inquiry. First, it was enunciated under the Interim Constitution. IC s 11 lacked FC s 12(1)(a)'s clear language that a deprivation of freedom may be neither 'arbitrary' nor 'without just cause'. Second, as the language in FC s 12(1)(a) suggests, a distinction with a real difference exists between the two legs of Ackermann J's inquiry: a deprivation may be arbitrary but still have a just cause. This distinction exists in relation to both the substantive dimension and the procedural dimension of arbitrariness.

(aa) Substantive arbitrariness

An inquiry into substantive arbitrariness raises two primary questions.

First: Does the deprivation have a source in law? For, even if a curtailment of freedom serves the most compelling governmental purpose imaginable, a curtailment unauthorized by law remains arbitrary.[3]

Second: Is the deprivation related to a legitimate government purpose?[4] For, even if a curtailment of freedom is authorized by law, if the law does not serve a legitimate government purpose, it remains arbitrary.

While the Constitutional Court has rejected expressly a number of FC s 12(1)(a) arbitrariness challenges on the grounds that the deprivations did serve a legitimate government purpose,[5] in S v Z & 23 Similar Cases, a full bench of the Eastern Cape Provincial Division condemned the keeping of children sentenced

[1] See Currie & De Waal (supra) at 296.

[2] Bernstein (supra) at para 145. According to Currie and De Waal, it makes no sense 'to require a reason for the deprivation of freedom in the first part of the enquiry and then to require a good reason for the deprivation in the second part of the same enquiry'. Currie & De Waal (supra) at 296 n14.

[3] I Currie & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in M Chaskalson, J Klaaren, J Kentridge, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) 39-36 — 39-37; De Waal (supra) at 226 (Arbitrary 'simply means that any deprivation of freedom must be authorised by law and in accordance with the law'.) This requirement is based on the principle of legality, which necessitates that all exercises of public power have a source in law. A deprivation in these circumstances will have to be, and will often be able to be, justified under FC s 36.

[4] A similar test of arbitrariness is used in two other contexts in South African constitutional law: where the legislation is arbitrary and violates the legality principle — see Pharmaceutical Manufacturers — and FC s 9(1)'s guarantee of equal protection before the law will be violated if the differentiation is arbitrary — see Prinsloo v Van der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 789 (CC). For a recent consideration of arbitrariness in the context of FC s 9(1), see Road Accident Fund v Van der Merwe CCT 48/05 (Unreported Decision, 30 March 2006)(Legislation prohibiting spouses from claiming non-patrimonial damages from each other serves no legitimate government purpose.)

[5] See, for example, De Lange (supra) at para 29 (Committal of witness to prison during insolvency investigation serves legitimate government purpose); Thebus (supra) at para 40 (The doctrine of common purpose is rationally related to the legitimate government purpose of 'controlling joint criminal enterprise'); Lawyers for Human Rights (supra) at para 32 (It is not arbitrary to detain at a port of entry a person reasonably suspected of being an illegal immigrant).

to reform schools in custody for inordinately long periods of time because there were no schools to which they could be sent.[1] The High Court held that the deprivation was arbitrary because 'it is purposeless and inflicts hardships on the juveniles that may be disproportionate to their crimes . . . and does not serve the purpose of the punishment imposed on them by the court.'[2] S v Z & 23 Similar Cases demonstrates that the content of substantive arbitrariness is not exhausted by the norm of 'just cause'. Indeed, S v Z & 23 Similar Cases illustrates that a deprivation may be animated by a just cause, but constitute substantively arbitrary action because it fails to achieve the deprivation's objective. Again, the cause may be just, but the deprivation may remain arbitrary.

(bb) Procedural arbitrariness

In Canada, a deprivation will be deemed arbitrary (a) if inadequate criteria exist to govern the exercise of state power,[3] or (b) if the exercise of official discretion is not based upon an actual grant of authority in the empowering legislation.[4] This 'procedural arbitrariness' speaks to the absence of legal authority for the deprivation rather than to its purpose.

This doctrine of 'procedural arbitrariness', as defined above, has not been expressly endorsed in our law. However, in Lawyers for Human Rights v Minister of Home Affairs, the Constitutional Court had to consider the constitutionality of a legislative provision granting an immigration officer the discretion to order the detention of a person illegally in South Africa.[5] The Court held that if

[1] 2004 (1) All SA 436 (E), 2004 (4) BCLR 410 (E) at para 21.

[2] Ibid at para 21, n17.

[3] See, eg, R v Hufsky [1988] 1 SCR 621, 632 followed in R v Ladouceur [1990] 1 SCR 1257 (Random stopping of motorists for spot checks was arbitrary detention because there were no criteria for the selection of motorists to be stopped); R v Swain [1991] SCR 933 (Law permitting commitment to psychiatric facility of person acquitted of criminal charge on the basis of insanity arbitrary as it provided no standards on which the judge could base his decision); R v Lyons [1987] SCR 309 (Declaration as a dangerous offender not arbitrary as decision had to be based on defined critetria); Thwaites v Health Sciences Centre (1988) 51 Man R (2d) 196, 201 (CA)(Legislation allowing for the compulsory detention by a magistrate on a showing that 'a person should be confined as a patient at a psychiatric facility' was declared a violation of the right against arbitrary detention or imprisonment because the legislation failed adequately to specify relevant guiding criteria 'sufficiently defining the persons who may be subject to the legislation, and the circumstances under which they may be compulsorily detained'.)

[4] See R v Duguay (1985) 1 SCR 93 (Arrest not on proper grounds nor with an honest belief that proper grounds were present a violation of the arbitrary detention right.) This principle is already part of our administrative law. See Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000, s 6(2)(e), (f) and (h).

[5] Lawyers for Human Rights & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2004 (4) SA 125 (CC), 2004 (7) BCLR 775 (CC)('Lawyers for Human Rights'). The legislative provision at issue was s 34 of the new Immigration Act 13 of 2002. Yacoob J held that the provision should be interpreted in a constitutionally compatible manner and that when this was done it permitted detention only if the officer had a reasonable suspicion that the person was an illegal immigrant. Detention under these circumstances was not arbitrary and the 'reasonable suspicion of the officer' was a 'just cause'. Ibid at paras 31–32. See also Lawyers for Human Rights & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2003 (8) BCLR 891 (T).

detention could be ordered on the mere say-so of the immigration officer, the section at issue would be arbitrary and unconstitutional.[1]

(ii) Just cause

(aa) Constitutional values

The somewhat elusive quality of 'just cause' is captured by this observation in De Lange v Smuts:

> It is not possible to attempt, in advance, a comprehensive definition of what would constitute a 'just cause' for the deprivation of freedom in all imaginable circumstances. . . . Suffice it to say that the concept of 'just cause' must be grounded upon and consonant with the values expressed in s 1 of the 1996 Constitution[2] and gathered from the provisions of the Constitution as a whole.[3]

In De Lange v Smuts NO, the Constitutional Court was asked to consider whether s 66(3) of the Insolvency Act[4] allowed for the imprisonment of witnesses who refused to answer questions regarding an insolvent estate. The Court held that the provision serves the compelling public purpose of enforcing civil claims against debtors,[5] that the penalties exacted induced necessary testimony and the production of documents about the estate by the insolvent and others, that imprisonment in terms of s 66(3) is not a criminal sanction,[6] and that similar provisions are common in many other democratic societies.[7] These rationales for s 66(3) — and the fact that the penalties did not go any further than was necessary —

[1] Lawyers for Human Rights (supra) at para 29. See also Omar v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others (Commission for Gender Equality, Amicus Curiae) 2006 (2) SA 289 (CC), 2006 (2) BCLR 253 (CC)(The applicant challenged various provisions of the Domestic Violence Act 116 of 1998 that permit arrest for violating a protection order. The applicant's complaint was that the arrest was mandatory if a complainant produced an affidavit alleging an infringement of the protection order and the policeman had a reasonable suspicion that the complainant could suffer imminent harm. The Court dismissed the claim on the grounds that the production of an affidavit was at least as good protection as requiring 'reasonable suspicion'. However, the Court's decision emphasized the section was saved because of the police officer retained the discretion to effect an arrest only if there was a possibility of harm.)

[2] Section 1 provides:

The Republic of South Africa is one, sovereign, democratic State founded on the following values:

(a) Human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms.

(b) Non-racialism and non-sexism.

(c) Supremacy of the Constitution and the rule of law.

(d) Universal adult suffrage, a national common voters roll, regular elections and a multi-party system of democratic government, to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness.

For more on FC s 1, see C Roederer 'Founding Values' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) Chapter 13.

[3] De Lange (supra) at para 30 (Ackermann J).

[4] Act 24 of 1936.

[5] De Lange (supra) at paras 31–32.

[6] Ibid at paras 37–38.

[7] Ibid at para 39.

collectively constituted a 'just cause' for the deprivation of freedom.[1]

The Constitutional Court has, however, handed down judgments that offer some guidance as to the kinds of deprivations that might be deemed without 'just cause'. In Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa, the Court invalidated provisions of the Magistrates' Courts Act that permitted the detention of civil debtors.[2] The Court found that the contested provisions would sweep up into their proscriptive net both debtors who could pay but wilfully refused and those impecunious members of society who were too poor to pay.[3] The Coetzee Court held that a 'debtors' prison' was inconsistent with new constitutionally-mandated mores and thus an unjustifiable limitation of IC s 11. Were the case to have been heard in terms of FC s 12(1)(a), the Court would have held that deprivations of freedom in these circumstances lacked a 'just cause'.

(bb) Basic tenets of the legal system

The concept of 'just cause' takes on somewhat greater solidity when informed by the following term of art: 'the basic tenets of the legal system'. The 'basic tenets' dimension of 'just cause' requires that courts 'abstract[ ] from the record of the South African legal system a sense of its fundamental principles'.[4] Members of the Constitutional Court have, on two occasions, deployed the 'basic tenets' test for 'just cause' when considering the constitutionality of statutory provisions that excluded a standard element of a criminal offence.

In S v Coetzee,[5] the Court was asked to determine the constitutionality of a provision that made directors and servants of a corporation liable for any acts

[1] De Lange (supra) at paras 36 and 40. The witness effectively 'carried the key to their prison in their own pocket' as they would be released as soon as they divulged the requested information or documents. Ibid at para 36. A fine would not be an appropriate sanction because it would often have to be very large to be effective. Ibid at para 40. The Court reached similar conclusions in other insolvency cases. See Bernstein (supra) at para 60 (Sections 417 and 418 of the Companies Act 61 of 1973 permitted witnesses to be called to testify or produce documents at the liquidation of a company. The Court upheld the provisions on the grounds that the law neither permits the enquiry to be employed in a vexatious or unfair manner nor allows imprisonment for failing to answer questions that, if answered, would threaten the witness' constitutional rights); Nel v Le Roux (supra) at paras 20–21 (Judges and magistrates were given the power under s 205 of the Criminal Procedure Act to summon witnesses to answer questions put by the prosecutor about a suspected offence. The Court held that the potentially unconstitutional effect of CPA s 205 was saved by CPA s 189. CPA s 190 allows a reticent witness to refuse to answer such questions if she has a 'just excuse'. When 'just excuse' is read in light of the Bill of Rights — as required by FC s 39(2) — CPA s 205 is no longer constitutionally objectionable); Harksen v Lane NO & Others 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 36 (Imprisonment for failing to answer questions at a meeting of creditors could, in terms of ss 64 and 65 of the Insolvency Act, only follow if the question was 'lawfully put' and the witness did not have a 'reasonable cause' for failing or refusing to answer. Under those circumstances there was nothing objectionable about the legislation.)

[2] Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa; Matiso & Others v Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison, & Others 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC), 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC).

[3] Ibid at paras 8 and 15.

[4] Currie & De Waal (supra) at 297. In S v Lubaxa the Supreme Court of Appeal held that the refusal to discharge an accused after the State's case when there was not sufficient evidence to convict threatened to violate FC s 12 because it would contradict the basic common-law principle that there must be a 'reasonable and probable cause to believe that the accused is guilty of an offence' before a prosecution is initiated 2001 (2) SACR 703 (SCA) at para 19.

[5] 1997 (3) SA 527 (CC), 1997 (4) BCLR 437 (CC).

for which the corporation could be held liable 'unless it is proved that he did not take part in the commission of the offence and that he could not have prevented it'.[1] A majority of the Court regarded the provision as a simple reverse onus that violated the right to be presumed innocent.

Kentridge AJ, in his dissent, took the view that s 332(5) of the Criminal Procedure Act imposed vicarious liability on directors and servants of a company for a criminal offence committed by a company.[2] On Kentridge AJ's reading, the 'unless' did not reverse the onus, but rather created an additional defence for the accused. The provision could not, on this reading, be challenged under IC s 25's right to presumed innocent. However, the imputation of liability and the absence of personal criminal intent were, according to Kentridge AJ, grounds for a challenge based on IC s 11. Kentridge AJ then concluded that the vicarious liability provision imposed on servants by s 332(5) unjustifiably limited IC s 11 because the imposition of absolute liability on servants (as opposed to directors) for the crimes of the body corporate is inconsistent with the basic tenets of our legal system.[3] One could neither impute to servants as a class the choice of engaging in a regulated activity nor impute to servants the element of control of the affairs of the corporate body. No law that punishes a person who exercises no control over the actions or the affairs that lead to criminal activity can be squared with IC s 11(1)'s commitment to 'freedom'.[4]

O'Regan J, in her dissent, largely agreed with the conclusions reached by Kentridge AJ.[5] However, she departed from Kentridge AJ with respect to her analysis of the problem. For O'Regan J, two distinct questions had to be answered. The first question was whether it was constitutionally legitimate to impose criminal liability on directors and servants of corporate bodies in the circumstances contemplated by s 332(5) of the Criminal Procedure Act. The second question was whether it was legitimate to impose upon an accused the burden of proving that he or she could not have prevented the commission of the offence. The two questions engaged two different aspects of constitutionally protected freedom. The first question engaged the reasons for which the state may deprive someone of freedom in terms of IC s 11(1). The second engaged the manner whereby a person is deprived of freedom in terms of IC s 25.[6]

According to the common law, criminal liability generally arises only where unlawful conduct and fault can be established. Deprivation of liberty, without culpability for the unlawful conduct, constitutes a breach of this established rule.[7] According to O'Regan J, s 332(5) did not require directors to show that they exercised due diligence, but merely that they could not have prevented the criminal conduct at issue. On this reading, directors could be sufficiently culpable

[1] Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977, s 332(5)(emphasis added).
[2] S v Coetzee (supra) at para 85.
[3] Ibid at para 100.
[4] Ibid at para 101.
[5] Sachs J appears to concur with O'Regan J. Ibid at paras 225 and 227. Ackermann J also concurs with O'Regan J. Ibid at para 66.
[6] See also Bernstein (supra) at paras 145–47.
[7] S v Coetzee (supra) at 176.

to warrant the imposition of criminal liability — thus any consequent deprivation of freedom of directors would not fall foul of IC s 11*(a). However, since no servant could ever engage in conduct — or undertake due diligence — that would make them criminally culpable for the purposes of s 332(5), s 332(5) infringed IC s 11(a)* with respect to this class of person.[1]

The Court has had another occasion to consider the removal of causation as an element of a criminal offence. The common-law doctrine of common purpose allows for the conviction of a group of people for the same offence even when only one person is truly — causally — responsible for the criminal act. The applicants in S v Thebus challenged this doctrine as an infringement of the substantive protection afforded by FC s 12(1)(a).[2] Moseneke J, writing for the Court, rejected the challenge on the grounds that many offences at common law — rape, incest or perjury — do not treat causation as an element of the crime and that a requirement of causation for criminal offences is not a 'basic tenet of the law'.[3]

FC s 12(1)(a) may also be used to challenge a criminal prohibition itself.[4] For example, the legislature could not make it a crime (punishable by imprisonment) to wear a red hat. The concept of 'just cause' extends FC s 12(1)(a)'s reach to any criminal sanction that fails to serve a legitimate social goal. Just cause may also embrace a certain degree of proportionality. In S v Boesak, Langa DP held that imprisonment for 'theft of a sufficiently serious nature' constitutes a just cause for imprisonment.[5] Implicit in Langa DP's finding is the proposition that imprisonment for a trivial amount might not constitute 'just cause' for imprisonment. However, this propostion has not yet been recognized and ratified by the Court: challenges on this basis to the oft-questioned criminalization of prostitution[6] and bestiality[7] have both failed.[8]

[1] To the extent that we can draw any conclusions from the minority judgments, S v Coetzee suggests that vicarious liability offences will be justifiable deprivations of freedom in terms of FC s 12(1)(a) if the offence can be categorized as merely 'regulatory', or, as we have just seen, the imposition of vicarious liability is modified by a defence of due diligence. Ibid at paras 97 (Kentridge AJ), 160 (O'Regan J), 77 (Didcott J), and 57 (Mahomed DP).

[2] 2003 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC).

[3] Ibid at para 37 n60.

[4] De Lange (supra) at para 25 ('[A]ccused persons are entitled to challenge the constitutional validity of a criminal offence with which they are charged on the substantive freedom right [on the] ground that such offence does not, for purposes of s 12(1)(a), constitute 'just cause' for the deprivation of their freedom.')

[5] S v Boesak 2001 (1) 912 SA (CC), 2001 (1) BCLR 36 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 1 (CC) at para 39.

[6] See S v Jordan 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 117 (CC)('Jordan') at para 75 (While the majority refused to consider the FC s 12 challenge to laws proscribing prostitution, it was firmly rejected by O'Regan and Sachs JJ.)

[7] See S v M 2004 (3) SA 680 (O) at para 22 (Court held that despite the lack of any material impact on the community, the criminalisation of bestiality was still justified as an abrogation of well-entrenched mores.)

[8] Indeed, in S v Jordan, the minority suggested that such a challenge was not even possible:

> [a] prostitute makes herself liable for arrest and imprisonment by violating the law. Provided that the law passes the test of constitutionality, any invasion of her freedom and personal security follows from her breach of the law, and not from any intrusion on her right by the State. In the light of the approach taken by the majority of this Court to s 11(1) of the interim Constitution, there can be no complaint in terms of that section by a person who has been convicted and sentenced in terms of a duly enacted criminal prohibition.

Jordan (supra) at para 75 (our emphasis). To the extent that this is what the minority were saying, they are wrong. FC s 12(1)(a) certainly does allow challenges to substantive criminal prohibitions, even if the scope is very limited.

(cc) Proportionality

Although the Constitutional Court has never explicitly endorsed proportionality as an element of 'just cause', it has regularly applied notions of proportionality in its IC s 11(1) and FC s 12(1)(a) decisions. In Nel,[1] and De Lange,[2] the release of a witness subsequent to an inquiry meant that the coercive measures went no further than was necessary to achieve their aim and were not, therefore, substantively arbitrary. In De Lange[3] and Bernstein,[4] Ackermann J specifically held that imprisonment was appropriate because it was the only effective means to achieve the objectives of the inquiry. The Lawyers for Human Rights Court held that the detention of illegal immigrants without confirmation by a court was unconstitutional only when the detention period exceeded 30 days. The findings in all four cases strongly suggest that proportionality is an important element of 'just cause'.[5]

[1] Nel (supra) at para 11.

[2] De Lange (supra) at para 36.

[3] Ibid at para 40.

[4] Bernstein (supra) at para 55 ('[I]t is not a sanction which is disproportionate to the offence, therefore s 11(1) and (2) are not impaired. The sanctions are necessary to enforce the legislation.')

[5] However, the Court would do well to be cautious about extending the proportionality component of 'just cause' too far. The Canadian Supreme Court began with a definition of 'fundamental justice' (their equivalent of 'just cause') as those principles found in 'the basic tenets of the legal system'. Re BC Motor Vehicle Reference [1985] 2 SCR 486, 503. However, 'fundamental justice' soon became the equivalent of principles that 'would have general acceptance among reasonable people' — Rodriguez v British Columbia [1993] 3 SCR 519, 607) — or that would be 'simply unacceptable to reasonable Canadians' — Canada v Schmidt [1987] 1 SCR 500, 522). The lack of precision manifest in Schmidt is reflected in two cases concerning extradition from Canada to another jurisdiction for a 'capital' offence. In 1991, the Supreme Court held that such extradition did not 'shock the conscience'. See Kindler v Canada [1991] 2 SCR 779. It reversed itself 10 years later. See United States v Burns [2001] 1 SCR 283. See, generally, Hogg (supra) at 44.10*(b)*.

In US constitutional law, substantive due process entails a two-part analysis of a legislative measure affecting life, liberty or property: a reasonableness enquiry and a proportionality enquiry. The measure may not be unreasonable or arbitrary, and the means selected to achieve the purpose of the measure must be in proportion to that purpose. See Nebbia v New York 291 US 502, 525 (1933)('The Fifth Amendment and the Fourteenth do not prohibit governmental regulation for the public welfare. They merely condition the exertion of the admitted power by securing that the end shall be accomplished by methods consistent with due process. And the guaranty of due process, as has often been held, demands only that the law shall not be unreasonable, arbitrary or capricious, and that the means selected shall have a real and substantial relation to the object sought to be attained.') The first part of this test is expressly authorized by FC s 12(1)(a). The second part — requiring proportionality between means and ends — may be authorized by the requirement that a deprivation of liberty must be for 'just cause'. German courts have adopted a similar approach. A deprivation of personal liberty must comply with the 'principle of proportionality, which is rooted in the rule of law'. 22 BVerfGE 180, 220 (1967)(Institutionalization as a mental patient of a person who posed no danger to himself or others offends principle of proportionality.) See D Currie The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (1994) 307. In German jurisprudence, proportionality means both proportionality between means and ends, and proportionality between costs and benefits. The state is justified in depriving a person of liberty only to the extent necessary for liberty and security of themselves or others. In addition, the harm prevented by the deprivation must outweigh the harm that it causes to individual liberty. Similar principles are said to underlie the European Court of Human Right's article 5 jurisprudence. See X v United Kingdom 4 EHRR 188 (Validity of detention of mental patients requires an assessment as to whether the interests of the protection of the public prevail over the individual right to liberty to an extent sufficient to justify detention.)

(d) Procedural dimension of FC s 12(1)(a)

FC s 12(1)(a) does not require a 'trial' as contemplated in either FC s 35 or FC s 12(1)(b). As a result the level and the kind of procedural fairness required by FC s 12(1)(a) will often turn on the nature of the deprivation of freedom. As Mokgoro J notes:

> Where an interest of paramount importance is at issue, then stringent procedures are called for: indeed, we expect them to be more precise than when a lesser interest is implicated, and our contemplation of the substance of the matter will influence our attitude toward the procedure required.[1]

Deprivation of freedom in a mental hospital differs — in meaning and in substance — from the deprivation of freedom that follows from a refusal to give evidence on pain of imprisonment.[2] Deprivation of freedom in a mental hospital will require different processes and different justifications than deprivations of freedom to prevent the spread of a contagious disease. The Court can, in advance, offer no more content to the required procedure for a particular deprivation than to say that the deprivation must be fair under the circumstances. Deprivations of freedom in terms of FC s 12(1)(a) will require well-articulated procedures that fall somewhere between a full criminal trial and appropriate responses by law enforcement officials[3] who stop individuals in order to ascertain their identity.[4]

In Sibiya, the High Court was asked to consider the constitutionality of procedures established to re-assess the prison terms of persons sentenced to death

[1] De Lange (supra) at para 128. See also Nel (supra) at para 14.

[2] For an examination of commitment to mental hospitals, see E Bonthuys 'Involuntary Civil Commitment and the New Mental Health Bill' (2001) 118 SALJ 667.

[3] Lawyers for Human Rights & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2003 (8) BCLR 891, 902B (T)(Du Plessis J found that immigration legislation that allowed a foreigner to be detained on the mere declaration that the person was an illegal by an immigration official violated both the rule of law and FC s 12(1)(a)'s procedural component.)

[4] Perhaps the best manner to gauge what is and is not acceptable is to look at the procedures the Court has already found fair or unfair. It must be emphasized that not all of these decisions were taken in terms of FC s 12(1)(a). Some rely upon IC s 11(1) or FC s 12*(b). However, as discussed above, we believe this part of FC s 12's protection best fits FC s 12(1)(a)*. In Nel, s 205 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 allowed witnesses to be summoned to appear in court to give evidence on a suspected offence. The witness could be imprisoned if he failed to answer the questions or produce the required documents. The Act, however, contained a number of safeguards: the presiding officer had to be a judge or magistrate; the subpoena had to be approved by the public prosecutor; imprisonment would only follow if it was necessary to maintain law and order; and the person would not be imprisoned if he had a just excuse. In the circumstances, and considering the importance of s 205 as an evidence gathering mechanism, the Court upheld the section. In Geuking, the applicant challenged the procedure for extradition which was close but not identical to an ordinary criminal trial. The proceedings were held in public before a magistrate or judge, the person liable for extradition was entitled to challenge and adduce evidence and to appeal the decision. The Court noted that extradition did not result in criminal conviction or punishment, it simply decided whether the person could be sent for trial in another country. The procedure, although falling slightly short of a full criminal trial, was fair in the circumstances. In De Lange, provisions allowing imprisonment for failing to answer questions or produce documents at insolvency proceedings were found invalid only to the extent that it permitted a non-judicial officer to preside.

before the abolition of the death penalty by the Constitutional Court in S v Makwanyane. The High Court described the challenged procedures as follows:

> Proceedings do not take place in public, there is Chamber consideration of documents and perhaps argument but no trial, the administrative action is performed by a judicial officer who does not purport to constitute a court of law, no evidence may be adduced at all, not even an application in terms of s 316 will be entertained, there is no right to access the reasons or advice formulated as a result of this process and no judgment as resulting (sic) from a court of law emerges from this process, there is no appeal against any of these proceedings or advice, sentence is imposed by the President not a court of law.[1]

The High Court held that, as the death sentences had been set aside, all those who had been sentenced to death were entitled to a new sentencing procedure akin to a trial.

A unanimous Constitutional Court reversed the High Court decision.[2] The Constitutional Court noted that the death sentences had not been set aside — all that Makwanyane had said was that the death sentence could not be imposed or carried out after the date of the judgment. While a new sentence had to be imposed, this consequence of the Court's finding in Makwanyane did not entitle the affected persons to a new trial.[3] It would have been perfectly consistent with the procedural requirements of FC s 12(1)(a) for the legislature to have replaced all of the death sentences with sentences of life imprisonment.[4] But the legislature had, in fact, done more. The legislative remedy for the holding and the order in Makwanyane was to give each prisoner an opportunity to have his sentence reconsidered by a judge. Under these circumstances, the inability to lead evidence, the holding of the proceedings in chambers and the lack of appeal did not infringe the procedural protections afforded by FC s 12(1)(a).[5]

As Sibiya suggests, a litigant relying on FC s 12(1)(a) — as opposed to FC s 35 — cannot challenge a specific procedural failure — say, the failure to be notified of the proceedings or to hold the proceedings in public.[6] A challenge grounded in FC s 12(1)(a) requires the court to review the entire domain of procedural safeguards afforded the applicant. If, on the whole, the proceedings are fair, then the requirements of FC s 12(1)(a) will be satisfied.[7]

The Constitutional Court confirmed this rule in Omar v Government of the Republic of South Africa. The applicant had challenged provisions of the Domestic Violence Act that had resulted in his arrest for violating a protection order. One of the [1] Sibiya & Others v Director of Public Prosecutions & Others [2005] 1 All SA 105 (W) at para 188.

[2] Sibiya & Others v Director of Public Prosecution Johannesburg & Others 2005 (5) SA 315 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 812 (CC)('Sibiya').

[3] Ibid at paras 10–13 and 35.

[4] Ibid at para 35.

[5] Ibid at paras 36–37.

[6] See Nel (supra) at para 19 (Failure to hold the proceedings in public not unfair because it may be to the benefit of both the witness and society not to disclose the evidence at this stage.)

[7] Ibid at para 20 ('The summary procedure for imprisoning a recalcitrant witness must be adjudged in the context of the s 205 proceedings as a whole.') complaints raised by the applicant was that the protection order did not have to be hand-delivered but could be sent by registered mail. It was therefore possible for him to be arrested for contravening an order of which he had no knowledge.[1] This argument relied heavily on the fact that lack of notice was one of the seven factors that led the Coetzee Court to declare unconstitutional various provisions of the Magistrates' Court Act that had permitted imprisonment of civil debtors.[2]

The Omar Court rejected this argument. It noted that if Omar were arrested for domestic violence, he would be entitled to all the benefits of FC s 35 — including a hearing within 48 hours of his arrest. Coetzee, on the other hand, was imprisoned indefinitely for a civil debt and received none of FC s 35's benefits.[3] The Omar Court concluded that, on the whole, the Domestic Violence Act's procedures were fair.

FC s 12(1)(a) can, in addition, only be invoked when a challenged provision either compels the adjudicator to act in a procedurally unfair manner or prevents her from acting in a procedurally fair manner. If the section in question is silent as to the fairness of the procedures, no constitutional complaint can be lodged against the section itself.[4] In Nel v Le Roux, this principle prompted the Court to find that even though s 205 of the Criminal Procedure Act did not require that the consequences of non-compliance be explained to the examinee, the presiding officer was constitutionally compelled to do so. The section was therefore valid.[5] The Bernstein Court held that the challenged provisions should, in addition, be construed in light of the considerable body of case law that fleshed out their application.[6] Given that the empowering legislation and the case law's gloss on that legislation were fair, the Bernstein Court held that the correct procedure would have been to approach the High Court for a review of the proceedings and the behaviour of the officer in question.[7]

40.4 FC s 12(1)(b): Detention Without Trial

FC s 12(1)(b) recognizes that 'detention without trial was a powerful instrument designed to suppress resistance to the programmes and policies of the former

[1] Omar (supra) at para 41.
[2] Coetzee v Government (supra) at para 14.
[3] Omar (supra) at para 44.
[4] Nel (supra) at para 18; De Lange (supra) at para 85.
[5] Nel (supra) at para 21. See also Bernstein (supra) at para 52 (The Court considered the validity of provisions compelling witnesses to appear and produce evidence at hearings regarding insolvent companies. When dealing with the contention that the section was open to abuse, Ackermann J held that '[t]he fact that the power of subpoena may possibly be abused in a particular case to the prejudice of the person subjected to such abuse does not mean that the power should, for this reason, be characterised as infringing s 11(1) of the Constitution. The law does not sanction such abuse; it merely recognises that it is difficult to control it and that a clear case of abuse must be established in order to secure a discharge from a subpoena.')
[6] Bernstein (supra) at para 46.
[7] Ibid at para 47.

government.'[1] Indeed, several members of the Constitutional Court have expressed the opinion that FC s 12(1)(b) should be read primarily as a reminder that this particular tool of the apartheid state cannot be used to repress political opposition and that the extension of the right should be largely determined (and curtailed) by its historical meaning. While FC s 12(1)(b) currently plays a limited role in our jurisprudence — a role largely determined by its historical resonance — the abuse of state power with which FC s 12(1)(b) is concerned could just as easily be visited upon immigrants, mental patients and common criminals. No good reason exists for limiting the protection afforded by FC s 12(1)(b) to political revolutionaries.

Moreover, FC s 12(1)(b) cannot be reduced to a purely symbolic function. Neither FC s 35(2) nor FC s 12(1)(a) can be read to require that a person detained by the state must have that detention preceded or confirmed by a 'trial'.[2] FC s 12(1)(b) imposes duties upon the state that differ markedly from the obligations found in FC s 35(2) and, by requiring a 'trial', goes well beyond the demands of procedural fairness manifest in FC s 12(1)(a).

(a) Detention

The 'trial' requirement only arises if a person is detained. But what is 'detention'?

The term 'detention' in FC s 12(1)(b) is best understood as the placing of a person under lock and key. 'Deprivation of liberty', in terms of FC s 12(1)(a), sets a far lower threshold: trials are not required for temporary restrictions of liberty (ie, requests for identification or even arrest[3]) incidental to police investigation of a crime. Nor should they be. While Ackermann J, in De Lange, concluded that that 'detention' encompasses imprisonment, he also suggested that it embraced significant 'restriction of physical movement'.[4] However, the 'restriction of physical movement' contemplated by FC s 12(1)(b) must be comparable to incarceration for there to be a meaningful distinction between 'detention' and 'deprivation'.

That said, Sibiya suggests that 'detention' must be read as 'detention without trial'. Sibiya turned on the failure of the state to alter the sanction imposed on those persons sentenced to death prior to the Interim Constitution coming into effect. The Sibiya Court considered the matter in terms of FC s 12(1)(a) rather than FC s 12(1)(b) because the continued 'deprivation of liberty' did not constitute 'detention without trial'.[5] The 'trial' required by FC s 12(1)(b) had already taken place.

[1] De Lange (supra) at para 115 (Didcott J). See also Lawyers for Human Rights (supra) at para 36.

[2] FC 35(2)(d) allows a detainee to challenge the lawfulness of his detention. However, FC s 12(1)(b) compels the state to provide a trial without any request or any challenge by the detainee.

[3] Lawyers for Human Rights & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Another 2003 (8) BCLR 891, 898E-F (T)(Arrest is not included in detention for the purposes of FC s 12(1)(b).)

[4] De Lange (supra) at para 28.

[5] Sibiya (supra) at para 32.

(b) Trial

As the Nel Court notes, a FC s 12(1)(b) 'trial' requires somewhat more than a mere administrative inquiry, but somewhat less than what FC s 35 demands:

> The 'trial' envisaged by this right does not, in my view, in all circumstances require a procedure which duplicates all the requirements and safeguards embodied in s 25(3) of the [Interim] Constitution. In most cases it will require the interposition of an impartial entity, independent of the Executive and the Legislature to act as arbiter between the individual and the State.[1]

Although the precise nature of this 'impartial entity' was left open, the Nel Court appeared to commit itself to the proposition that the official in question would always be a 'judicial officer who ordinarily functions as such in the ordinary courts'.[2]

In De Lange, the Court was asked to consider whether non-judicial officers could participate in the 'impartial entity' described by Nel. The question elicited significant disagreement.[3] De Lange concerned the constitutionality of s 66(3) of the Insolvency Act. That provision permitted the imprisonment of a witness summoned to give testimony about an insolvent estate. More importantly, the incarceration could be ordered by an official of the Master's office.

A plurality of the De Lange Court found that FC s 12(1)(b) demands 'a hearing presided over or conducted by a judicial officer in the court structure established by the [Final] Constitution and in which [FC] s 165(1) has vested the judicial authority of the Republic'.[4] The doctrine of separation of powers — as manifest in Chapter 8 of the Final Constitution — requires that laws be enforced by the executive and adjudicated by bodies independent of the executive. Officials of the Master's office, despite having the requisite skill and experience, remained members of the executive branch of government.[5] Although they may be impartial, executive officers could never be independent. The section was, therefore, found to be invalid to the extent that it allowed a person other than a judge or magistrate to commit another to prison.[6] [1] Nel (supra) at para 14 (our emphasis).

---

[2] Ibid at para 15.

[3] The plurality judgment is contained in the judgment of Ackermann J (Chaskalson P, Langa DP and Madala J). Sachs and O'Regan JJ concurred with the judgment.

[4] De Lange (supra) at para 57.

[5] Ibid at para 59.

[6] Ibid at paras 48–56 and 87–101. Didcott and Kriegler JJ disagreed with the majority. For Didcott and Kriegler JJ, Ackermann J's judgment 'concentrate[d] on form at the expense of substance'. Officers of the Master's office were, on this account, just as impartial as magistrates, and any irregularity would in any event be reviewable by an independent court. Ibid at para 125. Didcott and Kriegler JJ found s 66(3) wholly unobjectionable. Mokgoro J argued that the case was about process, not office: 'The mere fact without more that a person committing the recalcitrant witness to prison is in name a judicial officer, in my view, is, in itself, not an adequate safeguard that the committal is acceptable in an open and democratic society that has such high regard for individual liberty.' Ibid at para 137. As s 66(3) lacked any procedural safeguards, it constituted an unjustifiable limitation of FC s 12(1)(a). O'Regan J concluded that 'no person may be imprisoned indefinitely for coercive purposes except by a court of law, or an independent and impartial institution of a character similar to a court of law.' Ibid at 165. As the meeting of creditors envisaged in the s 66(3) procedure did not function as a court of law — even when presided over by a magistrate — it constituted a limitation of FC s 12(1). O'Regan J did not rely on FC s 12(1)(b), but on the general guarantee of procedural fairness in FC s 12(1).

The nature of the 'entity' that could conduct a trial in terms of FC s 12(1)(b) was considered again in Freedom of Expression Institute v President, Ordinary Court Martial, Lt Col Mardon NO & Others.[1] Provisions of the Defence Act and the Military Discipline Code in the First Schedule to the Act were challenged on the basis that the Code permitted army officers to adjudicate court martials.[2] None of the three army officers were required to have any legal training or qualification. A court martial could result in a sentence of up to two years imprisonment.[3] The Court found that, although a court martial could 'be presided over by a layman notwithstanding that such court has the power to deprive a convicted accused of his liberty',[4] the absence of meaningful independence amongst the convening authority, the prosecutor and the court martial personnel meant that the court martial failed to qualify as a 'trial' for the purposes of FC s 12(1)(b).[5]

Although the foregoing analysis suggests that the form of a FC s 12(1)(b) 'trial' has yet to be finally determined, De Lange and Freedom of Expression stand for the proposition that an independent and impartial entity similar, if not identical to a court of law, is required. In addition, two forms of 'detention without trial' do not violate FC s 12(1)(b): an accused person awaiting his or her first court appearance may be detained for a period of 48 hours,[6] and an accused person awaiting trial may be detained pending trial where bail has not been granted.[7]

(c) Limitation

Detention with anything less than a 'trial' constitutes a limitation of FC s 12(1)(b). In Lawyers for Human Rights, the Constitutional Court had an opportunity to assess the constitutionality of a range of limitations on the right.

Section 34 of the new Immigration Act permitted people to be detained pending deportation if an immigration officer reasonably suspected that they were an

[1] 1999 (2) SA 471 (C), 1999 (3) BCLR 261 (C).

[2] Act 44 of 1957.

[3] Freedom of Expression (supra) at para 21. The Full Bench of the Cape High Court had previously adopted the finding of the High Court in De Lange v Smuts (supra) that 'only a court of law may deprive a person of liberty.' Such a 'court of law' must 'be an ordinary court which conforms with the spirit of the Constitution and which affords an accused person a fair trial'. The court martial clearly fell far short of this ideal.

[4] Ibid.

[5] Ibid at paras 19–20. Hlophe ADJP sets out the test for independence as 'whether the tribunal from the objective standpoint of a reasonable and informed person will be perceived as enjoying the essential conditions of independence.' Ibid at para 25.

[6] FC s 35(1)(d).

[7] FC s 35(1)(f). See Dlamini (supra) at para 36. As Kriegler J noted, '[t]he Constitution itself . . . places a limitation on the liberty nterest protected by s 12' in terms of FC s 7(3). FC s 7(3) reads: 'The rights in the Bill of Rights are subject to the limitations contained or referred to in section 36, or elsewhere in the Bill.'

illegal foreigner. Yacoob J, writing for the Lawyers for Human Rights Court, held that detention based upon mere suspicion violated FC s 12(1)(b).[1]

The difficulties with the Act flowed from its differential treatment of various classes of person. Immigrants who arrived by air would be kept in a state facility for a maximum of 30 days before they had to be released or before an order of court had to be issued to extend the detention. Any such detainee could also demand the confirmation of his detention by a warrant issued by a court. If the warrant was not issued within 48 hours, the detainee had to be released. The Lawyers for Human Rights Court found that, if due regard was had to these procedural safeguards, the provisions of the Act governing detainees who arrived by air were justifiable under FC s 36.[2]

For those who arrived by ship, the Act's position was somewhat more complicated. They could, at the discretion of the officer, be detained, as described above, with the same procedural safeguards. However, they could also be detained on the ship until that ship left port. In ship detention cases, detainees could be held, on the ship, for periods substantially longer than 30 days. Moreover, these detainees could not challenge their detention in court. The Lawyers for Human Rights Court held that unlimited ship detention and the inability to challenge such detention constituted unjustifiable limitations of FC s 12(1)(b). It read various provisions into the legislation to cure these defects.[3]

40.5 FC s 12(1)(c): Public and Private Violence

The right in FC s 12(1)(c) 'to be free from all forms of violence from either public or private sources', though seldom mentioned, can be accredited with some of the most meaningful recent developments of the common law. While only recognized expressly under the Final Constitution, this right had already been recognized by the courts under the Interim Constitution.[4]

FC s 12(1)(c) draws its inspiration from art 5 of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination ('CERD'). Article 5 imposes duties on States Party to protect people from 'violence or bodily harm whether inflicted by government officials or by any individual, group or institution'.[5] In addition to these traditional negative duties, the Convention contains affirmative obligations to prohibit, to punish and to discourage violence.[6] While the apposite articles of [1] Lawyers for Human Rights (supra) at para 33.

[2] Ibid at para 44.
[3] Ibid at para 43.
[4] See Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC) at para 44 the Constitutional Court found that IC s 11 imposed a duty on the state to prevent criminals in custody from committing violent acts against members of the public. This finding was followed by the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal. See Carmichele v Minister of Safety & Security & Another 2003 (2) SA 656 (C); Minister of Safety and Security & Another v Carmichele 2004 (3) SA 305 (SCA), 2004 (2) BCLR 133 (SCA)('Carmichele SCA').
[5] Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, art 5*(b)*.
[6] Ibid art 2. These positive obligations contemplate both legislation and executive action to combat violence.

the CERD are directed exclusively towards racially-motivated carnage, FC s 12(1)(c) aims to thwart all forms of violence.[1]

(a) Violence

The term 'violence' has been defined by some commentators as a 'grave invasion of personal security'.[2] This denotation of the term suffers from several limitations.

First, we see little reason to distinguish, ab initio, 'grave invasions' from 'ordinary invasions' of personal security. The critical distinction is not the extent of the invasion, but its nature. For example, a person arbitrarily detained for three years would have experienced a 'grave invasion' of personal security, but it would hardly seem right to characterize that experience as 'violent'. Violence generally involves some immediate threat to life or physical security. (The source of this threat is immaterial.) Second, we think that the curtailment of FC s 12(1)(c)'s protection to 'grave' violations would fail many of those the right is meant to protect. Women (or men) trapped in abusive relationships may suffer from psychological, as well as physical violence that could probably not be successfully characterized as 'grave'. That such threats and acts of intimidation are often the hallmark of such relationships supports our contention that the violence contemplated by FC s 12(1)(c) ought not to be narrowly construed (even when FC s 12(2)'s right to psychological integrity may also be invoked.)

(b) Positive obligations

(i) Vertical application

The Constitutional Court first recognized the positive dimensions of FC s 12(1)(c) when considering a challenge to the Domestic Violence Act in S v Baloyi:

> The specific inclusion of private sources emphasises that serious threats to security of the person arise from private sources. Read with s 7(2), s 12(1) has to be understood as obliging the State directly to protect the right of everyone to be free from private or domestic violence.[3]

The Court subsequently confirmed the positive duty imposed on the state by FC s 12(1)(c) in Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security.[4]

[1] See Currie & De Waal (supra) at 303 n51.

[2] Ibid at 304.

[3] S v Baloyi (Minister of Justice & Another Intervening) 2000 (2) SA 425 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 86 (CC) at para 11 (Emphasis added. Footnote omitted)(Domestic Violence Act 116 of 1998 read not to impose a reverse onus provision on accused.)

[4] 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC), 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC)('Carmichele').

In Carmichele, a woman had been attacked by a man — accused of rape and murder — who had recently been released from jail on bail. The gravamen of Carmichele's complaint was that the attack was a direct consequence of the failure of the state — in the form of the investigating officer and the prosecutor — to oppose bail for her attacker in a previous matter. Both the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal refused her claim. They held that the state had no legal duty to prevent the harm in question. Although Carmichele had failed to raise constitutional issues in either the High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal, the Constitutional Court found that all courts have an obligation to develop the common law in light of the spirit purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[1] The Constitutional Court then found, without specifically relying on FC s 12(1)(c),[2] that > there is a duty imposed on the State and all of its organs not to perform any act that infringes these rights [including s 12(1)(c)]. In some circumstances there would also be a positive component which obliges the State and its organs to provide appropriate protection to everyone through laws and structures designed to afford such protection.[3]

This holding has spawned a revolution in the law of delict.[4] This new duty — grounded in FC ss 39(2) and 12(1)(c) — extends the state's general duty to protect

[1] Carmichele (supra) at para 39.

[2] According to Marius Pieterse, two obvious reasons exist for the Court's silence in this regard. First, since the case had initially been brought in terms of the Interim Constitution, the Court did not want to address the thorny issue of retrospective effect. Second, the subsequent constitutional challenge was brought in terms of FC s 39(2). FC s 39(2)'s general obligation to develop the common law in light of the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. See M Pieterse 'The Right to be Free from Public and Private Violence after Carmichele' (2002) 119 SALJ 27, 32. FC s 39(2), as one of the authors notes elsewhere, does not permit reliance on a specific substantive section of the Bill of Rights. S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 31.4*(e)*.

[3] Carmichele (supra) at para 44. In coming to this conclusion, the Carmichele Court rejected the position taken by the US Supreme Court in De Shaney v Winnebago County Department of Social Services. 489 US 189 (1988)(US Supreme Court declines to hold state liable for failure to prevent child abuse although state was on notice that such abuse had occurred.) The Carmichele Court preferred the reasoning of the European Court of Human Rights in Osman v United Kingdom. See Carmichele (supra) at para 45 quoting Osman v United Kingdom 29 EHHR 245 at para 115 ('It is common ground that the State's obligation in this respect extends beyond its primary duty to secure the right to life by putting in place effective criminal law provisions to deter the commission of offences against the person backed up by law-enforcement machinery for the prevention, suppression and sanctioning of breaches of such provisions. It is thus accepted by those appearing before the Court that article 2 of the European Convention on Human Rights may also imply in certain well-defined circumstances a positive obligation on the authorities to take preventive operational measures to protect an individual whose life is at risk from the criminal acts of another individual.') See also Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC) at para 40 ('The State is further under a constitutional duty to take steps to help diminish the amount of public and private violence in society generally and to protect all people and especially children from maltreatment, abuse or degradation.')

[4] The Minister of Safety and Security has since been held liable for a failure to take positive steps in the following Supreme Court of Appeal cases: Minister of Safety and Security & Another v Hamilton 2004 (2) SA 416 (SCA)(State responsible for damage caused by a mentally unstable woman issued a gun licence); Van Eeden v Minister of Safety and Security (Women's Legal Centre as Amicus Curiae) 2003 (1) SA 389 (SCA), 2002 (4) All SA 346 (Police failure to close a gate allowed a dangerous prisoner to escape and to rape and assault a young woman); Minister of Safety and Security v Van Duivenboden 2003 (1) SA 389 (SCA)(The failure its citizens by imposing liability in the event of egregious failures.[1] It is worth noting that a significant proportion of these successful delictual actions have vindicated the rights of women to be free from violence.

It is also worth noting that the courts have linked the right to freedom from violence to the constitutional value of accountability. In Van Duivenboden, the Supreme Court of Appeal wrote:

> Where the conduct of the State, as represented by the persons who perform functions on its behalf, is in conflict with its constitutional duty to protect rights in the Bill of Rights, in my view, the norm of accountability must necessarily assume an important role in determining whether a legal duty ought to be recognised in any particular case.[2]

The Van Duivenboden Court emphasized that delictual liability did not follow, automatically, from the state's failure to discharge its duties of accountability. Other kinds of remedies or extra-judicial mechanisms might well ensure the government's accountability.[3] However, the Van Duivenboden Court held that 'where the State's failure occurs in circumstances that offer no effective remedy other than an action for damages, the norm of accountability will . . . ordinarily demand the recognition of a legal duty unless there are other considerations affecting the public interest that outweigh that norm.'[4] of the police failed to remove a gun from a man they knew to be dangerous led, almost ineluctably, to the shooting deaths of the man's wife and daughter.) The High Court has also acknowledged Carmichele's revolution in the common law of delict. See Seema v Lid van die Uitvoerende Raad vir Gesondheid, Gauteng 2002 (1) SA 771 (T)(Authorities of state mental hospital have a duty to the public to ensure that patients do not escape and cause harm); Moses v Minister of Safety and Security 2000 (3) SA 106 (C)(Plaintiff's husband had been assaulted and killed by other inmates while in police custody); Geldenhuys v Minister of Safety and Security 2002 (4) SA 719 (C)(Police held liable for failure to provide speedy medical assistance.) In Geldenhuys Davis J wrote:

---

> 'The facts of this case recall a sad part of the apartheid past, of individuals left to die in cells, of a systematic destruction of human dignity of people who were in the custody of the police. That was our past and it can no longer be our future, for if it is, then the wonderful aspirations and magnificent dreams contained in the Constitution will turn to post-apartheid nightmares. The transformation of our legal concepts must, at least in part, be shaped by memory of that which lay at the very heart of our apartheid past. When considering police action, the past is of great importance in assisting to shape legal concepts which are congruent with our constitutional future.'

This decision was subsequently overruled by the Supreme Court of Appeal on the grounds that negligence had not been proven. See Minister van Veiligheid en Sekuriteit v Geldenhuys 2004 (1) SA 515 (SCA). See also Mpongwana v Minister of Safety and Security 1999 (2) SA 794 (C)(The plaintiff was paralysed by a stray bullet while in a taxi. The shot was fired by a rival taxi organisation. She claimed against the minister as the police had known about the volatile relationship between the rival organisations and had failed to prevent it erupting in violence. The court recognised the validity of the claim in principle by dismissing an exception to the claim); Botha v Minister van Veiligheid en Sekuriteit 2003 (6) SA 568 (T)(While effecting an arrest a policeman accidentally shot the plaintiff who successfully claimed for damages against the Minister); Van der Spuy v Minister of Correctional Services 2004 (2) SA 463 (SE)(The court upheld a claim by an innocent bystander who was shot by an escaping prisoner.) For a general discussion of FC s 12(1)(c)'s impact on the law of delict see J Neethling 'Delictual Protection of the Right to Bodily Intergrity and Security of the Person against Omissions by the State' (2005) 122 SALJ 572.

[1] Van Eeden (supra) at para 23.

[2] Van Duivenboden (supra) at para 21. See also Carmichele (SCA) (supra) at para 37; Van Eeden (supra) at para 17.

[3] Ibid.

[4] Ibid at para 21.

The Constitutional Court in Rail Commuters extended the logic of Van Duivenboden to the failure of any organ of state to discharge its constitutionally-mandated delictual duties.[1] At the same time, the Rail Commuters Court agreed with the Van Duivenboden Court that, although there is a strong link between the right to freedom from violence and accountability, the constitutional requirement of accountability would not always result in a finding of delictual liability. O'Regan J outlined the Rail Commuters Court's approach as follows:

> In determining whether a legal duty exists whether in private or public law, careful analysis of the relevant constitutional provisions, any relevant statutory duties and the relevant context will be required. It will be necessary too to take account of other constitutional norms, important and relevant ones being the principle of effectiveness and the need to be responsive to people's needs.[2]

As the above quotation suggests, the Constitutional Court has not merely confined FC s 12(1)(c)'s reach to instances that require it to redefine delictual liability. The Rail Commuters Court overruled an earlier decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal[3] and concluded that the Final Constitution required that the statutory provisions governing Metrorail's responsibilities imposed a positive duty — that is, a prospective duty, on Metrorail 'to ensure that reasonable measures are in place to provide for the security of rail commuters.'[4] Rail Commuters reads the statutory provisions at issue through the lens of FC s 12(1)(c) and suggests that we would all be better served if the law were read to compel the state to prevent the violence in the first place and not simply to justify the award of damages after the fact.

[1] Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC)('Rail Commuters') at para 76 ('The principle that Government, and organs of State, are accountable for their conduct is an important principle that bears on the construction of constitutional and statutory obligations, as well as on the question of the development of delictual liability.')

[2] Ibid at para 78 (footnotes omitted). The reasons for this reliance on accountability are not entirely clear. Surely, the text of FC s 12(1)(c) provides sufficient basis for increasing the State's liability. The deployment of the value of 'accountability' serves two functions. Firstly, although a large number of 'accountability' cases have involved an element of violence, by relying on state accountability rather than the right to be free from violence, the courts have given themselves the opportunity to extend state liability to cases in which violence is absent. Indeed, a number of such 'accountability' cases have already occurred. Applicants seeking compensation for unfair administrative action have relied upon the extension of state liability recognized in the FC s 12(1)(c) 'accountability' cases. See, eg, Olitzki Property Holdings v State Tender Board & Another 2001 (3) SA 1247 (SCA), Premier, Western Cape v Faircape Property Developers (Pty) Ltd 2003 (6) SA 13 (SCA). Secondly, the FC 12(1)(c) 'accountability' challenges have all been brought as statutory interpretation or development of the common law cases in terms of FC s 39(2). Thus, any support that can be found in the constitutional text to alter the current state of the law is of great rhetorical value. However, the reliance on accountability does detract from the State's specific duty, in terms of FC s 12(1)(c), to protect especially vulnerable members of our community from violence.

[3] Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others v Rail Commuters Action Group & Others 2003 (6) SA 349 (SCA), 2003 (12) BCLR 1363 (SCA). The Supreme Court of Appeal decision had overruled the previous judgment of Davis J in the Cape High Court. See Rail Commuter Action Group & Others v Transnet Ltd t/a Metrorail & Others (No 1) 2003 (5) SA 518 (C), 2003 (3) BCLR 288 (C).

[4] Rail Commuters (supra) at para 84.

FC s 12(1)(c), read with the requirement of accountability, has also broadened the common-law doctrine of vicarious liability.[1] In K v Minister of Safety and Security, the applicant had been raped by three on-duty policemen who had offered her a lift home. Both the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal rejected her delictual claim on the grounds that the policemen had been acting contrary to the purpose of their employment and that the Minister could accordingly not be held liable for their actions. O'Regan J found that the Supreme Court of Appeal had misunderstood the facts of the case and had therefore misapplied the common-law test. According to the Constitutional Court, the policemen who raped K had committed a crime while operating under the colour of law. Or to put the matter in slightly different terms, the officers simultaneously committed a crime that fell outside their duties and omitted to protect K from a crime that fell well within their duties. The omission created the basis for the finding of vicarious liability. The link drawn by the K Court between the commission of a crime and the failure to fulfil a constitutional duty echoes FC s 12(1)(c)'s link between the duty not to cause violence (negative) and the duty to prevent violence (positive).[2]

[1] K v Minister of Safety and Security 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC), 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC)('K'). See also the Supreme Court of Appeal's judgment in Minister of Safety and Security v Luiters Case Number 213/05 (as yet unreported decision of 17 March 2006)(The Minister was held liable for the actions of an off-duty policeman who fired on nine innocent people while allegedly looking for robbers. At the time of writing, the case was on appeal to the Constitutional Court.)

[2] The state's obligation to prevent violence in terms of FC s 12(1)(c), read with FC s 39(2), was further extended in Omar v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others (Commission for Gender Equality, Amicus Curiae 2006 (2) SA 289 (CC), 2006 (2) BCLR 253 (CC)('Omar'). The applicant had challenged various provisions of the Domestic Violence Act 116 of 1998 that facilitated the issuance of protection orders and warrants for arrest on the grounds that they violated his rights to freedom and security of the person, access to courts and fair trial. The Omar Court rejected the applicant's challenges and justified the legislation on the grounds that FC s 12(1)(c) requires the state to take active steps to prevent domestic violence and to encourage victims to report all instances of it:

> Whereas the privacy of the home and the centrality attributed to intimate relations are valued, privacy and intimacy often provide the opportunity for violence and the justification for non-interference. Victims are ambivalent about their fate and reluctant to go through with criminal prosecution. It is understandable for the legislature to enact measures that differ from those generally applicable to criminal arrests and prosecutions. It is clear that the Act serves a very important social and legal purpose.

Ibid at para 18. FC s 12(1)(c) could potentially have played a similar interpretative role in Road Accident Fund v Van der Merwe CCT 48/05 (Unreported, 30 March 2006). The complainant's husband had intentionally run her over with his car and reversed over her again. The Road Accident Fund rejected her claim on the grounds that it was barred by the Matrimonial Property Act. The Van der Merwe Court held that the challenged provision of the Matrimonial Property Act violated FC s 9(1) because it often impaired a woman's ability to claim adequate compensation. Although the Van der Merwe Court did not rely upon FC s 12(1)(c) in reaching its conclusions, the Court did have this to say in response to the amicus' invocation of the right to be free from violence: 'Spouse batterers and wrongdoers in delict are in effect immunised from making good patrimonial damages of their marriage partners. This ouster provision seems to be at odds with the constitutional protection extended to a person's bodily integrity.' Ibid at para 69.

(ii) Horizontal application

Although a number of the aforementioned matters engage domestic violence, they do so in terms of existing legislation designed to protect women. The courts have not, as yet, been required to use FC s 12(1)(c) to develop the common law of delict in purely private disputes.[1]

(c) Negative obligations

FC s 12(1)(c) imposes both positive obligations and negative obligations.[2] These two duties often overlap. Whenever the police arrest a suspected criminal or

[1] The existence of a duty to act that can give rise to a delictual liability is a well-ventilated topic. At common law, the presence of a number of factors can establish liability for an omission:

(1) Whether there was prior conduct which created a danger; the existence of prior conduct was once considered an absolute requirement for liability; see, eg, Silva's Fishing Corporation (Pty) Ltd v Mazewa 1957 (2) SA 256 (A)(Owner of fishing fleet liable for failing to rescue drifting boat);

(2) The control of a dangerous object; see, eg, Minister of Forestry v Quathambla (Pty) Ltd 1973 (3) SA 69 (A)(Owner liable for fire on property under his control); Oosthuizen v Homegas (Pty) Ltd 1992 (3) SA 463 (O)(Liability for explosion caused by failure to properly warn or instruct about dangers); Cape Town Municipality v Butters 1996 (1) SA 473 (C)(Municipality liable for failure to properly warn of dangerous slope next to parking area); see also Neethling, Potgieter & Visser (supra) at 63–66;

(3) The existence of a rule of law; see Minister van Polisie v Ewels 1975 (3) SA 590 (A)('Ewels')(Existence of a duty to prevent crime was a factor in the holding that a the Minister was liable for the failure of a policeman to prevent an assault); see also Carmichelle (supra); Neethling, Potgieter & Visser (supra) at 66–68;

(4) The existence of a special relationship between the parties; see Mtati v Minister of Justice 1958 (1) SA 221 (A)(Relationship between police officer and detained person); Ewels (supra)(Relationship between policeman and citizens); De Beer v Sergeant 1976 (1) SA 246 (T)(Duty on parent to prevent child committing a delict); see, generally, Neethling, Potgieter & Visser (supra) at 69–70;

(5) The holding of a particular office; see Macadamia Finance Ltd v De Wet 1991 (4) SA 273 (T)(Liquidators liable for failure to insure assets);

(6) Contractual undertaking to protect a third party; see SAR & H v Estate Saunders 1931 AD 276 (Liability for failure to move a trailer in terms of a contract); Blore v Standard General Insurance Co Ltd 1972 (2) SA 89 (O)(Garage accepted responsibility for safety of car's steering mechanism and therefore liable for loss suffered as a result); see also Neethling, Potgieter & Visser (supra) at 70–71;

(7) The creation of an impression that a third party's interests will be protected; See Compass Motors Industries (Pty) Ltd v Callguard (Pty) Ltd 1990 (2) SA 520 (W)(Security firm protecting premises owes duty to third parties lawfully on the premises to protect their property). See also Neethling, Potgieter & Visser (supra) at 71–72.

None of these factors constitute necessary or sufficient conditions for the imposition of a duty. Courts often require the presence of a number of such factors before finding that an omission to act violated a duty of care. See Neethling, Potgieter & Visser (supra) at 72.

The courts are, in this domain, developing a fairly progressive doctrine even where they do not invoke FC s 12(1)(c). For example, the Supreme Court of Appeal in Media 24 v Grobler found that employers have a positive duty to protect their employees not only from physical violence, but also from such forms of psychological violence as sexual harassment. National Media 24 & Another v Grobler 2005 (6) SA 328 (SCA) at para 65 ('This duty cannot in my view be confined to an obligation to take reasonable steps to protect them from physical harm caused by what may be called physical hazards. It must also in appropriate circumstances include a duty to protect them from psychological harm caused, for example, by sexual harassment by co-employees.' (Our emphasis)) break up a riot, they must simultaneously act positively to prevent further violence from private sources and at the same time act negatively to minimise the violence they necessarily employ, as agents of the state, to achieve their aims.

[2] Although FC s 12 requires no further justification, part of the rationale behind the prohibition on public violence is to promote greater respect for life and dignity. Langa J explains this commitment as follows:

The Constitutional Court considered the relationship between these two obligations in Walters. At issue in this case was the constitutionality of provisions allowing the police to use force, including lethal force, when affecting an arrest.[1] Kriegler J reasoned that an arrest was never an end in itself, but merely one means of getting a suspect into court. As a result, force could only be justified when an arrest was necessary to achieve that goal. If an arrest is necessary, the force employed must be the minimum necessary to effect the arrest,[2] and must be proportionate with respect to the offence committed or the continued threat of violence.[3]

Implicit in the provisions and tone of the Constitution are values of a more mature society, which relies on moral persuasion rather than force; on example rather than coercion. In this new context, then, the role of the State becomes clear. For good or for worse, the State is a role model for our society. A culture of respect for human life and dignity, based on the values reflected in the Constitution, has to be engendered, and the State must take the lead. In acting out this role, the State not only preaches respect for the law and that the killing must stop, but it demonstrates in the best way possible, by example, society's own regard for human life and dignity by refusing to destroy that of the criminal. Those who are inclined to kill need to be told why it is wrong. The reason surely must be the principle that the value of human life is inestimable, and it is a value which the State must uphold by example as well.

S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 222.

[1] Ex Parte Minister of Safety and Security & Others: In re Ex Parte Walters & Another 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC), 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC). The constitutional challenges to the Criminal Procedure Act were not limited to FC s 12(1)(c). The applicants raised challenges grounded in the right to life (FC s 11), the right to human dignity (FC s 10) and other rights to freedom and security of the person (specifically, FC ss 12(1)(e) and 12(2)(b)). Although the majority of the references in the judgment are to the right to bodily integrity — FC s 12(2) — the Court's observations remain relevant to our understanding of FC s 12(1)(c). See Currie & De Waal (supra) at 309. For a more detailed account of the constitutional dimensions of arrest, see F Snyckers & J le Roux 'Criminal Procedure' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 51.

[2] Walters (supra) at para 54 ('Where force is necessary, only the least degree of force reasonably necessary to carry out the arrest may be used.')

[3] Ibid ('In deciding what degree of force is both reasonable and necessary, all the circumstances must be taken into account, including the threat of violence the suspect poses to the arrester or others, and the nature and circumstances of the offence the suspect is suspected of having committed; the force being proportional in all these circumstances.') See also Govender v Minister of Safety and Security 2001 (4) SA 273 (SCA), 2001 (11) BCLR 1197 (SCA) at paras 19–20 (Court interprets statute to only allow use of force when there are reasonable grounds to believe that the suspected offence involved the infliction or threat of serious bodily harm or where the suspect poses an immediate threat of serious bodily harm to him or her, or a threat of harm to members of the public.)

The requirement of proportionality echoes the sentiments of Justice White in Tennessee v Garner 471 US 1 (1985) 11–12 ('It is not better that all felony suspects die than that they escape. Where the suspect poses no immediate threat to the officer and no threat to others, the harm resulting from failing to apprehend him does not justify the use of deadly force to do so. It is no doubt unfortunate when a suspect who is in sight escapes, but the fact that the police arrive a little late or are a little slower afoot does not always justify killing the suspect. A police officer may not seize an unarmed, nondangerous suspect by shooting him dead. The Tennessee statute is unconstitutional insofar as it authorises the use of deadly force against such fleeing suspects. It is not, however, unconstitutional on its face. Where the officer has probable cause to believe that the suspect poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or

40.6 FC s 12(1)(d): TORTURE

(a) Definition

Before offering a definition of 'torture', it may help to consider the purposes for which torture has, traditionally, been used: (1) as part of the victor's pleasure after military victory; (2) to promote terror in the general population; (3) as a form of punishment; (4) as a means of extracting confessions; and (5) as a method of gathering intelligence.[1] Luban notes that the last purpose is both the most recent to develop and the only one that citizens of liberal democracies accept as a legitimate justification.[2] As a result, our discussion of the definition of and the justification for torture will be limited to the relationship, if any, between torture and the need to gather information deemed necessary to protect the general safety of the commonweal.[3]

South African courts have not, as yet, been called upon to determine the scope to others, it is not constitutionally unreasonable to prevent escape by using deadly force. Thus, if the suspect threatens the officer with a weapon or there is probable cause to believe that he has committed a crime involving the infliction or threatened infliction of serious physical harm, deadly force may be used if necessary to prevent escape, and if, where feasible, some warning has been given.')

The High Court has twice held that allowing the police to order the surgical removal of a bullet from a suspect's leg amounted to a violation of FC s 12(1)(c). The removal of the bullet constituted violence beyond that necessary to effect an arrest. See S v Xaba 2003 (2) SA 703, 708H (N); S v Gaqa 2002 (1) SACR 654, 658H (C).

The dual duties of the police become particularly complicated when two opposing protesting groups resort to violence. The European Court of Human Rights held that the police have a duty to interfere, with force if necessary, to prevent the two private groups from causing further violence. See Platform Ärtzte fur dasLeben v Austria 13 EHRR 204 (1988); S Woolman 'Freedom of Assembly' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) Chapter 43.

[1] See D Luban 'Liberalism, Torture, and the Ticking Bomb' (2005) 91 Virginia Law Review 1425, 1429–37.

[2] Ibid at 1437. According to Luban, the utilitarian moral philosophy that informs political liberalism enables some liberals to conceive of torture, in the worst case scenario, as consistent with liberalism. Luban writes:

> To speak in a somewhat perverse and paradoxical way, liberalism's insistence on limited governments that exercise their power only for instrumental and pragmatic purposes creates the possibility of seeing torture as a civilized, not an atavistic, practice, provided that its sole purpose is preventing future harms. Now, for the first time, it becomes possible to think of torture as a last resort of men and women who are profoundly reluctant to torture. And in that way, liberals can for the first time think of torture dissociated from cruelty — torture authorized and administered by decent human beings who abhor what circumstances force them to do. Torture to gather intelligence and save lives seems almost heroic. For the first time, we can think of kindly torturers rather than tyrants.

Ibid.

[3] Sachs J offers a brief look at the history of torture in Southern Africa from the outset of Dutch settlement in his concurring judgment in Makwanyane. S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC), 1995 (2) SACR 1 (CC) at paras 384–87. For a brief exposition of torture's evolution into an acceptable form of law enforcement, see S Williams 'Your Honor, I Am Here Today Requesting The Court's Permission to Torture Mr. Doe': The Legality of Torture as a Means to an End versus The Illegality of Torture as a Violation of Jus Cogens Norms Under Customary International Law' (2004) 12 University of Miami International and Comparative Law Review 301, 307–11.

of the term 'torture'.[1] However, the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment ('CAT'), which has been ratified by South Africa, offers the following authoritative international definition:

> any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or a confession, punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing him or a third person, or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind, when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. It does not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions.[2]

Four essential features of torture emerge from this definition:[3] (a) severe mental or physical pain or suffering; (b) intentionally inflicted; (c) for a listed purpose;[4] and (d) by, or with the consent of, an official actor. While intention and official sanction are undoubtedly important elements for a finding of torture, it is the notion of 'severity' that attracts the greatest amount of jurisprudential debate.[5]

[1] See Fose v Minister of Safety Security 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC), 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC)('Fose'). The Constitutional Court was asked to consider whether a man was entitled to constitutional damages in addition to delictual damages for the severe assaults he had suffered while in police custody. The Fose Court casually referred to the assaults as 'torture'. Ibid at paras 81, 89, 101 and 103. Indeed, the Court accepted allegations that 'torture' was a 'widespread and persistent phenomenon at South African police stations.' Ibid at para 103. However, it made no attempt to define the term.

The Constitutional Court has been presented with other opportunities in which it could have analyzed law or conduct in terms of the prohibition of torture. It has preferred, however, to view the challenged law or conduct in terms of the prohibition on 'cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or punishment'. See Makwanyane (supra) at para 78 (Death penalty constitutes cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment.) However, Chaskalson P suggests, without making a specific finding, that the death penalty would not amount to torture. Makwanyane (supra) at para 97. Similarly, in Williams, while the Court was willing to engage some foreign jurisprudence on torture, it ultimately found that the whipping or the caning of juveniles constituted cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment. S v Williams 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC) at para 63.

[2] (1984) UN Doc A/39/51 (ratified by South Africa on 10 December 1998) art 1.

[3] See LM Keller 'Is Truth Serum Torture?' (2005) 20 American University International Law Review 521, 569.

[4] There is some disagreement over the content of this element. See N Jayawickrama The Judicial Application of Human Rights Law (2002) 307. As a general matter, the listed purposes involve the domination of the victim to achieve a predetermined end.

[5] The United Nations General Assembly has declared that 'torture constitutes an aggravated and deliberate form of cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.' Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Being Subjected to Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (1975) GA res 3452, UN Doc A/10034 ('Torture Declaration') art 1(2)(Our emphasis). Intention and severity also form the backbone of the European Court's and European Commission's understanding of torture. In Denmark v Greece, the European Commission wrote: 'The word 'torture' is often used to describe inhuman treatment which has a purpose such as the obtaining of information or confessions, or the infliction of punishment, and is generally an aggravated form of inhuman and degrading treatment.' Application Numbers 3321–3/67 and 3344/67 (1969) 12 European Commission for Human Rights Yearbook 186. The European Court expressed a very similar statement in Ireland v The United Kingdom (1978) 2 EHRR 25 ('Ireland v UK'). The Ireland v UK Court found that 'it was the intention that the Convention, with its distinction between 'torture' and 'inhuman or degrading treatment' should by the first of these terms attach a special stigma to deliberate inhuman treatment causing very serious and cruel suffering.' Ibid at para 167 (our emphasis).

The practical difficulties associated with determining whether pain or suffering is sufficiently severe to constitute torture are well documented in Ireland v The United Kingdom. In response to increased 'terrorist' activity by the IRA and other armed Irish activists, the United Kingdom began using various 'techniques' to extract information. The 'techniques' involved protracted standing against the wall on tip-toes, the covering of the suspect's head throughout most of the detention, the exposure of the suspect to loud noise for a prolonged period of time, and deprivation of sleep, food and drink. The European Commission on Human Rights found that these practices, employed collectively, amounted to torture.[1] The European Court on Human Rights, in a divided judgment, reversed the Commission's decision. It wrote:

> Although the five techniques, as applied in combination, undoubtedly amounted to inhuman and degrading treatment, although their object was the extraction of confessions, the naming of others and/or information and although they were used systematically, they did not occasion suffering of the peculiar intensity and cruelty implied by the word torture.[2]

A majority of the Ireland v The United Kingdom Court recognized that an undeniable benefit attaches to limiting the kinds of practices we identify as torture. If every undesirable interrogation technique amounts to torture, then the term 'torture' may lose its capacity to elicit the desired levels of public repugnance.

The conflicting conclusions the European Commission and the European Court reached regarding the 'levels of suffering' required to support a finding of torture reflect but one of the unsettled dimensions of this unsettling practice. Other courts and commentators have noted, however, that to focus on the severity of pain as the primary criterion for a finding of torture is to misconceive the essence of torture itself. As these writers often point out, the victims of war, disease and starvation often experience greater degrees of pain. What distinguishes torture from these other horrific experiences is that the pain is associated with a particularly malignant set of motives: the domination and the destruction of the personality of individual.[3] It is not pain, but cruelty bordering on barbarism

[1] Ireland v United Kingdom Commission Report (25 January 1976).

[2] Ireland v UK (supra) at para 167. The Israeli Supreme Court has held that similar practices — prolonged standing or uncomfortable sitting positions, tight hand or ankle cuffing, loud noise, sleep deprivation, hooding, cold rooms, and violent shaking — do not amount to torture. See Public Committee Against Torture in Israel v The State of Israel (1999) 53(4) PD 817 reprinted as Supreme Court of Israel: Judgment Concerning the Legality of the General Security Services Interrogation Method (1999) 38 ILM 1471.

[3] While arguing that the threat of escalating pain can constitute torture, Parry contends that torture 'can include not just the most intensely painful practices but also all the practices that use pain to punish or gather information, upend the victim's worldview, and express the domination of the state and the torturer'. J Parry 'What is Torture, Are We Doing it, and What if We Are?' (2003) 64 University of Pittsburgh Law Review 237, 248. Copelon argues that > to treat physical brutality as the sine qua non of torture obscures the essential goals of modern official torture: the breaking of the will and the spread of terror. It obfuscates the relationships between acts of violence and the larger context of torture, between physical pain and mental stress, and between mental integrity and human dignity. It ignores the facts that abuse of the body is humiliating as well as searing, and that the body is abused and controlled not only for obscene sadistic reasons but ultimately as a pathway to the mind and spirit.

R Copelon 'Recognizing the Egregious in the Everyday: Domestic Violence as Torture' (1994) 25 Columbia Human Rights Law Review 291, 309–10.

that distinguishes torture from other forms of physical violence or psychological abuse. So, for example, in Estrella v Uruguay the Human Rights Commission held that threats of violence to friends or relatives, the threat of deportation and the mock amputation of an arm with an electric saw — despite the infliction of minimal amounts of physical pain — amount to torture.[1]

Making 'severity' the linchpin of torture analysis also enables proponents of novel interrogation techniques to distinguish their more 'humane' forms of information extraction from such medieval forms of persecution as the rack.[2] Modern interrogation practices — often described as 'torture-lite' — may seem benign by comparison.[3]

The third requirement — the official sanction for such abuse — is often taken for granted in the international literature because the cases themselves turn on allegations of brutality by state actors.[4] That said, official sanction for this form of physical abuse and psychological violence seems to us to lie at the heart of contemporary debates about the nature of, and the justification for, torture. For example, our disgust at the treatment of prisoners at Guantanamo Bay stems, in large part, from the fact that such treatment was officially sanctioned by the US government.[5]

[1] Communication No 74/1980 HRC 1983 Report (1983) Annex XII. See also Cariboni v Uruguay Communication No 159/1983 HRC 1988 Report (1988) Annex VII.A (A university professor was kept hooded and sitting straight for seven days. When he had a meal he had to kneel and use the chair as a table. He was only taken to the toilet twice a day. He could often hear loud shrieks, possibly from a nearby torture in progress. The shrieks were accompanied by very loud music and noise. He was often threatened with torture and abruptly moved to a new location.) See also E Quinteros and MC Almeida de Quinteros v Uruguay Doc A/38/40 (1981)(Mother of daughter who was tortured also a 'victim of the violations suffered by her daughter.')

[2] As Parry has noted, '[t]he difference between wall-standing and the rack is a matter of degree, not of kind.' Parry (supra) at 249. See also Ireland v UK (supra) at 116 (O'Donoghue J, dissenting)('One is not bound to regard torture as only present in a medieval dungeon where the appliances of rack or thumb screw or similar devices were employed. Indeed, in the present day world there can be little doubt that torture may be inflicted in the mental sphere.')

[3] See RB Schechter 'Intentional Starvation as Torture: Exploring the Gray Area Between Ill-treatment and Torture' (2003) 18 American University International Law Review 1233.

[4] As a general matter, torture is understood to be a form of public, state-sanctioned violence. Private violence — no matter how gruesome — does not qualify as torture. But see Copelon (supra) at 342 (Argues that domestic violence should be regarded as torture. According to Copelon there is no real difference between the dominant position of the state and the position of a domestic abuser. Both are in a position of complete and often unquestionable control over their victim.)

[5] See Tyrer v United Kingdom (1979-80) EHRR 1 at para 33, cited with approval in Williams (supra) at para 33 ('Furthermore, [corporal punishment] is institutionalised violence, that is in the present case violence permitted by the law, ordered by the judicial authorities of the State and carried out by the police authorities of the State. Thus, although the applicant did not suffer any severe or long-lasting physical effects, his punishment — whereby he was treated as an object in the power of the authorities — constituted an assault on precisely that which is the main purpose of art 3 to protect, namely a person's dignity and physical integrity. The institutionalised character of this violence is further compounded by the whole aura of official procedure attending the punishment and by the fact that those inflicting it were total strangers to the offender.') In Aydin v Turkey, the European Commission for Human Rights held that one of the factors that raised the treatment of the complainant to the level of torture was that it was 'committed by a person in authority over the victim'. Commission Report (7 March 1996) at para 189.

(b) Justification

In S v Makwanyane Chaskalson P (as he then was) wrote that '[i]t is difficult to conceive of any circumstances in which torture, which is specifically prohibited under IC s 11(2), could ever be justified.'[1] Even in times of war or public emergency torture is, under international law, absolutely prohibited.[2] But while the Final Constitution does not allow derogation from FC s 12(1)(d) or (e) during a state of emergency,[3] it does not exclude the possibility that legislation permitting torture in specific circumstances could be justified under FC s 36. The crisp question, in this section, is whether 'conditions exist in which torture might be justifiably used to prevent the destruction of the constitutional order itself, the death of millions of this country's inhabitants or, perhaps, just one other life'.[4]

Recent allegations of torture of suspected terrorists and prisoners of war by US forces in Iraq and other parts of the world have rekindled serious academic

[1] Makwanyane (supra) at para 97. In his concurring judgment, Sachs J also suggests that the prohibition of torture may be non-justifiable. He writes:

> In the case of other constitutional rights, proportionate balances can be struck between the exercise of the right and permissible derogations from it. In matters such as torture, where no derogations are allowed, thresholds of permissible and impermissible conduct can be established.

Ibid at para 352. The implication of this statement is that once an act is classified as torture, then it can no longer be justified.

[2] CAT art 2(2) states that: 'No exceptional circumstances whatsoever, whether a state of war or a threat of war, internal political instability or any other public emergency, may be invoked as a justification of torture.' These words are echoed in art 3 of the Torture Declaration and art 5 of the American Torture Convention. Article 5 of the American Torture Convention precludes the use of such factors as 'the dangerous character of the detainee or prisoner' or 'the lack of security of the prison establishment' to justify torture. Article 9 of the OAU Guidelines and Measures for the Prohibition and Prevention of Torture, Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment in Africa also specifically ban the use of any type of necessity, threat of war or national emergency as a justification for torture. The extensive ratification of CAT (138 state parties) and the proliferation of similar treaties and guidelines that prohibit the justification of torture could be used to argue that the prohibition is in fact part of international customary law, if not a jus cogens norm. International customary law forms part of South African law (FC s 232), legislation must be interpreted to accord with international law if possible (FC 233) and the Constitution itself must be interpreted in light of international law (FC s 39(1)(b)). See, generally, H Strydom & K Hopkins 'International Law' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 31. All these factors suggest that torture would not be justifiable under the Final Constitution. However, international customary law is only binding only if it is not inconsistent with the Final Constitution or an Act of Parliament. The Final Constitution would require an independent inquiry to determine whether torture could ever be justified. It seems safe to say that torture under any circumstances violates South Africa's international obligations under CAT, a reasonable reading of international customary law and the general trend amongst constitutional democracies.

[3] FC s 35(5) lists torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment as non-derogable rights. See, generally, N Fritz 'States of Emergency' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 60.

[4] I Currie & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in M Chaskalson, J Klaaren, J Kentridge, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) 39.3*(b)*.

debate about when, if ever, torture can be justified.[1] For those who advocate the judicious use of torture, the preferred intuition pump is the 'ticking-bomb' scenario: a bomb has been planted in a densely populated area and the police have a man who knows where the bomb is and how to disarm it. For torture abolitionists, this scenario is what Wittgenstein would call 'the picture that bewitches us'.[2] It serves as an effective (but misleading) metaphor because it is loaded in favour of the judicious, but highly selective, use of torture: because the 'terrorist' possesses the relevant information for disarming the threat to our safety, torture will succeed in extracting accurate information. But this scenario, abolitionists contend, relies on a set of assumptions that do not in fact obtain:[3] knowledge of the bomb's existence and its location, and the ability of the suspect to defuse the bomb or somehow halt the countdown to detonation.[4] Because these assumptions are built in to the 'ticking-bomb' scenario, it commits us to accepting the use of torture when it is not, in fact, certain that torturing the suspected terrorist will save lives. Moreover, once we accept that torture may be a legitimate interrogation technique for significant threats to life where an explosion is imminent, the

[1] For a vigorous defence of state-sanctioned torture, see A Dershowitz Why Terrorism Works: Understanding the Threat, Responding to the Challenge (2002)(Dershowitz advocates a system of judicial warrants for torture.) For a critique of 'torture warrants', see M Strauss 'Torture' (2004) 48 New York Law School Law Review 201, 271–73. For other justifications of torture, see M Bagaric & J Clarke 'Not Enough Official Torture in the World: The Circumstances in Which Torture is Morally Justifiable' (2005) 39 University of San Francisco Law Review 581, 611 ('The only situation where torture is justifiable is where it is used as an information gathering technique to avert a grave risk. In such circumstances, there are five variables relevant in determining whether torture is permissible and the degree of torture that is appropriate. The variables are (1) the number of lives at risk; (2) the immediacy of the harm; (3) the availability of other means to acquire the information; (4) the level of wrongdoing of the agent; and (5) the likelihood that the agent actually does possess the relevant information. Where (1), (2), (4) and (5) rate highly and (3) is low, all forms of harm may be inflicted on the agent — even if this results in death.') See further, Parry (supra) at 258 ('There is no way to escape the fact that torture is an awful practice. People's lives are ruined, often beyond repair. The drafters of the Convention [Against Torture] were right: no one should torture; no one should suffer from torture; torture is always wrong' but 'Government agents should use torture only when it provides the last remaining chance to save lives that are in imminent peril.') See also J Parry & W White 'Interrogating Suspected Terrorists: Should Torture Be an Option?' (2002) 63 University of Pittsburgh Law Review 743, 760; A Moher 'The Lesser of Two Evils: An Argument for Judicially Sanctioned Torture in a Post-9/11 World' (2004) 24 Thomas Jefferson Law Review 469 (Argues that the Dershowitzian model is preferable to the current climate of secrecy in which torture occurs unregulated.)

[2] This criticism of the 'ticking-bomb' scenario is largely parasitic on Luban's insights and the criticism offered by Marcy Strauss. See Strauss (supra) at 265–68.

[3] For arguments against torture under any circumstances, see Luban (supra)(Examines torture's place in liberal theory and argues that the 'ticking-bomb' scenario is a fantasy used to justify the unjustifiable); S Williams 'Your Honor, I Am Here Today Requesting The Court's Permission to Torture Mr. Doe': The Legality of Torture as a Means to an End v. The Illegality of Torture as a Violation of Jus Cogens Norms under Customary International Law' (2004) 12 University of Miami International and Comparative Law Review 301, 360 ('If we, as human beings, wish to continue to characterize ourselves as 'civilized,' torture should never be legalized because it is the ultimate act of incivility and the epitome of inhumanity.'); Strauss (supra) at 274 ('Only an absolute ban on torture without exception will enable this nation to resist the impulse to ignore critical core values in favor of an elusive security.')

[4] See Luban (supra) at 1442–44.

other danger is that we will then feel that other potentially life-threatening situations warrant the same interrogation techniques.[1] Our bewitchment may lead us to endorse the use of torture to ensure, for example, the speedy return of a kidnapped child.[2]

Of course, the slippery-slope argument of the abolitionist is itself an intuition pump. It is designed to sow sufficient doubt about the efficacy of torture in the collective consciousness that we, the political community, will ultimately no longer be inclined to view the benefits that might flow from torture as ever sufficient to outweigh the costs.

Because neither the advocates nor the abolitionists can rely on 'facts' with respect to the 'ticking-bomb scenario', the arguments for and against torture cannot rely on the conclusions each side draws from this particular intuition pump. And for that reason we too wish to remain agnostic as to the justifiability of torture under the kinds of circumstances described above.

A more compelling and nuanced argument against torture — one that does not rely upon cost-benefit analysis — has recently been offered by Michael Ignatieff. First, Ignatieff contends that:

> [P]hysical torture . . . inflicts damage on those who perpetrate it as well as those who are forced to endure it. Any liberal democratic citizen who supports the torture of terrorist suspects in ticking-bomb cases must accept responsibility for the psychological damage done to victim and interrogator. Torture exposes agents of a democratic state to the ultimate moral hazard. The most plausible case for an absolute ban on physical torture relates precisely to this issue of moral hazard. No one should have to decide when torture is or is not justified, and no one should be ordered to carry it out. An absolute prohibition is legitimate because in practice it relieves public servants from the burden of making intolerable choices.[3]

Second, the damage done by torture extends beyond the immediate participants. Ultimately, torture implicates each and every citizen:

> For torture, when committed by a state, expresses the state's ultimate view that human beings are expendable. This view is antithetical to the spirit of any constitutional society whose raison d'être is the control of violence and coercion in the name of human dignity and freedom.[4]

[1] The scenario is normally presented as a simple utilitarian 'ends-justify-the-means' argument. It is also sometimes characterized as a form of self-defence. See Strauss (supra) at 260–61.

[2] Luban describes the slippery slope argument as follows:

> The real debate is not between one guilty man's pain and hundreds of innocent lives. It is the debate between the certainty of anguish and the mere possibility of learning something vital and saving lives. And, above all, it is the question about whether a responsible citizen must unblinkingly think the unthinkable and accept that the morality of torture should be decided purely by totaling up costs and benefits. Once you accept that only the numbers count, then anything, no matter how gruesome, becomes possible. 'Consequentialist rationality,' as Bernard Williams notes sardonically, 'will have something to say even on the difference between massacring seven million, and massacring seven million and one.

Luban (supra) at 1444, citing B Williams 'A Critique of Utilitarianism' in JJC Smart & B Williams Utilitarianism: For and Against (1973) 75, 93.

[3] M Ignatieff 'Evil under Interrogation: Is Torture ever Permissible?' Financial Times (May 15, 2004)('Evil under Interrogation'). See also M Ignatieff The Lesser Evil: Political Ethics in an Age of Terror (2004).

[4] Ignatieff 'Evil under Interrogation' (supra).

In sum, what makes torture anathema for Ignatieff is not so much the pain or the indignity experienced by the person tortured, but the extent to which the practice of torture undermines the 'dignity' of the persons charged with the responsibility of extracting information by such means, and the collective 'dignity' of a society that tolerates such practices. In this respect, Ignatieff sounds a set of cautionary notes consistent with the dignity jurisprudence of our own Constitutional Court. In Port Elizabeth Municipality, the Court writes:

> It is not only the dignity of the poor that is assailed when homeless people are driven from pillar to post in a desperate quest for a place where they and their families can rest their heads. Our society as a whole is demeaned when state action intensifies rather than mitigates their marginalisation.[1]

Dignity, as one of the authors of this chapter has written elsewhere, is not simply a constellation of negative duties owed by the state to each human subject, or a set of positive entitlements that can be claimed by each member of the polity. Dignity is that which binds us together as a community, and it occurs only under conditions of mutual recognition and mutual respect.[2]

40.7 FC s 12(1)(e): Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment

(a) Components of FC s 12(1)(e)

FC s 12(1)(e) prohibits six distinct forms of mischief: cruel treatment; inhuman treatment; degrading treatment; cruel punishment; inhuman punishment; and degrading punishment.[3]

---

[1] See Port Elizabeth Municipality v Various Occupiers 2005 (1) SA 217 (CC), 2004 (12) BCLR 1268 (CC) at para 18 (emphasis added).

[2] See S Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) at 36-15. The kind of community that both Ignatieff and the Constitutional Court have in mind is captured by Langa J's apercu on ubuntu in Makwanyane. Langa J explains how ubuntu illuminates the right not to be tortured or to be subject to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment as follows:

> [Ubuntu exists in] a culture which places some emphasis on communality and on the interdependence of the members of a community. It recognises a person's status as a human being, entitled to unconditional respect, dignity, value and acceptance from the members of the community such a person happens to be part of. It also entails the converse, however. The person has a corresponding duty to give the same respect, dignity, value and acceptance to each member of that community. More importantly, it regulates the exercise of rights by the emphasis it lays on sharing and co-responsibility and the mutual enjoyment of rights by all.

Makwanyane (supra) at paras 224–25 (emphasis added). Langa J, like Ignatieff, connects the dignity of discrete individuals to the solidarity necessary to maintain the kind of community contemplated by the Final Constitution. See also Khosa (supra) at para 74 (Court writes that the Final Constitution commits us to an understanding of dignity in which 'wealthier members of the community view the minimal well-being of the poor as connected with their personal well-being and the well-being of the community as a whole'); S Hoctor 'Dignity, Criminal Law and the Bill of Rights' (2004) 121 SALJ 265, 315 ('Dignity has a communitarian aspect: by requiring respect for others' claims to dignity, vindication of the human dignity of all is better assured, and a community of mutual co-operation and solidarity is fostered.')

[3] S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at paras 93 and 276; S v Williams 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC), 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC)('Williams') at para 20; S v Dodo 2001 (3) SA 382 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 423 (CC)('Dodo') at para 35; S v Niemand 2002 (1) SA 21 (CC), 2001 (11) BCLR 1181

(i) Treatment and punishment

The first important terms to understand are 'treatment' and 'punishment'. Plainly, if the challenged practice cannot be characterized as either 'punishment' or 'treatment', then FC s 12 cannot be successfully invoked.[1]

'Punishment' embraces most criminal sanctions. The death penalty (Makwanyane), corporal punishment (Williams) and imprisonment (Dodo) have all been found, without any difficulty, to constitute 'punishment' for the purposes of FC s 12(1)(e). It remains unclear, however, whether fines, or the confiscation of a licence, fall within this term. The horizontal application of 'punishment' could also extend beyond purely criminal sanctions to disciplinary procedures in the workplace, schools or universities.[2] 'Punishment' is, in reality, a subset of 'treatment'. Generally, punishment should be understood as a form of treatment by an authority — public or private — occasioned by the transgression of a rule.

But what, then, is 'treatment'? In S v Ncube the Zimbabwean Supreme Court remarked that

> [t]reatment has a different connotation from punishment. It seems to me that what is envisaged is treatment which accompanies the sentence. In other words, the conditions associated with the service of sentences of imprisonment are now subject to the proscription. The frequency and conditions of searches of convicts and remand prisoners, the denial of contact with family and friends outside the prison, crowded and unsanitary prison cells and the deliberate refusal of necessary medical care, might afford examples.[3]

'Treatment' would also encompass the circumstances in which a person is kept in custody prior to punishment. For example, in S v Huma the High Court held that the taking of fingerprints was not punishment, but did amount to treatment.[4] In Dilworth v Reichards, Claassen J held that knowingly subjecting an innocent man to arrest and several appearances in court was a 'prima facie' violation of FC s 12(1)(e).[5]

(CC) at para 21; S v Huma 1996 (1) SA 232, 236A (W)('Huma'). Similar provisions in the Namibian and Zimbabwean constitutions have also been interpreted disjunctively. See Ex parte Attorney General, Namibia: In re Corporal Punishment by Organs of State 1991 (3) SA 76, 86 (NmS); S v Ncube; S v Tshuma; S v Ndhlovu 1988 (2) SA 702, 715 (ZS)('Ncube').

[1] See P Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (3rd Edition, Loose-Leaf, RS 1, 2004) 50.2.

[2] See Tyrer v United Kingdom (1979–80) 2 EHRR 1 (Corporal punishment in school specifically held to be 'punishment', not treatment.)

[3] Ncube (supra) at 715E–F. At international law, the following forms of treatment — during punishment — have been found to amount to cruel inhuman or degrading treatment: Massiotti v Uruguay Communication No 25/1978 (1982) HRC Report Annex XVIII and Bazzano v Uruguay Communication No 5/1977 (1979) HRC Report Annex VII (Overcrowding in prisons); Cyprus v Turkey (1976) 4 EHRR 482 at para 405 and Whyte v Jamaica Communication No 732/1997 (1998) HRC Report Annex XI.V (Withholding of food, water or adequate medical treatment); Young v Jamaica Communication No 615/1995 (1998) HRC Report Annex XI.J (Repeated soaking of bedding); Ireland v The United Kingdom (1978) 2 EHRR 25 ('Ireland v UK')(Combination of practices including prolonged standing, sleep deprivation and exposure to loud noise while in custody are 'treatment' not 'punishment').

[4] Huma (supra) at 235H.

[5] Dilworth v Reichard 2003 (4) BCLR 388, 402F (W)(The plaintiff and defendant were both in the vicinity of a shooting. The plaintiff was arrested and charged. The defendant knew that the plaintiff had been charged and that the plaintiff was innocent. The plaintiff was subsequently released. The defendant was then arrested and eventually convicted. The plaintiff sued the defendant for failing to report his involvement to the police. The High Court upheld the claim.)

Neither FC s 12 nor the Constitutional Court, however, confines the extension of 'treatment' to events that occur during custody or imprisonment. Such a narrow reading would make 'treatment' a mere adjunct of 'punishment'. In Mohamed v President of the Republic of South Africa, a unanimous Constitutional Court held that the deportation or extradition of a person within the custody of South African law enforcement officials to the receiving state without first obtaining the assurance from the receiving state that the death penalty will not be imposed impairs FC s 12(1)(e).[1] The deportation or the extradition itself, in Mohamed, constitutes unconstitutional 'treatment'.[2] Even further outside the realm of criminal sanction, the European Commission of Human Rights has found that the invidious differentiation of racial groups by immigration law or policy amounts to degrading 'treatment'.[3]

The unfair operation of a criminal sanction will probably not amount to 'treatment' that may be challenged in terms of FC s 12(1)(e).[4] According to the Canadian Supreme Court

> [t]here must be some more active state process in operation, involving an exercise of state control over the individual, in order for the state action in question, whether it be positive action, inaction or prohibition, to constitute 'treatment' which is absent in the case of a 'mere prohibition'.[5]

The requirement of control, if generously interpreted, provides a sound basis for determining the outer limits of FC s 12(1)(e)'s application.

The potential horizontal application of FC s 12 might mean that 'the control' in question could be exercised by a party other than the state.[6] Given the

[1] Mohamed & Another v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others (Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty in South Africa & Another Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC), 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC) at para 60 (A suspected terrorist was deported to the USA from South Africa without any assurance from US authorities that that the suspect would not be subject to the death penalty. The Court declared that the government had failed to give effect to the Final Constitution and ordered that a copy of its judgment be sent to the federal district trial court in New York. Mohamed was not, in the end, sentenced to death.)

[2] See Chalal v United Kingdom (1996) 23 EHRR 413 (European Court holds that deportation constitutes 'treatment'.) In Canada, deportation is not regarded as punishment, but whether it falls within the ambit of 'treatment' has been left open. Canada v Chiarelli [1992] 1 SCR 711.

[3] East African Asians v United Kingdom (1973) 3 EHRR 76 (Immigration laws that discriminated on the basis of race constitute degrading treatment.) In South Africa such conduct will more likely be attacked as unfair discrimination under FC s 9. There is little, if anything, that s 12(1)(e) can add to the protection already afforded against discrimination.

[4] Rodriguez v British Columbia [1993] 3 SCR 519 ('Rodriguez')(The applicant was a terminally-ill patient who wanted to commit suicide but would soon be unable to do so without assistance. She argued that legislation prohibiting her assisted suicide was cruel and unusual punishment or treatment. The Supreme Court of Canada found that the prohibition was clearly not 'punishment' and also did not amount to 'treatment'.)

[5] Ibid at para 67.

[6] See Canadian Foundation for Children v Canada [2004] 1 SCR 76 at para 48 (The court dismissed a claim that a law permitting reasonable force to be used against children by parents sanctioned 'cruel and unusual punishment'. In addition, the Suprem Court held that force by parents could never amount to 'treatment' as they were not part of the state — and the Charter only applies to state action – and that force exercised by teachers could only qualify as 'treatment' if they were employed by the state.)

extension of the law of delict to state action and to state omission with respect to various forms of violence, one could well imagine a court applying FC s 12(1)(e) to the law governing — or to instances of — domestic violence or child abuse. However, given our thesis that the primary purpose of FC s 12 is to ensure that the emancipatory powers of the state that may be used to enhance human freedom are not simultaneously used to dominate or exploit citizens, we would hesitate to extend FC s 12's reach too readily to private violence where the text does not expressly invite such a reading.

(ii) Cruel, inhuman and degrading

Differentiating between the three qualifying adjectives in FC s 12(1)(e) — cruel, inhuman and degrading — is no easy task. And it is made no easier by the preference of our courts to find that the treatment complained of satisfies all three definitions. In S v Williams, Langa J articulated this preference as follows:

> Whether it is necessary to split the words of the phrase and interpret the concepts individually is a matter which would largely depend on the nature of the conduct sought to be impugned. It may well be that, in a given case, conduct that is degrading may not be inhuman or cruel. On the other hand, other conduct may be all three.[1]

The Williams Court, while grudgingly acknowledging the distinct meaning of the three terms, then notes that each generation will refract the terms 'cruel, inhuman and degrading' treatment through the lens of the social mores of the time. FC s 12(1)(e) analysis, the Court held, requires that the standards for cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment be 'objectively . . . articulated and identified, [with] regard being had to the contemporary norms, aspirations, expectations and sensitivities of the . . . people as expressed in its national institutions and its Constitution, and further having regard to the emerging consensus of values in the civilised international community'.[2] This objective standard does not, however, mean that public opinion serves as the benchmark for determining when punishment or treatment is 'cruel, inhuman and degrading'. As Chaskalson P made abundantly clear in Makwanyane:

> Public opinion may have some relevance to the enquiry, but, in itself, it is no substitute for the duty vested in the Courts to interpret the Constitution and to uphold its provisions without fear or favour. If public opinion were to be decisive, there would be no need for constitutional adjudication.[3]

(aa) Dignity

Before we turn to the differences in the meaning of the three words, it is important to emphasize what they have in common: the denial of dignity.[1] As Ackermann J wrote in Dodo: '[w]hile it is not easy to distinguish between the three concepts 'cruel', 'inhuman' and 'degrading', the impairment of human dignity, in some form and to some degree, must be involved in all three.'[2] Dignity, as a right, a value and an ideal, reminds us that '[h]uman beings are not commodities to which a price can be attached; they are creatures with inherent and infinite worth; they ought to be treated as ends in themselves, never merely as means to an end.'[3] FC s 12(1)(e)'s dignity concerns are not, however, limited to purely instrumental, and often brutal, uses of state power. FC s 12(1)(e), like FC s 12(1)(d), recognizes that certain forms of treatment and punishment diminish not only the humanity of the person subjected to the cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment, but also offend the dignity, that is, 'the humanity of those who carry it out'.[4] And, as with FC s 12(1)(d), FC s 12(1)(e) engages the dignity of society as a whole. Here, the state must not simply ensure that the bar is not set too low; it has a duty to raise the bar:[5]

[1] Williams (supra) at para 25.
[2] Ibid at para 22 quoting Ex parte Attorney-General, Namibia: In re Corporal Punishment by Organs of State 1991 (3) SA 76, 86I (NmS).
[3] Makwanyane (supra) at para 88.

> The Constitution has allocated to the State and its organs a role as the protectors and guarantors of those rights to ensure that they are available to all. In the process, it sets the State up as a model for society as it endeavours to move away from a violent past. It is therefore reasonable to expect that the State must be foremost in upholding those values which are the guiding light of civilised societies. Respect for human dignity is one such value; acknowledging it includes an acceptance by society that '. . . even the vilest criminal remains a human being possessed of common human dignity'.[6]

The state must model what it means to treat others with dignity.[7]

[1] For a full discussion of how dignity has influenced the Court's construction of FC s 12(1)(e), see Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) at § 36.4*(c)(iii). In utilizing dignity as a tool to determine violations of FC s 12(1)(e)*, we must of course be mindful of the general rule that it is a violation of a more specific right that indicates a violation of dignity, not the other way round. See Dawood & Another v Minister of Home Affairs & Others 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC), 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) at para 35. However, FC s 12(1)(e) is not subsumed by dignity and the specific circumstances to which it draws our intention do indeed give independent content to our understanding of dignity.

[2] Dodo (supra) at para 35. See also Furman v Georgia 408 US 238, 272–73 (1972)('The true significance of [cruel and unusual] punishments is that they treat members of the human race as nonhumans, as objects to be toyed with and discarded.' (Brennan J)).

[3] Dodo (supra) at para 38 (footnote omitted). For a more comprehensive account of the Court's dignity jurisprudence, and, in particular, the notion that individuals must be treated as ends-in-themselves, see Woolman 'Dignity' (supra).

[4] Makwanyane (supra) at para 314 (Mokgoro J).

[5] See Makwanyane (supra) at para 222 (Langa J) quoting Brandeis J in dissent in Olmstead v United States 277 US 438, 485 (1928) ('Our Government is the potent, the omni-present teacher. For good or for ill, it teaches the whole of our people by its example.')

[6] Williams (supra) at para 77 quoting Furman v Georgia (supra) at 273 (Brennan J). See also Makwanyane (supra) at paras 57, 88 (Chaskalson P), 229 (Langa J) 311, 314 (Mokgoro J) and 328 (O'Regan J).

[7] In S v Makwanyane a number of the judges linked the concept of protection of dignity in the realm of punishment to ubuntu. See Makwanyane (supra) at paras 130–31 (Chaskalson P), 223–27 (Langa J), 237–45 (Madala J), 263 (Mahomed J) and 307–09 (Mokgoro J). The 'dominant theme' of ubuntu is 'that the life of another person is at least as valuable as one's own thus, heinous crimes are the antithesis of ubuntu. Treatment that is cruel, inhuman or degrading is bereft of ubuntu. Makwanyane (supra) at para 225 (Langa J). For more on ubuntu and its application in South Africa, see D Cornell & K van Marle 'Interpreting Ubuntu: Possibilities for Freedom in the New South Africa' (2006) 6 African Human Rights LJ (forthcoming); D Cornell 'A Call for a Nuanced Jurisprudence (2004) 19 SA Public Law 661.

(bb) Cruel

'Cruelty' implies some form of intentional or wilful conduct by the perpetrator — a specific and callous disregard for the suffering — physical or psychological — of the victim.[1] Neither 'inhuman' nor 'degrading' conduct require this intention. So, while the state's negligent failure to provide adequate prison facilities due to a lack of resources may constitute inhuman or degrading treatment, it cannot be deemed cruel.[2]

(cc) Inhuman

While the absence of intention distinguishes 'cruel' from 'inhuman', cruel treatment will generally be found to be inhuman. A similar hierarchy exists between inhuman and degrading.

In Tyrer v United Kingdom, the European Court of Human Rights had to decide whether the caning of a boy three times by a police officer as punishment for an assault was 'inhuman' or 'degrading'. Relying on an earlier decision in Ireland v United Kingdom, the ECHR found that 'the suffering occasioned must attain a particular level before a punishment can be classified as "inhuman".'[3] It found that that threshold had not been crossed, but that the caning was still 'degrading'.[4] Mahomed J's judgment in Makwanyane supports the proposition — implicit in Tyrer — that 'inhuman' treatment refers to 'treatment' of others as if they were 'not' human — a thing, a tool or an animal. 'Degrading' treatment refers to the very human, if subjective, experience of humiliation.[5]

(dd) Degrading

Punishment or treatment is 'degrading' if it causes 'feelings of fear, anguish and inferiority capable of humiliating and debasing [the victims] and possibly breaking their physical or moral resistance.'[6] However, these feelings must go beyond those ordinarily caused by a criminal conviction or punishment. Were the subjective

[1] See Williams (supra) at para 24 (Langa J quoted, without comment, the following definitions of 'cruel' or 'cruel treatment': 'causing or inflicting pain without pity' (The Oxford English Dictionary); 'wilfully caus(ing) pain without justification . . . intention of causing . . . unnecessary suffering' (R v Mountain 1928 TPD 86, 88); 'deliberate act causing substantial pain and not reasonably necessary in all the circumstances' (Hellberg v R 1933 NPD 507, 510).)

[2] 'Intention' here is meant in the broad sense to include dolus directus, dolus indirectus and dolus eventualis.

[3] Tyrer (supra) at para 29. The suffering required for a practice to qualify as 'inhuman' need not cause physical injury. See Ireland v UK (supra) at para 167 ('The five techniques . . . caused, if not actual bodily injury, at least intense physical and mental suffering . . . and also led to acute psychiatric disturbances . . . [and] therefore fell into the category of inhuman treatment'.)

[4] Tyrer (supra) at para 35.

[5] Mohamed J was the only judge in Makwanyane to specifically find that the death penalty was inhuman punishment. Makwanyane (supra) at para 281 ('In my view, it also constitutes inhuman punishment. It invades irreversibly the humanity of the offender by annihilating the minimum content of the right to life protected by s 9; by degrading impermissibly the humanity inherent in his right to dignity; by the inevitable arbitrariness with which its objective is implemented; by the continuing and corrosive denigration of his humanity in the long periods preceding his formal execution; by the inescapable denial of his humanity inherently involved in a sentence which directs his elimination from society.')

[6] Ireland v UK (supra) at para 167.

responses of shame associated with every conviction or with every punishment to qualify as 'degrading', all convictions and all punishments would be prima facie unconstitutional. That could hardly have been the intent of the drafters.[1]

The European Court has suggested that a finding of degradation will turn on such objective factors as 'the nature and context of the punishment, the manner and method of its execution, its duration, its physical and mental effects and, in some instances, the sex, age and state of health of the victim'.[2] But such factors offer little insight into why the Court found the 'birching' of a 15-year-old boy on his bare buttocks by a policeman at a police station to be degrading, while it concluded that the 'slippering' of a 7-year-old pupil with a rubber-soled gym shoe by his headmaster in his office was not.[3]

(c) Judicial doctrines

(i) Inherently impermissible

(aa) Physical punishment

Some practices are inherently 'cruel, inhuman or degrading'. In S v Williams, Langa J characterized corporal punishment as follows:

> The severity of the pain inflicted is arbitrary, depending as it does almost entirely on the person administering the whipping. Although the juvenile is not trussed, he is as helpless. He has to submit to the beating, his terror and sensitivity to pain notwithstanding. Nor is there any solace to be derived from the fact that there is a prior examination by the district surgeon. The fact that the adult is stripped naked merely accentuates the degradation and humiliation. The whipping of both is, in itself, a severe affront to their dignity as human beings.[4]

[1] See Williams (supra) at paras 40–41 referring to Tyrer (supra) at para 30. The Dilworth High Court found that being arrested and forced to appear in court violated FC s 12(1)(e). Ordinarily, arrest and a court appearance do not amount to degrading treatment. However, where the police, the prosecutor or another party knew of the person's innocence and still acted in a manner that led to his arrest, then such action, it seems, may constitute a violation of FC s 12(1)(e).

[2] Costello-Roberts (1985) 19 EHRR 112 at para 30; Tyrer (supra) at para 30.

[3] Compare Tyrer (supra) at para 30 (Birching violates ECHR) with Costello-Roberts (1985) 19 EHRR 112. The Costello-Roberts majority, without much explanation, held that 'slippering did not reach the requisite 'level of severity'. Ibid at paras 31–32. The Costello-Roberts minority focused on the 'ritualised' 'official' and 'formalised' character of the punishment, the lack of adequate parental consent and that corporal punishment was being progressively outlawed throughout Europe. Ibid at 137–38. See also Campbell & Cosans v United Kingdom (1980) 3 EHRR 531 (European Commission holds that attending a school that permits corporal punishment does not amount to degrading treatment.) See also Williams (supra) at para 90 and Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1449 (CC) at paras 44–47 (Sachs J considers the degrading impact of corporal punishment in schools as part of the s 36 analysis to determine the justifiability of a religious groups claim for exemption from a state ban on corporal punishment. Interestingly, Sachs J held that there was a difference between corporal punishment administered in the 'detached and institutional environment' of a school and that meted out in the 'intimate and spontaneous atmosphere of the home'. Ibid at para 49.)

[4] Williams (supra) at para 45 (our emphasis). See also S v Petrus & Another [1985] LRC (Const) 699; S v Ncube; S v Tshuma; S v Nchlovu 1988 (2) SA 702 (ZS); Ex parte Attorney-General, Namibia: In re Corporal Punishment by Organs of State 1991 (3) SA 76 (NmS). For a discussion of Williams and other corporal punishment cases, see D van Zyl Smit 'Sentencing and Punishment' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 49.2*(d)*(ii).

Corporal punishment would therefore violate FC s 12(1)(e) irrespective of the crime or the person upon whom it was imposed.[1]

(bb) Imprisonment

Whether life imprisonment constitutes cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment has not yet been addressed directly by the Constitutional Court. However, implicit in the Court's finding in Dodo is the conclusion that mandatory life sentences are not necessarily incompatible with FC s 12(1)(e).[2]

On the other hand, there is good reason to believe that the Constitutional Court would confirm — if given the opportunity — the Supreme Court of Appeal's conclusion in S v Bull that a life sentence without the possibility of parole would always violate FC s 12(1)(e).[3] The Bull Court found, in a manner consistent with the position in other jurisdictions, that the possibility of release offered by parole enabled a prisoner to retain his dignity.[4] However, the mere possibility of parole alone does not immunize a life sentence from constitutional challenge. The sentence, in addition, had to take in to account whether the body that grants parole would exercise its discretion 'fairly, justly and responsibly' and whether the parole board's failure to do so would be reviewable by a court.[5]

In Nkosi, similar logic drove the Supreme Court of Appeal to conclude that a 'Methuselah sentence' — a sentence of such duration that the accused has no hope of release before death — was cruel, inhuman and degrading.[6] Again, the absence of any possibility of parole reduced the prisoner to a mere signal in a larger system of social control and thereby failed to recognize that the prisoner still retained some measure of dignity.

The Constitutional Court too has suggested that the imprisonment of an habitual offender for an indeterminate period of time — a span that could potentially exceed the length of the prisoner's life — is cruel, inhuman and degrading.[7] Although the Court ground its holding primarily on the gross disproportionality reflected in the imposition of such a sentence on a non-violent offender, it noted that

[1] Similarly, although slightly less emphatically, the Makwanyane Court held that the death penalty is innately cruel, inhuman and degrading. The Court identified five main reasons for this finding: the inherent arbitrariness of imposing the death penalty; the failure to respect the victim's dignity; the finality of death; the unequal effect on the poor and other marginalised or unpopular members of society; and the suffering during the long wait for execution. Didcott J's denunciation of the death penalty was more emphatic: 'every sentence of death must be stamped, for the purposes of [IC] s 11(2), as an intrinsically cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment.' Makwanyane (supra) at para 179.

[2] Dodo (supra)(The Court upheld legislation requiring mandatory minimum life sentences for certain crimes.)

[3] See S v Bull & Another; S v Chavulla & Others 2002 (1) SA 535 (SCA) at para 23; S v Nkosi & Others 2003 (1) SACR 91 (SCA) at para 9.

[4] See S v Tcoeib 1993 (1) SACR 274 (Nm); 45 BVerfGE 187 (1977). See also Van Zyl Smit (supra) at § 49.2*(d)*(iv).

[5] See van Zyl Smit (supra) at § 49.2*(d)*(iv) citing S v De Kock 1997 (2) SACR 171, 211*h* (T).

[6] Nkosi (supra) at para 9.

[7] S v Niemand 2002 (1) SA 21 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 219 (CC) at para 26.

> [t]he indeterminacy of the sentence also exacerbates the cruel, inhuman or degrading nature of the punishment on the grounds that the maximum period of incarceration remains at all times unknown to the prisoner and the period of his/her incarceration is dependent on the Executive. This is, no doubt, the cause of considerable torment. I therefore conclude that to sentence a person to what may potentially constitute a life-long imprisonment, infringes the right of such person not to be subjected to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.[1]

(cc) Other forms of punishment

Other forms of punishment may well offend FC s 12(1)(e). For example, Chief Justice Warren, writing for a plurality of the US Supreme Court in Trop v Dulles, found that expatriation as a punishment was 'cruel and unusual' despite the absence of physical harm:

> There may be involved no physical mistreatment, no primitive torture. There is instead the total destruction of the individual's status in organized society. It is a form of punishment more primitive than torture, for it destroys for the individual the political existence that was centuries in the development. The punishment strips the citizen of his status in the national and international political community. In short, the expatriate has lost the right to have rights.[2]

Expatriation, banishment or other severe forms of shunning might fall foul of FC s 12(1)(e) because such actions also constitute 'statements' that deny the inherent dignity or humanity of the offender.[3] Similarly, forms of punishment designed to humiliate publicly an offender may be found degrading in terms of FC s 12(1)(e).

(ii) Proportionality[4]

(aa) Gross disproportionality and mandatory minimum sentences

The most developed body of FC 12(1)(e) jurisprudence holds that a punishment 'grossly disproportionate' to the crime is cruel, inhuman and degrading. In S v Dodo, the Constitutional Court was asked to consider the constitutionality of new

[1] Niemand (supra) at para 26.

[2] 356 US 86, 101–102 (1958)(footnotes omitted). But see Perez v Brownell 356 US 44 (1958)(Court holds that expatriation for voting in foreign elections is not unconstitutional. However, the Supreme Court's finding was not based upon the Eighth Amendments limits on cruel and unusual punishment, but on the legitimate exercise of the legislature's powers.)

[3] See August & Another v Electoral Commission & Others 1999 (3) SA 1 (CC), 1999 (4) BCLR 363 (CC) at para 17 (While considering the statutory disenfranchisement of particular class of prisoners, Sachs J observed that membership in, and continued participation in, the political community is an essential dimension of human dignity: 'The universality of the franchise is important not only for nationhood and democracy. The vote of each and every citizen is a badge of dignity and of personhood. Quite literally, it says that everybody counts. In a country of great disparities of wealth and power it declares that whoever we are, whether rich or poor, exalted or disgraced, we all belong to the same democratic South African nation; that our destinies are intertwined in a single interactive polity.') mandatory minimum sentence legislation[1] that required the imposition of life sentences for certain forms of rape and murder. The sentences were not, however, truly mandatory. A judge could depart from the mandatory minimum if 'substantial and compelling circumstances' justified a lesser sentence. The Dodo Court began its consideration of FC s 12(1)(e) by emphasizing the centrality of human dignity to any determination of sentence:

[4] For a comprehensive discussion on proportionality in sentencing, see van Zyl Smit (supra) at § 49.2*(c)*.

> To attempt to justify any period of penal incarceration, let alone imprisonment for life as in the present case, without inquiring into the proportionality between the offence and the period of imprisonment, is to ignore, if not to deny, that which lies at the very heart of human dignity. Where the length of a sentence, which has been imposed because of its general deterrent effect on others, bears no relation to the gravity of the offence the offender is being used essentially as a means to another end and the offender's dignity assailed. So too where the reformative effect of the punishment is predominant and the offender sentenced to lengthy imprisonment, principally because he cannot be reformed in a shorter period, but the length of imprisonment bears no relationship to what the committed offence merits. Even in the absence of such features, mere disproportionality between the offence and the period of imprisonment would also tend to treat the offender as a means to an end, thereby denying the offender's humanity.[2]

While 'mere disproportionality' would partially deny an offender's humanity, it would not meet the threshold for a finding of unconstitutionality. Only a sentence 'grossly disproportionate' to the offence[3] infringes FC s 12(1)(e).[4] The question in Dodo was whether the mandatory minimum sentencing scheme reflected in the legislation compelled courts to impose grossly disproportionate sentences.

In S v Malgas, the Supreme Court of Appeal had interpreted the phrase 'substantial and compelling circumstances' — the linchpin for escaping the imposition of the mandatory minimum — to mean that > [i]f the sentencing court on consideration of the circumstances of the particular case is satisfied that they render the prescribed sentence unjust in that it would be disproportionate to the crime, the criminal and the needs of society, so that an injustice would be done by imposing that sentence, it is entitled to impose a lesser sentence.[5]

[1] Criminal Law Amendment Act 105 of 1997 ('CLAA').

[2] S v Dodo 2001 (3) SA 382 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 423 (CC)('Dodo') at para 35.

[3] See Dodo (supra) at para 37 (Offence in this context 'consists of all factors relevant to the nature and seriousness of the criminal act itself, as well as all relevant personal and other circumstances relating to the offender which could have a bearing on the seriousness of the offence and the culpability of the offender.')

[4] Ibid at para 39. Ackermann J emphasized that although the standard of gross disproportionality was essentially the same as that applied in Canadian and American courts, South African courts need not agree with the application of that standard in other jurisdictions.

[5] 2001 (2) SA 1222 (SCA) at para 25. The Supreme Court of Appeal placed the following gloss on the challenged CLAA provisions:

A Section 51 has limited but not eliminated the courts' discretion in imposing sentence in respect of offences referred to in Part 1 of Schedule 2 (or imprisonment for other specified periods for offences listed in other parts of Schedule 2). Courts are required to approach the imposition of sentence conscious that the Legislature has ordained life imprisonment (or the particular prescribed period of imprisonment) as the sentence that should ordinarily and in the absence of weighty justification be imposed for the listed crimes in the specified circumstances.

Ackermann J, writing for the Dodo Court, agreed that the Malgas court's gloss on the CLAA granted courts sufficient discretion to fashion a sentence that did not cross the threshold of 'gross disproportionality'. As a result, the challenged sentencing provisions in the CLAA were deemed constitutional.[1]

But what about mandatory minimum sentencing requirements that grant the courts no discretion to impose a lesser sentence? The sentence would then have to be evaluated against the nature of the offence prescribed. But, as both the Dodo Court and the Malgas Court note, the appropriateness of the sentence turns on both the nature of the offender and the circumstances of the offence.

In Canada, the Supreme Court originally adopted the 'most innocent possible offender' test when asked to consider the constitutionality of mandatory minimum sentencing requirements that deny courts the discretion to impose lesser sentences. If the minimum sentence would be grossly disproportionate for this hypothetical 'most innocent possible offender', the entire section would be deemed unconstitutional. For example, in R v Smith a minimum sentence of seven years for importing narcotics would have to be tested against a young person returning to Canada with her 'first joint of grass'.[2] The Supreme Court found this sentence to be grossly disproportionate. The Supreme Court of

B Unless there are, and can be seen to be, truly convincing reasons for a different response, the crimes in question are therefore required to elicit a severe, standardised and consistent response from the courts.

C The specified sentences are not to be departed from lightly and for flimsy reasons. Speculative hypotheses favourable to the offender, undue sympathy, aversion to imprisoning first offenders, personal doubts as to the efficacy of the policy underlying the legislation, and marginal differences in personal circumstances or degrees of participation between co-offenders are to be excluded.

The Legislature has however deliberately left it to the courts to decide whether the circumstances of any particular case call for a departure from the prescribed sentence. While the emphasis has shifted to the objective gravity of the type of crime and the need for effective sanctions against it, this does not mean that all other considerations are to be ignored. All factors (other than those set out in D above) traditionally taken into account in sentencing (whether or not they diminish moral guilt) thus continue to play a role; none is excluded at the outset from consideration in the sentencing process.

D The ultimate impact of all the circumstances relevant to sentencing must be measured against the composite yardstick ('substantial and compelling') and must be such as cumulatively justify a departure from the standardised response that the Legislature has ordained.

E In applying the statutory provisions, it is inappropriately constricting to use the concepts developed in dealing with appeals against sentence as the sole

F If the sentencing court on consideration of the circumstances of the particular case is satisfied that they render the prescribed sentence unjust in that it would be disproportionate to the crime, the criminal and the needs of society, so that an injustice would be done by imposing that sentence, it is entitled to impose a lesser sentence.

G In so doing, account must be taken of the fact that crime of that particular kind has been singled out for severe punishment and that the sentence to be imposed in lieu of the prescribed sentence should be assessed paying due regard to the bench mark which the Legislature has provided.

Ibid.

[1] See Dodo (supra) at para 40.

[2] [1987] 1 SCR 1045, 1053.

Canada's position meant that almost all legislation containing minimum mandatory sentences that eliminated judicial discretion would be found to be grossly disproportionate.[1]

The Supreme Court of Canada has twice retreated from this position. It first supplanted the 'most innocent possible offender' test with the 'reasonable' hypothetical offender most likely to 'arise in day-to-day life'.[2] More recently, it dispensed with its 'reasonable' hypothetical offender test entirely. In R v Morrisey[3] and R v Latimer,[4] the Court overturned departures from mandatory minimum sentences by the trial court. In both cases the offender fitted the description of the 'most innocent offender'. And yet, the Supreme Court upheld the mandatory minimum sentences on the grounds that they reflected the State's commitment to the right to life and to the denunciation of all forms of killing. As Peter Hogg notes, Morrisey and Latimer cannot be reconciled with Smith.[5] Hogg suggests that the Court simplify matters by creating a constitutional doctrine that asks only whether the sentence is grossly disproportionate for the specific offender a court finds before it.[6]

What approach is the South African Constitutional Court likely to adopt? The Court has regularly affirmed the doctrine of objective unconstitutionality. This doctrine states that 'the validity or the invalidity of any given law is not contingent upon the circumstances (say, the timing) of the case, or, more specifically, the parties to the case.'[7] While the doctrine of objective unconstitutionality is [1] See Hogg (supra) at 50-4–50-6. See also R v Goltz [1991] 3 SCR 485, 531 ('Goltz')(McLachlin J dissenting).

[2] Goltz (supra) at 516 (In upholding a law imposing a mandatory seven-day jail term for driving a car, the majority rejected the trial court's and the minority's reliance on a hypothetical 'Good Samaritan', and held that a genuine good samaritan could rely on a defence of necessity.)

[3] [2000] 2 SCR 90 at para 46 (The accused had been drinking with a friend in a cabin. He tried to jump onto a bunk bed while holding a loaded gun. He fell. The gun went off and killed his friend. The trial court refused to apply the 4-year statutory minimum sentence for culpable homicide. The Supreme Court upheld the minimum sentence on the grounds that it served 'principles of general deterrence, denunciation and retributive justice'.)

[4] [2001] 1 SCR 3 at para 86 (The applicant's daughter suffered from a severe form of cerebral palsy. When the applicant heard that many operations would be required to prevent his daughter's condition from deteriorating, the applicant decided to end her life. He was convicted of second degree murder. The trial court exempted the applicant from the mandatory sentence — life without parole for 10 years. A unanimous Supreme Court overturned the trial court and upheld the mandatory sentence on the grounds the sentence 'represents a symbolic, collective statement that the offender's conduct should be punished for encroaching on our society's basic code of values.')

[5] Hogg (supra) at 50-10.

[6] Hogg (supra) at 50-10. Hogg bases his approach on McIntyreJ 's dissent in Smith – a court should only consider the offender before it – and Arbour J's concurrence in Morrisey – a four-year minimum sentence was not disproportionate for this offender although it might be disproportionate for some future offender.

[7] S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) 31-50. See, eg, De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, WLD 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC); Ingledew v Financial Services Board: In re Financial Services Board v Van der Merwe & Another 2003 (4) SA 584 (CC), 2003 (8) BCLR 825 (CC) at para 20.

outcome neutral, or at least not outcome determinative, it ought to tilt the Court toward the acceptance of some variation on the 'most innocent offender' test.

(bb) Gross disproportionality and indefinite incarceration

In S v Niemand, the Constitutional Court applied the 'grossly disproportionate' test to the indefinite incarceration of habitual criminals. Mr Niemand had been declared a habitual criminal but had only committed crimes of dishonesty, not violence.[1] A rule of 'practice' limited the term for such offenders to 15 years. But no statutory limit existed on the length of imprisonment. In addition, although the habitual offender would come up for parole after seven years, the courts possessed no oversight powers with respect to the parole board's decisions. Given that this arrangement left the prisoner 'at the mercy of the executive',[2] the Niemand Court was asked to consider whether the punishment was grossly disproportionate. Madala J, writing for the Court, held that while

> [l]ife imprisonment for crimes such as murder and rape may be proportional to the heinous nature of the crimes the imposition of life imprisonment, in the guise of an indeterminate sentence, for an habitual criminal who is neither violent nor a danger to society . . . is a different matter. That sentence is grossly disproportionate to the length of the imprisonment merited by such offences and as such constitutes a violation of s 12(1)(e) of the Constitution.[3]

The Niemand Court cured the constitutional defect by reading in words to set the maximum period of incarceration at 15 years.[4]

(c) Extra-territorial application[5]

The prohibition on cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment has, and, considering current trends in international terrorism and international criminal law, will likely in future, raise the issue of the application of the Bill of Rights outside South Africa's borders. In Mohamed, the Constitutional Court held that the South African government could not extradite or deport a person to a country where he was likely to face the death penalty. This decision should also extend to include any practice that South African courts determine violates s 12(1)(e). Although not strictly concerned with extra-territorial application, the decision in Mohamed should be welcomed as recognizing and enforcing South Africa's obligation of non-refoulement under the Convention Against Torture.[6]

[1] Niemand (supra) at para 5.
[2] Ibid at para 13.
[3] Ibid at para 25.
[4] Ibid at para 33.
[5] For a detailed account of the extra-territorial application of the Bill of Rights, see S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 31.6.
[6] Article 3 of the Convention reads: 'No State Party shall expel, return ('refouler') or extradite a person to another State where there are substantial grounds for believing that he would be in danger of being subjected to torture.'

Much less encouraging is the Court's holding in Kaunda.[1] Kaunda concerned a claim by a group of South African citizens held in Zimbabwe that the South African government had a constitutional duty to intervene on their behalf to try to secure their extradition back to South Africa, or at the very least to secure an assurance that they would be well treated and not sentenced to death. In refusing all the claimed relief, the majority of the Court held that the Bill of Rights does not apply outside of South Africa.[2] If taken to its logical conclusion, the majority would permit the state to run a torture camp as long as it was located outside South African borders and its inmates never set foot in South Africa.

In contrast, the minority recognized that

> [a]s a general principle . . . our Bill of Rights binds the government even when it acts outside South Africa, subject to the consideration that such application must not constitute an infringement of the sovereignty of another state.[3]

This view gives appropriate weight to both the interests of the individual and the need for international comity,[4] and will hopefully persuade a future majority of the Constitutional Court to reconsider its position.

40.8 FC s 12(2): Bodily and Psychological Integrity

The structure of FC s 12(2) is, as we noted in the introduction, somewhat confusing. It guarantees a general right to 'bodily and psychological integrity'. It then elaborates upon that general guarantee by providing for the right to make decisions concerning reproduction (FC s 12(2)(a)), the right to security in and control over the body (FC s 12(2)(b)), and the right to be free from coercive medical and scientific experiments (FC s 12(2)(c)). While FC ss 12(2)(a) and (c) look like specific instances of FC s 12(2)'s general guarantee, FC s 12(2)(b) tests our ability to give distinct meaning to 'bodily and psychological integrity', on the one hand, and 'security in and control over the body', on the other. In order to avoid violating the constitutional canon of surplusage, we must interpret 'bodily and psychological integrity' to mean something over and above 'security in and control over' the body.

(a) Bodily integrity

When asked to consider, in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Justice & Others, whether a law criminalizing sodomy unfairly

[1] Kaunda & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others 2005 (4) SA 235 (CC), 2004 (10) BCLR 1009 (CC)('Kaunda').

[2] Ibid at para 37 ('The bearers of the rights are people in South Africa. Nothing suggests that it is to have general application beyond our borders.')

[3] Ibid at para 229.

[4] The rationale for the majority's decision can probably be traced back to the confusion of two separate issues: (a) the application of the Bill of Rights to state conduct and persons beyond our borders; and (b) the influence of the Bill of Rights on foreign legal systems. The majority seems to believe that the two are inextricably linked, while the minority correctly recognizes that the two issues are logically distinct. See Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.6.

discriminated against homosexuals, the Constitutional Court stated that all of its efforts to explicate our basic law are informed by the recognition that '[t]o understand "the other' one must try, as far as is humanly possible, to place oneself in the position of "the other".'[1] 'It is easy to say' the NCGLE I Court continued > that everyone who is just like 'us' is entitled to equality. Everyone finds it more difficult to say that those who are 'different' from us in some way should have the same equality rights that we enjoy. Yet so soon as we say any group is less deserving and unworthy of equal protection and benefit of the law all minorities and all of society are demeaned. It is so deceptively simple and so devastatingly injurious to say that those who are handicapped or of a different race, or religion, or colour or sexual orientation are less worthy.[2]

FC s 12(2) recognizes — at a minimum — that each physical body is of equal worth and is entitled to equal respect.[3] This reading of FC s 12(2) means that bodily integrity affords the individual somewhat more protection than the entitlement — found in FC s 9(3) — not to be discriminated against on the grounds of disability.[4] Moreover, FC s 12(2)'s commitment to bodily integrity requires more than mere tolerance of a myriad of diverse bodies. We would suggest that FC s 12(2) can be read to impose a duty on the state to ensure that every 'body' is able to participate fully in society.[5] This conception of bodily integrity also goes further than the largely negative protection afforded by FC s 12(2)(b).

Hoffmann v South Afican Airways gives us some indication of how FC s 12(2) might shape such a duty to ensure that every 'body' is able to participate fully in society. Hoffmann applied to the South African Airways (SAA) for employment as a cabin attendant. Despite SAA's own finding that he was professionally and physically capable of discharging the duties of cabin attendant, Hoffmann was denied employment because of his HIV-positive status.

[1] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Another v Minister of Justice & Others 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC), 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC)('NCGLE I') at para 22.

[2] NCGLE I (supra) at para 22 quoting with approval Cory J in Vriend v Alberta [1998] 1 SCR 493 at para 69.

[3] See S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2006) § 36.2*(b)* (Identifies 'equal concern and equal respect' as one of the five 'definitions' of dignity that the Constitutional Court employs.)

[4] FC s 12(2) creates the basis for an independent challenge that will be informed by, but not entirely determined by, the rights to dignity and to equality. More importantly, perhaps, a FC s 12(2) enables litigants to challenge the stigma that attaches to the cultural construction of their bodies (and some illness or disfigurement) without having to argue that they are 'disabled'. See Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC) at para 28 (Court holds that refusal to employ a person because of their HIV status constitutes unfair discrimination. Ngcobo J avoided addressing the question of whether HIV-positive status amounted to a disability for the purposes of FC s 9(3). Indeed, the applicant had pressed the point that that his FC s 9 challenge was grounded not in a claim regarding disability but from the affront to his dignity that flowed from the social marginalization associated with his HIV status.)

[5] As one of the authors has noted elsewhere, dignity requires the commitment of political community to the provision of that level of material goods necessary for all persons — irrespective of their talents or limitations — to 'pursue a meaningful and comprehensive vision of the good life as they understand it.' Woolman 'Dignity' (supra) at 36-68 citing A Sen Development as Freedom (1999) 75.

Hoffmann contended that that SAA's refusal to employ him violated FC s 9(3)'s prohibition on unfair discrimination.[1] The Constitutional Court agreed. It held that SAA's behaviour was constitutionally repugnant because it excluded Hoffmann from participation in society on account of the condition of his body.[2] SAA's conduct amounted not only to unfair discrimination: it also constituted, at least implicity, an assault on Hoffmann's body integrity.[3] It is this type of recognition of the inherent worth of all bodies lies at the care of FC in s 12(2)'s guarantee of bodily integrity.

(b) Psychological integrity

While the three subsections of FC s 12(2) give 'bodily integrity' concrete content, the same cannot be said for 'psychological integrity'. Given the paucity of case-law on the meaning of the term, the following ruminations remain speculative at best. In short, 'psychological integrity' as a self-standing right necessarily goes beyond the protection afforded by 'bodily integrity' and provides fortification from undue stress or shock.[4]

Psychological integrity already receives comprehensive protection in our common law in the form of delictual damages for 'emotional shock'.[5] Courts award such damages for a broad array of psychological trauma: the pain associated with a mother learning of her son's death;[6] the deleterious emotional effects of parents

[1] For a general discussion on the FC s 9 see B Goldblatt & C Albertyn 'Equality' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 35.

[2] Hoffman (supra) at para 38 ('The impact of discrimination on HIV positive people is devastating. It is even more so when it occurs in the context of employment. It denies them the right to earn a living. For this reason they enjoy special protection in our law. People who are living with HIV must be treated with compassion and understanding. We must show ubuntu towards them. They must not be condemned to 'economic death' by the denial of equal opportunity in employment.')

[3] The Court's finding on this score is somewhat undermined by its conclusion that the position would probably have been different if Hoffmann's CD4 count was so low that he would be unable to perform his duties.

[4] The FC s 12(2)'s right to psychology integrity will often overlap with the rights to dignity and privacy. See, generally, S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) Chapter 36; D McQuoid-Mason 'Privacy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 38.

[5] See, generally, J Neethling, JM Potgieter & PJ Visser Law of Delict (4th Edition, 2001) 290–95.

[6] Barnard v Santam Bpk 1999 (1) SA 202 (SCA)(The plaintiff's son had been killed in an accident caused by the negligent driving of the insured. She successfully claimed damages for the distress and grief she suffered when she was informed of his death.) See also Majiet v Santam Ltd [1997] 4 All SA 555 (C)(Mother discovered son's body in the street after he had been negligently knocked down by another driver); Bester v Commercial Union Versekeringsmaatskappy van SA Bpk 1973 (1) SA 769 (A)(The plaintiff suffered severe psychological trauma after witnessing his brother being involved in an accident.) Even the threat of harm to a loved one could be actionable. See Els E v Bruce; Els J v Bruce 1922 EDL 295 (Defendant threatened to harm plaintiff's husband); Boswell v Minister of Police 1978 (3) SA 268 (E)(Defendant untruthfully told the plaintiff that he had shot and killed the plaintiff's cousin.) In Canada, an application to place a child under state protection is considered an affront to the parents' psychological integrity. Their psychological integrity is protected by the Canadian Charter's s 7 guarantee of 'security of the person'. See New Brunswick v G.(J.) [1999] 3 SCR 46 (Court ordered that the parents be represented by state-funded counsel to ensure that the procedure was compatible with the principles of fundamental justice); Winnipeg Child and Family Services v KLW [2000] 2 SCR 519 (Apprehension of a child in need of discovering that their babies had been swapped at birth;[1] or the suffering of a person disfigured by acid during a medical examination.[2]

FC s 12(2)'s guarantee of psychological integrity also reinforces aspects of the actio iniuriarum's protection against insults and invasion of privacy. For example, in NM v Smith, the plaintiffs' HIV status had been revealed in the biography of a well-known politician.[3] The plaintiffs argued that this non-consensual revelation undermined their psychological integrity and caused them emotional harm. The High Court agreed. It wrote:

> [B]ecause of the ignorance and prejudices of large sections of our population, an unauthorised disclosure [of a person's HIV status] can result in social and economic ostracism. It can even lead to mental and physical assault.[4]

FC s 12(2) does meaningful and independent work here because the damage done is not to the plaintiff's FC s 10 right to dignity or her FC s 14 right to privacy: they sustain damage from the emotional and psychological stress caused by the disclosure of their status to their family, friends and community.

In Media 24 v Grobler, the Supreme Court of Appeal was seized with a claim that employers are liable for failing negligently to protect their workers from sexual harassment.[5] The Court specifically mentioned the effect of harassment on the psychological integrity of the victim in upholding the direct liability of the company for failing to protect its employees from harassment by co-workers.[6]

Constitutional protection of psychological integrity must, however, have limits. In Canada, the Supreme Court held that the stress induced by the unreasonable delay of a government entity in addressing a complaint could breach a person's right to psychological integrity.[7] However, that same delay, in the South African context, is unlikely to occasion a breach of FC s 12(2).

---

protection — but without a warrant — constitutes a prima facie breach of the parents' security of the person, but did not, ultimately, infringe the principles of fundamental justice because the parents were entitled to a post-apprehension hearing.)

[1] Clinton-Parker & Dawkins v Administrator, Transvaal 1996 (2) SA 37 (W)(Both couples claimed emotional damages from the hospital after discovering after two years that their babies had been swapped at birth.)

[2] Gibson v Berkowitz 1996 (4) SA 1029 (W)(Defendant had negligently used undiluted acid to take cancer swabs of the plaintiff's vagina. The plaintiff received damages for emotional and psychological suffering as well as physical harm.)

[3] [2005] 3 All SA 457 (W).

[4] Ibid at para 46.2.

[5] Media 24 v Grobler 2005 (6) SA 328 (SCA)(The SCA quoted with approval a finding of the Industrial Court that 'The victims of harassment find it embarrassing and humiliating. . . . The psychological effect on sensitive and immature employees, both male and female, can be severe, substantially affecting the emotional and psychological well-being of the person involved.')

[6] Ibid at para 67 citing with approval J v M Ltd (1989) 10 ILJ 755, 758A–D (IC)(The Court recognized that prolonged sexual harassment could severely affect the 'emotional and psychological well-being of the person involved'.)

[7] Blencoe v British Columbia [2000] 2 SCR 307 (Several complaints of sexual harassment had been lodged against the applicant, a former cabinet minister, at the Human Rights Commission. The Commission had taken almost three years to finalize the complaint. The majority found that state-induced psychological stress could impair the right to security of the person, but that the impairment in this case was not severe enough to warrant such a finding. In addition, the stress experienced by the applicant was not primarily caused by the delay. The Court also noted that Canada possessed sufficient administrative law remedies to address the matter.)

40.9 FC s 12(2)(a): Decisions Concerning Reproduction[1]

The right to bodily integrity or control over the body would seem broad enough to embrace the protection of reproductive decisions. Why then does the Final Constitution explicitly mention the right to 'make decisions concerning reproduction'?

One reason might be to avoid the well-known doctrinal difficulties that American courts have experienced as a result of the Roe Court's location of a judicially-created right to abortion in another judicially-created right to privacy.[2] The specific recognition of reproductive freedom may have been intended to leave the courts very little room to outlaw abortion, while still permitting the drafters to avoid responsibility for expressly reaching that conclusion in the constitutional text. That said, the primary motivation is probably symbolic. It recognizes that some of the most devastating and socially entrenched forms of physical (and psychological) oppression and exploitation relate to reproduction and sexuality. FC s 12(2)(a) serves to draw South African courts' attention to that specific form of denial of bodily integrity.

(a) Abortion

In Christian Lawyers Association v National Minister of Health, Mojapelo J recognised that FC s 12(2)(a) read with FC s 12(2)(b) creates a 'constitutional right to termination of pregnancy'.[3] The Christian Lawyers II Court held both that the challenged

[1] For a general discussion of reproductive rights in the Final Constitution, see M O'Sullivan 'Reproductive Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 37.5 (O'Sullivan deals specifically with the relationship between freedom and security of the person and reproductive rights.)

[2] This drafting decision by the Constitutional Assembly possesses the added benefit of meeting a host of feminist critiques levelled against viewing reproductive freedom in terms of privacy rights. See, eg, C Neff 'Woman, Womb, and Bodily Integrity' (1991) 3 Yale Journal of Law and Feminism 327, 327–28 (Argues that a right-to-privacy-based balancing test has led to an alarming trend in American constitutional law toward permitting the state to intercede on behalf of its interest in a foetal life. Neff contends that the right to privacy is not a meaningful concept for a woman if it allows the state to sever, conceptually, the woman from her womb and to 'represent its contents as a separate and identifiable interest'. Neff anticipates the South African solution to this problem and argues such a problem does not arise if reproductive rights are grounded in a right to bodily integrity.) Indeed, the Supreme Court of Canada deployed the more general but related right to 'security of the person' in s 7 of the Charter to strike down restrictions on abortion in R v Morgentaler (No 2). R v Morgentaler (No 2) [1088] 1 SCR 30.

[3] Christian Lawyers Association v National Minister of Health & Another 2005 (1) SA 509, 518 (T), 2004 (10) BCLR 1086 (T)('Christian Lawyers II')(The applicant challenged the constitutionality of statutory provisions that permitted women under the age of 18 to have abortions without the consent of and without consultation with their parent or guardian. The court upheld the legislation.) Christian Lawyers II affirms the position of McCreath J in Christian Lawyers I that a foetus does not have a right to life and that FC s 12 is in no way limited by any interests the foetus might have. Christian Lawyers Association & Others v Minister of Health & Others 1998 (4) SA 1113 (T), 1998 (11) BCLR 1434 (CC)('Christian Lawyers I'). Pace Roe, the 'right to an abortion' belongs to the pregnant woman, and not to the doctor performing the abortion. See Nourse v Van Heerden 1999 (2) SACR 198 (W)('No constitutional rights of the applicant were identified which were violated by his having been restricted as to the circumstances and conditions in and on which he could procure abortions.' Since doctors are not the beneficiaries of such rights, the Nourse court rejected the doctor's claim that illegal abortions performed prior to the promulgation of the Interim Constitution were, post-1994, now legal.) provisions of the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Act ('Choice Act')[1] are constitutional and that any attempt by the legislature to enact law making abortion per se a crime would be deemed constitutionally infirm.[2]

The argument around abortion is therefore more likely to turn on the extent to which the state can limit a woman's right to abortion.[3] The Choice Act currently places a number of limitations on the 'right to an abortion'. Abortions are permitted 'on request' until 12 weeks into the pregnancy. After 12 weeks of gestation, the foetus may still be terminated — but only in limited circumstances up to 20 weeks.[4] After 20 weeks, termination is permitted only if there is a risk of injury or death.[5] An abortion thus becomes steadily more difficult to procure as a pregnancy progresses.[6]

These limitations on FC s 12(2)(a) and (b) rely on two forms of justification. The first form of justification emphasizes the escalating risk of abortion to the mother over the course of the pregnancy.[7] In a society that permits a broad array of risky and unnecessary activities every day — from sky-diving and bungee-jumping to body-piercing and plastic surgery — the argument from 'risk' smacks of a particularly pernicious form of paternalism. For the legislature to decide in advance that pregnant women may not 'risk' second and third trimester abortions denies them the agency we easily grant the rest of the population over a broad domain of more dangerous and less socially relevant conduct, including many

[1] Act 92 of 1996.

[2] Christian Lawyers II (supra) at 518 ('In a sense therefore the Constitution not only permits the Choice on Termination of Pregnancy Act to make a pregnant woman's informed consent the cornerstone of its regulation of the termination of her pregnancy, but indeed requires the Choice Act to do so. To provide otherwise would be unconstitutional.')

[3] See O'Sullivan (supra) at § 37.12.

[4] An abortion between 12 and 20 weeks is permitted if:

(i) the continued pregnancy would pose a risk of injury to the mother's physical or mental health; or
(ii) there exists a substantial risk that the unborn child would suffer from severe physical or mental abnormality; or
(iii) the pregnancy resulted from rape or incest; or
(iv) the continued pregnancy would significantly affect the social or economic circumstances of the mother.

Choice Act s 2(1)(b).

[5] The exact circumstances are:

(i) would endanger the mother's life; or
(ii) would result in a severe malformation of the unborn child; or
(iii) would pose a risk of injury to the unborn child.

Choice Act s 2(1)(c).

[6] On limitations generally, see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constituional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[7] See Roe v Wade 410 US 113 (1973). A majority of the US Supreme Court held that the state had an interest in the life and health of both the woman and the foetus. In the first trimester, neither interest was sufficiently compelling to justify regulation or prohibition. By the second trimester, the interest in the woman's health was sufficiently compelling to justify regulation. The interest in the foetus' well-being only became compelling in the third trimester. In the third trimester, the state could justify regulation or even prohibition of abortion as long as it did not threaten the life of the woman.

other kinds of medical procedures.[1] In so doing, it risks turning women into 'foetal incubators'.[2] The second form of justification emphasizes the dignity interest of the political community in the life of the foetus. The High Court in Christian Lawyers I firmly rejected the proposition that a foetus possesses any rights — let alone the right to dignity — under the Final Constitution.[3] However, the Christian Lawyers II Court,[4] and authors elsewhere in this work, recognize that the state, and the broader political community, may have a 'detached', as opposed to a derivative, dignity interest in the regulation of abortion.[5]

(b) Sterilization

The Sterilisation Act[6] defines sterilization as 'a surgical procedure performed for the purpose of making the person on whom it is performed incapable of procreation, but does not include the removal of any gonad'.[7] Any person over the age of 18 may be sterilized with their consent.[8] Those persons below the age of 18 may only be

[1] For similar arguments against the prohibition of late term abortions, see T Kushnir 'It's My Body, It's My Choice: The Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003' (2004) 35 Loyola University Chicago Law Journal 1117; R Oliveri 'Crossing the Line: The Political and Moral Battle over Late-term Abortion' (1998) 10 Yale Journal of Law and Feminism 397. See also Stenberg v Carhart 530 US 914 (2000)(Five member majority invalidates statute prohibiting partial-birth abortion because it did not provide a health exception for the woman and constituted an 'undue burden' on a woman's right to choose a particular procedure. The Choice Act does possess a health exception.)

[2] Neff (supra) at 350 ('From the moment a pregnant woman decides that she does not want to carry the pregnancy to term, from the moment she ceases voluntarily to participate in the pregnancy, it becomes a pregnancy against her will and a significant bodily intrusion. This bodily intrusion is, in effect, state action to commission the womb for use as a fetal incubator. The state has entered the woman's body, seized control, and established an adversarial relationship between the woman and her womb.') See also JJ Thomson 'A Defense of Abortion' (1971) 1 Philosophy & Public Affairs 47. Thomson employs the hypothetical situation of a famous violinist being permitted to use the reader's kidneys for dialysis as an intuition pump to designed to force the reader to reconceive the relationship between a woman and the foetus inside her. We discuss this intuition pump at length in the context of FC s 13's prohibition of forced labour. See S Woolman & M Bishop 'Slavery Servitude and Forced Labour' in S Woolmna, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2005) 64-3.

[3] Christian Lawyers I (supra) at 1123. While one of the authors has roundly criticized McCreath J's reasoning in Christian Lawyers I, the outcome remains sound. See S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 31.3*(a)*(iii).

[4] Christian Lawyers II (supra) at 527E.

[5] See M O'Sullivan 'Reproductive Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, March 2005) § 37.2 citing R Dworkin Life's Dominion: An Argument about Abortion and Euthanasia (1993); S Woolman 'Dignity' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2005) § 36.4*(c)*(ii)(Woolman contends that it remains possible to take the state's interest in pre-natal life seriously without concomitantly undermining a woman's right to dignity and her ability to secure an abortion.)

[6] Act 44 of 1998.

[7] Sterilisation Act s 1.

[8] Sterilisation Act s 2(2).

sterilized if a failure to do so would put their life or health at risk.[1] Persons with diminished mental capacity may be sterilized without their consent under certain limited circumstances.[2]

Despite recent amendments to the Sterilisation Act intended to increase the protection afforded to persons with diminished mental capacity,[3] the provisions permitting their sterilization remain controversial.[4] Indeed, recent decisions in other jurisdictions suggest that even our new and improved Sterilisation Act may be the subject of future constitutional challenges.

In Re Eve, the Canadian Supreme Court rejected an application by a mother to have her disabled twenty-four-year-old daughter sterilized.[5] The Court emphasized both the permanent negative psychological impact sterilization would have on the daughter and the manner in which non-consensual sterilization re-inforced the marginalization of disabled persons.[6] The Court also rejected the argument that Eve would be unsuitable for parenthood. It found instead that > mentally incompetent parents show as much fondness and concern for their children as other people. Many, it is true, may have difficulty coping with the financial burdens involved. But this issue is a social problem, and one, moreover, that is not limited to incompetents.[7]

By contrast, the House of Lords permitted a similar application in Re B.[8] The Law Lords were at pains to emphasize that

[1] Sterilisation Act s 2(3)(a).

[2] Sterilisation Act s 3. The statutory requirements include: consent by a parent, guardian spouse or curator (s 3(1)(a)); the recommendation of a panel of a psychiatrist or medical practitioner, a psychologist or social worker and a nurse after considering various prescribed criteria (s 3(1)(b) read with s 3(2)); and that the person be incapable of making, now or in the future, their own informed decision about contraception or sterilisation or of fulfilling the parental responsibility associated with giving birth (s 3(1)(c)).

[3] Sterilisation Amendment Act 3 of 2005.

[4] For an excellent exposé on the sterilisation of mentally incapable people, see K Savell 'Sex and the Sacred: Sterilization and Bodily Integrity in English and Canadian Law' (2004) 49 McGill LJ 1093. Savell argues that how one views non-consensual sterilization depends largely on the narrative one employs and the conception of the body one adopts. She relates the story of AR, a twenty-five-year-old mentally disabled man who had been castrated without his consent at the request of his mother. A local official took exception to the castration and instituted action against the mother. In describing how the perception of the mother's actions depends on how one narrates the story, Savell writes:

> When a commentator agreed that AR was a subject in need of control in his own and others' interests, the legal action taken against his mother seemed unjust and unfair. Conversely, when a commentator was concerned about the implications for society of allowing castration to control individual members, the legal action taken against AR's mother seemed just.

Ibid at 1123. The determination may also turn on how society constructs AR's body:

> Where AR's body was constructed as threatening precisely because it could not be contained sexually, castration was viewed as a means of achieving integrity and, therefore, order at the level of the individual and the social body. Conversely, where AR's body was constructed as emasculated and lacking integrity as a result of having been castrated, castration was viewed as a violation of the individual body and a threat to social cohesion.

Ibid at 1095.

[5] E (Mrs) v Eve [1986] 2 SCR 388, 31 DLR (4th) 1 ('Eve').

[6] Eve (supra) at para 80.

[7] Ibid at para 84.

[8] Re B (a Minor) (Wardship: Sterilisation)(1987) [1988] 1 AC 199, [1987] 2 All ER 206 (HL)('Re B').

> [T]his case is not about sterilisation for social purposes; it is not about eugenics; it is not about the convenience of those whose task it is to care for the ward or the anxieties of her family; and it involves no general principle of public policy. It is about what is in the best interests of this unfortunate young woman and how best she can be given the protection which is essential to her future wellbeing so that she may lead as full a life as her intellectual capacity allows.[1]

The House rejected the applicant's distinction between therapeutic sterilization and non-therapeutic sterilization.[2] It grounded its conclusion, instead, in what it believed to be in the best interests of the person whose sterilization was at issue.[3]

The virtue of the Canadian approach is that it recognizes that persons with diminished mental capacity retain their right to 'bodily integrity'.[4] The vice of the House of Lords' approach is that it reinforces the cultural construction of the disabled person as outside the body politic.[5]

As things now stand, the Sterilisation Act grants a properly composed panel significant latitude when determining whether sterilization is appropriate. However, to the extent that the Act permits the panel to authorize sterilisation when it is not medically necessary, it clearly infringes FC s 12(2)(a) and faces, to our minds, the rather difficult task of justifying this grant of authority without palpable evidence that forced sterilization is a medical or a public health necessity.

(c) Contraception

Any law that impaired the ability to secure contraception would limit FC s 12(2)(a) and would have to be justified in terms of FC s 36.[6] Such a legislative restriction seems unlikely in our current political climate.

However, many private, mainly religious, institutions prohibit the use or the sale of contraceptives amongst their members or on their premises. In the United States, the use of contraceptives in Catholic hospitals and their distribution at [1] Re B (supra) at 212.

[2] Ibid at 204 and 205.

[3] According to Savell, the finding in B and subsequent cases in the United Kingdom were underwritten by three primary justifications: 'the risk of pregnancy, the trauma of pregnancy and childbirth, and the unfitness of the woman to parent. In each of these [three] categories, norms of sexual behaviour and reproductive responsibility function to produce the learning disabled woman as marginal and, therefore, in need of sterilization for her own protection.' Savell (supra) at 1129. Savell also notes that, thus far, the English courts have only allowed sterilisation of women. Ibid.

[4] See § 40.8*(a)* supra.

[5] See M Nussbaum Frontiers of Justice: Disability, Nationality and Species Membership (2006).

[6] American jurisprudence is particularly useful in this regard. See Griswold v Conneticut 381 US 479 (1965)(Law prohibiting any use of contraceptives unconstitutional); Eisenstadt v Baird 405 US 438, 442 (1972)(Prohibition on use by unmarried couples only unconstitutional); Carey v Population Services International Inc 431 US 678 (1977)(Law prohibiting distribution of contraceptives unconstitutional). For an excellent evaluation of American 'sexual freedom' cases, see D Cruz 'The Sexual Freedom Cases'? Contraception, Abortion, Abstinence and the Constitution' (2000) 35 Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review 299. See also R Wyser-Pratte 'Protection of RU-486 as Contraception, Emergency Contraception and as an Abortifacient under the Law of Contraception' (2000) 79 Oregon Law Review 1121.

schools has led to litigation.[1] As one of the authors argues elsewhere in this work, the ability of private religious groups to control the use of contraception — such as the day after pill — will turn both on the extent to which the institution controls the distribution of public goods (ie, a public hospital) and the extent to which members of the particular religious community have agreed to be bound by the tenets of that faith.[2]

40.10 FC s 12(2)(b): Security in and Control over One's Body

FC s 12(2)(b) creates a sphere of individual inviolability with two components. 'Security in' and 'control over' one's body are not synonymous. The former denotes the protection of bodily integrity against physical invasions by the state and others. The latter guarantees the freedom to exercise autonomy or the right to self-determination with respect to the use of one's body.

(a) 'Security in'

In the two most direct applications of FC s 12(2)(b), two High Courts found that the surgical removal of a bullet from a suspect for the purposes of a police investigation was a limitation of the the suspect's right to bodily integrity.[3] The two courts differed, however, as to whether the invasion constituted a justifiable limitation in terms of FC s 36.[4]

The High Court in Gaqa found that the Criminal Procedure Act[5] did contemplate the removal of a bullet.[6] In light of this law of general application, Desai J concluded that, since the proposed operation presented a minimal risk to the suspect and the

[1] Many Catholic hospitals refuse to provide the 'morning-after pill' to rape victims. As the history of RU486 in the US suggests, while the pill is generally considered a contraceptive, some do view this form of it as an abortificent. See H Skeeles 'Patient Autonomy versus Religious Freedom: Should State Legislatures Require Catholic Hospitals to Provide Emergency Contraception to Rape Victims?' (2003) 60 Washington and Lee Law Review 1007; T Fujikawa Lee 'Emergency Contraception in Religous Hospitals: The Struggle between Religious Freedom and Personal Autonomy (2004) 27 University of Hawaii Law Review 65.

[2] S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) Chapter 44. See also S Woolman & I Currie 'Community Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2006) Chapter 58.

[3] See S v Xaba 2003 (2) SA 703, 708H (D)('Xaba'); S v Gaqa 2002 (1) SACR 654, 658H (C)('Gaqa').

[4] On limitations, see, generally, S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[5] Act 51 of 1977 ('CPA').

[6] Gaqa (supra) at 657H–658C (Both the power to 'search' in CPA s 27 and the power to ascertain distinguishing features in CPA s 37 were held, on a purposive interpretation, to allow the police to carry out the operation.)

suspect was accused of murder, society's interest in the suspect's trial, and potential conviction, outweighed the suspect's interest in bodily integrity.[1]

The High Court in Xaba managed to avoid the manifold errors in Gaqa's limitations analysis by rejecting this decision's reading of the CPA. Southwood AJ instead interpreted the CPA in a manner that did not grant the police the power to authorize a surgical intervention.[2] Given the absence of 'law of general application', the Xaba Court held, the suspect's FC s 12(2)(b) right could not be justifiably limited in terms of FC s 36.

The conflicting decisions in Gaqa and Xaba reflect judicial uncertainty with regard to the exercise of police power in such cases. As Southwood AJ noted in Xaba,[3] the legislature would be well advised to draft an amendment to the CPA that brings greater clarity to the matter.[4]

Where the 'invasion' is more subtle than the extraction of a bullet, an equally subtle approach to FC s 12(2)(b) analysis is warranted. As Lawrence Tribe notes:

> it is important to have a way of talking about these matters in which the intrusion caused by the police officer who gently shoves a person back to clear the way for an ambulance, for example, does not amount, even potentially, as an invasion of privacy or personhood.[5]

In short, not every action by the state or another party that involves touching another person's body warrants constitutional scrutiny. In S v Huma, the High Court had the following to say about the mandatory taking of fingerprints:

> The process of taking one's fingerprints does not, in my view, constitute an intrusion into a person's physical integrity. No physical pain of any kind accompanies this process. By comparison, the taking of a blood sample constitutes more of an intrusion into a person's physical integrity than the mere taking of one's fingerprints. When a blood sample is taken the skin is ruptured and it is accompanied by a small element of pain. Pain and violation of a

[1] Gaqa (supra) at 659. The High Court quoted with approval the following dictum from Winston v Lee. 470 US 753 (1985)(Brennan J):

> The reasonableness of surgical intrusions beneath the skin depends on a case-by-case approach in which the individual's interests in privacy and security are weighed against society's interests in conducting the procedure. In a given case the question whether the community's needs for evidence outweighs the substantial privacy interests at stake is a delicate one, admitting of few categorical answers.

On the meaning of 'law of general application', see Woolman & Botha 'Limitations' (supra) at § 34.7.

[2] In Xaba, Southwood AJ first considered CPA s 27. The section only entitled a 'police official' to conduct a search. This power could not be delegated. In fact, the CPA prohibited a police official from taking a blood sample and could therefore hardly be interpreted to allow the much more invasive procedure at issue here. In addition, the ordinary meaning of 'search' did not include surgery. Xaba (supra) at 712G–713D. Southwood then considered CPA s 37(1)(c). CPA s 37(1)(c) gives the power to take 'necessary steps' to determine distinguishing 'marks, features or characteristics'. Section 37 allocates responsibility to medical practitioners to aid police officials with an array of procedures, including the taking of blood samples. CPA s 37(2)(a). According to Southwood AJ, this allocation of responsibilities did not embrace more invasive procedures as the surgical removal of a bullet. Ibid at 713G–714E.

[3] Ibid at 714F–G.

[4] Such an amendment, whatever its form, would not, however, answer the question of when police intrusion into a suspect's bodily integrity is justified under FC s 36.

[5] American Constitutional Law (2nd Edition, 1988) 1330.

person's physical integrity are also associated with corporal punishment and other forms of punishment. By comparison, in my judgment, the taking of fingerprints is on par with the mere taking of a photograph, which does not, in my view, violate the physical integrity of a person.[1]

Non-trivial invasions of bodily integrity that attract constitutional scrutiny occur most frequently in the context of law enforcement investigations. For example, a suspected drug courier may be subjected to a cavity search. A suspected drunk driver may be required to undergo a breathalyzer test or provide a blood sample for analysis. Unsolicited bodily invasions that cross the threshold for constitutional scrutiny have occurred in several other contexts and jurisdictions.[2]

Given that non-trivial invasions of bodily integrity will still occur rather frequently in the context of law enforcement, our courts will be obliged to develop criteria for distinguishing justifiable invasions from unjustifiable invasions. US case law offers the following set of rough and ready guidelines:

(1) A decision to invade bodily integrity must follow established procedures and not be arbitrary. For example, body searches require at least reasonable suspicion.
(2) Where possible, a deliberate invasion of bodily integrity must be preceded by a hearing — even if the hearing is only informal.[3]
(3) The principles of necessity and proportionality should be observed.[4] An intrusion must avoid inflicting unnecessary physical pain or anxiety. It must not run the risk of disfigurement or injury to health.

(b) 'Control over'

FC s 12(2)(b)'s right to exercise 'control over' one's body flows from the general liberal principle that freedom consists, in part, in the ability to 'fram[e] the plan of our life to suit our own character'.[5] However, such freedom may conflict with both well-grounded and ill-founded beliefs of a majority of the population — and its representatives — about ways of being in the world deemed deleterious to the health and the well-being of all of its citizens.

[1] S v Huma 1996 (1) SA 232, 236I–237B (W).
[2] In the US, for example, challenges to compulsory vaccination programmes and to the fluoridation of water have received the courts' attention. See Jacobsen v Massachusetts 197 US 11 (1905); Dowell v City of Tulsa 348 US 912 (1955).
[3] Tribe (supra) at 1332.
[4] Winston v Lee 470 US 753 (1985)(Surgical removal of a bullet from a suspect to determine its origin violates due process where the state has substantial evidence of the origins of the bullet from another source.)
[5] JS Mill On Liberty (1859) Introduction.

FC s 12(2)(b) assumes that individuals are capable of taking decisions that are in their own interests and of acting as responsible moral agents. Any political decision that limits such autonomy constitutes a prima facie affront to FC s 12(2)(b).

It is worth noting that both FC s 12(2)(b) and legitimate limitations on its exercise are protected by the same underlying principle: mutual concern and mutual respect for others. If we are genuinely concerned with and respectful of the lives of our fellow citizens, then we must respect the life choices they make at the same time as we express concern about whether such choices are good for them. Should their preferred way of being in the world entail putting coke up their nose (rather than drinking it from a glass), refusing life-saving blood transfusions for their children on religious grounds, or continuing to smoke in the face of incontrovertible evidence of its dangers, then the commonweal may be justified in passing laws that interfere with the 'bodily control' of citizens who wish to smoke, do coke or allow their children to die. However the recognition of a constitutional right to bodily autonomy in an open society means that we must minimize paternalistic forms of intervention in others' lives.[1]

Our case law is, however, replete with examples of court's upholding paternalistic limitations on bodily self-determination. For example, while declaring unconstitutional a law that prohibited sodomy, Heher J offered the following observation:

> There are undoubtedly some acts which are so repugnant to and in conflict with human dignity as to amount to perversion of the natural order. Bestiality seems to me to be an obvious example of an independent unnatural offence which justifies this categorisation.[2]

The High Court in S v M followed Heher J's lead and rejected equality, freedom and privacy-based constitutional challenges to laws prohibiting bestiality.[3] As a matter of legal strategy, the accused erred by relying upon the prohibition on arbitrary deprivation of freedom in FC s 12(1)(a) rather than the right to control over the body in FC s 12(2)(b).[4] However, the S v M court's findings in relation to both FC s 12(1)(a) and FC s 9(3) make it clear that it would have reached a similar conclusion with respect to a challenge brought under FC s 12(2)(b).[5]

[1] See Tribe (supra) at 1371–72:

> In a society unwilling to abandon bleeding bodies on the highway, the motorist or driver who endangers himself [by not wearing a helmet or seatbelt] plainly imposes costs on others. His choice to risk a range of possible injuries, instead of certain death, in one respect strengthens society's case for regulating him; the social and economic cost of caring for the motorist who suffers an accident is likely to be considerably greater than the cost of burying the terminally ill patient who refuses extraordinary measures to prolong his life.

[2] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality & Others v Minister of Justice & Others 1998 (2) SACR 102, 127d-f (W), 1998 (6) BCLR 726 (W).

[3] S v M 2004 (3) SA 680 (O).

[4] Ibid at paras 20–22.

[5] Ibid at paras 17–19 and 22.

The Constitutional Court has not yet been asked to consider the meaning of FC s 12(2)(b). However, its decision in S v Jordan suggests that the Court may not be especially sympathetic to uses of the body that it, and the majority of South Africans, find morally repugnant.[1] Jordan concerned the constitutionality of legislative provisions outlawing prostitution and brothel-keeping. The applicants' challenge was based on the rights to equality, privacy, dignity, freedom and security of the person and freedom of trade. The majority found, without much difficulty, that '[t]he Act pursues an important and legitimate constitutional purpose, namely to outlaw commercial sex.'[2] Sachs and O'Regan JJ's dissenting judgment is, somewhat ironically, more troubled by how we construct the idea of control over the body. The body is not, so they tell us, > something to be commodified. Our Constitution requires that it be respected. We do not believe that s 20(1)*(a*A*)* can be said to be the cause of any limitation on the dignity of the prostitute. To the extent that the dignity of prostitutes is diminished, the diminution arises from the character of prostitution itself. The very nature of prostitution is the commodification of one's body. Even though we accept that prostitutes may have few alternatives to prostitution, the dignity of prostitutes is diminished not by s 20(1)*(a*A*)* but by their engaging in commercial sex work. The very character of the work they undertake devalues the respect that the Constitution regards as inherent in the human body.[3]

As one of the authors has noted elsewhere, all of us, Constitutional Court judges included, commodify our bodies by receiving money for our labour.[4] To invidiously distinguish prostitutes from Constitutional Court justices in terms of the stigma that attaches to their profession is to confuse commodifying with moralizing. And, it would seem to us, the Court is guilty of the latter.[5]

Jordan — when viewed through the lens of FC s 12(2)(b) — reminds us that the right to bodily autonomy is concerned — not with the welfare of the individual — but with the preservation of individual integrity. 'The value of autonomy', according to Ronald Dworkin,

[1] 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC), 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC)('Jordan').

[2] Ibid at para 15. The Jordan Court offers (in a footnote) four justifications for this assertion: (1) prostitution breeds crime; (2) prostitution exploits women; (3) prostitution leads to child trafficking; (4) prostitution promotes the spread of disease. Both the applicant and the amicus had argued that these ills would be better solved by decriminalisation. According to the majority, the legislature's justification for the criminalization of prostitution ought not to be second-guessed by the Court. Ibid at n11. Of course, the interrogation of the legislature's purpose in passing a law that impairs the exercise of a fundamental right is an essential feature of limitations analysis. See S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 34.8.

[3] Jordan (supra) at para 74.

[4] See S Woolman 'Freedom of Association' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, December 2003) § 43.3*(c)(x)*.

[5] See N Fritz 'Crossing Jordan: Constitutional Space for (Un)Civil Sex' (2004) 20 SAJHR 230.

> derives from the capacity it protects: the capacity to express one's own character — values, commitments, convictions and critical as well as experiential interests — in the life one leads. Recognizing an individual right of autonomy makes self-creation possible. It allows each of us to be responsible for shaping our lives according to our own coherent or incoherent — but in any case, distinctive — personality. It allows us to lead our own lives rather than be led along them, so that each of us can be, to the extent a scheme of rights can make this possible, what we have made of ourselves. We allow someone to choose death over radical amputation or a blood transfusion, if that is his informed wish, because we acknowledge his right to a life structured by his own values.[1]

However, as we all know, illness, age or mental incompetence may result in the wholesale absence of individual autonomy. In such instances, where the decision would have been a matter of autonomous choice, courts and other parties may be asked to intervene on the afflicted person's behalf. A court may be approached for an order that a mentally incompetent person undergo surgery to remove a kidney in order to save the life of a sibling.[2] A court may be approached for an order declaring that a hospital may legally terminate life support for a patient in a persistent vegetative state.[3] Where the court substitutes its own judgment for that of the 'afflicted' person, it must remain mindful that FC s 12(2)(b)'s right to bodily self-determination requires such substitution to emphasize the importance of the 'afflicted' person's bodily integrity:

> On the one hand, Anthony Bland is alive and the principle of the sanctity of life says that we should not deliberately allow him to die. On the other hand, Anthony Bland is an individual human being and the principle of self-determination says he should be allowed to choose for himself and that, if he is unable to express his choice, we should try our honest best to do what we think he would have chosen. We cannot disclaim this choice because to go on is as much a choice as to stop. Normally we would unquestioningly assume that anyone would wish to live rather than to die. But in the extraordinary case of Anthony Bland, we think it more likely that he would choose to put an end to the humiliation of his being and the distress of his family. Finally, Anthony Bland, is a person to whom respect is owed and we think that it would show greater respect to allow him to die and be mourned by his family than to keep him grotesquely alive.[4]

Even prior to the enactment of the Final Constitution, South African law already gave partial recognition to the right to control over the body in the context of

[1] R Dworkin Life's Dominion (1993) 225.
[2] Strunk v Strunk 445 SW 2d 145 (1969).
[3] Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] 1 All ER 821.
[4] Airedale NHS Trust v Bland [1993] 1 All ER 821, 854*d-g* (Hoffmann LJ). See also The South African Law Commission Discussion Paper 71: Euthanasia and the Artificial Preservation of Life (1997). The Commission concluded that an individual's clear expression of a wish not to have her life prolonged by medical means should be respected. The expression of such a wish could take the form of a direction (sometimes called a 'living will') that should one ever suffer from a terminal illness and as a result be unable to make or to communicate decisions concerning one's medical treatment or its cessation, any medical treatment that one receives should be discontinued and that only palliative care should be administered. Where a patient is in a vegetative state and unable to express this wish a court should possess the power to authorize the termination of life-prolonging procedures.

euthanasia. The court in Clarke v Hurst granted an application for an order allowing the discontinuance of artificial feeding of a plaintiff who was in a persistent vegetative state and who had signed a document expressing his wish that he not be kept alive by artificial means.[1] While this holding constitutes an important recognition of bodily autonomy, it is unclear how much further our courts would be willing to go with respect to the right to die.

The ability of a court to substitute its own judgment for that of an 'afflicted' person will often be controversial. In Hay v B, a doctor made an urgent application to the High Court for permission to give an infant a life-saving blood transfusion.[2] The parents had refused to allow the transfusion because, as Jehovah's Witnesses, their faith prohibited it. Despite FC s 15's guarantee of freedom of religion and the law's general acknowledgement of the parental right to act on behalf of a child, the Hay court held that the interests of the child were always paramount,[3] and that its right to life should be protected.[4] It granted the application.[5]

40.11 FC s 12(2)(c): Subjection to Medical and Scientific Experiments

FC s 12(2)(c) requires a litigant to prove two distinct elements.[6] First, she must demonstrate that the conduct complained of constitutes a medical or scientific experiment. Secondly, if it does, she must show that there was an absence of informed consent.

(a) Medical or scientific experiment

Although both the National Health Act and FC s 12(2) afford a high degree of protection to any act that infringes a person's bodily integrity, FC s 12(2)(c) still requires that one demonstrate that a given procedure falls within the definition of an 'experiment'. Such a showing is of particular importance given that FC s 12(2)(c) is the only non-derogable FC s 12(2) right — as determined by FC s 37 — and that its non-derogability may be taken into account when a court considers the 'nature of right' in terms of FC s 36.

[1] 1992 (4) SA 630 (D).

[2] 2003 (3) SA 492 (W).

[3] Ibid at 494I–495A relying on FC s 28(2). See, generally, A Friedman & A Pantazis 'Children's Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2004) § 47.10.

[4] Hay v B (supra) at 495C-D ('His right to life is an inviolable one. This is a right that is capable of protection. It is in the best interests of baby R that this right be protected. He will live as a human being, be part of a broader community and share in the experience of humanity. I am alive to the fundamental beliefs espoused by the first and second respondents. I respect their private religious beliefs. However, in the present matter, the evidence establishes that their beliefs negate the essential content of the right in question.') See also M Pieterse 'Life' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 39.4.

[5] In the pre-constitutional decision of Phillips v De Klerk a Jehovah's Witness himself refused a blood transfusion for injuries sustained in a car accident. Unreported decision of the TPD (March 1983) discussed in SA Strauss Doctor, Patient and the Law: A Solution of Practical Issues (3rd Edition, 1991) 29-36. The responsible doctor successfully obtained an urgent order permitting him to give the transfusion against the patient's wishes. After he had recovered, the patient approached the High Court for an order overturning the earlier decision. Esselen J granted the order, holding that a competent adult was entitled to refuse treatment that went against his religious convictions.

[6] Currie & Woolman (supra) at 39–47; Currie & De Waal (supra) at 310.

When then does an activity qualify as a medical or scientific experiment? Although we are easily outraged by the notorious experiments performed by Nazi doctors during WWII[1] and the equally repugnant investigations carried out by US army doctors on US soldiers during the Cold War — the Tuskegee syphilis experiment[2] and the testing of the effects of radiation[3] and hallucinogens[4] — such conduct amount to acts of barbarism dressed up in medical gowns. They also tend to deflect our attention way from the fact that, as the World Medical Association notes in its Declaration of Helsinki, '[m]edical progress is based on research which ultimately must rest in part on experimentation involving human subjects.'[5] FC s 12(2)(c) alerts us to threats to personal integrity that flow from everyday medical research and treatment.

[1] See G Annas & M Grodin (eds) The Nazi Doctors and the Nuremburg Code: Human Rights in Experimentation (1992) 97–99 ('Nazi Doctors'). The one positive result to come out of those experiments is the Nuremburg Code. The Code was created by the Nuremburg tribunal as part of the judgment convicting the Nazi doctors. The code stands as the first, and still the principle, international document condemning medical experimentation and enshrining informed consent.

[2] From 1932 to 1972, four hundred black men suffering from syphilis were deliberately left untreated so as to better understand the effects of the disease. The men did not know about the project, and many did not know that they had syphilis. They thought they were receiving standard medical care. See, generally, JH Jones Bad Blood: The Tuskegee Syphilis Experiment (2nd Edition, 1993); J Katz 'The Consent Principle of the Nuremburg Code: Its Significance Then and Now' in Annas & Grodin Nazi Doctors (supra) at 230.

[3] See Jaffee v United States 663 F2d 1226 (3rd Cir 1981)(The plaintiff and some of his fellow soldiers were forced to stand in the Nevada desert without any protection while a nuclear device was exploded nearby. The plaintiff was ultimately unsuccessful. A majority of the court held that soldiers could not sue the government for injuries suffered 'in the course of activity incident to service'. The dissenting judges characterized the incident as a serious violation of internationally established human rights and that no law should allow the government to evade liability for such violations.) See also G Annas 'The Nuremburg Code in US Courts: Ethics versus Expediency' in Annas & Grodin Nazi Doctors (supra) at 209. An even more disturbing experiment occurred in Cincinnati between 1960 and 1971. Eighty-eight cancer patients were subjected to radiation treatment as part of research for the military. The patients were not told that they were part of an experiment or of the deleterious effects of the procedure. The treatment shortened all of their lives. When the experiment eventually came to light, the families of the victims instituted a class action suit against the hospital. See In re Cincinnati Radiation Litigation 874 F. Supp. 796 (SD Ohio 1995)(District Court accepted the plaintiffs contention that they had a right to bodily integrity and that the experiments potentially violated that right.) See also M Hawk 'The Kingdom of Ends': In Re Cincinatti Radiation Litigation and the Right to Bodily Integrity' (1995) 45 Case Western Law Review 977.

[4] The infamous MKULTRA project began in 1953. It involved 200 researchers at 80 institutions. The researchers would administer drugs, including LSD, to members of the armed forces to try to counter the 'brainwashing techniques' used against America soldiers in the Korean War. At least two people died during these experiments and many suffered from severe mental and physical illness as a result. When this project came to light, a freedom of information suit was filed to discover the names of the participating institutions. See Central Intelligence Agency v Sims 471 US 159 (1984). See also United States v Stanley 107 SCt 3054 (1987)(Stanley had volunteered to test protective clothing for chemical warfare. During the tests he was secretly given LSD. The hallucinations caused by the LSD led to his divorce and eventual discharge from the army. Stanley sued the army for compensation. In what Annas has described as an 'extraordinarily technical and abstract decision', Justice Scalia held that to allow Stanley to sue would be an unjustifiable intrusion into 'military discipline and decision-making'. See also Annas (supra) at 212–15. Justice O'Connor, in a strongly worded dissent, argued that the project was so deplorable and so far outside the bounds of the 'military mission' that the US Constitution, read with the Nuremburg Code, necessitated compensation. Ibid.

[5] Preamble to the Declaration of Helsinki (2000) WMA 52nd Assembly, available at www.wma.net/e/policy/17-c_e.html (accessed on 15 March 2006).

Most ethical guidelines for medical research draw a distinction between 'therapeutic' or 'clinical' research where the main aim is treating or diagnosing a patient, and 'non-therapeutic' research where the goal is 'purely scientific'. The Declaration of Helsinki only requires full informed consent for 'non-therapeutic' research. In the context of clinical research, physicians are given almost complete discretion to decide when consent is necessary.[1] This grant of discretion is justified on the grounds that doctors know best what is in the patient's interest. (As we shall see, the South African Medical Research Council takes a somewhat stricter line.)

In X v Denmark, medical professionals tested the fine line between experimentation and treatment.[2] The European Commission for Human Rights had to decide whether a doctor's use of a new model of pincers in an accepted procedure for sterilization amounted to an experiment. The dispute arose because subsequent to the sterilization operation the woman operated upon fell pregnant. The Commission found that a standard sterilization procedure could not be classified as experimentation and that the use of the new pincers did not alter this conclusion.[3]

In this instance, South African law may be ahead of international scientific conventions. Our law does away with the sometimes illusory distinction[4] between

[1] The following provisos apply to clinical research: 'In the treatment of the sick person, the physician must be free to use a new diagnostic and therapeutic measure, if in his or her judgment it offers hope of saving life, re-establishing health or alleviating suffering.' Part II, art 1. 'The potential benefits, hazards and discomfort of a new method should be weighed against the advantages of the best current diagnostic and therapeutic methods.' Part II, art 2.

[2] X v Denmark Application Number 9974/82 (1983) 32 Decisions and Reports 282. See N Jawayickrama The Judicial Application of Human Rights Law: National, Regional and International Jurisprudence (2002) 351-352 (For a discussion of X v Denmark.)

[3] The Medical Research Council offers the following 'rule of thumb' for distinguishing between clinical practice and research: 'consider the 'intent' of the clinician — if the intent is to apply information to others, or to present it at a scientific meeting, or submit it for publication or for a higher qualification — in other words, to contribute to generalisable knowledge — this is research.' Medical Research Council Guidelines on Ethics for Medical Research: General Principles (4th Edition, 2002) available at http://www.sahealthinfo.org/ethics/ethicsbook1.pdf (accessed on 14 August 2006)('MRC Guidelines') 2.4.1.3.

[4] Mason Meier criticizes this distinction specifically with reference to HIV experiments in developing countries conducted by multinational pharmaceutical companies: 'investigators see these trials as research, whose purpose is to provide generalizable knowledge that may help others. On the other hand, most individuals suffering with AIDS see these trials as therapy, whose primary purpose is to benefit them.' B Mason Meier 'International Protection of Persons Undergoing Medical Experimentation: Protecting the Right to Informed Consent' (2002) 20 Berkeley Journal of International Law 513, 537. This difference in perspective allows physicians to > artificially create less stringent informed consent requirements simply by labelling an activity 'therapeutic.' This 'therapeutic illusion' permits physicians to use non-consensual subjects under the superficial guise that the research would, in some undefined sense, benefit the subject or those with similar characteristics.

Ibid at 537–38 (footnotes omitted). A related problem is that researchers often select under-developed communities to conduct their research specifically because of the lower level of knowledge and the lack of treatment alternatives. The Medical Research Council requires researchers to prove the necessity of conducting the research in the vulnerable community and to prove some benefit to the community from the study. See MRC Guidelines (supra) at 7.1.3.8.

therapeutic conduct and non-therapeutic conduct by requiring all medical interventions to be subject to the same degree of informed consent. FC s 12(2)'s implicit distinction between 'normal' therapeutic medical interventions and medical experiments continues to possess meaningful content because the basic law ultimately determines the validity of ordinary law. It may well be the case that the standard of informed consent for 'all' medical interventions — experimental or not — is far too low. If that is so, then FC s 12(2)(c) can be used to raise the bar with respect to experiments. Or the standard may only be too low with regard to experimentation. In all such instances, FC s 12(2)(c) retains its purchase.[1] We would therefore agree with Van Wyk that 'experiment' in FC s 12(2)(c) should be read to include all forms of research,[2] therapeutic and non-therapeutic,[3] that in some way invade the bodily integrity of the subject.[4]

FC s 12(2)(c) also refers to 'scientific' experiments. Tests that may be covered by this term include placing people under extremely stressful conditions in order to measure their response.[5] As a result, some academics argue that FC s 12(2)(c)

[1] Van Wyk contends that 'experiment' in FC s 12(2)(c) should be read to include all forms of research, therapeutic and non-therapeutic, that invade the bodily integrity of the subject. Were that so, MRC Guidelines (supra) at 2.1.2 and 2.1.3 would fail van Wyk's test: 'Research is a systematic investigation, including research development, testing and evaluation designed to develop or contribute to generalisable knowledge. Any activity aimed at obtaining knowledge affecting a person in any way, and which is additional to ordinary clinical practice, is to be regarded as research.' Van Wyk (supra) at 17–18. However, Van Oosten argues that 'experiment' should include only non-therapeutic treatment that includes some risk. P van Oosten 'The Law and Ethics of Information and Consent in Medical Research' (2000) 63 THRHR 5. See also S Strauss 'Clinical Trials Involving Mental Patients: Some Legal and Ethical Issues' (1998) 1 South African Practice Management 20 (FC s 12(2)(c) only proscribes 'purely experimental' or non-therapeutic procedures.) The authors differ on this point. Stu Woolman acknowledges that his disability sometimes requires his physicians to employ non-standard modes of treatment. He is alive because of such treatment, but would be loath to describe his doctor's ministrations as experiments. Michael Bishop prefers to cast the net of experimentation as wide as possible to ensure maximum patient protection against medical abuse and neglect.

[2] A decent definition of research is offered in the MRC Guidelines (supra) at 2.1.2 and 2.1.3: 'Research is a systematic investigation, including research development, testing and evaluation designed to develop or contribute to generalisable knowledge. Any activity aimed at obtaining knowledge affecting a person in any way, and which is additional to ordinary clinical practice, is to be regarded as research.'

[3] Van Wyk (supra) at 17–18 (Argues that there are three possible interpretations of 'experiment': a) any research; b) only non-therapeutic research; and c) only research that amounts to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment. She argues that both a literal reading and a value based interpretation of FC s 12(2)(c) point to the first possibility.) But see Van Oosten (supra)(Argues that 'experiment' should include only non-therapeutic treatment that includes some risk); S Strauss 'Clinical Trials Involving Mental Patients: Some Legal and Ethical Issues' (1998) 1 South African Practice Management 20 (FC s 12(2)(c) only proscribes 'purely experimental' or non-therapeutic procedures.)

[4] There are some forms of research, for example testing samples that were taken in the course of ordinary medical practice or compiling data from existing records, that involve no separate interference with the subject and therefore no invasion of their integrity. These would not be prohibited by FC s 12(2)(c). See Van Oosten (supra) at 16.

[5] The two best-known examples of such social experimentation are the Milgram Experiment and the Stanford Prison Experiment. The Milgram Experiment tested how individual participants reacted to commands to inflict what the individual participant believed to be increasingly powerful electrical shocks on another. However, the other participant in the experiment was an actor and no shocks were inflicted. The majority of participants obeyed commands to inflict the maximum possible shock. See S Milgram requires the state to impose the same degree of care and the same degree of consent as is demanded for medical experiments. For example, welfare activists in the United States challenged a state rule that denied additional assistance to parents who conceived children while on welfare.[1] They contended that the rule constituted a form of experimentation designed to determine whether welfare recipients would alter their behaviour in response to particular kinds of incentives. Such a reading is not only strained — it is unworkable. All laws — from tax regulations to traffic violations — constitute forms of social control designed to constrain behaviour. If the state alters its policy — and the law — in response to the behaviour of the citizenry, then all law becomes an ongoing experiment. That would make all law subject to FC s 12(2)(c). The drafters of the Final Constitution could not have possibly imagined that all South African law would be so subject and that the implementation of each law would require the informed consent of each member of our polity.

(b) Informed consent

Informed consent provides both substantive and procedural protection to subjects of experimentation.[2] It ensures that subjects are treated with dignity[3] and that they retain the capacity to make decisions that may be contrary to the desire or the interests of the persons offering them a form of therapeutic treatment.[4]

Obedience to Authority; An Experimental View (1974). The Stanford Prison Experiment tested the reaction of a group of volunteers placed in a mock 'prison' and then separated into 'guards' and 'prisoners'. The guards became increasingly violent and the prisoners progressively more emotionally disturbed. The experiment, initially planned for two weeks, ended after six days because of the terrible state of the 'mock' prison conditions and its inhabitants. See C Haney, WC Banks & PG Zimbardo 'Interpersonal Dynamics in a Simulated Prison' (1973) 1 International Journal of Criminology and Penology 69. Both experiments press the envelope of what we might consider constitutionally-protected experiments in terms of FC s 12(2)(c). However, it is not the participants lack of knowledge about the experiment that could result in the constitutional impairment. The gold standard of double-blind, placebo-controlled experimentation relies upon participant and doctor ignorance. An argument could be made in which such experiments counted as impairments of FC s 12(2)(c), but were deemed justifiable — in terms of the MRC Guidelines — under FC s 36.

[1] CK v Shalala 883 F Supp 991 (DNJ 1995)(Claim failed on the basis that the law — even if characterized as an experiment — did not pose a danger to the plaintiffs' well-being.)

[2] Mason Meier (supra) at 515.

[3] According to Jonas 'only genuine authenticity of volunteering can possibly redeem the condition of thinghood to which the subject submits.' H Jonas 'Philosophical Reflections on Experimenting with Human Subjects' (1969) 98 Daedalus 219, 240 as cited in Mason Meier (supra) at 515. Recent MRC Guidelines (supra) amplify these two basic principles: (1) 'autonomy (respect for the person — a notion of human dignity); (2) beneficence (benefit to the research participant); (3) non-maleficence (absence of harm to the research participant); (4) justice (notably distributive justice — equal distribution of risks and benefits between communities)'. No one of these four principles has priority over another. Application of the MRC guidelines requires researchers and ethics to exercise good judgment. Guideline 1.3.1. FC s 12(2)(c) can embrace these four principles but will ultimately privilege autonomy as the basis of informed consent as the most central principle.

[4] See R Delgado & H Leskovac 'Informed Consent in Human Experimentation: Bridging the Gap Between Ethical Thought and Current Practice' (1986) 34 UCLA L Rev 67, 91; E Gordon 'Multiculturalism in Medical Decision-making: The Notion of Informed Waiver' (1996) 23 Fordham Urban LJ 1321, 1328 as cited in Mason Meier (supra) at 515.

As we have already noted, a substantial body of law already outlines the content of informed consent. The most recent contribution to this body of law is the National Health Act ('NHA').[1] According to the NHA, consent is only 'informed' if the health care user, at the time of consent, possesses the following forms of knowledge:

(a) her own health status, except in circumstances where there is substantial evidence that the disclosure of the user's health status would be contrary to her best interests;
(b) the range of diagnostic procedures and treatment options generally available;
(c) the benefits, risks, costs and consequences generally associated with each option; and
(d) her right to refuse health services and the implications, risks, obligations of such refusal.[2]

Informed consent does not merely require that the patient be informed of the salient risks and options but that he 'appreciates and understands what the . . . purpose of the [experiment] is'.[3] Furthermore, information alone is not sufficient if the person is unable to act meaningfully and freely on that information.[4] In C v Minister of Correctional Services, a prisoner's privacy suit succeeded because the state had permitted an HIV test to be taken without his informed consent.[5] The

[1] Act 61 of 2003.

[2] NHA s 7(1)(3) read with NHA s 6(1). This knowledge should be given to the user in a language that she understands and in a manner appropriate for her level of literacy. NHA s 6(2). For more detail on exactly what information a practitioner or an experimenter must be provide, see van Oosten (supra) at 27–28.

[3] C v Minister of Correctional Services 1996 (4) SA 292 (C). See also Christian Lawyers Association v Minster of Health & Others 2005 (1) SA 509, 516F–517B (T), 2004 (10) BCLR 1086 (T)('Christian Lawyers II')(The Court cited with approval the dictum of Innes CJ in Waring & Gillow Ltd v Sherborne 1904 TS 340, 344 that informed consent requires 'that the risk was known, that it was realised, and that it was voluntarily undertaken. Knowledge, appreciation, consent — these are the essential elements; but knowledge does not invariably imply appreciation, and both together are not necessarily equivalent to consent.' Mojapelo J went on to outline the meaning of each of these requirements:

> The requirement of 'knowledge' means that the woman who consents to the termination of a pregnancy must have full knowledge 'of the nature and extent of the harm or risk'.
>
> The requirement of 'appreciation' implies more than mere knowledge. The woman who gives consent to the termination of her pregnancy 'must also comprehend and understand the nature and extent of the harm or risk'. The last requirement of 'consent' means that the woman must 'in fact subjectively consent' to the harm or risk associated with the termination of her pregnancy and her consent 'must be comprehensive 'in that it must 'extend to the entire transaction, inclusive of its consequences'.' (citations omitted).)

Ibid at 515F-516B.

[4] See Van Oosten (supra) at 29 (Consent must not only be informed but also free and voluntary, clear and unequivocal, comprehensive and revocable.) The right to revoke consent at any time is central to any construction of informed consent. Unfortunately, financial inducements to participate in experiments tend to attract disproportionately larger percentage of poorer subjects. Poverty acts a powerful incentive to consent to activities for many participants. See MRC Guidelines (supra) at 9.13 (Specifically limits the payment of research participants.)

[5] The court considered the Department's compliance with pre-determined departmental regulations defining informed consent. However, the principles articulated by the High Court reflect generally accepted practice regarding HIV testing. C v Minister of Correctional Services (supra) at 301D.

prisoner had twice been informed that the test was for HIV and other sexually transmitted diseases and that he had the right to refuse. Despite these efforts, the court found that the prisoner had still not been given informed consent because (a) the information had not been divulged in private or individually and (b) the prisoner had not been given sufficient time to consider whether to refuse the test.[1] Similarly, if a person is given the opportunity to participate in a trial for an HIV treatment, but is not offered alternative means of treatment, then the duress that attends such a decision makes it difficult to say that she has given informed consent. That said, we do not, as yet, possess adequate medical responses to many illnesses. In such instances, the duress that attends consent may be preferred to the absence of experimental protocols that offer some possibility of a cure.

Similarly vexed questions of duress and consent attend the question of whether a doctor can withhold information from a patient regarding a potential risk if the doctor knows that the patient is likely to refuse what the doctor considers the best course of treatment?[2] Ackermann J, writing for a full bench of the Cape High Court in Castell v De Greef, held that the doctor, no matter how well-motivated, was not entitled to do so:

> It is clearly for the patient to decide whether he or she wishes to undergo the operation, in the exercise of the patient's fundamental right to self-determination. A woman may be informed by her physician that the only way of avoiding death by cancer is to undergo a radical mastectomy. This advice may reflect universal medical opinion and may be, in addition, factually correct. Yet, to the knowledge of her physician, the patient is, and has consistently been, implacably opposed to the mutilation of her body and would choose death before the mastectomy. I cannot conceive how the 'best interests of the patient' (as seen through the eyes of her physician or the entire medical profession, for that matter) could justify a mastectomy or any other life-saving procedure which entailed a high risk of the patient losing a breast. Even if the risk of breast-loss were insignificant, a life-saving operation which entailed such risk would be wrongful if the surgeon refrains from drawing the risk to his patient's attention, well knowing that she would refuse consent if informed of the risk. It is, in principle, wholly irrelevant that her attitude is, in the eyes of the entire medical profession, grossly unreasonable, because her rights of bodily integrity and autonomous moral agency entitle her to refuse medical treatment. It would, in my view, be equally irrelevant that the medical profession was of the unanimous view that, under these circumstances, it was the duty of the surgeon to refrain from bringing the risk to his patient's attention.[3]

[1] C v Minister of Correctional Services (supra) at 304C–E.

[2] See I Currie & J de Waal The Bill of Rights Handbook (5th Edition, 2005) 310; Van Oosten (supra) at 24; I Currie & S Woolman 'Freedom & Security of the Person' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) 39.6*(d)*(ii).

[3] 1994 (4) SA 408 (C)('Castell'). It is worth comparing this pronouncement by Ackermann J with his equally expansive construction of liberty in Ferreira. The correctness of Castell was questioned by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Broude v McIntosh 1998 (3) SA 60 (SCA). Although it did not overrule Castell, the Broude court worried that a 'surgical intervention of a medical practitioner whose sole object is to alleviate the pain or discomfort of the patient, and who has explained to the patient what is intended to

The Castell Court determined that for informed consent to exist a patient must be informed of all 'material' risks. A risk is material if:

(a) a reasonable person in the patient's position, if warned of the risk, would be likely to attach significance to it; or
(b) the medical practitioner is or should reasonably be aware that the particular patient, if warned of the risk, would be likely to attach significance to it.[1]

This decision represents a welcome shift from medical paternalism to patient autonomy.[2] This new standard for informed consent — based upon the notion of the reasonable patient and not the reasonable doctor — seems to us to be consistent with FC s 12(2)'s commitment to bodily integrity.

(c) Persons unable to consent

But what of those who are unable to consent? Can one ever perform experiments on them?[3] Both Van Oosten and Strauss have argued that FC s 12(2)(c) specifically refers to the subject's own consent. Assume then that children and the mentally handicapped cannot be experimented upon without limiting FC s 12(2)(c).[4] The question then would be whether any law that permits such experimentation can be justified in terms of FC s 36. The limitations analysis will turn largely upon whether the experiment is therapeutic or non-therapeutic. It will be much easier to justify research that has immediate potential benefit for the patient than research that has no or only remote possible benefits in the future.

However, the banning of all non-therapeutic research on a class of people will inevitably turn them into 'research orphans'.[5] Moreover, such a bright-line rule would preclude meaningful research into specific childhood diseases or mental disorders. Thus, experimentation that may be beneficial to the class to which the subject belongs — if not the subject herself — could be a justifiable limitation under FC s 36. The therapeutic value of the research and the level of risk be done and obtained the patient's consent to it being done, should be pejoratively described and juristically characterized as an assault simply because the practitioner omitted to mention the existence of a risk considered to be material enough to have warranted disclosure and which, if disclosed, might have resulted in the patient withholding consent.' Ibid at 67J-68A.

[1] Castell (supra) at 428 F–G.

[2] See Van Oosten (supra) at 24 ('[T]he undeniable inherent potential of abuse of research subjects renders a stricter adherence to the informed consent requirement necessary in medical research than standard practice.')

[3] For a summary of classes of person who may not be able to consent, and a brief exposition of the law regulating consent on their behalf, see Van Oosten (supra) at 15–21.

[4] In the context of children, it will likely only be those children who are in fact unable to provide informed consent, rather than those who fall under a set age, that will not be permitted to engage in experimentation. See Christian Lawyers II (supra)(Court upheld legislation permitting girls under the age of 18 to receive abortions. The court accepted that it was the subjective capacity of the child to provide informed consent, not her age, that was necessary to allow an abortion.)

[5] J Burchell 'Non-Therapeutic Medical Research on Children' (1978) 95 SALJ 193, 196.

involved will be important, but not decisive factors in determining the justifiability of any such experimentation. Legislation already permits proxy consent for therapeutic interventions on children[1] and the mentally ill.[2] National ethical guidelines exist for conducting non-therapeutic research on those unable to consent.[3] It should be borne in mind that ultimately, it is the courts, not medical research boards, that have the final say on the constitutionality of any medical research.

The apparent justifiability of experiments on persons who cannot consent is still subject to one important proviso. The specific refusal of the incompetent — no matter what the grounds — must always be honoured.[4]

[1] Section 39(4) of the Child Care Act distinguishes between various classes of children. Act 74 of 1983. Children under 14 cannot consent to any form of medical treatment and they can be treated only with proxy consent from their legal guardian. Children aged between 14 and 18 may consent to treatment but not to operations. Only 18-year-olds may consent to any form of medical intervention. The treatment can include experimentation.

[2] The new Mental Health Act allows interventions if consent is granted by a spouse, next of kin, partner, associate, parent or guardian. Act 17 2002 ('MHA'). It does not, however, seem to allow any non-therapeutic experimentation on mentally ill patients. People may be submitted to 'involuntary care, treatment and rehabilitation' which 'means the provision of health interventions to people incapable of making informed decisions due to their mental health status and who refuse health intervention but require such services for their own protection or for the protection of others'. MHA s 1. No provision of the Act allows experimentation.

[3] South African Medical Research Council Guidelines on Ethics for Medical Research (1993). The guidelines allow therapeutic research if there exists only 'minimal risk'. 'Minimal risk' is defined as a small chance of a trivial reaction or an extremely remote possibility of serious harm or death. Non-therapeutic research (and therapeutic research on incompetent subjects) may be conducted only if there is a 'negligible risk'. Negligible risk is defined as risk 'equal to the probability and magnitude of physical or psychological harm that is normally encountered in the daily lives of people in a stable society or in the routine performance of physical or psychological examination or test'. Both Van Wyk and Van Oosten claim that the Guideline's definition of minimal risk is not in line with international practice. See Van Wyk (supra) at 11 and 22; Van Oosten at 12.

[4] MRC Guidelines (supra) at 5.1 (Research can only be conducted on an incompetent with their assent. 'Assent implies a willingness that does not necessarily carry the greater understanding and legal implications that are generally understood by "consent".')

41 Freedom of Religion, Belief and Opinion

Paul Farlam

41.1 Introduction 41-1
(a) Religion and the state before 1994 41-1
(b) Provisions in the Final Constitution protecting religion . . 41-3
(c) The origins and development of the religion clause. 41-5
(i) The drafting of s 15 of the Final Constitution 41-5
(ii) The drafting of s 14 of the Interim Constitution. . . 41-8
(iii) Relevant clauses in international and foreign law . 41-10
41.2 Freedom of religion, belief and opinion: s 15(1) 41-11
(a) The importance of the right. 41-11
(b) Notable features of the clause 41-12
(i) The protection of non-religious thoughts and beliefs 41-12
(ii) The protection of 'opinion'. 41-14
(iii) The absence of any express mention of religious practice 41-15
(iv) The lack of an 'establishment clause' 41-17
(c) The core of the right to religious freedom 41-18
(d) The penumbra of the right: the protection against subtle non-quantifiable coercion 41-23
(e) The penumbra of the right: religious equality? 41-29
41.3 The stages of the freedom of religion enquiry 41-30
(a) Sincerity of belief 41-31
(b) Sufficient burden. 41-33
(c) The problem of doctrinal entanglement. 41-40

41.4 Limitations on the right to freedom of religion. 41-41
(a) Reasonable and justifiable limitations on religious practice 41-42
(b) Infringements by neutral, generally applicable, measures . 41-44
(c) Conflicts with other constitutional rights 41-46
(d) Waiver of the right to religious freedom 41-49
41.5 Religious observances at state or state-aided Institutions: s 15(2) 41-51
41.6 Recognition of religious marriages and systems of Family law: s 15(3) 41-53

41.1 Introduction

(a) Religion and the state before 1994

Prior to 1994, Christianity was South Africa's unofficial state religion. The pre-1994 Constitutions[1] and a host of legal rules expressly endorsed the tenets of the Christian faith.[2]

The promotion of Christianity by the state was accompanied by, and contributed to, the marginalisation of other religious communities. The Christian bias of the legal system caused adherents of other faiths, significant prejudice in respect of maintenance and other spousal benefits,[3] divorce,[4] succession,[5] and the law of evidence.[6]

However, even the articulation of Christian belief was not unfettered under Apartheid. The brand of Christianity favoured by the state reflected a theology that advocated obedience to the government of the day. As a result, Christian groups and leaders that regarded their faith as requiring opposition to tyrannical

[1] Section 2 of the Republic of South Africa Constitution Act 110 of 1983 ('Tricameral Constitution') and s 2 of the Republic of South Africa Constitution Act 32 of 1961 both stated that 'The people of the Republic of South Africa acknowledge the sovereignty and guidance of Almighty God'. The Preamble to the Tricameral Constitution contained a pledge to 'uphold Christian values and civilized norms' and, like the 1961 Constitution, included a statement to the effect that the South African people 'are conscious of our responsibility towards God and man'. At some periods prior to Union in 1910, there were even established churches (the Nederduitsch Hervormde Kerk or the Nederduitse Gereformeerde Kerk) in the Zuid-Afrikaansche Republiek and the Free State.

[2] These legal rules included: (1) non-recognition of Muslim and Hindu marriages on the basis that, being potentially polygamous, they were 'contrary to public policy'; Ismail v Ismail 1983 (1) SA 1006, 1025F-G (A); see also Esop v Union Government (Minister of Interior) 1913 CPD 133 and F Cachalia 'Citizenship, Muslim Family Law and a Future South African Constitution: A Preliminary Enquiry' (1993) 56 THRHR 392, 398-9; (2) rules relating to 'Christian national education' for white students in public schools; see S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg 1997 (4) SA 1176 (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC) at para 149 (Sachs J) ('Solberg'); (3) censorship provisions; see the Publications and Entertainment Act 26 of 1963 and the Publications Act 42 of 1974; see too Publication Control Board v Gallo (Africa) Ltd 1975 (3) SA 665 (A) ('Publication Control Board'); Human & Rousseau Uitgewers (Edms) Bpk v Snyman NO 1978 (3) SA 836, 849 (T); (4) the crime of blasphemy (an offence based only on the Christian concept of God); R v Webb 1934 AD 493, 496; Publication Control Board (supra) at 671H; (5) laws restricting shopping, sporting and entertainment events on Sundays; J D van der Vyver 'Religion' in W A Joubert (founding ed) The Law of South Africa (Vol 23, First Reissue) at para 239; (6) the public holidays 'with a religious base' (Ascension Day and the Day of the Vow, as well as Good Friday and Christmas Day); and (7) penalties exacted on gays and lesbians. For a judicial survey of State bias in the pre-constitutional period, see Solberg (supra) at paras 149-153 (Sachs J). For earlier discussions of the relationship between church and State in South Africa (with specific reference to the position under the 1961 Constitution), see J G Wulfsohn 'Separation of Church and State in South African Law' (1964) 81 SALJ 90 and 226, and B v D van Niekerk ' "Render unto Caesar . . .": A study of the Sunday Observance Laws in South Africa' (1969) 86 SALJ 27.

[3] Ismail v Ismail (supra).

[4] Cf Ryland v Edros 1997 (2) SA 690 (C), 1997 (10) BCLR 77 (C).

[5] Seedat's Executors v The Master (Natal) 1917 AD 302; Kalla and Another v The Master and Others 1995 (1) SA 261 (T), 1994 (4) BCLR 79 (T).

[6] S v Johardien 1990 (1) SA 1026 (C).

and unjust rulers often suffered government reprisals.[1]

Believers of other faiths who felt compelled to voice their opposition to government policies naturally found the state less than sympathetic[2]. Those who subscribed to secular ideologies such as communism were actively sought out and penalised.[3] In pre-1994 South Africa, religious freedom was certainly less severely impaired than in countries with regimes hostile to religion. But the post-1994 constitutional entrenchment of freedom of religion, conscience, thought and belief marks a clear break with the repressive and the biased policies of the past.

[1] The Christian Institute, headed by Dr. Beyers Naude, was banned in 1977 under s 4 of the Internal Security Act, Act 44 of 1950, after earlier having been declared an 'affected organisation' in 1975 under s 2 of the Affected Organisations Act, Act 31 of 1974. See the report of the mission sent to South Africa in 1987 by the International Commission of Jurists; G Bindman (ed) South Africa: Human Rights and the Rule of Law (1988) 55-7; A S Mathews Freedom, State Security and the Rule of Law (1986); J Van der Vyver (supra) at para 232. A prominent church leader like Beyers Naude (a former moderator of NGK in the Transvaal and later Secretary-General of the South African Council of Churches) was himself banned. Archbishop Desmond Tutu had his passport revoked in 1981 (when he was a Bishop in the Anglican Church); Tutu v Minister of Internal Affairs 1982 (4) SA 571 (T). Allan Boesak had his passport withdrawn in 1985 (when he was a minister in the NG Sendingkerk, as well as President of the World Alliance of Reformed Churches); Boesak v Minister of Home Affairs 1987 (3) SA 665 (C). Frank Chikane (Beyers Naude's successor as Secretary-General of the SACC, as well as general secretary of the Institute of Contextual Theology) was denied entry to South West Africa when invited in his clerical capacity by the Council of Churches in Namibia; Cabinet for the Territory of South West Africa v Chikane 1989 (1) SA 349 (A). Another example of an infringement of freedom of Christian belief under Nationalist rule was the infamous 'church clause' in the Blacks (Urban Areas) Consolidation Act, Section 9(7) of Act 25 of 1945. The clause empowered the relevant government minister, with the consent of the local urban authority, to prohibit the attendance of black people at church services in areas that had not been zoned for occupation by black people under the Group Areas Act, Act 36 of 1966. See D V Cowen The Foundations of Freedom (1961) 56, 63; J D van der Vyver (supra) at para 232. The passing of this Act, which was openly disobeyed by a number of denominations, had a tragic postlude. The Anglican Archbishop of Cape Town, Geoffrey Clayton, died of a heart attack after signing a letter to the Prime Minister, advising that he could not instruct his church to obey it. See A Paton Apartheid and the Archbishop: The life and times of Geoffrey Clayton, Archbishop of Cape Town (1973).

Many Christian and other religious organisations in South Africa and elsewhere (including the World Alliance of Reformed Churches) declared apartheid to be a heresy. A particularly strong statement to this effect was The Kairos Document, signed largely by left-wing Christians and Muslims. Another notable denunciation of apartheid was 'The Koinonia Declaration', produced by a group of Afrikaner clergy. See, generally, J W De Gruchy The Church Struggle in South Africa, and J W De Gruchy & C Villa-Vicencio (eds) Apartheid is a Heresy. The World Council of Churches also denounced racial discrimination as being contrary to Christian teachings in 1960. See Cape Times 15 December 1960; Cowen (supra) at 63. The South African Council of Churches condemned apartheid as being inconsistent with Christian principles in 1968. See L Thompson A History of South Africa (1990) 204-5.

[2] The teachings of Mahatma Gandhi on Satyagraha — which drew inspiration from Hinduism — were developed in the context of opposition to the apartheid-style laws imposed on Indians in the Transvaal in the first decade of this century. For Gandhi's description of the origin of Satyagraha, see Shriman Narayan (ed) The Selected Works of Mahatma Gandhi (Vol 3, 1928) Chapters XII and XIII. See also Fatima Meer (ed) 'The South African Gandhi' in An Abstract of the Speeches and Writings of M K Gandhi 1893-1914 (2nd Edition, 1996).

[3] See, for example, the Suppression of Communism Act 44 of 1950; Kahn v Louw NO and Another 1951 (2) SA 194 (C); R v Sachs 1953 (1) SA 392 (A).

(b) Provisions in the Final Constitution protecting religion

The right to freedom of religion, belief and opinion — s 15 of the Final Constitution[1] — reads as follows:

> 15(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of conscience, religion, thought, belief and opinion.
>
> (2) Religious observances may be conducted at state or state-aided institutions, provided that —
>
> (a) those observances follow rules made by the appropriate public authorities;
> (b) they are conducted on an equitable basis; and
> (c) attendance at them is free and voluntary.
>
> (3) (a) this section does not prevent legislation recognising-
>
> (i) marriages concluded under any tradition, or a system of religious, personal or family law; or
> (ii) systems of personal and family law under any tradition, or adhered to by persons professing a particular religion.
>
> (b) Recognition in terms of paragraph (a) must be consistent with this section and the other provisions of the Constitution.

A number of other provisions in the Bill of Rights also affect religious belief. The most important is s 31's right to practise religion in a communal setting.[2] That provision reads as follows:

> 31(1) Persons belonging to a cultural, religious or linguistic community may not be denied the right, with other members of that community –
>
> (a) to enjoy their culture, practise their religion and use their language; and
> (b) to form, join and maintain cultural, religious and linguistic associations and other organs of civil society.
>
> (2) The rights in subsection (1) may not be exercised in a manner inconsistent with any provision of the Bill of Rights. [3]

There was no equivalent to s 31 in the Interim Constitution. Nor was there a community right in any proposed text of the Final Constitution prior to the second Constitution Bill. The insertion of s 31 was apparently a last-minute concession to the Freedom Front and was conceivably motivated by a desire to ensure compliance with Constitutional Principle XII.

The relationship between the rights in s 15 and s 31 is not entirely clear. In particular, it is not evident whether, in the absence of any reference to manifestation of religious practice in s 15(1), religious practice should be regarded as being protected in the group right rather than the individual freedom. The Constitutional Court has now clarified the nature of the relationship between the two rights. Section 15(1) protects the practices of religious sects, groups, associations, communities and institutions. As Ngcobo J wrote in Prince v President, Cape Law Society ('Prince II') [1]:

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 108 of 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC')

[2] See I Currie 'Minority Rights: Education, Culture and Language' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS5, 1999) Chapter 35.

[3] In the first certification decision, the Constitutional Court referred to s 31 as the provision which ensured the recognition and protection of the collective rights of self-determination mentioned in CP XII. See Ex parte Chairperson of the Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC) at para 220.

> ... [ss] 15(1) and 31(1)(a) complement one another. Section 31(1)(a) emphasises and protects the associational nature of cultural, religious and language rights. In the context of religion, it emphasises the protection to be given to members of communities united by religion to practise their religion.

Section 31, read with s 18, strengthens, rather than undermines, the force of the right to religious freedom enshrined in s 15(1).[2]

Another important provision in the Bill of Rights for the purposes of freedom of religion analysis is s 9, the right to equality. Subsection 9(3) provides that the state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone inter alia on the grounds of religion, conscience or belief. Subsection 9(4) expands the protection against unfair discrimination to the private sphere by stipulating that no person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection 3. It further requires that national legislation must be enacted to prevent or to prohibit unfair discrimination.[3] How s 9 both reinforces religious liberty and limits religious autonomy are subjects canvassed below.[4]

[1] 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC) at para 39.

[2] See S Woolman 'Association' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Sptiz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, 2003) Chapter 44. The Supreme Court of Appeal in Nkosi v Bührmann provision suggested that the internal limitation of the s 31 (found in s 31(2)) should be regarded as implicit in s 15(1), with the result that the s 15's right to practise religion must also be regarded as subordinate to the other rights in the Bill of Rights. 2002 (1) SA 372 (SCA) at para 43. That interpretation would not, however, appear to be warranted textually or be consistent with the Constitutional Court's decisions.

[3] This legislation has been enacted as the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000. Religion, conscience and belief are among the 'prohibited grounds' listed in s 1(1) thereof. In terms of s 6, 'discrimination', as defined in s 1(1), is forbidden on any of the prohibited grounds, if it is 'unfair'. The burden of proof in cases in which unfair discrimination has been alleged and the factors to be taken into account in determining unfair discrimination, are dealt with in ss 13 and 14 of the Act. See C Albertyn et al (eds) Introduction to the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act (Act 4 of 2000) 75-77.

[4] Other constitutional provisions which mention religion, but which are of little importance for the present chapter, are: s 6(5)(b)(ii) (which provides that a Pan South African Language Board established by national legislation, must promote and ensure respect for Arabic, Hebrew Sanskrit and other languages used for religious purposes in South Africa); s 35(2)(f)(iii) (which confers on all detained persons, including every sentenced prisoner, the right to communicate with and be visited by, that person's chosen religious counsellor); and Schedule 2, which provides for oaths or solemn affirmations by office bearers in the national and provincial spheres of government, with the oath concluding with the words 'So help me God', and s 29(4) (a clause in the section dealing with the right to 'Education', which allows state subsidies for private — and thus religious — educational institutions, and thus means that state subsidies for church schools or other educational institutions with a religious dimension or focus are constitutional).

As case law in foreign jurisdictions demonstrates, the manifestation of religion, conscience or belief can also implicate other rights that do not expressly refer to religion, such as the right to freedom of expression (s 16), the right to freedom of assembly (s 17) and the 'associational' or institutional nature of religion protected by the right to freedom of association (s 18).[1]

(c) The origins and development of the religion clause

(i) The drafting of s 15 of the Constitution

The wording of s 15 of the Constitution owes much to its predecessor. Section 14 of the Interim Constitution[2] reads:

> 14 (1) Every person shall have the right to freedom of conscience, religion, thought, belief and opinion, which shall include academic freedom in institutions of higher learning.
>
> (2) Without derogating from the generality of subsection (1), religious observances may be conducted at state or state-aided institutions under rules established by an appropriate authority for that purpose, provided that such religious observances are conducted on an equitable basis and attendance at them is free and voluntary.
>
> (3) Nothing in this Chapter shall preclude legislation recognising-
>
> (a) a system of personal and family law adhered to by persons professing a particular religion; and
>
> (b) the validity of marriages concluded under a system of religious law subject to specified procedures.'

The main differences between the freedom of religion, belief and opinion clauses in the Interim and Final Constitutions are: (1) the absence of a reference to academic freedom in subsection (1) of FC 15 (academic freedom is now protected under the right to freedom of expression); (2) the absence of the clause 'Without derogating from the generality of subsection (1)' at the beginning of subsection (2) of FC 15; (3) the fact that subsection (3) of FC 15 authorises legislation recognizing marriages concluded under any system of personal or family law, and not just religious law; and (4) and that FC 15(3) makes any legislation enacted in terms of that subsection susceptible to challenge under other provisions of the Constitution.

The changes to subsection (3) are potentially of substance. However, at least one commentator suggests that, even under IC s 14(3), legislation recognizing a system of personal or family law was required to be consistent with the other rights in the Bill of Rights.[1] The aforementioned amendments to subsections (1) and (2) are seemingly less significant. Academic freedom, for example, is more appropriately protected elsewhere in the Bill of Rights.[2]

[1] See Solberg (supra) at para 149 (Sachs J); L du Plessis & H Corder Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights 156. As regards s 18, the right to association, see S Woolman 'Association' (supra) at Chapter 44.

[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC').

Other differences between the Interim and Final Constitutions as far as religion is concerned are the inclusion in the Final Constitution of a right to religious community (s 31) and a change in the wording of the preamble.[3] As I have already noted, the inclusion of the group religious right in s 31 should only amplify the freedom protected in s 15. Substituting the invocation at the start of the Interim Constitution with the peroration in the Final Constitution should,

[1] D Basson South Africa's Interim Constitution: Text and Notes (1994) 27. The majority of writers, however, came to the opposite conclusion. See, for example, E Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where? Introducing the Interim Bill of Rights' (1994) 10 SAJHR 31, 45n44; F Cachalia et al Fundamental Rights in the New Constitution (1994) 52, 53; D Davis et al Fundamental Rights in the Constitution (1997) 107; J Sinclair The Law of Marriage (Vol I) 34.6.

[2] Academic freedom was presumably included in s 14(1) of the Interim Constitution because of a desire to protect freedom of thought, belief and opinion in institutions of higher learning, and to protect such institutions from being subjected to closures, direct interference or economic harassment on account of the beliefs and ideologies espoused there. The more natural home for academic freedom would, however, have been the right to freedom of expression (where it is now located), which even under the Interim Constitution protected the freedom of artistic creativity and scientific research.

It is nevertheless of interest to note that there has traditionally been a connection between freedom of religion and certain South African universities. A feature of the Acts establishing and regulating the English-medium universities and some of the Afrikaans-medium universities prior to November 2001 was the presence of a 'conscience clause'. See s 21 of the University of the Witwatersrand, Johannesburg (Private) Act 15 of 1959; s 17 of the University of Cape Town Act 38 of 1959; s 21 of the University of Natal (Private) Act 7 of 1960; s 21 of the University of Port Elizabeth Act 1 of 1964. This clause prohibited a test of religious belief being imposed on any person as a condition of his/her becoming or continuing to be a student, graduate, or member of the academic staff of the University, or of that person's holding any office or emolument or exercising any privilege. It also forbade any preference being given to, or advantage being withheld from, a person on the ground of his/her religious belief. Thus, even in the pre-1994 era, freedom from religious coercion and discrimination was a foundational tenet of a number of South African universities and an integral part of their character and composition.

The statutes containing the conscience clauses were repealed by the Higher Education Amendment Act 23 of 2001. The objects and strictures of the 'conscience clauses' are, however, still protected, by virtue of the right to freedom of religion, and the right to freedom from discrimination on the basis of religion, conscience and belief. The opening words to s 14(2) were unnecessary and, arguably, inappropriate.

The words '[w]ithout derogating from the generality of subsection (1)', which prefaced s 14(2), were probably intended to indicate that s14(2) was not to be used to build restrictions into the general s 14(1) right, but rather to be viewed as regulating a particular situation covered by that right. But that interpretation should in any event have been apparent from the context; so nothing is lost by its exclusion from s 15(2). In any event, s 14(2) was arguably a qualification of the s 14(1) rights (just as s 15(2) qualifies the s 15(1) right), rather than an example of the sort of religious freedom enshrined in subsection (1), as suggested by the prefatory clause.

[3] The Final Constitution, unlike the Interim Constitution, does not commence with the words 'In humble submission to Almighty God'. It does, in contrast with the Interim Constitution, conclude with the words 'May God protect our people. Nkosi Sikelel' iAfrika. Morena boloka setjhaba sa heso. God seën Suid-Afrika. God bless South Africa. Mudzimu fhatutshedza Afurika. Hosi katekisa Afrika'.

likewise, not have any substantive effect. The Constitutional Court's comments in relation to the meaning of the phrase 'In humble submission to Almighty God' in the Western Cape Constitution buttress this conclusion.[1]

The drafts of the text of s 15 of the Final Constitution reveal that there was seemingly little controversy among the members of the Constitutional Assembly or the panel of experts about the precise wording of subsections (1) and (2) of the right. The only change between the final approved text and the 'Working Draft of the New Constitution' distributed by the Constitutional Assembly on 22 November 1995 is the substitution of the words 'an appropriate authority' at the end of s 15(2)(a) with the phrase 'the appropriate public authorities'. The changes make it clear that rules for religious observances at state or state-aided institutions should conform to the principle of subsidiarity. That is, ideally such rules would be articulated and enforced by the body in closest proximity to the institution being regulated.[2]

The formulation of s 15(3) was apparently more contentious. The final wording of the clause showed every sign of having been drafted by committee. The Working Draft of 22 November 1995 included a subsection (3) that read as follows:

> The Constitution does not prevent legislation recognising the validity of marriages concluded under a system of religious law [or other recognised traditions], or a system of personal and family law adhered to by persons professing a particular religion to the extent that the system is consistent with the Bill of Rights.

By the fourth edition of the Working Draft of the New Constitution, disseminated on 25 March 1996, this provision was changed to read:

> 3 (a) This section does not prevent legislation recognising —
>
> (i) marriages concluded under any tradition or a system of religious, personal or family law; and
>
> (ii) systems of personal and family law under any tradition or adhered to by persons professing a particular religion.
>
> (b) The legislation referred to in paragraph (a) must be consistent with the provisions of the Constitution.

[1] Ex parte Speaker of the Western Cape Provincial Legislature: In re Certification of the Constitution of the Western Cape 1997 (4) SA 795 (CC), 1997 (9) BCLR 1167 (CC) at para 28.

[2] The Fifth Edition of the Working Draft for the New Constitution, released on 15 April 1996, placed an asterisk next to the words 'state or state-aided', noting that these words should be 'revisited and consistency with the wording in the ['Education' clause] (once it is settled) considered'. There was, however, no change to that phrase.

The fifth edition of the Working Draft, dated 15 April 1996, reflected a further change to subsection (3)(b).[1] The wording of s 15(3)(b) was then changed a final time prior to the second version of the Constitutional Bill adopted by the Constitutional Assembly on 8 May 1996. The amendments were largely cosmetic. However, the new text did insert a requirement that the legislation contemplated by subsection 15(3)(a) be consistent not only with the Constitution but also 'this section' (ie, s 15). It is unclear what the drafters intended by stipulating that s 15 does not prevent legislation consistent with section as a whole. That would seem self-evident.[2]

(ii) The drafting of s 14 of the Interim Constitution

The Bill of Rights in the Interim Constitution was drafted by a Technical Committee appointed by the Negotiating Council (one tier of the Multi-Party Negotiating Process) between May and November 1993. This committee had a number of South African proposals for bills of rights to work from and also relied heavily on international human rights documents and Bills of Rights in

[1] It read: 'Marriages, or systems of personal and family law, recognised by legislation referred to in paragraph (a) must be consistent with the provisions of the Constitution.'

[2] The end-notes to the Fourth Working Draft of the New Constitution (of 25 March 1996), which reflected submissions from the public on the Working Draft published on 22 November 1995, indicate that a variety of submissions on the right to freedom of religion, belief and opinion were considered and rejected by the members of the Constitutional Assembly. For example —

(i) as regards subsection (1): individual members of the public requested that satanism be expressly excluded from freedom of religion; submissions were received for and against the legalisation of dagga for religious purposes (with over a thousand petitions being received from the Burning Spear Movement calling for the recognition of the rights of Rastafarians); an academic requested that the clause explicitly state that freedom of religion also includes the right to change religious allegiance, and the right to profess, practise and propagate the religion of one's choice (a clause along these lines appears in the Constitution of Botswana, section 11(1) whereof provides: 'Except with his own consent, no person shall be hindered in the enjoyment of his freedom of conscience, and for the purposes of this section the said freedom includes freedom of thought and of religion, freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others, and both in public and in private, to manifest and propagate his religion or belief in worship, teaching, practice and observance'. See also, s 13(1) of the Constitution of Lesotho of 1993. The Conscientious Objector Support Group proposed adding the words 'including the right to conscientious objection to military service' (by way of comparison, Article 4(3) of the German Basic Law reads: 'No one may be compelled against his conscience to render military service involving the use of arms. Details shall be regulated by federal statute';

(ii) concern was expressed, inter alia by the National Professional Teachers Association of South Africa, that subsection (2) was both too vague and too restrictive; and

(iii) various Muslim organizations objected to the requirement that legislation enacted in terms of subsection (3) be consistent with the Bill of Rights, on the basis that Muslims regard their personal law as divine, binding and absolute and this law cannot be altered or subjected to any national law. A clause along the lines of IC s 14(3) was proposed.

other countries.[1] The Technical Committee that drafted the Bill of Rights was also assisted in drafting the freedom of religion clause by a proposed clause submitted by the South African Chapter of the World Conference on Religion and Peace (WCRP-SA).[2]

According to two members of that Technical Committee, Professors Corder and Du Plessis, IC s 14(1) was understood to be in conformity with the first sub-clause of the WCRP-SA proposal.[3] The second sub-clause of the WCRP-SA proposal was addressed in IC s 14(3). That clause did not go as far as recognising religious communities' systems of family law. It merely authorises the legislature to do so.

Professors Du Plessis and Corder also note that '[d]uring the negotiations, it soon became clear that the negotiators had no intention whatsoever of using the Constitution and the Bill of Rights to erect walls to separate church and state'.[4] IC s 14(2) reflects this intention.

---

[1] Du Plessis & Corder (supra) at 25-33 and 46-48.

Among the indigenous human rights documents that provided the backdrop to individual rights provisions, such as the freedom of religion clause, in the Interim Constitution were the South African Law Commission's Interim Report on Group and Human Rights (1991), the ANC Bill of Rights in South Africa (1992), the Constitution for the State of KwaZulu-Natal (approved by the Legislative Assembly of KwaZulu in 1992) and the Charter for Social Justice (produced by a group of Western Cape human rights experts in 1992).

The Bill proposed by the Law Commission in its Interim Report included the following clause, as article 18 (headed 'Religious, linguistic and cultural rights'):

Everyone has the right, individually or in community with others, freely to practise the religion and culture and freely to use the language of his or her choice, so that there shall be no prejudice to or favouring of anyone on account of his or her religion, culture or language.

The Law Commission's proposal in its Final Report on Group and Human Rights of October 1994, was briefer, and more in line with formulations of the right in international human rights documents: 'Every person shall have the right to freedom of thought, conscience, religion and belief, and to manifest his or her religion or belief.'

The first two clauses of article 7 of the Charter for Social Justice (which was modelled in large part on s 2 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms) provided that:

Everyone has the following freedoms:

freedom of conscience and religion;

freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression including freedom of the press and other media of communication.

[2] Du Plessis & Corder (supra) at 155-157. The WCRP-SA's proposed clause read as follows:

1. All persons are entitled:
1.1 to freedom of conscience,
1.2 to profess, practise, and propagate any religion or no religion,
1.3 to change their religious allegiance;
2. Every religious community and/or member thereof shall enjoy the right:
2.1 to establish, maintain and manage religious institutions;
2.2 to have their particular system of family law recognized by the state;
2.3 to criticise and challenge all social and political structures and policies in terms of the teachings of their religion.

For a discussion of the WCRP-SA's proposed clause, see G Abraham 'Declaration on religious rights and responsibilities: A Catholic response' (1994) 111 SALJ 344.

[3] Du Plessis & Corder (supra) at 156.

[4] Ibid at 155, 157.

(iii) Relevant clauses in international and foreign law

FC s 15(1) and IC s 14(1) of the Interim Constitution betray the influence of international, regional and domestic human rights documents.[1] The concatenation of thought, conscience, religion and belief in the same clause would appear to have been influenced by Art 18 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) ('UDHR'),[2] Art 18(1) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966) ('ICCPR')[3] and Art 9(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (1950) ('ECHR').[4]

The brevity with which the right to freedom of religion is expressed in Chapter 2 of the Constitution does, however, stand in stark contrast to the wording of that right in international, regional and domestic human rights documents.[5]

The minimalism of s 15(1) may well be attributable to s 2*(a)* of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.[6] Section 15(1) of the Constitution has also been shaped by Art 21(1)(b) of the Chapter on Fundamental Human Rights and Freedoms in the Constitution of the Republic of Namibia. That clause provides that:

---

[1] Ibid at 47.

[2] Article 17 of the UDHR provides that: Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.

[3] Article 18 of the ICCPR states:

1. Everyone shall have the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion. This right shall include freedom to have or to adopt a religion or belief of his choice, and freedom, either individually or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in worship, observance, practice and teaching. 2. No one shall be subject to coercion which would impair his freedom to have or to adopt a religion or belief of his choice. 3. Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs may be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary to protect public safety, order, health, or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others. 4. The States Parties to the present Covenant undertake to have respect for the liberty of parents and, when applicable, legal guardians to ensure the religious and moral education of their children in conformity with their own convictions.

[4] Article 9 of the ECHR provides: Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief, in worship, teaching, practice and observance. Freedom to manifest one's religion or beliefs shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society in the interests of public safety, for the protection of public order, health or morals, or for the protection of the rights and freedoms of others.

[5] An example of a more expansive right in a foreign constitution, which influenced the drafting of the South African Constitution is to be found in Article 4 of the German Basic Law ('Freedom of faith, of conscience, and of creed'), which has been translated as follows:

(1) Freedom of faith and of conscience, and freedom to profess a religion or a particular philosophy [Weltanschauung], are inviolable.

(2) The undisturbed practice of religion is guaranteed.

(3) No one may be compelled against his conscience to render military service involving the use of arms. Details shall be regulated by federal statute.

See D Currie The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (1994) 344.

[6] Section 2*(a)* declares succinctly that the first of the freedoms to which everyone is entitled is 'freedom of conscience and religion'.

> All persons shall have the right to … freedom of thought, conscience, and belief, which shall include academic freedom in institutions of higher learning.[1]

The texts of both s 14 of the Interim Constitution and s 15 of the Final Constitution are conspicuously different from that of the First Amendment to the United States Constitution. The US Constitution forbids laws 'respecting the establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof'. Nevertheless, case law and academic commentary on the First Amendment has been heavily utilised by the Constitutional Court.[2] It has also been referred to extensively by South African writers.[3] While guidance and inspiration can profitably be sought from the decisions and analysis emanating from the United States,[4] the Constitutional Court has sounded its usual cautionary note that the South African Constitution 'deals with issues of religion differently to the US Constitution'.[5]

41.2 Freedom of Religion, Belief and Opinion: Section 15(1)

(a) The importance of the right

Freedom of conscience and religion is said to be one of the oldest of the internationally recognised human freedoms.[6] Indeed some political philosophers have

[1] In contrast to s 15 of the Final Constitution (and s 14 of the Interim Constitution), Art 21 of the Namibian Constitution does, however, refer to religion alone in a further clause. Article 21(1)(c), which confers on all persons the right to 'freedom to practise any religion and to manifest such practice'.

[2] See, in particular, the judgments of O'Regan and Sachs JJ in Solberg (supra) at paras 118-123, 137-138 and 153-163, and Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC), 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC) at paras 29-41 (Sachs J)('Christian Education South Africa').

[3] See, for example, D Davis 'Religion, Belief and Opinion' in H Cheadle et al South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights 204, 204-208; and G Devenish A Commentary on the South African Bill of Rights Chapter 10.

[4] See Solberg (supra) at para 141(Sachs J) ('If I draw on statements by certain United States Supreme Court Justices, I do so not because I treat their decisions as precedents to be applied in our Courts, but because their dicta articulate in an elegant and helpful manner problems which face any modern court dealing with what has been loosely called church / State relations. Thus, though drawn from another legal culture, they express values and dilemmas in a way which I find most helpful in elucidating the meaning of our own constitutional text.')

[5] See Solberg (supra) at para 99-100 (Chaskalson P) ('we should be careful not to blur [the] distinction' between the establishment and free exercise clauses, which have different concerns. Not only should one take care not to import establishment concerns into the South African freedom of religion clause, but one should also be alert to the fact that 'free exercise' doctrine in the United States has developed in a context in which there is an establishment clause, and may potentially have to be augmented or revised in the absence of such a clause.')

A further factor to bear in mind is that the South African Constitution, unlike the United States Bill of Rights, has a general limitation clause. Thus, when seeking to make use of the American free exercise test, one must determine which legs of the test belong in the religion clause enquiry and which legs should form part of the limitation clause evaluation.

[6] See P Lillich 'Civil Rights' in T Meron (ed) Human Rights in International Law (1984) 158, and J Humphrey 'Political and Related Rights' in Meron (op cit) 176.

recently argued that it is the pre-eminent negative right in the liberal pantheon.[1] The right has lost none of its currency or centrality in recent constitutional documents.[2] The Constitutional Court appears to have accorded it singular status in Prince v President, Cape Law Society & other:

> The constitutional right to practise one's religion is of fundamental importance in an open and democratic society. It is one of the hallmarks of a free society.[3]

One of the reasons why the right remains so important is that the freedom is deemed to be integral to our dignity, growth and self-worth.[4]

(b) Notable features of the clause

(i) The protection of non-religious thoughts and beliefs

The first significant feature about s 15(1) is that the clause does not merely protect religious freedom.[5] To secure protection under the ambit of s 15, one does not have to prove that one is an adherent of a 'religion' — something that in the past was not infrequently (although wrongly) equated with belief in

[1] P Macklem 'Freedom of Conscience and Religion in Canada' (1982) 40 U of Toronto LR 50. John Rawls asserts that the right to freedom of conscience and religion would be the first to be consented to in his hypothetical social contract. A Theory of Justice (1976) 206.

[2] Close to two centuries after the protection of religious freedom was accorded precedence in the United States of America's Bill of Rights (1791), it was placed at the head of the list of protected rights and freedoms in s 2(a) in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (1982).

[3] 2001 (2) SA 388 (CC), 2001 (2) BCLR 133 (CC) at para 24.

[4] As regards the connection between religion and dignity, see Christian Education South Africa (CC) (supra) at para 35:

> The right to believe or not to believe, and to act or not to act according to his or her beliefs or non-beliefs, is one of the key ingredients of any person's dignity. Yet freedom of religion goes beyond protecting the inviolability of the individual conscience. For many believers, their relationship with God or creation is central to all their activities. It concerns their capacity to relate in an intensely meaningful fashion to their sense of themselves, their community and their universe. For millions in all walks of life, religion provides support and nurture and a framework for individual and social stability and growth. Religious belief has that capacity to awake concepts of self-worth and human dignity which form the cornerstone of human rights.'

See also Prince (CC 1) (supra) at paras 48-50 (Ngcobo J).

[5] In this respect, it is much like s 2 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Art 4 of the German Basic Law, Art 18 of the ICCPR and Art 9 of the European Convention. FC s 9, which will no doubt play an important role in litigation on religious matters, also echoes the expansive nature of the s 15(1) right when it prohibits unfair discrimination on the grounds of 'religion, conscience, belief'.

a supreme being[1] — nor that one is affiliated with religious institutions in any conventional sense.[2]

The South African clause goes further than a number of other freedom of religion clauses in foreign constitutions in that it not only includes 'conscience' and 'religion', but also 'thought, belief and opinion'. It imports a decidedly overt secular element into the clause.[3] Thus s 15 encompasses a freedom not to believe in any religion, or, to phrase it more positively, the freedom to be a sceptic, agnostic or atheist.[4] It should embrace comprehensive views of the good life that are derived from political, sociological or philosophical ideologies[5] as well as purely personal moral codes. It may even cover opinions formed as a result of 'considerations of policy, pragmatism, or expediency'.[6] Views on abortion and euthanasia could therefore potentially be protected under s 15 even if they stem from 'personal morality that is not founded in religion' or from 'conscientious beliefs that are not religiously motivated'.[7]

[1] See Publications Control Board v Gallo (Africa) Ltd. 1975 (3) SA 665, 672 (A) as cited in J D van der Vyver in 'Suspension, derogation and de facto deprivation of fundamental rights in Bophuthatswana' (1994) 57 THRHR 257, 267. See also Adelaide Company of Jehovah's Witnesses v The Commonwealth (1943) 67 CLR 116 (HC) ('Probably most Europeans would regard religion as necessarily involving some idea or doctrine effecting the relation of man to a Supreme Being'). Note that the United States' 'Universal Military Training and Service Act once defined the term 'religious training and belief' as 'an individual's belief in a relation to a Supreme Being involving duties superior to those arising from any human relation'. See US v Seeger 380 US 163, 85 SCt 850 (1965) ('Seeger'). This definition is not dissimilar to that adopted by the South African Board for Religious Objection when interpreting the Defence Act 44 of 1957. See Hartman v Chairman, Board of Religious Objection 1987 (1) SA 922 (O). In Hartman, however, a full bench decision of the Orange Free State Provincial Division ruled that Theravada Buddhism, a non-theistic tradition of Buddhism, did in fact qualify as a 'religious conviction' in terms of the Act. The US Supreme Court did not read the phrase 'religious training and belief' as having a theistic requirement when applied to conscientious objectors — Seeger (supra) and Welsh v United States 398 US 333, 90 SCt 1792 (1970) — despite the seemingly clear language of the statute to the contrary. These last three decisions are more in accord with contemporary norms.

[2] In this regard, s 14(1) is similar to s 19(1) of the Zimbabwe Constitution. See In re Chikweche 1995 (4) SA 284, 290H-I (ZS), 1995 (4) BCLR 533 (ZS) (Gubbay CJ)('In any event, I am of the view that the reference in s 19(1) to freedom of conscience is intended to encompass and protect systems of belief which are not centred on a deity or religiously motivated, but are founded on personal morality.') McNally JA, who had 'reservations about the classification of Rastafarianism as a religion', in fact would have held for the applicant on this basis: 'But I have no doubt that it is a genuine philosophical and cultural belief, and as such falls under the protection of s 19(1) of the Constitution.' Ibid at 292F.

[3] The equivalent provision in the Interim Constitution, s 14, introduced an even more secular tone by including within the right in s 14(1), 'academic freedom in institutions of higher learning'.

[4] See J Humphrey 'Political and Related Rights' in T Meron (ed) Human Rights in International Law: Legal and Policy Issues (1984) 178.

[5] See P Lillich 'Civil Rights' in T Meron (ed) Human Rights in International Law: Legal and Policy Issues (1984) 159 n243.

[6] See Seeger (supra).

[7] R v Morgentaler [1988] 1 SCR 30, 176-8 ('Morgentaler'); P Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada (4th Edition, 1992) § 39.2, 979 n12. In Morgentaler, Wilson J asserted that regulation of abortion is a denial of freedom of conscience and thus a violation of s 2(a) of the Canadian Charter. See also M O'Sullivan & C Bailey 'Reproductive Rights' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 5, 1999) § 16.6.

There may well, however, be a difference between the extent of the protection conferred by s 15(1) on religious and other conscientiously held beliefs,[1] on the one hand, and other beliefs, thoughts, opinions, on the other hand. As the Constitutional Court has made clear, s 15(1), in line with international human rights norms, protects an adherent's right to manifest his or her religion in worship, observance, practice and teaching.[2] The Constitutional Court has not yet pronounced on the extent to which the s 15(1) right to thought, belief and opinion also includes an external dimension — or in other words, encompasses not only the right to hold a belief or opinion or adhere to a system of thought, but also to act thereon. However while the expressions, or external manifestations of 'thought, belief and opinion' may have been more appropriately protected under other provisions in the Bill of Rights,[3] and may be regarded as already enjoying some measure of protection there, one probably cannot read the protection of conduct associated with 'thought, belief and opinion' out of the section without doing undue violence to the text.[4]

(ii) The protection of 'opinion'

An unusual feature of the right enshrined in s 15(1) is the inclusion of 'opinion' along with religion, conscience, thought and belief. In fact, the reference to 'opinion' in a clause protecting freedom of religion and belief is seemingly without precedent in international or foreign jurisprudence.

One might argue that protecting opinion is out of place in a clause that is concerned with honouring and protecting a person's convictions. But that need not necessarily be so. Section 15 is aimed at ensuring that everyone is free to adhere to deeply held beliefs and values, whether they are derived from religion, a system of personal morality, or a secular world view. A set of deeply held opinions — or convictions — can form a comprehensive view of the good life comparable to any and all conventional religious faiths. Viewed in this light, the protection of 'opinions' is not inconsistent with the protection of thought or belief.[5] Nor is it necessarily incongruous in a clause concerned with recognising the individuality, freedom and dignity of every person and the diversity of ideas.

[1] See Morgentaler (supra)(Wilson J)(referring not only to a right to hold or articulate beliefs in relation to abortion but also a right to act thereon in accordance with one's conscience).

[2] See §§ 41.2(b)(iii) and 41.2*(c) infra*.

[3] See, eg, the right to freedom of expression (s 16), the right to assembly, demonstration, picket and petition (s 17), the right to freedom of association (s 18) or the right to make political choices (s 19), the right to freedom of movement and residence (s 21).

[4] A reading that excludes protection for the manifestation of non-religious thoughts and beliefs would also unduly emasculate those rights. The right to hold a belief — and not be forced to renounce or forswear it — is a fundamental right. However, it has limited application in modern diverse societies, where it generally difficult, if not impossible, to discern the nature and content of a person's beliefs or ideologies without some external manifestation thereof. Furthermore, a prohibition on the manifestation of particular thoughts or beliefs would significantly prejudice persons who held such beliefs and thus, at least indirectly, significantly undermine their right to adhere to the beliefs in question.

[5] The New Shorter Oxford English Dictionary (Vol 2) 2007 defines 'opinion' as 'belief'.

As has been pointed out in the previous section,[1] the s 15(1) right is normally associated with a right to manifest religious beliefs in practice. Consequently, some doubt could be expressed about whether the right to 'freedom of opinion' amounts to anything more than the right to 'hold' an opinion. The airing of an opinion is after all protected elsewhere — most notably in the 'freedom of expression' clause (s 16).[2] But to suggest that there is no protection of the external manifestations of an opinion under s 15(1) is seemingly not justified, either textually or conceptually.[3] The articulation or external manifestation of opinion — like religion — should therefore probably be regarded as being protected under s 15(1), notwithstanding the overlap with rights such as s 16.

(iii) The absence of any express mention of religious practice

There can be no dispute that s 15(1) entrenches the right to hold or entertain any religious or non-religious thoughts, beliefs and opinions.[4] It is, however, one thing to protect the holding of opinions, beliefs or thoughts, as we have already noted. It is another to protect the manifestation of those beliefs. The text of s 15(1) does not explicitly protect practice motivated by religion (or, for that matter, conscience).[5]

The lack of any direct reference to religious practice, while unusual,[6] has correctly been regarded by the Constitutional Court as being of little significance. The Court has adopted the interpretation of the right in Canadian law.[7] In particular,

[1] § 41.2(b)(i) supra.

[2] See Solberg (supra) at para 145 (Sachs J): 'Freedom of opinion and freedom of expression go hand in hand'.) See art 19 of the UDHR, art 19 of the ICCPR and art 10 of the ECHR, where 'opinion' is linked with 'expression', rather than the 'thought, conscience and religion' which is located in the previous article. Compare art 5 (Freedom of Expression) of the German Basic Law and art 4 thereof, with s 2*(b)* of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (which protects 'freedom of thought, belief, opinion and expression').

[3] See the discussion in relation to the protection of manifestations of thought and belief in § 41.2(b)(i) supra.

[4] A number of commentators have suggested that the right to hold or entertain thoughts and beliefs (whether religious or not) should be considered inviolable. See in this regard K Partsch 'Freedom of Conscience and Expression, and Political Freedoms' in L Henkin (ed) The International Bill of Rights of Rights (1981); M Nowak UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: CCPR Commentary (1993); and L du Plessis & H Corder Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights (1994) 158.

[5] Cf the German Basic Law (art 4(2) and (3)), art 18(1) of the ICCPR, art 9(1) of the European Convention, and, seemingly, the First Amendment to the American Constitution (which is concerned, in part, with the free exercise of religion) — which explicitly protect religious practice. With the exception of the First Amendment to the US Constitution, these provisions have been quoted above under § 41.1*(c)*(iii). The First Amendment to the US Constitution commences thus: 'Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof'.

[6] In addition to the examples already mentioned, the following clauses also protect religious practice: art 18 of the UDR, art 3 of the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man, art 12 of the American Convention on Human Rights, art 8 of the African [Banjul] Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights ('African Charter'), art 21(1)(c) of the Namibian Constitution, arts 25 & 26 of the Indian Constitution and art 19(1) of the Constitution of Zimbabwe.

[7] See § 41.2*(c)* below.

the Court has followed Dickson J's remarks in R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd[1] as to the scope of the Canadian freedom:

> [t]he essence of the concept of freedom of religion is the right to entertain such religious beliefs as a person chooses, the right to declare religious beliefs openly and without fear of hindrance or reprisal, and the right to manifest belief by worship and practice or by teaching and dissemination.[2]

The Court's interpretation is consistent with the rest of s 15. Section 15(2) makes provision for 'religious observances'. Section 15(3) deals with marriages and other details of family life governed inter alia by religious law. The marked distinction between protected religious belief and unprotected religiously dictated or motivated conduct that was drawn in 19th century American case law,[3] and in pre-Charter Canadian cases[4] has not been followed. The international consensus on the protection of religious practice requires that s 15(1) be interpreted as protecting the manifestation and practice of religious belief.[5].

---

[1] [1985] 1 SCR 295, (1985) 18 DLR (4th) 321, 353 (SCC). (Big M Drug Mart Ltd).

[2] Ibid. The last clause of this excerpt from Dickson J's judgment is virtually identical to art 18(1) of the ICCPR and art 9(1) of the European Convention.

This interpretation accords with the views of two of the members of the Technical Committee that drafted the Bill of Rights. See Du Plessis & Corder (supra) at 155-6. (The authors assert that IC s 14(1) accorded, in this respect, with the submission from the South African Chapter of the World Conference on Religion and Peace. That submission contained a provision claiming that all persons are entitled 'to profess, practise, and propagate any religion or no religion'.)

[3] Reynolds v United States 98 US 145, 25 LEd 244 (1878) (After an examination of whether the First Amendment exempted from criminal prosecution for polygamy, people who practised bigamy on account of their Mormon religious beliefs, the Court held: 'Laws are made for the government of actions, and while they cannot interfere with mere religious belief and opinions, they may with practices.')

[4] Walter et al v Attorney-General of Alberta [1969] SCR 83, (1969) 3 DLR (3d) 1 (SCC) ('The Act is not directed at Hutterite religious belief or worship, or at the profession of such belief. It is directed at the practice of holding large areas of Alberta land as communal property, whether such practice stems from religious belief or not.') See also D Gibson The Law of the Charter: Equality Rights (1990) 191-195.

[5] South Africa ratified the ICCPR in 1998 and the African Charter in 1996. It thereby became obliged to ensure compliance with these documents in its domestic law. See J Dugard International Law: A South African Perspective (2nd Edition) 242-244. It would also be difficult to justify divergence from the UDHR. Although the UDHR was envisaged as merely a 'standard-setting' document, its status and prestige are such that it is not only regarded as the yardstick by which to measure compliance with human rights standards, but it has also come to be viewed as a legally binding instrument. See Dugard (supra) at 240-242; W Amien and P Farlam (eds) Basic human rights documents for South Africans 6. It should be borne in mind that in terms of Constitutional Principle II, the Final Constitution had to ensure that everyone enjoys 'all universally accepted fundamental rights, freedoms and civil liberties' by means of 'entrenched and justifiable provisions in the Constitution'. The Principle is enumerated in Schedule 4 to the Interim Constitution.

(iv) The lack of an 'establishment clause'

The fourth notable feature of s 15(1) is the absence of an establishment clause. That is, the Final Constitution contains no clause mandating the separation of church and state.[1] This structured silence should not occasion much surprise. Establishment clauses are not very common in national constitutions or international covenants.[2] Nor are the two clauses necessarily as compatible in the same document as might at first be thought. The American establishment clause, for example, was originally conceived as complementary to the free exercise clause. However, the two clauses do pull in different directions.[3] As Louis Lusky notes:

> In our society . . . there is continuing tension between the two Clauses. Sometimes, indeed, it has almost seemed that anything not forbidden by one is required by the other, and that — but for the Court's divine mediation — the same act or omission might be forbidden by one and required by the other.[4]

The drafters of South Africa's Constitutions were quite self-conscious about the traditional commitment of the state to religion writ large.[5] It is therefore not surprising that it soon became clear to the members of the Technical Committee responsible for the Interim Constitution's Bill of Rights that 'the negotiators had no intention whatsoever of using the Constitution and the Bill of Rights to erect walls to separate church and state'.[6] In its first decision dealing with IC s 14(1), the Constitutional Court expressly acknowledged that a strict separation of church and state was not required by the Constitution.[7]

The textual silence does not, however, mean that establishment clause concerns will enjoy no protection in South Africa. As discussed below,[8] the right to freedom of religion, belief and opinion requires at least some degree of separation

---

[1] The 'establishment clause' consists of the injunction, at the start of the First Amendment, that 'Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion'. According to the US Supreme Court in Lemon v Kurtzman, a statute will only comply with the establishment clause if: (i) it has a secular purpose; (ii) its primary effect is one that neither advances nor inhibits religion; and (iii) it does not foster excessive government entanglement with religion. 403 US 602, 91 SCt 2105 (1984).

[2] Apart from the US Constitution, the Australian Constitution (s 116) and the Constitution of the Russian Federation (art 14) are seemingly the only constitutions with such clauses which provide for the separation of religion and the state, although see also, art 20.3 of the Japanese Constitution. Article 137(1) of the German Basic Law (part of the Weimar Constitution of 1919, which was incorporated by art 140 into the Basic Law) declares 'There shall be no state church', but it is clear from other provisions of the Basic Law (such as art 7) that the German Constitution imposes no strict divide between church and state. The German Constitutional Court has also not interpreted the clause as equivalent to the American establishment clause. See Currie The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (supra) at 245ff.

[3] See E S Corwin and J W Peltason's Understanding the Constitution (13th Edition, 1994) 194-5.

[4] L Lusky By What Right? (1975) 167 (emphasis in original).

[5] There were, for example, public holidays for Christmas, Good Friday, Easter and Ascension Day, as well as a day of thanksgiving and commemoration, previously called The Day of the Vow. There were also tax exemptions, state chaplains etc., as well as a well-developed Afrikaner 'civil religion'. See T D Moodie Power, Apartheid and the Rise of Afrikanerdom (1980); and C Villa-Vicencio Trapped in Apartheid (1988).

[6] See § 41.1*(c)*(ii) above. See also L Du Plessis & H Corder Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights (1994) 155.

[7] Solberg (supra) at paras 99-102 (Chaskalson P), 116, 118-119 (O'Regan J).

[8] See § 41.2*(d)* below.

between church and state. Moreover, s 9 specifically prohibits unfair discrimination, whether direct or indirect, on the grounds of religion, conscience or belief. The equality clause, in conjunction with s 15, could therefore also serve to outlaw some of the state practices that have been captured by the establishment clause in the United States.[1]

(c) The core of the right to religious freedom

In Prince, the Constitutional Court confirmed that the right to freedom of religion in s 15(1) of the Constitution protects religious belief and the practice or manifestation of belief and prohibits coercion or restraint of religious belief or practice. Ngcobo J wrote:[2]

> This Court has on two occasions [in Solberg and Christian Education South Africa] considered the contents of the right to freedom or religion. On each occasion, it has accepted that the right to freedom of religion at least comprehends: (a) the right to entertain the religious beliefs that one chooses to entertain; (b) the right to announce one's religious beliefs publicly and without fear of reprisal; and (c) the right to manifest such beliefs by worship and practice, teaching and dissemination. Implicit in the right to freedom of religion is the 'absence of coercion or restraint'. Thus 'freedom of religion may be impaired by measures that force people to act or refrain from acting in a manner contrary to their religious beliefs.[3]

Another way of itemising what lies at the heart of the right to freedom of [1] See Solberg (supra) at para 102 (Chaskalson P). That a concern for equality was one of values underlying the Establishment Clause is suggested by comments in James Madison's Memorial and Remonstrance, a tract that has been regarded by generations of Supreme Court justices as illustrative of the intention of the framers of the Establishment Clause. See, for example, Everson v Board of Education 330 US 1, 67 SCt 504 (1947); Engel v Vitale 370 US 421, 82 SCt 1261 (1962) ('Engel'). In Memorial and Remonstrance, one of Madison's criticisms of a contemporary bill was that it was violative of the principle of equality.

[2] Prince (CC I) at para 38. (Ngcobo J was writing for the minority, but the majority did not disagree with him on this point, nor was it open for them to do so in the light of the unanimous judgment in Christian Education South Africa.)

[3] In interpreting the right to freedom of religion in this way, the Constitutional Court has adopted the definition of freedom of religion by Dickson J in R v Big M Drug Mart Ltd, in relation to s 2*(a)* of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. See § 41.2*(b)*(iii) above. The Constitutional Court has also ensured that the main attributes of the right to freedom of religion and belief in the South African Constitution are the same as those of the rights to thought, conscience and religion enshrined in international documents like the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) (Article 18), and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966) (Article 18(1) and (2)). See also regional documents like the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms (Article 9(1) and (2)) and the African [Banjul] Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (art 8 whereof reads: 'Freedom of conscience, the profession and free practice of religion shall be guaranteed. No one may, subject to law and order, be submitted to measures restricting the exercise of these freedoms.') religion in s 15(1) is to distinguish the following four freedoms:[1] (a) freedom of religious choice; (b) freedom of religious observance; (c) freedom of religious teaching; and (d) freedom to propagate a religion.[2] A more comprehensive list of the kinds of religious practices or manifestations of religious belief that would be protected under s 15(1) can be discerned from art 6 of the United Nations Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief, passed by the United Nations General Assembly in November 1991. That article provides a number of concrete examples of the freedoms contained in the 'right of freedom of thought, conscience, religion or belief', and thus the type of conduct that should be protected under s 15(1) of the Constitution.[3] These include the freedom: (a) to worship or assemble in connection with a religion or belief, and to establish and maintain places for these purposes; (b) to establish and maintain appropriate charitable or humanitarian institutions; (c) to make, acquire and use to an adequate extent the necessary articles and materials related to the rites or customs of a religion or belief; (d) to write, issue and disseminate relevant publications in these areas; (e) to teach a religious or belief in places suitable for these purposes; (f) to solicit and receive voluntary financial and other contributions from individuals and institutions; (g) to train, appoint, elect or designate by succession appropriate leaders called for by the requirements and standards of any religion or belief; (h) to observe days of rest and to celebrate holidays and ceremonies in accordance with the precepts of one's own religion or belief; and (i) to establish and maintain communication with individuals and communities in matters of religion and belief at the national and international levels.

The Constitutional Court has pointed out that the coercion prohibited by s 15(1) may be direct or indirect[4] and that constraints on religion may be imposed in subtle ways.[5] In order to determine whether there is an infringement of the right to freedom of religion, it is necessary not only to look at the purpose of the legislation (or conduct), but also its 'overall purpose and effect'.[6]

---

[1] See Y Dinstein 'Freedom of Religion and Religious Minorities' in Y Dinstein & M Tabory (eds) The Protection of Minorities and Human Rights 145, 147; I Currie 'Minority Rights: Education, Culture and Language' Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition)(supra) at § 35.4*(d)*(iii).

[2] As Iain Currie notes, the last three freedoms may receive additional protection under s 31, but only insofar as the observance, dissemination and teaching of religious beliefs relates to the practice of a religion in community with other practitioners. Furthermore, atheism or agnosticism would not be covered by s 31, since such beliefs are merely held and not communally practised. Currie (supra) at §35.4*(d)*(iii).

[3] The relevance of these examples to art 9 of the ECHR is noted by M Shaw 'Freedom of Thought, Conscience and Religion' in R St Macdonald, F Matshcher & H Petzold (eds) The European System for the Protection of Human Rights 451-452. See also G Weigel 'A Preliminary Examination of Religious Freedom' in R Gastil (ed) Freedom in the World: Political Rights and Civil Liberties (1982) 136-40, who uses these eleven points as the basis for his Index for Religious Freedoms.

[4] Solberg (supra) at para 104 (Chaskalson P).

[5] Ibid at paras 93 (Chaskalson P), and 114 (O'Regan J). 'Subtle' coercion is dealt with below under § 41.2*(d)*.

[6] Ibid at paras 127 (O'Regan J), and 161 (Sachs J).

One of the most flagrant ways in which the State could breach the right to freedom of religion would be by law or action that intentionally, and directly, targeted particular religious organisations or believers (or religious organisations or adherents in general). An example of such a law would be one that banned a particular church[1] or religious group or order (such as Jehovah's Witnesses or Jesuits[2]) or prohibited a particular religious practice (either at all, or by a particular religion or sect).[3] The United States Supreme Court, in Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc v City of Hialeah,[4] struck down just such a statute. The municipal ordinance in question was construed as a thinly veiled prohibition of the animal sacrifice rituals of the Santeria religion.[5] Similarly, a law or decision that precluded adherents of a particular religious faith from being eligible for state jobs or being admitted into state-funded institutions would violate s 15.[6]

Another obvious violation of the right to freedom of religion would occur were the State to compel persons to profess allegiance to a particular faith, or partake in, or be connected with, activities of a particular religion.[7] The state cannot compel a person to take a religious oath as a condition of public employment or eligibility for an elected position.[8] Nor can one be forced to pay taxes to a

[1] An example of a flagrant violation of this nature was the Transkei Minister of Justice's banning of the Methodist Church of Southern Africa in 1978 (under the Undesirable Organisations Act 98 of 1975 (Tk)) and the Transkei legislature's subsequent passing of the Methodist Church of Transkei (Private) Act 41 of 1978 (Tk), in terms of which the Methodist Church of Southern Africa was divested of its assets. See United Methodist Church of Southern Africa & others v Methodist Church of Southern Africa & others 1991 (2) SA 138 (TkAD).

[2] Norway, at one period of time, excluded Jesuits from the country and thus, had to make a reservation with respect thereto when it first ratified the ECHR. See D J Harris, C Warbrick & M O'Boyle Law of the European Convention on Human Rights (1995) 362.

[3] See Kokkinakis v Greece (1994) 17 EHRR 397 (The European Court of Human Rights held that Greece had violated art 9 of the ECHR, the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion, when its courts had convicted, and ordered the imprisonment of a Jehovah's Witness for proselytism — i.e., the evangelical activity of calling at houses to persuade occupiers to become Jehovah's Witnesses).

[4] 508 US 520, 113 SCt 2217 (1993).

[5] Earlier judgments of the US Supreme Court declared unconstitutional laws forbidding or imposing restrictions on the teaching of religious beliefs or the dissemination of religious tracts. See Cantwell v Connecticut 310 US 296, 60 SCt 900 (1940); Murdock v Commonwealth of Pennsylvania 319 US 105, 63 SCt 870 (1943).

[6] McDaniel v Paty 435 US 618, 98 SCt 1322 (1978) (a state provision prohibiting members of clergy from serving in various state offices held to be unconstitutional). See also Fowler v Rhode Island 345 US 67, 73 SCt 526 (1953) (the State cannot penalize or discriminate against individuals or groups because they hold religious views abhorrent to the authorities). A more contemporaneous example of a practice that would appear to violate the right to freedom of religion is the Bavarian government's prohibition on members of the Church of Scientology being employed by the state.

[7] A provision outlawing such conduct expressly is in fact included in the German Basic Law. Article 136(4) of the Weimar Constitution, incorporated by art 140 of the Basic Law, declares that no-one can be compelled to perform any religious act or ceremony, to participate in religious exercises, or to take a religious form of oath.

[8] Torcaso v Watkins 367 US 488 (1961) (person appointed as a notary public was required to take an oath declaring belief in God).

church, of which one is not a member, in support of its religious activities.[1] Nor can the state pass legislation designed to compel all residents (including non-believers) to observe the holy day of one particular religion.[2]

Laws or conduct of the nature described in the previous two paragraphs — i.e., laws or conduct with a religious motivation or purpose — are still on the books. However, a more common form of state intervention in religious affairs is by means of facially neutral government actions. Facially neutral laws — laws that do not engage expressly with or refer to religious practice (or belief) — apply to religious organisations and adherents because such laws apply to everyone. While such 'neutral' interference would apparently be more benign (and ostensibly much less likely to be motivated by religious preferences or bigotry), it could have a severe impact on religious organisations or communities. A religious group's way of life or its rites of worship could effectively be prohibited. Believers could be coerced into acting in ways inimical to their faith.[3]

[1] See Shaw (supra) at 453-454 (As the European Commission of Human Rights held as much in Darby v Sweden A 187 (1991) Comm. Rep.).

[2] Thus, a Canadian federal statute, the Lord's Day Act RSC 1970 — which inter alia prohibited any work or commercial activity on the 'Lord's Day' (the Christian sabbath) — was found by the Canadian Supreme Court to have a religious purpose, as well as a religious effect, and consequently to infringe the right to freedom of conscience and religion impermissibly. See Big M Drug Mart Ltd (supra) at 321. In contrast, various Sunday observance laws in the US were held to no longer have a religious purpose and consequently to be constitutionally unobjectionable. See McGowan v Maryland 366 US 420 (1961)81 SCt 1101; Braunfeld v Brown 366 US 599, 81 SCt 1144 (1961); Gallagher v Crown Kosher Super Markets of Massachusetts, Inc. 366 US 617, 81 SCt 1122 (1961); and Two Guys from Harrison-Allentown, Inc. v McGinley 366 US 582, 81 SCt 1135 (1961).

[3] Examples of neutral statutes or requirements that have been challenged in the United States on the basis of violating a particular religious group's or adherent's right to the free exercise of their religion include: a Wisconsin law requiring compulsory school attendance until the age of 16, which was successfully challenged by the Amish (who argued that this requirement severely jeopardised the survival of their religion) in Wisconsin v Yoder 406 US 205, 92 SCt 1526 (1972); a law prescribing payment of social security taxes, which was unsuccessfully challenged by a member of the Old Order Amish (on the basis that payment of taxes and receipt of benefits violated the taxpayer's Amish faith) in United States v Lee 455 US 252 (1982) (for another case in which the US Supreme Court dismissed a challenge to a generally applicable tax which did not provide an exemption for a religious organisation, see Jimmy Swaggart Ministries v Board of Equalization of California 493 US 378, 110 SCt 688 (1990)); a government requirement that welfare applicants submit their social security numbers in order to receive benefits which was unsuccessfully attacked in Bowen v Roy 476 US 693, 106 SCt 2147 (1986) ('Bowen'); statutory provisions

The Constitutional Court has thus far considered two cases in which religious adherents or organisations requested exemptions from facially neutral statutes.[2] In both cases, the Court did not deny that the statutes violated the right to freedom of religion, notwithstanding the secular nature and purpose of the laws. The Court also accepted that the legislation could potentially be held to be unconstitutional by virtue of failing to include an exemption for religious adherents.[3] But in neither case was the religious challenge successful.

In Christian Education, South Africa (the first of the challenges to an overtly neutral law) the Court unanimously assumed that a statute prohibiting corporal punishment of juveniles in schools infringed the claimant's right to freedom of religion. It found, however, that any such infringement would be justified under denying state unemployment benefits to Seventh Day Adventists who refused to work on Saturdays (their sabbath), which were successfully challenged in Sherbert v Verner 374 US 398 (1963), 83 SCt 1790 and Hobbie v Unemployment Appeals Commission of Florida 480 US 136 (1987), 107 SCt 1046 (see also Thomas v Review Board of the Indiana Employment Security Division 450 US 707 (1981), 101 SCt 1425 ('Thomas') — US Supreme Court found that Indiana's denial of unemployment benefits to a Jehovah's Witness who had left his job producing armaments because of sincerely held religious beliefs violated the free exercise clause). See too Employment Division Oregon Department of Human Resources v Smith 494 US 872 (1990), 110 SCt 1595 ('Smith') (a challenge to the criminal prohibition on the use of the drug peyote (a hallucinogen derived from a plant), which outlawed all ingestion of peyote, whether for sacramental purposes or not. A majority of the US Supreme Court rejected the free exercise challenge (although this decision was overturned by a national statute, which was then itself found to be unconstitutional by the US Supreme Court). By contrast, the California Supreme Court held unconstitutional the application of state criminal statutes to Native American Indians using peyote in a bona fide religious ceremony. See People v Woody 61 Cal 2d 716, 394 P2d 813 (1964). Jehovah's Witnesses also successfully challenged the failure to exempt them from a law which required saluting the national flag, on the basis that this violated the injunction in the Scriptures against worshipping graven images. See West Virginia State Board of Education v Barnette 319 US 624, 87 LEd 1628 (1943), 63 SCt 1178.

[2] See Christian Education South Africa (supra) and Prince (supra). See also N Smith 'Freedom of Religion: The Right to Manifest our Beliefs' (2002) 119 SALJ 690. The third freedom of religion case considered by the Constitutional Court thus far –Solberg (supra) — could potentially have been framed as a claim for exemption by adherents of religions (such as Judaism) whose day of rest or worship was a day other than Sundays, and who were thus faced with financial disadvantage if they honoured their religion. See, for example, the challenge mounted in Edwards Books and Art Ltd. v The Queen [1986] 2 SCR 713, 35 DLR (4th) 1 ('Edwards Books and Art Ltd'), where a majority of the Canadian Supreme Court found that there was a violation of the right to freedom of conscience and religion, but that this infringement was justified under s 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The attack on the Liquor Act in Solberg (supra) was not, however, along these lines. Instead, it was alleged that the relevant statutory provisions fell to be struck down in their entirety by virtue of having an impermissible religious purpose.

[3] The Supreme Court of Appeal stated in Prince v President, Cape Law Society & others 2000 (3) SA 845 (SCA), 2000 (7) BCLR 823 (SCA) at para 11 ('Prince (SCA)') that it may well be impermissible for a court to declare otherwise unobjectionable statutes unconstitutional by virtue of their failing to contain an exemption for bona fide religious users, because this would involve a court legislating. The Constitutional Court has, however, correctly pointed out that this is not so; it is perfectly competent for a Court to hold that a statute violates the right to freedom of religion insofar as its impact on a particular religious group is concerned. See Prince (CC) (supra) at paras 31-33.

the limitation clause. In Prince v President, Cape Law Society & others, ('Prince (CC 2)'),[1] the Court found that there was a violation of s 15 (as well as s 31) of the Constitution vis-à-vis adherents of the Rastafari religion as a result of the prohibition on the use or possession of cannabis in two statutes.[2] A majority of the Court hearing that case found, however, that the infringement is justified under s 36 of the Constitution[3]

(d) The penumbra of the right: the protection against subtle non-quantifiable coercion

Although the Final Constitution contains no 'establishment clause' and does not mandate a 'wall of separation' between church and state, the state is not necessarily free to identify with or promote a particular religion. The extent to which the state remains able to do so depends on the dictates of the freedom of religion clause (s 15(1)), as well as the right to freedom from discrimination on the basis of religion, conscience and belief (s 9(1)). Although non-entanglement of church and state is not the direct focus of s 15(1) — unless there is coercion of adherents of other faiths to act (or refrain from acting) contrary to their beliefs[4] — it may be caught and constrained by the very logic of the right.

The question of whether it would be consistent with s 14(1) of the Interim Constitution (the equivalent of s 15(1) of the Final Constitution) for the state to gives its imprimatur of approval to a particular religion arose for consideration by the Constitutional Court in S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg. In Solberg, the appellants alleged that the Liquor Act 27 of 1989 (as amended), evinced a religious purpose (allegedly 'to induce submission to a sectarian Christian conception of the proper observance of the Christian sabbath and Christian holidays or, perhaps, to compel the observance of the Christian sabbath and Christian holidays') and that such a sectarian aim constituted an infringement of the right to freedom of religion. A majority of the Constitutional Court found that the right to freedom of religion in s 14(1) of the Interim Constitution prohibited the 'endorsement' of religion by the State. O'Regan J wrote that 'explicit endorsement of one religion over others would not be permitted in our new constitutional order'.[5] Sachs J similarly opined that the State's endorsement would violate the freedom of religion clause if a 'reasonable South African (of any faith or none) who is neither hyper-sensitive nor overly insensitive to the belief in question, but highly

[1] 2002 (2) SA 794 (CC), 2002 (3) BCLR 231 (CC). See also Prince (CC 1) (supra).

[2] The Drugs and Drug Trafficking Act 140 of 1992 (s 4(b)) and the Medicines and Related Substances Control Act 101 of 1965 (s 22*(a)*(10)).

[3] The decision in Prince turned in large part on whether or not it would have been practical or in the public interest for an exemption to be granted so as to permit Rastafarians to smoke cannabis or marijuana for religious purposes.

[4] See the discussion in § 41.2*(c)* above.

[5] See Solberg (supra) at para 123 (O'Regan J).

attuned to the requirements of the Constitution' would deem there to be such.[1] However, Sachs J concluded that the infringement could be justified in terms of the limitation clause. In the result, a majority[2] held that s 90(1) of the Liquor Act was consistent with the Interim Constitution.

What is significant about the Solberg decision is not so much the result but the fact that a majority of justices found that the right to freedom of religion in the Interim Constitution — which to all intents and purposes is the same as the right to religious freedom in the Final Constitution — precluded the state from showing a special affinity with Christianity.[3] Despite a lack of unanimity in reasoning,[4] the Court clearly supported the proposition that those endorsements of the kind effected by s 90(1) of the Liquor Act — which precluded the sale of wine under a grocer's licence on Sundays, Christmas Day and Good Friday — infringed the rights to religious freedom.

The question at this point is whether a prohibition on state involvement with religion (and particularly the endorsement of one particular religion) is required in order for there to be adequate protection from religious coercion (and thus full protection of religious liberty). A prohibition on certain forms of state identification with religion, such as endorsement of a 'favoured' religion, is necessary to protect against subtle non-quantifiable coercion. State endorsement of a particular religion results in indirect coercion of adherents of other faiths, agnostics and atheists. The presence of coercion of this nature may be particularly pronounced in a school environment.[5] A proscription on state endorsement of a favoured

[1] Ibid at para 162 (Sachs J). O'Regan J declared that s 90 of the Liquor Act 27 of 1989 had both a sectarian purpose and a sectarian effect and therefore impermissibly infringed the freedom of religion clause of the Interim Constitution. Sachs J wrote that 'the inescapable message sent out by the particular choice of these closed days [of the Liquor Act] is that despite the enactment of s 14, the state still shows special solicitude to Christian opinion or, to put it more accurately, to the views of certain Christians, and thereby infringes s 14'. Ibid at para 163.

[2] Chaskalson P (with three Justices concurring) found that there was no violation of IC s 14(1). The opinion of Sachs J, upholding the provision of the statute under the limitation clause, was concurred in by Mokgoro J. Thus, five of the nine Justices who heard the case agreed that the constitutional challenge should be dismissed.

[3] Restricting sale of alcohol on Sundays and other 'closed days' (as defined in the Liquor Act) did not further a religious purpose or impinge on anyone's faith, except in a legally irrelevant way. See, eg, the decisions of the US Supreme Court upholding Sunday observance laws: McGowan v Maryland (supra); Braunfeld v Brown (supra); Gallagher v Crown Kosher Super Markets of Massachusetts, Inc. (supra); and Two Guys from Harrison-Allentown, Inc. v McGinley (supra). There was moreover no evidence in Solberg (supra) that anyone's freedom of religion had in fact been infringed. There was consequently an 'air of artificiality' about the challenge and the attack on the consistency of the Liquor Act with s 14(1) of the Interim Constitution should arguably have been dismissed on this ground alone. Ibid at paras 140 and 154, (Sachs J). See also the Canadian Supreme Court decision in Hy & Zel's Inc v Ontario (Attorney-General) [1993] 3 SCR 675 (a challenge to Sunday trading restrictions was rejected on the basis that the appellants, who had adduced no evidence and did not allege that their rights had been violated, lacked standing.); Edwards Books and Art Ltd (supra) at 40-41, 65 (freedom of religion challenge of Hindus and Muslims was dismissed because of insufficient evidence to support a constitutional attack.)

[4] O'Regan emphasised the importance equality or 'equitableness' of state support for religiously-based norms. See Solberg (supra) at paras 120-123 (O'Regan J) and para 148 (Sachs J).

[5] See Lee v Weisman 505 US 577, 112 SCt 2649 (1992) ('Weisman') (US Supreme Court declared a purportedly non-denominational prayer at a high school graduation ceremony impermissible under the free exercise clause on the basis that, though voluntary, it resulted in indirect coercion).

religion is therefore appropriately located under the freedom of religion clause. While this coercion analysis can claim empirical evidence in its favour, the coercion becomes more subtle once one moves away from religious observances in captive environments such as schools or prisons (i.e., to activities not covered by s 15(2) of the Constitution).[1]

Support for the view that endorsement results indirectly in coercion, and thus must be prohibited to properly protect freedom of religion, is to be found in the judgment of O'Regan J in Solberg[2]. The same argument has been surfaced in the writings of South African academics such as Denise Meyerson[3] and Charles Villa-Vicencio[4] and the opinions of the US Supreme Court.[5] What is not directly addressed by the Solberg decision is the extent of state involvement with Christianity or any other religion that would be precluded by the constitutional right to freedom of religion by virtue of being indirectly coercive to adherents of minority faiths. Would any government actions with a religious purpose necessarily be precluded on the basis of being 'subtly coercive'? And would such a strict separation between the state and religion actually advance religious freedom?

The answer to both of these two questions is no. There is no reason why state involvement with religion, or government actions that have a religious purpose or effect, would necessarily be coercive (even indirectly or subtly) and thus be inconsistent with the penumbra of the right to religious freedom. There is furthermore no simple correlation between separation of church and state and total religious freedom. While complete identification of church and state clearly undermines religious freedom, a rigorous policy of state non-identification with religion would likely be violative of freedom of religion. The apex of religious freedom therefore

[1] A majority of the Supreme Court in Weisman endorsed the 'psychological coercion' analysis of Justice Kennedy. The majority's position prompted the quintessential Scalia riposte: 'interior decorating is a rock-hard science compared to psychology practiced by amateurs … [a] few citations of [r]esearch in psychology that have no particular bearing upon the precise issues here, cannot disguise the fact that the Court has gone beyond the realm where judges know what they are doing'. Ibid at 636.

[2] Solberg (supra) at paras 122-123.

[3] See D Meyerson Rights Limited (1997) 32-33 ('[a]nother, perhaps less obvious, way in which the state may limit the right to religious freedom is by giving a preferred status either to religion as such or to one or more specific religions. Such a policy would obviously raise equality concerns, but it also raises concerns about religious freedom, because the preferral puts indirect pressure on citizens to adopt the religion favoured by the state.')

[4] See C Villa-Vicencio A Theology of Reconstruction (1992) 264-268. Professor Villa-Vicencio discusses the importance of the separation of religion and state for freedom of religion. See J Klaaren 'Review of Stephen Carter's The Culture of Disbelief ' (1994) 10 SAJHR 287, 289.

[5] Larson v Valente 456 US 228, 245, 102 SCt 1673 (1982) (Brennan J). See also McCollum v Board of Education 333 US 203, 227 (1948) (Frankfurter J); Zorach v Clauson 343 US 306, 325 (1952) (Jackson J); School District of Abington Township, Pennsylvania v Schempp 374 US 203, 287-294, 298-299, 305 (1963) (Brennan and Goldberg JJ); and Engel (supra) (Black J, admittedly in an establishment clause setting, discussed the indirect coercive pressure that could be exerted on religious minorities.)

lies somewhere between positive identification and negative identification.[1]

In establishing exactly where on the continuum of church-state identification maximum freedom of religion is attained it is useful to outline more nuanced models of church-state interaction. At one extreme lie absolute theocracies[2]. Next are countries with an established church: an established church is compatible either with a system in which there is a virtual monopoly in religious affairs, or one in which there is a substantial toleration of other beliefs. Thirdly, there are countries with an endorsed church: an endorsed church, while not formally affirmed as the official church of a nation, is accorded special acknowledgment and perhaps treatment (although freedom of religion and freedom from religious discrimination are protected). Fourthly, there are co-cooperationist regimes where no special status is granted to dominant churches although the state co-operates closely with churches in a number of ways. (It may arrange religious education, maintain churches or even collect taxes for churches). Fifthly, there are accommodationist regimes. Such states 'might be thought of as co-operationism without the provision of any direct financial subsidies to religion or religious education'.[3] Under these latter regimes the state is able to accommodate religion and the religious wishes of citizens by, for example acknowledging the importance of religion as part of national or local culture, allowing religious symbols in public settings, and permitting tax, dietary holiday, Sabbath and other kinds of exemptions. Sixthly, there are separationist regimes. Such regimes can vary dramatically. At the very least they differ from accommodationist regimes by being less accepting of state involvement with religious activities (even on an equitable basis). In separationist regimes religious teaching in schools would be prohibited, while any suggestion of public support for religion would be considered inappropriate. Seventhly, there are political arrangements marked by inadvertent insensitivity to religion. Finally, there are legal orders characterised by hostility and overt persecution of religious orders and adherents.

There may be disagreement about which of the middle four systems outlined above would be most likely to maximise religious liberty in any particular context. (The first two and last two involve some restrictions on religious practices and adherents.) Perhaps the most persuasive case can be made for an accommodationist

[1] A useful discussion of religious freedom in this context is to be found in W Cole Durham, Jr. 'Perspectives on Religious Liberty: A Comparative Framework', in J D Van der Vyver and J Witte Jr. (eds) Religious Human Rights in Global Perspective: Legal Perspectives (1996) 1-44. I have previously employed Cole Durham Jr's framework when analysing the Constitutional Court decision in Solberg. See P Farlam 'The Ambit of the Right to Freedom of Religion: A Comment on S v Solberg' (1998) 14 SAJHR 298, 320-323.

[2] Durham (supra) at 19.

[3] Ibid at 21.

regime.[1] Accommodationism certainly results in greater freedom than a system that allows endorsement.[2]

An accommodationist approach would also appear to be preferable to a separationist stance because it would permit a government, in certain circumstances, to enact laws that have the primary or incidental purpose of benefiting a particular religion (but do not constitute endorsement). Such measures may well be required for the full protection of religious liberty.[3] Worship or expressions of faith can have a public, as well as a private, dimension. Refusing to permit religious observances or other expressions or manifestations of faith in public fora can therefore constitute an infringement of the religious faith of certain adherents.[4] Stated differently, a policy banning all worship or religious instruction from state institutions is not neutral vis-à-vis different religions (or even all adherents of one religion[5]), or between religious adherents, atheists and agnostics. This proposition has been acknowledged and affirmed by the German Constitutional Court:[6]

---

[1] This model is favoured by a number of American academics who are dissatisfied with the restrictions on religious freedom that they feel are concomitant on a policy of rigid church-state separation as well as some South African writers. As regards American writers, see, in addition to Durham (supra), M W McConnell 'Accommodation to Religion' 1985 Supreme Court Review 1 and 'Accommodation of Religion: An Update and a Response to Critics' (1992) 60 George Washington LR 685. For South African support for an accommodationist position, see D Davis 'Religion, Belief and Opinion' in H Cheadle, D Davis & N Haysom South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights (2002) 209-210; W Freedman 'The Right to Religious Liberty, The Right to Religious Equality, and S 15(1) of the South African Constitution' (2000) 11 Stell LR 99, 113-114. See also Farlam (supra) at 320-323.

[2] As regards 'endorsement', Durham says the following: 'Of course, substantial religious liberty can also exist in co-operationist or endorsed church regimes, at least where genuine religious equality is present. However, there is always a sense in such regimes that smaller religious communities have a kind of second-class status, and to the extent that public funds are directly supporting programs of majority churches, there is a sense that members of religious minorities are being coerced to support religious programs with which they do not agree.' See Durham (supra) at 24.

[3] See Solberg (supra) at para 122 (O'Regan J).

[4] This was recognised by the framers of the Interim and Final Constitutions — hence the inclusion of ss 14(2) and 15(2).

[5] For example, the view — seemingly influential among the drafters of the First Amendment of the US Constitution — that the ideal model for the church is the small, non-hierarchical institution of the first few centuries (i.e. before Constantine made Christianity the official religion of the Roman Empire), and the attitude that the essence of religion is a personal relationship between the believer and his/her God, were all Puritan beliefs that stemmed in part from disaffection with the religious practice in Europe in the 17th and 18th centuries. Thus, not only were these not impartial religious truths then, (or, for that matter, now) they had never even been the most widely accepted Christian views. A more optimistic view about the Church and its ability to preserve its integrity in the face of worldly temptations, a more generous view of who should appropriately be accepted as church members, and a less intensely private view about the nature and content of religious practices would probably be more reflective of mainstream Christian belief. Thus, a policy whereby churches are denied any co-operation or assistance from government authorities, and are consequently small and perhaps less hierarchical and bureaucratic, is a policy that favours beliefs that churches should conform to this model, while equally clearly disadvantaging those who believe that more worldly structures (like the Catholic Church) reflect an appropriate ecclesiastical structure.

[6] See D Currie The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (supra) at 253. See also Mozert v Hawkins County Public Schools 647 FSupp 1194 (E Tenn 1986) and Mozert v Hawkins County Public Schools 827 F2d 1058 (6th Cir 1987) (concerning whether schools should be required to exempt students from readings and discussions that offended their religious beliefs).

The Court wrote:

> Similarly, in the later decisions respecting school prayers and interdenominational public schools the claims of dissenting children to be free from state-sponsored exposure to religion were subordinated to the rights of religious children and their parents, based upon Article 4, to the free exercise of their religion.[1]

In its first decision on school prayers in interdenominational public schools, the German Constitutional Court noted that the complaining parents' desire to keep their children's education free from religious influence conflicted with the wishes of other parents to provide their children with a Christian upbringing. The Court then advanced a number of propositions. First, to eliminate all traces of religious thinking from the schoolroom would not be neutral with respect to religion. Second, it would disadvantage those parents who preferred a religious education[2]. Third, resolution of competing claims to religious liberty was basically entrusted to the democratic process. Finally, so long as public schools did not become 'missionary schools' or attempt to breach the infallibility of Christian beliefs, a curricular affirmation of Christianity more cultural than confessional infringed no one's religious freedom.[3]

In Solberg, there was no unanimity over whether the impugned provisions of the Liquor Act violated the right to freedom of religion. There was, however, a clear majority (if not consensus) in support of the proposition that subtle and potentially non-quantifiable coercion (such as state support for a particular religion) could infringe the right to religious freedom. This proposition was explicitly articulated by O'Regan J and the two justices who concurred with her. The same proposition was unequivocally endorsed by the four Justices who found that there was no violation of the right to freedom of religion in Solberg:

> I am not unmindful of the fact that constraints on the exercise of freedom of religion can be imposed in subtle ways and that the choice of Christian holy days for particular legislative purposes may be perceived to elevate Christian beliefs above others; and that as a result adherents of other religions may be made to feel that the State accords less value to their beliefs than it does to Christianity.[4]

At the same time, the Court, in Solberg, made it clear that government measures favouring or benefiting a religion in a particular context would not necessarily amount to endorsement of that religion. Thus, such measures would not inevitably be prohibited under the freedom of religion clause because they were indirectly or subtly coercive.[5]

It is not clear from the various judgments in Solberg precisely what the attitude of the Court would be as regards 'accommodationism'. However, the analyses of O'Regan and Sachs JJ display an awareness of the need to tolerate state involvement with religion, while at the same time restricting displays of state favouritism.

[1] 41 BVerfGE 29 (1975); 52 BVerfGE 223 (1979).
[2] 41 BVerfGE 29 (1976) 49-50.
[3] 41 BVerfGE 29 (1975) 50-52, 64.
[4] Solberg (supra) at para 93 (Chaskalson P).
[5] Ibid at para 122.

The approach of Chaskalson P acknowledges the reality of coercion and warns against an establishment-clause style 'wall of separation'. Thus all three opinions in Solberg would seem consistent with such an accommodationist approach.

(e) The penumbra of the right: religious equality

A more contentious issue than whether s 15(1) protects 'subtle coercion' as part of the guarantee of religious liberty, is whether the right also contains a guarantee of equality. This issue was the primary source of disagreement between the majority and minority opinions in Solberg.[1] O'Regan and Sachs JJ argued that it was apparent from both the text and the broader context that equality (or equity) considerations were an integral part of the right to freedom of religion in IC s 14(1). Chaskalson P, on the other hand, felt that neither textual nor policy considerations warranted the inclusion of equality considerations in IC s 14(1).[2]

The Constitution undeniably manifests a concern for equality and a respect for diversity. Nevertheless, it would not seem to be textually required, or conceptually coherent, for the right to freedom of religion, belief and opinion in s 15(1) to be read to require equal treatment.[3] As Chaskalson P stated in Solberg:

> The Constitution deals with unequal treatment and discrimination under s 8. Unequal treatment of religions may well give rise to issues under s 8(2), but that section was not relied upon by the appellant in the present case. To read 'equitable considerations' relating to State action into s 14(1) would give rise to any number of problems not only in relation to freedom of religion but also in relation to freedom of conscience, thought, belief and opinion, which would go far beyond the difficulties raised by the 'establishment clause' of the US Constitution[4].

The freedom of religion jurisprudence of Canada reflects similar concerns.[5] As Katherine Swinton has noted,[6] early decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada, such as Big M Drug Mart Ltd and Edwards Books and Art Ltd suggested that the right to freedom of conscience and religion enshrined in s 2*(a)* of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms contained an equality (or 'equal liberty') component.[7] However, this dimension was not the 'essence of the concept' of freedom of religion as described in Big M Drug Mart. The reference to equality in these early cases may well have been influenced by the fact that the right to equality in s 15 of the Canadian Charter only came into effect on 17 April 1985, three years

[1] See Davis (supra); Farlam (supra) at 310.

[2] For a discussion of the debate over equality in the Solberg judgment, see Farlam (supra) at 310-318; J De Waal I Currie & G Erasmus The Bill of Rights Handbook (4th Edition) 297-301; Freedman (supra) at 108 -114.

[3] See De Waal et al (supra) at 301.

[4] Solberg (supra) at para 102.

[5] The Canadian freedom of religion and conscience clause bears some similarity to s 15(1) of the Constitution, as discussed above. See §§ 41.1*(c)(iii), 41.2(b)*(iii) & (c) supra.

[6] K Swinton 'Freedom of Religion' in G A Beaudoin & E Mendes (eds) The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (3rd Edition, 1996) 4-5.

[7] Big M Drug Mart Ltd (supra) at 353.

after the rest of the Charter, and after both Big M Drug Mart Ltd and Edwards Books had been argued before the Supreme Court. The question of whether the challenge should have been brought under s 15 of the Charter could not arise in Big M Drug Mart Ltd, and was considered by the Supreme Court in Edwards Books to be inappropriate to consider.[1] By contrast, in the main decision on Sunday trading after April 1985 — the Ontario Court of Appeal's judgment in Peel (Regional Municipality) v Great Atlantic[2] — there was greater concern with coercion than equality.[3] The same emphasis on coercion is to be found in the leading Canadian judgments on religious education handed down between Edwards Books and A & P.[4] The case law of Canada therefore suggests that the references to equality considerations in early cases (for quite understandable textual reasons) have become somewhat less relevant as the jurisprudence has matured.[5]

41.3 The Stages of the Freedom of Religion Enquiry

As indicated in § 41.2 above, the Constitutional Court has, on a few occasions, commented on the ambit of the right to freedom of religion. There is, however, less clarity as yet as to the test to be employed in determining whether or not the right to freedom of religion has been infringed. Would legislation or conduct that impeded the exercise of religion to any degree or in any respect violate the right? If not, what kinds of impediments would fall afoul of the freedom of religion guarantee? And to what extent should the courts engage in an analysis of whether the claimant has correctly described or characterised the prejudice that the state actions would allegedly inflict upon his or her religious faith or practice? These are some of the issues that will have to be confronted, and answered, prior to the crystallisation of the test for determining contraventions of the right to religious freedom.

It is not necessary to examine the stages of the freedom of religion enquiry in the context of government measures (be they laws or conduct) with the clear intent of impairing religious freedom. The first stage of the analysis would be satisfied by such clear intent. All that would then be required would be a determination of whether the limitation on religion was justified under s 36 of the Constitution. Determining contraventions of s 15(1) by ostensibly neutral laws that may have a disparate effect on various religions and from which some affected believers consequently request an exemption is a more complex

[1] Edwards Books and Art Ltd (supra) at 54–55 (Dickson CJC), and 59 (Beetz J) and 75 (La Forest J).

[2] (1991) 78 DLR (4th) 333 (Ont CA). Leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was granted: (1991) 85 DLR (4th) viii (note). The appeal was withdrawn: 11CRR (2d) 383.

[3] See Swinton 'Freedom of Religion' (supra) at 4-14 to 4-15.

[4] Ibid at 4-14 n68. See, for example, Zylberberg v Sudburg (Board of Education) (1988) 52 DLR (4th) 577 (Ont CA); Canadian Civil Liberties Association v Ontario (Min. of Education) (1990) 65 DLR (4th) 1 (Ont. CA).

[5] See Hogg (supra) at Chapter 39 (no mention of an 'equal liberty' dimension). See also R Sharpe & K Swinton 'Freedom of Conscience and Religion' in The Charter of Rights and Freedoms (1998)(no mention of equality as regards freedom of belief, conscience or religion).

matter. In those cases it would be necessary for a court to determine whether (a) there is a sincerely held belief (whether held by the complainant or other persons in relation to whom the challenge is brought), (b) that has been sufficiently burdened. In making these enquiries, the court should avoid becoming entangled in doctrinal disputes or imposing its own views as to the validity or worth of the religious beliefs in question.

(a) Sincerity of belief

The first issue to be considered by a court when faced with an allegation that a secular and otherwise unimpeachable law impinges upon the s 15(1) right is the believer's sincerity.[1] The court cannot simply accept without any enquiry that a religious belief has been affected by legislation or state conduct. At the same time, the court should be sensitive to the varieties of beliefs and the constitutional commitment to diversity. Religious beliefs do not have to be objectively reasonable or sophisticated to be worthy of protection for the adherence thereto to be regarded as sincere.[2] The fact that a doctrine might not be regarded as particularly reasonable or coherent does not mean that is not genuinely believed. Nor is the sincerity of a complainant's beliefs necessarily called into question by the fact that other members of a religion disagree with his or her interpretation or views as to what actions are prohibited by the religion,[3] or the fact that the beliefs are apparently not held by any organised religious group.[4] It is not for the court, or the state, to prescribe what is orthodox or heretical.

Only in exceptional cases will the court conclude that a religious belief is not sincerely held. This might occur where, for example, there is little or no evidence of true devotion to a religion, or where the evidence suggests that claims of adherence to a belief have been trumped up in an attempt to obtain an exemption to cater for personal predilections. Thus far in South Africa, no court has held that a belief has not been sincerely held and thus falls outside the protective ambit of the freedom of religion clause.[5] In Prince,[6] the genuineness (or sincerity) of the appellant's religious beliefs were put in issue by the Director-General of Health. This contention was swiftly dispatched by the Court.

---

[1] Prince (CC2) (supra) at paras 40, 41 and 43; In re Chikweche (supra) at 289I-J; Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 1999 (4) SA 1092, 1100B-D (SE), 1999 (9) BCLR 951 ('Christian Education South Africa (SE)'); L Tribe American Constitutional Law (2nd Edition) §14-12. See also Christian Education South Africa (CC) (supra) at paras 6, 14 and 16.

[2] See Tribe (supra) at § 14-6 and § 14-12; *Thomas (supra)*; United States v Ballard 322 US 78, 86-87 (1944).

[3] Thomas (supra) (Jehovah's Witness resigned from a munitions factory because of a sincere belief that such work violated his religion, even though other members of his religion disagreed with his views as to what actions the beliefs forbade).

[4] *Bowen (supra)* (The claimants therein sought to bar the government from using their daughter's social security number, on the basis that this would 'rob the spirit of their daughter and prevent her from obtaining greater spiritual power').

[5] On the other hand, a finding of sincerity was made in Christian Education South Africa (SE) (supra) at 1100I-1101J. The Court's findings in relation to whether it had been shown that a religious belief was implicated will be dealt with under § 41.3*(b)*.

[6] Prince (CC2) (supra) at paras 43, 97 and 111.

Another issue that arises at this stage of the freedom of religion enquiry is whether the beliefs in issue in a particular case should properly be characterised as 'religious'. The right in s 15(1) does not merely cover religious beliefs. It also extends to views derived from political, sociological or philosophical ideologies (and includes the right not to be religious). To the extent that organisations and adherents are committed to comprehensive visions of the good life, there may well be no difference between the extent of the protection afforded under s 15(1) to religious practices, on the one hand, and secular ideologies or systems of thought, belief, conscience or opinion, on the other.[1] However, freedom of religion, thought and belief clauses in international human rights documents do not appear to accord the same degree of protection to practices motivated by non-religious beliefs as to ones dictated by religious faith. Nor has the question of the protection to be afforded to non-religiously motivated practices yet been addressed by the Constitutional Court. Consequently, there may still be some significance attached (albeit limited) to whether a belief can be classified as 'religious' or not.[2]

The definition given to the term 'religion' in various contexts (and in different countries) has been canvassed above.[3] The concept was often equated in the past with belief in a supreme being. Such a definition is undoubtedly too limited. It would fail, for example, to include a faith like Theravada Buddhism.[4] The term 'religion' requires a much broader extension.[5]

It is, however, impossible to define religion in advance or in the abstract.[6] The question of whether a system of beliefs qualifies as a religion would therefore have to be evaluated in every case, with regard to precedent,[7] comparative case

[1] Talking about a belief will probably be regarded as being protected in the first instance under the right of freedom of expression, rather than the freedom of conscience, religion, thought, belief and opinion. However it should still enjoy protection under the latter right.

[2] In Prince (CC2), the Constitutional Court dealt with the question of whether Rastafarianism was a religion. Prince (CC2) (supra) at paras 15-18 and 97.

[3] See § 41.2*(b)*(i) (supra)

[4] See Hartman v Chairman, Board of Religious Objection 1987 (1) SA 922 (O) ('Hartman') (Faith qualifies as a 'religious conviction' in terms of the Defence Act 44 of 1957).

[5] See Christian Education South Africa (CC) (supra).

[6] See G van der Schyff 'The Legal Definition of Religion and its Application' (2002) 119 SALJ 288-294; E Peñalver 'The Concept of Religion' (1997) 107 Yale LJ 791; The Hon Mr Justice D Malcolm 'Religion, Tolerance and the Law' (1996) 70 Aust LJ 976, 978-980. For a list of indicia as to what constitutes a religion, see also Malnak v Yogi 592 F2d 197 (3d Cir 1979) and Church of the New Faith v Commissioner for Payroll Tax (Vic) (1983) 154 CLR 120, 132, 173, 174.

[7] South African Courts have held the following belief systems to be religions: Theravada Buddhism, (see Hartman (supra)); Rastafarianism, (see Prince (CC2) (supra) at paras 40, 97)) and Scientology, (see Church of Scientology in SA Incorporated Association Not for Gain v Readers' Digest Association SA (Pty) Limited 1980 (4) SA 313, 314G-H (C)). As regards Jehovah's Witnesses, see Simonlanga & Other v Masinga & Other 1976 (4) SA 373 (W).

law,[1] and religious and academic writings.[2] It would also require sensitivity to the fact that it would not be appropriate or desirable for a court to stand in judgment of the verity or acceptability of beliefs.[3]

(b) Sufficient burden

The second leg of the freedom of religion enquiry in cases in which the invalidity of or religious exemptions from ostensibly neutral statutes are at issue concerns the nature of the burden that has to be imposed on a religion in order for there to be a violation of the right to freedom of religion and belief. The right is clearly infringed where government measures impinge upon practices such as worship, teaching and observance,[4] or where they relate to other actions concerning the viability or existence of religious organisations or precepts of a faith. In other words, religious practices central to a faith are protected. What is less clear is whether practices that are not prescribed or proscribed by the organisation to which the individual belongs, but are simply motivated by, derived from, or related to the organisation's creed and commands, or the individual's faith, can be protected as part of the right to religious freedom. An ancillary issue is the extent to which it is competent or appropriate for a court to make such determinations.

---

[1] For a case in which a practice was not held to be 'religious' for the purpose of art 18 of the ICCPR, see MAB, WAT and J-AYT v Canada (Communication No 570/1993, Inadmissibility decision of April, 1994) 1994 HRC Rep, Vol II. In that matter, the Human Rights Committee dismissed a claim for protection under the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion by three Canadian citizens, who said they were leading members and 'plenipotentiaries' of an organisation named 'Assembly of the Church of the Universe', the beliefs and practices of which, according to the authors of the complaint, necessarily involved the care, cultivation, possession, distribution, maintenance, integrity, and worship of the 'Sacrament' of the church (which they referred to as 'God's tree of life', and which is generally known as cannabis or marijuana). The Human Rights Committee held that there was no violation of the right as the expression 'religion or belief' did not encompass 'a belief consisting primarily or exclusively in the worship and distribution of a narcotic drug'. See also B G Tahzib Freedom of Religion or Belief (1996) 278-279; United States v Meyers 95 F3d 1475, 1479 (10th Cir. 1996) (defendant tried to avoid conviction for drug violations by arguing that he was the 'founder and Reverend of the Church of Marijuana' and that it was 'his sincere belief that his religion commands him to use, possess, grow and distribute marijuana for the good of mankind and the planet Earth).

[2] See Tribe (supra) at 1181-1182:

> The most common approach to defining religion is to draw analogies to generally accepted religions. When such analogies focus on the externalities of a belief system or organization, they unduly constrain the concept of religion. As the theologian Harvey Cox has written: '[A] man-in-the-street approach would surely have ruled out early Christianity, which seemed both subversive and atheistic to the religious Romans of the day. The truth is that one man's 'bizarre cult' is another's true path to salvation . . .'. Externalities upon which courts cannot properly rely include the belief system's age, its apparent social value, its political elements, the number of its adherents, the sorts of demands it places on those adherents, the consistency of practice among different adherents, and the system's outward trappings- e.g., prayers, holy writings and hierarchical organizational structures. To be sure, courts should be wary of sudden births of religions that entitle practitioners to special rights or exemptions. But the proper place for that inquiry is in the assessment of the believer's sincerity, not in any evaluation of the belief's externalities.

[3] See Woolman 'Association' (supra) at §§ 44.1*(b),* 44.1*(c)* and 44.3*(c)*(viii).

[4] These practices are specifically mentioned as corollaries of the right to freedom of conscience, thought, belief and religion in art 18(1) of the ICCPR and art 9(1) of the ECHR.

Lower courts in South Africa have demonstrated little reluctance in engaging in debates as to what practices are truly dictated by religion, or whether a restriction on such practices constitutes a substantial burden on a claimant's faith. They have also shown no hesitation in finding that where impeded practices are not central to a faith, or when the burden on the faith is not substantial, a freedom of religion challenge should be rejected. In Christian Education South Africa (SE), the High Court held that the claimants had not shown that it was part of their religious beliefs that teachers and schools be empowered to administer corporal punishment to learners.[1] Liebenberg J stated that he had come to the conclusion that, on the applicant's own showing, the impugned section of the statute[2] 'does not constitute a substantial burden on the freedom of religion as practised in the applicant's constituent schools'.[3]

The Constitutional Court by contrast has shown a greater sensitivity to the claims of religious adherents.[4] In Christian Education South Africa (CC), Sachs J accepted that the appellant's members sincerely believed that parents are obliged by scriptural injunction to use corporal correction as an integral part of the upbringing of their children and also accepted that the impact of the relevant provision of the South African Schools Act was 'far from trivial'.[5] The case was therefore decided under the limitation clause, rather than on the basis of a failure to prove a violation of the right to freedom of religion. In a later case, Prince (CCII),[6] the Constitutional Court had no difficulty in concluding that the use of cannabis was central to the Rastafari religion and thus covered by s 15(1). Ngcobo J warned against courts enquiring too readily into the centrality of religious practices:[7]

> . . . as a general matter, the Court should not be concerned with questions whether, as a matter of religious doctrine, a particular practice is central to the religion. Religion is a matter of faith and belief. The beliefs that believers hold sacred and thus central to their religious faith may strike non-believers as bizarre, illogical or irrational. Human beings may

[1] See Christian Education South Africa (SE) (supra) at 1101G-1102A.

[2] South African Schools Act 84 of 1996.

[3] Christian Education South Africa (SE) (supra) at 1102E-1103H. See M du Plessis 'Doing Damage to Freedom of Religion' (2000) 11 Stell LR 295-305 (criticising the decision in Christian Education South Africa (SE) (supra) on the basis that the court inappropriately disputed the contents of the applicant members' religious beliefs).

See also Garden Cities Incorporated Association Not For Gain v Northpine Islamic Society 1999 (2) SA 257, 272D-H (C)(Conradie J found that the respondent had not made out a case on the papers for a finding that electronic amplification of the call to prayer was a fundamental tenet of Islamic religion: 'there is evidence on the affidavits that it has become a widespread practice for calls to prayer to be electronically amplified but there is nothing to suggest that such amplification has become a precept of the Islamic religion after centuries of call to prayer without sound equipment.')

[4] However, for criticism of the Constitutional Court's approach in Christian Education South Africa (supra), see M Pieterse 'Religious Confusion' (2001) 64 THRHR 672; S Woolman 'Association' (supra) at § 44.3*(c)*(viii). As far as the approach of the Supreme Court of Appeal is concerned, see N|kosi v Bürhmann 2002 (1) SA 372 (SCA) at paras 45 and 46 (Court considered the contents of a particular adherent's religious beliefs relating to funerals and graveside rites and rituals).

[5] Christian Education South Africa (CC) (supra) at para 37.

[6] Prince (CCII) (supra) at paras 42 and 97.

[7] Ibid at para 42.

> freely believe in what they cannot prove. Yet that their beliefs are bizarre, illogical or irrational to others, or are incapable of scientific proof, does not detract from the fact that these are religious beliefs for the purposes of enjoying the protection guaranteed by the right to freedom of religion. The believers should not be put to the proof of their beliefs or faith. For this reason, it is undesirable for courts to enter into the debate whether a particular practice is central to a religion unless there is a genuine dispute as to the centrality of the practice.

The comments of the Constitutional Court in Prince (CCII) echo those of the Supreme Court of the United States. In Lyng v Northwest Indian Cemetery ('Lyng), O'Connor J wrote:

> The dissent thus offers us the prospect of this court holding that some sincerely held religious beliefs and practices are not 'central' to certain religions, despite protestations to the contrary from the religious objectors who brought the lawsuit. In other words, the dissent's approach would require us to rule that some religious adherents misunderstand their own religious beliefs. We think that such an approach cannot be squared with the Constitution or with our precedents, and that it would cast the judiciary in a role that we were never intended to play.[1]

The US Supreme Court has, however, applied a 'substantial burden' test to determine whether there was an infringement of the free exercise of religion in cases such as Sherbert v Verner[2] and Wisconsin v Yoder.[3] The judgment of the US Supreme Court in Employment Division, Oregon v Smith prompted the United States Congress to enact a statute — The Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 — restoring the ('substantial burden') free exercise of religion test.[4]

Like the United States Supreme Court and the South African Constitutional Court, the German Constitutional Court has been reluctant to second-guess the religious claims of applicants or to reinterpret their own beliefs for them. In Rumpelkammer,[5] the Court overturned a lower court's decision, which, on the [1] 485 US 439, 108 SCt 1319, 1329-30 (1988). Ironically, the U.S. Supreme Court's reluctance in Lyng to engage in an evaluation of what is 'central' or 'indispensable', rather than peripheral or insignificant, to religious beliefs and practices, may have had the consequence of upholding conduct that would 'virtually destroy the Indians' ability to practice their religion' and thus have 'devastating effects on traditional Indian religious practices'. Lyng (supra) at 133 (Brennan J dissenting).

See also Smith (supra) where Scalia J stated 'nor is it possible to limit the impact of respondents' proposal by requiring a 'compelling state interest' only when the conduct prohibited is 'central' to the individual's religion. It is no more appropriate for judges to determine the 'centrality' of religious beliefs before applying a 'compelling interest' test in a free exercise field, than it would be for them to determine the 'importance' of ideas before applying the 'compelling interest' test in the free speech field. What principle of law or logic can be brought to bear to contradict a believer's assertion that a particular act is 'central' to his personal faith? Judging the centrality of different religious practices is akin to the unacceptable 'business of evaluating the relative merits of differing religious claims'. [Repeatedly] and in many different contexts, we have warned that courts must not presume to determine the place of a particular belief in a religion or the plausibility of a religious claim.'

[2] 374 US 398 (1963).

[3] 406 US 205 (1972).

[4] The Religious Freedom Restoration Act was held to be unconstitutional. See City of Boerne v Flores, Archbishop of St. Antonio 521 US 507, 117 SCt 2157, 138 LEd 2d 624 (1997).

[5] 24 BVerfGE 236 (1968).

grounds of unfair competition with commercial rag dealers, had forbidden a Catholic youth organisation (not incorporated into the Catholic church but institutionally connected with it) from encouraging practitioners to contribute rags and other old clothes to raise money for hunger relief.[1] In holding that charitable collection was an exercise of religion the Court reasoned as follows:

> In determining what is to be regarded as the free exercise of religion, we must consider the self-image of the religious or ideological community. The state would violate the independence of ideological associations and their internal freedom to organize accorded by the Constitution if it did not consider the way these associations see themselves when interpreting religious activity resulting form a specific confession or creed.
>
> The Catholic and Evangelical churches view the exercise of religion as encompassing not only the freedom of worship and believe but also the freedom to act on those beliefs in the real world. The active love of neighbour is understood by both Catholic and Evangelical churches as a fundamental religious duty. It follows from the nature of religious freedom outlined here that a charitable collection has a religious character and may claim the protection of Article 4(2) of the Constitution only if it meets certain conditions.[2]

The German Constitutional Court did not attempt to establish for itself whether the activities in question were truly central to, or core tenets of, the Catholic faith. At the same time, it did not abdicate all responsibility and simply accept the ipse dixit of the applicants.

The judgment in Religious Oath[3] further illustrates the deferential approach of the German Constitutional Court. An evangelical pastor was fined because he refused to be sworn in as a witness in criminal proceedings. His justification — that, according to Christ's word from the Sermon on the Mount, it was impermissible for him to take any oaths, even non-religious ones — was accepted by the Constitutional Court. His conviction was overturned.

Religious Oath is notable both for the majority and dissenting judgments. The majority judgment evinces an admirable tolerance for divergent religious positions. By contrast, the dissent, which rejected the pastor's claim on the grounds that he had misread the Sermon on the Mount, embodies an approach which could have disastrous consequences for religious freedom and, in particular, minority viewpoints.[4]

The majority impliedly criticises the dissent when it says that the pastor's view 'finds some support from the Bible', and that, in any event, '[t]he state may not evaluate its citizens' religious convictions or characterize these beliefs as 'right' or

[1] See Currie The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (supra) at 258-259.

[2] Ibid at 261-2 n94. See also D Kommers The Constitutional Jurisprudence of the Federal Republic of Germany (2nd Edition, 1997) 447.

[3] 33 BVerfGE (1972) 23.

[4] According to Justice von Schlabrendorff, in dissent, the Sermon on the Mount 'does not apply to the state', 'is not a law and, above all, is not a law for the earthly millennium. As a consequence, one may only read and understand the Sermon on the Mount from the standpoint of eschatology'. See Kommers (supra) at 456-457. Currie terms this dissent 'astounding' and suggests that it is surely 'up to the individual, within the limits of sincerity, to say what his own religion required'. Currie (supra) at 261-262 n 94.

'wrong'.[1] The majority's judgment is replete with a number of statements to the effect that 'the numerical strength of a particular faith or its relevance in society cannot be determinative', that Article 4(1) 'protects those infrequently occurring convictions which diverge from the teachings of the churches and religious communities' and that the state 'permits even outsiders and sects to develop their personalities in keeping with their subjective convictions, free of harassment'.[2]

In contrast to the approach of the South African Constitutional Court, the US Supreme Court and the German Constitutional Court, the Canadian courts have shown a far greater readiness to dip into the murky waters of religious doctrine. In Jones v The Queen ('Jones')[3] a pastor of a fundamentalist church in Alberta, who ran his own schooling programme, refused to apply for approval for his academy from the Department of Education as he was required to do by statute. He claimed that to do so would violate his religious convictions. In particular, he claimed that he could not make such an application, because to do so would acknowledge that the school board, a secular institution, was the source of his right and obligation to educate his children rather than God. He was, however, prepared to accept that the board could, of its own initiative, send an official to vet his academy. Furthermore, he was prepared to abide by the board's decision. His only concern was that he not be compelled to ask the state to permit him to perform God's will.

The approach of the majority of the Jones Court was to hold that even though the pastor claimed that he was being compelled to act contrary to his conscience, the statute was actually not contrary to his religious beliefs. Wilson J concluded that being required to recognise a secular role for the school did not entail that Jones 'replace God with the school board as the source of his right and his duty to educate his children'.[4] Wilson J was also of the view that, even if the legislation did compel action contrary to Jones' religious beliefs, 'any impact at all on [his] freedom of conscience and religion … is an extremely formalistic and technical one'. It would not give rise to a violation of s 2*(a)* of the Charter.[5]

This sort of judicial intervention is inappropriate. Courts should not assert that believers (and particularly ministers of religion) have incorrectly interpreted what their religion requires them to do. Indeed, the minority in Jones stated that 'a court is in no position to question the validity of a religious belief, notwithstanding that few share that belief'.[6]

---

[1] It is not objectionable for a Court to assert that religious convictions do not automatically trump the demands of citizenship. But what the State cannot do is assess whether, in its opinion, a believer has misunderstood the religious beliefs to which she adheres.

[2] Kommers (supra) at 454-456.

[3] [1986] 2 SCR 284, 31 DLR (4th) 569.

[4] Ibid at 575-8, 577-8.

[5] Ibid at 578. (Wilson J claimed that the effect of the statutory machinery for Jones' religion was 'trivial or insubstantial'.)

[6] Ibid at 591 (emphasis in the original). Even the approach of the minority is not, however, beyond criticism. La Forest J seemed to consider as relevant to a determination of the sincerity of Jones's religious convictions whether or not his beliefs on this score are typical or unusual. This again portrays a bias towards orthodox and mainstream beliefs that is inappropriate for a freedom of conscience and religion enquiry.

Lower courts in Canada have also shown a willingness to involve themselves in such doctrinal enquiries regarding burdens, centrality and sincerity. In Salvation Army, Canada East v Ontario (A-G),[1] the Ontario General Division ruled that the Pension Benefits Act (requiring that payment of pension benefits be guaranteed to members of the Salvation Army) did not violate the Salvation Army's freedom of religion because the principle and practice of 'voluntarism' is not a fundamental tenet or essential of the faith and therefore does not fall within the freedom covered by s 2*(a)*. Even if the freedom was impaired, the court reasoned, the burden imposed by the requirement of compliance with the relevant statute was trivial or insubstantial. The Court found that the practices in question were really only an administrative or pastoral in nature and did not derive from one of the deeply held convictions of the faith.[2]

The same approach has been employed by the European Commission of Human Rights. According to Shaw, the Commission has 'posited a distinction between actions expressing a belief, which may be protected under Article 9 if 'they are intimately linked' to the sphere of personal beliefs and religious creeds, and actions merely motivated or influenced by such beliefs or creeds, which will not be so protected'.[3]

As the cases above suggest, there is no uniformity in approach in open and democratic societies when it comes to determining which practices fall to be protected under the right of freedom of religion and belief. The preferred approach would, however, seem to be the one adopted by the South African Constitutional Court, the United States Supreme Court and the German Constitutional Court. According to this approach courts are not required to accept every claim of faith as the basis for a prima facie infringement of the right and then move immediately to a limitation clause analysis. However if freedom of religion is to be truly respected, even the most unorthodox beliefs and convictions should be given some credence. All the court need require is credible explanation for the religious practice under scrutiny.[1]

[1] (1992) 88 DLR (4th) 238.

[2] For further examples of a seemingly inappropriate determination as to the precepts of a faith, see Ontario (Attorney-General) v Dieleman (1994) 117 DLR (4th) 449, 748b-c ('Dieleman'). In that matter, Adams J, when (apparently correctly) dismissing a freedom of religion challenge, and granting an interlocutory injunction to restrict picketing protesting abortion, stated: 'If Umbertino's belief that her protest activity is required by her religion is not shared by the vast majority of the members of her religion, which is the case, it is difficult to conclude that her conduct constitutes the exercise, practice or manifestation of her religion.' The reasoning of Adams J is open to criticism on the basis that it could result in prejudicing of unusual views and the stifling of religious diversity and privileges religious conformity over individual conscience. In this regard, it is notably different from the judgment of the US Supreme Court in Thomas.

[3] Shaw (supra) at 458-9.

Nevertheless, in certain cases, a court will quite rightly examine how closely linked the practices for which protection is claimed are to the actual religious beliefs of the claimant.[2] Two cases, Arrowsmith v UK ('Arrowsmith')[3] and Grandmaison and Fritz v Federal Republic of Germany ('Grandmaison').[4] — both adjudicated in terms of art 9(1) of the ECHR[5] — provide germaine examples of situations in which conduct has not been held to fall within the ambit of the right to freedom of religion, conscience, thought and belief because it could not be linked closely to belief.

In Arrowsmith, the Commission held that although pacifism comes within the ambit of freedom of thought or conscience, distribution of leaflets which did not 'actually express the belief concerned' was not protected under Article 9(1). The fact that the distribution was motivated or influenced by pacifist convictions was

[1] Owing to the difficulty, in part, in evaluating the claims of religious adherents under the free exercise clause for this reason, it is important that cases be decided under other rights, when they are implicated. See Tribe (supra) at §14-12, 1249-1. Challenges brought inter alia under the free exercise clause may be upheld on the basis of freedom of expression. See West Virginia State Board of Education v Barnette 319 US 624 (1943) (Jehovah's Witnesses challenged school regulations requiring students to salute the American flag — something which they regarded as equivalent to worshipping a 'graven image'); Wooley v Maynard 430 US 705 (1977) (the refusal of Jehovah's Witnesses to be coerced into displaying New Hampshire's state motto, 'Live Free or Die', on their car licence plates.) See also Heffron v International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON) 452 US 640 (1981) (decided (and rejected) on the basis of the right to freedom of expression, notwithstanding the allegation that the regulations in question suppressed religious rituals. Challenge was by a religious society espousing the views of the Krishna religion to rules prohibiting the sale or distribution at a state fair of printed or written material, except from booths, on the basis that it was a religious ritual for members of the Krishna religion to go into public places to distribute or sell religious literature.)

[2] See Woolman 'Association' (supra) at §§ 44.1*(c)* and 44.2*(b)*. See also American Life League v Reno 855 FSupp 137, 144 (ED Va 1994). (That case concerns picketing and physical obstruction of abortion clinics by anti-abortion activitists, contrary to the Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act of 1994, which was sought to be justified on the basis of the free exercise of religion clause. This kind of activity would appear to fall under s 17 (the right to assembly, demonstration, picket and petition) or even s 16 (the right to freedom of expression). Consequently, unless claimants in a comparable case in South Africa could show that a prohibition on picketing abortion clinics was integrally linked to their faith, their claims should not be able to succeed under s 15(1). The District Court may however have gone too far in its centrality enquiry, as evidenced by the following comments in the judgment: 'It suffices here to note that the plaintiffs have not alleged in any of their three complaints and do not contend in their memoranda that physical obstruction of abortion clinics is a sacrament or important ritual necessary to their observance of their faith'. Nevertheless, the court was seemingly correct to enquire whether picketing was sufficiently closely linked to Catholicism to warrant protection under the guarantee of freedom of religion. See also Dieleman (supra) at 748b-c (a freedom of religion justification for picketing in protest against an abortion clinic.)

[3] No 7050/75, 19 DR 5 (1980).

[4] 53 DR 150 (1987).

[5] As already mentioned, art 9(1) grants everyone the freedom, 'either alone, or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief, in worship, teaching, practice and observance'.

held to be too attenuated a link. In Grandmaison, the distribution of leaflets to soldiers was viewed as undermining military discipline. The distribution of the leaflets was not regarded as capable of being the manifestation or expression of a belief. Once again the conduct was not held to be a protected 'practice'.[1]

Arrowsmith and Grandmaison are, however, cases that concern expressions of conscience rather than religious belief. Though there may be no good reason to favour religious belief over conscience,[2] courts may be inclined to grant more scope for making centrality enquiries in respect of matters of conscience.

(c) The problem of doctrinal entanglement

A constant refrain in the United States Supreme Court decisions referred to above is the need for a court to avoid becoming enmeshed in debates about the validity, merits or truths of religious beliefs, or their importance to believers. In short, the Courts need to avoid doctrinal entanglement.

The United States Supreme Court's desire to avoid making judgments that call for investigation into religions and of individual beliefs is no doubt partly motivated by a desire to avoid any state entanglement with religion. US Courts would foreground Establishment Clause concerns.[3] But, as the Court explained in United States v Ballard,[4] the desire to avoid doctrinal entanglement also rests on separate free exercise grounds.[5]

[1] Compare X v Federal Republic of Germany 24 DR 137 (the wish of a man to be buried on his own land), with the decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Nkosi v Bührmann 2002 (1) SA 372 (SCA) (the refusal of an orthodox Jew to hand over the letter of repudiation (guett or 'get') to his ex-wife after their divorce). (As regards Jewish divorces and 'gets' in South African law, see s 5A of the Divorce Act, 70 of 1979 (inserted by the Divorce Amendment Act, 95 of 1996); the Hon Mr Justice M W Friedman 'Jewish divorces — a purposeful and pragmatic solution by the South African Law Commission' (1994) 111 SALJ 97; and Raik v Raik 1993 (2) SA 617 (W).)

[2] It might perhaps be contended that, inasmuch as religious beliefs could involve matters of divine revelation or precepts of faith, they are less readily susceptible to rational, objective analysis than matters of conscience. There may be some truth in this, but people can conscientiously hold beliefs that are worthy of protection even if they cannot articulate coherently the justifications therefor.

[3] See Lemon v Kurtzman 403 US 602 (1971)(the third requirement of the establishment clause is stated to be that a statute 'not foster 'an excessive government entanglement with religion').

[4] 322 US 78 (1944).

[5] For other cases (involving internal church disputes) in which it has been held that courts should refrain from deciding matters of religious doctrine in order not to impinge upon religious autonomy, see Jones v Wolf 443 US 595 (1979); Presbyterian Church in the United States v Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Memorial Presbyterian Church 393 US 440 (1969); Kedroff v St Nicholas Cathedral 344 US 94 (1952); Serbian Orthodox Diocese v Milivojevich 426 US 696 (1976).

The dangers of doctrinal entanglement have been recognised by South African courts, most notably in Ryland v Edros,[1] Worcester Muslim Jamaa v Valley & others,[2] and Mankatshu v Old Apostolic Church of Africa & others.[3] Doctrinal entanglement is the guiding principle for enquiries into both the sincerity of beliefs and the burden of government measures on religious faiths. This principle could well result in courts becoming more reluctant to interfere in internal disputes of religious organisations.[4]

41.4 Limitations on the Right to Freedom of Religion

After the infringement of the right to freedom of religion is established, it is necessary to examine whether the contravention of the right is justifiable in terms of the limitation clause.[5] The limitation clause enquiry is apt to be of

[1] 1997 (2) SA 690, 702F-703D (CC), 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC). Farlam J (as he then was) stated: 'I myself raised the doctrinal entanglement point after reading the instructive article by F Cachalia 'Citizenship, Muslim family law and a future South African Constitution: A preliminary enquiry' (1993) 56 THRHR 392, 400 in which the following statement appears: 'Thus Islam is a 'revelational culture', which does not differentiate between law and religion, positive legal rules and moral prescripts, the religious and the profane, and the public and the private. . . .' Mr Cachalia also states, as did the witnesses who testified at the trial, that the > Holy Quran is the fundamental source of Islamic law, and in the Muslim belief system, it constituted the ipsissima verba of Almighty God. The Holy Quran, together with compilations of the practices and traditions of the Prophet Mohammed form a body of commandments (sharia) which govern all aspects of a Muslim's life, including marriage, divorce and devolution of property on death.

That being so, it seemed to me that there was a distinct danger that by making rulings on the issues before the Court I might unwittingly become entangled in doctrinal matters which it is inappropriate and indeed undesirable, for the reasons given in the American decisions such as Jones v Wolf (supra), for a Judge in a secular Court to do in a country which has a constitution which entrenches every person's 'right to freedom of conscience, religion, thought, belief and opinion . . .' (as ours does in s 14(1)). It is true that our Constitution, unlike the Constitution of the United States, does not have an establishment clause but it seems clear that, although the American rule against doctrinal entanglement is to some extent prompted by establishment concerns, the rule also rests on independent free exercise clause grounds as was explained in United States v Ballard (supra): cf also the approach of the majority in the German Constitutional Court in the Religious Oath Case (supra), a decision on art 4 of the Basic Law, which deals with freedom of faith, conscience and creed.

[2] 2002 (6) BCLR 591 (C).

[3] 1994 (2) SA 458 (TkA).

[4] For example, disputes as to ownership of property or whether there was proper adherence to ecclesiastical rules in elections or disciplinary proceedings. See Woolman 'Association' (supra) at §§ 44.1*(b)* and (c), and § 44.3*(c)*(viii). For US Supreme Court cases on these questions, see Jones v Wolf (supra), Presbyterian Church in the United States v Mary Elizabeth Blue Hull Memorial Presbyterian Church (supra), Kedroff v St Nicholas Cathedral (supra), Serbian Orthodox Diocese v Milivojevich (supra).

[5] Prince (CCII) at para 45.

greater import in freedom of religion cases given the deference that is likely to be accorded claims of religious adherents.[1] While the nature of this exercise is addressed in some detail elsewhere in this work[2], it is appropriate to make some observations at this juncture of the specific relevance of s 36 analysis in the freedom of religion cases.

(a) Reasonable and justifiable limitations on religious practice

An important distinction in relation to the limitation of religious freedom is traditionally regarded as being between the holding of religious or non-religious beliefs, on the one hand, and the practice of religion, on the other. Many commentators write that the right to hold a religious belief, or any other belief or world-view is inviolable.[3] This would seem to be correct. Thus persons could not constitutionally be required to forswear allegiance to any religion; nor could persons be obliged to pledge allegiance to, or be forced to join, a particular religion in order to qualify for state benefits or admission to state institutions. However, apart from these limited examples, it is difficult to see how — in the absence of telepathy and mind control — the freedom to hold a belief can be meaningfully restricted.

The right to manifest religious or other conscientiously held beliefs in practice is, however, clearly capable of being limited. International and regional human rights instruments expressly recognize this potentiality.[4]

Bans or restrictions on suicide cults or religious sects whose activities could

[1] For a discussion of s 36(1) in freedom of religion cases, see Christian Education South Africa (CC) (supra) at paras 29-31; Prince (CCII) (supra) at paras 45-47 (Ngcobo J); 128 (the Majority); 151, 155 (Sachs J). In Christian Education South Africa (CC), the Constitutional Court confirmed, to the extent that this may have been necessary, that there is no requirement on the state to show a 'compelling interest' in order to justify an infringement of the right to freedom of religion — even where the burden on religion is demonstrably substantial. The extent of the burden imposed on religion would, however, be a factor that would go into the balancing or proportionality enquiry, which inter alia involves a consideration of the 'nature and extent of the limitation' (s 36(1)(c) of the Constitution).

[2] See S Woolman 'Limitation' in M Chaskalson, J Kentridge, J Klaaren, G Marcus, D Spitz & S Woolman (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (1st Edition, RS 5, 1999) Chapter 12.

[3] See De Waal et al (supra) at 296; D Meyerson Rights Limited (1997) 2; L du Plessis & H Corder Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights (1994) 158. No limitation of that right is, for example, permitted under art 18 of the ICCPR or art 9 of the ECHR. See K Partsch in L Henkin (ed) The International Bill of Rights (1981); M Nowak UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: CCPR Commentary (1993); D J Harris et al Law of the European Convention on Human Rights (1995) 365-366.

[4] For example, Art 1(3) of the United Nations Declaration on the Elimination of All Forms of Intolerance and Discrimination Based on Religion or Belief (1991) (this clause qualifies the religious practices listed in art 6 of the Declaration), Art 18(3) of the ICCPR, Art 9(2) of the ECHR, and Art 12(3) of the American Convention on Human Rights (1978) all use roughly the same words to describe permissible limitations (that the freedom to manifest one's religion and/or beliefs 'shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary to protect public safety, order, health, or morals or the fundamental rights and freedoms of others').

potentially cause physical harm to the general public would likely pass constitutional muster. To the extent that the existence and activities of such religious groupings were not prohibited by existing legislation, more specific statutes could potentially outlaw them.[1]

The jurisprudence of the U.S. Supreme Court reveals a readiness to uphold restrictions on religious freedom when confronted with religious demands made within prison or within the military. The Court has upheld regulations forbidding a religious observance like the wearing of a yarmulke by a devout Jew while in Air Force uniform,[2] and regulations that restricted the freedom of a prisoner to observe religious practices.[3] A number of rulings of the European Commission confirm this trend.[4] The Commission has, for example, upheld a ban on a Buddhist prisoner growing a beard,[5] and refused to accept an argument that religious precepts should be taken into account when providing prison food.[6] The grounds, in such cases, for differentiating prison and military populations from other classes of citizens is suspect at best. On the other hand, the basis for other restrictions seem obvious. The European Commission was quite correct in giving short shrift to a Sikh who argued that high-caste Sikhs are not allowed by their religion to clean floors[7] and in denying a prisoner access to a religious book which contained an illustrated chapter on martial arts techniques.[8]

Laws or regulations that endorse or display a clear preference for one religion would violate the right to freedom of religion of adherents of other faiths.[9] The constitutional concern with diversity, as well as the constitutional values of freedom and equality, would seemingly prevent the sectarian motivation underlying such laws from being accepted as a legitimate government objective, and thus preclude any such laws being upheld under the limitation clause.[10] To survive s 36 analysis government laws that directly or indirectly benefit a particular religion (without endorsing it), or that, conversely, restrict or prejudice the practices of a

[1] See Ross v New Brunswick School District No 15 [1996] 1 SCR 825 (a schoolteacher publicly disseminated the opinion that Christian civilization was being destroyed by an international Jewish conspiracy. The bulk of the punishment meted out to Ross was held to be a justifiable limitation of his right to freedom of religion and conscience.)

[2] Goldman v Weinberger 475 US 503, 106 SCt 1310 (1986).

[3] O'Lone v Estate of Shabazz 482 US 342 (1987).

[4] See also Arrowsmith (supra) and Grandmaison (supra).

[5] X v Austria 1753/63 Yearbook VIII (1965) 174 (184).

[6] See P Van Dijk & G J H van Hoof Theory and Practice of the European Convention on Human Rights (2nd Edition) 404 , 404n1062).

[7] X v UK 28 DR 5, 27, 38 (1982). See also Van Dijk & Van Hoof (supra) at 404; Shaw (supra) at 459-460.

[8] X v UK No. 6886/75 5 DR 100 (1976).

[9] See § 41.2*(d)* above.

[10] See Ryland v Edros 1997 (2) SA 690, 707G (C): 'It is quite inimical to all the values of the new South Africa for one group to impose its values on another'. This passage is quoted with approval in Amod v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accidents Fund 1999 (4) SA 1319, 1329C-D (SCA) and Solberg (supra) at 1228A-B. See S Wooman 'Limitations' (supra) at § 12.6.

particular faith, must therefore be supported by an objectively reasonable purpose, or what Denise Meyerson has called 'neutral reasons'[1].

An ancillary question is whether sectarian religious reasons can be considered by the legislature when engaging issues such as corporal punishment, abortion, or school curricula. This issue has generated considerable debate amongst political and legal philosophers. According to John Rawls and Kent Greenawalt, faith-based reasons simpliciter are insufficient justification for political action.[2] Rawls argues that choices of political representatives should be justifiable on the basis of 'public reasons'. Greenawalt asserts that 'explicit reliance [by legislators] on any controversial religious or other comprehensive view would be inappropriate',[3] because when legislators speak on political issues, they represent all their constituents. However, neither philosopher denies that religious dictates can be the basis or motivation for the legislator's position. Thus, while the kinds of crassly sectarian religious motivations that were so prevalent prior to April 1994 may be prohibited in the new constitutional era, banishing religion entirely from political fora, and precluding adherents from attempting to influence public debates, would itself violate the right to religious freedom.[4]

(b) Infringements by neutral, generally applicable, measures

The most common form of state interference with religious liberty is by means of facially neutral government measures that are not intended to prejudice any particular religion but which have the effect of doing so. The extent to which it is > the reference in the limitation clause to an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom implies that no limit on the right to religious freedom is permissible unless justified in terms of reasons which would carry at least some weight with all reasonable people who relate to each other as possessors of equal moral status' and that 'such reasons will be public reasons, or reasons which are independent of particular intractably disputed religious views and those views' own internal standards of justification.

[1] See Meyerson Rights Limited (supra) at 21. Professor Mayerson also wrote that:

Ibid at 19. For example, a legislature may prohibit the followers of a particular religion from making human sacrifices at their ceremonies on the basis of preventing physical harm — the involuntary loss of innocent life. As Meyerson points out, the status of such measures 'can be defended in terms of which any reasonable person, regardless of their religious beliefs, would accord at least some weight'. Ibid. See also D Meyerson 'Reading the Constitution through the Lens of Legal Philosophy', Inaugural Lecture, University of Cape Town, 8 October 1997 at ss II and III.

[2] See K Greenawalt Religious Convictions of Political Choice (1988); K Greenawalt Private Consciences and Public Reasons (1995); J Rawls Political Liberalism (1992); J Rawls 'The Idea of Public Reason Revisited' (1997) 64 University of Chicago LR 765; Michael J Perry Religion in Politics: Constitutional and Moral Perspectives (1997).

[3] Greenawalt Private Consciences and Public Reasons (supra) at 157.

[4] See Chamberlain v Surrey School District No. 36 [2002] 4 SCR 710 (Case concerning whether a school board had exceeded its authority under the School Act by making a decision to exclude books depicting same-sex parented families from Kindergarten-Grade One in order to accommodate the moral and religious beliefs of some parents that homosexuality was wrong. The majority of the Canadian Supreme Court in that case, although overturning the decision of the British Columbia Court of Appeal and setting aside the school board's decision, held that s 76 of the School Act — which required school boards to conduct schools on 'strictly secular and non-sectarian principles' and to inculcate 'the highest morality' while avoiding the teaching of any 'religious dogma or creed' — did not preclude decisions motivated in whole or in part by religious considerations, provided they were otherwise within the Board's powers.)

appropriate to limit religious freedom in this manner (by not providing for an exemption for adherents of affected religions) is therefore of critical importance to freedom of religion analysis.

Courts are often reluctant to grant such exemptions: especially when a religious institution seeks an exemption from a criminal prohibition.[1] The Australian High Court, in Church of the New Faith v Commissioner for Payroll Tax (Vic)[2], refused to extend legal immunity to conduct contravening a criminal law of general application. The Court wrote:

> The freedom to act in accordance with one's religious beliefs is not as inviolate as the freedom to believe, for general laws to preserve and protect society are not defeated by a plea of religious obligation to breach them. Religious conviction is not a solvent of legal obligation.

The United States Supreme Court adopted a similar approach in Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v Smith.[3] The majority held that an Oregon law prohibiting the knowing or intentional possession of a 'controlled substance', including the hallucinogenic drug peyote, was not unconstitutional by virtue of failing to make an exception for the ingestion of peyote for sacramental purposes at ceremonies of the Native American Church.[4]

The South African Constitutional Court has not expressed the same reservations as regards the granting of religious exemptions from generally applicable statutes. However, it has refused to grant exemptions in both cases in which one has been sought.[5] The recognition of the need for exemptions and the refusal to grant them automatically is captured by the following passage from Christian Education South Africa (CC)[6] (and reiterated by the majority in Prince (CCII)):

> The underlying problem in any open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom in which conscientious and religious freedom has to be regarded with appropriate seriousness, is how far such democracy can and must go in allowing members of religious communities to define for themselves which laws they will obey and which not. Such a society can cohere only if all its participants accept that certain basic norms and standards are binding. Accordingly, believers cannot claim an automatic right to be exempted by their beliefs from the laws of the land. At the same time, the State should,

[1] See John Locke A Letter Concerning Toleration (1689) (reprinted in J Locke A Letter Concerning Toleration in Focus (1991) 36-37). Locke argues that neither a religion nor its adherents should not be exempted from a neutral criminal prohibition enacted for the good of society.

[2] (1983) 154 CLR 120, 135-136 (Mason ACJ and Brennan J). See also the Hon Mr Justice D Malcolm 'Religion, Tolerance and the Law' (1996) 70 Aust LJ 976, 980.

[3] 494 US 872 (1990).

[4] The US Supreme Court had previously mandated an exemption in a criminal law in Wisconsin v Yoder (supra). It had also been predisposed to require that personal choices arising out of religious motivations be exempted from formally neutral state requirements. See Tribe (supra) at §14-7, 1193. As regards the approach of Canadian courts to exemptions, see W Freedman 'Up in Smoke: Judicially Mandated Constitutional Exemptions for Religiously Motivated Conduct' (2002) 13 Stell LR 135, 140-144.

[5] See § 41.2*(c)* above.

[6] Christian Education South Africa (CC) (supra) at para 35.

wherever reasonably possible, seek to avoid putting believers to extremely painful and intensely burdensome choices of either being true to their faith or else respectful of the law.[1]

(c) Conflicts with other constitutional rights

Rights to religious freedom can potentially be outweighed by other constitutionally protected rights. Religious freedom will conflict with and sometimes give way to rights such as the rights of the child (s 28),[2] the right to freedom of expression (s 16),[3] the right to dignity (s 10),[4] the right to freedom and security of the person (s 12),[5] and the right to equality (s 9).

Religious freedom is apt to run up most often against demands for equality.[6] These demands will be most compelling with regard to discrimination on the basis of race, sex or sexual orientation.[7] The extent to which religious institutions

[1] Prince (CCII) (supra) at para 115.

[2] See Kotze v Kotze 2003 (3) SA 628 (T) (A provision in a settlement agreement in an unopposed divorce requiring that '[b]oth parties undertake to educate the minor child in the Apostolic Church and to educate the minor child in the religious activities of that church' not made an order of court as not in the child's best interests); Dunscombe v Willies 1982 (3) SA 311 (D) (an application for variation of a custody order to deny the non-custodian father, a Jehovah's Witness, who refused to refrain from attempting to inculcate in his children the tenets of his faith, access to the divorced parties' minor children); Allsop v McCann [2000] 3 All SA 475 (C) (an application by a custodian parent to prevent a child from attending the non-custodian parent's church). For commentary on the case, see E Bonthuys & M Pieterse 'Divorced parents and the religious instruction of their children: Allsop v McCann (2001) 118 SALJ 216. See also P v S (1993) 108 DLR (4th) 287 (SC) (a case concerning whether the imposition of restrictions on the right of access of a divorced father (a Jehovah's Witness) to his child contravened his right to freedom of religion under the Canadian Charter); and Young v Young [1993] 4 SCR 3 (relating to a restriction in a custody order precluding the father from discussing the Jehovah's Witness religion with his children when he had access to them). For cases involving the refusal of a Jehovah's Witness parents to consent to a blood transfusion for their child; B (R) v Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto [1995] 1 SCR 315, (1995) 122 DLR (4th) 1 (SC).

[3] See Otto-Preminger-Institut v Austria (1995) 19 EHRR 34 (upholding the seizure and forfeiture of a film found likely to offend the religious feelings of Catholics, despite the infringement on the right to freedom of expression).

[4] See Tobacco Atheist 12 BVerfGE 1 (1960) (Case concerns a convict whose parole application had been denied on the ground that he had attempted to bribe fellow inmates by offering them tobacco to forswear their religion. The German Constitutional Court held that the denial of parole did not infringe his religious freedom, as the right to proselytise did not permit proselytisation inconsistent with the dignity of others). See also Currie The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (supra) at 253; Kommers (supra) at 452-453.

[5] See Christian Education South Africa (CC) (supra) at paras 39-47 (prohibition on corporal punishment of learners challenged on the basis of a violation of the right to freedom of religion); X, Y & Z v Sweden 5 EHRR 47 (1983) (a complaint that the Swedish criminal law which prohibited parents from physically chastising their children was a violation of freedom of religion).

[6] Two statutes likely to elicit equality challenges to religious practices are the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 and the Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995.

[7] Religious institutions must be allowed to differentiate on the basis of religion or belief. See De Waal et al (supra) at 292; C Albertyn, B Goldblatt & C Roederer (eds) Introduction to the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act, 4 of 2000 (2001) 76; S Woolman 'Association' (supra) at §§ 44.1*(b)* and (c) and 44.2*(b)*.

are permitted to (continue to) differentiate on these grounds is captured by the following three scenarios.[1]

The first scenario involves discrimination against a person with spiritual responsibilities (such as priest or a candidate for ordination). Few exercises are more central to religious freedom than the right of a church to choose its own spiritual leaders. If a court were to hold that churches could not deem sexual orientation, or any of the other enumerated grounds in the equality clause, a disqualifying factor for the priesthood, the effect on many churches could be devastating. Consequently, although the value of equality is foundational to the new constitutional dispensation, it is unlikely that equality considerations could outweigh the enormous impact of failing to give churches an exemption in relation to their spiritual leaders.[2] Where the appointment, dismissal and employment conditions of religious leaders (such as priests, imams, rabbis, and so forth) are concerned, religious bodies are likely to be exempted from compliance with legislation prohibiting unfair discrimination.[3] One way in which this could be achieved would be by exempting the church-minister relationship from labour relations legislation on the grounds that 'ministry' is a 'calling' involving duties to God, and thus does not involve an employment relationship.[4] Indeed, in Church of the Province of Southern Africa, Diocese of Cape Town v Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration[5], the Labour Court held that an ordained priest was not an 'employee' for the purposes of the 1995 Labour Relations Act.[6]

The second scenario relates to discrimination against employees of a seminary or Christian school. Factors militating against legal intervention might include the job

[1] See P Farlam 'Liberation Through the Law? The Constitution and the Church' in P Germond & S de Gruchy (eds) Aliens in the Household of God (1997) 136-141.

[2] In the light of the history of South Africa, the principle of racial equality is particularly fundamental. If a church sought to justify this racial discrimination in the choice of clergy on biblical or theological grounds, it might therefore not escape legal sanction. A Court would no doubt examine closely the basis for the discrimination and scrutinise the justification therefor (while still hopefully being mindful of the danger of doctrinal entanglement).

[3] See McClure v Salvation Army 460 F2d 553 (5th Cir 1972). The Salvation Army was deemed not to be in violation of the prohibition on sex discrimination when it fired McClure, a female officer of the Salvation Army.

[4] See Davies v Presbyterian Church of Wales [1986] 1 All ER 705 (HL). See also, Diocese of Southwark v Coker [1998] ICR 140 (CA); Mabon v Conference of the Methodist Church of New Zealand [1998] 3 NZLR 513 and Knowles v The Anglican Church Property Trust, Diocese of Bathurst (1999) 89 IR 47. The possibility of this sort of approach being adopted in New Zealand to safeguard the right of religious freedom under the Human Rights Act 1993 was discussed by P Rishworth 'Coming Conflicts over Freedom of Religion' in G Huscroft and P Rishworth (eds) Rights and Freedoms: The New Zealand Bill of Rights Act 1990 and the Human Rights Act 1993 (1995) 247.

[5] 2002 (3) SA 385 (LC), [2001] 11 BLLR 1213.

[6] The 'church minister' exemption might also be available for a person such as a church organist or a director of music at a church, whose ecclesiastical functions involve sufficient pastoral or liturgical leadership for them to be considered to occupy analogous posts to ministers. For US cases in which the 'church-minister' exemption has been extended to such musical figures, see Walker v First Presbyterian Church 22 Fair Empl Prac Cases (BNA) 762 (Cal Superior Ct 1980) (a church that dismissed a gay organist was granted immunity from action under a city ordinance forbidding discrimination on the basis of sexual preference), and Assemany v Archdiocese of Detroit 434 NW 2d 233 (Mich App 1988) (a church that dismissed a musical director was similarly immunised on the basis of the 'church-minister' exemption).

description of the person suffering the discrimination and the impact on religious freedom of not granting the religious institution an exemption. If, for example, the seminary or theological faculty could show that a teaching post involved substantial religious responsibilities, the seminary might be able to succeed in obtaining an exemption from anti-discrimination legislation using the analogy of the 'church-minister' exemption. In the United States, the Catholic University of America succeeded in defeating a job discrimination suit by a nun who claimed she was denied tenure in the university's canon law department on the basis of her sex.[1] Furthermore, if a Christian school could show that leading an 'exemplary Christian life' was an important part of every teacher's job description — 'exemplary', of course, being interpreted by the church in accordance with its own tenets — then it is conceivable that the church would be given some latitude to flout the legal prohibition on employment discrimination.[2]

Apart from these sorts of special circumstances, however, religious institutions — like schools, seminaries or universities — would probably not be deemed exempt from an anti-discrimination law. In general, one's gender, marital status, ethnic or social origin, pregnancy or language (to list just a few of the s 9(3) prohibited grounds) could not be legitimately considered a negative factor by a Christian educational body when evaluating a person for a teaching post. It is that much more true of applicants for non-teaching positions. Consequently, if a Christian college dismissed a laboratory co-ordinator or a computer systems analyst or a secretary, on finding out that the person was homosexual, it would not avail the educational institution to say that 'it holds strong religious views against homosexuality or homosexual practices'.[3] The same reasoning would seemingly be applicable where a church dismissed an employee engaged in a non-spiritual task — for example, a receptionist or typist[4] on the basis of one of the prohibited grounds. A different outcome might, however be required if employment as a secretary was made conditional on church membership, and the person so employed was subsequently excommunicated from the church because of his or her involvement in a gay or lesbian relationship.[5] The logic of the distinction is that the secretary understood the membership criteria of the church when she joined the church and bound herself to them.

---

[1] EEOC & McDonough v Catholic University of America (CA DC, No 94-5263, 14/5/96). See also EEOC v Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary 651 F2d 277 (5th Cir. 1981) (the court held that all academics in the theological seminary qualified as ministers, and that the 'church-minister' exemption therefore applied to all of them. It has not, however, been held that teachers and administrators in a religious school are 'ministers' for the purpose of this exemption); EEOC v Tree of Life Christian School 751 FSupp 700 (SD Ohio 1990).

[2] In Canada, religious schools have escaped legal sanction after dismissing teachers for indulging in practices (such as having an extra-marital relationship or remarrying after a divorce) which the religious institutions deemed inconsistent with their teachings. See Caldwell v Stuart (1984) 56 NR 83; Garrod v Rhema Christian School (1991) 18 CHRR 47; Kearley v Pentecostal Assemblies Board of Education (1993) 19 CHRR 473.

[3] King's College in Edmonton, Alberta, Canada fired an employee who performed a secular task: see Vriend v Alberta [1998] 1 SCR 493. See also Vriend v Alberta 132 DLR (4th) 595, 599a-b (Alb CA) (1996).

[4] Whitney v Grater NY Corp of Seventh-Day Adventists 401 FSupp 1363 SDNY (1975) in which the free exercise claim of the religious employer was rejected.

[5] See Geraci v Eckankar 526 NW 2d 39 (Minn Ct App 1995).

In a third set of scenarios, a religiously affiliated publisher, bookshop, hospital or other business may attempt to dismiss an employee, or refuse to hire an applicant on the basis of that person's gender, sexual orientation, or marital status. It is extremely unlikely that the church-minister analogy or the role model exemption, which could be used to justify discrimination under the previous scenarios, would be available to an employer in this context.[1] Nor would religious freedom be likely to be undermined in any substantial way by a ruling prohibiting discrimination on any of the grounds listed in s 9(3) (other than religion or belief). Some may even query whether there is any infringement of religious freedom in this context. It may be argued that it is a secular, and not a religious, activity that is being regulated, and thus the right to freedom of religion is not implicated. A court should, however, exercise caution before making such a ruling, due to the problem of doctrinal entanglement and the danger of ignoring, or stifling, the diversity of religious and secular beliefs.

(d) Waiver of the right to religious freedom

The question of whether a person is capable of waiving the right to religious freedom has thus far arisen in a number of High Court cases.

In Wittmann v Deutscher Schulverein, Pretoria, & others,[2] the High Court was required to consider whether a private school infringed the right of freedom of religion protected by IC s 14 when it compelled a pupil to attend religious instruction classes and morning assemblies that included prayers. The religious instruction sessions were not devotional in nature, but the prayers at assembly were. The plaintiff wanted compelled attendance at both to be declared unconstitutional. The school had previously allowed children to opt out of the religious instruction classes. But it changed its policy and had, since the introduction of a more academic form of religious instruction, made it virtually impossible to opt out of the classes. The plaintiff's child was admitted to the school after it had made more restrictive its policy on religious instruction.

Van Dijkhorst J characterized the issue in terms of religious freedom. As a result, he had to decide as whether, if the religious instruction was of a confessional nature, the German School acted unconstitutionally in enforcing attendance at these classes.[3] Van Dijkhorst J found that this private school was not a 'state-aided school' in terms of IC s 14(2) and was also not an organ of state. IC s 14(2) therefore did not apply. Van Dijkhorst J then went on to hold that even if the school had been a state-aided one, the compulsion would have been constitutional because the parent had voluntarily agreed to abide by the school rules and had thus waived any right of non-attendance in terms of IC s 14(2).[1]

[1] There are numerous American cases holding the 'church-minister' exception inapplicable to employees holding jobs in secular, albeit religiously affiliated, businesses. See, for example, EEOC v Pacific Press Publishing Association 676 F2d 1272 (CA 9th Cir 1982), where an editorial secretary of a publishing house was held not to be a 'minister'; and Lukaszewski v Nazareth Hospital 764 FSupp 57 (ED Pa 1991), in which a director of a physical plant at a hospital was not considered a 'minister'.

[2] 1998 (4) SA 423 (T), 1999 (1) BLCR 92 (T).

[3] Ibid at 438F-G.

In Garden Cities Incorporated Association Not For Gain v North Pine Islamic Society,[2] the High Court was faced with the question of whether the right to freedom of religion (or, for that matter, any other right protected by the Constitution) could be waived in a written contract. The applicant was in the business of developing townships. The respondent had been formed to establish a mosque in an area under development. The respondent had agreed, in a contract for the purchase of property in the township, not to conduct any activities on the property that would, in the opinion of the applicant, cause a nuisance or in some other way disturb the other owners in the township. In particular, the respondent had undertaken not to use any sound amplification on or in the buildings or structures to be erected on the land and not to issue any audible 'calls to prayer'. Instead, a light would be switched on at the appointed hour of prayer. By its own admission, the respondent never intended to honour clause 20 of the agreement of sale that set out these restrictions. Instead, it claimed that the clause infringed its right to freedom of religion protected by s 15(1) of the final Constitution.

Conradie J held that the applicant's freedom of religion had not been infringed.[3] The contract did not more than 'consensually regulate a particular ritual practised at a particular place'.[4] He also concluded that the respondent could waive any religious rights in the contract and that the sanctity of the contract should be upheld. In support of his conclusion Conradie J cited the words of Van Schalkwyk J in Knox D'Arcy Ltd & another v Shaw & another[5]:

> It must be understood that there is a moral dimension to a promise which is seriously given and accepted. It is generally regarded as immoral and dishonourable for a promissory to breach his trust and, even if he does so to escape the consequences of a poorly considered bargain, there is no principle that inheres in an open and democratic society, based upon freedom and equality, which would justify his repudiation of his obligations. On the other hand, the enforcement of a bargain (even one which was ill-considered) gives recognition to the important constitutional principle of the autonomy of the individual.

The result in both cases is correct.[6] However, the waiver of fundamental rights and freedoms is best avoided if at all possible. Simply put, allowing rights and freedoms to be bartered or sold diminishes their value.

[1] Ibid at 455E.
[2] 1999 (2) SA 268 (C).
[3] See Garden Cities (supra) at 271H-I. Ibid at 271B.
[4] Whether it is correct, or at least advisable, for a Court to grapple with what constitutes a tenet of the Islamic faith is an issue dealt with under § 41.3(b) supra.
[5] 1996 (2) SA 651 (W), 1995 (12) BCLR 1702 (W) (Constitutionality of a restraint of trade clause).
[6] See Kotze v Kotze (supra) at 631C (as regards a waiver of the right to freedom of religion).

41.5 Religious Observances in State or State-aided Institutions: Section 15(2)

In an attempt to avoid a debate — such as that which has taken place in the United States of America,[1] and to a lesser extent in Canada[2] — as to whether prayers, Bible-readings and other devotional activities are allowed in schools or other state institutions at all (and, if so, to what extent), the drafters of s 14 of the Interim Constitution inserted a clause (s 14(2)) regulating such observances.[3] It has essentially been retained intact in FC s 15(2). In terms thereof, religious observances at state or state-aided institutions are allowed subject to two provisos: (i) that 'such religious observances are conducted on an equitable basis'; and (ii) that 'attendance at them is free and voluntary'.[4] Both provisos are deliberately open-ended. Both provisos allow the 'appropriate public authorities', who ideally would be in direct or at least fairly immediate contact with the institutions under scrutiny, the discretion to regulate observances in the manner best suited to the particular context. It will be difficult to lay down any fixed principles as to what s 15(2) should mean in practice. That said, a few comments are required on the meaning of the terminology used in s 15(2).

What is the meaning of the requirement that observances be conducted on an equitable basis? The word 'equity', according to Etienne Mureinik, means something less than equal.[5] It is more akin to 'fair' and 'just'.[6] 'Equitable basis' does not require the equal treatment and parity of observance for all religious faiths. Further guidance can be gleaned from Solberg:

> In the context of a school community and the pervasive peer pressure that is often present in such communities, voluntary school prayer could also amount to the coercion of pupils to participate in the prayers of the favoured religion. To guard against this, and at the same time to permit school prayers, s 14(2) makes clear that there should be no such coercion. It is in this context that it requires the regulation of school prayers to be carried out on an equitable basis. I doubt whether this means that a school must make provision for prayers for as many denominations as there may be within the pupil body; rather it seems to me to require education authorities to allow schools to offer the prayers that may be most

[1] See Engel (supra) (purportedly non-denominational prayer composed by Regents appointed by the school board in New York declared unconstitutional); Abington School District v Schempp 374 US 203 (1963) (reciting of Lord's Prayer and reading of the Bible as start of each school day deemed unconstitutional); Wallace v Jaffree 472 US 38 (1985) (period of silence for 'meditation or voluntary prayer' unconstitutional); Lee v Weisman 112 SCt 2649 (1992) ('non-sectarian' invocation and benediction by rabbi at school graduation ceremony unconstitutional). See also Stone v Graham 449 US 39 (1980) (posting of Ten Commandments in schools was unconstitutional).

[2] See Zylberberg v Sudbury Board of Education (1988) 65 OR (2d) 641 (CA), (1988) 52 DLR (4th) 577; Russow v BC (AG) (1989) 35 BCLR (2d) 29 (SC); Canadian Civil Liberties Association v Ontario (1990) 71 OR (2d) 341 (CA). See also B Sokhansanj 'Our Father who art in the classroom' (1992) 56 Sask LR 47.

[3] See Du Plessis & Corder (supra) at 157 (IC s 14(2) is a 'prime example of a provision attesting to the negotiators' unwillingness to erect walls of separation between church and state'.)

[4] See De Waal et al (supra) at 302-305.

[5] E Mureinik 'Let's Privatise God' Mail and Guardian 10-11 November 1995; W Freedman 'Understanding the Freedom of Religion Clause in the South African Constitution Bill, 1996' (1996) 1 Human Rights and Constitutional LJ of Southern Africa 35, 36.

[6] See Solberg (supra) at paras 121-123 (O'Regan J) (The Justice brackets fairness with equity, and states that 'at the least, the requirement of equity demands the State act even-handedly in relation to different religions').

> appropriate for a particular school, to have that decision taken in an equitable manner applicable to all schools, and to oblige them to do so in a way which does not give rise to indirect coercion of the 'non-believers'.[1]

What constitutes religious observances? In Wittmann v Deutscher Schulverein, Pretoria, & others (Wittman), the Court concluded that a religious observance was in the nature of an act of worship, and should be distinguished from religious education:

> 'Religious observance' is an act of a religious character, a rite. The daily opening of a school by prayer, reading of the scripture (and possibly a sermon or religious message, and benediction) is such an observance. Religious education is not.[2]

What is the meaning of the words state-aided? Does this include any school, university or hospital that receives any state funding, no matter how small? In Wittmann,[3] the Court concluded, in the light of an analysis of the applicable statutory context[4] that 'private schools' as defined in the latter Act were not 'state-aided institutions', despite being eligible to apply annually for the prescribed subsidy.

What is meant by the requirement that religious observances be free and voluntary? In terms of this proviso, is it sufficient that the attendance at such observances, or participation therein, not be compulsory? The Canadian courts have held that religious observances can have coercive effects despite not being compulsory. This observation is undoubtably correct. As a result, regulations permitting prayers and other religious observances have been struck down in Canada, even though pupils who did not want to participate could apply for an exemption.[5] However if a similar approach were adopted in South Africa, s 15(2) could be rendered nugatory.[6] Surely the framers of the Interim or Final Constitutions were concerned with compulsion and not simple coercion. And that is a distinction with a difference. The purpose of s 15(2) is to allow religious observances in such institutions, provided that cognisance is taken of the need not to violate the religious beliefs of persons of other faiths.[7]

---

[1] Solberg (supra) at para 103.

[2] Wittman (supra) at 449E.

[3] Wittman (supra) at 450H-453B.

[4] The Education and Training Act 90 of 1979 (which dealt with black education) and the Private Schools Act (House of Assembly) 104 of 1986.

[5] See Hogg (supra) at § 39.7, 985-986; D Gibson The Law of the Charter: Equality Rights (1990) 199, 200; P Macklem et al Canadian Constitutional Law (Vol II, 1994) 310-4.

[6] See E Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where? Introducing the Interim Bill of Rights' (1994) 10 SAJHR 31, 45-46.

[7] The jurisprudence of Germany may be of assistance in this regard. See Currie The Constitution of the Federal Republic of Germany (supra) at 244-269. Arts 7(2) and (3) of the Basic Law permit and regulate the holding of religious classes in pubic schools. Article 7(2) provides that: 'The person entitled to bring up a child have the right to decide whether the child shall attend religious classes'. Article 7(3) states that: 'Religion classes shall form part of the ordinary curriculum in public schools, except in secular schools. Without prejudice to the state's right of supervision, religious instruction shall be given in accordance with the tenets of the religious communities. No teacher may be obliged against his will to give religious instruction.' For a comparison of school prayer in Germany, the USA and Canada, see J Waltman 'Communities in Conflict: The School Prayer in West Germany, the United States and Canada' (1991) 6 CJLS/RCDS 27.

41.6 Statutory Recognition of Religious Family Law

FC s 15(3) states that s 15 does not preclude legislation recognising (a) marriages concluded under any tradition or a system of religious, personal or family law, or (b) systems of personal or family law adhered to by any tradition or religion. However, s 15(3) contains the rider that any such legislation must be consistent both with s 15 and with the Constitution.

The last-minute insertion[1] into s 15(3)(b) of the requirement of consistency with s 15 is difficult to fathom. Subsections 15(1) and (2) could hardly preclude legislation that was not inconsistent with them. Conversely they could not permit legislation that was in conflict with them. The reference to 'this section' in s 15(3)(b) should therefore be disregarded. It does no work.

The requirement of consistency with the other provisions of the Constitution is significant. It avoids a debate — such as that which ensued in relation to IC s 14(3) — over whether legislation recognising a system of personal and family law could be immune from challenge under other clauses of the Bill of Rights.[2] It is now clear that any legislation that recognises religious or customary law marriages or systems of family law must comply with the equality clause and thus cannot, for example, discriminate on the basis of sex or gender. As a result, if Parliament chooses to enact legislation contemplated by s 15(3), it faces the unenviable task of trying to be true to the religion or custom in question while avoiding all unfair discrimination.

Only one statute of the kind envisaged in s 15(3) has been enacted: the Recognition of Customary Marriages Act 120 of 1998.[3] That statute allows polygamy, provided that the husband has a written contract approved by a court that will regulate the matrimonial property system of his marriages.[4]

---

[1] See § 41.1*(c)*(i) above.

[2] The majority of academics who commented on s 14 of the Interim Constitution concluded that it precluded any judicial scrutiny of legislation that fell within the purview of s 14(3)(a) and (b), whether on account of a violation of the right to equality or any other basis. See Mureinik 'A Bridge to Where? (supra) at 45 n44; Cachalia et al (supra) at 52–53; D Davis, H Cheadle & N Haysom 'Fundamental Rights in the Constitution' (1997) 107; J D Sinclair The Law of Marriage, Vol I (supra) at §34.6.

[3] See Thembisile v Thembisile 2002 (2) SA 209 (T) at 214A ('Thembisile'), where it is stated that the Recognition of Customary Marriages Act is part of the legislation referred to in s 15(3).

[4] As to whether the statute involves any discriminatory provisions, see J Pienaar 'African Customary Wives in South Africa: is there Spousal Equality after the Commencement of the Recognition of Customary Marriages Act?' (2003) 14 Stell LR 256. Also note that one of the provisions in that Act was challenged as being in conflict with s 9 of the Constitution, but the issue was ultimately held over for adjudication at a separate hearing. See Mabuza v Mbatha 2003 (7) BCLR 743 (C) ('Mabuza').

The South African Law Commission has recently produced a report on 'Islamic Marriages and Related Matters'. South African Law Commission Discussion Paper 101 'Islamic Marriages and Related Matters' Project 59 (December 2001). The Department of Justice has begun drafting legislation on the recognition of Muslim marriages. As regards gender equality in Muslim law, see N Goolam 'Gender equality in Islamic Family Law: Dispelling Common Misconceptions and Misunderstandings' (2001) 12 Stell LR 199.

Section 15(3)(a) is, in the final analysis, a weak provision. It merely permits the state to pass legislation. It does not require it to do so[1]. It then stipulates that such legislation is subject to (and thus subordinate to) all the provisions of the Constitution.[2] One might therefore question whether s 15(3)(a) serves any purpose at all, and whether the concerns that it was designed to address were not adequately catered for in other clauses.

That said, s 15(3) does indeed have value.

First, s 15(3)(a) emphasises the fact that, contrary to pre-1994 judgments like Ismail v Ismail,[3] there is nothing objectionable or contra bonos mores about recognising the validity of marriages, or other elements of the family laws, of non-Christian faiths or traditions.[4] Such marriages or systems of family law can be recognised by the legislature, and by the courts. The significance of this shift cannot be overestimated. Prior to 1994, family law conformed strictly to Western and Christian norms. A particularly pernicious result of this ethnocentrism was that marriages concluded according to a number of non-Christian religious rites were not recognised as valid civil marriages. This refusal had deleterious consequences for spouses in relation to succession, evidence and determination of marriages.[5] Section 15(3) makes it clear that this deficiency of the pre-constitutional era is now a thing of the past and can be set right.[6] The courts and the legislature have begun this task.[7]

The second benefit that flows from the inclusion of s 15(3)(a) in the Constitution is that it removes any argument that legislation which recognised, say,

[1] See ss 9(4), 32(2) and 33(3) of the Constitution, which require Parliament to enact legislation of the kind envisaged in those sections.

[2] Interestingly, two of the members of the technical committee that drafted the Bill of Rights in the Interim Constitution, Professors Du Plessis and Corder, commented that IC s 14(3), by merely authorising the legislature to pass legislation recognising a system of family law rather than requiring it to do so, was of a 'provisional nature'. They attributed this provisional nature to the fact that the recognition religious family law rites was raised at a very late stage in the negotiating process and in conjunction with the highly controversial issue of customary law. See Du Plessis & Corder (supra) at 157. Nevertheless, the 'provisional nature' of the subsection dealing with religious family law has been retained in the Final Constitution.

[3] 1983 (1) SA 1006 (A).

[4] See Mabuza (supra) at para 129; Thembisile (supra) at paras 23-25. See also L du Plessis 'Legal and Constitutional Means Designed to Facilitate the Integration of Diverse Cultures in South Africa: A Provisional Assessment' (2002) 13 Stell LR 367, 377-378.

[5] See Seedat's Executors v The Master (Natal) 1917 AD 302; Kalla v The Master 1995 (1) SA 261 (T), 1994 (4) BCLR 79 (T); and S v Johardien 1990 (1) SA 1026 (C).

[6] See, as regards the courts' protection of the rights of women under African Customary Law, Bhe & others v The Magistrate, Khayelitsha (Unreported judgment of the Cape High Court delivered 25 September 1993) (Ngwenya J). See also Chawanda v Zimnat Insurance Co Ltd 1990 (1) SA 1019 (ZHC), Katekwe v Mushabaiwa 1984 (2) ZLR 112 (SC) ('the Courts by their judgments should seek to heal the pangs inflicted on African women by their legal disabilities').

[7] See Ryland v Edros (supra), Amod v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accidents Fund (supra) and Daniels v Campbell NO [2003] 3 All SA 139, 154c-155i (C), 2003 (9) BCLR 969 (C). See also the amendments to legislation such as the Civil Proceedings Evidence Act 35 of 1965, the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977, the Government Employees Pension Law 1996 (Proclamation 21 of 1996), the Transfer Duty Act 40 of 1949, and the Child Care Act 74 of 1983.

Muslim family law could be vulnerable to attack on the basis that it was prima facie discriminatory because it afforded official recognition to Muslims that was not available to Hindus, Jainists, or Buddhists. Absent a provision such as s 15(3), there may have been a danger that, irrespective of its content, a statute that recognised a system of personal or family law adhered to by a particular religious community could have been challenged by religious groups whose own systems of family law had not yet been accorded similar treatment.[1]

[1] That is, a constitutional challenge might have been possible under s 15(1), given that the government cannot favour one religion over another, or religion over non-religion.

42 Freedom of Expression

Dario Milo, Glenn Penfold & Anthony Stein

42.1 Introduction 42–1
42.2 The Drafting History of FC s 16 42–2
42.3 The Structure of Free Speech Analysis: FC s 16(1) and FC s 16(2) 42–6
42.4 The General Approach of our Courts to the Constitutional Right to Freedom of Expression 42–8
42.5 The Rationales For Freedom Of Expression 42–14
(a) The search for truth 42–16
(b) The proper functioning of democracy 42–21
(c) Self-fulfilment and audience autonomy 42–25
(d) Some other rationales for freedom of expression 42–28
42.6 The Application of FC s 16(1) 42–30
(a) 'Everyone' has the right to freedom of expression 42–30
(b) Direct horizontality of FC s 16(1): Khumalo v Holomisa 42–30
42.7 Protected Expression: Analysis of FC s 16(1) 42–31
(a) Freedom of speech and expression 42–31
(b) Freedom to receive or impart 42–32
(c) Information or ideas 42–33
(d) Freedom of the press and other media 42–34
(i) Press exceptionalism 42–34
(ii) Protection of sources of information 42–36
(aa) Comparative jurisprudence 42–40
(bb) The preferred approach to the privilege under the Final Constitution 42–49
(e) Freedom of artistic creativity 42–52
(i) The centrality of context 42–54
(ii) What is art? 42–57

(f) Academic freedom and freedom of scientific research. . . 42–60
(g) Protecting the means of expression 42–62
(i) Monopolies 42–62
(ii) Testing the means of expression: the availability of alternative means 42–63
(iii) State support for the means of expression and state broadcasters 42–65
(iv) The Internet 42–67
42.8. Excluded Expression: Analysis of FC s 16 (2) 42–69
(a) FC s 16(2)(a): Propaganda for war 42–69
(b) FC s 16(2)(b): Incitement of imminent violence 42–71
(c) FC s 16(2)(c): Hate speech 42–73
(i) The arguments for and against hate speech prohibitions. 42–73
(ii) The constitutional treatment of hate speech 42–79
(aa) The express exclusion in FC s 16(2)(c) 42–79
(bb) 'Advocacy of hatred based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion' 42–80
(cc) 'Incitement to cause harm' 42–81
(iv) Legislative prohibitions on hate speech. 42–84
(aa) The general approach to assessing the constitutionality of hate speech legislation 42–84
(bb) Section 29 of the Films and Publications Act . 42–85
(cc) Section 10 of the Equality Act 42–86
42.9 Major Restrictions on Freedom of Expression. 42–88
(a) The law of defamation 42–88
(i) Standing to sue for defamation 42–90
(ii) Defamatory statements. 42–91
(iii) The challenges to the onus rule and the strict liability rule 42–93
(iv) The defence of reasonable publication 42–95
(v) Falsity as an ingredient of the plaintiff's cause of action 42–99
(vi) Truth for the public benefit 42–101
(vii) Remedies: Interdicts, damages and the amende honorable 42–104
(b) The law of privacy 42–107
(i) Lack of negligence in media privacy cases 42–108
(ii) The public interest defence 42–111

(c) Restrictions designed to serve the administration of justice 42–115
(i) The principle of open justice. 42–115
(ii) Restrictions on the open justice principle 42–121
(iii) Broadcasting of enquiries and judicial proceedings. . 42–123
(iv) Balancing freedom of speech against the administration of justice 42–128
(aa) Scandalising the court 42–128
(bb) The sub judice rule. 42–134
(d) Intellectual property restrictions 42–140
(i) Parodying famous trademarks 42–140
(ii) Copyright: Defences to infringement 42–145
(e) Sexually explicit expression 42–149
(i) The statutory framework 42–149
(ii) Pornographic films and publications as protected expression. 42–150
(iii) Assessing limitations on sexually explicit material: pornography as low-value speech 42–154
(iv) Assessing limitations on pornography: harms sought to be avoided through criminalizing pornography . . 42–156
(v) Nude dancing as protected expression 42–159
(f) Commercial expression 42–161
(i) Commercial speech as protected expression 42–162
(ii) Assessing limitations on commercial expression . . . 42–164
(g) Restrictions in the interest of national security, defence and intelligence 42–170
(i) General national security restrictions 42–170
(aa) the Constitution 42–170
(bb) Minimum Information Security Standards 42–171
(cc) Protection of Information Act. 42–173
(ii) Other legislative entrenchment of national security restrictions 42–174
(aa) The Defence Act 42–174
(bb) The National Key Points Act 42–175
(cc) The Intelligence Services Act 42–176
(dd) Other legislation. 42–176
(iii) Case law 42–177
(h) Prior restraints on publication 42–183

(i) The presumption against prior restraints. 42–183
(ii) Legislative prior restraint 42–184
(iii) Judicial prior restraints 42–185
42.10 Special Protection of Speech in the Legislature. 42–189

16. Freedom of Expression

(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of expression, which includes —

(a) freedom of the press and other media;

(b) freedom to receive or impart information or ideas;

(c) freedom of artistic creativity;

(d) academic freedom and freedom of scientific research.

(2) The right in subsection (1) does not extend to —

(a) propaganda for war;

(b) incitement of imminent violence;

(c) advocacy of hatred that is based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion, and that constitutes incitement to cause harm.[1]

42.1 INTRODUCTION

This chapter deals with the fundamental right to freedom of expression. This is a right that has attracted a great deal of judicial attention since its entrenchment in FC s 16 and its predecessor, IC s 15.

We start with a discussion of the drafting history of FC s 16 and the major issues that arose during the drafting process. This is followed by an introduction to the structure of analysis under FC s 16's two parts: the protection in FC s 16(1) and the exclusions in FC s 16(2). We then consider the general approach of our courts to the FC s 16 right, including the dominant approach of balancing the right against countervailing considerations, and the rationales for protecting free speech (including the traditional justifications of the pursuit of truth, the functioning of democracy and self-fulfilment). Next, we focus on the application of FC s 16(1) in more detail; we consider, amongst others, the meaning and import of the express inclusion of freedom of the media, freedom to receive or impart information and ideas, freedom of artistic creativity and academic and scientific freedom in FC s 16(1). Some of the issues canvassed in this context are the meaning of 'expression', the notion of 'press exceptionalism', the protection of journalists' sources, the concept of artistic expression and the protection of the means of expression.

Having largely focussed on the protection of freedom of expression up to then, we move to restrictions on freedom of expression that shed light on the nature of the protection given to freedom of expression. First, we look at the categories of expression excluded from constitutional protection in FC s 16(2): propaganda for war, incitement of imminent violence and, most significantly, hate speech (which, in the constitutional context, consists of 'advocacy of hatred that is based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion, and that constitutes incitement to cause harm'). In this section we also consider legislative restrictions on hate speech. Second, we examine, at some length, various common law and statutory restrictions on freedom of speech, which each raise fundamental issues as to the proper balance between freedom of expression and countervailing rights and values. In this section, we first consider defamation, an area in which free speech clashes with the right to reputation and in which the law has developed dramatically since the advent of constitutional democracy. This is followed by a discussion of privacy, restrictions in the name of protecting the administration of justice (that is, the open justice principle and its implications as well as the criminal offences of scandalising the court and the so-called sub judice rule), intellectual property restrictions, sexually explicit expression (including pornography, child pornography and nude dancing), restrictions on commercial expression (notably, advertising restrictions), restrictions in the interests of national security, defence and intelligence, and prior restraints on publication. Our main focus in the discussion of these restrictions is assessing the proper constitutional approach that ought to be taken to these restrictions or, put differently, where the balance should be struck in these areas of expression.

* The authors would like to thank Michael Bishop and Stu Woolman for their editorial assistance.

[1] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ('Final Constitution' or 'FC').

Finally, we consider the special protection of speech in the legislature, including the rule that members of the legislature are not liable for what they say in these institutions that are so central to our democracy.

42.2 THE DRAFTING HISTORY OF FC S 16

In addition to their historical interest, travaux préparatoires may under certain circumstances play a role in the interpretation of a fundamental right.[1] The text of the right to freedom of expression under the Final Constitution differs in notable respects from that of the Interim Constitution.[2] Moreover, the clause went

[1] See S v Makwanyane & Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at paras 16-19 ('In countries in which the constitution is similarly the supreme law, it is not unusual for the courts to have regard to the circumstances existing at the time the constitution was adopted, including the debates and writings which formed part of the process. . . .

Our Constitution was the product of negotiations conducted at the Multi-Party Negotiating Process. The final draft adopted by the forum of the Multi-Party Negotiating Process was, with few changes, adopted by Parliament. The Multi-Party Negotiating Process was advised by technical committees, and the reports of these committees on the drafts are the equivalent of the travaux préparatoires relied upon by the international tribunals. Such background material can provide a context for the interpretation of the Constitution and, where it serves that purpose, I can see no reason why such evidence should be excluded. The precise nature of the evidence, and the purpose for which it may be tendered, will determine the weight to be given to it. . . .

Background evidence may, however, be useful to show why particular provisions were or were not included in the Constitution. . . . [W]here the background material is clear, is not in dispute, and is relevant to showing why particular provisions were or were not included in the Constitution, it can be taken into account by a Court in interpreting the Constitution'.)

[2] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ('Interim Constitution' or 'IC'). IC s 15 read:

(1) Every person shall have the right to freedom of speech and expression, which shall include freedom of the press and other media, and the freedom of artistic creativity and scientific research.

(2) All media financed by or under the control of the state shall be regulated in a manner which ensures impartiality and the expression of a diversity of opinion.

through a number of incarnations[1] in the relevant Theme Committee of the Constitutional Assembly[2] before it settled on FC s 16 in its present form.[3] The Explanatory Memorandum expressly recognises the influence of foreign jurisdictions' constitutional protection of expression in the drafting of the clause, and in particular the constitutions of Canada, the United States, Germany, Namibia and India.[4] The Theme Committee identified three 'key issues' that 'troubled South African constitutional drafters' in respect of freedom of expression: first, horizontality versus verticality; secondly 'the bearer of the right issue'; and thirdly what was termed 'the two-tier approach to restrictions'.[5] We shall discuss the last of these issues first, and then consider the first and second issues.

The two-tier approach, which was reflected in the limitations clause of the Interim Constitution, afforded greater protection to 'political expression' over other forms of expression by requiring that limitations on political expression meet the higher criterion of 'necessity' in order to be justifiable.[6] As the [1] At least three variations of the clause were considered: the 'Provisional Text', the 'Redrafted Provisional Text: Option 1' and the 'Redrafted Provisional Text: Option 2'. See Constitutional Assembly, Constitutional Committee, Sub-Committee: Draft Bill of Rights Explanatory Memorandum of Theme Committee 4 of the Constitutional Assembly responsible for fundamental rights: Explanatory Memorandum Vol. 1 (9/10/1995)('Explanatory Memorandum').

The Provisional Text provided:

(1) Every person, including the press and other media, shall have the right to freedom of speech and expression.

(2) This right shall include the freedom to receive and impart information and ideas without interference by public authority and regardless of frontiers.

(3) Any propaganda for war shall be prohibited.

(4) Any advocacy of racial or religious hatred that constitutes incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence shall be prohibited.

(5) All media financed by or under the control of the state shall be regulated in a manner that ensures independence, impartiality and diversity of opinion.

The Redrafted Provisional Text: Option 1 provided:

(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of speech and expression, including —

(a) freedom of the press and other media; and

(b) freedom to receive or impart information and ideas.

(2) The speech and expression protected in subsection (1) does not include either

(i) propaganda for war; or

(ii) advocacy of hatred that constituted incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence, and that is based on race, ethnicity, gender, or religion.

(3) The state must regulate any media that it finances or controls to ensure that it is impartial and presents a diversity of opinion.

Redrafted Provisional Text: Option 2 was the same as Redrafted Provisional Text: Option 1, but with clause (2) removed.

[2] A general background to the drafting process and passing of the Final Constitution is provided on the Constitutional Court's website: see http://www.constitutionalcourt.org.za/site/theconstitution/history.htm (accessed on 20 July 2008).

[3] In general, for this overview of the background we draw upon the Explanatory Memorandum (supra) at para 4.1.1.

[4] Ibid at para 3.1.

[5] Ibid at para 3.2.2.

[6] See S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

Explanatory Memorandum notes, the final text rejects this two-tier approach and hence 'political expression' does not as a matter of form enjoy greater protection in the text of the Constitution than, for example, artistic expression or commercial expression.[1]

Returning to the application issue, in response to the case law that had developed under the Interim Constitution, the Explanatory Memorandum reflects a conscious decision to allow the right to freedom of expression to apply 'horizontally' as well as vertically. Referring expressly to the lower court decision in De Klerk v Du Plessis,[2] which had then only recently been decided, the Theme Committee noted that if the right to freedom of expression is only vertical in its operation, as the De Klerk Court had held in respect of the Interim Constitution, it 'will have a major impact on the common law offences of criminal defamation, blasphemy and contempt of court' but not on other important areas of the common law. To allow it to operate horizontally would facilitate, for example, the reassessment of the law of defamation which 'in recent years has been hostile to claims of press freedom'.[3] Moreover, the Explanatory Memorandum notes that there are strong jurisprudential arguments against confining the right to freedom of expression to vertical application since this would result in the paradox that aspects of the common law, which have less democratic legitimacy, will be subject to less searching scrutiny than legislation, which is subject to direct constitutional review.[4] As discussed further below, the 'horizontal' application of the right to freedom of expression in the Final Constitution has since been affirmed by the Constitutional Court, although the precise extent of this horizontal application requires refinement.[5]

In respect of the third contentious issue identified by the Theme Committee, namely who should qualify as 'bearers of the right', both the Interim Constitution and the drafts of the final text preferred the use of the term 'every person'. The Explanatory Memorandum, referring again to decided cases,[6] makes it plain that this is intended to cast the net of the bearers of the right to freedom of expression

[1] Explanatory Memorandum (supra) at para 4.1.1. This is not to say that political expression does not in any event enjoy greater protection than other forms of speech under FC s 16 as a matter of principle. See, for example, 'Defamation' § 42.9*(a)* infra.

[2] 1995 (2) SA 40 (T), 1994 (6) BCLR 124 (T). The vertical application of the Interim Constitution was upheld on appeal in Du Plessis v De Klerk 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC).

[3] Explanatory Memorandum (supra) at para 4.1.4, referring to Neethling v Du Preez; Neethling v The Weekly Mail 1994 (1) SA 708 (A); Financial Mail (Pty) Ltd v Sage Holdings Ltd 1993 (2) SA 451 (A); Pakendorf & Andere v De Flamingh 1982 (3) SA 146 (A). Indeed, the application of the right to freedom of expression has resulted in substantial reform of the common law of defamation and, to a lesser extent, privacy. See 'Defamation' § 42.9*(a)* and 'Privacy' § 42.9*(b)* infra.

[4] Explanatory Memorandum (supra) at para 4.1.4, referring to academic writing on the subject.

[5] See § 42.6 infra. See also S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) Chapter 31; S Woolman 'The Amazing Vanishing Bill of Rights' (2007) 124 SALJ 762.

[6] The cases referred to were those decided both prior to and under the Interim Constitution. See eg, Nyamakazi v President of Bophuthatswana 1992 (4) SA 540 (B). Under the Zimbabwean Constitution, see Woods v Minister of Justice & Others 1995 (1) SA 703 (ZSC).

widely, including all natural persons, whether citizens or aliens and prisoners.[1] The final text adopts the term 'everyone' instead of 'every person'. As discussed below,[2] this reinforces the breadth of the potential bearers of the right to freedom of expression.

A further obvious difference between the expression clauses of the Interim and Final Constitutions is the introduction into the final text of categorical exclusions. The Explanatory Memorandum reflects the debate between the express exclusion of certain categories of speech, and leaving it to the courts to develop exclusionary categories under the limitations clause.[3] The debate was resolved in favour of the categorical exclusions.[4] The drafting notes to the Provisional Text and the Revised Provisional Text reflect that the categorical exclusions of propaganda for war and hate speech were taken, almost word for word, from the expression clause of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights.[5]

From the outset, IC s 15(2), pertaining to funding of state media, had been contentious. The Explanatory Memorandum comments that it is absent from the expression clauses of the source instruments and that it 'does not really belong in a Bill of Rights', and had been included in the Interim Constitution at the last minute as a political compromise.[6] The argument for its omission was that

[1] Explanatory Memorandum (supra) at para 4.1.1.

[2] See § 42.6 infra.

[3] See Explanatory Memorandum (supra) at para 5 fn 3-4.

[4] See § 42.3 infra. We argue that there are good reasons for preferring the limitations approach over categorical exclusions, including allowing for a more nuanced and flexible analysis in the hands of the courts when confronted with expression challenges and avoiding the interpretive difficulties involved in defining the precise ambit of the categorical exclusions. See also L Johannessen 'A Critical View of the Constitutional Hate Speech Provision: Section 16' (1997) 13 SAJHR 135.

[5] International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 ('ICCPR') arts 20(1) and 20(2) provide:

1. Any propaganda for war shall be prohibited by law.

2. Any advocacy of national, racial or religious hatred that constitutes incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence shall be prohibited by law.

The wording of the ICCPR was slightly altered in the final text of the Constitution. Advocacy of hatred based on 'ethnicity' and 'gender' were expressly added (while the reference to 'national' hatred was removed) and the simpler general qualification, 'that constitutes incitement to cause harm', was preferred over the ICCPR phrase, 'that constitutes incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence'. Notably, the separate categorical exclusion of expression that constitutes 'incitement of imminent violence' does not appear in the earlier drafts. This category is absent from the ICCPR but is derived from foreign expression jurisprudence, and was added later to the final text. See 'Excluded Expression: Analysis of FC s 16(2)' § 42.8 infra.

[6] Explanatory Memorandum (supra) at para 4.1.2 ('Section 15(2) does not enunciate an individual right but a constitutional principle designed to ensure an independent and impartial media which gives expression to a diversity of opinion. This provision does not really belong in a Bill of Rights, as it is not concerned with a right and is not a 'universally accepted fundamental right' within the meaning of Constitutional Principle II. It was inserted at a late stage in the Kempton Park drafting at the insistence of groups that wished to ensure that the principle of an independent media had constitutional endorsement and was not simply left to recognition in an ordinary statute'. Referring to L Du Plessis & H Corder Understanding South Africa's Transitional Bill of Rights (1994)).

pursuant to the then recently enacted Independent Broadcasting Authority Act[1] regulation of all media, including the state media, fell under an independent regulatory body and therefore the clause was unnecessary. The requirement of an independent body to regulate broadcasting in the public interest is entrenched elsewhere in the Final Constitution.[2] A similar clause to IC s 15(2) was included in the Provisional Text as well as the Revised Provisional Text but the argument for its omission prevailed and it did not emerge in FC s 16. In view of this history, the omission of the provision cannot be interpreted as a constitutional endorsement of partiality in the state media.

42.3 The structure of Free Speech Analysis: FC s 16(1) and FC s 16(2)

The consequence of the explicit exclusion of certain categories of expression from the ambit of constitutional protection, as noted by the Constitutional Court in Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority & Others, is that FC s 16 is a section in two parts:

> Subsection (1) is concerned with expression that is protected under the Constitution. It is clear that any limitation of this category of expression must satisfy the requirements of the limitations clause to be constitutionally valid. Subsection (2) deals with expression that is specifically excluded from the protection of the right.[3]

How is FC s 16(2) to be interpreted? The words '[t]he right in subsection (1) does not extend to' imply that the categories of expression enumerated in FC s 16(2) are not to be regarded as constitutionally protected speech. FC s 16(2) therefore defines the boundaries beyond which the right to freedom of expression does not extend. In that sense, the subsection is definitional: certain expression does not deserve constitutional protection because, among other things, the expression has the potential to impinge adversely on the dignity of others and cause grave harm.[4]

In Islamic Unity the Court emphasised that any expression that is not specifically excluded under FC s 16(2) enjoys the protection of the right.[5] Even expression such as child pornography, considered by the Court in De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions, that has dubious extrinsic worth in serving any of the values underlying the protection of expression is, as a point of departure, constitutionally

[1] Act 153 of 1993.
[2] FC s 192.
[3] 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC), 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC)('Islamic Unity').
[4] Ibid at paras 31-32.
[5] Ibid at para 33. This passage was endorsed in De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC)('De Reuck') at para 47.

protected.[1] Having encapsulated the well-established underlying rationales for the constitutional protection of expression, the De Reuck Court explained the role of the limitations enquiry as follows:

> Seen from this perspective, the [ban on the possession of child pornography] does not implicate the core values of the right. Expression that is restricted is, for the most part, expression of little value which is found on the periphery of the right and is a form of expression that is not protected as part of freedom of expression in many democratic societies.[2]

It is curious that child pornography, which the Court noted is 'universally condemned' in 'all democratic societies',[3] could be described as rising even to the level of 'little value', rather than as having no value whatsoever. This is, however, the necessary consequence of the structure of analysis imposed by the text of the Final Constitution and the approach adopted by the Court to the interpretation of FC s 16; namely, that all and any expression save for that explicitly excluded under section 16(2) is protected, and that any restriction must then be justified under the limitations enquiry.[4] The Court has rightly regarded the explicit categorical exclusions in the constitutional text as comprising a closed list. The implication of this approach to the interpretation of FC s 16 is that the Court will never take it upon itself to carve out further types of expression for categorical exclusion. Instead, FC s 36 will carry an ever-increasing (but desirable) burden in defining the contours of our expression jurisprudence.

This is borne out by the approach in Phillips v DPP, Witwatersrand Local Division — which concerned nude dancing — where in a nuanced passage the Constitutional Court digressed to correct the emphasis of the Court below in characterising the analysis imposed by FC s 16:

[1] In the case of child pornography, we submit that the only conceivable justification for protection is one which appeals to the value of expression in itself. Only the most austere anti-consequentialist meta-ethical theory (a theory that does not assign value by ends or consequences) would allow any such intrinsic value (if indeed such value exists) to outweigh the intolerable consequences of child pornography, which were summarized by the Court in De Reuck as striking at the dignity of children, harming the children who are used in its production, and harming any society in which it is tolerated. De Reuck (supra) at para 61. In any event, all respectable anti-consequentialist theories have heuristics or higher-order rules that resolve conflicts between intrinsic values. For example, in the case of child pornography, the inherent assault on the dignity of the child and therefore the value of the child in itself. Ibid. See further 'Sexually explicit expression' § 42.9*(e)* infra.

[2] De Reuck (supra) at para 59.

[3] Ibid at para 61.

[4] Ibid at para 48 ('Relying on the approach of the United States Supreme Court where certain categories of expression are unprotected forms of speech, the respondents argued such materials do not serve any of the values traditionally considered as underlying freedom of expression, namely, truth-seeking, free political activity and self-fulfilment. This argument must fail. In this respect, our Constitution is different from that of the United States of America. Limitations of rights are dealt with under s 36 of the Constitution and not at the threshold level. Section 16(1) expressly protects the freedom of expression in a manner that does not warrant a narrow reading. Any restriction upon artistic creativity must satisfy the rigours of the limitation analysis' (footnotes omitted).)

> [I]t is necessary to address an aspect of the High Court judgment that has relevance for the way in which constitutional protection of freedom of expression is understood and perceived. Referring no doubt to s 16 of the Constitution, the Judge in the High Court concluded that:
>
> > 'It is clear, however, that under the new constitutional dispensation in this country, expressive activity is prima facie protected no matter how repulsive, degrading, offensive or unacceptable society, or the majority of society, might consider it to be.'
>
> The trial Court's conclusion might convey an incorrect understanding of the extent of the protection afforded by the constitutional scheme. The right to freedom of expression (as is the case with all rights in the Bill of Rights) is not and cannot be regarded as absolute. The FC s 16(1) right may be limited by a law of general application that complies with FC s 36. In other words, the Constitution expressly allows the limitation of expression that is 'repulsive, degrading, offensive or unacceptable' to the extent that the limitation is justifiable in 'an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom'.[1]

In Phillips the threshold infringement — a limitation of FC s 16 — was easily established. The Court below had halted the enquiry at that stage in the absence of state submissions on justification, holding that the state bore an onus in this regard that could not be discharged in the absence of submissions.[2] The Constitutional Court, however, held that the burden of limitations was not an onus in the true sense[3] and, despite the absence of argument or evidence from the state, proceeded to undertake a thorough and careful limitations analysis in respect of the impugned provisions which occupied by far the bulk of the Court's reasoning.[4]

42.4 THE GENERAL APPROACH OF OUR COURTS TO THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT TO FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

As the length of this chapter demonstrates, our courts have, since the advent of the Interim Constitution, decided a large number of cases dealing with the right to freedom of expression. After a thorough analysis, it would no doubt be possible to extract a wealth of themes, principles and subtle contradictions from the case law. Our aim in this portion of the chapter is the less ambitious one of identifying the major features and some of the sub-themes of our courts' approach to the constitutional right to freedom of expression. We do so in a largely uncritical way, saving our criticism for the discussion that follows on the various restrictions on freedom of expression.

[1] 2003 (3) SA 345 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC)('Phillips') at para 17 (footnotes omitted).
[2] Ibid at para 28.
[3] Ibid at para 20.
[4] The state agencies were severely criticised in the judgment for the failure to assist the courts. Ibid at paras 9-12. For further analysis of Phillips, see 'Sexually explicit expression' § 42.9*(e)* infra. For a discussion on the obligation of the state to supply evidence, see M Chaskalson, G Marcus & M Bishop 'Constitutional Litigation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, 2007) § 3.7.

The single most significant aspect of the growing South African jurisprudence on freedom of expression is a rejection of the dominant approach in the United States that freedom of expression is a pre-eminent right or value, in favour of an approach of balancing. In the words of O'Regan J on behalf of a unanimous Constitutional Court, 'although freedom of expression is fundamental to our democratic society, it is not a paramount value'.[1] The overwhelming approach of our courts in dealing with issues that engage freedom of expression is to balance freedom of expression against other countervailing rights or interests, such as the rights to reputation, privacy, equality or the values of the administration of justice or national security. As Kriegler J has remarked:

> With us the right to freedom of expression cannot be said to automatically trump the right to human dignity. The right to dignity is at least as worthy of protection as the right to freedom of expression. How these two rights are to be balanced, in principle and in any particular set of circumstances, is not a question that can or should be addressed here. What is clear though and must be stated, is that freedom of expression does not enjoy superior status in our law.[2]

Balancing is not conducted within FC s 16. Instead, expression jurisprudence follows the basic structure of the Bill of Rights which sets out a wide array of fundamental rights but specifically states that they are all subject to the self-standing limitations clause in FC s 36(1). In terms of this clause, all rights may be limited, provided that the limitation is in terms of 'law of general application' and is 'reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom'. This involves a proportionality enquiry or, put differently, a balancing exercise.[3] A court is required to weigh up the infringement of the right against the purpose that the infringement seeks to achieve. The effect of the limitations clause is that the same document that entrenches freedom of expression as a fundamental right itself acknowledges

[1] Khumalo & Others v Holomisa 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC)('Khumalo') at para 25. This view of free speech can be contrasted with the best interests of the child, enshrined in FC s 28(2), which is a paramount value. See A Pantazis & A Friedman 'Children's Rights' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition OS, 2004) Chapter 48.

[2] S v Mamabolo (E TV, Business Day and the Freedom of Expression Institute Intervening) 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC), 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC), 2001 (1) SACR 686 (CC)('Mamabolo') at para 41. Professor Karthy Govender, on behalf of the appeal committee in Freedom Front v South African Human Rights Commission 2003 (11) BCLR 1283, 1288 (SAHRC)('Freedom Front') describes this as 'a much more nuanced and balanced approach' to freedom of expression than that of the US courts. See also Khumalo (supra) at paras 28 and 41-3; Independent Newspapers (Pty) Ltd v Minister for Intelligence [2008] ZACC 6 at para 44 (Confirming that the principle of open justice, which flows inter alia from the right to freedom of expression, is not absolute and can be overridden by countervailing rights.)

[3] S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC), 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 104; S v Bhulwana 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC), 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC) at para 18. For a critique of balancing as a metaphor for limitations analysis see S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 33.

that this right is neither absolute nor pre-eminent. Fitting this pattern, the courts have interpreted FC s 16(1) broadly to include any material that communicates or attempts to communicate meaning, including speech that may be considered of low value, such as pornography[1] (including, even, child pornography),[2] nude dancing[3] and commercial speech.[4] Even this low value speech overcomes the first hurdle of proving an infringement of the right, and thus engages the limitations clause.[5] Confining balancing to FC s 36(1) in this way should be supported because the limitations clause is particularly well suited to this weighing-up exercise.[6]

The approach of balancing is best reflected in the courts' unwillingness to adopt an all-or-nothing standard that would allow freedom of expression to always override harm in certain types of situations, even in situations in which freedom of expression will invariably outweigh the countervailing considerations. The Constitutional Court's refusal to strike down the crime of scandalising the court and the SCA's refusal to bar Cabinet ministers from suing for defamation in relation to criticism of their official conduct illustrate this reluctance. The Constitutional Court preferred to leave open the possibility that, in an appropriate case, a conviction for scandalising may be justified, while making it clear that this could only occur in exceptional circumstances.[7] In a similar vein, the SCA, in

[1] Case & Another v Minister of Safety and Security & Others; Curtis v Minister of Safety and Security & Others 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 587 (CC)(Mokgoro J).

[2] De Reuck (supra) at para 48. See further 'Sexually Explicit Expresson' § 42.9*(e)* infra.

[3] Phillips (supra) at para 15. See 'Sexually Explicit Expression' § 42.9*(e)* infra.

[4] City of Cape Town v Ad Outpost (Pty) Ltd 2000 (2) SA 733, 748 (C); and North Central Local Council and South Central Local Council v Roundabout Outdoor (Pty) Ltd & Others 2002 (2) SA 625 (D). See also 'Commerical Speech' §42.9*(f)* infra.

[5] The only difficulty with this approach is that FC s 36(1) can only be employed to justify 'laws of general application'. If the law arises from executive or private conduct that does not qualify as a 'law of general application', FC s 36(1) cannot be used to depart from the very broad construction of FC s 16.

[6] See R v Keegstra [1990] 3 SCR 697, (1990) 3 CRR (2d) 193, 218('Keegstra')(Dickson CJC notes that the self-standing limitations clause (s 1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms is better suited to the balancing exercise than attempting to carve out certain areas from the free expression protection in s 2*(b)* of the Charter. Dickson CJC thus favours a 'large and liberal interpretation' of freedom of expression coupled with weighing the 'various contextual values and factors' at the limitations stage.) This approach is different to that in the United States, where the courts, in the absence of a limitations clause in the US Constitution, carve out certain forms of speech from constitutional protection. As the US Supreme Court stated in Chaplinsky v New Hampshire 315 US 568 (1942)('Chaplinsky'): 'There are certain well-defined and narrowly limited classes of speech, the prevention and punishment of which have never been thought to raise any constitutional problem. These include the lewd and the obscene, the profane, the libelous, and the insulting or 'fighting' words — those that by their very utterance inflict injury or tend to incite an imminent breach of the peace'. Chaplinsky has, however, been watered-down in a number of subsequent decisions of the US Supreme Court.

[7] Mamabolo (supra). See § 42.9*(c)*(iv)(aa) infra.

principle, allowed Cabinet ministers to sue for defamation but simultaneously favoured a strict approach in assessing whether a political plaintiff should succeed in a defamation action.[1]

There are only two clear areas of South African free speech law where balancing is rejected. Tellingly, both are a product not of the courts, but of the constitutional drafters. The first is the exclusion from constitutional protection of certain forms of expression — propaganda for war, incitement of imminent violence and egregious hate speech — in FC s 16(2).[2] If expression falls within these specified categories, there is no room for balancing; free speech always loses. The other, diametrically opposed, area in which balancing does not apply is the privilege for speech in Parliament and the other legislatures. Here, the Final Constitution states that a member of the legislature cannot be criminally or civilly liable for anything said in the legislature.[3] In this instance, because of the overwhelming value to our democratic enterprise of free speech in the legislature, speech always wins, trumping considerations such as reputation and even national security.[4]

This approach of balancing is inconsistent with complete faith in the 'marketplace of ideas' that is sometimes evident in the approach of the courts in the United States.[5] It recognises that expression can cause harm and that it is sometimes necessary to prevent or minimise that harm through the mechanism of law, rather than simply through more speech.[6] This is nowhere more apparent than in our law's treatment of hate speech, where the Constitutional Court has recognised that the harm that such speech does to dignity, equality and the goal of national unity, justifies its restriction.[7] As Professor Govender has stated, on behalf of the appeal committee of the South African Human Rights Commission, the approach in our law of balancing freedom of expression against other rights and interests

[1] Mthembi-Mahanyele v Mail & Guardian Limited & Another 2004 (6) SA 329 (SCA)('Mthembi-Mahanyele'). See § 42.9*(a)* infra.

[2] Though the approach of balancing has been restored somewhat by the legislature in s 29 of the Films and Publications Act 65 of 1996, which provides for a number of defences to the criminal prohibition against these forms of expression. The courts and other tribunals have, in interpreting the hate speech exclusion in s 16(2)(c), adopted somewhat of a balancing approach by stating that this exclusion should be interpreted in a manner which balances the right to freedom of expression with dignity, equality and national unity. See § 42.8(2) infra.

[3] See 'The protection of expression in legislatures' § 42.10 infra.

[4] Another area in which one might say that our courts do not adopt a clear balancing approach is the defence of qualified privilege to a civil claim (e.g. defamation or breach of privacy). The approach is that the value of free speech is so high in certain circumstances (e.g. statements made during the course of court proceedings) that the statement is not unlawful unless it is irrelevant to the occasion for which privilege is granted, or if it is actuated by malice.

[5] For more, see § 42.5*(a)* infra.

[6] Our courts thus do not rigidly apply the famous statement of Brandeis J in Whitney v California 274 US 357, 377 (1927)('Whitney v California') that, if there is time for discussion to expose the falsehood and fallacies, 'the remedy to be applied is more speech, not enforced silence'.

[7] Islamic Unity (supra) at para 33. See § 42.8*(c)* infra.

involves a rejection of 'the absolutist stance of allowing ideas to compete totally uninhibited in the market place of ideas'.[1]

Part of what balancing means is that, while our courts acknowledge that expression can cause harm, the fundamental value of freedom of expression means that it can only be restricted where harm is actually caused or is likely to occur. Mere speculation of harm is insufficient to warrant overriding this fundamental right. This is particularly apparent in the approach of our courts to those aspects of contempt of court that implicate freedom of expression.[2] In the context of, first, scandalising the court and, then, sub judice, the Constitutional Court and the SCA (respectively) have emphasised that these crimes only arise where there is a real likelihood of the publication undermining the administration of justice.[3] This stands in sharp contrast to the position under the pre-constitutional common law, where a statement was unlawful where it tended to undermine the administration of justice.[4] This emphasis on real harm is also apparent in the constitutional treatment of trade mark law, where the Constitutional Court has emphasised that an action for dilution under the Trade Marks Act[5] only arises where the trade mark owner demonstrates a likelihood of substantial harm or detriment of such a degree that permitting the diluting speech would be unfair.[6]

Nevertheless, the Constitutional Court appears to be willing to relax this stringent approach to the likelihood of harm when the stakes are too high for it to risk being wrong[7] and the speech at issue is of relatively little value. This is apparent in the Court's decision to uphold a broad, criminal prohibition of all forms of child pornography despite accepting, in relation to simulated child pornography,[8] that no child would have been physically harmed in its production.

Another consequence of the balancing approach is that, unlike the United States' courts,[9] our courts have not followed a 'levels of scrutiny' approach to

[1] Freedom Front v South African Human Rights Commission 2003 (11) BCLR 1283, 1296 (SAHRC)('Freedom Front').

[2] Contempt ex facie curiae. See § 42.9*(c)*(iv) infra.

[3] Mamabolo (supra); Midi Television (Pty) Ltd t/a E-TV v Director of Public Prosecutions (Western Cape) 2007 (5) SA 540 (SCA)('Midi Television').

[4] S v Van Niekerk 1972 (3) SA 711 (A); S v Harber & Another 1988 (3) SA 396 (A).

[5] Act 194 of 1993.

[6] Laugh It Off Promotions CC v South African Breweries International (Finance) BV t/a SABMark International 2006 (1) SA 144 (CC), 2005 (8) BCLR 743 (CC)('Laugh It Off') at paras 49-50. See 'Intellectual Property Restrictions' § 42.9*(d)* infra.

[7] This approach is consistent with that advocated by RA Posner. See RA Posner 'The Speech Market and the Legacy of Schenk' in L Bollinger & G Stone (eds) Eternally Vigilant: Free Speech in the Modern Era (2002) 121, 124 ('If [the harm that may be caused by speech] is grave enough, it should be regulable even though unlikely; and if likely enough, it should be regulable even though not particularly grave'.) There is thus, in Posner's words, a need for a trade-off between the gravity and the likelihood of the harm.

[8] Pornography that apparently portrays children but where the persons depicted are in fact adults or where the images are computer generated without the involvement of actual children.

[9] Although the US courts have to some extent moved towards an approach of balancing in recent years, a 'levels of scrutiny' approach continues to apply. For example, high value speech, including political speech, can only be restricted where there is a 'clear and present danger'. See Schenck v United States 249 US 47, 52, 39 SCt 247 (1919)('Schenck v US') and Abrams v United States 250 US 616, 628, 40 SCt 17 (1919)('Abrams v US'). Commercial speech, as comparatively low value speech, may be limited where the government interest in restricting the speech is substantial, the regulation directly advances the government interest and that the manner in which it does so is no more extensive than is necessary. See Central Hudson Gas v Public Services Commission 447 US 557, 100 SCt 2343 (1980)('Central Hudson').

freedom of expression which adopts different tests depending on the nature of the expression. They have, however, tended to scrutinise the type of expression in issue in order to assess the value of that expression, and therefore how heavily it weighs in the limitation scales.[1] In doing so, our courts, in effect, distinguish between high value and low value speech, based in part on the underlying rationales for freedom of speech.[2] For example, our courts have generally emphasised that political expression lies at the core of the freedom of expression protection,[3] while the Constitutional Court has made the point that child pornography does not implicate the core values of freedom of expression and therefore receives less protection.[4] This attitude was also apparent when the Constitutional Court struck down a restriction on nude (or improperly clothed) performances at premises with a liquor licence in part because the prohibition hit not just striptease clubs and the like, but also serious theatre.[5] Certain judges seemed to regard the latter type of expression as more deserving of constitutional protection than the former.[6] In sum, while aspects of the US approach may be characterised as a ladder, with discrete rungs of value and levels of justification, the South African approach is more like a slide with a gradual decreasing burden of justification as the value of speech decreases.

South Africa's courts have, to date, not faced a number of tricky issues that bring into focus the manner in which freedom of expression may be limited or regulated in the name of the promotion of better — read fuller, or more diverse — expression; areas such as campaign finance restrictions, content and common carrier regulation of broadcasting and public funding of certain forms of speech. These issues, which dominate much of the recent literature on free speech in the United States, raise important questions as to the manner in which the state, in the words of Owen Fiss, 'might become the friend, rather than the enemy, of

[1] A similar approach is adopted in Canada (which, like South Africa, has a self-standing limitations clause — s 1 of the Canadian Charter). See, for example, Keegstra (supra) at 242.

[2] These rationales are discussed in § 42.5 infra.

[3] See, for example, Holomisa v Argus Newspapers Limited 1996 (2) SA 588 (W) ('Holomisa'); Mthembi-Mahanyele (supra). See 'The Law of Defamation' § 42.9*(a)* infra. See also MEC for Education: KwaZulu-Natal & Others v Pillay 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC) at para 94 (cultural and religious expression is 'central to the right of freedom of expression').

[4] De Reuck (supra) at para 59. See § 42.9*(e)* infra.

[5] Phillips (supra) at paras 27-28.

[6] For further discussion of this case, see § 42.9*(e)* infra. Two areas which squarely raise the question as to the value of speech in furthering the rationales of freedom of expression that have not yet been fully ventilated before our highest courts, are hate speech and commercial expression. As discussed below, the value of these categories of speech, and the level of protection that should be accorded to them, is a matter of some controversy. See § 42.8*(c)* and § 42.9*(f)* infra. Hate speech was to some extent considered in Islamic Unity which considered the manner in which the hate speech exclusion in FC s 16(2)(c) operates and struck down a clearly overbroad hate speech prohibition.

freedom'.[1] They require courts to engage with the most appropriate way in which to regulate the 'marketplace of ideas'. Given the approach of our courts in other areas, it is likely that they will reject arguments to allow for an uninhibited, free market and will look favourably upon laws that rationally improve access to the speech market in the interests of greater participation.[2]

42.5 THE RATIONALES FOR FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION

Freedom of expression has been described in the United States as 'the matrix, the indispensable condition on which nearly every other freedom depends'[3] and, closer to home, by our Constitutional Court as 'the lifeblood of an open and democratic society cherished by our Constitution'.[4] Despite these emphatic affirmations of the value of freedom of expression, it seems that, while almost everyone agrees that freedom of expression should be protected, almost no one agrees on why it should be protected.

A possible response to this dilemma is to say that freedom of expression should be protected because FC 16(1) says so. While this may be true, it is a facile and unsatisfactory response. The reasons that we protect freedom of expression matter. Without an understanding of the rationales underpinning this freedom, we cannot properly explain the degree of protection that is given to it in various contexts nor draw its limits, both in the sense of defining the ambit of the right to freedom of expression and in assessing the permissibility of limitations on the right. It is therefore necessary to consider some of the rationales advanced for freedom of expression.[5]

[1] O Fiss The Irony of Free Speech (1996) 2. Fiss also lists hate speech and pornography in this category because this speech, according to Fiss, can undermine the sense of self-worth of the target group (in the case of hate speech) and women (in the case of pornography) and thus reduce their contribution to debate on public issues. Ibid at 5-26. This harm of withdrawal of the target group (an aspect of what Fiss refers to as 'the silencing effect of speech') is acknowledged by the majority of the Canadian Supreme Court in Keegstra (supra) 227-8. See § 42.8*(c)* infra.

[2] See, for example, New National Party of South Africa v Government of the Republic of South Africa & Others 1999 (3) SA 191 (CC), 1999 (5) BCLR 489 (CC) at para 13 ('The Constitution recognises that it is necessary to regulate the exercise of the right to vote so as to give substantive content to the right.')

[3] Palko v State of Connecticut 302 US 319, 327 (1937).

[4] Dikoko v Mokhatla 2006 (6) SA 235 (CC), 2007 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) ('Dikoko') at para 92. See also Mandela v Falati 1995 (1) SA 251, 259 (W)('Mandela')('In a free society all freedoms are important, but they are not equally important. Political philosophers are agreed about the primacy of the freedom of speech. It is the freedom upon which all the other freedoms depend; it is the freedom without which the others would not long endure'.)

[5] In the space available, we cannot do justice to the large amount of literature on this topic. For more detailed considerations of the philosophical underpinnings of freedom of expression, see F Schauer Free Speech: A Philosophical Enquiry (1982)('Free Speech')(Schauer expresses misgivings with a number of the justifications advanced for freedom of speech); E Barendt Freedom of Speech (2nd Edition, 2005) ('Freedom of Speech'); T Emerson The System of Freedom of Expression (1970); L Bollinger & G Stone (eds) Eternally Vigilant: Free Speech in the Modern Era (2002); I Loveland (ed) Importing the First Amendment: Freedom of Speech and Expression in Britain, Europe and the USA (1998); and L Alexander Is There a Right of Freedom of Expression? (2005)(Alexander expresses the view that there is no independent right to freedom of expression). In a South African context, see J Van der Westhuizen 'Freedom of Expression' in Van Wyk, J Dugard, B de Villiers & D Davis (eds) Rights and Constitutionalism (1994) 264; D Meyerson ' "No

One of the justifications that is sometimes given for freedom of expression is the principle of autonomy or liberty: if one is free to do as one pleases, one should be free to say as one pleases. In other words, freedom of expression is simply an instance of the more general principle of autonomy, or a way of giving effect to autonomy.[1] This is based on the idea that if we are all equal, rational beings we should not be told that our views are less worthy, and therefore cannot be expressed, while the views of others are allowed. We should thus all enjoy liberty of expression unless good reasons are advanced for limiting that liberty.

The difficulty with the principle of autonomy as a justification for freedom of expression, is that it does not explain why expression is different to other conduct. In the words of Frederick Schauer, it does not give rise to a Free Speech Principle, i.e. a principle which explains why expression is given greater protection from interference than other forms of conduct.[2] The principle of autonomy also fails to explain why the Constitution protects certain, specific fundamental freedoms (such as freedom of expression, religion, association, assembly and movement), rather than containing a general right to freedom.[3] We therefore need to look elsewhere for the justification for why we protect the right to freedom of expression.

Platform for Racists": What Should the View of Those on the Left Be?' (1990) 6 SAJHR 394; R Suttner 'Freedom of Speech' (1990) 6 SAJHR 372; A Sachs 'Towards a Bill of Rights in a Democratic South Africa' (1990) 6 SAJHR 13; and J Burchell Personality Rights and Freedom of Expression (1998) 1-23.

[1] F Schauer 'First Amendment Opportunism' in Bollinger & Stone (supra) at 174, 175 (Argues that a number of United States Supreme Court decisions relying on freedom of speech, in fact appeal to more general notions of liberty. He posits, for example, that the advertising decision of Virginia Citizens Consumer Council v Virginia Board of Pharmacy 425 US 748 (1976), which on the face of it relies on the protection of freedom of speech in the First Amendment, has little to do with freedom of expression and more to do with the general notion of economic liberty.) See § 42.9*(f)*.

[2] Schauer Free Speech (supra) at 5-7.

[3] See Ferreira v Levin NO & Others; Vryenhoek & Others v Powell NO & Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC), 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC). Ackermann J interpreted the right to freedom and security of the person in IC s 11(1) in a 'broad and generous' way, as entrenching a general 'right to freedom' (or liberty). Ibid at paras 45-69. The majority of the Constitutional Court, however, rejected this broad approach, holding that the right to freedom embodied the protection of physical integrity and other freedoms (which are likely to arise only rarely) of a fundamental nature. Ibid at para 184. See further M Bishop & S Woolman 'Freedom and Security of the Person' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) 40-5–40-11. This does not mean, however, that the principle of autonomy is irrelevant to the protection of freedom of expression and the weight to be accorded to that freedom. As O'Regan J states in Khumalo (supra) at para 21*:* '[f]reedom of expression is integral to a democratic society for many reasons. It is constitutive of the dignity and autonomy of human beings'. The Constitutional Court recently adopted part of Ackermann J's view in the context of freedom of expression, holding that: 'Human dignity has little value without freedom; for without freedom personal development and fulfilment are not possible. Without freedom, human dignity is little more than an abstraction. Freedom and dignity are inseparably linked. To deny people their freedom is to deny them their dignity.' MEC for Education: KwaZulu-Natal & Others v Pillay 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC) at para 63 quoting Ferreira (supra) at para 49. See § 42.5*(c)* infra.

Three more solid justifications are traditionally advanced for the protection of freedom of expression: the search for truth, the functioning of a democracy and self-fulfilment (or audience autonomy).[1] These justifications were captured by the Constitutional Court in South African National Defence Union in the following terms:

> [Freedom of expression] lies at the heart of a democracy. It is valuable for many reasons, including its instrumental function as a guarantor of democracy, its implicit recognition and protection of the moral agency of individuals in our society and its facilitation of the search for truth by individuals and society generally. The Constitution recognises that individuals in our society need to be able to hear, form and express opinions and views freely on a wide range of matters.[2]

We discuss each of these traditional rationales, in turn. This is followed by a brief discussion of some other free speech rationales.

(a) The search for truth

The oldest justification advanced for the protection of free expression, is the pursuit of truth.[3] This rationale was probably first articulated in 1644 by John Milton, arguing against the licensing of the printing press: 'Let [Truth] and falsehood grapple; who ever knew Truth put to the worse, in a free and open encounter?'.[4] A number of Milton's arguments were taken up two centuries later by John Stuart Mill, who adopted the premise that many of the opinions that we suppress may be true, or may contain a portion of truth, and the elimination of suppression of speech would increase the likelihood of establishing truth.[5] Mill expressed the view that it was not only the publication of true information that facilitates the search for truth. He reasoned that wholly false information can also advance that search, because it provides an opportunity for the truth to be made more

[1] See Irwin Toy Limited v Quebec (Attorney-General) (1989) 58 DLR (4th) 577, 612 (SCC)(The Canadian Supreme Court described the rationales for freedom of expression in the following terms: '(1) seeking and attaining truth is an inherently good activity; (2) participation in social and political decision-making is to be fostered and encouraged; and (3) the diversity in forms of individual self-fulfillment and human flourishing ought to be cultivated'.)

[2] South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC) at para 7. See also Phillips & Another v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division, & Others 2003 (3) SA 345 (CC), 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC)('Phillips') at para 23 ('[t]he right to freedom of expression is integral to democracy, to human development and to human life itself'); De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions (Witwatersrand Local Division) 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC)('De Reuck') at para 59.

[3] It is not only the oldest but also probably the most influential. In the words of Schauer, it is the 'predominant and most persevering' justification for free speech. Free Speech (supra) at 15. See also Case & Another v Minister of Safety and Security & Others; Curtis v Minister of Safety and Security & Others 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 587 (CC)('Case') at para 26 (Mokgoro J describes the truth justification as the most commonly cited rationale for freedom of expression.)

[4] Areopagitica (1644). See also J Milton A Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing (1644).

[5] On Liberty (1859), republished in On Liberty and Other Essays (1991).

meaningful in exposing the false idea. Further, if those who hold a true idea are not forced to defend it, it will become a 'dead dogma' rather than a 'living truth'.[1]

These ideas on the importance of freedom of speech to the pursuit of truth have been taken up enthusiastically by the United States Supreme Court, to justify the protection of free speech under the First Amendment to the United States Constitution.[2] The Supreme Court has, in some respects, adopted a market theory of free speech, holding that the best means of attaining truth is through free competition in the 'marketplace of ideas'. The market is preferable to government determination as a means for attaining truth because government cannot be relied on to distinguish truth from falsity, especially where government has an interest in the matter. The 'marketplace of ideas' theory of free speech was famously expressed by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes in his dissenting judgment in Abrams v US:

> But when men have realised that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas — that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market, and that the truth is the only ground upon which their wishes safely can be carried out. That at any rate is the theory of our Constitution.[3]

The marketplace of ideas theory has also found some purchase in the judgments of our courts. As Kriegler J stated on behalf of the Constitutional Court in S v Mamabolo:

> Freedom of expression, especially when gauged in conjunction with its accompanying fundamental freedoms, is of the utmost importance in the kind of open and democratic society the Constitution has set as our aspirational norm. Having regard to our recent past of thought control, censorship and enforced conformity to governmental theories, freedom of expression — the free and open exchange of ideas — is no less important than it is in the United States of America. It could actually be contended with much force that the public interest in the open market-place of ideas is all the more important to us in this country

[1] JS Mill On Liberty (supra) at 40. As Brennan J, with reference to Mill, states in the famous decision of the United States Supreme Court in New York Times v Sullivan: '[e]ven a false statement may be deemed to make a valuable contribution to public debate, since it brings about "the clearer perception and livelier perception of truth, produced by its collision with error".' 376 US 254, 279 n 19 (1964)('Sullivan').

[2] The First Amendment states, in emphatic language, that 'Congress shall make no law . . . abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press'.

[3] Abrams v US (supra). This approach, which Holmes J conceded was an experiment, led him to disagree with the view of the majority of the Supreme Court that the First Amendment was not infringed by the Espionage Act, which criminalized the criticism of the United States government's policies while the country was at war. Similarly, in Gitlow v New York, Holmes J dissented from the majority in relation to a conviction for criminal anarchy arising from the publication of a Communist Party manifesto. 268 US 652 (1925)('Gitlow'). He stated: 'If, in the long run, the beliefs expressed in proletarian dictatorships are destined to be accepted by the dominant forces of the community, the only meaning of free speech is that they should be given that chance'. Ibid at 673.

> because our democracy is not yet firmly established and must feel its way. Therefore we should be particularly astute to outlaw any form of thought control, however respectably dressed.[1]

It seems fair to accept that the attainment of truth is a beneficial value and that expression is capable of advancing this value in a way that other conduct is not. In this respect, the pursuit of truth is a compelling rationale for freedom of expression,[2] expecially where a statement of fact (which is capable of objective ascertainment) is made and some public good (other than the mere attainment of truth for its own sake) is achieved through the establishment of truth. This would include, for example, the disclosure of scientific results reflecting drugs which ease suffering or cure illness or the disclosure of criminal acts or malfeasance of public officials.[3]

The truth rationale is regarded by some as less compelling in relation to expressions of opinions (as opposed to facts) because an opinion does not directly advance the truth as, unlike a fact, it cannot be either true or false. This argument is, in our view, mistaken. It seems to us that the pursuit of truth may be advanced through the expression of opinion where one opinion is more correct than another and the expression of that opinion persuades others to accept it.[4] As Schauer points out, the fact that objective truth may not be ascertainable is not fatal to the utility of this justification for free speech, as the purpose is not necessarily the attainment of objective truth, but epistemic advancement (i.e. information or ideas in which we can be more confident).[5]

There are, however, several problems with the truth theory. As a starting point, it is of little assistance in explaining the protection of speech which conveys neither a statement of fact nor an opinion. A fictional novel, for example, does not necessarily advance the truth. The same can be said of most forms of pornography, numerous forms of artistic expression, including music or sculpture, and false statements of fact published by the media, albeit in good faith.

[1] Mamabolo (supra) at para 37. See also Mandela (supra) at 259 ('The history of liberty shows that the currency of every free society is to be found in the market-place of ideas where, without restraint, individuals exchange the most sacred of all their commodities. If the market is sometimes corrupt or abused or appears to serve the interests of the wicked and unscrupulous, that is reason enough to accept that it operates in accordance with the rules of human nature'.)

[2] See Gardener v Whitaker 1995 (2) SA 672, 687 (E)('the advancement of knowledge and truth' is a fundamental value underlying freedom of expression.)

[3] The argument from truth is thus a particularly compelling rationale for the specific protection of scientific and academic research in FC s 16(1)(d).

[4] We note that the judgments in the United States Supreme Court which established the 'marketplace of ideas' theory of free speech dealt with the expression of opinions rather than facts. See Abrams v US (supra); Gitlow (supra); and Whitney v Califonia (supra).

[5] Schauer Free Speech (supra) at 18. Unrestricted expression of opinions may well be more important than free expression of facts because the nature of opinions or ideas is that we can be less confident in the truth of a particular proposition (i.e. the proposition may be more open to debate). Ibid at 31-33.

The primary criticism of the truth rationale is that, in its strong form, it assumes that truth is likely to emerge from unrestricted discussion. In short, the 'marketplace of ideas' theory puts too much faith in the power of truth to emerge from open discussion.[1] There are two main reasons why the theory's detractors argue that this is not necessarily the case. First, men and women's rationality is flawed. The marketplace of ideas theory assumes that, faced with a choice, people will tend to choose truth because they are endowed with reason or the power of rational decision-making. The problem is that there is little empirical support for this proposition and history is replete with instances of false (or bad) ideas gaining general acceptance. A number of authors cite the rise of Nazism in Germany prior to World War II as an instance of false ideas generally prevailing in society. Commenting that the argument from truth is idealistic and naive, Stanley Ingber points out that people may be more persuaded by packaging than by the content of a particular idea.[2] Schauer remarks that the ability to reason has largely been discredited by history and the insights of psychology, and concludes that without empirical support for the likelihood of truth emerging from a free market in ideas, 'the argument from truth evaporates'.[3]

We submit that this overstates the position. If one accepts that truth is valuable, the real question is not whether truth will always emerge from unrestricted discussion, but rather whether truth is more likely to result from free discussion or from a system in terms of which government (or another body) regulates what can and cannot be said. While we are conscious that there is no empirical support for this view, history would seem to support the argument that the greater the freedom to express a diversity of opinions, the more likely it is that the truth will be established. At the very least, it seems that an increase in the pool of ideas improves the chances of establishing truth.

Second, the probability of truth emerging from open discussion may be hampered if the marketplace is skewed, which it invariably is. Ingber correctly points out that real world conditions may interfere with, and distort, the operation of the marketplace of ideas.[4] The 'marketplace of ideas' model is therefore open to the same criticisms as the laissez-faire economic theory on which it is based. Ingber points to, for example, sophisticated and expensive communication technology, monopoly control of the media, and access limitations for disfavoured and impoverished groups, as leading to a situation where ideas which support the entrenched power structure or ideology are most likely to gain acceptance in

[1] See D Feldman 'Content Neutrality' in I Loveland (ed) Importing the First Amendment: Freedom of Speech and Expression in Britain, Europe and the USA (1998) 139 ('Content Neutrality'), 142 ('we would do well to maintain a healthy scepticism in the face of exhortations to subscribe to a blind faith in the capacity of an heroic citizenry and the market-place of ideas to weed out the bad ideas and allow only the good to flourish'.)

[2] S Ingber 'The Marketplace of Ideas: A Legitimizing Myth' (1984) Duke LJ 1, 35-36.

[3] Schauer Free Speech (supra) at 26. For further formidable critiques of the argument from truth in this context, see generally R Abel Speech and Respect (1994); Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 8-13.

[4] Ingber (supra) at 5. See also C Sustein Democracy and the Problem of Free Speech (1993).

the free market.[1] In Ingber's words, the market has 'a status quo bias'.[2] This criticism must be taken particularly seriously in post-apartheid South Africa, which is characterised by great political, social and economic inequalities, a fairly narrow group of media owners and in which access to the mass media is virtually unattainable for a great deal of the population.[3]

This criticism does not, however, necessarily give rise to an absolute rejection of the pursuit of truth as a justification for protecting freedom of expression. It can rather take the form of a call for some measure of regulation in order to create conditions in which true freedom of expression is advanced. In other words, we need not completely abandon the value of the speech marketplace, but should rather attempt to make access to that marketplace more equitable so that a greater diversity of views is available in the market. Owen Fiss makes the point that government should, in appropriate cases, intervene as a 'parliamentarian' in creating pro-speech conditions:

> In some instances, instrumentalities of the state will try to stifle free and open debate, and the First Amendment is the tried-and-true mechanism that stops or prevents such abuses of state power. In other instances, however, the state may have to act to further the robustness of public debate in circumstances where powers outside the state are stifling speech. It may have to allocate public resources — hand out megaphones — to those whose voices would not otherwise be heard in the public square.[4]

In our view, it is important to distinguish between the marketplace of ideas theory and the more general truth rationale. Although these two concepts are related — and intertwined in the jurisprudence of the United States Supreme Court — they are not the same. It is possible to accept the argument from truth, while rejecting the idea that the marketplace that acts as the mechanism of establishing truth must be free of all restrictions. In a South African context, the huge social and economic inequalities and the need to balance freedom of expression against a variety of other rights and interests, offer compelling reasons to regulate expression in certain circumstances in order to alleviate the threat of the marketplace being skewed. This is, to some extent, reflected in the approach taken in FC s 192, which stipulates that legislation must establish an independent broadcasting

[1] See also CE Baker Human Liberty and Freedom of Speech (1989).

[2] Ingber (supra) at 17.

[3] The lack of access to the mass media is not a uniquely South African phenomenon. Eric Barendt has had the following to say about the position in the United States: 'the modern mass media are controlled by a handful of groups and networks. Few cities in the United States offer readers a choice of newspapers, while three or four national networks dominate television. The United States, like Europe, has witnessed the growth in multi-media corporations, with interests in films, broadcasting, newspapers and magazines, or some combination of them'. Barendt 'The First Amendment and the Media' in Loveland (ed) (supra) at 44.

[4] O Fiss The Irony of Free Speech (1996) 3-4. See also Feldman (supra) at 148 ('A free market-place of ideas needs careful management to prevent abuse of power by those who can apply money or physical force to demean or drive out others'.)

authority in the public interest 'to ensure fairness and diversity of views broadly representing South African society'.[1]

The area of government regulation of expression is, however, one in which decision-makers should tread carefully. While there may, in appropriate circumstances, be good reasons to regulate certain aspects of the speech market in the interests of increasing the quality and diversity of speech, we should not lose sight of the fact that government is often poorly placed to make decisions on the regulation of expression because it will almost inevitably have an interest in maintaining the status quo — or changing it in a manner that suits the government of the day. As Frederick Schauer says: 'The reason for preferring the marketplace of ideas to the selection of truth by government may be less the proven ability of the former than it is the often evidenced inability of the latter.'[2]

Another criticism levelled at the truth rationale is that it assumes that truth is a pre-eminent value in society. These critics argue that there are many other values that society may regard as equally or more important, such as the right to a fair trial, intellectual property or the right to reputation.[3] They also point out that, in certain circumstances, the truth of the statement is the very reason for prohibiting it. This is true of, for example, the prohibition on the disclosure of information that undermines national security, the protection of commercially confidential information and the protection of individual privacy.

The response to this criticism is that the fact that speech may be limited in certain circumstances does not remove the value of the argument from truth. It merely serves to emphasise that the interests in freedom of expression — which may include the advancement of truth — may, in appropriate cases, be outweighed by other rights or interests, and that freedom of expression is not absolute. Put differently, that other rights or interests might outweigh freedom of expression in particular cases does not mean that the reason that free speech weighs heavily on the other side of the scale is not its capacity to advance the pursuit of truth.

(b) The proper functioning of democracy

The next rationale for freedom of expression is its value in facilitating the proper functioning of the democratic process. This justification, which certain authors

[1] The body contemplated in FC s 192 is the Independent Communications Authority of South Africa, established in terms of s 3 of the Independent Communications Authority of South Africa Act 13 of 2000. See J White 'The Independent Communications Authority of South Africa' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, February 2005) 24E-3. See also Chapter 9 of the Electronic Communications Act 25 of 2002 (Regulates, amongst other things, broadcasting content and ownership).

[2] Schauer Free Speech (supra) at 34. For a critical discussion of the argument for free speech based on the 'suspicion of government rationale', see Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 21-23.

[3] See Schauer Free Speech (supra) at 23 and 33 (Argues that any strong version of the argument from truth must elevate truth to a position of absolute priority over other values, and that such absolute priority is unworkable.)

regard as the dominant rationale for freedom of expression,[1] occupies a prominent position in American free speech theory. The main proponent of this rationale, Alexander Meikeljohn, argued that the American people, as a matter of historical fact, created a form of self-government where sovereignty rested in the people and not the government,[2] and in terms of which the people only granted some powers to the government and reserved other powers for themselves.[3] The power to criticise government and to engage in political speech was one of the powers specifically reserved by the people in the emphatic wording of the First Amendment of the United States Constitution.[4] In the words of James Madison, 'the censorial power is in the people over the Government, and not in the Government over the people'.[5] Meikeljohn therefore drew a sharp distinction between public and private speech and argued that freedom of speech in areas of public affairs is absolute.[6] He criticised the United States Supreme Court for extending the protection of the First Amendment to non-political speech because, he said, it diluted the protection of core political speech (if one accepts that private speech is protected, one must assume that other interests will occasionally trump it and its protection is thus not absolute).

Meikeljohn's views were instrumental in shaping the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the landmark defamation case of New York Times v Sullivan.[7] During the course of his judgment, which put in place a highly speech-protective standard for libel involving public officials, Justice Brennan emphasised the fundamental importance of political speech in the context of a national commitment that 'debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and wide open, and that it may well include vehement, caustic, and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on government and public officials'.[8]

Following the lead of the United States, courts in most democracies agree that political expression is at the core of the protection of freedom of expression.[9] As the English courts have stated:

[1] See, for example, L Bollinger & G Stone 'Dialogue' in L Bollinger & G Stone (eds) Eternally Vigilant: Free Speech in the Modern Era (2002) 1, 23.

[2] Hence, the opening words of the United States Constitution: 'We the people. . .'

[3] A Meikeljohn Political Freedom – The Constitutional Powers of the People (1960)('Political Freedom') and 'The First Amendment is an Absolute' [1961] Supreme Court Review 245.

[4] 'Congress shall make no law . . .' (emphasis added).

[5] 4 Annals of Congress 934 (1794), quoted in R Post 'Reconciling Theory and Doctrine in First Amendment Jurisprudence' in Bollinger & Stone (eds) (supra) at 152, 157.

[6] Meiklejohn Political Freedom (supra) at 79.

[7] 376 US 254 (1964)('Sullivan'). See also W Brennan 'The Supreme Court and the Meikeljohn Interpretation of the First Amendment' (1965) 79 Harvard Law Review 1. Sullivan is discussed in detail at § 42.9*(a)* infra.

[8] Sullivan (supra) at 270. See also H Kalven 'The New York Times Case: A Note on "the Central Meaning of the First Amendment"' [1964] Sup Ct Rev 191; D Milo Defamation and Freedom of Speech (2008) 66-7 ('Defamation').

[9] See, for example, Lingens v Austria (1986) 8 EHRR 407 (European Court of Human Rights)('Lingens v Austria'); Theophanous v Herald and Weekly Times Ltd (1993-4) 182 CLR 104 (Australia). See D Spitz 'Eschewing Silence Coerced by Law: The Political Core and the Protected Periphery of Freedom of Expression' (1994) 10 SAJHR 301; Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 155-162.

> In a free and democratic society it is almost too obvious to need stating that those who hold public office in government and who are responsible for public administration must always be open to criticism. Any attempt to stifle or fetter such criticism amounts to political censorship of the most insidious and objectionable kind.[1]

The argument from democracy asserts that freedom of expression is a precondition to a properly functioning democracy because it promotes, in particular, the twin democratic values of accountability and participation.

The protection of freedom of expression enhances democratic accountability — as well as the other core constitutional values of responsiveness and openness[2] — by imposing a valuable check on governmental and other public power. For example, it facilitates the exposure of maladministration, corruption and nepotism.[3] As Cameron J stated in Holomisa v Argus Newspapers Ltd:

> In a system of democracy dedicated to openness and accountability, as ours is, the especially important role of the media, both publicly and privately owned, must in my view be recognised. The success of our constitutional venture depends upon robust criticism of the exercise of power. This requires alert and critical citizens. But strong and independent newspapers, journals and broadcast media are needed also, if those criticisms are to be effectively voiced, and if they are to be informed with the factual content and critical perspectives that investigative journalism may provide.[4]

Freedom of expression is thus fundamental in a representative democracy like ours, in which the people elect the government, are represented by that government and in which the government should be accountable to the electorate.[5]

---

[1] Derbyshire County Council v Times Newspaper [1992] 3 All ER 65, 80 (CA), quoting Hector v Attorney General of Antigua and Barbuda [1990] 2 All ER 103, 106.

[2] FC s 1*(d)*. See also, for example, FC s 195. The fundamental nature of public accountability is emphasised in the judgment of the Constitutional Court in Rail Commuters Action Group & Others v Transnet Limited t/a Metrorail & Others 2005 (2) SA 359 (CC), 2005 (4) BCLR 301 (CC) at para 74. The Supreme Court of Appeal has also endorsed the importance of the principle in, for example, Minister of Safety and Security v Van Duivenboden 2002 (6) SA 431 (SCA) at paras 20-22.

[3] See Government of the Republic of South Africa v 'Sunday Times' Newspapers & Another 1995 (2) SA 221, 227 (T)('Sunday Times')(Joffe J)('It is the function of the press to ferret out corruption, dishonesty and graft wherever it may occur and to expose the perpetrators. The press must reveal dishonest, mal- and inept administration.')

[4] 1996 (2) SA 588, 608-9 (W)('Holomisa'). Holomisa was decided under the Interim Constitution, which expressly recognised the special importance of political expression, by stating that a limitation on the right to freedom of expression 'insofar as it relates to free and fair political activity' must, in addition to being reasonable and justifiable, also be necessary' (IC s 33). Although the limitations clause in the Final Constitution (FC s 36) is different in approach, and applies the same limitations test to all infringements of fundamental rights, our courts will probably continue to apply an increased level of protection to political speech. See J Burchell Personality Rights and Freedom of Expression (1998) 22-23. See also Mthembi-Mahanyele (supra).

[5] See R Dworkin Sovereign Virtue: The Theory and Practice of Equality (2000) 363-365; R Post 'Equality and Autonomy in First Amendment Jurisprudence' (1997) 95 Michigan LR 1517. The democratic participation value is particularly useful in the context of the Internet, which has dramatically enhanced the ability of citizens to engage in public discussion of important issues. See JM Balkin 'How Rights Change: Freedom of Speech in the Digital Era' (2004) 26 Sydney LR 13. For a discussion of the concept of representative democracy, see T Roux 'Democracy' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) § 42.10.2*(b)*.

Freedom of expression also enhances democratic participation in several ways. It enables citizens, and particularly the media, to communicate information and ideas to the community and thus contributes to the creation and maintenance of an informed electorate, so that they can better participate in the democratic process.[1] As O'Regan J stated in Khumalo: 'without [freedom of expression], the ability of citizens to make responsible political decisions and to participate effectively in public life would be stifled'.[2] Freedom of expression also advances democratic participation by enabling people to communicate the wishes of the population to the government. In the words of Joffe J in Sunday Times, freedom of expression enables communication between 'the governed and those who govern'.[3]

A number of criticisms have historically been aimed at the argument from democracy. We briefly discuss two of the most common criticisms. First, it is argued that the argument from democracy is only useful in democracies, and it assumes that democracy is the most preferable form of government.[4] While there may be some merit in this criticism in the abstract, this is immaterial in a South African context, in which the Constitution emphatically endorses a commitment to democratic governance.[5] Leaving aside the merits and demerits of democracy as a political system, the point about the argument from democracy is that if a country adopts a democratic form of government, such a government functions most effectively amidst a culture of accountability and participation; a culture that is served by freedom of expression.

Second, certain authors have pointed to the 'democratic paradox' that they see as implicit in the argument from democracy.[6] This so-called paradox is that, if one accepts that freedom of expression flows from democracy (or the sovereignty of the people), how does one explain that, in a constitutional state, the right to freedom of expression can be used to override the democratically-expressed will of the majority expressed through, for example, an Act of Parliament? This criticism misses the point. The point is not that the protection of freedom of expression is the natural outcome of the democratic process, but rather that this freedom is a precondition to the proper functioning of the democratic system — particularly a system of representative democracy. Without the protection of this fundamental right, one cannot be confident in the outcome of the democratic

[1] The Constitutional Court recently confirmed the importance of participatory democracy in a case dealing with the right to comment on draft legislation, Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly & Others 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC), 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC) at para 145. For more on public participation, see Matatiele Municipality & Others v President of the RSA & Others 2007 (1) BCLR 47 (CC); Merafong Demarcation Forum & Others v President of the Republic of South Africa & Others [2008] ZACC 10.

[2] Khumalo (supra) at para 21.

[3] Sunday Times (supra) at 228.

[4] Thomas Scanlon therefore regards the argument from democracy as 'artificial'. T Scanlon 'A Theory of Freedom of Expression' (1972) 1 Philosophy & Public Affairs 204, 205-206.

[5] On the relevant provisions of the Final Constitution, see Roux 'Democracy' (supra) at § 10.3.

[6] See, for example, Schauer Free Speech (supra) at 40-41.

process.[1] Seen in this context, the criticism becomes simply a manifestation of the 'counter-majoritarian dilemma'[2] — the idea that fundamental rights can trump the will of the majority — which is canvassed in other chapters of this work.[3] The answer to this dilemma is, as Theunis Roux explains, that the South African Constitution adopts a conception of democracy that is broader and more sophisticated than simple majoritarianism. The Final Constitution safeguards fundamental rights against unjustifiable infringement by the majority as constitutive of, rather than contrary to, democracy.[4]

A potential weakness with the argument from democracy is that it only explains why we protect a fairly narrow range of expression: political speech. It does not explain why we protect other speech that does not further the democratic enterprise — such as, arguably, painting, music, scientific research, commercial speech, defamation that does not engage political speech, and hard core pornography. An additional difficulty is the absence of a bright line between political and non-political expression.[5] By way of example, much of pornography is not necessarily political, yet the emphasis by feminist writers on the power relations underlying pornography suggests that there may be a political element to this expression.[6]

(c) Self-fulfilment and audience autonomy

The third traditional justification for freedom of expression is that it promotes individual self-fulfilment. This rationale values freedom of expression for its intrinsic worth in enabling individuals to communicate with others and, in so doing, to develop towards self-fulfilment. In the words of Froneman J in Gardener v Whitaker, one of the underlying values of freedom of expression is 'the free development of an individual's intellect, interests, tastes and personality'.[7]

[1] Schauer acknowledges that this argument is still a powerful one in support of a 'broad freedom to communicate ideas and information relevant to the processes of government', but points out that this is not a strong argument based on sovereignty of the people, but rather one based on equal participation. Ibid at 41.

[2] Ibid at 40 ('Any distinct restraint on majority power, such as a principle of freedom of speech, is by its nature anti-democratic, anti-majoritarian').

[3] See S Seedorf & S Sibanda 'Separation of Powers' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 12. See also S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[4] 'Democracy' (supra) at §§ 10.2*(d)* and 10.5. For example, FC s 7(1) proclaims that the Bill of Rights is 'a cornerstone of democracy in South Africa'. Ibid at § 10.3*(c)*.

[5] For an attempt to explicate the parameters of public interest speech in the context of defamation law, see D Milo Defamation and Freedom of Speech (2008) at 138-154.

[6] See § 42.9*(e)* infra.

[7] 1995 (2) SA 672, 687 (E). See also Case (supra) at para 26 (Mokgoro J)(freedom of expression is 'foundational to each individual's empowerment to autonomous self-development'); NM & Others v Smith (Freedom of Expression Institute as Amicus Curiae) 2007 (5) SA 250 (CC), 2007 (7) BCLR 751 (CC)('NM v Smith') at para 145 (O'Regan J). The leading academic exponent of the self-fulfillment rationale for free speech is Emerson. T Emerson The System of Freedom of Expression (1970) 6.

This rationale draws heavily on the idea that we are all equal moral agents, endowed with human dignity, and that we should thus be able, insofar as possible, to strive for individual self-fulfilment. As van der Westhuizen J states in Holomisa v Khumalo:

> The different theoretical and philosophical explanations offered as reasons why freedom of expression should be protected [include] that expression is an essential part of one's awareness of oneself, one's very being, and one's human dignity. There is thus an element of the protection of dignity involved in the protection of expression. Therefore not only true or meaningful statements, which could contribute to a debate, are protected, but also other forms of expression, simply because it is human to communicate.[1]

The strength of this rationale is that it is not limited to political speech or speech which is capable of advancing the truth, but extends to all forms of communication. It includes, for example, music, painting, fictional writing and nude dancing — any form of communication through which one may pursue fulfilment.

Freedom of expression can advance self-fulfilment of the speaker. In this sense, we pursue fulfilment by communicating with others, and testing and modifying our ideas in open discussion. As Schauer says, '[c]ommunication is an integral part of the self-development of the speaker, because it enables him to clarify and better understand his own thoughts'.[2] But freedom of expression can, in addition, advance the fulfilment of the listener. In this sense, free communication promotes individual fulfilment by facilitating exposure to a wide variety of information and ideas, allowing us to take a broader range of issues on board and encouraging intellectual development.

The argument from self-fulfilment is similar to another rationale that is sometimes offered for freedom of expression — 'audience autonomy'.[3] The concept of audience autonomy is most often associated with the writing of Thomas Scanlon, who adopts the liberal stance that the powers of the state are limited to those that citizens would recognise 'while still regarding themselves as equal, autonomous and rational agents'[4] and that '[a]n autonomous person cannot accept without independent consideration the judgment of others as to what he should believe or what he should do'.[5] Ultimate choice (or sovereignty) thus rests with the individual, even when a particular course of conduct is prohibited by law because the individual can choose whether to obey the law, or to breach it and suffer the consequences. If the ultimate choice rests with the individual, then the individual's decision ought to be as informed as possible; hence the need for a

[1] 2002 (3) SA 38, 61 (T)('Khumalo HC').
[2] Schauer Free Speech (supra) at 55.
[3] This is different to the idea of autonomy discussed above because, unlike other conduct, expression has an audience. There are thus two autonomy interests at play in relation to expression — that of the speaker and that of the listener.
[4] Scanlon (supra) at 214.
[5] Ibid at 216.

free flow of communication. According to Schauer, 'Scanlon's theory, therefore, is best characterised not as a right to speech, but rather as a right to receive information and, more importantly, a right to be free from governmental intrusion into the ultimate process of individual choice'.[1]

This rationale is also reflected in the writing of Ronald Dworkin:

> [M]orally responsible people insist on making up their own minds about what is good or bad in life or in politics, or what is true or false in matters of justice and faith. Government insults its citizens, and denies their moral responsibility, when it decrees that they cannot be trusted to hear opinions that might persuade them to dangerous or offensive convictions. We retain our dignity, as individuals, only by insisting that no one — no official and no majority — has the right to withhold an opinion from us on the ground that we are not fit to hear and consider it.[2]

One difficulty with the rationale of audience autonomy is that the so-called 'right' to disobey the law is a contested principle.[3] In addition, it is, at times, difficult to justify the protection of harmful expression on the basis that it is necessary for the individualistic self-fulfilment or autonomy of the speaker or listener. For example, in the context of hate speech, it is difficult to explain why the personal growth of an individual that may come with speech should justify the infliction of serious harm on others.[4]

Nevertheless, the free speech rationales of individual self-fulfilment and audience autonomy are, we submit, helpful. The fact that free speech may justifiably be limited (or outweighed) by significant countervailing values does not detract from the premise on which these rationales are based: we value free speech because it advances self-fulfilment and personal growth. Moreover, even if one rejects the 'right' to civil disobedience, there is a wide range of expression that does not bring about unlawful results and which can be justified on the basis of the need for facilitating individual choice. It is rare that we make decisions as to whether or not to obey the law. It is far more common for us to make the myriad of decisions as to which course of conduct to adopt within the bounds of the law — what religion, if any, one chooses to follow, what one's view is on the death penalty or what type of music one prefers.

[1] Scanlon (supra) at 69.

[2] Freedom's Law: The Moral Reading of the America Constitution (1996) 200. See also Burchell (supra) at 13-16. Dworkin's emphasis on moral agency as underlying the right to freedom of expression is cited with approval in Holomisa v Argus Newspapers (supra) at 608. See also D Richards Free Speech and the Politics of Identity (1999).

[3] See Schauer Free Speech (supra) at 70-71.

[4] See § 42.8*(c)* infra. Another criticism that is sometimes advanced of the self-fulfilment rationale is that it fails to explain what is so special about expression in advancing self-fulfilment, where fulfilment can be advanced through non-speech activities such as international travel. See Schauer Free Speech (supra) at 57.

(d) Some other rationales for freedom of expression

In addition to the traditional theories discussed above, a number of other rationales have been advanced for protecting freedom of expression. We discuss some of them here. The first is that a society which values freedom of expression is more likely to encourage tolerance, as the community (and government) is more likely to accept the co-existence of a variety of opinions, ideas and ways of life.[1] As the Constitutional Court has stated:

> The corollary of freedom of expression and its related rights is tolerance by society of different views. Tolerance, of course, does not require approbation of a particular view. In essence, it requires the acceptance of the public airing of disagreements and the refusal to silence unpopular views.[2]

The leading proponent of this rationale, Lee Bollinger, explains that the protection of freedom of expression is a means of grappling with the 'the impulse to censor' that can lead to intolerance in a wide variety of settings.[3] He argues that the protection of freedom of expression restrains this impulse and thus generally promotes tolerance:

> [T]here is a bias toward intolerance that must be continually curbed and mediated for any democratic society to work. Under this picture of human society, it makes sense to take a single area of human behaviour — we take speech — and to declare it more or less off-limits for regulation. It serves a similar function to a wilderness area in an urban society, a place where sides of our personality are singled out, developed, tested and highlighted because they are relevant to life in general. In this way, the extremes of speech take on their own meaning. The whole point of the exercise is to stretch the limits of our capacities, of our self-restraint and capacity for the appropriate level of social tolerance.[4]

This rationale has a particular appeal in post-apartheid South Africa, given the heterogeneous nature of our society and our past of racial, religious, cultural and other intolerance. As the Constitutional Court emphasised in the same-sex marriage case, South Africa is a pluralist society in which diversity and tolerance of that diversity is important. As with the articulation of many other values in the jurisprudence of the Constitutional Court, this sentiment is clearly captured in the judgment of Sachs J, writing on behalf of a unanimous Court:

> Equality means equal concern and respect across difference. It does not presuppose the diminution or suppression of difference. Respect for human rights requires the affirmation of self, not the denial of self. Equality therefore does not imply the levelling or homogenisation of behaviour or extolling one form as supreme, and another as inferior, but an acknowledgement and acceptance of difference. . . . The Constitution thus acknowledges the variability of human beings . . . affirms the right to be different, and celebrates the

[1] L Bollinger The Tolerant Society (1986).
[2] South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence & Another 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC), 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC) at para 8.
[3] L Bollinger 'Dialogue' in Bollinger & Stone (eds) (supra) at 27.
[4] Ibid at 27-28.

> diversity of the nation. . . . At issue is a need to affirm the very character of our society as one based on tolerance and mutual respect. The test for tolerance is not how one finds space for people with whom, and practices with which, one feels comfortable, but how one accommodates the expression of what is discomforting.[1]

Vincent Blasi takes the tolerance argument further, identifying a number of beneficial character traits — including inquisitiveness, independence of judgment, distrust of authority and initiative[2] — that a system of freedom of expression promotes by, for example, forcing persons to confront differences of understanding and to defend their view.[3] According to Blasi, these character traits are beneficial to society because they enable the populace to act as an effective, independent check on authority and facilitate compromise.[4]

A final rationale for freedom of expression is the 'safety valve' theory. According to this rationale, the suppression of expression is not effective in curbing the promotion of undesirable views. On the contrary, suppression is likely to encourage ideas to fester until they erupt through the outlet of violent conduct. Expression, in contrast, provides an avenue — a 'valve' — which channels undesirable views through the medium of expression rather than actions.[5] If, for example, the Ku Klux Klan is free to express racist views, they are less likely, so the argument goes, to engage in lynchings or other forms of racial unrest.

The primary difficulty with the 'safety valve' argument is that there is no firm, empirical evidence to support it. While it may be true that, in certain instances, freedom of expression operates in this positive way, there are no doubt other

[1] Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie (Doctors for Life International & Others, Amici Curiae); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project & Others v Minister of Home Affairs 2006 (1) SA S24 (CC), 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC) at para 60. See also MEC for Education: KwaZulu-Natal & Others v Pillay 2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC) at para 107 (In rejecting an argument by a school that permitting a Hindu student to wear a nose-stud to school would result in many more students deviating from the school's code of conduct, Langa CJ held: 'if there are other learners who hitherto were afraid to express their religions or cultures and who will now be encouraged to do so, that is something to be celebrated, not feared. As a general rule, the more learners feel free to express their religions and cultures in school, the closer we will come to the society envisaged in the Constitution. The display of religion and culture in public is not a "parade of horribles" but a pageant of diversity which will enrich our schools and in turn our country.')

[2] 'Free Speech and Good Character: From Milton to Brandeis to the Present' in Bollinger & Stone (eds)(supra) at 84 (Other traits identified by Blasi are: perseverance, courage to confront evil, aversion to simplistic accounts and solutions, self-awareness, imagination, empathy, receptivity to change and a tendency to view problems and events in a broad perspective.)

[3] Ibid at 85-86 (Freedom of expression also promotes Blasi's beneficial traits by emboldening persons who do not subscribe to the orthodox view to retain their dissident views and express them, and encouraging those who wish to combat what they perceive as bad views to do so through engagement (i.e. communication) rather than censorship.)

[4] Ibid at 87-90 (These traits also help people and institutions adapt to a changing world and encourage engagement and civic participation.)

[5] Emerson (supra), and in Whitney v California (supra) at 375-6 (1927)(Brandeis J). See also D Meyerson ' "No Platform for Racists": What Should the View of Those on the Left Be?' (1990) 6 SAJHR 394 ('No Platform') at 397 (An example of the use of the 'safety value' argument in the context of hate speech.)

instances where expression fuels the fire of noxious views and promotes violent conduct. It is by no means clear that allowing the Ku Klux Klan to engage in racist invective results in a decrease in racial violence rather than the opposite.

42.6 THE APPLICATION OF FC S 16(1)

(a) 'Everyone' has the right to freedom of expression

The use of the term 'everyone' in FC s 16(1) entails that the widest possible range of subjects is able to assert the right. The Constitutional Court has adopted a purposive interpretation of the word that includes both natural and juristic persons in order to fully and meaningfully protect the right.[1] In addition, it has been held that in the absence of an indication that a particular right is to be restricted only to citizens,[2] the term 'everyone' extends the benefits of the right to both citizens and non-citizens.[3] The values underlying expressive freedom demand that those who may be least empowered, including those who do not enjoy citizenship rights, are able to invoke the protection of the right.

(b) Direct horizontality of FC s 16(1): Khumalo v Holomisa

The right to freedom of expression under the Final Constitution may be directly relied upon in certain disputes involving only private parties. This is the effect of the Constitutional Court's decision in Khumalo & Others v Holomisa & Others.[4] In this respect, the Final Constitution differs fundamentally from the Interim Constitution.[5] However, it would be a mistake to read this part of Khumalo too broadly:

> In this case, the applicants are members of the media who are expressly identified as bearers of constitutional rights to freedom of expression. There can be no doubt that the law of defamation does affect the right to freedom of expression. Given the intensity of the constitutional right in question, coupled with the potential invasion of that right which

[1] Ex parte Chairperson of Constitutional Assembly: In re Certification of Constitution of the RSA 1996 1996 (4) SA 744 (CC), 1996 (10) BCLR 1253 (CC)('First Certification Judgment') at para 57. The drafters of the final text abandoned the formulation of 'every person' which had been preferred in the IC s 15(1), in favour of the broader 'everyone'.

[2] See, for example, FC s 19 (the right to vote) and FC s 23 (the right to freedom of trade, occupation and profession).

[3] Khosa v Minister of Social Development; Mahlaule v Minister of Social Development 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC), 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC) at para 47. See also Nyamakazi v President of Bophuthatswana 1992 (4) SA 540 (B)(Significantly, this decision was referred to by the Theme Committee responsible for the Draft Constitutional Assembly, Constitutional Committee, Sub-Committee: Draft Bill of Rights Explanatory Memorandum of Theme Committee 4 of the Constitutional Assembly Responsible for Fundamental Rights: Explanatory Memorandum Vol. 1 (9/10/1995) at para 4.1.1.).

[4] 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC), 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC)('Khumalo').

[5] Under the Interim Constitution it had been held categorically that freedom of expression could have no direct horizontal application. Du Plessis v De Klerk 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC), 1996 (5) BCLR 658 (CC).

> could be occasioned by persons other than the State or organs of State, it is clear that the right to freedom of expression is of direct horizontal application in this case as contemplated by s 8(2) of the Constitution.[1]

The italicised words are the crucial part of the dictum for the purposes of the present discussion. The Court based its decision on the wording of FC s 8(2) as opposed to FC s 8(1). The Court rejected an interpretation, based on the express inclusion of 'the judiciary' under FC s 8(1) that would have entailed categorical horizontal application of FC s 16. The absence of the term 'the judiciary' in IC s 7(1) had been central to the finding, under the Interim Constitution, that freedom of expression had no direct 'horizontal' application.[2]

The particular reading of FC s 8 adopted by the Court in Khumalo is carefully examined elsewhere in this work,[3] and is not without difficulties.[4] However, the clear effect of the dictum is that the competence of direct reliance on the right to freedom of expression in disputes that do not involve the impugning of legislative provisions and where the state is not a party, will be determined on a case-by-case basis applying the open-ended criteria set out in FC s 8(2), namely: 'if, and to the extent that, [the right to freedom of expression] is applicable taking into account the nature of the right and the nature of any duty imposed by the right.'

42.7 Protected expression: analysis of FC s 16(1)

(a) Freedom of speech and expression

While the Interim Constitution used both the terms 'speech' and 'expression',[5] the text of the Final Constitution opts for the term 'expression' alone. This is undoubtedly a result of the recognition that 'expression', while including the act

[1] Khumalo (supra) at para 33 (Emphasis added.)

[2] The basis for the finding was not the text of the respective expression clauses but rather the difference in the text of the application provisions: IC s 7 and FC s 8. In essence, the Court (Kentridge AJ) based its finding on the absence of the term 'judiciary' in IC s 7(1). In this manner the Court avoided the force of the United States application jurisprudence arising from Shelley v Kraemer 334 US 1 (1948). Du Plessis v De Klerk (supra) at paras 45-50:

> Nor do I believe that the absence of reference to the Judiciary in s 7(1) is an oversight. One of its effects is to exclude the equation of a judgment of a Court with State action and thus prevent the importation of the American doctrine developed in Shelley v Kraemer. This Court, like the Provincial and Local Divisions of the Supreme Court, is bound to apply the law, which in a proper case includes chapter 3, but that does not permit the Courts to ignore the limitation contained in s 7(1). . . . [A]ny litigant contesting the constitutionality of a statute is applying chapter 3 to the relationship between himself and the Legislature, not to his relationship to the opposing (private) litigant.

[3] See generally S Woolman 'Application' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren , A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition , OS, December 2005) § 31.1*(c)*.

[4] Some of them derived from the very failure to impart meaning to the term 'the judiciary' in s 8(1). S Woolman 'Application' (supra) at § 31.1*(c)*.

[5] IC s 15(1) read in relevant part: 'Every person shall have the right to freedom of speech and expression which shall include freedom of the press and other media, and the freedom of artistic creativity and scientific research.'

of speaking, encompasses a broader range of activities than 'speech'. Protection of 'expression' alone also avoids the interpretive difficulties that might otherwise arise from attempting to imbue 'speech' with a meaning that is not already captured under 'expression'.[1]

In De Reuck[2] it was argued that child pornography, as defined in the relevant legislation,[3] was not a form of constitutionally protected expression. In advancing this argument, the respondents sought to develop a categorical exclusion of child pornography in line with the United States approach. The Court[4] rejected this argument, emphasising, as it had previously done,[5] that the Constitution's protection of freedom of expression differed from that of the First Amendment to the United States' Constitution; except for the explicitly excluded categories of expression set out in FC s 16(2), all other expressive acts, even child pornography, are protected at the threshold level. Infringements then fall to be justified under the FC s 36 limitations inquiry.

(b) Freedom to receive or impart

While it remained an open question under the Interim Constitution,[6] in De Reuck the Court noted that freedom of expression under the Final Constitution extends not only to those who seek to impart information or ideas but also to those who may be the recipients of expression.[7] In Case, Mokgoro J emphasised the importance of the right to receive information in the following terms:

> But my freedom of expression is impoverished indeed if it does not embrace also my right to receive, hold and consume expressions transmitted by others. Firstly, my right to express myself is severely impaired if others' rights to hear my speech are not protected. And secondly, my own right to freedom of expression includes as a necessary corollary the right to be exposed to inputs from others that will inform, condition and ultimately shape my own expression. Thus, a law which deprives willing persons of the right to be exposed to the expression of others gravely offends constitutionally protected freedoms both of the speaker and of the would-be recipients.[8]

[1] For a general discussion on forms of conduct that nevertheless qualify as expression, such as flag desecration, see E Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 78-86. For a discussion of nude dancing as protected expression in South Africa, see 'Sexually Explict Expression' § 42.9*(e)* infra.

[2] De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC), 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC)('De Reuck').

[3] Films and Publications Act 65 of 1996 s 1. Read with s 27(1) and sch 1 of the Act, various activities associated with possessing, distributing and publishing child pornography are criminalized.

[4] De Reuck (supra) at para 48.

[5] Mamabolo (supra) at para 41. See also Midi Television (supra) at para 14.

[6] Case (supra) at para 92. But see the separate judgement of Mokgoro J. Ibid at para 25.

[7] De Reuck (supra) at 49.

[8] Case (supra) at para 25. The right to receive information does not necessarily provide a constitutional claim to access the information that one wishes to receive. Such a right is, of course, protected specifically in FC s 32, and by the Promotion of Access to Information Act 2 of 2000, but this does not mean that the (largely negative) right to freedom of expression itself creates a right of access to information that a holder of the information does not wish to part with. See Barendt Freedom of Speech (supra) at 110-111.

Thus, in Islamic Unity the Court was unimpressed with the argument that the impugned provision, clause 2*(a)* of the Code of Conduct for Broadcasting Services,[1] only limited the expression of broadcasters. The respondents sought to advance this argument under the limitations enquiry as a ground of justification for the breadth of the provision. The Court found that this argument ignored the fact that the broadcaster concerned had a potentially wide audience that would be deprived of the expression that it would receive in the event that the clause was allowed to stand.[2]

The right to receive information is, like the right to express it, not absolute. In South African Broadcasting Corporation Ltd v National Director of Public Prosecutions & Others the public broadcaster sought leave to broadcast criminal proceedings which were of high public interest.[3] The Court recognised the importance of the right to receive information as part of the expressive right and assumed without deciding that expression includes the positive aspect of access to courts.[4] This however did not entitle the broadcaster to broadcast proceedings as the ultimate issue was the preservation of the right to a fair trial and the Court's power to regulate its own process to achieve this end.[5]

(c) Information or ideas

The significance of the inclusion of both information and ideas in FC s 16(1) is that not only the imparting or receiving of the factual, empirical content of expression is protected but also the elements of expression which may be novel, controversial or involve creativity.[6] 'Ideas' are often central to political and social expression and accordingly expression cannot be restricted purely on the basis that it has no demonstrable factual content or is not susceptible to proof.[7] Against the particular South African history of suppression of ideas, the express protection of the right to receive and impart ideas emphasises that expression may not be restricted on the basis that it is deemed to be politically or socially 'subversive'.[8] Moreover, in articulating the scope of the right the courts

[1] Independent Broadcasting Authority Act 153 of 1993 sch 1, read with s 56(1).
[2] Islamic Unity (supra) at para 47.
[3] 2007 (1) SA 523 (CC), 2007 (1) SACR 408 (CC), 2007 (2) BCLR 167 (CC)('SABC v NDPP').
[4] Ibid at paras 24-25.
[5] See § 42.9*(c)(i)* and (iii) infra.
[6] The distinction between 'information' and 'ideas' is generally that 'information' comprises facts and may be the constituent of knowledge whereas ideas involve some creative content and need not be underpinned by facts.
[7] Again, this tests the limits of common-law restrictions on communication of ideas. For instance, opinions are treated more favourably in defamation law as compared with false facts. See § 42.9*(a)* infra.
[8] The same is true of information; for example, the publication of factual material that some may consider to be subversive.

on more than one occasion have endorsed the dictum of the European Court of Human Rights in Handyside v United Kingdom that the right to 'receive or impart information or ideas' applies 'not only to "information" or "ideas" that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also that offend, shock or disturb'.[1]

Though the effect of the distinction between information and ideas in the context of a constitutional right has received no particular judicial consideration, the common law has long recognised the distinction between information and ideas on the one hand, and their expression on the other. It has been repeatedly affirmed, for example, that there can be no copyright in information or ideas but only in the precise form of their communication.[2] At a minimum, constitutionalising the freedom to receive or impart information and ideas requires that those limitations imposed at common law or by statute on communication of information and ideas be re-examined in light of the Constitution to ensure that they are justifiable. In certain instances, restrictions imposed by trade mark or copyright law, for example, will be required to yield to the imperatives of freedom of expression.[3]

(d) Freedom of the press and other media

(i) Press exceptionalism

Our Courts have on a number of occasions[4] rejected a strict doctrine of so-called 'press exceptionalism'. In its strongest form, this doctrine demands that special or greater protection be extended to the press under the right to freedom of expression.[5] Courts have, however, also repeatedly endorsed one of the premises which

[1] Handyside v United Kingdom (1976) 1 EHRR 737, 754 ('Handyside v UK') quoted with approval in Islamic Unity (supra) at para 28 and De Reuck (supra) at para 49. See also Sunday Times (supra) at 227E; In re Chinamasa 2001 (2) SA 902 (ZS), 2001 (1) SACR 78 (ZS), 2000 (12) BCLR 1294 (Z), 2000 (2) ZLR 322 (Gubbay CJ). The Courts have in this respect self consciously opted for the broad approach of the European Court of Human Rights.

[2] See Galago Publishers (Pty) Ltd v Erasmus 1989 (1) SA 276, 283J-284D (A); Kalamazoo Division (Pty) Ltd v Gay 1978 (2) SA 184, 191C-D (C).

[3] This is the case in other jurisdictions where, for example, parody in expressive acts with a legitimate social objective is allowed to trump intellectual property rights in certain circumstances. See, for example, Mattel Inc v Walking Mountain Productions 353 F 3d 792 (9th Cir 2003), 2004 US Dist LEXIS 12469; Dr Suess Enterprises v Penguin Books USA Inc 109 F 3d 1394, 1400 (9th Cir); Campbell v Acuff-Rose Music Inc 510 US 569, 114 S Ct 1164, 127 L Ed 2d 500 (1994). The principle received recognition, albeit obiter dictum in Laugh It Off (supra) at paras 64-66. The effect of freedom of expression on intellectual property rights is discussed separately below. See 'Intellectual property restrictions' § 42.9*(d)* infra.

[4] Holomisa v Argus Newspapers 1996 (2) SA 588 (W)('Holomisa'), cited with approval in Midi Television (supra) at para 6.

[5] 'Press exceptionalism' has also been described as 'the idea that journalism has a different and superior status in the Constitution'. A Lewis Make No Law — the Sullivan Case and the First Amendment (1991) 210, quoted by Cameron J in Holomisa v Argus Newspapers (supra) at 610D, approved in Midi Television (supra) at para 6. For a classic exposition of press exceptionalism, see Justice Potter Stewart 'Or of the Press' (1975) 26 Hastings LJ 631.

usually underpins press exceptionalism; namely that the press occupies a position of singular importance in protecting the expressive right on the community's behalf. In Islamic Unity the Court observed:

> [T]he fact that s 16(1)(a) makes specific mention of 'freedom of the . . . media' is a clear indication of the recognition by the Constitution of the powerful role that the media plays in shaping public opinion and providing the public with information about current events. There can be no doubt that radio and television are extremely influential media. The extent and impact of the infringement is therefore not rendered less significant by reason of the fact that the prohibition applies only to broadcasters.[1]

This recognition of the importance of the media in the protection of expressive freedom in a democratic society may be regarded as an endorsement by our Courts of a weak form of press exceptionalism. The press, by virtue of its position, is a bearer not only of rights but of constitutional obligations in relation to freedom of expression. The necessary implication is that in relation to freedom of expression, the press is not identically situated to the ordinary citizen. This also emerges in an important passage from the decision of the Constitutional Court in Khumalo which it is worth quoting at length:

> The print, broadcast and electronic media have a particular role in the protection of freedom of expression in our society. Every citizen has the right to freedom of the press and the media and the right to receive information and ideas. The media are key agents in ensuring that these aspects of the right to freedom of information are respected. The ability of each citizen to be a responsible and effective member of our society depends upon the manner in which the media carry out their constitutional mandate. As Deane J stated in the High Court of Australia,
>
> '. . . the freedom of the citizen to engage in significant political communication and discussion is largely dependent upon the freedom of the media'.
>
> The media thus rely on freedom of expression and must foster it. In this sense they are both bearers of rights and bearers of constitutional obligations in relation to freedom of expression.
>
> Furthermore, the media are important agents in ensuring that government is open, responsive and accountable to the people as the founding values of our Constitution require. . . . In a democratic society, then, the mass media play a role of undeniable importance. They bear an obligation to provide citizens both with information and with a platform for the exchange of ideas which is crucial to the development of a democratic culture. As primary agents of the dissemination of information and ideas, they are, inevitably, extremely powerful institutions in a democracy and they have a constitutional duty to act with vigour, courage, integrity and responsibility. The manner in which the media carry out their constitutional mandate will have a significant impact on the development of our

[1] Islamic Unity (supra) at para 47. See also SABC v NDPP (supra) at para 24 ('The media are key agents in ensuring that these aspects of the right to freedom of information are respected. The ability of each citizen to be a responsible and effective member of our society depends upon the manner in which the media carry out their constitutional mandate. The media thus rely on freedom of expression and must foster it. In this sense they are both bearers of rights and bearers of constitutional obligations in relation to freedom of expression.') > democratic society. If the media are scrupulous and reliable in the performance of their constitutional obligations, they will invigorate and strengthen our fledgling democracy. If they vacillate in the performance of their duties, the constitutional goals will be imperilled. The Constitution thus asserts and protects the media in the performance of their obligations to the broader society, principally through the provisions of s 16.[1]

In Holomisa v Argus Newspapers Cameron J reconciled the apparent tension between the rejection of press exceptionalism on the one hand, and acknowledgement of the singular role of the press in a democratic society on the other, as follows:

> It does not follow, however, from the special constitutional recognition of the importance of media freedom, or from the extraordinary responsibilities the media consequently carry, that journalists enjoy special constitutional immunity beyond that accorded ordinary citizens. . . . Ronald Dworkin A Matter of Principle (1985) at 386-7 puts the matter thus:
>
> > 'But if free speech is justified on principle, then it would be outrageous to suppose that journalists should have special protection not available to others, because that would claim that they are, as individuals, more important or worthier of more concern than others.'
>
> It is thus consistent to reject 'press exceptionalism' while at the same time emphasising that, because of the critical role that the media play in modern democratic societies, the law of defamation must leave them free to speak on matters of public importance — though no more free than other citizens — as fully and openly as justice can possibly allow.[2]

(ii) Protection of sources of information

Since relevant evidence of a competent witness is under ordinary circumstances compellable in both criminal and civil proceedings without 'just excuse',[3]

[1] Khumalo (supra) at paras 22-24, citing with approval the dictum of the High Court of Australia in Theophanous v Herald & Weekly Times Ltd & Another (1994) 124 ALR 1 ('Theophanous') 61. See Sunday Times (supra) at 227I-228A:

> It is the function of the press to ferret out corruption, dishonesty and graft wherever it may occur and to expose the perpetrators. The press must reveal dishonest mal- and inept administration. . . . It must advance communication between the governed and those who govern.

[2] Holomisa (supra) at 610D, citing Neethling v Du Preez & Others, Neethling v The Weekly Mail & Others 1994 (1) SA 708 (A)('Neethling v Du Preez'). This dictum has been approved by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Midi Television (supra) at para 6. For discussion of press exceptionalism in the context of defamation law, see D Milo Defamation (supra) at 81-94. Press exceptionalism can readily be rejected if one grounds the protection of freedom of expression in the principle of autonomy (a rationale that we, in any event, reject above) or self-fulfilment. See § 42.5 supra. It seems to us, however, that if one understands freedom of expression as furthering the search for truth and the proper functioning of democracy (and, to a lesser extent, audience autonomy), a degree of press exceptionalism may well be justified, given the institutional role that the media play in communicating information and ideas on a wide range of issues to the public.

[3] See D Zeffertt, A Paizes & A St Q Skeen The South African Law of Evidence (2003) 665. See also C Tapper Cross & Tapper on Evidence (10th Edition, 2004) at 241-242.

recognition of a journalistic privilege[1] not to divulge the identity of sources, may be viewed conceptually as a weaker manifestation of 'press exceptionalism'. In many open and democratic societies protection of journalistic sources is considered to be an essential component of media freedom,[2] but in South Africa the existence of that journalistic privilege remains uncertain. It is best to distinguish two issues; first, whether a journalist enjoys a legally enforceable privilege in respect of the identity of her source, and secondly, if so, the proper scope or limitations of such privilege.

In civil proceedings, a witness who refuses to answer relevant and admissible questions without proper cause, such as a valid assertion of privilege, may be sentenced to prison for contempt. In criminal proceedings, the statutory peg for this inquiry is s 189 of the Criminal Procedure Act ('CPA')[3] which provides that a witness is compellable and must answer any question put to him and produce any document required to be produced by him, unless he has a 'just excuse' for his refusal or failure to do so.[4] Where no 'just excuse' is demonstrated, the same section empowers a court to sentence the recalcitrant witness to incarceration for considerable periods.[5] In the event that the witness persists in refusing to answer relevant and admissible questions without just excuse, the court may repeatedly renew the prison sentence.[6]

[1] See Zeffertt, Paizes & Skeen (supra) at 665 (The authors observe that the issue of compellability must be distinguished conceptually from the recognition of a privilege. If a witness is not compellable then that witness cannot be required to enter the witness box. On the contrary, if a privilege may be claimed, the witness may still be compellable but may refuse to answer questions within the legitimate scope of the privilege claimed.)

[2] See § 42.7*(d)*(ii)(aa) infra.

[3] Act 51 of 1977.

[4] A number of other statutory provisions incorporate s 189 by reference. See, for example, CPA s 205. Section 189 provides, in relevant part:

> (1) If any person present at criminal proceedings is required to give evidence at such proceedings and refuses to be sworn or to make an affirmation as a witness, or, having been sworn or having made an affirmation as a witness, refuses to answer any question put to him or refuses or fails to produce any book, paper or document required to be produced by him, the court may in a summary manner enquire into such refusal or failure and, unless the person so refusing or failing has a just excuse for his refusal or failure, sentence him to imprisonment for a period not exceeding two years or, where the criminal proceedings in question relate to an offence referred to in Part III of Schedule 2, to imprisonment for a period not exceeding five years.
>
> (2) After the expiration of any sentence imposed under subsection (1), the person concerned may from time to time again be dealt with under that subsection with regard to any further refusal or failure.
>
> (3) A court may at any time on good cause shown remit any punishment or part thereof imposed by it under subsection (1).
>
> (4) Any sentence imposed by any court under subsection (1) shall be executed and be subject to appeal in the same manner as a sentence imposed in any criminal case by such court, and shall be served before any other sentence of imprisonment imposed on the person concerned.

[5] Two years in respect of criminal proceedings for certain offences and five years for criminal proceedings involving more serious offences.

[6] CPA s 189(2).

Prior to the Interim Constitution, there was conflicting authority on the existence of a journalistic privilege. In S v Pogrund the accused was a journalist who asserted that principles of professional ethics prevented the disclosure of a source.[1] The court, interpreting the equivalent statutory provisions to CPA s 189, held that such principles 'confer no privilege in law on any journalist'[2] and accordingly that protection of a journalistic source did not constitute a 'just excuse'.

In S v Cornelissen,[3] however, the court held that a journalist whom the police sought to compel to give a statement was justified in refusing to do so. The journalist had reported on a meeting at the University of the Witwatersrand where a political activist had allegedly sung 'kill the boer, kill the farmer'. The journalist was prepared to swear the truth of his article but not to give a statement under CPA s 205, which provides for the compulsion of statements but expressly incorporates the 'just excuse' provisions of CPA s 189.[4] In addition, CPA s 205(4) requires a Court to be of the opinion, before imposing the prison sentence, that the information is 'necessary for the administration of justice or the maintenance of law and order'.[5] In the circumstances where the police made no attempt first to obtain evidence from other potential witnesses, the Court held that it was not necessary for the administration of justice to obtain the evidence from the journalist concerned. The reasoning of Stegmann J,[6] however, makes it clear that this is not on account of the witness's position as a journalist but would apply wherever there were other potential sources of the information which had not been exhausted. Cornelissen is therefore of doubtful authority for the recognition of a journalistic privilege and it has subsequently been held not to support the proposition that a journalist may only be called as a witness as a matter of last resort.[7]

Whatever the situation prior to the Constitution, CPA s 189, as well as those other provisions that incorporate it by reference, must now be interpreted in light of the Bill

[1] S v Pogrund 1961 (3) SA 868 (T)(Pogrund had received secret documents issued by one 'Thunder Cracker', the leader of an organization that aimed to disrupt and make a farce of all Republican celebrations planned for 31 May 1961, under the code name operation 'damp squib'. Information concerning celebratory events would be passed to cell leaders, referred to as 'rockets' who would be assisted in their anti-republican disruptions by members of their cells, called 'crackers'. Disruption was to be achieved, inter alia, by cutting off electricity, disrupting toilet facilities, cutting off the speaker system or 'causing a farce at the "moment critique"'. Ibid at 868-869.)

[2] Ibid at 871A. See also S v Woods 1978 (1) SA 713 (A), referring to S v Pogrund but upholding a refusal to answer questions on grounds of just excuse.

[3] S v Cornelissen: Cornelissen v Zeelie NO & Andere 1994 (2) SACR 41 (W)('Cornelissen').

[4] CPA s 205(2).

[5] CPA s 205(4).

[6] Cornelissen (supra) at 62.

[7] See Munusamy v Hefer NO & Others 2004 (5) SA 112 (O)('Munasamy') at 120 (Court held that Cornelissen did not establish the principle that 'a journalist qua journalist has the right to be called as a witness only as a last resort.') of Rights.[1] The backdrop to any approach to the issue is the principle recognised in Nel v Le Roux NO[2] that a witness may never be required to answer a question or produce a document which would unjustifiably infringe a constitutional right.[3] Refusal to answer in such circumstances would always and necessarily constitute a 'just excuse' within the meaning of the legislative provisions. The relevant question, therefore, is whether — and to what extent — FC s 16, and in particular the freedom of the press and other media, demands the recognition of a journalistic privilege.

The issue has arisen squarely only once in proceedings under the Constitution and the Court, correctly in the circumstances, avoided it. In Munusamy v Hefer NO & Others a journalist was summoned to testify before a commission of enquiry. The Commission had been established to enquire into allegations that the then National Director of Public Prosecutions had been an apartheid spy. The allegations first arose in articles written by the journalist in question.[4] The journalist sought to be excused entirely from giving evidence before the Commission on account of her desire to protect her sources or, alternatively, to be excused until all other evidence had been led before the Commission. The Chairman of the Commission declined to excuse her temporarily or at all, but ruled that she and her legal representatives would be afforded a proper opportunity to object to particular questions if and when they were put to her. Relying in part on the authority of Cornelissen, the journalist applied to the High Court for this ruling to be set aside and for an order that the Commission permanently excuse her or, alternatively, summon her only after all other evidence had been gathered. The Court, in effect, found that the journalist's challenge was premature. There were undoubtedly many legitimate questions relevant to the terms of reference of the Commission that could be put to the journalist which would not require her to identify the sources of her information.[5] She was accordingly a compellable witness, though this did not prevent her from asserting a privilege in respect of particular questions if and when the need arose.

In the absence of any definitive judgment on the protection of journalists' sources from our courts, it is useful to look to foreign courts for assistance.

[1] See L Du Plessis 'Interpretation' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren, A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, June 2008) Chapter 32.

[2] Nel v Le Roux NO 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC), 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC), 1996 (1) SACR 572 (CC)('Nel v Le Roux')(The case concerned an inquiry in terms of CPA s 205 (read with s 189), which permitted witnesses to be called to give evidence on a suspected offence and to be imprisoned if they refused to do so.) The principle has been affirmed in, for example, Harksen v Lane NO 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC), 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at paras 75-76; De Lange v Smuts NO 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC), 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC).

[3] Nel v Le Roux (supra) at para 7.

[4] The journalist, Munusamy, had made the information available to City Press newspaper when her own newspaper, the Sunday Times, declined to publish it.

[5] Munusamy (supra) at 118D.

(aa) Comparative jurisprudence

The journalistic privilege not to disclose a source is recognised as a necessary incident of freedom of the press in many open and democratic societies. Accordingly, the jurisprudence in those countries is concerned not with the existence of the privilege, but with its proper scope or limitation. In the United Kingdom, the legislature has provided that no person responsible for a publication may be required to disclose a source unless it is demonstrated that to do so is necessary in the interests of justice, national security or the prevention of crime. These exceptions have been characterised metaphorically by the Court of Appeal as the 'doorways' to disclosure of sources.[1] The focus of the jurisprudence of the United Kingdom has inevitably turned on the proper interpretation and application of these 'doorways'.[2] The line of cases leading up to the decision of the European Court of Human Rights in Goodwin v United Kingdom[3] provides the greatest insight into the approach of the UK courts and the European jurisdiction generally.

The facts are significant. Goodwin, a journalist for a leading trade magazine, received from an established source unsolicited information by telephone concerning the troubled financial position of a private company; one Tetra Ltd. The information was derived from a draft of Tetra's confidential corporate plan which had been removed, unlawfully, while in the custody of Tetra's accountants, either by the source himself or by some other party who had passed it on to the source. Relying on the 'interests of justice' doorway Tetra Ltd sought an order preventing the publication or dissemination of the information and disclosing the identity of the source. The disclosure order was granted by the Chancery Division and upheld both by the Court of Appeal[4] and the House of Lords.[5] The judgment of the House of Lords set a cornerstone for the approach of the United Kingdom courts to the interpretation of the criterion of necessity in the interests

[1] United Kingdom Contempt of Court Act s 10 provides: 'No court may require a person to disclose, nor is any person guilty of contempt of court for refusing to disclose, the source of information contained in a publication for which he is responsible, unless it be established to the satisfaction of the court that disclosure is necessary in the interests of justice or national security or for the prevention of disorder or crime.'

[2] See X Ltd & Another v Morgan-Grampian (Publishers) Ltd & Others [1991] 1 AC 1, [1990] 1 All ER 616, 1990 2 WLR 421 ('X v Morgan-Grampian CA'). The use of the 'doorways' metaphor is significant because it reflects the manner in which the United Kingdom courts have approached the journalistic privilege. The privilege is presumptive with the onus upon those seeking the disclosure of sources. The statutory exceptions are the 'doorways' to disclosure of the source, which are not presumptively open but rather presumptively closed.

[3] Goodwin v The United Kingdom [1996] 22 ECHR 123 ('Goodwin').

[4] X Ltd & Another v Morgan-Grampian (Publishers) Ltd & Others [1991] 1 AC 1, [1990] 1 All ER 616, 1990 2 WLR 421 ('X v Morgan-Grampian CA').

[5] X Ltd & Another v Morgan-Grampian (Publishers) Ltd & Others [1991] 1 AC 1, [1990] 2 All ER 1, 1990 2 WLR 1000 ('X v Morgan-Grampian HoL').

of justice and accordingly for the journalistic privilege more generally.[1] The relevant part of the speech of Lord Bridge of Harwich in this regard is often referred to and bears quoting:

> Construing the phrase 'in the interests of justice' in this sense immediately emphasises the importance of the balancing exercise. It will not be sufficient, per se, for a party seeking disclosure of a source protected by s 10 to show merely that he will be unable without disclosure to exercise the legal right or avert the threatened legal wrong on which he bases his claim in order to establish the necessity of disclosure. The judge's task will always be to weigh in the scales the importance of enabling the ends of justice to be attained in the circumstances of the particular case on the one hand against the importance of protecting the source on the other hand. In this balancing exercise it is only if the judge is satisfied that disclosure in the interests of justice is of such preponderating importance as to override the statutory privilege against disclosure that the threshold of necessity will be reached.[2]

On referral to the European Court of Human Rights at the instance of the journalist, the European Court found that the disclosure order imposed by the

[1] The additional 'doorways' in the UK legislation — namely, national security and the prevention of crime — were not considered to pose the same interpretive difficulties. See X v Morgan-Grampian HoL (supra) at 7 ('I cannot help wondering whether these dicta do not concentrate attention too much on only one side of the picture. They suggest that in determining whether the criterion of necessity is established one need only look at, in the one case, the interests of national security and, in the other case, the prevention of crime. In the context of cases dealing with those two grounds of exception to the protection of sources, it is perfectly understandable that they should do so. For if non-disclosure of a source of information will imperil national security or enable a crime to be committed which might otherwise be prevented, it is difficult to imagine that any judge would hesitate to order disclosure. These two public interests are of such overriding importance that once it is shown that disclosure will serve one of those interests, the necessity of disclosure follows almost automatically though even here if a judge were asked to order disclosure of a source of information in the interests of the prevention of crime, he 'might properly refuse to do so if, for instance, the crime was of a trivial nature'. . .. But the question whether disclosure is necessary in the interests of justice gives rise to a more difficult problem of weighing one public interest against another.')

[2] X v Morgan-Grampian HoL (supra) at 7 (Lord Bridge continued: 'It would be foolish to attempt to give comprehensive guidance as to how the balancing exercise should be carried out. But it may not be out of place to indicate the kind of factors which will require consideration. In estimating the importance to be given to the case in favour of disclosure there will be a wide spectrum within which the particular case must be located. If the party seeking disclosure shows, for example, that his very livelihood depends on it, this will put the case near one end of the spectrum. If he shows no more than that what he seeks to protect is a minor interest in property, this will put the case at or near the other end. On the other side the importance of protecting a source from disclosure in pursuance of the policy underlying the statute will also vary within a wide spectrum. One important factor will be the nature of the information obtained from the source. The greater the legitimate public interest in the information which the source has given to the publisher or intended publisher, the greater will be the importance of protecting the source. But another and perhaps more significant factor which will very much affect the importance of protecting the source will be the manner in which the information was itself obtained by the source. If it appears to the court that the information was obtained legitimately this will enhance the importance of protecting the source. Conversely, if it appears that the information was obtained illegally, this will diminish the importance of protecting the source unless, of course, this factor is counterbalanced by a clear public interest in publication of the information, as in the classic case where the source has acted for the purpose of exposing iniquity. I draw attention to these considerations by way of illustration only and I emphasise once again that they are in no way intended to be read as a code.') domestic courts of the United Kingdom unjustifiably interfered with Goodwin's right to freedom of expression under art 10 of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms. In weighing the importance of the journalistic privilege, the European Court noted that:

> Protection of journalistic sources is one of the basic conditions for press freedom, as is reflected in the laws and the professional codes of conduct in a number of contracting states and is affirmed in several international instruments on journalistic freedoms.
>
> . . .
>
> Without such protection, sources may be deterred from assisting the press in informing the public on matters of public interest. As a result the vital public watchdog role of the press may be undermined and the ability of the press to provide accurate and reliable information may be adversely affected. Having regard to the importance of the protection of journalistic sources for press freedom in a democratic society and the potentially chilling effect an order of source disclosure has on the exercise of that freedom, such a measure cannot be compatible with art 10 of the convention unless it is justified by an overriding requirement in the public interest.[1]

In addition to the 'overriding requirement', the Court held that art 10(2) requires a reasonable relationship of proportionality between the legitimate aim which the disclosure order is intended to achieve and the means deployed to achieve this aim.[2] On the facts of Goodwin the Court found that such proportionality was absent. It held that the publication ban was sufficient to protect Tetra Ltd against further publication and dissemination of the material. The disclosure order was unnecessary to achieve this purpose. Beyond this, a company's interest in rooting-out the disloyal employee was not, in the Court's view, a sufficient reason for overriding the central values underlying the journalistic privilege.[3]

Never enamoured with a reversal in Strasbourg, the response of the United Kingdom courts to Goodwin has been revealing. The Court of Appeal in Camelot Group v Centaur Ltd held that the tests applied by the European Court and the House of Lords were substantially the same.[4] The two Courts, it was held, applying the same principles, simply reached different conclusions on the same facts;

[1] Goodwin (supra) at para 39. The majority of the Court referred with approval to the 'Resolution on Journalistic Freedoms and Human Rights' adopted at the 4th European Ministerial Conference on Mass Media Policy (Prague, 7-8 December 1994) and the European Parliament's 'Resolution on the Confidentiality of Journalists' Sources' OJ 1994 C44 (18 January 1994) 34.

[2] Goodwin (supra) at para 46.

[3] Ibid at paras 42-46 (In reaching this conclusion, the European Court held that it is not sufficient for a party seeking disclosure of a journalist's source to show merely that he or she requires disclosure in order to exercise a legal right or avert a threatened legal wrong. Ibid at para 45. Moreover, it is significant that the Court overturned the decisions of the domestic courts notwithstanding its express recognition of the margin of appreciation doctrine in terms of which domestic courts enjoy a broad discretion in respect of the application and interpretation of domestic law under the Convention. As the European Court noted, the assessment by the domestic courts as to whether there was a 'pressing social need' which overrides the journalistic privilege was subject to this margin of appreciation. Ibid at para 40.)

[4] [1999] QB 124 (CA)('Camelot').

a conclusion as unsurprising as two courts reaching different conclusions on whether the same course of conduct is negligent.[1] Although this attempt to reconcile the two approaches is unconvincing,[2] it explains the emphasis the United Kingdom courts have placed on the facts of each case. This approach has allowed the courts to lean in favour of overriding the privilege notwithstanding the stringency of the test in principle and the incidence of the onus, often with disturbing and counter-intuitive results.[3]

[1] Ibid at 131 (This, the Court of Appeal held 'is no more surprising legal phenomenon than this court concluding that a particular course of conduct amounted to negligence when the court of first instance concluded that the very same course of conduct did not amount to negligence.')

[2] The House of Lords adopted a test more akin to a direct utilitarian calculus emphasised by the 'weighing' or 'balancing' analogy; the benefits of protecting the source from disclosure are to be weighed against the prejudice to the complaining party. By contrast, the European Court places a heavy onus on the party seeking to upset the journalistic privilege to demonstrate that there is an overriding requirement in the public interest in favour of the disclosure of the source and that the means of achieving this benefit is proportionate to the aim. If one is to utilize the 'weighing' analogy of the House of Lords, the scales, on the approach of the European Court, begin heavily weighted in favour of the journalistic privilege. The courts of the United Kingdom begin with the scales evenly balanced. In our view, the judgment of the Court of Appeal in Camelot is best read as an implicit rebuke of the European Court for failing to accord the English courts a sufficient margin of appreciation, in accordance with established Convention law.

[3] See, for example, Camelot (supra)(Camelot was a company — whose controlling stake was owned by public companies — which had secured the monopoly to run the national lottery in the United Kingdom. Draft financial statements were stolen by an employee and leaked to the press. The purpose of the leak was to disclose unusually high payments to Camelot's directors at the expense of the charities which the lottery was established to support. The leak gave rise to a series of press articles which resulted in a public storm. The directors were called to account to government and this led ultimately to a reduction in the payments to the directors concerned. Camelot secured urgent interdicts to prevent further dissemination or publication of the draft statements, but also sought delivery of the draft statements that would, by their nature, reveal the source of the leak. The High Court obliged, and the order was confirmed by the Court of Appeal. Distinguishing the facts from those in the Goodwin case, the Court of Appeal held that of fundamental importance was the fact that Camelot had two purposes in seeking the order which would reveal the source. The first was to prevent further disclosure of those documents. The second was to identify the disloyal employee and thereby to prevent further leaks. Both purposes were legitimate, and the second would only be served by discolsure of the source. Moreover, the Court held that there was no substantial public interest in the leaking of the draft statements as the final statements were due for release in due course and would have contained substantially similar information. On the facts, the Court held that there were therefore sufficiently strong reasons to outweigh the important public interest in protection of press sources. But the facts could easily have led the Court to the opposite conclusion. Camelot was, in effect, a public company overseeing public funds. The United Kingdom Courts in X v Morgan-Grampian CA (supra) and X v Morgan-Grampian HoL (supra) repeatedly observed that the public status of a company would add significant weight to the benefit of protecting the source of a leak. In addition, in Goodwin the European Court held that uncovering disloyalty was not a competent basis for disclosure. On these grounds alone the facts of Camelot more strongly support upholding the journalistic privilege than did those in X v Morgan-Grampian. Moreover, the fact that the final statements would soon be disclosed could, for two reasons, have weighed in favour of protecting disclosure of the source. First, since the excesses of the directors would have been revealed in any event, there is a diminished basis for compromising the fundamental press freedom in requiring the disclosure of the source. Second, the final statements might have afforded diminished emphasis to the directors' remuneration or allowed Camelot to 'spin' the statements so as to distract from the remuneration issue.). See also Ashworth Hospital Authority v MGN Ltd [2002] UKHL 29; [2002] 4 All ER 193, [2002] UKHL 29, [2002] 1 WLR 2033, 67 BMLR 175 (HL)('Ashworth')(The Court ordered disclosure where the source, in all likelihood an employee, was privy to confidential medical records at a secure state mental health hospital and had divulged details of a patient's medical record. Disclosure was ordered notwithstanding that much of the information was already in the public domain and had been placed there by the patient himself in the course of prior court proceedings, and despite the articulation by Lord Woolf CJ that the protection of journalists' sources 'makes a significant contribution to the ability of the press to perform their role in society'. Ibid at para 66. The Court emphasised the paramount value of medical confidentiality to the institutional integrity of medical institutions. The institution therefore had an interest in discovering the source of the leak so as to prevent further leaks. Ibid at para 63. The fact that the information is paid for was also held to diminish the claim to privilege.)

A serious deficiency of the UK courts' approach is that it decreases the level of foreseeability. This has related consequences for the rule of law and freedom of expression. One of the requirements of the rule of law is that laws must be sufficiently precise to allow reasonable individuals to plan their actions.[1] If the law is too vague, or the test of transgression too open-textured, this not only undermines the rule of law, it will also have a chilling effect on expression since it will leave journalists and their sources unable to determine in advance whether their actions will be afforded the protection of the privilege. In Goodwin the European Court found that the discretion in relation to that Court's version of the journalistic privilege did meet this forseeability requirement.[2] This was of course before the dictum in Camelot which attempts to reconcile, we suggest by fiat, the approaches of the European and United Kingdom courts. The inevitable consequence of this has been a line of cases which seeks to distinguish Goodwin on the facts rather than by recourse to principle leading, at times, to counter-intuitive results.

Despite its drawbacks, the case law in the wake of the Goodwin line of decisions has considerably distilled the UK courts' approach to the privilege. The following principles are discernable: The formal test to be applied in determining whether overriding the privilege against disclosure is warranted is whether the disclosure is necessary and proportionate.[3] There is a formal onus on the party seeking to override the privilege in meeting this test.[4] While the test applied by the European Court and the United Kingdom courts is the same, in applying the test, the UK court enjoys a wide discretion.

[1] See generally L Fuller The Morality of Law (Revised Edition, 1969); L Fuller 'Positivism and Fidelity to Law – A Reply to Professor Hart' (1958) 71 Harvard LR 630. Of Fuller's eight principles of legality, this principle is perhaps the least contentious. Along with the publicity requirement, this principle is generally regarded as an uncontroversial requirement for something to be a valid law.

[2] Goodwin (supra) at para 31 referring with approval to Tolstoy Miloslavsky v United Kingdom (13 July 1995) Series A 316-B at para 37 ('The Court reiterates that, according to its case-law, the relevant national law must be formulated with sufficient precision to enable the persons concerned — if need be with appropriate legal advice — to foresee, to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail. A law that confers a discretion is not in itself inconsistent with this requirement, provided that the scope of the discretion and the manner of its exercise are indicated with sufficient clarity, having regard to the legitimate aim in question, to give the individual adequate protection against arbitrary interference.')

[3] Ashworth (supra) at para 61.

[4] Goodwin (supra).

Moving to the United States, the First Amendment extends no privilege to a journalist against being compelled to reveal the identity of a source in respect of a federal crime. This was the proposition established, by a narrow majority of the Supreme Court, in the leading case Branzburg v Hayes.[1] It does not matter whether the source herself was involved in the commission of the crime or merely provided information as to others' criminal conduct.[2] Any doubt which may have existed as to the categorical nature of this dictum has recently been settled in Judith Miller.[3]

The circumstances of Miller are notorious. Senior members of the George W Bush Administration leaked the identity of a CIA agent, Valerie Plame, in order

[1] 408 US 665, 92 S Ct 2646, 33 L Ed 2d 626 (1972)('Branzburg'). The majority was 5-4. The separate concurrence of Justice Powell, which established the majority, was notoriously opaque and spawned a generation of scholarly and judicial First Amendment analysis and debate as to the proper scope of the dictum in Branzburg. For a representative sample, see NY Times Co v Gonzales 459 F 3d 160, 172-73 (2nd Cir, 2006)(Recognised qualified privilege); Zerilli v Smith 656 F 2d 705, 711 (DC Cir, 1981)('Zerilli')(Affirmed qualified privilege); Riley v City of Chester 612 F 2d 708, 715-16 (3d Cir, 1979)(Affirmed qualified privilege emphasising that where testimony of journalist is relatively insignificant in context of overall evidence this weighs heavily against erosion of privilege); McKevitt v Pallasch 339 F 3d 530, 532 (7th Cir, 2003) (scathingly critical of the line of cases which seeks to discern the recognition of a privilege in Branzburg); see also A Lewis 'Panel Discussion and Collected Essays: Are Journalists Privileged?' (2008) 29 Cardozo L Rev 1431. Of Powell J's concurrence one of the dissenting judges, Justice Stewart, later wrote extra-judicially that the Supreme Court had rejected claims to a journalist's First Amendment privilege to protect their sources 'by a vote of five to four, or, considering Mr. Justice Powell's concurring opinion, perhaps by a vote of four and a half to four and a half'. P Stewart 'Or of the Press' (1975) 26 Hastings LJ 631, 635. The controversy is apparent in almost every First Amendment case that revisits the issue. See, eg, In re: Grand Jury Subpoena, Judith Miller 297 F 3d 964 (2005)('Miller'). In Miller it was argued that since Powell J's concurrence secured the majority, the scope of the Branzburg dictum is confined to the scope of Powell J's judgment, as the 'least common denominator', and cannot be derived from the judgment of the plurality of the Court. Miller (supra) at 969 referring to McKoy v North Carolina 494 US 433, 462, 108 LEd 2d 369 (1990). This interpretation of Branzburg was rejected in the unanimous judgement of the Court in Miller which held that while Powell J had written a separate concurrence he had also endorsed the reasons for the decision of the plurality of the Court and that accordingly the plurality judgment was binding in respect of the absence of a First Amendment privilege. Miller (supra) at 969-970. It is of historical interest that Powell J's judicial conference notes pertaining to the deliberations in Branzburg have recently been discovered and published. They indicate unequivocally that Powell recognised a privilege, though not a constitutional privilege, and was concerned rather with the limitations on such privilege:

> A few days after the argument in Branzburg, Justice Powell prepared notes of the court's private conference on a form that looks a little like a miniature-golf scorecard. In contrast to his meandering concurrence, the few crisp sentences of notes were relatively clear. 'We should not establish a constitutional privilege,' Justice Powell said, referring to one based on the First Amendment. Such a privilege would create problems 'difficult to foresee,' among them 'who are "newsmen" — how to define?' But, he added, 'there is a privilege analogous to an evidentiary one' — like those protecting communications with lawyers, doctors, priests and spouses — 'which courts should recognize and apply' case by case 'to protect confidential information'.

A Liptak 'A Justice's Scribbles on Journalists' Rights' New York Times (7 October 2007).

[2] Branzburg (supra) at 692 and 695.

[3] In re: Grand Jury Subpoena, Judith Miller 297 F 3d 964 (2005)('Miller').

to politically damage her husband, a former ambassador, Joseph Wilson.[1] Leaking the identity of an intelligence agent is a federal crime and the journalists involved refused to comply with a Grand Jury subpoena which would have required them to reveal the source of the leak even though they had not published the name of the intelligence agent. The Court of Appeals unanimously held that there was no doubt as to the authority of the dictum in Branzburg[2] and the Supreme Court declined to hear any further appeal.[3]

The failure to recognise a privilege flowing directly from the US Constitution does not, however, close the door on the privilege in the United States. In Miller, while unanimous in their finding, on the authority of Branzburg, as to the absence of a First Amendment privilege, the Court was heavily divided as to the whether the Branzburg Court had left room for the recognition of a privilege at common law, and, if so, the proper scope of such privilege.[4] Tatel J, the only judge to find that there was a common-law privilege noted that the Court in Branzburg had expressly invited the legislature to define such a privilege[5] and, subsequent to Branzburg, the legislature had authorised the courts to develop evidentiary privileges in federal cases in light of 'reason and experience'.[6] As to the scope of the privilege, Tatel J favoured the so-called 'balancing approach' which emphasises the facts of each case.[7] He also identified guidelines to be followed when

[1] Wilson had revealed that he had been sent to Niger in 2002 in order to investigate whether Iraq had sought to purchase uranium and that he had reported that there was no credible evidence to support this claim. The claim that Iraq had sought to purchase uranium from Africa was central to the Bush Administration's contention that Iraq sought to develop nuclear weapons. This claim became the central basis for the subsequent US invasion of Iraq.

[2] Miller (supra) at 970 ('Unquestionably, the Supreme Court decided in Branzburg that there is no First Amendment privilege protecting journalists from appearing before a grand jury or from testifying before a grand jury or otherwise providing evidence to a grand jury regardless of any confidence promised by the reporter to any source. The Highest Court has spoken and never revisited the question. Without doubt, that is the end of the matter.')

[3] Writ of certiorari denied: Miller v United States 125 S Ct 2977, 162 LEd 2d 906 (2005).

[4] Each of the three members of the Appeal Court wrote separate judgments on this issue; Sentelle J found, on the authority of Branzburg, that there was categorically no common law privilege, Tatel J held there to be a qualified privilege (though he found on the facts that the appellants did not meet the requirements of the privilege) and Henderson J held it unnecessary to decide the question.

[5] Branzburg (supra) at 706.

[6] Federal Rules of Evidence, Pub L No 930595 88 Stat 1926 (1975) Rule 501. The Supreme Court had previously found, albeit in the context of a different privilege, that this legislative authorisation evidenced 'an affirmative intention not to freeze the law of privilege' but to 'leave the door open to change'. Miller (supra) at 989 citing with approval Trammel v United States 442 US 939, 99 S Ct 2879, 61 LEd 2d 309 (1980)(justifying privilege against adverse spousal testimony in terms of the sanctity of the relationship).

[7] Miller (supra) at 991, quoting the Justice Department Subpoena Guidelines 28 CFR § 50.10(2)('[T]he approach in every case must be to strike the proper balance between the public's interest in the free dissemination of ideas and information and the public's interest in effective law enforcement and the fair administration of justice. . .. [C]ourts applying the privilege must consider not only the government's need for the information and exhaustion of alternative sources, but also the two competing public interests lying at the heart of the balancing test. Specifically, the court must weigh the public interest in compelling disclosure, measured by the harm the leak caused, against the public interest in newsgathering, measured by the leaked information's value. That framework allows authorities seeking to punish a leak to access conducting the balancing exercise including that the claim on privilege will always be greater in the civil as opposed to criminal cases[1] and that while exhaustion of other avenues of determining the identity of the source is a necessary condition for overriding the privilege, it is not sufficient.[2]

In respect of the foreseeability problem in applying the balancing test, Tatel J stressed that the decision whether to disclose the information to the journalist is always ultimately the source's decision:

> Indeed, the point of the qualified privilege is to create disincentives for the source — disincentives that not only promote the public interest, but may also protect journalists from exploitation by government officials seeking publication of damaging secrets for partisan advantage. Like other recipients of potentially privileged communications — say, attorneys or psychotherapists — the reporter can at most alert the source to the limits of confidentiality, leaving the judgment of what to say to the source. While the resulting deterrent effect may cost the press some leads, little harm will result, for if the disincentives work as they should, the information sources refrain from revealing will lack significant news value in the first place.[3]

Canadian law distinguishes between two fundamental categories of privilege, so-called class or blanket privilege and case-by-case privilege.[4] Under class privilege, of which attorney-client and police-informer privilege are the standard examples, the subject matter is presumptively privileged and the onus is on those seeking to key evidence when the leaked information does more harm than good. . . while preventing discovery when no public interest supports it'. Tatel J adopted this approach despite its rejection in the context of other forms of privilege. He noted that Jaffee (extending the psychotherapists privilege to social workers) rejected the balancing test not because other jurisdictions had done so but because 'making the promise of confidentiality contingent upon a trial judge's later evaluation of the relative importance of the patient's interest in privacy and the evidentiary need for disclosure would eviscerate the effectiveness of the privilege.' Miller (supra) at F 2d 991 referring to Jaffee (supra) at 1923. See also Upjohn Co v United States 449 US 383, 393 (1981); C Clark 'The Recognition of a Qualified Privilege for Non-Confidential Journalistic Materials: Good Intentions, Bad Law' (1999) 65 Brooklyn LR 369.

[1] Miller (supra) at 970 citing Zerilli (supra)(Even prior to Miller, as both Sentelle J, in the judgment of the Court, and Tatel J in his separate judgment noted, it had been settled that Branzburg is not controlling authority in the context of civil cases 'where the public interest in effective law enforcement is absent'.)

[2] Some of the other guidelines were: (a) the fact that it is difficult to determine the definitional limits of a 'journalist', particularly in view of rapidly developing unconventional forms of journalism, such as bloggers, is not an obstacle to recognising the privilege in standard cases, leaving the further extension of the privilege to future cases. See, for example, Note 'Developments in the Law of Media: II Protecting the New Media: Application of The Journalist's Privilege to Bloggers' (2007) 120 Harvard LR 996. (b) It is important to emphasise that the privilege is not analogous to the medical or legal privilege in so far as it is the journalist's privilege and not that of the source. This entails that only the journalist, not the source, may waive the privilege. As Tatel J notes in Miller, if it were the source's privilege then this might easily be undermined by government or employees demanding waivers as a condition of employment or in advance of any leak. Miller (supra) at 994. (c) The manner in which the reporter treats or uses the received information makes no difference in determining whether the privilege should be upheld. Tatel J held, on the facts of Miller, that it did not matter that the journalists themselves had not disclosed that Valerie Plame was a CIA agent in their publications.

[3] Miller (supra) at 1001.

[4] For a discussion on the origin of the distinction, see R v McClure [2001] 1 SCR 445, 2001 SCC 14 ('McClure') at paras 27-29.

displace the privilege to demonstrate that no privilege should apply.[1] Journalist-source privilege (like that involving priest-congregant and doctor-patient)[2] is not extended this presumptive protection. Instead, the applicability of the privilege is determined by the Court on a case-by-case basis applying the so-called Wigmore test:[3]

(i) The communications must originate in a confidence that they will not be disclosed;
(ii) This element of confidentiality must be essential to the full and satisfactory maintenance of the relationship between the parties;
(iii) The relationship must be one which in the opinion of the community ought to be 'sedulously fostered'; and
(iv) The injury to the relationship from the disclosure of the communications must be greater than the benefit gained from the correct disposal of the litigation.[4]

In a recent decision, the Ontario Court of Appeal expressly referred with approval to that part of the United States jurisprudence which emphasised the high value to be assigned to combating crime when balancing the competing interests.[5] The Court paraphrased the statement of White J in Branzburg as '. . .it is not necessarily better to write about crime than to do something about it.'[6]

Even in cases where the journalist is ordered to reveal a source, the Canadian courts have held that the contempt power as a means of coercing compliance must be used cautiously and only as a last resort. Courts must apply the principle of least intrusive means of securing compliance.[7] The Courts have embraced the

[1] For a description of 'class privilege', see R v Gruenke [1991] 3 SCR 263 at 286 (Lamer CJ).

[2] St Elizabeth Home Society v Hamilton [2008] OJ No 983, 2008 ONC LEXIS 1179, 2008 ONCA 182 ('St Elizabeth Home Society') at para 24.

[3] JH Wigmore Evidence in Trials at Common Law (McNaughton Revised Edition, 1961) Vol 8, 527.

[4] See also McClure (supra) at para 29; A M v Ryan [1997] 1 SCR 157 at para 30; R v National Post [2008] OJ No 744, 2008 ONCA 139 ('National Post') at para 79, St Elizabeth Home Society (supra) at paras 25-26. Notably, in the most recent considerations of the issue, National Post (supra) and St Elizabeth Home Society (supra), the Ontario Court of Appeal has emphasised that the approach to journalistic privilege is the same whether it is founded in the common law or s 2*(b)* of the Canadian Charter, except that the application of the Wigmore criteria at common law must be influenced by the relevant provisions of the Charter. National Post (supra) at para 74. At the time of writing the Supreme Court of Canada had granted an application for leave to appeal, but had not yet delivered judgment.

[5] On the facts of National Post — the journalist had received documents implying that the Prime Minister had a conflict of interest in obtaining a loan — the Appeal Court was particularly keen to order the journalist to deliver up an envelope containing documents supplied by the source for two reasons. First, there was an allegation that the documents (which might disclose the source) were forged. Second, it was not contended by the law enforcement agencies that the documents concerned simply contained evidence of the crime, but that the documents were themselves real evidence and therefore part of the commission of the crime. It was alleged that the sending of the documents to the journalist was part of a criminal conspiracy to implicate the Prime Minister of Canada in wrongdoing and therefore to force him out of office. The physical documents could be subjected to forensic analysis which might aid in the identification of the source. The severity of the alleged crime was added to the scales when the Court balanced the competing interests. National Post (supra) at paras 115-120.

[6] National Post (supra) at para 116.

[7] St Elizabeth Home Society (supra) at paras 40-41.

so-called Dagenais/Mentuck test.[1] The test, which has been applied in a wide range of contexts involving the discretionary application of competing Charter rights, directs courts, rather than approaching matters as a direct clash or conflict between two or more Charter rights or values, to explore alternative measures and to minimise the impact upon the rights and values implicated by incorporating the proportionality and minimal impairment principles enshrined in s 1 of the Charter.[2]

(bb) The preferred approach to the privilege under the Final Constitution

It is possible to discern, at the highest level of generality, certain common principles in the foreign jurisprudence which may inform an approach under FC s 16. The courts assume, in one form or another, a wide discretion as to whether to apply the privilege; a discretion which is extremely sensitive to the facts of each particular case. Moreover, most courts reach for the metaphor of 'balancing' to structure the exercise of this discretion. However, part of the difficulty with this approach is to articulate what precisely is to be added to the scales on each side in a manner that does not pre-select the outcome.[3] It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that 'balancing' barely advances the analysis.

Beyond the poverty of the balancing metaphor however, there is a fundamental difference in the types of 'balancing', even at this ephemeral level. On the one hand there are those courts[4] that appear to approach the issue as a consequentialist balancing of equal interests on either side. On the other hand are those courts[5] that apply a modified consequentialist analysis, holding that there is a powerful presumption in favour of the protection of the journalistic source arising out of the particular importance of the privilege to media freedom and the importance of media freedom to the democratic project.[6] The party seeking

[1] Ibid at paras 46-49. The test is named after the Supreme Court decisions in which the approach was developed. See Dagenais v Canadian Broadcasting Corp [1994] 3 SCR 835 ('Dagenais'). See also R v Mentuck [2001] 3 SCR 442.

[2] St Elizabeth Home Society (supra) at paras 47-49.

[3] For example the balancing expressed by the US Court in Miller is 'between the public's interest in the free dissemination of ideas and information and the public's interest in effective law enforcement and the fair administration of justice.' Miller (supra) at 991. This formulation merely begs the question as to what is in the public interest on each side of the equation and how this is to be 'balanced'. Under such an analysis, the Court's conclusion is likely to determine its reasons rather than the converse.

[4] Such as the United States courts that recognise the privilege in any form. Cf Miller (supra) and the fourth Wigmore criterion applied by the Canadian courts, such as National Post (supra).

[5] The United Kingdom and European courts applying the X v Morgan-Grampian/Goodwin v United Kingdom approach. However, this attempt to distil common principle must be qualified by the analysis, undertaken above, of the substantive differences between the UK and European approaches despite the professed formal similarity of the approach adopted.

[6] In consequentialist terms, under this analysis the source protection is always assigned a very high starting value or alternatively, the values underlying source protection are held to have some intrinsic value within the consequentialist calculus — they are pockets of intrinsic value. Bernard Williams' critique of the structure of consequentialism runs as follows: 'No one can hold that everything, of whatever category, that has value, has it in virtue of its consequences. If that were so, one would just go on for ever, and there would be an obviously hopeless regress. That regress would be hopeless even if one takes the view, which is not an absurd view, that although men set themselves ends and work towards them, it disclosure of the source bears a heavy onus of persuading these courts that the privilege should not be extended in the particular case.[1] The onus can be discharged only if the party seeking disclosure of the source demonstrates that there is, to use the language of Goodwin, 'an overriding requirement in the public interest' in favour of disclosure and that the means of achieving this benefit is proportionate to the aim.[2] To put it differently, lifting of the privilege must be both proportionate — in the sense that it is the least invasive means of achieving an objective of sufficient importance — and necessary — there must be no other means of achieving the objective.

Of these two approaches to 'balancing' we submit that only the latter approach gives proper effect to the status of the privilege as an incidence of the fundamental right to press freedom as opposed to a right or interest of lesser status. However, even under a modified 'balancing' approach there will be a high level of uncertainty in the manner in which a particular court will exercise its discretion in a particular case. This has real consequences for the rule of law, as discussed above, and may have a 'chilling' effect as journalists and their sources struggle to foresee whether the source's anonymity will be respected. It is therefore desirable that our courts craft lower-order principles with as great a degree of specificity as possible. We suggest that the more detailed considerations set out below provide a starting point for developing those principles.

First, it is important to recognise that the privilege is that of the journalist and not the source, and accordingly it cannot be waived by the source. In many cases, pressure, internal and external, implicit and explicit, is brought to bear on the source to waive privilege in order to 'let the journalist off the hook'. The recognition that the source cannot waive the privilege is intended to remove the inevitable corrosion that this pressure inflicts on the privilege. Second, it is not necessary that the 'chilling effect' which will result from disclosure of journalistic sources be proved by empirical evidence in each case.[3] Third, the United is very often not really the supposed end, but the effort towards it on which they set value — that they travel, not really in order to arrive (for as soon as they have arrived they set out for somewhere else), but rather they choose somewhere to arrive, in order to travel. Even on that view, not everything would have consequential value; what would have non-consequential value would in fact be travelling, even though people had to think of travelling as having the consequential value, and something else — the destination — the non-consequential value'. B Williams 'A Critique of Utilitarianism' in JJC Smart & B Williams Utilitarianism For & Against (1973).

[1] Cf § 42.42.9*(h)*(iii) infra.

[2] For more on Goodwin see § 42.7*(d)*(ii)(aa) supra.

[3] See St Elizabeth Home Society (supra) at paras 31-33 ('I am also unable to accept the submission of the Attorney General for Ontario that we should exclude consideration of the Charter on the ground that there is insufficient evidence to support the claim that disclosing the identity of the source would have a "chilling effect" on journalists' sources and the gathering of news. As I have noted, there was some evidence to this effect provided at the show cause hearing by the appellant's editor and the expert witness. For the following reasons, it is my view that no more was required. Courts routinely craft legal rules without the need for elaborate empirical evidence. They instead employ their judgment as to the likely impact rules will have on human behaviour, particularly where the issue is encouraging the free flow of information.')

Kingdom courts have placed significant emphasis on the value of discovering the identity of a disloyal employee as a basis for ordering disclosure.[1] This cannot be consistent with the recognition of the privilege as central to the fundamental right of press freedom.[2]

Fourth, it should not be sufficient for a party seeking disclosure to show merely that without disclosure it will be unable to exercise a legal right or avoid a threatened legal wrong. To do so would be to ignore the pedigree of the privilege by placing a fundamental right on the same footing as an ordinary right. The fifth guideline, which is related to the fourth, is that civil disputes should seldom provide an occasion for compromising the privilege. This is particularly so where the party seeking disclosure is a listed company or where the information disclosed was relevant to wrongdoing which has public significance, such as corrupt activities in a national lottery company or a large bank or accounting firm. Sixth, notwithstanding the approach of the House of Lords in Ashworth,[3] whether the information was purchased from the source should be relevant to disclosure only where the party seeking disclosure has a purely private interest. Where, for example, the source has disclosed information of wrongdoing that is of public significance, the fact that the information was purchased should be regarded as insignificant when considered against the public benefit of the information emanating from the source reaching the public domain.

Seventh, it is correct that the privilege will be more easily overridden in contexts where the source has disclosed information of criminal offences, which may require identification of the source for effective investigation and prosecution of the crime. There is, inescapably, an important public interest in law enforcement. However, the nature of the criminal act is also relevant; a source that discloses information regarding the criminal conduct of a public official should be deserving of greater protection than one who discloses general criminal conduct. To remove that protection in the case of wrongdoing of significant public interest may discourage the information from reaching the public domain at all. Eighth, the fact that alternative avenues of determining the identity of the source have been exhausted should constitute a necessary but not sufficient condition for overriding the privilege. Ninth, the manner in which the journalist utilises the information of the source should be relevant to determining whether the privilege is upheld. A journalist who uses the privilege responsibly, particularly in a matter of grave public importance, should enjoy greater confidence that her source will be protected.[4]

[1] For more on Camelot see § 42.7*(d)*(ii)(aa) supra.

[2] In this respect, the approach of the European Court in Goodwin is to be preferred; a private company's interest in rooting out disloyalty should not feature as a good enough reason to override the privilege. Goodwin (supra) at paras 42-46.

[3] Ashworth (supra) at para 66.

[4] See Miller (supra)(The journalists concerned did not disclose the identity of the CIA agent even though the source had informed them of her identity. Notwithstanding this the court did not consider this relevant to the question of whether disclosure should be ordered.)

Tenth, and finally, it is not a challenge to the recognition of the privilege that the legitimate bounds of what constitutes 'journalism' are difficult to identify. It is true that there will be difficult cases, such as whether a lone blogger with a laptop is a journalist and therefore deserving of the privilege. However, this does not detract from the uncontroversial instances of journalism which are 'easy cases' and deserving of the full protection of the privilege.[1]

(e) Freedom of artistic creativity

Many of the fundamental values underlying freedom of expression, discussed above,[2] are emphasised in artistic expression. Artists frequently address themes and issues which are painful or difficult for society, or which are ignored through social prejudice or routine. Moreover, artistic expression is integral to human culture; it is part of individual and social self-definition.

Two textual features of the protection of artistic expression under FC s 16 stand out and must structure the approach to the interpretation of this right. Firstly, unlike many other jurisdictions and instruments,[3] the text of FC s 16 expressly includes artistic expression. Secondly, FC s 16 refers to 'artistic creativity' not merely 'artistic expression'.[4] The protection of creativity rather than expression expands the range of artistic endeavours that are protected to include the process of creation.[5] It is not merely the outcome or end product of the artistic process that is protected, but the process of creation itself.[6]

The express inclusion of artistic creativity in the text warrants further examination. Although not expressly included in any of the instruments from which the wording of our Constitution's expression clause is derived, it is now trite in those jurisdictions that artistic expression is protected, and in many cases, that it is considered to lie at the core of protected activity.[7] Why, then, did the drafters

[1] National Post (supra) at para 99 ('Case-by-Case approach does not require establishing in advance the legitimate bounds of journalism.')

[2] See § 42.5 supra.

[3] Notably, neither the First Amendment, s 2*(b)* of the Canadian Charter, art 19 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, art 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights, art 19 of the Indian Bill of Rights (Part III of the Indian Constitution), s 14 of the New Zealand Bill of Rights Act of 1990 nor s 20 of the Constitution of Zimbabwe expressly protect artistic expression.

[4] FC s 16(1)(c).

[5] The Oxford Dictionary (10th Edition) defines 'creativity' as follows: 'creative adj. relating to or involving the use of imagination or original ideas in order to create something. n creativity'.

[6] A restrictive interpretation of FC s 16(1)(c) would emphasise the elements of originality in 'creativity', suggesting that those wishing to claim the protection of the right must demonstrate this element. This interpretation, it is submitted, would be subversive of the expressive right as a whole which the Constitutional Court has emphasised must be interpreted generously and subject only to the express categorical exceptions listed in FC s 16(2). See § 42.3 supra.

[7] See, for example, National Endowment for the Arts v Finley ('Finley') 524 US 569, 602, 118 SCt 2168, 141 LEd 2d 500 (1998)(Souter J dissenting — though not on this issue)('It goes without saying that artistic expression lies within this First Amendment protection', citing Hurley v Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston Inc 515 US 557, 569, 115 SCt 2338 (1995).)

consider it necessary to specifically mention artistic creativity in FC s 16(1)? There are a number of possible reasons. The first is for historical emphasis. The Court noted in Islamic Unity that artistic[1] expression had been particularly suppressed under apartheid and that the Interim and Final Constitutions signalled a fundamental departure from this regime.[2]

Secondly, the drafters sought to place beyond any doubt that artistic expression — like the other specifically enumerated forms of expression in FC s 16(1) — is deserving of protection in its own right and that it therefore lies at the core of the expressive right, not merely in the penumbra.[3] This addresses the highly developed American First Amendment jurisprudence where initially only political expression was considered to lie at the core. It required gradual development at the hands of the courts before even standard forms of artistic expression moved closer to the core of expressive freedom alongside political expression, warranting protection for their own sake and not on account of any political content which they may convey. Even now it is not clear that artistic and political expression occupy the same space in the United States expression jurisprudence.[4] The listing of artistic creativity in FC s 16 provides a short cut in this regard, avoiding some expression khakibos.

The khakibos, however, cannot be altogether evaded, and this suggests a third reason for the overt protection of artistic expression. Two fundamental conceptual dimensions govern the analysis of the scope and application of the artistic right in all jurisdictions: (a) the range of activities, acts and endeavours which are, or ought to be, included within the scope of 'artistic expression' (or in our case 'artistic creativity'); and (b) the role of context. These two dimensions are related. Expressive activities that may not be justified in certain contexts will not only be tolerated but may lie at the heart of the protection of expressive freedom when

[1] The Court also identified political expression as having been particularly suppressed.

[2] Islamic Unity (supra) at para 27, quoted with approval in Phillips (supra) at para 27.

[3] The use of the terms 'core' and 'penumbra' in this discussion is not intended to show allegiance to positivist jurisprudence. Rather it is the language employed in many of the cases and is a useful shorthand for articulating broadly those forms of expressive activity, along a continuum, that enjoy greater protection (the corollary of which is that infringements are difficult to justify) versus those that may enjoy lesser protection.

[4] Finley (supra) LEd 2d at 568 ('The constitutional protection of artistic works turns not on the political significance that may be attributable to such productions, though they may indeed comment on the political, but simply on their expressive character, which falls within a spectrum of protected "speech" extending outward from the core of overtly political declarations. Put differently, art is entitled to full protection because our 'cultural life', just like our native politics, "rests upon [the] ideal" of governmental viewpoint neutrality.' Quoting from Turner Broadcasting System, Inc v FCC 512 US 622, 641, 114 SCt 2445, 129 LEd 2d 497 (1994)('Turner Broadcasting') and Joseph Burstyn Inc. v Wilson 343 US 495, 501, 72 SCt 777, 96 LEd 1098 (1952)(Art 'may affect public attitudes and behavior in a variety of ways, ranging from direct espousal of a political or social doctrine to the subtle shaping of thought which characterizes all artistic expression.')) undertaken in social space that is specifically reserved for artistic expression. The express protection of 'artistic creativity' is therefore significant because once an expressive activity is identified as falling within this constitutional category, limitations on that activity may be more difficult to justify.

(i) The centrality of context

As discussed above, the structure of the free speech analysis under FC s 16 entails that the greatest burden of reasoning is borne under the limitations inquiry.[1] The inquiry, as has now been repeatedly affirmed, is essentially one of proportionality.[2] Legislative provisions that are expressly aimed at restricting artistic endeavours or that do so inadvertently by overbreadth — legislative clumsiness — will face particular difficulty in the proportionality inquiry, owing to the special protection afforded to artistic space. This was the unarticulated premise in the Court's reasoning in Phillips where liquor licensing laws which might have had the effect of restricting portrayals of nudity in ordinary theatres where alcohol was offered were struck down.[3] While the Court acknowledged that the State has a legitimate interest in regulating the sale of liquor, the licensing laws were too broad to survive the limitations inquiry. The majority held:[4]

> That the section applies to theatres is of particular concern. A theatre liquor licence holder is obliged to maintain a bona fide theatre at which dramatic performances, concerts or plays are presented. The core business of a theatre is to realise protected freedom of expression by presenting artistic creations that communicate thoughts and ideas. There seems to be no basis to distinguish, as the Act purports to do, between theatres that sell liquor for consumption and those that do not. This is particularly so if it is borne in mind that theatres are in effect restricted to selling liquor only to those to whom access has been granted to attend a particular presentation and then only for a period that starts half an hour before the show begins and cannot go beyond half an hour after it ends. Indeed, the provision controls the kind of entertainment that may be provided at licensed theatres instead of controlling behaviour or conduct at these establishments. The provision is far too wide and also misdirected.[5]

The implication of this reasoning is that the same expression (nude dancing) in a different context — such as an ordinary bar — would fall further towards the penumbra of the right and restriction would therefore be easier to justify.

[1] See § 42.3 supra.

[2] See S Woolman & H Botha 'Limitations' in S Woolman, T Roux, J Klaaren A Stein, M Chaskalson & M Bishop (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2nd Edition, OS, July 2006) Chapter 34.

[3] Phillips (supra) at paras 28-29 (The appellant, who had been charged under the provisions of the Liquor Act 27 of 1989, was the owner of a strip club, not what would commonly be understood to be a theatre. Nonetheless, the Court was conscientious in extrapolating to ordinary theatrical spaces. For further discussion on Phillips, see 'Sexually explicit expression' § 42.9*(e)* infra.)

[4] Yacoob J (Langa DCJ Goldstone J, Kriegler J, Mokgoro J, Ngcobo J, O' Regan J and Sachs J concurring.) In addition to signing on to the majority judgment, Ngcobo J and Sachs J wrote separate concurring opinions. Madala J dissented.

[5] Phillips (supra) at para 28 (emphasis added).

The centrality of context to the breadth of protection afforded by the free speech right, as distinct from the content of the expressive act, has been repeatedly affirmed in the United States First Amendment jurisprudence.[1] In Pacifica a complaint was laid by a listener to a radio station that broadcast a recording of the profane, and now famous, Filthy Words monologue first performed for a live audience in a theatre in California by the then ground-breaking stand-up comedian George Carlin.[2] Noting that the routine was 'vulgar, offensive and shocking' the Court held that the context of the broadcast was critical in determining whether the sanction imposed by the regulatory body was constitutionally permissible. The recording was broadcast at about 2 pm on a weekday and the listener laid a complaint with the relevant regulatory body on the basis that it had been heard over the car radio by his child who was accompanying him. Upholding the sanction, the Supreme Court was willing to assume that the expression would be protected in the context of a stand-up comedy theatre[3] but held that it was deserving of diminished protection in an unrestricted broadcast setting at that particular time of day.[4]

The process of expressly delineating in our expression jurisprudence the contextual havens for artistic creativity, both physical and conceptual, has only just

[1] The classic exposition of the relevance of context is that of Justice Holmes in Schenk v US (supra) at 52 ('We admit that in many places and in ordinary times the defendants in saying all that was said in the circular would have been within their constitutional rights. But the character of every act depends upon the circumstances in which it is done. . . . The most stringent protection of free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theatre and causing a panic. It does not even protect a man from an injunction against uttering words that may have all the effect of force. . . . The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent.') See further Cohen v California 403 US 15, 25 (1971)('Cohen')(In Cohen, which was not an artistic expression case, the appellant was convicted of disturbing the peace after he entered a court room wearing a jacket which said 'Fuck the Draft', which he then folded and removed. The Court quashed the conviction.); FCC v Pacifica Foundation 438 US 726, 98 SCt 3026, 57 LEd 2d 1073 (1978)('Pacifica')(Pacifica referred with approval to Cohen, paraphrasing, 'one occasion's lyric is another's vulgarity').

[2] Carlin was considered the doyen of United States stand-up comedy. He used routines such as this as social satire to take aim at 'what he thought of as the palliating and obfuscating agents of American life – politicians, advertisements, religion, the media and conventional thinking of all stripes'. M Watkins & B Weber 'George Carlin, Comic Who Chafed at Society and Its Constraints, Dies at 71' New York Times (24 June 2008).

[3] Pacifica (supra) LEd 2d at 1088 ('[W]e may assume, arguendo, that this monologue would be protected in other contexts. Nonetheless, the constitutional protection accorded to a communication containing such patently offensive sexual and excretory language need not be the same in every context.') begun.[1] Our Courts will be called upon increasingly to stipulate the context restrictions on expressive acts that are characterised as 'art' and which test expressive boundaries. This is, as discussed above, apparent in the reasoning of the Court in Phillips where a standard artistic context — a theatre — was implicated. It is also apparent, though only implicitly, in De Reuck where the Court found no basis for a constitutional complaint against a statutory offence of knowing possession of child pornography where the legislative scheme[2] permits possession of such material only on specific application for an exemption in each case to the executive committee of the Film and Publications Board.[3] In doing so, the Court rejected the contention that a defence akin to possession with 'legitimate purpose' was required to save the legislative scheme from overbreadth and hence unconstitutionality.[4] Though it was not directly in issue in De Reuck, a feature of the legislative scheme that is particularly noteworthy is that it expressly denies child pornography an 'artistic use'[5] exemption from the highest level of restrictive classification.[6] Accordingly, though in principle on the structure of analysis imposed by FC s 16, all expression, save that expressly excluded, passes the threshold of protected expression, there is only a single basis of justification for expressive acts associated with child pornography, and that is where a formal criterion has been satisfied; namely authorisation from the Film and Publications Board.

[4] Pacifica (supra) at 746-747 (Referring to Joseph Burstyn Inc v Wilson 343 US 495, 502-503 (1952) and *Red Lion Broadcasting Co*mpany v Federal Communications Commission et al (No 2) 395 US 367 (1969)('Red Lion Broadcasting') the Court noted that '[w]e have long recognised that each medium of expression presents special First Amendment problems' and that the broadcast medium received more limited protection because of its 'uniquely pervasive presence'.)

This is understandable under the Constitution. It is correct that even social space reserved for artistic expression which tests the limits of expressive freedom should not be made available for activities involving child pornography.[7] To extend these spaces to expressive acts involving abuse of children, or to afford them a context in which they are protected, would do violence to the entire constitutional project. From a jurisprudential point of view it is interesting to note that the effect of the legislative scheme which has received constitutional sanction in De Reuck — on the limited basis at issue in that case — is that child pornography takes up a position on the continuum of constitutionally protected expressive acts that in effect approaches the categorical exclusions expressly listed in FC 16(2).

[1] See De Reuck (supra) at para 33 (The Court recognised that context was important in characterising the true content of an expressive act; in this case in determining whether the material concerned met the definition of 'child pornography'. However it is essential to distinguish conceptually between the role of context in determining meaning (which was what the Court was considering in this passage of De Reuck) and the role of context in justifying expressive acts, where the meaning/content of those acts is clear or has been determined. We are concerned in this discussion with the latter.)

[2] The Films and Publications Act 65 of 1996 ('FPA').

[3] See De Reuck (supra) at para 13 (The Court observed that this was the effect of the amendments to FPA s 27(1) read with FPA s 22.)

[4] De Reuck (supra) at paras 80-83 (The Court held that, notwithstanding that this was a feature of similar legislation in other jurisdictions, it was open to abuse.)

[5] The term employed in the statute is 'artistic publications'.

[6] FPA sched 5 read with sched 9.

[7] In this context, we use to term 'child pornography' in the sense of the depiction of sexual activity involving actual children (i.e. real and not simulated child pornography). For a discussion of the ambit of child pornography under the FPA, see § 42.9*(e)* infra.

(ii) What is art?

We suggest above that one reason for the express protection of 'artistic creativity' under FC s 16(1) is that expressive acts that have an artistic purpose, are part of the artistic process or are in-and-of themselves 'art', will be deserving of increased protection by making any infringement more difficult to justify under the limitations clause. The question of what activities qualify as acts of artistic creativity will therefore be central to developing South African expression jurisprudence.[1]

Standard categories of artistic expression that are recognised as such in all comparable jurisdictions include: music and poetry;[2] films, programmes broadcast by radio and television;[3] live entertainment such as live music and dramatic works;[4] and paintings, drawings, engravings and sculpture.[5] Though it is not always explicit, an analysis of the cases in other jurisdictions reveals that the type of medium itself is not a sufficient condition for expression to be considered as 'art'; context, as discussed above, is fundamentally important. In addition, some courts have examined intentionality or purpose in order to determine whether an act qualifies as a form of artistic expression.[6]

As innovative artistic forms challenge the limits of the concept of art, the temptation on the part of courts (and legislators) elsewhere to breach the 'forbidden line' of viewpoint neutrality by examining the content of the expressive act has grown proportionately stronger.[7] The temptation appears to be strongest where the artistic expression involves graphic sexual content, violence or subversive political or social comment. In these cases obscenity and indecency laws are

[1] If the assumption is wrong, as indicated above, then there is really little remaining reason to distinguish 'artistic creativity' from other forms of expression. Another way of putting this is that the express protection of artistic creativity entails at least a weak form of 'artistic exceptionalism'.

[2] See Hurley v Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, Inc. 515 US 557, 569, 115 S Ct 2338, 132 LEd 2d 487 (1995)('Hurley').

[3] See Schad v Mount Ephraim 452 US 61, 65, 101 SCt 2176, 68 LEd 2d 671 (1981); Kaplan v California 413 US 115, 119-120, 93 SCt 2680, 37 LEd 2d 492 (1973)('Kaplan').

[4] See Ward v Rock Against Racism 491 US 781, 790, 109 SCt 2746, 105 LEd 2d 661 (1989)('Ward'); Hurley (supra) at 569.

[5] See Kaplan (supra) at 119-120; Hurley (supra) at 569.

[6] See, for example, Ward (supra) at 790 (Music as a form of 'expression and communication' is protected (emphasis added)); Finley (supra)('art is entitled to full protection because our cultural life. . . rests upon the ideal' citing with approval Turner Broadcasting (supra) at 641 (emphasis added, internal quotations omitted)).

[7] Police Dept of Chicago v Mosley 408 US 92, 95, 92 SCt 2286, 33 LEd 2d 212 (1972)('If there is a bedrock principle underlying the First Amendment, it is that the government may not prohibit the expression of an idea simply because society finds the idea itself offensive or disagreeable'); Texas v Johnson 491 US 397, 414, 109 SCt 2533, 105 LEd 2d 342 (1989)('Above all else, the First Amendment means that government has no power to restrict expression because of its message [or] its ideas' which is to say that 'the principle of viewpoint neutrality . . . underlies the First Amendment'.)

often invoked in order to restrict the activity.[1] Perhaps the most probing challenge, at least in the United States, has come from so-called 'performance art',[2] though traditional media such as photography and sculpture have also evoked restrictive or punitive measures from the state particularly where they have included homoeroticism and religious criticism.

